On 2 January 1996, pursuant to Security Council resolution 993 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on all aspects of the situation in Abkhazia, Georgia,¹ and his recommendations regarding the role of the United Nations after the expiry of the mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia (UNOMIG) on 12 January 1996.² In his report, the Secretary-General informed the Council that the Georgian-Abkhaz peace process remained deadlocked and the situation in the UNOMIG area of responsibility remained unsettled and tense. He stated that, despite strenuous efforts by the Russian Federation, in its capacity as facilitator, to draft a protocol acceptable to both parties to the conflict, there had been very little progress. Stressing that the two sides continued to need outside assistance to help them find a lasting solution to their dispute, he recommended that the Security Council extend the mandate of UNOMIG for six months, until 12 July 1996. However, as the situation in Abkhazia as well as the mandate of the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) peacekeeping force would be considered at the meeting of the Council of Heads of State of CIS on 19 January 1996, he also expressed the view that it would be appropriate to make the extension of the mandate of UNOMIG subject to early review by the Security Council if decisions taken at that meeting changed the mandate of the CIS peacekeeping force.

At its 3618th meeting, held on 12 January 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United Kingdom), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Georgia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution, prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.³ The President also drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 8 January 1996 from the representative of Georgia addressed to the President of the Security Council, reporting the killing of eight civilians in the Abkhazian region allegedly by "Abkhaz boeviks".⁴

At the same meeting, the representative of Georgia stated that the firm position of the Security Council regarding the developments in the troubled region of Georgia had repeatedly thwarted the aspirations of the separatists to divide the country and to put its sovereignty in question. Abkhaz separatists stubbornly continued to intimidate the civilian population through kidnappings, torture and summary executions. He informed the Council that, despite the resolutions of the Security Council calling for the unconditional return of refugees to their homes, only a small group of displaced persons had managed to return to the region of Gali, where they lived under constant threat. He also informed the Council that, on 5 January, “Abkhaz boeviks” had brutally tortured and killed innocent civilians. The representative stressed that, in carrying out that act, the separatists had once again overridden numerous resolutions of the Security Council and ignored the presence of the United Nations observers and CIS peacekeeping forces in the region. He maintained that the Government of Georgia had always been committed to the peaceful resolution of the conflict but, at the same time, numerous breaches of agreements by the Abkhaz side, including violations of the provisions of Security Council resolutions and attempts to ignore, evade and negotiate away their obligations, had brought them to the conclusion that peace had to be enforced. Therefore, he appealed to the Security Council to assist his country by using its capacity to stop further bloodshed and restore peace in Georgia. He expressed his country’s hope that the members of the Council and all interested parties would once again seriously consider the situation in Georgia and would take necessary measures to prevent the imminent escalation of the dispute.⁵

The representative of Italy stressed that the activities of UNOMIG should not contribute to an indefinite paralysis of the situation but that UNOMIG needed to continue playing a dynamic role. That role needed to help to restore a climate of security that would finally make it possible to settle the crucial problem of the return of refugees.⁶

The representative of the Russian Federation noted that the draft resolution reaffirmed the dedication of the international community to settling of the conflict in Abkhazia through political dialogue, on the basis of respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia, and to ensuring the rights of the multinational people of that country. He also maintained that the basic responsibility for ending the crisis, through mutually acceptable compromises, lay with the parties to the conflict themselves. While the situation of the negotiating process remained complex, he informed the Council that his country was actively working to encourage the parties to be flexible in their approaches to a settlement. Finally, he expressed his delegation’s concern over the situation regarding the return of refugees and displaced persons, and stated that the Russian Federation considered it essential that the comprehensive and safe return of refugees be ensured.⁷

The representative of China maintained that the final settlement of the question in Georgia depended, in the final analysis, on Georgians of all ethnic groups. In that connection, the international community could play only a supplementary and promoting role that was based on the political will of the two parties concerned. Therefore, he urged the two parties to take into account the fundamental interests of Georgians of all ethnic groups and to engage in real peace talks to find a proper solution.⁸

Speaking both before and after the vote, several speakers made statements expressing their concern over the lack of progress in the negotiations and the humanitarian situation. They expressed support for the role of UNOMIG and expressed hope that a political settlement to the conflict would be reached. Many delegations stressed that both parties needed to cooperate with UNOMIG in creating a safe environment for the return of refugees and displaced persons. Speakers also stressed that any settlement needed to respect the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia.⁹

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1036 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming all its relevant resolutions, in particular resolution 993 (1995) of 12 May 1995,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 2 January 1996,

Decision of 25 April 1996 (3658th meeting):
statement by the President

On 15 April 1996, pursuant to paragraph 13 of Security Council resolution 1036 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on all aspects of the situation in Abkhazia.¹⁰ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that, despite months of vigorous efforts by the Russian Federation, in its capacity as facilitator, neither side had signed the draft protocol on the principal elements of a settlement owing to continued disagreement over the political status of Abkhazia. He stressed that, while the stalemate continued, there could be no significant improvement in the situation of displaced persons and refugees, whose plight was a cause of great concern. He stated that, while it was unlikely that the draft protocol would clearly define the political status of Abkhazia, if the draft protocol was signed, it would serve as a framework for further negotiations and expert discussions. The Secretary-General stated that he saw an important role for the United Nations, especially as both sides, as well as the Russian Federation in its capacity as facilitator, had recently asked his Special Envoy to strengthen the role of the United Nations in the search for a comprehensive settlement.

At its 3658th meeting, held on 25 April 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Chile), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Georgia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President then made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹¹

The Security Council has considered the interim report of the Secretary-General concerning the situation in Abkhazia, Georgia, of 15 April 1996. It has also read with appreciation the letter dated 5 March 1996 from the Government of Georgia and the proposals on the political status of Abkhazia contained therein.

The Council notes with deep concern the continued failure of the parties to achieve a comprehensive political settlement. It also notes the adverse impact that this failure has on the humanitarian situation and economic development in the region. It calls upon the parties, in particular the Abkhaz side, to achieve substantive progress without further delay.

The Council reaffirms its full support for the efforts of the Secretary-General, of his Special Envoy and of the Russian Federation as facilitator, aimed at achieving a comprehensive political settlement of the conflict, including on the political status of Abkhazia, respecting the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia. The Council stresses that the primary responsibility for achieving a comprehensive political settlement rests upon the parties themselves.

The Council welcomes the efforts undertaken by the members of the Commonwealth of Independent States as set out in annex IV to document S/1996/74, in support of such a comprehensive political settlement.

The Council remains deeply concerned at the continued obstruction of the return of the refugees and displaced persons by the Abkhaz authorities, which is totally unacceptable.

The Council expresses its support for the efforts of the Secretary-General to find ways of improving the observance of human rights in the region, as an integral part of the work towards a comprehensive political settlement.

The Council notes the important contribution made by the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia and the collective peacekeeping force of the Commonwealth of Independent States to the stabilization of the situation in the zone of conflict. The Council recalls its encouragement to Member States to make contributions, in cash or kind, to the voluntary fund in support of the implementation of the Agreement on a Ceasefire and

Separation of Forces signed in Moscow on 14 May 1994 and/or for humanitarian aspects, including demining. It welcomes the contributions mentioned in the report of the Secretary-General.

The Council is, however, deeply concerned at the deterioration in security conditions in the Gali region, which has a negative effect on the ability of the Mission to meet its mandated tasks. The Council condemns mine-laying in the Gali region, which has resulted in loss of life, including of a military observer of the Mission. Such mine-laying should cease. The Council calls upon the parties to take all measures in their power to prevent it. The Council stresses that the ability of the international community to assist depends on the full cooperation of the parties, especially the fulfilment of their obligations regarding the safety and freedom of movement of international personnel.

The Council invites the Secretary-General to continue to keep it informed of the situation.

Decision of 12 July 1996 (3680th meeting):
resolution 1065 (1996)

On 1 July 1996, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1036 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on all aspects of the situation in Abkhazia.¹² In his report, the Secretary-General informed the Council that the political process remained at a standstill and that the core issue in the conflict, namely the definition of a political status for Abkhazia acceptable to both sides, remained unresolved. Nor were additional measures by the United Nations to improve conditions in the security and restricted weapons zones likely to prove effective, unless the parties demonstrated the necessary will to cooperate. In the hope that the parties could be persuaded to help reactivate the peace process, he recommended that the Security Council extend the mandate of UNOMIG until 31 January 1997. However, as the mandate of the CIS peacekeeping force would expire on 19 July 1996, the extension of the mandate of UNOMIG needed to be subject to an early review by the Council, if decisions were to be taken to change the mandate of that force.

At its 3680th meeting, held on 12 July 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (France), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of

Georgia and Ireland, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹³ The President also drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 23 May 1996 from the representative of the Russian Federation addressed to the Secretary-General,¹⁴ transmitting the decision on the presence of the Collective Peacekeeping forces and the declaration on the settlement of the Nagorny Karabakh conflict, adopted at the meeting of the Council of Heads of State of the CIS on 17 May 1996; and a letter dated 8 July 1996 from the representative of Georgia addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁵ transmitting a letter of 6 July by the President of Georgia on the situation in Abkhazia.

At the same meeting, the representative of Georgia noted that the peace process was at a standstill and that the Gali region, on which international efforts were focused, was engulfed by lawlessness and chaos. The small number of refugees who had returned to their homes had become hostages in the hands of bandit groups. He stated that things had reached the point where the lives of United Nations military observers were being threatened, not to mention their ability to carry out their mandated tasks. He also stated that the mining of the territory had far-ranging consequences, allowing those who were carrying it out to create conditions in which international observers were deprived of first-hand information and in which the thwarting of the international community was planned and premeditated. He stated that, although the Government of Georgia was well aware that both sides bore responsibility for maintaining peace and stability, a true assessment of the positions of the parties, as reflected in their actions, could not be achieved on the basis of a balanced approach. His Government expressed hope that all possible steps would be taken to expand the participation of the international community in a settlement of the conflict. In his view, it would be useful to send representatives of the Security Council to Georgia to study the situation on the ground. He also expressed the hope that the Council would make use of all means available to

The representative of Germany stressed that, while his country welcomed the valuable and stabilizing role that UNOMIG was playing, the role of the Mission could not be to support a perpetuation of the political status quo without the prospect of a negotiated settlement. If the current political stalemate continued, the Council might be forced to ask itself where a future role for United Nations engagement might be. He also expressed his Government's concern over the deteriorated security situation, which had virtually brought patrolling by UNOMIG to an end. He suggested that, if no improvement was foreseen, there might be reason to take a fresh look at the tasks UNOMIG had been mandated to accomplish.¹⁷

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that it was imperative that there be a speedy settlement of the conflict and the elimination of its consequences. His country was holding active consultations with the Abkhaz leaders, combined with measures to exert strong pressure on the Abkhaz side, in accordance with the decisions of the Council of Heads of State of the CIS of 19 January 1996 in order to give greater flexibility and a constructive nature to the position of Sukhumi.¹⁸ He also stated that another subject of growing concern to his delegation was the ongoing deadlock in the question of the organized return of refugees. His Government expected that a firm demand of the Security Council on the issue would ultimately enjoy a positive reception in Sukhumi. Finally, he concluded that urgent and widespread measures need to be taken to eliminate the widespread danger of mines.¹⁹

Several other speakers called on the parties to make committed efforts towards a political settlement. While delegations welcomed the expressed will of the Government of Georgia to move ahead, they criticized the continued intransigence of the Abkhaz authorities and urged Sukhumi to demonstrate flexibility towards a solution based on the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia. Members also highlighted the humanitarian situation in the region and the plight of refugees and displaced persons; the establishment of the human rights office in Sukhumi; and the deteriorating security situation in the Gali region, where continued mine-laying posed a particular threat to UNOMIG, the CIS peacekeeping force and the local population, as well as to the freedom of movement of the United Nations observers. Most speakers also expressed support for the proposal for a programme for the protection and promotion of human rights in Abkhazia, to be carried out by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) in cooperation with the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE).²⁰

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1065 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming all its relevant resolutions, in particular resolution 1036 (1996) of 12 January 1996,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 1 July 1996,

Noting with deep concern the continued failure by the parties to resolve their differences due to the uncompromising position taken by the Abkhaz side, and underlining the necessity for them to intensify without delay their efforts, under the auspices of the United Nations and with the assistance of the Russian Federation as facilitator, to achieve an early and comprehensive political settlement of the conflict, including on the political status of Abkhazia within the State of Georgia, which fully respects the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia,

Reaffirming the necessity for the parties strictly to respect human rights, and expressing its support for the efforts of the Secretary-General to find ways to improve their observance as an integral part of the work towards a comprehensive political settlement,

Commending the contribution the Mission and the collective peacekeeping force have made to stabilize the situation in the zone of conflict, and stressing the importance of continued close cooperation and coordination between them in the performance of their respective mandates,

Deeply concerned at the deterioration of the security conditions in the Gali region and of the safety and security of the local population, of the refugees and displaced persons returning to the region and of the Mission and collective peacekeeping force personnel,

17. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of France stressed that political negotiations had to be urgently resumed and the obstacle to the return of refugees and displaced persons removed. In that respect, the development of the situation in the Gali region would test the seriousness of the Abkhaz representatives. Continued refusal to cooperate on the issue could only lead the international community to condemn in the harshest terms what would be tantamount to a deliberate policy of “ethnic cleansing”.²¹

Decision of 22 October 1996 (3707th meeting): resolution 1077 (1996) and statement by the President

On 9 August 1996, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1065 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on possible arrangements for the establishment of a human rights office in Sukhumi in cooperation with the OSCE.²²

On 10 October 1996, pursuant to paragraph 16 of Security Council resolution 1065 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in Abkhazia and the operations of the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia.²³ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that, despite the fact that UNOMIG had had to limit its patrolling of the Gali sector owing to the continued mine threat, the Mission had been able to implement some of its mandated tasks in the region. He informed the Council that the peace process continued to be stalled and there had been no progress on the question of the return of refugees and displaced persons to Abkhazia. He had, therefore, asked his Special Envoy to visit the region from 8 to 10 October 1996 in order to assess the situation with representatives of both sides and with the Russian Federation. Based on his assessment of the situation, the Secretary-General would consider what steps could be taken by the United Nations to reinvigorate the peace process.

At its 3707th meeting, held on 22 October 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the reports of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Honduras), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Georgia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by France, Germany, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States.²⁴

Speaking before the vote, the representative of China stated that, in accordance with the agreement reached by the two parties in Georgia, OSCE and OHCHR would set up a human rights office in Abkhazia. He noted that, in order to ensure its efficiency and security, the Secretary-General had recommended that UNOMIG provide appropriate support facilities. He emphasized that the Security Council had entrusted UNOMIG with the primary peacekeeping mandate, and his delegation was of the view that peacekeeping operations needed to have a clear mandate and could not be all-inclusive, still less overextended by assuming responsibilities that fell to other agencies. He expressed regret that the amendments offered by China on the basis of that principled position were not accepted. He expressed his country’s belief that it was beyond the competence of the Council to authorize the establishment of the aforementioned office, and stated that it was not in accordance with the Agreement between the two parties concerned. Therefore, the Chinese delegation would abstain on the draft resolution. He emphasized that, even if the draft resolution was adopted, it should not set a precedent for other United Nations peacekeeping operations.²⁵

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention (China), as resolution 1077 (1996).²⁶ which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 937 (1994) of 21 July 1994, 1036 (1996) of 12 January 1996 and 1065 (1996) of 12 July 1996,

Having considered the reports of the Secretary-General of 1 July and 9 August 1996,

Reiterating its full support for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia within its internationally recognized borders,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 1 July 1996, and in particular paragraph 18 thereof, and decides that the office referred to in this report shall form part of the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia, under the authority of its head of Mission, consistent with the arrangements described in paragraph 7 of the report of the Secretary-General of 9 August 1996;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to continue close cooperation with the Government of Georgia in determining the priorities of the programme referred to in the above-mentioned reports of the Secretary-General and close consultation in its implementation;

3. Also requests the Secretary-General to pursue the necessary follow-up arrangements with the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁷

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 10 October 1996 concerning the situation in Abkhazia, Georgia. It has also taken note of the letter dated 8 October 1996 from the Permanent Representative of Georgia to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council.

The Council notes with deep concern that no significant progress has yet been achieved towards a comprehensive political settlement of the conflict, including on the political status of Abkhazia, respecting the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia within its internationally recognized borders.

The Council reaffirms its full support for an active role of the United Nations, with the assistance of the Russian Federation as facilitator, aimed at achieving a comprehensive political settlement. In the context of the recent visit to the region of the Special Envoy of the Secretary-General, the Council requests the Secretary-General to undertake further efforts and make proposals to reinvigorate the stalled peace process.

The Council stresses that the primary responsibility for achieving such reinvigoration of the peace process rests upon the parties themselves and calls upon them, in particular the Abkhaz side, to resume discussions and to reach substantive progress in the negotiations.

The Council is deeply concerned by the deterioration of the situation in the Gali region and its negative impact on the ability of the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia to meet its mandated tasks. The Council condemns mine-laying and other threats referred to in the report of the Secretary-General against the Mission and the collective peacekeeping force of the Commonwealth of Independent States. The Council calls upon both parties to take all the necessary steps to prevent all such acts.

The Council calls upon both parties to respect the Agreement on a Ceasefire and Separation of Forces signed in Moscow on 14 May 1994 and expresses its concern at the violations referred to in the report of the Secretary-General, in particular the serious violations which recently occurred in the restricted weapons zone.

The Council stresses that the ability of the international community to assist depends on the full cooperation of the parties, especially the fulfilment of their obligations regarding the safety and freedom of movement of international personnel.

The Council is deeply concerned at the announcement made by the Abkhaz side that so-called parliamentary elections would be held on 23 November 1996. The holding of such elections would be possible only after the determination through negotiations of the political status of Abkhazia respecting the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia within its internationally recognized borders, within the framework of a comprehensive political settlement, and with the guaranteed possibility of full participation for all refugees and displaced persons. The Council notes that conditions for holding such elections are not met at present. It calls upon the Abkhaz side to call off these elections and further calls upon both sides to refrain from any action that could heighten tension.

The Council remains deeply concerned at the continued obstruction of the return of the refugees and displaced persons by the Abkhaz authorities, which is totally unacceptable.

The Council welcomes the good cooperation between the Mission and the collective peacekeeping force and their efforts to promote stabilization of the situation in the zone of conflict.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to continue to keep it closely informed of the situation.

Decision of 20 January 1997 (3735th meeting): resolution 1096 (1997)

On 20 January 1997, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1065 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in Abkhazia and an update on the operations of UNOMIG.²⁸ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that the key issues of the peace process remained unresolved. He stated that the role of the United Nations ought to be to support the efforts of the two sides to arrive at mutually acceptable compromises that would underpin an overall settlement. He informed the Council that conditions in the Gali sector had not improved. Acts of violence continued to be committed, some of which appeared to be organized by armed groups operating from south of the Inguri river and to be beyond the control of the Government of Georgia. The situation, if allowed to continue, would make it more difficult for UNOMIG to contribute to the creation of conditions conducive to the safe and orderly return of refugees. He called on all concerned to take effective measures to end a situation that could only have negative effects for the return of peace to the region. In conclusion, the Secretary-General stated that despite the difficult circumstances UNOMIG was operating in, the presence of the Mission continued to be a stabilizing factor in the area and to provide useful support to the political process and therefore recommended that the Security Council extend the mandate of UNOMIG for an additional period of six months ending on 31 July 1997.

At its 3735th meeting, held on 20 January 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Japan), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Georgia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.²⁹ The President further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 21 January 1997 from the representative of Georgia addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁰ transmitting the text of the provisions of the final document of the December 1996 Lisbon Summit of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe pertaining to the situation in Georgia; and a letter dated 24 January 1997 from the representative of Georgia addressed to the Secretary-General, transmitting a copy of the letter dated 20 January 1997 from the Chairman of the Supreme Council of Abkhazia addressed to the Secretary-General.³¹

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1096 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming all its relevant resolutions, in particular resolution 1065 (1996) of 12 July 1996, and recalling the statement by its President of 22 October 1996,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 20 January 1997,

Acknowledging the efforts in support of the peace process of the Secretary-General and his Special Envoy, the Russian Federation as facilitator, and the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General on Georgia, as mentioned in the report,

Noting with deep concern the continued failure by the parties to resolve their differences due to the uncompromising position taken by the Abkhaz side, and underlining the necessity for the parties to intensify without delay their efforts, under the auspices of the United Nations and with the assistance of the Russian Federation as facilitator, to achieve an early and comprehensive political settlement of the conflict, including on the political status of Abkhazia within the State of Georgia, which fully respects the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia,

Noting the opening of the United Nations Human Rights Office in Abkhazia, Georgia,

Reaffirming the necessity for the parties strictly to respect human rights, and expressing its support for the efforts of the Secretary-General to find ways to improve their observance as an integral part of the work towards a comprehensive political settlement,

Noting with concern recent frequent violations on both sides of the Agreement on a Ceasefire and Separation of Forces signed in Moscow on 14 May 1994, as well as acts of violence organized by armed groups operating from south of the Inguri river and beyond the control of the Government of Georgia,

Commending the contribution that the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia and the collective peacekeeping force of the Commonwealth of Independent States have made to stabilize the situation in the zone of conflict, noting that the cooperation between the Mission and the collective peacekeeping force has developed considerably, and stressing the importance of continued close cooperation and coordination between them in the performance of their respective mandates,

Deeply concerned at the continued deterioration of the security conditions in the Gali region, with an increase in acts of violence by armed groups, and indiscriminate laying of mines, including new types of mines, and deeply concerned also at the continued deterioration of the safety and security of the local populations, of the refugees and displaced persons returning to the region and of the personnel of the Mission and of the collective peacekeeping force,

Reminding the parties that the ability of the international community to assist them depends on their political will to resolve the conflict through dialogue and mutual accommodation, as well as their full cooperation with the Mission and the collective peacekeeping force, including the fulfilment of their obligations regarding the safety and freedom of movement of international personnel,

Taking note of the decision adopted by the Council of Heads of State of the Commonwealth of Independent States on 17 October 1996 to expand the mandate of the collective peacekeeping force in the conflict zone in Abkhazia, Georgia, and to extend it until 31 January 1997,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 20 January 1997;

2. Reiterates its deep concern at the continued deadlock in achieving a comprehensive settlement of the conflict in Abkhazia, Georgia;

3. Reaffirms its commitment to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia, within its internationally recognized borders, and to the necessity of defining the status of Abkhazia in strict accordance with these principles, and underlines the unacceptability of any action by the Abkhaz leadership in contravention of these principles, in particular the holding on 23 November and 7 December 1996 of illegitimate and self-styled parliamentary elections in Abkhazia, Georgia;

4. Reaffirms its full support for an active role for the United Nations in the peace process, welcomes the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Envoy aimed at achieving a comprehensive political settlement of the conflict, including on the political status of Abkhazia within the State of Georgia, which fully respects the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia, as well as the efforts that are being undertaken by the Russian Federation in its capacity as facilitator to continue to intensify the search for a peaceful settlement of the conflict, and encourages the Secretary-General to continue his efforts to that end, with the assistance of the Russian Federation as facilitator, and with the support of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe;

5. Welcomes, in this context, the initiative of the Secretary-General, as outlined in his report, to strengthen the role of the United Nations in the peace process;

6. Calls upon the parties, in particular the Abkhaz side, to achieve substantive progress without further delay towards a comprehensive political settlement, and further calls upon them to cooperate fully with the efforts undertaken by the Secretary-General, with the assistance of the Russian Federation as facilitator;

7. Welcomes the renewal of direct dialogue at a high level between the parties, calls upon them to intensify the search for a peaceful solution by further expanding their contacts, and requests the Secretary-General to make available all appropriate support if so requested by the parties;

8. Reaffirms the right of all refugees and displaced persons affected by the conflict to return to their homes in secure conditions in accordance with international law and as set out in the Quadripartite Agreement on Voluntary Return of Refugees and Displaced Persons of 4 April 1994, condemns the continued obstruction of that return, and stresses the unacceptability of any linkage of the return of refugees and displaced persons with the question of the political status of Abkhazia, Georgia;

9. Recalls the conclusions of the Lisbon summit of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe regarding the situation in Abkhazia, Georgia, and reaffirms the unacceptability of the demographic changes resulting from the conflict;

10. Reiterates its condemnation of killings, particularly those ethnically motivated, and other ethnically related acts of violence;

11. Reiterates its demand that the Abkhaz side accelerate significantly the process of voluntary return of refugees and displaced persons without delay or preconditions, in particular by accepting a timetable on the basis of that proposed by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, and further demands that it guarantee the safety of spontaneous returnees already in the area and regularize their status in cooperation with the Office of the High Commissioner and in accordance with the Quadripartite Agreement, in particular in the Gali region;

12. Welcomes, in this context, the holding of the meeting on 23 and 24 December 1996 in Gali on the resumption of the orderly repatriation of refugees and displaced persons, in particular to the Gali region, and calls upon the parties to continue these negotiations;

13. Calls upon the parties to ensure the full implementation of the Agreement on a Ceasefire and Separation of Forces signed in Moscow on 14 May 1994;

14. Condemns the continued laying of mines, including new types of mines, in the Gali region, which has already caused several deaths and injuries among the civilian population and the peacekeepers and observers of the international community, and calls upon the parties to take all measures in their power to prevent the laying of mines and intensified activities by armed groups and, to cooperate fully with the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia and the collective peacekeeping force of the Commonwealth of Independent States in order to honour their commitments to ensure the safety and the freedom of movement of all personnel of the United Nations, the collective peacekeeping force and international humanitarian organizations;

15. Urges the Secretary-General to take the necessary steps in response to the threat posed by the laying of mines in order to improve security conditions so as to minimize the danger to Mission personnel and to create conditions for the effective performance of the mandate of the Mission;

16. Decides to extend the mandate of the Mission for a new period terminating on 31 July 1997, subject to a review by the Council of the mandate of the Mission in the event of any changes that may be made in the mandate of the collective peacekeeping force;

17. Expresses its full support for the implementation of a concrete programme for the protection and promotion of human rights in Abkhazia, Georgia, notes, in this context, the opening on 10 December 1996 of the United Nations Human Rights Office in Abkhazia, Georgia, as part of the Mission, under the authority of the Head of Mission, and requests the Secretary-General to continue to pursue the necessary follow up arrangements with the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe and to continue close cooperation with the Government of Georgia;

18. Reiterates its encouragement to States to contribute to the voluntary fund in support of the implementation of the Moscow Agreement and/or for humanitarian aspects, including demining, as specified by donors;

19. Requests the Secretary-General to consider the means of providing technical and financial assistance aimed at the reconstruction of the economy of Abkhazia, Georgia, following the successful outcome of the political negotiations;

20. Also requests the Secretary-General to continue to keep the Council regularly informed and to submit a report after three months from the date of adoption of the present resolution on the situation in Abkhazia, Georgia, including on the operations of the Mission and to provide recommendations in that report on the nature of the United Nations presence, and in this context expresses its intention to conduct a thorough review of the operation at the end of its current mandate;

21. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 8 May 1997 (3774th meeting):
statement by the President

On 25 April 1997, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1096 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in Abkhazia and the operations of UNOMIG.³² In his report, the Secretary-General observed that both parties to the conflict seemed determined to continue their direct contacts and to broaden their bilateral relations. The Russian Federation had also supported a strengthened involvement by the United Nations in the political process and agreed that future peacemaking efforts would be guided by a better exchange of information and improved coordination. In response to the increased demands arising from a strengthened involvement by the United Nations in the peacemaking process, the Secretary-General planned to appoint as a successor to his current Special Envoy for Georgia, a resident Special Representative who would be based in Tbilisi and Sukhumi. He also expressed his intention to strengthen the political element of UNOMIG by deploying a few additional officers specialized in political, civil and legal affairs.

At its 3774th meeting, held on 8 May 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Republic of Korea), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Georgia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 1 April 1997 from the Russian Federation addressed to the Secretary-General,³³ transmitting four instruments adopted by the CIS Council of Heads of State on 28 March 1997; and a letter dated 30 April 1997 from the representatives of Azerbaijan and Georgia addressed to the Secretary-General, transmitting resolution 1119 (1997) on conflicts in Transcaucasia adopted by the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe on 22 April 1997.³⁴ The President also drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 28 April 1997 from the representative of Georgia addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁵ transmitting a letter from the President of Georgia of 23 April 1997 stating that, for security reasons, the return of refugees and internally displaced persons was not feasible and requesting that the role of the United Nations in the peace process be invigorated.

At the same meeting, following consultations, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:³⁶

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 25 April 1997 concerning the situation in Abkhazia, Georgia. It has also taken note of the letter dated 1 April 1997 from the Permanent Representative of the Russian Federation to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General and of the letter dated 28 April 1997 from the Permanent Representative of Georgia to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council.

The Council reiterates its full support for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia within its internationally recognized borders.

The Council reaffirms its full support for a more active role for the United Nations, with the assistance of the Russian Federation as facilitator, aimed at achieving a comprehensive political settlement.

The Council acknowledges the efforts in support of the peace process of the Secretary-General and his Special Envoy, with the assistance of the Russian Federation as facilitator, and of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe and the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General on Georgia, as mentioned in the report of the Secretary-General of 25 April 1997.

In this context, the Council fully supports the proposals made by the Secretary-General in his report to strengthen the involvement of the United Nations in the peacemaking process. It fully supports, in particular, the intention of the Secretary-General to convene a meeting with both sides to map out the areas where concrete political progress can be made. The Council encourages the Secretary-General to explore the idea of revitalizing the Coordinating Commission and establishing expert groups on questions of mutual interest.

The Council welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to appoint a resident Special Representative, as a successor to his current Special Envoy for Georgia, and to strengthen the political element of the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia.

The Council further encourages the Secretary-General to take such steps as are necessary, in cooperation with the parties, in order to ensure a prompt and safe return of the refugees and displaced persons to their homes, with the assistance of all relevant international organizations. The Council takes note of the initiation of activities by the United Nations Human Rights Office in Abkhazia, Georgia.

The Council continues to stress that the primary responsibility for reinvigorating the peace process rests upon the parties themselves. It welcomes the continuation of direct dialogue between the parties. The Council calls upon them, in particular the Abkhaz side, to intensify the search for a peaceful solution by further expanding their contacts, and requests the Secretary-General to make available all appropriate support if so requested by the parties. The Council notes the appeal of the Secretary-General to both parties to pursue the current discussions on the implementation of the decisions adopted by the Council of Heads of State of the Commonwealth of Independent States on 28 March 1997.

The Council remains deeply concerned at the continued deterioration of the security conditions in the Gali region, including acts of violence by armed groups, indiscriminate laying of mines and armed robbery, and the resulting deterioration of the safety and security of the local populations, of the refugees and displaced persons returning to the region, and of the personnel of the Mission and the collective peacekeeping force of the Commonwealth of Independent States. The Council condemns the acts of violence which have led to the loss of life of members of the collective peacekeeping force. It welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to continue to make every effort to build upon the positive results recently achieved in order to improve the safety of the military observers and the operational effectiveness of the Mission.

The Council reminds the parties of their obligation to ensure the safety and freedom of movement of the Mission and the collective peacekeeping force and, in particular, to prevent the laying of mines.

The Council welcomes the good cooperation between the Mission and the collective peacekeeping force and their efforts to promote stabilization of the situation in the zone of conflict.

The Council also welcomes the continued efforts by the United Nations agencies and humanitarian organizations to address the urgent needs of those suffering most from the consequences of the conflict in Abkhazia, Georgia, in particular internally displaced persons, and encourages further contributions to that end. It also reiterates its encouragement to States to contribute to the voluntary fund in support of the implementation of the Agreement on a Ceasefire and Separation of Forces and/or for humanitarian aspects, including demining, as specified by donors.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to continue to keep it closely informed of the situation.

Decision of 31 July 1997 (3807th meeting):
resolution 1124 (1997)

On 18 July 1997, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1096 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in ³⁶ S/PRST/1997/25.

Abkhazia, Georgia and the operations of UNOMIG.³⁷ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that prospects for progress in the Georgian/Abkhaz peace process had improved. The efforts by the Russian Federation to resolve the situation and the declared commitment by the Secretary-General to strengthen the involvement of the United Nations in that process had set in motion a series of initiatives by the parties to the conflict. In the light of progress achieved in the political process and bearing in mind the positive effects that UNOMIG continued to have on the situation, he recommended that the Security Council extend the mandate of the Mission until 31 January 1998, subject to an early review by the Council if decisions taken by the Governments of the States that made up CIS resulted in changes in the mandate of the CIS peacekeeping force.

At its 3807th meeting, held on 31 July 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Sweden), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Georgia and Germany, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 28 July 1997 from the representative of Georgia addressed to the Secretary-General, transmitting the text of a letter of the same date from the President of Georgia addressed to the Secretary-General, concerning the talks held between the Georgian and Abkhaz sides.³⁸

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution.³⁹ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1124 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions, reaffirming in particular resolution 1096 (1997) of 30 January 1997 and recalling the statement by its President of 8 May 1997,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 18 July 1997,

Reiterating its full support for the more active role for the United Nations, with the assistance of the Russian Federation as facilitator, aimed at achieving a comprehensive political settlement,

Acknowledging the efforts in support of the peace process of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative, with the assistance of the Russian Federation as facilitator, as well as the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General on Georgia and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, as mentioned in the report,

Welcoming, in this context, the indication given in the report that prospects for progress in the peace process have improved, noting with deep concern the continued failure by the parties to resolve their differences, and underlining the necessity for the parties to intensify without delay their efforts to achieve an early and comprehensive political settlement of the conflict, including on the political status of Abkhazia within the State of Georgia, which fully respects the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia,

Reaffirming the necessity for the parties strictly to respect human rights, expressing its support for the efforts of the Secretary-General to find ways to improve their observance as an integral part of the work towards a comprehensive political settlement, and noting developments in the work of the United Nations Human Rights Office in Abkhazia, Georgia,

Commending the contribution that the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia and the collective peacekeeping force of the Commonwealth of Independent States have made in stabilizing the situation in the zone of conflict, noting that the cooperation between the Mission and the collective peacekeeping force is good and has continued to develop, and stressing the importance of continued close cooperation and coordination between them in the performance of their respective mandates,

Deeply concerned at the continuing unstable and tense security conditions in the Gali region, characterized by acts of violence by armed groups, by armed robbery, and other common crime and, most seriously, by the laying of mines, including new types of mines, and deeply concerned also at the resulting lack of safety and security for the local populations, for the refugees and displaced persons returning to the region and for the personnel of the Mission and of the collective peacekeeping force,

Reminding the parties that the ability of the international community to assist them depends on their political will to resolve the conflict through dialogue and mutual accommodation, as well as their full cooperation with the Mission and the collective peacekeeping force, including the fulfilment of their obligations regarding the safety and freedom of movement of international personnel,

Taking note of the decision adopted by the Council of Heads of State of the Commonwealth of Independent States on 28 March 1997 to expand the mandate of the collective peacekeeping force in the conflict zone in Abkhazia, Georgia, and to extend it until 31 July 1997, but noting with concern the uncertainty surrounding its extension beyond that date,

Decision of 6 November 1997 (3830th meeting):
statement by the President

On 28 October 1997, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1124 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in Abkhazia and the operations of UNOMIG.⁴⁰ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that, despite efforts, there continued to be no progress on the key issues, although both sides had reaffirmed their commitment to resolving the conflict by political means. He noted that the mandate of the Security Council provided for an innovative, experimental mediatory arrangement that offered the potential for productive synergy that could usefully assist the parties in their difficult challenge and that without the presence of UNOMIG and the CIS peacekeeping force, there could be little doubt that open conflict would resume. While ceasefire violations had been limited to incidents of a non-violent nature, several longstanding and significant violations of the Agreement on a ⁴⁰ S/1997/827.

Ceasefire and Separation of Forces, signed in Moscow on 14 May 1994,⁴¹ had remained. The Secretary-General, therefore, called on the parties to abide fully by the Agreement and to cooperate with the Mission in that regard. In addition, the mine threat as well as armed and criminal activities had been threatening the lives of innocent civilians and had affected the operations of aid agencies, the CIS peacekeeping force and UNOMIG. He called on both sides to do all they could to improve the security situation in the area and to end such activities.

At its 3830th meeting, held on 6 November 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (China), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Georgia and Germany, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴²

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 28 October 1997 concerning the situation in Abkhazia, Georgia.

The Council regrets that, despite strenuous efforts to reactivate the peace process, there has been no visible progress on the key issues of the settlement—the future political status of Abkhazia and the permanent return of refugees and displaced persons.

The Council attaches particular importance to the more active role for the United Nations in the peace process, and encourages the Secretary-General to continue his efforts to that end, with the assistance of the Russian Federation as facilitator, and with the support of the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General on Georgia and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe. The Council calls upon the parties to cooperate fully with these efforts.

In this context, the Council regrets that the adjourned high-level meeting on the conflict, held in Geneva under the aegis of the United Nations, did not resume in October as initially planned. It welcomes the intention of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General to resume this meeting on 17 November to map out the areas where concrete political progress could be made, to take forward discussion of social and economic issues in support of a comprehensive settlement of the conflict, and to address the issue of the return of refugees. The Council calls upon all concerned to do their utmost for the resumption of this meeting with the constructive engagement in particular of the Abkhaz side.

The Council commends the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative aimed at achieving a comprehensive settlement of the conflict, including on the political status of Abkhazia within the State of Georgia, which respects fully the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia, and the efforts undertaken by the Russian Federation as facilitator, in particular the initiative put forward by the President of the Russian Federation on 1 August 1997 and the Georgian-Abkhaz negotiations held in Sukhumi on 9 and 10 September with the participation of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General. The Council welcomes the meeting of the President of Georgia and Mr. Vladislav Ardzinba in Tbilisi on 14 August 1997, facilitated by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Russian Federation, and the continuation of direct dialogue between the parties, and calls upon them to intensify the search for a peaceful solution by further expanding their contacts.

The Council further encourages the Secretary-General to take such steps as are necessary, in cooperation with the parties, to ensure a prompt and safe return of the refugees and displaced persons to their homes, with the assistance of all relevant international organizations.

The Council welcomes the decision of the Council of Heads of State of the Commonwealth of Independent States mentioned in the report of the Secretary-General to extend the mandate of the collective peacekeeping force of the Commonwealth of Independent States until 31 January 1998.

The Council welcomes the good cooperation between the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia and the collective peacekeeping force and their efforts to promote stabilization of the situation in the zone of conflict. The Council calls upon the parties to cooperate fully with the Mission and the peacekeeping force.

The Council expresses concern at the continuing violations of the Agreement on a Ceasefire and Separation of Forces signed in Moscow on 14 May 1994 and calls upon the parties to ensure the full implementation of this agreement.

The Council remains deeply concerned at the continuing unstable and tense security conditions in the Gali and Zugdidi sectors and in the Kodori valley. The Council strongly condemns the kidnapping of personnel of the Mission and the collective peacekeeping force.

The Council also condemns the continued laying of mines, including more sophisticated types of mines, which has already caused several deaths and injuries among the civilian population and the peacekeepers and observers of the international community. It calls upon the parties to take all measures in their power to prevent the laying of mines and intensified activities by armed groups and to cooperate fully with the Mission and the collective peacekeeping force in order to honour their commitments to ensure the safety and the freedom of movement of all personnel of the United Nations, the collective peacekeeping force and international humanitarian organizations.

The Council supports the additional measures envisaged by the Secretary-General in the report to improve the safety of Mission personnel and to create conditions for the effective performance of the mandate of the Mission.

The Council welcomes the continued efforts by the United Nations agencies and humanitarian organizations to address the urgent needs of those suffering most from the consequences of the conflict in Abkhazia, Georgia, in particular internally displaced persons, encourages further contributions to that end, and reiterates its encouragement to States to contribute to the voluntary fund in support of the implementation of the Moscow Agreement and/or for humanitarian aspects, including demining, as specified by donors.

The Council reminds the parties that the ability of the international community to assist them depends on their political will to resolve the conflict through dialogue and mutual accommodation.

Decision of 30 January 1998 (3851st meeting): resolution 1150 (1998)

On 19 January 1998, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1124 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in Abkhazia and an update on the operations of UNOMIG.⁴³ In his report, the Secretary-General informed the Council that much groundwork had been laid during the reporting period towards achieving substantive progress in the Georgian/Abkhaz peace process and that the political machinery to address the military, political and economic ramifications of the peace process was in place. Progress, therefore, depended on the determination of the two sides to negotiate in earnest and to work constructively with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General to achieve substantial results. He noted that, thanks in part to additional steps taken to ensure the security of the Mission, UNOMIG had been able to carry out the tasks entrusted to it in relative safety. Bearing in mind that the presence of UNOMIG continued to be a stabilizing factor in the area and to provide useful support for the political process, and in the light of the steps already taken to promote substantive progress in the peace process, he recommended that the Security Council extend the mandate of UNOMIG for an additional period of six months, ending on 31 July 1998, subject to a review by the Council in the event of any changes made in the mandate of the CIS peacekeeping force.

At its 3851st meeting, held on 30 January 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (France), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Georgia and Germany, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 12 January 1998 from the representative of Georgia addressed to the Secretary-General,⁴⁴ transmitting the text of a statement issued by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Georgia regarding acts of hostage-taking in the Gali region of Abkhazia. In the letter, the Government of Georgia expressed its belief that the Security Council, the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and the Government of the Russian Federation would make every effort to prevent the escalation of tension from creating realistic grounds for reversing the process of the return of refugees and displaced persons, and for the protection of their rights. In the implementation of the above, the Government of Georgia deemed it necessary to reinforce the mandate of the United Nations observers to include police functions, to qualitatively enhance the activities of the Human Rights Office and seriously to consider the commencement of a comprehensive international peacekeeping operation.

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution.⁴⁵ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1150 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions, reaffirming in particular resolution 1124 (1997) of 31 July 1997, and recalling the statement by its President of 6 November 1997,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 19 January 1998,

Supporting the vigorous efforts to move the peace process forward made by the Secretary-General and his Special Representative aimed at achieving a comprehensive political settlement of the conflict, including on the political status of

Abkhazia within the State of Georgia, respecting fully the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia, with the assistance of the Russian Federation as facilitator, as well as of the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General and of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe,

Stressing in this context the importance of the concluding statement adopted in Geneva on 19 November 1997 in which both sides welcomed, inter alia, the proposals of the Secretary-General to strengthen the involvement of the United Nations in the peace process, approved a programme of action and set up a mechanism for its implementation,

Reaffirming the necessity for the parties strictly to respect human rights, expressing its support for the efforts of the Secretary-General to find ways to improve their observance as an integral part of the work towards a comprehensive political settlement, and noting developments in the work of the United Nations Human Rights Office in Abkhazia, Georgia,

Deeply concerned at the continuing unsettled and tense security situation in the Gali region, characterized by the laying of mines, by a rising number of criminal activities, including kidnapping and murder, and, most seriously, by significantly increased subversive activities by armed groups which disrupt the peace process and impede a settlement of the conflict and the return of refugees, and at the resulting lack of safety and security for the local population, for the refugees and displaced persons returning to the region, for aid workers and for the personnel of the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia and of the collective peacekeeping force of the Commonwealth of Independent States,

Welcoming in this context the contribution that the collective peacekeeping force and the Mission have made to stabilizing the situation in the zone of conflict, noting that the cooperation between the Mission and the collective peacekeeping force is good and has continued to develop, and stressing the importance of continued close cooperation and coordination between them in the performance of their respective mandates,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 19 January 1998;

2. Notes with satisfaction that much groundwork has now been laid towards achieving substantive progress in the peace process, but reiterates its deep concern that, as yet, no significant progress has been made on the key issues in the settlement of the conflict in Abkhazia, Georgia;

3. Commends the parties for the constructive approach shown at the meeting held in Geneva from 17 to 19 November 1997, welcomes in this context the establishment and the first meetings of the Coordinating Council and, within its framework, of working groups, under the chairmanship of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, and stresses the importance of the effective working of these bodies in order to help progress towards a settlement;

4. Emphasizes the fact that the primary responsibility for reinvigorating the peace process rests upon the parties themselves, and reminds them that the ability of the international community to assist them depends on their political will to resolve the conflict through dialogue and mutual accommodation and on their taking real steps towards bringing about a comprehensive political settlement of the conflict through the speediest possible agreement on and signature of the relevant documents;

5. Reaffirms the particular importance it attaches to the more active role for the United Nations in the peace process, encourages the Secretary-General and his Special Representative to continue their efforts, with the assistance of the Russian Federation as facilitator, and with the support of the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, and calls upon the parties to work constructively with them to achieve a comprehensive settlement;

6. Encourages the continuation of direct dialogue between the parties, calls upon them to intensify the search for a peaceful solution by further expanding their contacts, and requests the Secretary-General to make available all appropriate support if so requested by the parties;

7. Recalls the conclusions of the Lisbon summit of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe regarding the situation in Abkhazia, Georgia, reaffirms the unacceptability of the demographic changes resulting from the conflict and the right of all refugees and displaced persons affected by the conflict to return to their homes in secure conditions in accordance with international law and as set out in the Quadripartite Agreement on the Voluntary Return of Refugees and Displaced Persons, of 4 April 1994, encourages the Secretary-General to take such steps as are necessary, in cooperation with the parties, to ensure a prompt and safe return of the refugees and displaced persons to their homes, and stresses the urgent need for progress in this area, in particular from the Abkhaz side;

8. Calls upon the parties to ensure the full implementation of the Agreement on a Ceasefire and Separation of Forces signed in Moscow on 14 May 1994;

9. Condemns the intensified activities by armed groups, including the continued laying of mines, in the Gali region, and calls upon the parties to honour fully their commitments to take all measures in their power and to coordinate their efforts to prevent such activities, and to cooperate fully with the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia and the collective peacekeeping force of the Commonwealth of Independent States in order to ensure the safety and the freedom of movement of all personnel of the United Nations, the collective peacekeeping force and international humanitarian organizations;

10. Welcomes the additional steps taken in order to improve security conditions so as to minimize the danger to Mission personnel and to create conditions for the effective performance of the mandate of the Mission, and urges the Secretary-General to continue to make further arrangements in this field;

11. Decides to extend the mandate of the Mission for a new period terminating on 31 July 1998, subject to a review by the Council of the mandate of the Mission in the event of any changes that may be made in the mandate or in the presence of the collective peacekeeping force;

12. Encourages further contributions to address the urgent needs of those suffering most from the consequences of the conflict in Abkhazia, Georgia, in particular internally displaced persons, including contributions to the voluntary fund in support of the implementation of the Moscow Agreement and/or for humanitarian aspects, including demining, as specified by donors, requests the Secretary-General to consider the means of providing technical and financial assistance aimed at the reconstruction of the economy of Abkhazia, Georgia, following the successful outcome of the political negotiations, and welcomes the planning of a needs assessment mission;

13. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to keep the Council regularly informed, to report after three months from the date of the adoption of the present resolution on the situation in Abkhazia, Georgia, including on the operations of the Mission, and to provide recommendations in that report on the nature of the United Nations presence, and, in this context, expresses its intention to conduct a thorough review of the operation at the end of its current mandate;

14. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 28 May 1998 (3887th meeting):
statement by the President

On 11 May 1998, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1150 (1998), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in Abkhazia and the operations of UNOMIG.⁴⁶ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that the sustained efforts to move the Georgian/Abkhaz peace process forward had been negatively affected by a new wave of tension in the area, marked by an assassination attempt on the President of Georgia and deteriorating security conditions in the UNOMIG area of operations. The personnel and property of UNOMIG had continued to be subjected to acts of violence by criminal groups, and a particularly serious incident had taken place on 19 February, when a group of 15 to 20 armed men forcibly entered the sector headquarters of UNOMIG in Zugdidi, and took four observers hostage. In view of those developments, the Secretary-General suggested that a possible solution would be to provide the Mission with a self-protection unit, along with the necessary civilian support personnel, whose task would be to guard each of the facilities of UNOMIG, except the one in Tbilisi. He also expressed his belief that there was much to be done by both sides and, in particular by the Government of Georgia, to improve the security situation in the area of operation of UNOMIG. If the Security Council agreed with the concept of a self-protection unit, he stated that his Special Representative would consult with the Abkhaz authorities, in close consultation with the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General, bearing in mind that the agreement of both parties would be a condition for the deployment of such a unit. If the Council preferred a different approach, he suggested three options: reducing UNOMIG to the minimal possible presence, pending a significant improvement in the security situation; redeploying UNOMIG at its authorized strength and resuming previous operations using mine and ballistic-protected vehicles; or strengthening security arrangements with the CIS peacekeeping force.

At its 3887th meeting, held on 28 May 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (Kenya) then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 14 April 1998 from the representative of Georgia addressed to the Secretary-General;⁴⁷ and letters dated 22 and 26 May 1998, respectively, from the representative of Georgia addressed to the President of the Security Council.⁴⁸ In the letters, the Government of Georgia informed the Council of ethnic-related incidents in the Gali region and of large-scale military operations that the Abkhaz separatists had carried out in the security zone, which had prompted the exodus of more than 30,000 returnees. He expressed his country's belief that the Security Council needed to make a decision with regard to the resettlement of recently expelled returnees and their humanitarian assistance. Georgia was confident that the time had come to acknowledge that the conflict might threaten international peace and security, which would allow the Council to act in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations.

⁴⁸ S/1998/423 and S/1998/432.

At the same meeting, the President also drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 5 May 1998 from the representative of the Russian Federation addressed to the Secretary-General.⁴⁹ The President then made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁵⁰

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 11 May 1998 concerning the situation in Abkhazia, Georgia.

The Council is gravely concerned by the recent outbreak of violence in the zone of conflict, which has resulted in the loss of human life and a significant outflow of refugees, and calls upon the parties to observe strictly the Agreement on a Ceasefire and Separation of Forces signed in Moscow on 14 May 1994 and also the ceasefire protocol signed on 25 May 1998, as well as all their obligations to refrain from the use of force and to resolve disputed issues by peaceful means only.

The Council is deeply concerned by the recent slowing of the peace process. The Council calls upon the parties to display the necessary political will to achieve substantial results on the key issues of the negotiations within the framework of the United Nations-led peace process and through direct dialogue, with full respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia.

The Council reaffirms the right of all refugees and displaced persons affected by the conflict to return to their homes in secure conditions, calls upon both sides to fulfil their obligations in this regard, and welcomes in this context the efforts undertaken by the members of the Commonwealth of Independent States, as set out in their decision of 28 April 1998, in support of the return of refugees and of a comprehensive political settlement.

The Council is deeply concerned that the deteriorating security situation in the Gali region gravely impedes the work of aid workers, personnel of the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia and of the collective peacekeeping force of the Commonwealth of Independent States. The Council calls upon the parties to honour fully their commitments to take all measures in their power to improve the security situation, including the creation of a joint mechanism for investigation and prevention of acts that represent violations of the Moscow Agreement and terrorist acts in the zone of conflict.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to consult both sides on the basis of paragraphs 26, 48 and 49 of his report, in particular on the concept of the self-protection unit outlined therein, and on other options as appropriate, in close cooperation with the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General, bearing in mind the need to secure the consent of both parties to his proposal. The Council also requests the Secretary-General to report to it on the outcome of those consultations as soon as possible and no later than 12 June 1998.

resolution 1187 (1998)

On 14 July 1998, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1150 (1998), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in Abkhazia and the operations of UNOMIG.⁵¹ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that, during the reporting period, his Special Representative and the Russian Federation in its capacity as facilitator were forced to address one immediate crisis after another, caused by the lack of willingness on the part of both sides to renounce violence and seriously consider peaceful options for the resolution of the conflict. Some 40,000 people from the Gali district had had to seek refuge for the second time on the other side of the Inguri river, and the international community had to witness how its assistance and efforts “literally went up in flames”, when houses that had been constructed out of UNHCR funds were deliberately set on fire, with the motive apparently to expel people from their home areas. As the situation on the ground was tense and the risk of new confrontations was high, he informed the Council that he had asked his Special Representative to make demarches to both sides to prevent the resumption of hostilities. The Special Representative was also maintaining liaison with the parties in order to consider the organization of another high-level meeting in Geneva, with a view to bringing the “Geneva process” back on track. He also stated that, despite the support of the Security Council, the self-protection unit option had not been accepted by the Abkhaz side and that neither party had supported the option that UNOMIG be reduced to the minimal possible presence. He stressed that he would keep the matter under constant review, but that both sides still had to make substantial efforts to contain the threat on the ground. Activities in the Gali sector by armed groups, who operated from the Georgian side of the Inguri river, required a determined effort by the authorities of Georgia to contain them. At the same time, the Abkhaz side needed to do much more than it had done to protect the Mission elsewhere in Abkhazia and the harassment campaign launched against UNOMIG would only exacerbate the situation on the ground. As the presence of the Mission continued to be a stabilizing factor in the area and to provide useful support for the political process, the Secretary-General recommended that the Security Council extend the mandate of the Mission for a further period of six months terminating on 31 January 1999, subject to a review by the Council of the mandate of UNOMIG in the event of any changes in the mandate or in the presence of the CIS peacekeeping force.

At its 3912th meeting, held on 30 July 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Russian Federation), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Georgia and Germany, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by France, Germany, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States.⁵² The President also drew the attention of the Council to two letters dated 15 July 1998 as well as to ones dated 16 and 17 July 1998, respectively, from the representative of Georgia addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting statements on incidents in Abkhazia and elsewhere.⁵³ Finally, he drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 14 July 1998 from the representative of the Russian Federation addressed to the Secretary-General, transmitting a statement by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs concerning events in Gali district in Abkhazia, Georgia.⁵⁴

At the same meeting, the representative of Georgia stated that the tragic events in the Gali district had clearly shown that the peace process was at a critical point and required a new and possibly unconventional assessment of the situation. Despite the concrete proposals made by the Georgian side and because of the intransigence of the Abkhaz leadership, an agreement on the political status of Abkhazia had not yet been reached and the fate of some 250,000 refugees and displaced persons remained unsolved. He stressed that, while Georgia had been hopeful when the Geneva negotiations had started under the leadership of the United Nations with the participation of the Russian Federation as facilitator, the OSCE and the members of the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General,⁵⁵ the events in the Gali district during May 1998 had called the “Geneva process” into question. Despite the negotiations, the Abkhaz separatist regime had continued to follow its policy of terror against the population of the Gali district and only the vigorous efforts of his Government had made it possible to prevent the involvement of Georgia in a full-scale war. Noting that violence still continued in the region even after the introduction of the ceasefire, he underscored the worry that the Abkhaz side continued to reject implementation of its obligations regarding the unconditional return of refugees expelled during the events of May, as stipulated in the agreement signed on 25 May 1998. He noted that the punitive operations had been carried out within the 12-kilometre security zone controlled by the peacekeeping contingent, which demonstrated the fragility of the mechanism of the ceasefire regime in the conflict zone. He also expressed regret that the proposal by Georgia on the expansion of the mandate and functions of the peacekeeping operation had been flatly rejected by the Abkhaz side, whereas the international organizations and other participants in the peace process had failed to be demanding enough during the adoption of such an important decision. While his country condemned any action directed against the civilian population and would take all possible measures against such action, he believed that without international efforts and concrete steps on the part of the United Nations, the resolution of the problem would be impossible. He expressed his country’s belief that it was necessary to create a crisis management mechanism in the conflict zone, and reiterated his country’s support for the United Nations self-protection unit. He also stressed that the effectiveness of the conflict-resolution mechanism depended on the monitoring of the human rights situation, and the Gali events had made it clear that the Human Rights Office required changes and serious reinforcement. In closing, he conveyed the appeal of the President of Georgia that the international community adopt a decision which lived up to the aspirations of the Security Council, reflecting the real situation in the conflict zone and suggesting relevant assessments and findings. Such a resolution needed to differ from the previous 18 documents, contribute to the decrease of tension and give new impetus to the reinvigoration of the negotiations.⁵⁶

The representative of the Russian Federation expressed his deep concern at the continuing tense situation in the Gali region and noted that the Gagra Protocol on a Ceasefire and Withdrawal of Armed Formations of 25 May 1998 was not being implemented either by the Abkhaz or by the Georgian side. He demanded from the Abkhaz side the establishment of conditions for the speedy return of the peaceful civilians that had left that region as a result of the hostilities and stressed that, if the Abkhaz authorities posed obstacles to their return, such actions would be regarded as being aimed at the implementation of “ethnic cleansing”. He expressed his delegation’s deep concern with the problem of the security of UNOMIG personnel and his belief that the greatest responsibility lay with the Georgian and the Abkhaz sides, which needed to immediately take the measures that were needed. He informed the Council that with the mediation of the Russian Federation, the sides had been actively negotiating on preparations for a meeting between the President of Georgia and the Abkhaz leader, which would eliminate the consequences of the events of May in the Gali region and would allow for the adoption of a package of documents on key issues in order to reach a settlement. He reiterated that the Russian Federation was ready to promote comprehensively both the implementation of the agreements achieved in Geneva and the advancement of an overall settlement.⁵⁷

The representatives of the United States, the United Kingdom and Germany stressed that the events of May 1998 were a direct result of the lack of commitment by the parties and that, unless there was an improvement in the peace process and in the security situation on the ground, a reconsideration of the United Nations peacekeeping commitment could not be excluded.⁵⁸

Several other speakers expressed grave concern at the resumption of hostilities in May 1998 and called on the parties to observe the relevant ceasefire agreements. They also expressed concern at the new outflow of refugees from the region and reaffirmed the right of all refugees and displaced persons to return to their homes in secure conditions. They stressed that the Abkhaz side should allow immediately and without any conditions the return of all persons displaced since the resumption of the hostilities in May. A number of speakers also pointed to the need for the Georgian authorities to curb the operation of groups from the Georgian side of the Inguri river. They condemned the acts of violence against the personnel of UNOMIG and the renewed laying of mines. Expressing grave concern at the security situation on the ground, many speakers welcomed the intention of the Secretary-General to keep that issue under constant review. Others spoke in favour of a self-protection unit in UNOMIG.⁵⁹

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1187 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming all its relevant resolutions, in particular resolution 1150 (1998) of 30 January 1998, recalling the statement by its President of 28 May 1998, and recalling also the letter from its President to the Secretary-General dated 10 July 1998,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 14 July 1998,

Deeply concerned at the continuing tense and confrontational situation in the Zugdidi and Gali regions and at the risk of resumed fighting,

Deeply concerned also at the unwillingness on the part of both sides to renounce violence and seriously consider peaceful options for the resolution of the conflict,

Supporting the vigorous efforts made by the Secretary-General and his Special Representative, with the assistance of the Russian Federation in its capacity as facilitator as well as of the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General and of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, to prevent the resumption of hostilities and to give a new impetus to the negotiations within the United Nations-led peace process, and welcoming in this context the adoption by the parties of the concluding statement of the meeting held in Geneva from 23 to 25 July 1998 and the accompanying statement of the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General,

Reaffirming the necessity for the parties strictly to respect human rights, expressing its support for the efforts of the Secretary-General to find ways to improve their observance as an integral part of the work towards a comprehensive political settlement, and noting developments in the work of the United Nations Human Rights Office in Abkhazia, Georgia,

Welcoming the role of the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia and of the collective peacekeeping force of the Commonwealth of Independent States as stabilizing factors in the zone of conflict, noting that the cooperation between the Mission and the collective peacekeeping force is good, and stressing the importance of continued close cooperation and coordination between them in the performance of their respective mandates,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 14 July 1998;

2. Reiterates its grave concern at the resumption of hostilities in May 1998, and calls upon the parties to observe strictly the Agreement on a Ceasefire and Separation of Forces signed in Moscow on 14 May 1994 and also the ceasefire protocol signed on 25 May 1998, as well as all their obligations to refrain from the use of force and to resolve disputed issues by peaceful means only;

3. Expresses its deep concern at the significant outflow of refugees resulting from the recent hostilities, reaffirms the right of all refugees and displaced persons to return to their homes in secure conditions in accordance with international law and as set out in the Quadripartite Agreement on the Voluntary Return of Refugees and Displaced Persons of 4 April 1994, calls upon both sides to fulfil their obligations in this regard, and demands in particular that the Abkhaz side allow the unconditional and immediate return of all persons displaced since the resumption of hostilities in May 1998;

4. Condemns the deliberate destruction of houses by Abkhaz forces, with the apparent motive of expelling people from their home areas;

5. Recalls the conclusions of the Lisbon summit of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe regarding the situation in Abkhazia, Georgia, and reaffirms the unacceptability of the demographic changes resulting from the conflict;

6. Expresses its deep concern at the extremely difficult humanitarian situation of the displaced persons from the Gali region as well as of those who remained in that area, and at the serious negative impact recent developments have had on international humanitarian efforts in the Gali region;

7. Reiterates that the primary responsibility for achieving peace rests upon the parties themselves, and reminds them that the continued commitment of the international community to assist them depends on their progress in this regard;

8. Calls upon the parties to display without delay the necessary political will to achieve substantial results on the key issues of the negotiations, with full respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia, within the framework of the United Nations-led peace process and through direct dialogue, and to cooperate fully with the efforts made by the Secretary-General and his Special Representative, with the assistance of the Russian Federation as facilitator, as well as of the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General and of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe;

9. Welcomes the meeting of the parties held in Geneva from 23 to 25 July 1998, and calls upon them to continue and increase their active engagement in this process initiated by the Secretary-General aimed at achieving a comprehensive political settlement;

10. Reminds the parties of their commitments to take all measures in their power and to coordinate their efforts to ensure the security and safety of international personnel, and calls upon them to implement fully and without delay those commitments, including the creation of a joint mechanism for investigation and prevention of acts that represent violations of the Moscow Agreement and terrorist acts in the zone of conflict;

11. Condemns the acts of violence against the personnel of the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia, the renewed laying of mines in the Gali region and also the attacks by armed groups, operating in the Gali region from the Georgian side of the Inguri River, against the collective peacekeeping force of the Commonwealth of Independent States, and demands that the parties, in particular the Georgian authorities, take determined measures to put a stop to such acts which subvert the peace process;

12. Reiterates its deep concern regarding the security of the Mission, welcomes the measures already taken to improve security conditions to minimize the danger to Mission personnel and to create conditions for the implementation of the mandated tasks of the Mission, underlines the need to continue to make further arrangements in this field, welcomes also the instruction of the Secretary-General that the security of the Mission be kept under constant review, and calls upon the two parties to facilitate the implementation of practical measures resulting from that review;

13. Expresses its concern at the mass media campaign launched in Abkhazia, Georgia, and the acts of harassment against the Mission, and calls upon the Abkhaz side to cease those acts;

14. Decides to extend the mandate of the Mission for a new period terminating on 31 January 1999, subject to a review by the Council of the mandate of the Mission in the event of any changes that may be made in the mandate or in the presence of the collective peacekeeping force;

15. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to keep the Council regularly informed, to report three months after the date of the adoption of the present resolution on the situation in Abkhazia, Georgia, including on the operations of the Mission, and expresses its intention to conduct a review of the Mission in the light of the report of the Secretary-General, taking into account in particular the progress made by the two parties in creating secure conditions in which the Mission can fulfil its existing mandate, and in establishing a political settlement;

16. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 25 November 1998 (3948th meeting): statement by the President

On 29 October 1998, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1187 (1998), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation on Abkhazia and the operations of UNOMIG.⁶⁰ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that the recent meeting in Athens between the Georgian and Abkhaz sides on confidence-building measures had been an achievement, and he appealed to them to implement in good faith the measures agreed upon at the meeting. He underlined that he continued to be concerned by the security situation of UNOMIG, which was threatening the very viability of the Mission. An ambush in Sukhumi on 21 September 1998 had been a deliberate attack on the United Nations, and its intent was clearly to kill UNOMIG personnel. Prior to the attack, patrolling and other activities of UNOMIG had already been curtailed for security reasons. He stressed that, unless the parties took urgent measures to improve the security environment for the United Nations, he would be obliged to draw down the strength of the Mission and to consider relocating United Nations personnel and facilities to more secure locations. Should UNOMIG be compelled to withdraw from Abkhazia, the situation in the security and restricted weapons zones would almost certainly become more serious, and a return to open hostilities could not be excluded. Therefore, he urged Member States, and the members of the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General in particular, to use their influence with the parties to ensure that the security environment improved significantly. In the meantime, he recommended that the Security Council consider whether increasing substantially the number of internationally recruited security personnel to provide internal security to the installations of the Mission might offer at least a partial solution.

At its 3948th meeting, held on 25 November 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda.

At the same meeting, the President (United States) made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶¹

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 29 October 1998 concerning the situation in Abkhazia, Georgia.

The Council remains deeply concerned at the continuing tense and unstable situation in the Gali and Zugdidi regions and at the threat of resumption of serious hostilities. The Council demands that both sides observe strictly all their obligations to refrain from the use of force and to resolve disputed issues by peaceful means only.

The Council welcomes the reinvigoration of the negotiations within the United Nations-led peace process. It particularly welcomes the meeting of both sides on confidence-building measures held in Athens from 16 to 18 October 1998, the largest and most representative meeting of the parties since the military confrontation of 1993, and the increased bilateral contacts between the two sides. The Council strongly urges the two sides to build on this momentum to widen their commitment to the United Nations-led peace process, to continue to intensify their discussion, in particular within the Coordinating Council, and to expand their relations at all levels. The Council also strongly encourages the parties to work together in order to convene a meeting between the President of Georgia and Mr. Vladislav Ardzinba and to reach agreements, in particular on the return of refugees and measures for the economic rehabilitation of Abkhazia, Georgia, as a concrete step towards easing tensions and leading to improvement in the security environment. The Council reiterates its call to both sides to display without delay the necessary will to achieve substantial results on the key issues of the negotiations, and calls upon them to implement promptly and in good faith their undertakings, so that living conditions for the population on both sides can be improved by practical confidence-building measures.

The Council strongly condemns the deliberate acts of violence against the personnel of the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia and of the collective peacekeeping force of the Commonwealth of Independent States, including the continued laying of mines, which also endangers the civilian population and impedes the work of the humanitarian organizations. The Council demands that both sides take determined and prompt measures to put a stop to such acts, which subvert the peace process, and to ensure that the security environment of all international personnel improves significantly.

The Council welcomes the efforts of the Secretary-General aimed at improving the security of the Mission, approves his proposal to increase the number of internationally recruited lightly-armed security personnel and additional local security personnel to provide internal security to the installations of the Mission, and requests the Secretary-General to keep the security of the Mission under constant review, taking into account the observations contained in his report.

The Council reminds both sides that the continued commitment of the international community to assist them depends on their progress in achieving peacefully a comprehensive political settlement.

Decision of 28 January 1999 (3972nd meeting):
resolution 1225 (1999)

On 20 January 1999, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1187 (1998), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in Abkhazia, Georgia and an update on operations of UNOMIG.⁶² In his report, the Secretary-General stated that, while the political process towards a settlement had been slow and at times had seemed to be almost blocked, UNOMIG had continued to carry out its mandate, thus contributing to lessening tensions on the ground, preventing an exacerbation of potentially serious incidents and providing a climate in which substantive negotiations could take place on the political level. Measures taken by the Mission had resulted in a situation in which UNOMIG military observers had been able to conduct limited patrolling without serious security incidents during the last three months. He cautioned that, for a return to previous patrolling patterns to happen, the two sides needed to take substantive and tangible measures to curb criminal and terrorist activities. He also stated that the recent intensification of activities related to the peace process had highlighted the need for a strengthening of the civilian component of the Mission, particularly in the field of political and civil affairs and public information. Given that UNOMIG remained indispensable for maintaining a situation conducive to the search for a political settlement of the conflict, he recommended that the Security Council extend the mandate of the Mission for a further six months until 31 July 1999.

At its 3972nd meeting, held on 28 January 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Brazil), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Georgia and Germany, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by France, Germany, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States.⁶³ The President also drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 25 January 1999 from the representative of Georgia addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting a letter dated 22 January 1999 from the President of Georgia addressed to the Security Council, outlining the position of Georgia and giving their recommendations on UNOMIG.⁶⁴

At the same meeting, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Georgia stated that despite the “pretended lull”, the situation in the region was getting worse in all aspects. The political, socio-economic and criminal situations were catastrophic. Despite the efforts of Georgia, the living conditions of the refugees and displaced persons were nothing less than tragic. All of those factors increased tension in the country and threatened the peace and security of the whole Caucasus region. He informed the Council that since the events of May 1998, the extermination of the Georgian population and violence against the returnees in Abkhazia, particularly in the Gali region, had not ended and the punitive operations by the “so-called Abkhaz militia” were ongoing. Moreover, during that period, the Abkhaz side had employed all the power in its hands to stall the process of the return of the refugees and displaced persons to their homes and had violated every article of the May 1998 Protocol in that regard. He expressed his country’s belief that the time had come for the Security Council to seriously consider the question of the ethnic cleansing committed by the Abkhaz side against the Georgian population. The international community also needed to warn the Abkhaz side that further attempts to obstruct the return of refugees and displaced persons to their homes would be viewed as a continuation of the policy of ethnic cleansing and might well prompt the Security Council to employ relevant articles of the Charter of the United Nations and bring those responsible to justice. Expressing grave concern at the security conditions in the conflict zone, he stressed that, under its current mandate, the peacekeeping operation of the CIS had exhausted itself, and the Georgian side was opposed to the extension of the mandate unless it reflected the realistic objectives provided in the decisions of the numerous summits of the CIS. He also stated that, due to the lack of proper security conditions, UNOMIG was also failing to discharge its functions fully. He reiterated that Georgia had always supported the deployment of a self-protection unit in the zone and that the realities indicated that UNOMIG could not function adequately without one. He maintained that, under the circumstances, the United Nations could not limit itself to just reaffirming the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia, but needed to elaborate proposals for a comprehensive political settlement of the conflict in Abkhazia and submit them to the parties for consideration. He expressed his belief that the Security Council needed to reaffirm the rights of all refugees and displaced persons to return to their homes; take note of the decisions adopted at the December 1998 OSCE Ministerial Council meeting in Oslo, which offered principal provisions with regard to the conflict settlement in Abkhazia; welcome bilateral dialogue between parties; and express readiness to promote the region’s economic rehabilitation, in accordance with the progress reached in the peace process. He also stressed that effective monitoring of the CIS peacekeeping operation needed to become one of the most important criteria for the activities of UNOMIG.⁶⁵

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1225 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions, in particular resolution 1187 (1998) of 30 July 1998, and the statement by its President of 25 November 1998,

Noting the letter dated 22 January 1999 from the President of Georgia to the President of the Security Council,

Deeply concerned at the continuing tense and unstable situation in the conflict zone and at the risk of resumed fighting,

Deeply concerned also at the continued deadlock in achieving a comprehensive settlement of the conflict in Abkhazia, Georgia,

Welcoming, in this context, the contribution that the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia and the collective peacekeeping force of the Commonwealth of Independent States have made to stabilizing the situation in the zone of conflict, noting that the working relationship between the Mission and the collective peacekeeping force has been good at all levels, and stressing the importance of continued close cooperation and coordination between them in the performance of their respective mandates,

Recalling the conclusions of the Lisbon summit of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe regarding the situation in Abkhazia, Georgia,

Reaffirming the necessity for the parties strictly to respect human rights, expressing its support for the efforts of the Secretary-General to find ways to improve their observance as an integral part of the work towards a comprehensive political settlement, and noting developments in the work of the United Nations Human Rights Office in Abkhazia, Georgia,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 20 January 1999;

2. Expresses its concern at the failure of the parties to conclude, after bilateral contacts and the Athens meeting of 16 to 18 October 1998 on confidence-building measures, agreements on security and the non-use of force, the return of refugees and displaced persons and economic reconstruction, and urges the parties to resume bilateral negotiations to this end;

3. Demands that both sides widen their commitment to the United Nations-led peace process, continue to seek and engage in dialogue, expand their contacts at all levels and display without delay the necessary will to achieve substantial results on the key issues of the negotiations, and underlines the necessity for the parties to achieve an early and comprehensive political settlement, which includes a settlement on the political status of Abkhazia within the State of Georgia, which fully respects the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia within its internationally recognized borders;

4. Emphasizes, in this context, that the readiness and ability of the international community to assist the parties depend on their political will to resolve the conflict through dialogue and mutual accommodation and on their acting in good faith to implement promptly concrete measures towards bringing about a comprehensive political settlement of the conflict;

5. Strongly supports the sustained efforts made by the Secretary-General and his Special Representative with the assistance of the Russian Federation, in its capacity as facilitator, as well as of the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, to prevent hostilities and to give a new impetus to the negotiations within the United Nations-led peace process in order to achieve a comprehensive political settlement, and welcomes, in this context, the intention of the Secretary-General to propose a strengthening of the civilian component of the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia;

6. Demands that both sides observe strictly the Agreement on a Ceasefire and Separation of Forces, signed in Moscow on 14 May 1994, and all their obligations to refrain from the use of force and to resolve disputed issues by peaceful means only, and calls upon them to display greater resolve and willingness to make the Joint Investigation Group functional;

7. Expresses its continuing concern at the situation of refugees and displaced persons, resulting most recently from the hostilities of May 1998, reaffirms the unacceptability of the demographic changes resulting from the conflict and the imprescriptible right of all refugees and displaced persons affected by the conflict to return to their homes in secure conditions in accordance with international law and as set out in the Quadripartite Agreement on the Voluntary Return of Refugees and Displaced Persons, of 4 April 1994, and calls upon the parties to address this issue urgently by agreeing and implementing effective measures to guarantee the security of those who exercise their unconditional right to return;

8. Welcomes, in this context, the efforts of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General to facilitate, as a first step, the safe return of refugees and displaced persons to the Gali region, and calls upon the parties to resume and intensify their bilateral dialogue to this end;

9. Condemns the activities by armed groups, including the continued laying of mines, which endanger the civilian population, impede the work of the humanitarian organizations and seriously delay the normalization of the situation in the Gali region, and deplores the lack of serious efforts by the parties to bring an end to those activities;

10. Reiterates its demand that both sides take immediate and determined measures to put a stop to such acts and ensure that the security environment of all international personnel improves significantly, and welcomes the first steps taken in this regard;

11. Reiterates its deep concern regarding the security of the Mission, welcomes the implementation of measures in this regard, and requests the Secretary-General to keep the security of the Mission under constant review;

12. Decides to extend the mandate of the Mission for a new period terminating on 31 July 1999, subject to a review by the Council of the mandate of the Mission in the event of any changes that may be made in the mandate or in the presence of the collective peacekeeping force of the Commonwealth of Independent States;

13. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to keep the Council regularly informed and to report after three months from the date of the adoption of the present resolution on the situation in Abkhazia, Georgia;

14. Expresses its intention to conduct a thorough review of the operation at the end of its current mandate, in the light of steps taken by the parties to achieve a comprehensive settlement;

15. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 7 May 1999 (3997th meeting):
statement by the President

On 21 April 1999, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1225 (1999), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in Abkhazia and an update on UNOMIG.⁶⁶ In his report, the Secretary-General informed the Council that a valuable opportunity to take a step forward in the peace process had been missed due to the failure to reach agreement in January 1999 on the terms for the return of refugees and measures for economic rehabilitation. Over the past three months it had taken all the diligence of the military and political staff of UNOMIG to preserve and slightly improve on the lessening of tension in the area of responsibility of the Mission that had resulted from the 21 December 1998 meeting in Gali. However, the situation was not yet such that the operational restrictions imposed on the Mission in February 1998 could be lifted or that some or all of the team bases could be reopened. The Secretary-General stressed that a further improvement of the security situation, based on tangible measures by the two sides, would be required before UNOMIG was able to return to its pre-February 1998 operational pattern and, in that way, increase its presence in all parts of its area of responsibility. Only then would UNOMIG be able to fully implement the mandate entrusted to it by the Security Council. He stated that two specific actions by the parties would significantly help to improve the situation on the ground: the full separation of forces from the ceasefire line and the establishment of a joint investigation mechanism.

At its 3997th meeting, held on 7 May 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Gabon) then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 6 April 1999 from the representative of the Russian Federation addressed to the Secretary-General, transmitting the text of a decision on further measures to settle the conflict in Abkhazia, adopted in Moscow on 2 April 1999 by the Council of Heads of State of the CIS.⁶⁷

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶⁸

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 21 April 1999 concerning the situation in Abkhazia, Georgia.

The Council reiterates its demand that both sides widen their commitment to the United Nations-led peace process, continue to seek and engage in dialogue, expand their bilateral contacts and display without delay the necessary will to achieve substantial results on the key issues of the negotiations, and underlines the necessity for the parties to achieve an early and comprehensive political settlement, which includes a settlement on the political status of Abkhazia within the State of Georgia, which fully respects the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia within its internationally recognized borders.

The Council reaffirms the unacceptability of the demographic changes resulting from the conflict and the imprescriptible right of all refugees and displaced persons affected by the conflict to return to their homes in secure conditions, and calls upon the parties to address this issue urgently by agreeing and implementing effective measures to guarantee the security of those who exercise their unconditional right to return.

The Council welcomes in this context the decision of the Council of Heads of State of the Commonwealth of Independent States of 2 April 1999 on further measures to settle the conflict in Abkhazia, Georgia. The Council notes the conclusions of the eighth session of the Coordinating Council of the Georgian and Abkhaz sides held on 29 April 1999.

The Council expresses its deep concern at the failure of the parties to reach an agreement on the terms for the return of refugees and displaced persons to the Gali region and measures for economic rehabilitation. The Council stresses the need for them to conclude urgently such an agreement, which would make it possible for the international community to participate in this effort, as well as an agreement on peace and guarantees for the prevention of armed confrontation.

The Council welcomes the improvements in the security situation, but notes that the general situation in the conflict zone still remains tense and unstable.

The Council urges the parties to exercise great restraint in their responses to any incidents arising on the ground and to take concrete steps to improve their cooperation in this field. The Council demands that both sides take immediate and determined measures to put a stop to the activities by armed groups, including the continued laying of mines, and to establish a climate of confidence allowing refugees and displaced persons to return. The Council further demands that both sides ensure a full separation of forces from the ceasefire line, in accordance with the ceasefire protocol signed on 25 May 1998, and establish a joint investigation mechanism without further delay.

The Council welcomes the continued contribution that the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia and the collective peacekeeping force of the Commonwealth of Independent States have made to stabilizing the situation in the zone of conflict and notes that the working relationship between the Mission and the collective peacekeeping force has remained good.

The Council reaffirms the importance it attaches to the security of the Mission and of all international personnel and recalls the obligations of both sides in this regard. The Council welcomes the steps taken to enhance the operations and security of the Mission.

The Council strongly supports the sustained efforts made by the Secretary-General and his Special Representative with the assistance of the Russian Federation, in its capacity as facilitator, as well as of the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe to prevent hostilities, to protect human rights and to advance a settlement.

Decision of 30 July 1999 (4029th meeting):
resolution 1255 (1999)

On 20 July 1999, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1225 (1999), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in Abkhazia, and an update on UNOMIG.⁶⁹ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that, while achieving progress in the negotiations process aimed at the comprehensive settlement of the conflict remained difficult, contacts between the sides had continued to grow. At the same time, the key issues of the settlement process remained unresolved. He informed the Council that in the security field, the recent improvements in the security situation along the line of separation of forces and the efforts of both sides to produce those improvements were noted with approval, but the full separation of forces remained to be accomplished. Noting that UNOMIG continued to play an essential role in the stabilization of the situation in Abkhazia,

Georgia, the Secretary-General recommended that the Security Council extend the mandate of UNOMIG for a further six-month period, ending on 31 January 2000.

At its 4029th meeting, held on 30 July 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Malaysia), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Georgia and Germany, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁷⁰ The President also drew the attention of the Council to letters dated 19, 22 and 22 July 1999, respectively, from the representative of Georgia addressed to the President of the Security Council;⁷¹ and a letter dated 21 July 1999 from the representative of Georgia to the Secretary-General, transmitting a number of documents and statements relating to the situation in Abkhazia.⁷²

At the same meeting, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Georgia stated that the peace process was stalled, and that despite his country's joint efforts there had been no tangible progress in the course of negotiations that could break the existing impasse. He stated that the time had come for the Security Council to clearly point to the unacceptability of the stagnation and to categorically urge the Abkhaz side to take constructive action. He maintained that the Council needed to recall the decisions of the Budapest and Lisbon summits of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe and to stress that obstruction of the return of the refugees and displaced persons was nothing but a continuation of the policy of ethnic cleansing. That provision would trigger adequate action on the part of the Council, in line with the spirit and the letter of the Charter of the United Nations. He also stated that the decision of the Abkhaz authorities to hold "so-called presidential elections" in the autumn of 1999 was one more attempt to establish the demographic changes resulting from the conflict, and he expressed his belief that the Council needed to severely condemn the intention of the Abkhaz side to hold such "elections", declare it unlawful and strictly warn the Abkhaz authorities that such action might damage the peace process. He reiterated the support of Georgia for the idea of introducing a self-protection unit into the conflict zone and stated that he thought that the Council should require the Secretary-General to resume consultations on the proposal for the unit set out in his 11 May 1998 report. He also emphasized that the future of the CIS peacekeeping operation remained a problem, and that Georgia believed that the CIS peacekeeping operation would be fully functional only after the implementation of the principal decisions adopted at the recent summits of the CIS. Unfortunately, the Abkhaz side was blocking the fulfilment of those decisions, leaving the CIS peacekeepers in the conflict zone with an expired mandate. Finally, he expressed his country's disappointment that cooperation between the United Nations and OSCE on resolving the conflict was still lagging. He suggested that the Security Council stress the importance of the decision adopted at the Oslo Ministerial meeting of OSCE in December 1998, which provided fundamental provisions with regard to the comprehensive political settlement of the conflict and which constituted a programme for the promotion of the cooperation between the United Nations and OSCE.⁷³

The representative of the Russian Federation expressed his country's concern at the lack of progress on key aspects of the settlement and noted that the most acute problem remained the return of refugees to the Gali region. He stressed that it was important that the parties demonstrate the necessary resolve and sign the document that they had "virtually agreed upon", which would open the way to resolving other settlement-related problems. He noted that the cooperation between the United Nations and CIS was taking place strictly on the basis of Chapter VIII of the Charter and that the activities of the CIS peacekeeping forces were backed by the relevant resolutions of the Security Council, which had repeatedly welcomed their important contribution in helping to stabilize the situation in the conflict zone. He pointed out that, while his delegation attached great importance to the question of security in the area of the Georgian-Abkhaz conflict, the situation in the region had improved, although it remained fragile. The representative informed the Council that his Government had taken steps to enhance the effectiveness of the CIS peacekeeping force in order to ensure the security of the international personnel of the United Nations.⁷⁴

Several speakers made statements reiterating the necessity of a peaceful settlement based on the territorial integrity of Georgia. They expressed concern over the refugee situation and called on parties to reach a credible agreement. Regarding the security situation, some speakers called on both sides to prevent further incidents. The representatives of France and Argentina stated that the elections planned in Abkhazia needed to be regarded as illegitimate.⁷⁵

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1255 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions, in particular resolution 1225 (1999) of 28 January 1999, and the statement by its President of 7 May 1999,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 20 July 1999,

Taking note of the letter dated 19 July 1999 from the President of Georgia to the Secretary-General,

Stressing that, notwithstanding positive developments on some issues, the lack of progress on key issues of a comprehensive settlement of the conflict in Abkhazia, Georgia, is unacceptable,

Deeply concerned at the continuing volatile situation in the conflict zone, welcoming in this regard the important contributions that the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia and the collective peacekeeping force of the Commonwealth of Independent States continue to make in stabilizing the situation in the zone of conflict, noting that the working relationship between the Mission and the collective peacekeeping force has been good at all levels, and stressing the importance of continuing and increasing close cooperation and coordination between them in the performance of their respective mandates,

Secretary-General to find ways to improve their observance as an integral part of the work towards a comprehensive political settlement,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 20 July 1999;

2. Demands that the parties to the conflict widen and deepen their commitment to the United Nations-led peace process, continue to expand their dialogue and contacts at all levels and display without delay the necessary will to achieve substantial results on the key issues of the negotiations;

3. Strongly supports the sustained efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative with the assistance of the Russian Federation, in its capacity as facilitator, as well as of the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe to promote the stabilization of the situation and to give new impetus to the negotiations within the United Nations-led peace process in order to achieve a comprehensive political settlement, and commends the tireless efforts of the retiring Special Representative of the Secretary-General, Mr. Liviu Bota, in carrying out his mandate;

4. Emphasizes, in this context, that the readiness and ability of the international community to assist the parties depend on their political will to resolve the conflict through dialogue and mutual accommodation and on their acting in good faith to implement promptly concrete measures towards bringing about a comprehensive political settlement of the conflict;

5. Underlines the necessity for the parties to achieve an early and comprehensive political settlement, which includes a settlement on the political status of Abkhazia within the State of Georgia, which fully respects the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia within its internationally recognized borders, and supports the intention of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative, in close cooperation with the Russian Federation, in its capacity as facilitator, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe and the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General, to continue to submit proposals for the consideration of the parties on the distribution of constitutional competences between Tbilisi and Sukhumi as part of a comprehensive settlement;

6. Considers the holding of self-styled elections in Abkhazia, Georgia, unacceptable and illegitimate;

7. Expresses its continuing concern at the situation of refugees and displaced persons, resulting, in particular, from the hostilities of May 1998, reaffirms the unacceptability of the demographic changes resulting from the conflict and the imprescriptible right of all refugees and displaced persons affected by the conflict to return to their homes in secure conditions in accordance with international law and as set out in the Quadripartite Agreement on the Voluntary Return of Refugees and Displaced Persons, of 4 April 1994, and calls upon the parties to address this issue urgently by agreeing and implementing effective measures to guarantee the security of those who exercise their unconditional right to return;

8. Welcomes, in this context, the efforts of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General to facilitate, as a first step, the safe return of refugees and displaced persons to the Gali region, and emphasizes, in this regard, that the lasting return of the refugees cannot be ensured without concrete results from the bilateral dialogue between the parties, which produce the necessary security and legal guarantees;

9. Takes note with appreciation of the agreements reached at the meetings of 16 to 18 October 1998 and 7 to 9 June 1999, hosted respectively by the Governments of Greece and Turkey, aimed at building confidence, improving security and developing cooperation, and calls upon the parties to enhance their efforts to implement those decisions in an effective and comprehensive manner, notably at the prospective meeting in Yalta at the invitation of the Government of Ukraine;

10. Demands that both sides observe strictly the Agreement on a Ceasefire and Separation of Forces, signed in Moscow on 14 May 1994, and takes note with appreciation, in this context, of the substantial progress reported towards setting up a joint investigation mechanism for violations of the Agreement, as well as of the greater restraint exercised by the parties along the line of separation of forces;

11. Condemns the ongoing activities by armed groups, which endanger the civilian population, impede the work of the humanitarian organizations and seriously delay the normalization of the situation in the Gali region, reiterates its concern regarding the security of the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia, welcomes the implementation of measures in this regard, and requests the Secretary-General to keep the security of the Mission under constant review;

12. Decides to extend the mandate of the Mission for a new period terminating on 31 January 2000, subject to a review by the Council of the mandate of the Mission in the event of any changes that may be made in the mandate or in the presence of the collective peacekeeping force of the Commonwealth of Independent States;

13. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to keep the Council regularly informed and to report three months from the date of the adoption of the present resolution on the situation in Abkhazia, Georgia;

14. Expresses its intention to conduct a thorough review of the operation at the end of its current mandate, in the light of steps taken by the parties to achieve a comprehensive settlement;

15. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 12 November 1999 (4065th meeting): statement by the President

On 22 October 1999, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1255 (1999), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in Abkhazia and an update on UNOMIG.⁷⁶ In his report, the Secretary-General welcomed the acceleration of bilateral contacts at all levels between the Georgian and Abkhaz sides. He reiterated that the Georgian and Abkhaz sides needed to take the first concrete step towards the full return of refugees and internally displaced persons. While the security situation had slightly improved in the Gali and Zugdidi sectors and the number of incidents had decreased, the hostage-taking incident of 13 October 1999 had once again shown the precariousness of the situation in which UNOMIG operated. He stressed that UNOMIG was keeping its security arrangement under constant review in order to ensure the highest possible level of security for its staff.

At its 4065th meeting, held on 12 November 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Slovenia), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Georgia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁷⁷

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 22 October 1999 concerning the situation in Abkhazia, Georgia.

The Council warmly welcomes the appointment of Mr. Dieter Boden as resident Special Representative of the Secretary-General, and hopes the parties will see this as an opportune moment to give renewed impetus to the search for a political settlement.

The Council welcomes the acceleration of bilateral contacts at all levels between the Georgian and Abkhaz sides and calls upon them to continue to expand their contacts.

The Council notes with grave concern that, notwithstanding positive developments on some issues, no progress has been made on the key issues of the settlement, particularly the core issue of the status of Abkhazia, Georgia. The Council therefore strongly supports the intention of the Special Representative to submit as soon as possible further proposals to both sides on the distribution of constitutional competences between Tbilisi and Sukhumi, as part of a comprehensive settlement, with full respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia within its internationally recognized borders, working in close cooperation with the Russian Federation, in its capacity as facilitator, the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General, and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe.

The Council reiterates its demand that the parties to the conflict widen and deepen their commitment to the United Nations-led peace process, in particular by resuming regular meetings of the Coordinating Council and of its working groups, and agrees with the Secretary-General that they must continue to meet regularly, regardless of the constraints of domestic politics. The Council calls upon the parties to agree upon and to take, in the nearest future, the first concrete steps towards the full return to Abkhazia, Georgia, of refugees and internally displaced persons in safe, secure and dignified conditions. The Council reminds the parties that this would enable the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to provide substantial material assistance. The Council reiterates its view on the unacceptability of any action by the Abkhaz leadership in contravention of the principles of the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia.

The Council notes with satisfaction that the security situation has improved slightly, in particular in the reduction of tension along the line of separation of forces, while noting the persistent precariousness of the security of United Nations personnel. The Council reiterates its condemnation of the hostage-taking of seven United Nations personnel on 13 October 1999, welcomes the release of the hostages, and stresses that the perpetrators of this unacceptable act should be brought to justice. The Council welcomes the fact that the United Nations Observer Mission is keeping its security arrangements under constant review in order to ensure the highest possible level of security for its staff.

The Council pays tribute to Mr. Liviu Bota for his valuable work while serving as Special Representative of the Secretary-General. The Council welcomes the important contributions that the Mission and the collective peacekeeping force of the Commonwealth of Independent States continue to make in stabilizing the situation in the zone of conflict, notes that the working relationship between the Mission and the collective peacekeeping force has been good at all levels, and stresses the importance of continuing and increasing close cooperation and coordination between them in the performance of their respective mandates.

29. The situation in Albania

Initial proceedings

Decision of 13 March 1997 (3751st meeting): statement by the President

By letters dated 13 March 1997 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹ the representatives of Albania and Italy, respectively, requested the convening of an urgent meeting of the Security Council for the purpose of considering the situation in Albania.

At its 3751st meeting, held on 13 March 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the above-mentioned letters in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Poland), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Italy and Albania, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²

The Security Council, having considered the letter dated 13 March 1997 to the President of the Council from the Permanent Representative of Albania to the United Nations and the letter dated 12 March 1997 to the President from the Permanent Representative of Italy to the United expresses its deep concern about the deteriorating situation in Albania. It urges all concerned to refrain from hostilities and acts of violence and to cooperate with diplomatic efforts to reach a peaceful solution to the crisis.

The Council calls upon the parties involved to continue the political dialogue and to live up to the commitments undertaken on 9 March 1997 in Tirana. It urges all political forces to work together to lower tension and facilitate the stabilization of the country.

The Council calls upon the parties not to impede the provision of humanitarian assistance to the civilian population and, in this context, recalls the importance of keeping open all means of communication in the country. It encourages Member States and international organizations to help with the provision of humanitarian assistance.

The Council stresses the importance of regional stability and fully supports the diplomatic efforts of the international community, in particular those of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe and the European Union, to find a peaceful solution to the crisis.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to keep it informed of developments in the situation in Albania.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 28 March 1997 (3758th meeting): resolution 1101 (1997)

By a letter dated 28 March 1997 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³ the representative of Albania informed the Council that, following the collapse of the pyramid investment schemes, the situation in Albania had deteriorated further and the structures of the Ministries of the Interior and Defence had proved to be incapable of dealing with the situation. Massive unrest had swept entire regions of the country resulting in many casualties, and in a national state of mind which led hundreds of thousands to break into armouries and loot weapons. This was followed by a massive wave of destruction of public, private and institutional property and further criminal activities. The complete disorder and lack of security was bound to bring about another wave of tens of thousands of refugees, sailing to and landing in neighbouring Italy and forcing the Government of Italy to proclaim an emergency as well. The situation in Albania remained serious, as law and order had yet to be achieved in a significant part of the country and the humanitarian situation was a matter of grave concern. As a result, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) had agreed to support the willingness of some Member States to participate with a military or a police force in the protection of humanitarian activities in Albania. Albania felt that such a force also had to have the necessary support and authorization of the Security Council. With regard to a possible mandate for the deployment of the force, he noted that his country would like it to be composed of troops from a number of countries which had been addressed by the authorities of Albania and which had already expressed their willingness to join. The objective would be to provide humanitarian aid throughout Albania and to help to create an environment of durable security for the safe provision of international assistance. The force would stay until conditions on the ground made it possible for the Government of Albania to ensure the safe delivery of humanitarian goods, until the coming general elections. The Parliament of Albania would decide more precisely how long the force would remain. Finally, he stressed the urgency of the matter and stated that he expected that the Security Council would be able promptly to take the right decision on Albania. Documents entitled “Updated information on the Albanian crisis” and “Decision No. 160 of the Permanent Council of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE), adopted at the 108th plenary meeting, on 27 March 1997” were also attached.⁴

At its 3758th meeting, held on 28 March 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letter in its agenda. The President (Poland), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Albania, Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, the Netherlands, Romania, Spain, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and Turkey, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Albania, Austria, Belgium, France, Greece, Italy, Poland, Portugal, the Republic of Korea, Romania, Spain, Sweden, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States, with Denmark, Finland, Germany, Ireland and the Netherlands joining as sponsors.⁵ The President then drew the attention of the Council to revisions to be made to the seventh preambular paragraph and the fourth operative paragraph of the draft resolution.⁶

The President also drew the attention of the Council to letters dated 14 and 17 March 1997, respectively, from the representative of the Netherlands addressed to the Secretary-General,⁷ transmitting statements on Albania issued on 1 and 17 March, respectively, by the Presidency of the European Union; and a letter dated 24 March 1997 from the representative of the Netherlands addressed to the Secretary-General,⁸ transmitting the conclusions of the Council of the European Union of 24 March 1997 regarding the situation in Albania. He also called attention to a letter dated 27 March 1997 from the representative of Italy addressed to the Secretary-General,⁹ in which the representative noted that the decision by OSCE had established the conditions for launching an effort to assist Albania. In that regard, Italy had consulted with a number of Governments, in particular the Government of Albania, and had taken the initiative of promoting the creation of a multinational protection force, which would operate with full respect for the principles of the Charter of the United Nations and of OSCE and which, to ensure security and freedom of movement of its personnel, would act under Chapter VII of the Charter.

At the same meeting, speaking before the vote, the representative of China stated that, while his delegation was concerned by developments in Albania and supported the political and diplomatic efforts made by the international community, the situation was essentially an internal affair of Albania. He stated that the authorization by the Security Council of an action in a country because of strife resulting from the internal affairs of that country was inconsistent with the provisions of the United Nations Charter and, therefore, needed to be handled with extreme caution. He noted that his country had never been in favour of the Security Council frequently invoking Chapter VII of the Charter in authorizing such actions. However, with due regard for the relevant requests of the Government of Albania and its urgent desire for the return of stability, he affirmed that his delegation would not stand in the way of the adoption of the draft resolution.¹⁰

At the same meeting, the draft resolution as orally revised was put to the vote and adopted by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention (China), as resolution 1101 (1997),¹¹ which reads:

The Security Council,

⁴ S/1997/259, annex I and annex II, respectively.

⁵ S/1997/260.

Taking note of the letter dated 28 March 1997 from the Permanent Representative of Albania to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council,

Taking note also of the letter dated 27 March 1997 from the Permanent Representative of Italy to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General,

Taking note further of decision No. 1610 of 27 March 1997 of the Permanent Council of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, including the decision to provide the coordinating framework within which other international organizations can play their part in their respective areas of competence,

Recalling the statement by the President of the Security Council of 13 March 1997 on the situation in Albania, Reiterating its deep concern over the deteriorating situation in Albania,

Underlining the need for all concerned to refrain from hostilities and acts of violence, and reiterating its call to the parties involved to continue the political dialogue,

Stressing the importance of regional stability, and in this context fully supporting the diplomatic efforts of the international community to find a peaceful solution to the crisis, in particular those of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe and the European Union,

Affirming the sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity of the Republic of Albania,

Determining that the present situation of crisis in Albania constitutes a threat to peace and security in the region,

1. Condemns all acts of violence, and calls for their immediate end;

2. Welcomes the offer made by certain Member States to establish a temporary and limited multinational protection force to facilitate the safe and prompt delivery of humanitarian assistance and to help to create a secure environment for the missions of international organizations in Albania, including those providing humanitarian assistance;

3. Welcomes also the offer by a Member State, contained in its letter to take the lead in organizing and commanding the temporary multinational protection force, and takes note of all the objectives contained in that letter;

4. Authorizes the Member States participating in the multinational protection force to conduct the operation in a neutral and impartial way to achieve the objectives set out in paragraph 2 above, and, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, further authorizes those Member States to ensure the security and freedom of movement of the personnel of the multinational protection force;

5. Calls upon all those concerned in Albania to cooperate with the multinational protection force and international humanitarian agencies for the safe and prompt delivery of humanitarian assistance;

6. Decides that the operation shall be limited to a period of three months from the adoption of the present resolution, at which time the Council will assess the situation on the basis of the reports referred to in paragraph 9 below;

7. Also decides that the cost of implementing this temporary operation shall be borne by the participating Member States;

8. Encourages the Member States participating in the multinational protection force to cooperate closely with the Government of Albania, the United Nations, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, the European Union and all international organizations involved in rendering humanitarian assistance in Albania;

9. Requests the Member States participating in the multinational protection force to provide periodic reports to the Council, at least every two weeks, through the Secretary-General, the first such report to be made no later than fourteen days after the adoption of the present resolution, inter alia, specifying the parameters and modalities of the operation on the basis of consultations between those Member States and the Government of Albania;

10. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 19 June 1997 (3791st meeting):
resolution 1114 (1997)

By a letter dated 14 June 1997 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹² the Secretary-General transmitted a letter dated 13 June 1997 from the representative of Italy transmitting the sixth biweekly report on the multinational protection force for Albania, as requested by the Security Council in resolution 1101 (1997). The report noted that the Steering Committee, consisting of the political directors of the troop-contributing countries and the Commander of the operation, had considered and acceded to several requests by the authorities of Albania that the force remain in Albania during the electoral process to help ensure a safe and secure environment for OSCE monitoring teams, within the framework of the mandate of the Security Council. The Steering Committee had also noted the indications provided by the authorities of Albania and OSCE that the electoral process would exceed the time limit of the mandate. The Committee also noted that a withdrawal of the multinational protection force by 28 June, the day before the planned elections as foreseen in paragraph 6 of resolution 1101 (1997), would not allow the force to provide a secure environment and would undermine one of the main efforts of international assistance to Albania. In fact, a limited increase in the strength of the force from that originally planned would be necessary. Noting the readiness of the contributing countries to maintain, for a limited time, their military contingents as part of the multinational protection force within the framework of the mandate given by the Security Council, the Steering Committee recommended that the mandate given to the multinational protection force by the Security Council in resolution 1101 (1997) be extended for the period necessary for the completion of the electoral process in Albania and, in any event, not longer than 45 days after the termination of the present mandate.

By a letter dated 16 June 1997 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹³ the representative of Albania noted that, while major improvements had been noticed in the field of public order, numerous challenges still existed. In particular, a serious threat still remained for public security in certain areas in view of the upcoming parliamentary elections. He agreed that the presence of the multinational protection force had contributed to the normalization of public order and that it was necessary for it to continue. As a result, Albania requested that the presence of the force in Albania be extended for another three months.

At its 3791st meeting, held on 19 June 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the above-mentioned letters in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Russian Federation), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Albania, Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Romania, Spain, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and Turkey, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of members of the Council to a letter dated 17 June 1997 from the representative of Denmark addressed to the Secretary-General,¹⁴ transmitting a statement by the Ministers of the OSCE Troika issued at Copenhagen on 10 April 1997, in which they, inter alia, expressed their support for an OSCE presence. The President further drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Albania, Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland,

France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Poland, Portugal, the Republic of Korea, Romania, Spain, Sweden, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States.¹⁵

At the same meeting, the representative of Albania noted that the multinational protection force had been successful in improving the situation and that the people of Albania were in the process of taking important decisions for the stability and future of their country through parliamentary elections. He therefore invited the members of the Council to vote in favour of the draft resolution, which would authorize the force to further help in the normalization of the situation.¹⁶

The representative of Italy expressed hope that the operation would be concluded in six weeks and welcomed the decision of OSCE to support the decision of Albania to hold new parliamentary elections on 29 June 1997. He noted, however, that the achievement of that goal would not mean the end of either the economic emergency or the need for a sustained international commitment in Albania and that a ministerial conference would be convened in Rome after the elections to assess the progress in Albania and provide guidance for future international action.¹⁷

Speaking before the vote, the representative of China noted that the Charter of the United Nations clearly stipulated that the United Nations should not interfere in what were essentially the internal affairs of a State and, since the question of Albania was essentially an internal affair of Albania, the Security Council should proceed with caution. He reiterated that his delegation was not in favour of authorizing the deployment of the multinational protection force and was even less in favour of expanding its mandate. Moreover, as the situation improved, the force should terminate its mandate at an appropriate time. He stated that it was his understanding that the deployment of the force in Albania was a special measure taken under special circumstances and, taking into account the relevant request of the Government of Albania for the extension of the mandate of the multinational protection force, the Chinese delegation would not stand in the way of the adoption of the draft resolution.¹⁸

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention (China), as resolution 1114 (1997),¹⁹ which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 1101 (1997) of 28 March 1997,

Recalling also the statement by its President of 13 March 1997 on the situation in Albania,

Taking note of the letter dated 16 June 1997 from the Permanent Representative of Albania to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council,

Taking note also of the sixth report to the Council on the operation of the multinational protection force in Albania,

Taking note further of decision No. 160 of 27 March 1997 of the Permanent Council of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, including the decision to provide the coordinating framework within which other international organizations can play their part in their respective areas of competence,

Expressing its appreciation for the neutral and impartial way in which the mandate of the Council has been carried out by the multinational protection force, in close cooperation with the Albanian authorities,

Reiterating its concern over the situation in Albania,

Underlining the need for all concerned to refrain from hostilities and acts of violence, and calling on the parties involved to continue the political dialogue and facilitate the electoral process,

Stressing the importance of regional stability, and in this context fully supporting the diplomatic efforts of the international community, particularly the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe and the European Union, to find a peaceful solution to the crisis and assist in the electoral process in Albania, in cooperation with the Albanian authorities,

Noting the need over a short period of time, as underlined in the sixth report on the operation of the multinational protection force in Albania, for a limited increase in the contingent originally planned, for the purpose of protecting the mission of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, especially in view of the planned elections,

Reaffirming the sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity of the Republic of Albania,

Determining that the present situation in Albania constitutes a threat to peace and security in the region,

1. Condemns all acts of violence, and calls for their immediate end;

2. Welcomes the readiness of the countries contributing to the multinational protection force to maintain their military contingents in Albania for a limited time as part of the multinational protection force, in the framework of the mandate provided by resolution 1101 (1997);

3. Welcomes also the intention of the countries contributing to the multinational protection force to continue, within the framework of the mandate provided by resolution 1101 (1997), to facilitate the safe and prompt delivery of humanitarian assistance and to help to create a secure environment for the missions of international organizations in Albania, including those providing humanitarian assistance, and takes note of all the elements contained in the sixth report to the Council on the operation of the multinational protection force in Albania, concerning, inter alia, the electoral monitoring mission of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe/Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights;

4. Authorizes the Member States participating in the multinational protection force to conduct the operation in a neutral and impartial way to achieve the objectives set out in paragraph 3 above, and acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, further authorizes those Member States to ensure the security and freedom of movement of the personnel of the multinational protection force;

5. Calls upon all those concerned in Albania to cooperate with the multinational protection force and with the missions of the international organizations;

6. Decides that the operation shall be limited to a period of forty-five days from 28 June 1997, at which time the Council will assess the situation on the basis of the reports referred to in paragraph 9 below;

7. Also decides that the cost of implementing this temporary operation shall be borne by the participating Member States;

8. Encourages the Member States participating in the multinational protection force to cooperate closely with the Government of Albania, the United Nations, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, the European Union and all international organizations involved in rendering humanitarian assistance in Albania;

9. Requests the Member States participating in the multinational protection force to provide periodic reports to the Council through the Secretary-General, at least every two weeks, the first such report to be made no later than fourteen days after the adoption of the present resolution, inter alia, specifying the parameters and modalities of the operation on the basis of consultations between those Member States and the Government of Albania;

10. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 14 August 1997 (3812th meeting):
statement by the President

By a letter dated 5 August 1997 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁰ the representative of Italy noted that on 12 August 1997, the mandate of the multinational protection force in Albania, authorized by the Security Council in resolutions 1101 (1997) and 1114 (1997) would come to an end. Italy, in its capacity as leader of the force, would present the final report on the eve of the termination of the operation. He therefore requested that an open meeting of the Council be held upon the expiration of the mandate of the force.

¹⁹ For the vote, see S/PV.3791, pp. 4-5.

By a letter dated 8 August 1997 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²¹ the representative of Albania concurred with the request of the representative of Italy for an open meeting of the Council in the context of the closing of the multinational protection force operation in Albania.

By a letter dated 12 August 1997 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²² the Secretary-General transmitted a letter from the representative of Italy, which transmitted the eleventh and final biweekly report on the multinational protection force for Albania as requested in resolutions 1101 (1997) and 1114 (1997). The report noted that what had been in place in Albania for the last four and a half months was not a traditional peacekeeping or peacemaking operation but rather one of a complex nature, involving assistance from the international community within a multinational security framework provided by the multinational protection force. The presence of the force effectively blocked the risk of Albania sliding towards anarchy or even internal political conflict and allowed the various international organizations and individual States willing to provide practical help to Albania to organize assistance in a secure environment. Thus, a notable improvement in the situation in the country was brought about in a short period of time, restoring confidence in national prospects. The report stated that a new phase needed to begin without delay, focusing on the rehabilitation of State institutions and the return of the country to an orderly social, political and economic condition, with the active support of the international community.

At its 3811th meeting, held on 14 August 1997 in response to the requests of the representatives of Italy and Albania, the Security Council included the above-mentioned letters in its agenda. The President (United Kingdom), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Albania, Denmark, Germany, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, Romania, Slovenia, Spain, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and Turkey, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President, with the consent of the Council, also invited the head of the delegation of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) under rule 39 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure.

Over the course of the meeting, several representatives underlined the success of the multinational protection force in facilitating the delivery of humanitarian assistance and in creating a secure environment, and in successfully performing the tasks assigned in accordance with Council resolutions 1101 (1997) and 1114 (1997), although serious challenges remained that would require the ongoing support of the international community. Everyone noted the important contribution of OSCE and the role of regional organizations, and the importance of the successful elections, which had been supported by the extension of the mandate.²³

The representative of Japan noted that the operation constituted an important precedent of a militarily and politically coordinated multinational action under Chapter VII of the Charter, providing a comprehensive framework to deal with a humanitarian crisis in one country, which prevented the spillover of the crisis which might have affected peace and security in the broader region.²⁴

The representative of the Republic of Korea expressed his belief that the operation in Albania had set a "significant" precedent for potential future interventions by the international community in cases in which a State was gripped by a complex crisis with serious humanitarian implications and political repercussions for its neighbours.²⁵

The representative of Albania expressed his country's gratitude to the Security Council, the member countries of the multinational protection force, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, the European Union, the Council of Europe and the Western European Union. He stated that public order and security would be assured within a short time, and that Albania would enter the path of normal and solid development.²⁶

The representative of Italy underlined the factors that had contributed to the positive outcome of the operation in Albania. The first factor was the unity of intent shown by a group of countries to get involved immediately in a risky but necessary operation. The second factor was the decisive action by the Security Council in approving the mandate for the multinational protection force in one day. The third factor was the rapid planning and deployment of the force. Fourth, there had been intense and in-depth political consultation and coordination among the participating countries, giving the force the necessary guidance from the outset. Fifth, definite limits had been placed on the time-frame of the operation from the outset, with a sunset clause that had been fully respected. The sixth factor had been the comprehensive and ongoing integration of the political, military and humanitarian aspects of the entire operation. The final factor had been the absolute respect by the multinational protection force for its mandate regarding complete neutrality and impartiality towards the political forces in Albania, and refraining from any kind of police activities, no matter how difficult that had proved.²⁷

The representative of ICRC informed the Council that, while the dispatch of the multinational protection force had made it possible to stabilize the situation and to hold legislative elections, Albania still faced law and order problems and was still in the process of rebuilding a functioning State administration. Those tasks called for long-term assistance which went far beyond the capacity of any humanitarian organization.²⁸

At its 3812th meeting, held on 14 August 1997, the Security Council resumed its consideration of the items from its 3811th meeting. In accordance with decisions taken at that meeting, the representatives of Denmark, Germany, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, Romania, Slovenia, Spain, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and Turkey were invited to be present.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁹

The Security Council has considered the eleventh and last report of the operation of the multinational protection force in Albania of 11 August 1997, submitted pursuant to the requirement set out in paragraph 9 of resolution 1114 (1997),

The Council notes with appreciation that the mandate of the multinational protection force, as set out in its resolutions 1101 (1997) and 1114 (1997), has been fulfilled successfully. The presence of the multinational protection force has contributed to the facilitation of safe and prompt delivery of humanitarian assistance in Albania. Its presence has also helped to create a secure environment for the missions of international organizations in Albania, as part of the efforts of the international community, particularly the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe and the European Union, to find a peaceful solution to the crisis and to assist international organizations in their role in the electoral process in close cooperation with the Albanian authorities.

The Council recognizes the role played by the multinational protection force and the Governments of the participating countries under Italian leadership in the full discharge of the mandate in assisting the Albanian authorities and the international organizations involved.

The Council is of the view that the Albanian people and their authorities bear the primary responsibility for the future of Albania and for restoring normal conditions in the country. The necessary international assistance will be conditional upon Albania's own efforts at achieving reconciliation, security, rehabilitation and economic reform.

In this respect, the Council encourages the international community to assist and support the economic, social and institutional rehabilitation of Albania and welcomes the steps that have already been taken in this direction, including the preparatory meetings for the ministerial conference to be held in Rome in autumn 1997.

Middle East

30. The situation in the Middle East

A. Letter dated 13 April 1996 from the Permanent Representative of Lebanon to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council (S/1996/280)

Decision of 18 April 1996 (3654th meeting): resolution 1052 (1996) and rejection of a draft resolution

By a letter dated 13 April 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹ the representative of Lebanon requested the convening of an urgent meeting of the Security Council to consider the grave situation in Lebanon resulting from the large-scale Israeli bombardment of many towns and villages in his country, including the southern suburb of Beirut, causing alarming numbers of civilian dead and wounded, thousands of displaced persons and severe damage to property. He maintained that the bombardment constituted a flagrant violation of the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Lebanon and the Charter of the United Nations and posed a great threat to international peace and security.

At its 3653rd meeting, held on 15 April 1996 in response to the request contained in a letter dated 13 April 1996 from the representative of Lebanon, the Security Council included the letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Chile), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Afghanistan, Algeria, Colombia, Cuba, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Israel, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Malaysia, Morocco, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, the Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, Turkey and the United Arab Emirates, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The representative of Lebanon stated that his delegation was before the members of the Security Council to plead for the Council to take action to stop the Israeli military aggression against Lebanon, its people, its territorial integrity, its independence and its sovereignty. Military aggression was a flagrant violation of the Charter of the United Nations, international law and pertinent Security Council resolutions, particularly resolution 425 (1978) and the Armistice Agreement of 1949 between Lebanon and Israel. He stressed that, contrary to the claims of Israeli officials, the escalation was a result of persistent Israeli attacks and bombardments deep in Lebanese territory, killing men, women and children, and was a violation of the “so-called understanding” of July 1993 and hence attracted reaction from the Lebanese resistance. He maintained that the new cycle of violence could not be viewed apart from the overall situation in the south and in the Western Bekaa, and was not a question of who launched a rocket first, but was the result of the occupation by Israel, in flagrant violation of resolution 425 (1978). He reiterated that, while Lebanon stressed its firm condemnation of all forms of terrorism, it firmly supported the legitimate right of peoples to resist foreign occupation, and that the Lebanese were within their legitimate rights in defending themselves against occupation, human rights abuses and displacement. He asked the Council to order Israel to immediately stop its aggression against Lebanon and to withdraw all its reinforcements; to condemn the Israeli aggression against Lebanon; to force Israel to implement resolution 425 (1978); to provide, in cooperation with the Secretary-General, a massive programme of assistance to Lebanon and its people; and to remain seized of the matter as long as the Israelis did not abide by the order of the Council to halt their aggression.²

The representative of Israel noted that, since 1 February 1996, 8 Israelis had been killed and 29 more wounded by Hizbullah Islamic fundamentalist terrorists, and during the previous weeks, 36 more Israeli civilians had been injured in several waves of Katyusha rocket attacks fired by Hizbullah into northern Israel. Tens of thousands were living in shelters or had left the northern part of the State of Israel. He stressed that the primary obligation of Israel was to protect the security of all its citizens, and that as the Government of Lebanon did not have the ability, or the will, to control Hizbullah activities, Israel needed to defend the security of its north by all necessary measures. He reiterated that Israel had no territorial claim on Lebanon and had no intention of entering into battles with either the Syrian or the Lebanese armies. He observed that two trends were emerging in the Middle East: one that sought a peaceful resolution to the conflict, and another “inspired and supported by Iran, that [was] trying to kill the prospects for peace”. He noted that the stated goal of Hizbullah was not the removal of Israeli forces from southern Lebanon, but the destruction of Israel. He stressed that operations were being conducted solely against Hizbullah terrorist targets, but that Hizbullah positions were situated throughout Lebanon and were usually located in the midst of civilian population centres.³

The representative of France reaffirmed the right of all States in the region to live in security, and stated that his delegation understood the desire of Israel to keep its people safe from acts of violence. However, France deeply regretted that the ongoing military actions of the last few days had already led to the death of several dozen Lebanese civilians and forced hundreds of thousands of others to flee their homes in a mass exodus which endangered national reconstruction efforts. He stressed that France was convinced that the crisis could not be resolved by military means, and that only the implementation of resolution 425 (1978) could ensure respect for the security of the States of the region by re-establishing the complete sovereignty of Lebanon over its territory and thereby enabling the Government of Lebanon to participate fully in the maintenance of peace. He called on all parties concerned to demonstrate responsibility and restraint, and to order a ceasefire as soon as possible.⁴

The representative of Germany noted that, while self-defence was clearly legitimate, measures of self-defence could become illegal if they did not abide by the basic rule of law prescribing proportionality. He also maintained that measures of self-defence must not be directed against innocent civilians, a principle which was laid down in Article 33 of the Fourth Geneva Convention, to which both Israel and Lebanon were parties. Any measure of self-defence needed to be proportionate not only in size, but also in direction. He stressed that, whereas all States were responsible for complying with resolution 425 (1978), the Government of Lebanon was responsible for doing all it could to prevent its territory from being used for attacks against persons protected by the four Geneva Conventions.⁵

The representative of China called on the Israeli side to immediately cease all military actions and urged all sides to exercise restraint, to settle their disputes through dialogue and consultation and to eschew force or the threat of force so as to safeguard peace and stability in the region.⁶

The representative of the Russian Federation expressed the belief that the military operations by Israel were an inappropriate reaction to the actions of extremists. He emphasized again the inadmissibility of the infringement of the territorial integrity and the violation of the sovereignty of Lebanon and stressed that it was necessary to halt immediately the military operations by Israel in Lebanon and the armed acts initiated from Lebanese territory against Israel. He also stressed that it was absolutely inadmissible that there be firing in the area where the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) was deployed.⁷

The representative of Italy spoke on behalf of the European Union and associated countries.⁸ He stated that the European Union expressed its grave concern at the escalation of military activity in Israel and Lebanon and about the security of UNIFIL and called on all sides to ensure that its safety was not put at risk. While reaffirming its commitment to the implementation of resolution 425 (1978), the European Union called upon all parties to show the greatest moderation and to cease military activities.⁹

The representative of the United States observed that Hizbullah attacks into northern Israel had once again compelled the Government of Israel to take steps deemed necessary to protect its people from direct threats emanating from Lebanese territory. The violence by Hizbullah had not only damaged Israel and the prospects for a Middle East peace, it had also undermined the safety of people in Lebanon and the legitimacy of the State of Lebanon. She maintained that those who allowed the militia of Hizbullah to act with impunity in Lebanon needed to bear responsibility for the consequences, which included not only abuses to the State of Lebanon from within, but actions of self-defence by Israel in response to Hizbullah violence. She noted that the United States was engaged in an intensive diplomatic effort to restore calm and establish a more stable situation in the area which would enhance the security and well-being of the civilian population of both southern Lebanon and northern Israel. Finally she reiterated that the United States remained committed to the sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity, and national unity of Lebanon.¹⁰

The representative of the United Kingdom condemned the continuing rocket and other attacks by Hizbullah on northern Israel and expressed deep concern at the loss of life among the civilians in Lebanon and the severe humanitarian problems in the face of attacks on population centers. He called upon all parties to move to restore peace and a measure of stability in southern Lebanon and reiterated that attacks directed at civilian targets needed to end and that the 1993 arrangement needed to be respected, or a more effective arrangement should be put in its place.¹¹

The representative of Egypt stated that any armed aggression against a neighbouring State, whatever the motive, constituted prohibited aggression. However, self-defence also had rules prescribed by the United Nations and contemporary international law. First, under Article 51 of the Charter, there had to have been an “actual armed attack”. While firing Katyusha rockets across borders was indeed a proscribed act which needed to cease, the armistice agreement between Lebanon and Israel continued officially to stand, and the mechanisms provided for in the armistice should have been invoked to deal with those events. Second, the situation needed to have been put to the Security Council. Third, self-defence by States was not “a blank cheque”, but an element of proportionality was involved: the scale, duration and objective of military activity needed to be proportionate to the reason for such activity. He also noted that Egypt could not consider that Israel had been unable to invoke other means, such as the Security Council or other channels, to find the means to obtain security. He then quoted a former Secretary of State of the United States in saying that “the right of self-defence implied the instant and overwhelming necessity for self-defence, leaving no choice of means and no time for deliberation” and stressed that, lacking those conditions, the use of military force was considered an act of reprisal prohibited by international law.¹²

The representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran referred to the statement made by the representative of Israel, and rejected the “fabrications” about his country.¹³

The representative of Turkey stated that terrorism posed the greatest threat to security and stability in the Middle East. He further held that it had been the consistent position of his Government that the fight against terrorism was vitally important for the success of the peace process. However, Turkey also believed that it should not inflict any harm on innocent civilians. He informed the Council that the positions of Turkey regarding the fight against terrorism and its concerns for the safety of innocent civilians had once again been brought to the attention of Israel.¹⁴

A number of speakers stressed that the attacks by Israel were a clear violation of the principles of the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Lebanon, and a violation of the Charter of the United Nations, international law and relevant Security Council resolutions, particularly resolution 425 (1978). They called on the Council to intervene to put an end to the Israeli aggression against Lebanon.¹⁵ Several speakers appealed to the parties to cease the fighting immediately and to enter into negotiations for a peaceful settlement on the basis of resolution 425 (1978).¹⁶

At its 3654th meeting, held on 18 April 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council resumed consideration of the item. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Chile), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Afghanistan, Algeria, Bahrain, Canada, Colombia, the Comoros, Cuba, Djibouti, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Iraq, Ireland, Israel, Japan, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Malaysia, Mauritania, Morocco, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, the Sudan, the Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, Turkey, the United Arab Emirates and Yemen, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Algeria, Bahrain, Djibouti, Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mauritania, Morocco, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, the Sudan, the Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, the United Arab Emirates and Yemen,¹⁷ with the Comoros joining as a sponsor;¹⁸ and to a draft resolution submitted by France, Germany, Honduras, Italy, Poland, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States.¹⁹ The President also drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 17 April 1996 from the representative of Italy addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting the text of the declaration by the Presidency on behalf of the European Union on the situation in the Middle East;²⁰ and to a letter dated 17 April 1996, from the President of the United Arab Emirates to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General transmitting the text of resolution 5573 issued on 17 April 1996 by the Council of the League of Arab States.²¹

At the same meeting, the first draft resolution submitted by Algeria, Bahrain, Djibouti, Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mauritania, Morocco, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, the Sudan, the Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, the United Arab Emirates and Yemen was put to the vote.²² The resolution would have, inter alia, called upon Israel to immediately cease its military action against the Lebanese territorial integrity and withdraw forthwith its forces from all Lebanese territory, considered that Lebanon was entitled to appropriate redress for the destruction it had suffered and held Israel responsible for adequate compensation for such destruction. The resolution received four votes in favour (China, Egypt, Guinea-Bissau, Indonesia), with 11 abstaining and was not adopted because it did not obtain the required majority.

At the same meeting, the draft resolution submitted by France, Germany, Honduras, Italy, Poland, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States was also put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1052 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous relevant resolutions regarding the situation in Lebanon, including resolution 425 (1978) of 19 March 1978 by which it established the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon,

Taking note of the letters dated 13 April 1996 from the Permanent Representative of Lebanon to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council,

Bearing in mind the debate which took place at its 3653rd meeting on 15 April 1996 on the situation in the Middle East,

Gravely concerned at the consequences which the ongoing fighting could have for the peace and security of the region and for the furthering of the peace process in the Middle East, and affirming its full support for that process,

Gravely concerned also at all attacks on civilian targets, including residential areas, and at the loss of life and suffering among civilians,

Stressing the need for all concerned to respect fully the rules of international humanitarian law with regard to the protection of civilians,

Gravely concerned at actions which seriously threaten the safety of the Force and impede the implementation of its mandate, and deploring in particular the incident on 18 April 1996 in which shelling resulted in heavy loss of life among civilians at a site of the Force,

8. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of Egypt commented that the manner in which the Council had dealt with the matter since the Israeli aggression began had been marked with a negativism which would have unfortunate effects on the maintenance of international peace and security, particularly in the Middle East. He noted that differences in the positions of members of the Council had led to a delay in a favourable response being made to the request for an emergency meeting by Lebanon, which had enabled the aggressor to continue its aggression, flouting the principles of international law and of the Charter of the United Nations. He maintained that the draft resolution submitted by the Arab Group showed the severity and scale of the tragedy being experienced by the Lebanese people following the Israeli aggression. He stated that Egypt found it difficult to be convinced by the positions of those that had opposed it. He also noted that, while his country had supported it, resolution 1052 (1996) did not contain all of the principles which needed to apply with regard to the situation in Lebanon. The resolution did not clearly condemn Israel, and it did not deal with the question of the compensation to which Lebanon was entitled for the loss of human life and the destruction of property.²³

The representative of Indonesia, speaking in regards to the two draft resolutions, stated that, while cognizant of the common threads between the resolution and the draft resolution, Indonesia recognized all too well the divergent elements which had proved to be irreconcilable. For his delegation, it was quite clear where the onus of responsibility rested for bringing the current hostilities to an immediate end. He reiterated that military action in Lebanon was a violation of resolutions 242 (1967), 338 (1973) and 425 (1978), and in total contradiction of the aims and objectives of the Madrid peace process.²⁴

The representative of China expressed his delegation's profound concern at the large-scale military offensive launched by Israel in the preceding days in southern Lebanon. He stressed his Government's belief that sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity within internationally recognized borders needed to be fully respected, and that the relevant Security Council resolutions, including resolution 425 (1978), needed to be implemented. He underlined that UNIFIL should not be obstructed in the implementation of its mandate. China called upon the international community, including the United Nations and its agencies, to provide immediate humanitarian assistance to the civilians of Lebanon. On the basis of those considerations, China had voted in favour of the two draft resolutions.²⁵

The representative of Germany stated that there needed to be a political solution on the basis of all relevant Security Council resolutions, including resolution 425 (1978), and that such a political solution, in the framework of the peace process, would best be helped by a decision of the Council that addressed the principal problems and, at the same time, commanded the widest support. That was why Germany had voted for resolution 1052 (1996) and had abstained in the vote on the other resolution.²⁶

The representative of Guinea-Bissau stressed that his country would support all peace initiatives and encouraged the initiatives being taken by certain countries of the region, which his delegation hoped would take into account the relevant resolutions of the Security Council, including resolution 425 (1997). He deplored the recent incidents, expressed support for all those who had been affected by the military activities in the area and made an appeal to the international community to come to the aid of the victims of the war in Lebanon. For all those reasons, he stated that Guinea-Bissau had voted in favour of both of the draft resolutions in the hope that it would make a major contribution to the immediate cessation of hostilities and to the continuation of negotiations on a just and lasting peace in the region.²⁷

The representative of the Republic of Korea stated that there was a window of opportunity which members could have utilized to promote a consensus text. However, it seemed to his delegation that the opportunity had not been fully explored. It was for that reason that the Republic of Korea had decided to abstain in the vote on the draft resolution submitted by the Arab Group.²⁸

The representative of France expressed the hope that the unanimity of the Council would give full weight and backing to the resolution and enable it to produce results; namely the cessation of hostilities by all the parties.²⁹

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that what was happening in Lebanon was unacceptable, as the actions of Israel were undermining the sovereignty of the State of Lebanon, hurting the civilian population and damaging civilian targets. It was essential to demonstrate restraint. A peaceful solution was required that provided for the cessation of the military action against Lebanon while not allowing terrorist attacks against the territory of Israel. He noted that the Security Council had faced a difficult choice. A group of Arab countries had introduced a draft resolution that had not received the requisite number of votes. In principle, the Russian delegation agreed with most of the ideas reflected in the draft resolution. But at the same time, it did not give a full picture of the very complex situation. The resolution passed over in silence such important aspects as the need to provide guarantees for the security of all States in the region and to not allow provocative military actions by extremists from the territory of Lebanon, which undermined the peace process and ran counter to the intensive diplomatic efforts under way. Therefore, the Russian Federation had abstained. He stated that the second draft resolution had been more balanced, although his country would have preferred it to be worded more clearly and precisely and some things could have been called by their names. However, he stressed that the main point was that it did reflect support for an unconditional ceasefire and for the efforts to achieve peace.³⁰

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that his Government remained deeply concerned about the situation as it affected both Lebanon and Israel and condemned the continuing rocket and other attacks on northern Israel, which had started the crisis. While the Government of the United Kingdom deeply deplored the loss of innocent civilian lives in Lebanon, he maintained that what needed to be done was to focus on the future and to do all that could be done to prevent further such tragedies; and what was needed was an immediate cessation of hostilities.³¹

The representative of the United States informed the Council that President Clinton had called upon all parties to agree to an immediate ceasefire, which had been welcomed by the Governments of Israel and Lebanon. She stated that, unfortunately, the draft resolution put before the Council by Lebanon and others had not been one that the United States could support. She maintained that there should be no doubt that the actions taken by Israel were in response to Hizbullah strikes launched from Lebanese territory against civilian centres in Israel. The draft resolution sponsored by Lebanon and others did not mention that. She stressed that singling out Israel for condemnation would have set back negotiations towards an end to the fighting.³²

The representative of Lebanon underscored that his country deplored that the Council had not acted swiftly to put an end to the Israeli aggression, and that the Arab draft resolution had not been adopted. He noted that the draft resolution had represented the firm and constant position of Lebanon and the Arab world in particular. He recalled that the Council of the League of Arab States, at the level of Ministers for Foreign Affairs, had adopted unanimously the same text at the end of its special meeting, which had taken place in Cairo. He reaffirmed that the only way to end the violence in Lebanon was through the full implementation of resolution 425 (1978).³³

The representative of Israel expressed regret for the loss of life among innocent people. He maintained that the tragedy that had occurred was caused because Hizbullah had launched Katyusha rockets at Israel from locations a short distance away from the United Nations position where innocent civilians had taken shelter. He noted that Israel knew Hizbullah had been using civilians as a shield and that they were also doing so with units of UNIFIL, and not for the first time. He expressed regret that Israel had not heard a word of condemnation of those who had initiated hostilities from some of the members of the Security Council who had spoken. He noted that Israel had accepted the initiative by President William Jefferson Clinton to reach a ceasefire, to be implemented as soon as the other party agreed to implement it as well.³⁴

The representative of Norway demanded, as the most important contributor of troops to UNIFIL, that Hizbullah put a stop to its practice of establishing positions close to civilian or United Nations installations, and that the Israeli authorities take every necessary step to prevent shelling of United Nations and civilian targets.³⁵

A number of speakers stated that the military actions against Lebanon constituted a violation of its territorial integrity, sovereignty and political independence within its internationally recognized borders and were also a flagrant violation of the Charter of the United Nations, international law, relevant Security Council resolutions, in particular resolution 425 (1978), and the 1949 armistice agreement between Lebanon and Israel. They called for the hostilities to end immediately.³⁶ Other speakers called for a ceasefire and expressed concern about the security, safety and freedom of movement of UNIFIL.³⁷

B. United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon and development in the Israel-Lebanon sector

Decision of 29 January 1996 (3622nd meeting): resolution 1039 (1996) and statement by the President

On 22 January 1996, pursuant to resolution 1006 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report covering developments in Lebanon since his last report.³⁸ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that during the past six months, hostilities had continued in southern Lebanon between the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) and the local Lebanese auxiliary of IDF, the de facto forces, on the one hand, and armed elements who had proclaimed their resistance against the Israeli occupation on the other. The United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon had continued its efforts to limit the conflict and to protect the inhabitants from the fighting. Israel had maintained its occupation of parts of southern Lebanon, and the mandate of UNIFIL, contained in resolution 425 (1978), had remained unfulfilled. However, during the past six months, incidents involving the targeting of civilians had decreased. Although there had been no progress towards the implementation of the mandate of UNIFIL, the contribution by UNIFIL to stability in the area and the protection it was able to afford the inhabitants remained important. He therefore recommended that the Council accept the request of the Government of Lebanon and extend the mandate of UNIFIL for another period of six months, until 31 July 1996.

At its 3622nd meeting, held on 29 January 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (United Kingdom) then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 17 January 1996 from the representative of Lebanon addressed to the Secretary-

General, requesting the Council to extend the mandate of UNIFIL, which would expire on 31 January 1996, for a further interim period of six months.³⁹

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁴⁰ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1039 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 425 (1978) and 426 (1978) of 19 March 1978, 501 (1982) of 25 February 1982, 508 (1982) of 5 June 1982, 509 (1982) of 6 June 1982 and 520 (1982) of 17 September 1982, as well as all its resolutions on the situation in Lebanon,

Having studied the report of the Secretary-General of 22 January 1996 on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon, and taking note of the observations expressed therein,

Taking note of the letter dated 17 January 1996 from the Permanent Representative of Lebanon to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General,

Responding to the request of the Government of Lebanon,

1. Decides to extend the present mandate of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon for a further period of six months, that is, until 31 July 1996;

2. Reiterates its strong support for the territorial integrity, sovereignty and independence of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries;

3. Re-emphasizes the terms of reference and general guidelines of the Force as stated in the report of the Secretary-General of 19 March 1978, approved by resolution 426 (1978), and calls upon all parties concerned to cooperate fully with the Force for the full implementation of its mandate;

4. Reiterates that the Force should fully implement its mandate as defined in resolutions 425 (1978), 426 (1978) and all other relevant resolutions;

5. Condemns all acts of violence committed in particular against the Force, and urges the parties to put an end to them;

6. Welcomes the streamlining of the Force described in paragraph 16 of the report of the Secretary-General of 22 January 1996, to be completed by May 1996, and stresses the need to continue efforts to achieve further savings by rationalizing the administrative and support services of the Force, provided they do not affect its operational capacity;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to continue consultations with the Government of Lebanon and other parties directly concerned with the implementation of the present resolution and to report thereon to the Security Council.

At the same meeting the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴¹

The Security Council has noted with appreciation the report of the Secretary-General of 22 January 1996 on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon, submitted in conformity with resolution 1006 (1995) of 28 July 1995.

The Council reaffirms its commitment to the full sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries. In this context, the Council asserts that all States shall refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.

As the Council extends the mandate of the Force for a further interim period on the basis of resolution 425 (1978), it again stresses the urgent need for the implementation of that resolution in all its aspects. It reiterates its full support for the Taif Agreement of 22 October 1989 and for the continued efforts of the Lebanese Government to consolidate peace, national unity and security in the country, while successfully carrying out the reconstruction process. The Council commends the Lebanese Government for its successful effort to extend its authority in the south of the country in full coordination with the Force.

The Council expresses its concern over the continuing violence in southern Lebanon, regrets the loss of civilian life, and urges all parties to exercise restraint.

The Council takes this opportunity to express its appreciation for the continuing efforts of the Secretary-General and his staff in this regard and commends troops of the Force and troop-contributing countries for their sacrifices and commitment to the cause of international peace and security under difficult circumstances.

Decision of 30 July 1996 (3685th meeting):
resolution 1068 (1996) and statement by
the President

On 20 July 1996, pursuant to resolution 1039 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on developments in Lebanon since his last report.⁴² In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the past six months had been marked by the serious escalation of hostilities in April, of which the population of southern Lebanon had been the primary victim, and that UNIFIL had also come under fire. The Force was in the same difficult and dangerous situation in which it had been since the Israeli forces had withdrawn to their current lines in 1985. In the circumstances, UNIFIL had done its best to limit violence and to protect the civilian population, which had become its de facto mandate. In that connection, he noted that the understanding announced on 26 April 1996 had the potential of contributing to the protection of civilians and restraining the parties. It was therefore to be hoped that it would soon be put into full effect. He had instructed UNIFIL to assist the monitoring group, which was currently being set up in accordance with the understanding. In view of the importance of the contributions of UNIFIL to stability and the measure of protection it was able to afford to the civilian population, the Secretary-General recommended that the Council extend the mandate for another period of six months, until 31 January 1997.

At its 3685th meeting, held on 30 July 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (France) then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 18 July 1996 from the representative of Lebanon addressed to the Secretary-General, requesting that the Council extend the mandate of UNIFIL.⁴³

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁴⁴ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1068 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

4. Reiterates that the Force should fully implement its mandate as defined in resolutions 425 (1978), 426 (1978) and all other relevant resolutions;

5. Condemns all acts of violence committed in particular against the Force, and urges the parties to put an end to them;

6. Welcomes the completion of the streamlining of the Force described in paragraph 33 of the report of the Secretary-General, and encourages further efficiency and savings provided they do not affect the operational capacity of the Force;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to continue consultations with the Government of Lebanon and other parties directly concerned with the implementation of the present resolution and to report to the Security Council thereon.

At the same meeting the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴⁵ resolution 1095 (1997) and statement by

The Security Council has noted with appreciation the report of the Secretary-General of 20 July 1996 on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon, submitted in conformity with resolution 1039 (1996) of 29 January 1996.

the President

On 20 January 1997, pursuant to resolution 1068 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on developments since his last report.⁴⁶ In his report, the Secretary-General noted that, while the level of hostilities had been somewhat lower than in the past, the situation in southern Lebanon had continued to be tense and volatile, as Israel had maintained its occupation of parts of the area, while Lebanese groups had continued their attacks against the occupying forces. Although UNIFIL had continued to be prevented from implementing its mandate, its contribution to stability and the protection it was able to afford the population of the area remained important and the Secretary-General therefore recommended that the Council accede to the request of the Government of Lebanon and extend the mandate of UNIFIL for another period of six months, until 31 July 1997.

the President

On 20 January 1998, pursuant to resolution 1122 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on developments since his last report.⁵⁴ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that during the past six months, the situation in southern Lebanon remained volatile and had continued to give cause for serious concern. The level of hostilities had risen, and the increase in the number of civilians who had been killed or injured was particularly worrisome. He also expressed concern at the harassment of United Nations personnel. However, he noted that Israel had expressed its readiness to implement resolution 425 (1978), subject to a number of conditions. Although UNIFIL had continued to be prevented from implementing its mandate, its contribution to stability and the protection it was able to afford the population of the area remained important and the Secretary-General therefore recommended that the Council accede to the request of the Government of Lebanon and extend the mandate of UNIFIL for another period of six months, until 31 January 1998.

7. Requests the Secretary-General to continue consultations with the Government of Lebanon and other parties directly concerned with the implementation of the present resolution and to report to the Security Council thereon.

At the same meeting the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶¹

The Security Council has noted with appreciation the report of the Secretary-General of 16 July 1998 on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon, submitted in conformity with resolution 1151 (1998) of 30 January 1998.

The Council reaffirms its commitment to the full sovereignty, political independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries. In this context, the Council asserts that all States shall refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.

As the Council extends the mandate of the Force for a further interim period on the basis of resolution 425 (1978), it again stresses the urgent need for the implementation of that resolution in all its aspects. It reiterates its full support for the Taif Agreement of 22 October 1989 and for the continued efforts of the Lebanese Government to consolidate peace, national unity and security in the country, while successfully carrying out the reconstruction process. The Council commends the Lebanese Government for its successful effort to extend its authority in the south of the country in full coordination with the Force.

The Council expresses its concern over the continuing violence in southern Lebanon, regrets the loss of civilian life, and urges all parties to exercise restraint.

The Council takes this opportunity to express its appreciation for the continuing efforts of the Secretary-General and his staff in this regard. The Council notes with deep concern the high level of casualties the Force has suffered and pays a special tribute to all those who gave their life while serving in the Force. It commends the troops of the Force and troop-contributing countries for their sacrifices and commitment to the cause of international peace and security under difficult circumstances.

Decision of 28 January 1999 (3970th meeting): resolution 1223 (1999) and statement by the President

On 19 January 1999, pursuant to resolution 1188 (1998), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on developments since his last report.⁶² In his report, the Secretary-General observed that fighting in southern Lebanon continued at an increased pace. Although UNIFIL had continued to be prevented from implementing its mandate, its contribution to stability and the protection it was able to afford the population of the area remained important and the Secretary-General therefore recommended that the Council accede to the request of the Government of Lebanon and extend the mandate of UNIFIL for another period of six months, until 13 July 1999.

At its 3970th meeting, held on 28 January 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Brazil) drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 8 January 1999 from the representative of Lebanon addressed to the Secretary-General, requesting that the Council extend the mandate of UNIFIL for a further period of six months.⁶³

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁶⁴ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1223 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 425 (1978) and 426 (1978) of 19 March 1978, 501 (1982) of 25 February 1982, 508 (1982) of 5 June 1982, 509 (1982) of 6 June 1982 and 520 (1982) of 17 September 1982, as well as all its resolutions on the situation in Lebanon,

Having studied the report of the Secretary-General of 19 January 1999 on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon, and taking note of the observations expressed and the commitments mentioned therein,

Taking note of the letter dated 8 January 1999 from the Permanent Representative of Lebanon to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General,

Responding to the request of the Government of Lebanon,

1. Decides to extend the present mandate of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon for a further period of six months, that is, until 31 July 1999;

resolution 1254 (1999) and statement by
the President

On 21 July 1999, pursuant to resolution 1223 (1999), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on developments since his last report.⁶⁶ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the situation in the area remained volatile and continued to give cause for serious concern. The level of hostilities had risen and civilians had again been targeted. Although UNIFIL had done its best to limit the violence and to protect the civilian population, its ability to do so was dependent on the parties, who had too often not honoured their commitments in that regard. He stressed that the fact that UNIFIL itself had been targeted and a member of UNIFIL killed and others injured needed to be strongly condemned. However, he noted that, despite the recent escalation of hostilities, there had been positive signs. In June, Jezzín once again came under the full control of the Government of Lebanon, and there had been new hope that the same would become possible soon for the part of Lebanon that was still under Israeli control. Although UNIFIL had continued to be prevented from implementing its mandate, its contribution to stability and the protection it was able to afford the population of the area remained important and the Secretary-General therefore recommended that the Council accede to the request of the Government of Lebanon and extend the mandate of UNIFIL for another period of six months, until 31 January 2000.

C. United Nations Disengagement Observer Force

Decision of 30 May 1996 (3669th meeting): resolution 1057 (1996) and statement by the President

On 23 May 1996, pursuant to resolution 1024 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on the activities of the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force (UNDOF).⁷⁰ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that the ceasefire in the Israel-Syria sector had been maintained without serious incident and that the area of operation of UNDOF had remained calm. UNDOF had supervised the area of separation to ensure that no military forces had been deployed in it. Despite the current quiet in the Israel-Syria sector, the situation in the Middle East continued to be potentially dangerous and was likely to remain so, unless and until a comprehensive settlement covering all aspects of the Middle East problem could be reached. In the prevailing circumstances, the Secretary-General considered the continued presence of UNDOF in the area to be essential. He therefore recommended that the Council extend the mandate of UNDOF for a further period of six months, until 30 November 1996. He noted that the Governments of the Syrian Arab Republic and Israel had expressed their agreement.

At its 3669th meeting, held on 30 May 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (China) then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁷¹ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1057 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 23 May 1996 on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force,

Decides:

(a) To call upon the parties concerned to implement immediately its resolution 338 (1973) of 22 October 1973;

⁷⁰ S/1996/368.

⁷¹ S/1996/363.

(b) To renew the mandate of the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force for another period of six months, that is, until 30 November 1996;

(c) To request the Secretary-General to submit, at the end of this period, a report on the development in the situation and the measures taken to implement resolution 338 (1973).

At the same meeting, in connection with the resolution adopted, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁷²

As is known, the report of the Secretary-General of 23 May 1996 on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force states, in paragraph 14: "Despite the present quiet in the Israel-Syria sector, the situation in the Middle East continues to be potentially dangerous and is likely to remain so, unless and until a comprehensive settlement covering all aspects of the Middle East problem can be reached." That statement of the Secretary-General reflects the view of the Security Council.

Decision of 27 November 1996 (3715th meeting): resolution 1081 (1996)

On 18 November 1996, pursuant to resolution 1057 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on the activities of UNDOF.⁷³ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that the situation in the Israeli-Syrian sector had remained quiet and that there had been no serious incidents. However, in the prevailing circumstances, the Secretary-General considered the continued presence of UNDOF in the area to be essential and therefore recommended that the Council extend the mandate of UNDOF for a further period of six months, until 31 May 1997. He noted that the Governments of the Syrian Arab Republic and Israel had expressed their agreement.

At its 3715th meeting, held on 27 November 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (Indonesia) then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁷⁴ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1081 (1996), which reads:

(b) To renew the mandate of the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force for another period of six months, that is, until 31 May 1997;

(c) To request the Secretary-General to submit, at the end of this period, a report on the development in the situation and the measures taken to implement resolution 338 (1973).

At the same meeting, in connection with the resolution adopted, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁷⁵

As is known, the report of the Secretary-General of 18 November 1996 on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force states, in paragraph 13: "Despite the present quiet in the Israel-Syria sector, the situation in the Middle East continues to be potentially dangerous and is likely to remain so, unless and until a comprehensive settlement covering all aspects of the Middle East problem can be reached." That statement of the Secretary-General reflects the view of the Security Council.

Decision of 28 May 1997 (3782nd meeting): resolution 1109 (1997) and statement by the President

On 16 May 1997, pursuant to resolution 1081 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on the activities of UNDOF.⁷⁶ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that the situation in the Israeli-Syrian sector had remained quiet and that there had been no serious incident. However, in the prevailing circumstances, the Secretary-General considered the continued presence of UNDOF in the area to be essential. He therefore recommended that the Council extend the mandate of UNDOF for a further period of six months, until 30 November 1997. Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁷⁷ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1109 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 16 May 1997 on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force,

Decides:

(a) To call upon the parties concerned to implement immediately Security Council resolution 338 (1973) of 22 October 1973;

(b) To renew the mandate of the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force for another period of six months, that is, until 30 November 1997;

(c) To request the Secretary-General to submit, at the end of this period, a report on the development in the situation and the measures taken to implement resolution 338 (1973).

At the same meeting, in connection with the resolution adopted, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁷⁸

As is known, the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force states, in paragraph 13: "Despite the present quiet in the Israeli-Syrian sector, the situation in the Middle East continues to be potentially dangerous and is likely to remain so, unless and until a comprehensive settlement covering all aspects of the Middle East problem can be reached." That statement of the Secretary-General reflects the view of the Security Council.

Decision of 21 November 1997 (3835th meeting): resolution 1139 (1997) and statement by the President

On 14 November 1997, pursuant to resolution 1109 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on the activities of UNDOF.⁷⁹ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that the situation in the Israeli-Syrian sector had remained quiet and that there had been no serious incident. However, in the prevailing circumstances, the Secretary-General considered the continued presence of UNDOF in the area to be essential. As is known, the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force states, in paragraph 11: "Despite the present quiet in the Israeli-Syrian sector, the situation in the Middle East continues to be potentially dangerous and is likely to remain so, unless and until a comprehensive settlement covering all aspects of the Middle East problem can be reached." That statement of the Secretary-General reflects the view of the Security Council.

Decision of 24 November 1999 (4071st meeting):
resolution 1276 (1999) and statement by
the President

On 15 November 1999, pursuant to resolution 1243 (1999), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on the activities of UNDOF.⁹¹ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that the situation in the Israeli-Syrian sector had remained quiet and that there had been no serious incident. However, in the prevailing circumstances, the Secretary-General considered the continued presence of UNDOF in the area to be essential. He therefore recommended that the Council extend the mandate of UNDOF for a further period of six months, until 31 May 2000. He noted that the Governments of the Syrian Arab Republic and Israel had expressed their agreement.

At its 4071st meeting, held on 24 November 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (Slovenia) then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁹² The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1276 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 15 November 1999 on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force,

Decides:

(a) To call upon the parties concerned to implement immediately Security Council resolution 338 (1973) of 22 October 1973;

(b) To renew the mandate of the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force for another period of six months, that is, until 31 May 2000;

(c) To request the Secretary-General to submit, at the end of this period, a report on the development in the situation and the measures taken to implement resolution 338 (1973).

At the same meeting, in connection with the resolution adopted, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁹³

As is known, the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force states, in paragraph 10: "Despite the present quiet in the Israeli-Syrian sector, the situation in the Middle East continues to be potentially dangerous and is likely to remain so, unless and until a comprehensive settlement covering all aspects of the Middle East problem can be reached." That statement of the Secretary-General reflects the view of the Security Council.

31. The situation in the occupied Arab territories

Deliberations of 15 April 1996 (3652nd meeting)

By a letter dated 10 April 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the representative of the United Arab Emirates requested the Council to meet to consider the serious situation in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including Jerusalem.¹

At its 3652nd meeting, held on 15 April 1996 in response to that request, the Security Council included the letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Chile), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Algeria, Colombia, Cuba, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Israel, Japan, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Malaysia, Morocco, Norway, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, the Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, Turkey, the United Arab Emirates and Yemen, and the Permanent Observer of Palestine, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President also invited the Acting Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People and the Permanent Observer of the Organization of the Islamic Conference under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure.

The President then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 2 April 1996 from the Permanent Observer of Palestine addressed to the Secretary-General.² In his letter, the representative informed the Council that Israel had been taking very harsh measures against the Palestinian people in the occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem. The measures included the demolition of homes, the confiscation of land and expansion of settlements and severe restrictions on the movement of persons and goods within the Palestinian territory, as well as into and out of the territory.

The representative of Palestine stated that the Palestinian people in the occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem, had been enduring a very difficult time due to a set of policies adopted by Israel in several fields. Speaking on the first field, he elaborated on the points in the above letter. He stressed that it was clear that the policy represented "a siege of the Palestinian territory and the strangulation of the Palestinian people and their economy". In addition, the measures had been taken by Israel unilaterally, without consultation with the Palestinian side, and they were illegally imposed by military means. The second field involved a set of Israeli measures with multiple aspects, which began with the resumption by the occupying Power of the practice of demolishing Palestinian homes and its threats to revert to deportation, and included political assassinations and the continued confiscation of Palestinian land. The third field concerned the non-compliance of Israel with some relevant provisions of the agreements reached between the Israeli and Palestinian sides, including the failure of Israel to implement the redeployment of its forces from the city of Hebron. He condemned all the policies and measures on the basis that some of them violated the provisions of the Fourth Geneva Convention as well as agreements reached between the Government of Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization, and constituted a violation of the spirit of peace. He stated that his delegation had hoped that the Council would express an official position concerning the issue discussed; nevertheless, the convening of the official meeting today was a clear indication of the serious concern of the international community with regard to the existing situation and the negative impact it had on the peace process.³

The representative of Israel stated that during February and March, terrorists from the West Bank and Gaza had perpetrated four separate suicide bombings within Israel and, as a direct result, the Government of Israel had imposed a closure of Israel to residents of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. He noted that the rationale behind the closure was to restore a sense of security to the Israeli people by preventing armed terrorists from infiltrating Israel. He stressed that the closure was not a form of collective punishment against the Palestinian population but was a measure enacted solely to ensure security. Stating that Israel was aware of the toll that the closure had taken on the residents of the West Bank and Gaza, he explained that the Government of Israel had undertaken measures to gradually ease the closure. He noted that following the elections in the Palestinian Authority, it was the belief of Israel that it was the responsibility of the Authority to root out terrorists. He also noted that the terrorists were supported by several foreign Governments. Finally, he maintained that Israel would continue to work towards enhancing the peace process and towards implementing the agreement which had been reached with the Palestinians.⁴

The representative of China maintained that the national interests of the Palestinian people needed to be respected and safeguarded, and expressed the hope that the Government of Israel, on the basis of the overall interests of peace in the Middle East, would lift the closure as soon as possible. Noting that terrorism was a threat to international peace and security, he stated that in opposing terrorist acts as in dealing with other international problems, it was necessary to observe the norms of international relations and international law and not to violate the sovereignty, security or fundamental interests of other countries.⁵

The representative of the United States expressed regret that the discussion of closure of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip by Israel was taking place, as such a discussion could not help the peace process. He stated that the Council needed to be focusing their efforts on seeking ways to combat those who would destroy the peace process and prevent Arabs and Israelis from achieving further progress. He stressed that the United States regretted the economic hardship and suffering of Palestinians caused by the recent Hamas terrorist attacks and the measures Israel had taken to deal with the threat, and called on the international community to do all it could to alleviate those economic hardships. He maintained that the sole objective of the Council needed to be to aid and support efforts to restore momentum to the process of implementation of the agreements.⁶

The representative of the Russian Federation expressed alarm at the situation which prevailed in the autonomous Palestinian territory as a result of actions by the Israeli authorities. He stated that the dangerous turn of events threatened the further development of the peace process. He noted that experience indicated that the problems in the way of a peace settlement could not be resolved through unilateral actions which affected the most sensitive aspects of the Arab-Israeli conflict. He also stressed that the Russian Federation condemned acts of terrorism perpetrated in Israel by extremist groups.⁷

The representative of France stated that his country understood the anguish of the Israeli authorities and their firm determination to ensure the safety of the population and to reassure it after the trauma of recent months. However, it was essential that the scope and duration of the measures taken did not penalize the Palestinians to such an extent that their confidence in rapprochement and peace might be shattered for some time to come. He also noted that some of the measures imposed by the Government of Israel disregarded the spirit and at times the letter of the Interim Agreement of 28 September 1995. The representative reiterated the conviction of France that a just and lasting peace guaranteeing the security of Israel and the sovereignty of Lebanon needed to involve the implementation of resolution 425 (1978) and that in the interim all acts of violence and retaliation needed to cease.⁸

The representative of the United Kingdom stated his country's agreement with the representative of Israel that the origin of the current setback to the situation in the West Bank and Gaza lay in the attacks carried out by Hamas terrorists in Jerusalem. He noted that the United Kingdom had always recognized and supported the right to and need for security of Israel, which had been recognized by the Council in resolution 242 (1967). While Israel had the right to protect itself, he maintained that security and economic stability in Gaza and the West Bank were two sides of the same coin. He welcomed the measures which the Government of Israel had taken, and expressed hope that those could be further amplified, particularly in respect of permitting workers to enter Israel and of easing the export and transit of goods.⁹

The representative of Italy, on behalf of the European Union and associated countries¹⁰ stated that in condemning the terrorist acts in Israel, the European Union acknowledged the need to assure the safety of the Israeli population and to prevent further terrorist acts. The European Union also recognized the hardship imposed on the Palestinian population as a result of the closure by Israel, for security reasons, of all land and sea borders with Gaza and the West Bank. The closure of the borders, which needed to be completely ended, was threatening the interdependent work of the reconstruction assistance and causing suffering through lack of food supplies to the Palestinian population. The European Union called on Israel to allow humanitarian assistance and materials for the internationally financed reconstruction programmes to go through and to cease the imposition of collective punishment.¹¹

The representative of Lebanon reiterated that Israeli forces had been engaging in collective punishment against Palestinian inhabitants inside the occupied Palestinian territories and were also continuing to blockade the entire Lebanese coast and to bombard coastal roads. He stressed that such policies were in flagrant violation of human rights, international law and the Charter of the United Nations.¹²

The Permanent Observer of the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC) stated that, while OIC wanted to continue to encourage and support the peace process, that could not be accomplished without a visible change of attitudes and practices. OIC wanted to see the implementation of United Nations resolutions, particularly resolutions 242 (1967), 338 (1973) and 425 (1978), and the withdrawal of Israel from all the Palestinian and Arab territories, including Al-Quds al-Sharif, the occupied Lebanese territories and the occupied Syrian Golan, and an immediate halt to the Israeli military actions in Lebanon.¹³

A number of speakers made statements which, while condemning terrorism, stated that the Israeli measures constituted a collective punishment. They called on the Council to bring pressure to bear on the Government of Israel and on the Israelis to immediately end the measures and to abide by the commitments it had made. Several speakers noted that the measures violated the Fourth Geneva Convention and the agreements between Israel and the Palestinians.¹⁴ A number of speakers also called on Israel to cease its military actions in Lebanon.¹⁵ In addition, the United Arab Emirates asked the Council to call on the Government of Israel to accede to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons in a way that was in consonance with the peace process.

Other speakers expressed grave concern at the situation and, while condemning terrorism, stressed that the socio-economic problems resulting from the Israeli measures needed to be resolved as soon as possible. They called on both parties to implement the international commitments they had entered into.¹⁶

Decision of 28 September 1996 (3698th meeting): resolution 1073 (1996)

By a letter dated 26 September 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁷ the representative of Saudi Arabia, in his capacity as Chairman of the Arab Group, conveyed the position of the Group with regard to the action taken by the Government of Israel in opening an entrance to the tunnel extending under the Western Wall of the Al-Aqsa Mosque in occupied East Jerusalem; and to the shooting by Israeli Army forces of civilian Palestinian demonstrations protesting against that action, resulting in hundreds of dead and wounded. The Arab Group strongly condemned the Israeli action as a flagrant violation of the Fourth Geneva Convention and of the relevant Security Council resolutions and as being incompatible with the agreements concluded by the Palestine Liberation Organization and the Government of Israel. He requested the Council to meet its responsibilities with regard to the maintenance of peace and security by convening an immediate meeting and taking the necessary measures, including the closing of the tunnel, to address the situation and put an end to the Israeli violations.

By a letter dated 26 September 1996 addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁸ the representative of Egypt supported that request and called for the immediate convening of the Council.

At its 3698th meeting, held on 27 and 28 September 1996 in response to the requests contained in the above-mentioned letters, the Security Council included the letters in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Guinea-Bissau), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Algeria, Canada, Djibouti, Ireland, Israel, Japan, Kuwait, Lebanon, Malaysia, Morocco, Norway, Pakistan, Senegal, Tunisia and Turkey, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President also invited the Head of the Observer Delegation of Palestine to participate in the debate in accordance with the provisional rules of procedure and with previous practice in that regard.

The President then drew the attention of the Council to the following documents: letters dated 23, 24, 25 and 26 September 1996 from the Permanent Observer of Palestine addressed to the Secretary-General;¹⁹ a letter dated 26 September 1996 from the representative of Israel addressed to the Secretary-General;²⁰ and a letter dated 26 September 1996 from the Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People addressed to the Secretary-General.²¹

The representative of Palestine stated that for the previous three days, the Palestinian people in the occupied Palestinian territories had been assaulted by the Israeli army and police forces. He suggested that it seemed that the developments had been planned in advance with the aim of undermining the achievements of the political process. Following the declaration of its political programmes, the Government of Israel had taken many provocative actions, including the resumption of settlement activities and the building of thousands of housing units, and had confiscated more Palestinian land. It had also closed down a number of educational and cultural institutions, and had isolated the city of Jerusalem from other Palestinian territories and restricted housing development in Arab neighbourhoods. He stated that the political programme of the Government of Israel was based on a number of negative positions, including no return to the 4 June 1967 border; no withdrawal from the Syrian Golan; no discussion of Jerusalem; and no establishment of an independent Palestinian State. As a result of that political programme, as soon as Israel had announced the opening of the tunnel in Jerusalem, the spark of conflagration had been touched off. He also reiterated and emphasized the commitment of the Palestinian Authority to the underpinning of the peace process, which called for the withdrawal of Israel from all occupied territories, including Jerusalem, under the resolution adopted by the Council and in keeping with the principle that rejected the acquisition by force of the territories of others.²²

The representative of Israel stated that, while the official reason for convening the meeting of the Security Council was the opening of the Western Wall tunnel, that was merely a pretence. The Western Wall tunnel was a 2,500-year-old tunnel which, in ancient times, had been used as a water system. He emphasized that the tunnel held no political or religious significance whatsoever and that it did not run beneath the Temple Mount, nor did it in any way affect the Al-Aqsa Mosque or its foundations. The sole intention in opening the exit of the tunnel was to provide greater comfort and safety to the many local visitors, tourists and pilgrims who came to the Holy City to marvel at its wonders. He also noted that the supreme Muslim religious authority in Jerusalem, the Waqf, had been informed in advance of the intention to open the tunnel to tourists and visitors. He stressed that the President of the Palestinian Authority needed to exert the authority vested in him to exercise his restraining influence and issue clear and unequivocal instructions to his forces, which were subject to his authority, and to the residents of the autonomous areas to refrain from violence lest there be any further deterioration. Regarding the closure of the autonomous areas, he noted that Israel had taken steps to ease the closure and also to assist and ease the economic hardship in the autonomous areas. He reiterated that the place for resolving differences was the negotiating table, and, for that, order, stability and security needed to be restored.²³

The representative of Egypt stated that his delegation condemned the changes made by Israel in Jerusalem, as well as its incitation action and the challenges it had issued. He underscored that the matter went beyond the recent events, as what his country saw was Israel moving away from the basic points that had been agreed. He reiterated the decision of the Cairo summit that the peace option was a strategic Arab option, which would require a serious commitment by Israel. He argued that Arab countries would not accept a threat to peace or a threat to the legitimate national rights of the Palestinians. He stressed that the Council needed to assume its obligations and responsibilities in maintaining peace and security, and send a strong message to the Government of Israel that policies of violence against civilians, of provoking religious sentiment, of relinquishing contractual obligations and of political prevarication would not lead to a positive outcome.²⁴

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that urgent action was needed to deal both with the immediate problem and with the underlying deterioration in the peace process. He suggested that what was required was, first, a moratorium on the opening up of the tunnel to tourism; second, a meeting between the two leaders at which agreement could be reached on immediate steps to cease the fighting; third, the earliest possible engagement to bring about the implementation of outstanding issues under the Interim Agreement; and fourth, an agreement to an international commission to work out ways of dealing with the sensitive questions that arose in Jerusalem on archaeological matters.²⁵

The representative of France noted that his country had been warning the Israeli authorities about growing frustrations in the Palestinian territories, and had insisted on the urgency of concrete measures that would allow for an improvement in the daily lives of the Palestinians. He commented that the opening of a tunnel was less serious than many of the measures taken, which had directly affected the lives of Palestinians, but the latest step, taken in a highly symbolic place, showed, if not deliberate provocation, then at least a serious psychological error. He stated that France was concerned that an important provision of the agreements concluded between the Palestinian Authority and the Government of Israel had been deliberately violated, and noted the fact that the Israeli Army had entered parts of Zone A, which was under Palestinian control, contrary to the letter and spirit of the Taba Agreement.²⁶

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that it would appear that the situation was a direct result not only of reckless activity in respect of the delicate issue of religious sentiment, but also of the fact that over the past four months the peace process in the Middle East had come to a virtual standstill and that Israel had even begun to draw back from agreements it had entered into. He strongly urged all the interested parties to show maximum restraint and to avoid action that might lead to a further deterioration of the situation.²⁷

The representative of the United States stressed that the focus needed to be on how to stop the violence, in order to restore the peace process. He stated that the first objective was to restore calm, and that the second objective was to accelerate the negotiating process, which was the way to resolve key outstanding issues for implementation of the Interim Agreement. He stressed that tangible results needed to be seen, and that to be effective, both sides needed to reach out to each other as real partners. Noting that the United States was working intensively with both sides, he stated that the Council needed to focus on how to help, how to restore calm, how to encourage the peace process and how to make and consolidate real gains.²⁸

A number of speakers called on both parties to do everything possible to calm the situation and resume dialogue in the framework of respect for existing agreements and for the beliefs of the populations concerned.²⁹ Other speakers condemned the opening of the tunnel and called on Israel to close the tunnel and return it to its initial state before the crisis. Those speakers further called for the cessation of all acts detrimental to the safety and well-being of the Palestinian people, and for negotiations to resume on the basis of previous agreements.³⁰

During the course of the debate, the meeting was suspended at 1:04 p.m. and resumed at 5 p.m. It was then suspended at 9:40 p.m. on 27 September 1996 and resumed at 9:35 p.m., on 28 September 1996. Following the second resumption, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.³¹ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted by 14 votes to none, with one abstention (United States), as resolution 1073 (1996),³² which reads:

The Security Council,

Having considered the letter dated 26 September 1996 from the representative of Saudi Arabia, on behalf of the States members of the Group of Arab States, which referred to the action by the Government of Israel to open an entrance to a tunnel in the vicinity of Al Aqsa Mosque and its consequent results,

Expressing its deep concern about the tragic events in Jerusalem and the areas of Nablus, Ramallah, Bethlehem and the Gaza Strip, which resulted in a high number of deaths and injuries among the Palestinian civilians, and concerned also about the clashes between the Israeli army and the Palestinian police and the casualties on both sides,

Recalling its resolutions on Jerusalem and other relevant Security Council resolutions,

Having discussed the situation at its formal meeting on 27 September 1996, with the participation of Ministers for Foreign Affairs of a number of countries,

Decision of 7 March 1997 (3747th meeting):
rejection of a draft resolution

At the 3745th meeting of the Security Council, held on 5 March 1997 at the request of Egypt under rule 2 of the provisional rules of procedure, the President (Poland), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Afghanistan, Algeria, Argentina, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Brazil, Canada, Colombia, Cuba, Indonesia, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Israel, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, Malaysia, Malta, Morocco, the Netherlands, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, the Philippines, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, the Sudan, the Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, Turkey, the United Arab Emirates and Yemen, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President also invited the Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People and the Permanent Observer of the Organization of the Islamic Conference to participate, under rule 39 of the provisional rules of procedure.

The President then drew the attention of the Council to the following documents regarding, inter alia, the plans for a new settlement in East Jerusalem: letters dated 21 and 25 February 1997, respectively, from the Permanent Observer of Palestine addressed to the President;³³ a letter dated 27 February 1997 from the Permanent Observer of Palestine addressed to the President;³⁴ a letter dated 28 February 1997 from the Acting Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People addressed to the President;³⁵ a letter dated 3 March 1997 from the representative of Qatar addressed to the President;³⁶ a letter dated 3 March 1997 from the representative of Israel addressed to the Secretary-General;³⁷ a letter dated 28 February 1997 from the representative of the Netherlands addressed to the Secretary-General;³⁸ and identical letters dated 3 March 1997 from the representative of Indonesia addressed to the Secretary-General and to the President of the Security Council.³⁹

The representative of Palestine informed the Council that the Government of Israel had decided to build a new settlement in the area of Jabal Abu Ghneim in the occupied Palestinian territories. That area was situated within the territory that Israel had annexed and considered part of the extended municipal boundaries of the city of Jerusalem. He maintained that the decision was illegal and in blatant violation of international humanitarian law and the relevant Council resolutions. Moreover, the decision would isolate areas of Arab Jerusalem from the southern part of the West Bank in pursuit of a long-standing Israeli plan to build settlements around those Arab neighbourhoods and completely isolate them from the rest of the West Bank, thus creating new facts on the ground. He stated that that Israeli measure followed a series of others regarding Jerusalem that constituted a clear policy aimed at the “Judaization” of the city of Jerusalem and at changing its legal status and its demographic composition. All of those actions represented flagrant violations of several Council resolutions on the question of Jerusalem. He stressed that the relevant resolutions, including resolutions 252 (1968), 271 (1969), 478 (1980) and 672 (1990), clearly affirmed that any actions or measures taken by Israel to alter the legal status and the demographic composition of the city were null and void and had no legal validity. The international community had categorically rejected the positions of Israel on Jerusalem and had always affirmed that East Jerusalem was part of the territories occupied since 1967. Furthermore, it had never recognized Israeli sovereignty over West Jerusalem. He called on Israel to cease construction on the settlement in Jabal Abu Ghneim and cease all settlement activities and confiscation of land, as well as any action that would change the facts on the ground. He also called on the Council to take the necessary action by adopting a clear resolution in order to guarantee respect for its relevant resolutions and for international law and to save the peace process.⁴⁰

The representative of Israel noted that Jerusalem had been the capital of the State of Israel since its rebirth in 1948 and the seat of Jewish Government since King David established it as the centre of Jewish national life some 3,000 years ago. He stated that Jerusalem, like any other modern city, had specific needs, such as development and modernization, and that municipal services needed to be extended to all its citizens. On 26 February 1997, the Government of Israel had unanimously approved construction in Har Homa and in 10 predominantly Arab neighbourhoods throughout Jerusalem. The project was an essential part of a comprehensive municipal plan to construct new housing units for the city's Jewish and Arab residents in a ratio comparable to that of the Jewish and Arab populations of the city. The purpose of the project was to alleviate the shortage of housing for both Jewish and Arab residents of Jerusalem. He noted that it was regrettable that some speakers had failed to differentiate between the issue of Jerusalem and its neighbourhoods and the issue of settlements in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, and reiterated that both of those issues were to be negotiated separately within the context of the permanent status negotiations. He expressed regret that the Council saw fit to discuss issues of contention between Israel and the Palestinians, as the very appeal by the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) to the Council was inconsistent with its explicit agreement to settle all issues under dispute through negotiations. He noted that in agreeing that the issue of Jerusalem was to be part of the permanent status negotiations, the parties had recognized Jerusalem as a separate issue which did not constitute a part of the agreed arrangement for redeployment and transfer of authorities in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. He stressed that the status of the city remained unchanged so long as no decision to the contrary was taken in the permanent status negotiations. Therefore, the approval of building plans within Jerusalem, or the implementation of any construction work did not constitute a change in the status of Jerusalem, nor did it create a situation which could adversely affect or influence the permanent status negotiations. In any event, the existing agreements did not accord the Palestinians any standing with regard to any actions taken in Jerusalem, and Israel was under no obligation to coordinate such actions or consult with them.⁴¹

Several speakers stressed that the building of new settlements in East Jerusalem posed a danger to the peace process and was a violation of international law and the agreements with the Palestinian Authority. East Jerusalem was part of the territories occupied in 1967, which meant that it was governed by the Hague Rules of 1907 and the Fourth Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, which made it necessary for the occupying Power not to undertake any change in the lands. Many speakers noted that the Council had adopted several resolutions calling on Israel to respect its obligations as an occupying Power, including 252 (1968), 271 (1969), 476 (1980) and 672 (1990). Resolution 478 (1980) also specifically stated that all legislative and administrative measures which altered, or purported to alter, the character and status of Jerusalem were null and void. Several speakers stressed that the decision also ran counter to the letter and the spirit of the Declaration of Principles on the Interim Self-Government Arrangements as well as the Interim Agreement on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, among others. They called on the Government of Israel to cancel its decision to build settlements at Jabal Abu Ghneim and to adopt measures to accelerate the peace process as a whole.⁴²

Other speakers expressed concern about any threats to the ongoing negotiations and urged the parties to exercise restraint and to continue to negotiate on all outstanding issues, including the permanent status of Jerusalem.⁴³

The representative of France expressed the view that the decision by the Government of Israel to authorize the establishment of a new settlement at Jabal Abu Ghneim was not a step in the right direction and ran counter to international law and to guarantees that had been given. The parties had agreed to negotiate the status of Jerusalem in the context of the peace process, and negotiations could not accommodate unilateral decisions or decisions which prejudged the outcome of the discussions or altered the status quo. Until the parties came to an agreement, East Jerusalem remained subject to the principles set out in resolution 242 (1967).⁴⁴

The representative of the United Kingdom reiterated his delegation's position on settlements, which was that all Israeli settlements in occupied territory were illegal under Article 49 of the Fourth Geneva Convention, including those in East Jerusalem, and that settlement activity damaged the peace process. He suggested that if the Government of Israel showed signs that it was willing to change its hard-line stance, the United Kingdom would be willing to consider a delay to any reaction by the Council.⁴⁵

The representative of China stated that the move was bound to place serious obstacles in the way of the Palestinian-Israeli peace process and urged Israel to call off its plan to build the settlements. He stated that the question of Jerusalem needed to be settled by the parties concerned through negotiations on the basis of the relevant United Nations resolutions.⁴⁶

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the steps taken by Israel ran counter to the Palestinian-Israeli agreement and that such unilateral actions, designed to change the demographic composition of East Jerusalem in favour of the Israeli population, perpetuated the policy of fait accompli with respect to Jerusalem and obviated a negotiated search for compromise on the problem of Jerusalem. He expressed hope that the Government of Israel would ponder all the consequences of the decision and reconsider it.⁴⁷

The representative of the United States stated that the announced decision of the Government of Israel on the proposed Har Homa settlement in East Jerusalem did not accord with the progress the parties had achieved to date. The United States was concerned by the decision announced by the Government of Israel. He underscored that his Government knew the sensitivity of the issue of Jerusalem, and that it was precisely because mutual confidence was needed to deal with the permanent status questions that his country would have preferred the decision not have been taken. He stressed that all parties needed to do everything possible to foster a supportive environment for permanent status negotiations, and be especially sensitive to any actual or implied interference in those negotiations. He stressed that such interference could only provoke mistrust and harden the positions of both sides, and that the Council had a special responsibility in that regard.⁴⁸

At its 3747th meeting, held on 7 March 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations and in accordance with the decisions taken at the 3745th meeting, the President (Poland) invited the representative of Israel and the Permanent Observer of Palestine, and the representatives of Afghanistan, Algeria, Argentina, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Brazil, Canada, Colombia, Cuba, Indonesia, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon,

Malaysia, Malta, Morocco, the Netherlands, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, the Philippines, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, the Sudan, the Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, Turkey, the United Arab Emirates and Yemen, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by France, Portugal, Sweden and the United Kingdom.⁴⁹

The representative of Costa Rica stated that his delegation had lent its support to the draft text submitted by the countries of the European Union, on the understanding that the text's contents would accurately reflect what had been expressed in the formal debate. His delegation had felt that in that regard there had been no inconsistencies between the European text and what had been stated by the members of the Council, and that the substance of the consensus could be expressed accurately and with a single voice by the Council. The important point would have been to preserve the unity of that message in the content of the text, whether it was a resolution or a presidential statement. He stated that unfortunately the negotiation process had taken a different path and that the necessary consensus had not been reached. However, faced with a "de facto situation" that they truly did not want and that in their opinion was not the ideal one, the Government of Costa Rica had decided to vote with the majority in support of the draft resolution.⁵⁰

The representative of Egypt stated that the draft resolution faithfully reflected the sentiments of grave concern over the expansion of Israeli settlement activity and the recent decision by the Government of Israel on Jabal Abu Ghneim, expressed by many delegations in the previous Council meetings. Second, the feelings conveyed were overwhelmingly opposed to the Israeli position and underlined the fundamental international principle of the inadmissibility of the acquisition of land by force and reiterated the position that the settlement activity was in contravention of the legal commitments entered into by Israel with the Palestinian Authority.⁵¹

resolution, the Council would, inter alia, have confirmed that all legislative and administrative measures and actions taken by Israel which purported to alter the status of Jerusalem, including expropriation of land and properties thereon, were invalid and could not change its status. Under the operative part of the resolution, the Council would have called on Israel to refrain from acts that altered the facts on the ground, and to abide by the Fourth Geneva Convention; and would have called on both parties to continue negotiations. The resolution received 14 votes in favour and 1 against (United States) and was not adopted, owing to the negative vote of a permanent member of the Council.⁵²

The representative of the United States stated that the decision of the Government of Israel ran counter to the progress and achievement of the parties to date, and that the United States did not believe that such activity was helpful to the peace process and wished the decision had not been made. He stressed that the Israeli action undermined the trust and confidence so badly needed in creating the appropriate environment for successful negotiations. Achieving a just, lasting and comprehensive peace in the Middle East would require an honest negotiating process, one in which the parties did nothing to pre-empt, prejudice or predetermine talks over any of the issues the parties themselves had decided would be addressed in permanent status negotiations. Unfortunately, the draft resolution would not have helped that process. He noted that the United States had never believed, despite the useful role the Council could play and had played in working for Middle East peace, that it was an appropriate forum for debating the issues under negotiation between the parties. Furthermore, the draft resolution made sweeping statements concerning the legal status of Israeli settlements, which the parties themselves had agreed was to be treated as a permanent-status issue in the talks that were about to resume. He suggested that the Council needed to reiterate its support for the achievements of the partners to date and respect their commitment to working together towards their common goal without the interference of outside parties. As the resolution would not move them towards that goal, the United States had been obliged to vote against it.⁵³

The representative of Palestine maintained that the central importance of Jerusalem and the grave danger posed by the Israeli decision required the Palestinians and Arabs to insist that the Council adopt a clear draft resolution on the question. However, despite the moderation and flexible timing of the text and his delegation's response to and accommodation of certain requirements, the Council had been unable to assume its responsibilities for the maintenance of international peace and security or to adopt the draft resolution. He expressed the belief that this would complicate the peace process and would not help advance it. He also expressed the belief that the Council remained responsible for international peace and security, including in the Middle East region, and that the United Nations would have an ongoing responsibility regarding the question of Palestine until it was resolved in all its aspects.⁵⁴

The representative of Israel expressed the hope that, as the Council had decided not to take any action regarding the decision of the Government of Israel to begin construction in Har Homa and in 10 predominantly Arab neighbourhoods throughout Jerusalem, the sponsors of the draft resolution would recognize that the Council was not the appropriate forum for discussions of outstanding issues between Israel and the Palestinians. He reiterated that the adoption of unbalanced positions by outside parties could only damage the process.⁵⁵

rejection of a draft resolution

By a letter dated 19 March 1997 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵⁶ the representative of Qatar, in his capacity as Chairman of the Arab Group for the month of March 1997 and on behalf of the members of the League of Arab States, requested that an immediate meeting of the Council be convened to consider the commencement by Israel, "the occupying Power", of the construction of a new settlement in the Jabal Abu Ghneim area to the south of occupied East Jerusalem as well as Israeli settlement activities in general in the rest of the occupied territories.

At its 3756th meeting, held on 21 March 1997 in response to that request, the Security Council included the letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Poland), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Israel and Qatar, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President also invited the Permanent Observer of Palestine to participate in the current debate in accordance with the rules of procedure and with previous practice in that regard. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Egypt and Qatar.⁵⁷ The President also drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 18 March 1997 from the Permanent Observer of Palestine addressed to the Secretary-General.⁵⁸

The representative of Egypt stated that the draft resolution prepared by all the Arab States and sponsored by Egypt and Qatar called on Israel to cease using settlements as an instrument for imposing a fait accompli, which had been rejected in both form and substance. The decision to begin building settlements needed to be overturned because it ran counter to the norms of international law and to the obligations as an occupying Power, in accordance with the Fourth Geneva Convention, as well as to relevant United Nations resolutions. He stated that the silence of the Council and its failure to take up its duties would send an erroneous message likely to encourage the current Government of Israel to continue to violate international law and to disdain its contractual obligations.⁵⁹

The representative of Costa Rica reaffirmed all the reasons that had led Costa Rica to vote, on 7 March, in favour of the previous draft resolution on the subject of the building of settlements in East Jerusalem. He reiterated that the decision by the Government of Israel ran counter to international law and did serious damage to the desire for peace and faithful compliance with the Oslo agreements. However, Costa Rica had insistently maintained that there needed to be unity in the Council, whether it was expressed as a resolution or as a presidential statement, in order for the message to reach the Middle East clearly and unequivocally. Unfortunately, for the second time, the Council found itself lacking the necessary conditions of unity. As a result, he informed the Council that he had received instructions from his Government to abstain in the voting on the draft resolution.⁶⁰

The representative of the United States noted that, while his Government shared the concerns expressed in the Council and the General Assembly about the decision of the Government of Israel to begin construction at the site, his delegation disagreed on the best method of addressing the situation and favoured moving beyond the current controversy in a way that would support the Middle East peace process. The United States did not believe that the Council or the General Assembly should be in the business of inserting themselves into issues that the negotiating partners had decided would be addressed in their permanent status talks, as such interference could only harden the positions of both sides and make their work even more difficult.⁶¹

A number of speakers expressed their concern at the situation and calling on the Government of Israel to cease the settlement activities. They also condemned terrorism and the bombing attack that had occurred that day.⁶²

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote. By the draft resolution, the Council would, inter alia, have demanded that Israel immediately cease construction of the Jabal Abu Ghneim settlement in East Jerusalem, as well as all other Israeli settlement activities in the occupied territories. The draft resolution received 13 votes in favour and 1 against (United States), with 1 abstention (Costa Rica) and was not adopted, owing to the negative vote of a permanent member of the Council.⁶³

Speaking after the vote, the Permanent Observer of Palestine stated that it was difficult to accept that the veto had been cast to protect the peace process. It was also difficult to accept that the bilateral negotiations were the only solution, at a time when one of the two parties was imposing new facts on the ground. The reality was that the veto had been cast to shield Israel from the will of the international community and to exempt Israel from the provisions of international law and of the Charter of the United Nations. Using the veto as a matter of “principle”, regardless of the text of the draft resolution submitted, seemed to elevate to an official position the suspension of the functions and powers of the Council with regard to Israel and the situation in the Middle East. He expressed the belief that the use of the veto had seriously violated the provisions of the Charter and was definitely not in the interests of the Council and its credibility, or in the interests of the peace process and its continuity. The existence of bilateral agreements between the parties on the nature of the interim stage, as well as the postponement of negotiations on important second-stage issues, did not negate the provisions of international law or those of resolutions of the Council.⁶⁴

The representative of Israel noted that on a day when three Israeli women had been murdered by Palestinian terrorists and many more wounded, 13 members of the Security Council had “raised their hands in support of a one-sided draft resolution which single[d] out Israel”. He maintained that the Palestinians had been engaged in a concerted effort to bring international pressure to bear against Israel and to avoid addressing the outstanding issues through a mechanism established as part of the current peace process. However, the Palestinian attempts to politicize those issues and to generate international pressure could only damage the trust between the parties, be counterproductive and raise doubts over Palestinian readiness to negotiate in good faith. He stressed that the Palestinians had also committed violations of the agreements, but that whenever such violations had occurred, Israel had raised the issue directly with the Palestinians. He noted that the Palestinians had undertaken to complete the process of revising the Palestinian charter, to fight terrorism, to prevent violence and to conduct Palestinian Council activities in areas of Palestinian jurisdiction, although not in Jerusalem. However, the Palestinian side had failed to demonstrate its intention or will to comply with any of its commitments. He reiterated that the permanent status negotiations would resume that month and he expressed hope that the Palestinians would not “rush to the United Nations if obstacles arose”.⁶⁵

The representative of Egypt again intervened to emphasize that he could not accept the statement that bringing to the Council a matter relating to the maintenance of international peace and security in the Middle East would be a blatant misuse of the Council.⁶⁶

Decision of 13 July 1998 (3904th meeting):
statement by the President

By a letter dated 23 June 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁶⁷ the representative of the Sudan referred to the decision of the Government of Israel to expand the boundaries of the municipality of Jerusalem and to create “a municipal umbrella” that would include a number of Jewish settlements on the West Bank, which was in the context of annexing more occupied Palestinian territory and ensuring a greater Jewish majority in the demographic composition of occupied Jerusalem. He requested the convening of an urgent formal meeting of the Council to consider the matter and take the necessary concrete measures to oblige Israel to rescind the above-mentioned decision and to prevent it from continuing its repeated violations of resolutions of the Council and international law.

At its 3900th meeting, held on 30 June 1998 in response to that request, the Council included the letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Portugal), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Algeria, Bangladesh, Colombia, Cuba, Egypt, Indonesia, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Iraq, Israel, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, Malaysia, Mauritania, Morocco, Norway, Oman, Peru, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, the Sudan, the Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, the United Arab Emirates and Yemen, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then invited the Permanent Observer of Palestine to participate in the debate in accordance with the rules of procedure and previous practice in that regard. He also invited the Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, the Permanent Observer for the League of Arab States and the Permanent Observer for the Organization of the Islamic Conference under rule 39 of the provisional rules of procedure.

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to letters dated 8, 15, 18 and 22 June 1998, respectively, from the Permanent Observer of Palestine to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General, regarding, inter alia, the plan of the Prime Minister of Israel to expand the border of Jerusalem and extend the municipal authority over some Jewish settlements in the West Bank.⁶⁸ The President also drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 26 June from the representative of the Sudan addressed to the President of the Council.⁶⁹

The Permanent Observer of Palestine stated that the Israeli plan would expand the municipal boundaries of the city and establish an “umbrella authority” to include a number of illegal settlements in the West Bank, which represented a concrete step towards the illegal annexation of more occupied Palestinian lands to the already illegally expanded Jerusalem municipality, in order to maintain a specific demographic composition with the aim of furthering the process of the “Judaization” of the city. He reiterated that the plan constituted a flagrant violation of international law, the Fourth Geneva Convention, several resolutions of the Council, and those of the tenth emergency special session of the General Assembly. He expressed hope that the Council would have the sufficient will to undertake the necessary measures to guarantee the rescinding of the plan and to prevent Israel from undertaking any further illegal actions in Jerusalem and the rest of the occupied territories, beginning with the adoption of the draft resolution sponsored by the Arab Group in that regard. It was ridiculous to claim that the Palestinian Authority complaining to the Council violated the existing agreements. He also stressed that the claim that the consideration by the Council of the Israeli violations would harm the peace process was unreasonable and unacceptable.⁷⁰

The representative of Israel recalled that fifty years ago when the Jewish quarter of the Old City of Jerusalem had surrendered, its Jewish inhabitants had been expelled and that free access of the Jewish people to their holy places, particularly the Western Wall, had been denied. Yet during all those years, from 1948 until 1967, the Council had not met once to consider the denial of Israeli rights or Jewish rights in Jerusalem. He also noted that the Jewish majority in Jerusalem was not a present-day demographic development, but had already been restored by the middle of the nineteenth century, in 1864, when Jerusalem was under the rule of the Ottoman Empire. He stressed that besides safeguarding the access of all faiths to the holy sites, Israel had carefully sought to ensure the development of Jerusalem for all its peoples and that preserving Jerusalem required planning. He underlined that the actions of Israel to preserve and protect Jerusalem were fully in accordance with the Interim Agreement between Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization, which provided that Jerusalem remained under exclusive Israeli jurisdiction while remaining an issue for permanent status negotiations. It was for that reason that the Palestinian Authority undertook in the 1997 Note for the Record to close all of its offices in Jerusalem. He also argued that, if a decision was taken to shift the municipal boundary of Jerusalem, the Government of Israel had stated that it would strictly apply to areas westward of Jerusalem that were within the pre-1967 lines. He noted that a similar adjustment of the western municipal border of Jerusalem occurred in May 1993 without being the subject of a debate at the United Nations. He stressed that this was an internal Israeli matter on the municipal-administrative level rather than on the international level, as the “umbrella municipality” was nothing more than a coordination mechanism between Jerusalem and surrounding communities and did not entail a shift in municipal boundaries or the extension of municipal authority over any Israeli settlements. Finally, he reiterated that Israel had a long list of Palestinian Authority violations in the West Bank and around Jerusalem, but that Israel brought its complaints

directly to the negotiating table and not to the United Nations.⁷¹

The representative of the United States expressed regret at the announcement by the Government of Israel that it intended to create an “umbrella municipality” and to broaden the jurisdiction and planning boundaries of Jerusalem. The United States viewed the decision of Israel as unhelpful at the delicate stage of negotiations. He reiterated that all parties needed to refrain from any unilateral action which could prejudice the outcome of the permanent status negotiations. In that connection, he welcomed the statement by the Government of Israel that there would be no change in the political status of Jerusalem pending the outcome of the permanent status negotiations. He reiterated that the Council could not and should not interject itself into issues that the parties themselves had decided would be dealt with in face-to-face negotiations, but the Council could continue to offer the parties its unqualified support and encouragement.⁷²

The representative of the United Kingdom spoke on behalf of the European Union and associated and aligned countries.⁷³ He stated that the European Union was concerned at the endorsement by the Government of Israel of plans to extend the municipal authority of Jerusalem in a way which would alter the demographic balance in the Jerusalem area and tended to pre-empt the final status of occupied land. That concern had been heightened by statements, attributed by the media to senior Israeli spokesmen, that the new arrangements were “a basic change in Jerusalem’s status”. The European Union reaffirmed the applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention to the occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem, and to the other Arab territories occupied by Israel since 1967. The Government of Israel, by initiating, encouraging and endorsing settlement activity in the occupied territories, was in violation of that Convention. The European Union believed that the final status of Jerusalem needed to be determined in final status talks.⁷⁴

⁷² Ibid., pp. 11-12.

⁷³ Ibid., p. 12 (Czech Republic, Hungary, Lithuania, Poland, and Slovakia; and Cyprus, Iceland and Liechtenstein).

⁷⁴ Ibid., p. 12.

The representative of France stated that inasmuch as the new structure would include West Bank settlements close to Jerusalem, it would clearly alter the status quo, which would run counter to the spirit and letter of the agreements signed between the parties, be a breach of the Fourth Geneva Convention and disregard the decisions of the Council. He therefore appealed to the Israeli authorities to renounce that approach.⁷⁵

Several speakers stressed that the final, permanent status of Jerusalem needed to be determined and agreed in the manner established by the parties to the peace process, and appealed for compliance with the substance of the agreements and for the parties to fulfil all their obligations without reservations and conditions.⁷⁶

Other speakers criticized the recent endorsement by the Government of Israel of plans to extend the municipal authority of Jerusalem in a way that would alter the status quo of the city and prejudge the outcome of the final status negotiations. They maintained that the decision constituted a violation of numerous resolutions of the Council and General Assembly and contravened the terms of reference of the peace process and the spirit of the Oslo accords. They expressed concern that the move would negatively affect the peace process, and called on Israel to reconsider the decision and to honour its commitments under the Geneva Convention and under the bilateral agreements it had signed.⁷⁷

At its 3904th meeting, held on 13 July 1998, the Council resumed its consideration of the item.

Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Russian Federation), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Israel and the Permanent Observer of Palestine to participate in the discussion without the right to vote, in accordance with the decisions taken at the 3900th meeting. The President then made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁷⁸

The Security Council has considered the letters dated 18 and 22 June 1998, as well as the letters dated 8, 9 and 15 June 1998, from the Permanent Observer of Palestine to the United Nations, and the letter dated 23 June 1998 from the Permanent Representative of the Sudan to the United Nations on behalf of the States members of the League of Arab States relating to the issue of Jerusalem.

The Council recognizes the importance and sensitivity of the issue of Jerusalem to all parties and expresses its support for the decision of the Palestine Liberation Organization and the Government of Israel, in accordance with the Declaration of Principles of 13 September 1993, that the permanent status negotiations shall cover the issue of Jerusalem. The Council therefore calls upon the parties to avoid actions which might prejudice the outcome of these negotiations.

In the context of its previous relevant resolutions, the Council considers the decision by the Government of Israel on 21 June 1998 to take steps to broaden the jurisdiction and planning boundaries of Jerusalem a serious and damaging development. The Council therefore calls upon the Government of Israel not to proceed with that decision and also not to take any other steps which would prejudice the outcome of the permanent status negotiations. Further, the Council calls upon Israel to abide scrupulously by its legal obligations and responsibilities under the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War of 12 August 1949.

The Council supports the efforts of the United States aimed at breaking the stalemate in the peace process, calls upon the parties to respond positively to these efforts, notes that the Palestinian side has already given agreement in principle to the proposals of the United States of America, and expresses the hope that the permanent status negotiations can resume and progress can be made towards the achievement of a just, lasting and comprehensive peace based on Council resolutions 242 (1967) of 22 November 1967 and 338 (1973) of 22 October 1973.

The Council will keep Israeli actions under review.

32. The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

Decision of 19 March 1996 (3642nd meeting): statement by the President

At its 3642nd meeting, held on 19 March 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the item “The situation between Iraq and Kuwait” in its agenda. The President (Botswana) then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 9 March 1996 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of Security Council resolution 687 (1991) addressed to the President of the Council;¹ and a letter dated 12 March 1996 from the President of the Council addressed to the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of Security Council resolution 687 (1991),² both concerning the events of 8 and 9 March during which Iraq delayed the access of a Special Commission³ inspection team to a nuclear facility. The President also drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 17 March 1996 from the representative of Iraq addressed to the President of the Council,⁴ transmitting the text of a letter of the same date from the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq addressed to the President of the Council.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁵

The Security Council has noted with growing concern that the incident described in the letter dated 9 March 1996 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission addressed to the President of the Security Council and the further incident on 11 March 1996 in which an inspection team was again not allowed immediate and unconditional access to a site designated by the Commission under Council resolution 687 (1991) were followed by other such incidents on 14 and 15 March 1996. In all of these cases access was subsequently granted only after unacceptable delays.

The Council reiterates its full support for the Special Commission in the conduct of its inspections and the other tasks entrusted to it by the Council.

The Council takes note of the letter dated 17 March 1996 to its President from the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq. It recalls that, under paragraph 9 (b) (i) of section C of Council resolution 687 (1991), Iraq is required to permit “immediate on-site inspection of Iraq’s biological, chemical and missile capabilities, based on Iraq’s declarations and the designation of any additional locations by the Special Commission itself”. By its resolution 707 (1991), the Council also expressly demanded that Iraq “allow the Special Commission, the International Atomic Energy Agency and their inspection teams immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to any and all areas, facilities, equipment, records and means of transportation which they wish to inspect”. The obligation was furthermore confirmed in the Commission’s plan for ongoing monitoring and verification which was approved by the Council in resolution 715 (1991); in this context the Council recalls the notes from the Secretary-General of 21 July and 1 December 1993.

The Council considers that Iraq’s delays in permitting the inspection team recently in Iraq access to the sites concerned constitute clear violations by Iraq of the provisions of resolutions 687 (1991), 707 (1991) and 715 (1991). The Council demands that the Government of Iraq allow the Special Commission inspection teams immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to all sites designated by the Commission for inspection in accordance with the relevant resolutions of the Council.

Decision of 27 March 1996 (3644th meeting): resolution 1051 (1996)

By a letter dated 7 December 1995 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁶ the Chairman of the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait transmitted a report prepared by the Committee, the Special Commission and the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) that contained the provisions for the mechanism for export/import monitoring under paragraph 7 of resolution 715 (1991). The report was also accompanied by the text of a letter dated 17 July 1995 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission, indicating the general principles that would be followed in implementing the export/import mechanism in Iraq. The Chairman of the Committee expressed hope that the Council would take an early decision on the report so that preparations might be pursued at the national level for the implementation of the mechanism.

At its 3644th meeting, held on 27 March 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the item "Implementation of resolution 715 (1991)" and the letter in its agenda. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by France, Germany, Italy, the United Kingdom and the United States.⁷

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Italy stressed that the contents of the draft resolution were primarily technical, but that the cooperation that Iraq could offer towards its proper implementation would have a positive impact on the image of the country in international public opinion.⁸

The representative of Germany stated that the Council would approve the mechanism and give it the binding force that Chapter VII of the Charter provided for, with the aim of preventing the misuse of items legally imported into Iraq for the illegal purposes of production or acquisition of banned weapons. That aim justified the new obligations imposed on Iraq and on other States.⁹

The representative of Egypt underscored that no provision of the draft resolution should jeopardize the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq. The provisions of paragraph 5 of the draft resolution should not prevent Iraq from exercising its legitimate right to import or export, for non-proscribed purposes, the technologies or materials it needed to promote its economic and social development. He noted that, although the establishment of the new mechanism amounted to a reinforcement of the current regime, the concept was unprecedented for the Council in that no specific time limits were set for the new mechanism, which was a matter of some concern for the Egyptian delegation. He stated that the mechanism approved under the draft resolution, as provided for in paragraph

3, was without prejudice to, and should not impair the operation of, existing or future non-proliferation agreements on regimes at the international or regional level. In that context, he reiterated that the arrangements were those referred to in paragraph 14 of resolution 687 (1991), which clearly stated that actions taken by Iraq in accordance with that resolution in connection with the elimination of weapons of mass destruction represented steps towards the goal of establishing in the Middle East a zone free from weapons of mass destruction.¹⁰

The representative of Indonesia expressed support for the notion that the export/import mechanism was not a regime for international licensing, nor should it undermine the legitimate right of Iraq to import or export, for non-proscribed purposes, items and technology necessary for the promotion of its economic and social development. He also stressed that every effort needed to be made to ensure that the provisions of the mechanism were systematically applied without prejudice to the operation of existing or future non-proliferation agreements or regimes on the international or regional level. He also maintained that the mechanism needed to be flexible enough to accommodate changing circumstances, and stressed the important task given to the Council, as reflected in paragraph 9, to review the mechanism in light of changing conditions and to amend it if necessary, after appropriate consultations with interested States.¹¹

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1051 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, in particular section C thereof, its resolution 707 (1991) of 15 August 1991, and its resolution 715 (1991) of 11 October 1991 and the plans for ongoing monitoring and verification approved thereunder,

Recalling the request in paragraph 7 of its resolution 715 (1991) to the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990), the Special Commission and the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency to develop in cooperation a mechanism for monitoring any future sales or supplies by other countries to Iraq of items relevant to the implementation of section C of resolution 687 (1991) and other relevant resolutions, including resolution 715 (1991) and the plans approved thereunder,

Having considered the letter dated 7 December 1995 to the President of the Security Council from the Chairman of the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990), annex I to which contains the provisions for the mechanism for export/import monitoring called for in paragraph 7 of resolution 715 (1991),

Recognizing that the export/import monitoring mechanism is an integral part of ongoing monitoring and verification by the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency,

Recognizing that the export/import mechanism is not a regime for international licensing but rather for the timely provision of information by States in which companies are located which are contemplating sales or supplies to Iraq of items covered by the plans for ongoing monitoring and verification and will not impede Iraq's legitimate right to import or export for non-proscribed purposes, items and technology necessary for the promotion of its economic and social development,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Approves, pursuant to the relevant provisions of its resolutions 687 (1991) and 715 (1991), the provisions for the export/import monitoring mechanism contained in annex I to the aforementioned letter dated 7 December 1995, subject to the terms of the present resolution;

2. Approves also the general principles to be followed in implementing the mechanism, contained in the letter dated 17 July 1995 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission to the Chairman of the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990);

3. Affirms that the mechanism approved by the present resolution is without prejudice to and shall not impair the operation of existing or future non-proliferation agreements or regimes on the international or regional level, including arrangements referred to in resolution 687 (1991), nor shall such agreements or regimes impair the operation of the mechanism;

4. Confirms, until the Council decides otherwise under its relevant resolutions, that requests by other States for sales to Iraq or requests by Iraq for import of any item or technology to which the mechanism applies shall continue to be addressed to the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) for decision by that Committee in accordance with paragraph 4 of the mechanism;

5. Decides, subject to paragraphs 4 and 7 of the present resolution, that all States shall:

(a) Transmit to the joint unit constituted by the Special Commission and the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency, under paragraph 16 of the mechanism, the notifications, with the data from potential exporters, and all other relevant information when available to the States, as requested in the mechanism, on the intended sale or supply from their territories of any items or technologies which are subject to such notification in accordance with paragraphs 9, 11, 13, 24, 25, 27 and 28 of the mechanism;

(b) Report to the joint unit, in accordance with paragraphs 13, 24, 25, 27 and 28 of the mechanism, any information they may have at their disposal or may receive from suppliers in their territories of attempts to circumvent the mechanism or to supply Iraq with items prohibited to Iraq under the plans for ongoing monitoring and verification approved by resolution 715 (1991), or where the procedures for special exceptions laid down in paragraphs 24 and 25 of the mechanism have not been followed by Iraq;

6. Decides that the notifications required under paragraph 5 above shall be provided to the joint unit by Iraq, in respect of all items and technologies referred to in paragraph 12 of the mechanism, as from the date agreed upon between the Special Commission and the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency and Iraq, and in any event not later than sixty days after the adoption of the present resolution;

7. Decides that the notifications required under paragraph 5 above shall be provided to the joint unit by all other States as from the date the Secretary-General and the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency, after their consultations with the members of the Council and other interested States, report to the Council indicating that they are satisfied with the preparedness of States for the effective implementation of the mechanism;

8. Decides that the information provided through the mechanism shall be treated as confidential and restricted to the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency, to the extent that this is consistent with their respective responsibilities under resolution 715 (1991), other relevant resolutions and the plans for ongoing monitoring and verification approved under resolution 715 (1991);

9. Affirms, if experience over time demonstrates the need or new technologies so require, that the Council would be prepared to review the mechanism in order to determine whether any changes are required and that the annexes to the plans for ongoing monitoring and verification approved under resolution 715 (1991), which identify the items and technologies to be notified under the mechanism, may be amended in accordance with the plans, after appropriate consultations with interested States and, as laid down in the plans, after notification to the Council;

10. Decides that the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) and the Special Commission shall carry out the functions assigned to them under the mechanism, until the Council decides otherwise;

11. Requests the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency to carry out, with the assistance and cooperation of the Special Commission, the functions assigned to him under the mechanism;

12. Calls upon all States and international organizations to cooperate fully with the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990), the Special Commission and the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency in the fulfilment of their tasks in connection with the mechanism, including supplying such information as may be sought by them in implementation of the mechanism;

13. Calls upon all States to adopt as soon as possible such measures as may be necessary under their national procedures to implement the mechanism;

14. Decides that all States shall, not later than forty-five days after the adoption of the present resolution, be provided by the Special Commission and the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency with information necessary to make preparatory arrangements at the national level prior to the implementation of the provisions of the mechanism;

15. Demands that Iraq meet unconditionally all its obligations under the mechanism approved by the present resolution and cooperate fully with the Special Commission and the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency in the performance of their tasks under the present resolution and the mechanism by such means as they may determine in accordance with their mandates from the Council;

16. Decides to consolidate the periodic requirements for progress reports under its resolutions 699 (1991), 715 (1991) and the present resolution and to request the Secretary-General and the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency to submit such consolidated progress reports every six months to the Council, commencing on 11 April 1996;

17. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States reiterated that, while the resolution had been a very technical step, which was a prerequisite for the lifting of sanctions, the only step that would bring the lifting of sanctions closer would be a new Iraqi attitude of cooperation with IAEA, the Special Commission and the Council, in meeting all of the obligations of Iraq.¹²

The representative of France stated that the resolution would provide an essential tool for the long-term monitoring of dual-use goods and technologies in Iraq, once the current sanctions regime had been lifted.¹³

The representative of the United Kingdom stressed that the 60-day deadline of implementation of the mechanism by Iraq needed to be scrupulously respected.¹⁴

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that his country believed that it was important to work out and finalize the system and procedure for compiling and transmitting notifications; the guarantees on preserving trade secrets in the notification process; the competences of the basic organs operating under the regime and the system whereby they would interact; and the procedure for reviewing the mechanism and the records. He also noted that his Government had serious questions about paragraph 29 of the mechanism, regarding possible differences between suppliers and the Special Commission. There was a need to avoid situations arising in which the mechanism could become the embryo of a policy of double standards.¹⁵

At its 3672nd meeting, held on 12 June 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Egypt) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by the United Kingdom and the United States.¹⁶ He then drew the attention of the Council to several revisions to the text of the draft resolution.

All the members of the Council spoke, expressing their concern at the incidents of 11 and 12 June in which inspectors were denied access to sites the Commission had designated, and some speakers called on Iraq to cooperate fully with the Special Commission and fulfil all its obligations under previous resolutions of the Council.¹⁷

Speaking before the vote, the representative of the Russian Federation expressed regret that an inspection team of the Special Commission had been refused access to sites it wished to inspect in violation of resolutions of the Council for the first time and stressed that such incidents should not be repeated. At the same time, he noted that the members of the Council had been able to resist the temptation to use threatening language and an approach based on force.¹⁸

The representative of China stated that his country was of the view that the reasonable and legitimate security concerns of Iraq as a sovereign State needed to be respected by all parties, that resolution 687 (1991) needed to be implemented comprehensively and that the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Iraq needed to be safeguarded.¹⁹

The representative of the United Kingdom underscored that it was clearly unacceptable for Iraq to declare that any facilities or sites were off limits. The Special Commission had made it clear to Iraq that it was still not satisfied that the information it had obtained provided a complete picture of the weapons of mass destruction programmes in Iraq. It was also apparent that Iraq continued to withhold information. He stressed that therefore the Special Commission had no alternative but to continue with intrusive, no-notice inspections, which were fully within its mandate.²⁰

The representative of Germany stressed that the recent incidents had been particularly grave because the Iraqi leadership was trying to define a category of sites to be excluded from any inspections. He maintained that claims by Iraq that its sovereignty and independence were infringed upon by inspections by the Special Commission were obviously not valid, as Iraq had accepted resolution 687 (1991), including the role the Special Commission was given by that resolution.²¹

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1060 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, 707 (1991) of 15 August 1991 and 715 (1991) of 11 October 1991,

Recalling also the letter dated 9 March 1996 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission to the President of the Security Council, the letter dated 12 March 1996 from the President to the Executive Chairman, the statement made at its 3642nd meeting on 19 March 1996 by the President, and the report of the Executive Chairman of 11 April 1996 (S/1996/258),

Reiterating the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Kuwait and Iraq,

Recalling in this context the notes by the Secretary-General of 21 July and 1 December 1993,

Noting the progress made in the work of the Special Commission towards the elimination of Iraq's programmes of weapons of mass destruction, and outstanding problems, reported by the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission,

Noting with concern the incidents on 11 and 12 June 1996, reported to members of the Council by the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission, when access by a Special Commission inspection team to sites in Iraq designated for inspection by the Commission was excluded by the Iraqi authorities,

Emphasizing the importance the Council attaches to full compliance by Iraq with its obligations under resolutions 687 (1991), 707 (1991) and 715 (1991) to permit immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to the Special Commission to any site the Commission wishes to inspect,

Emphasizing the unacceptability of any attempts by Iraq to deny access to any such site,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Deplores the refusal of the Iraqi authorities to allow access to sites designated by the Special Commission, which constitutes a clear violation of the provisions of Security Council resolutions 687 (1991), 707 (1991) and 715 (1991);

2. Demands that Iraq cooperate fully with the Special Commission in accordance with the relevant resolutions, and that the Government of Iraq allow the Special Commission inspection teams immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to any and all areas, facilities, equipment, records and means of transportation which they wish to inspect;

3. Expresses its full support to the Special Commission in its efforts to ensure implementation of its mandate under the relevant resolutions of the Council;

4. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States stressed that the invasion and occupation of Kuwait, the campaign against the Kurds and Shia, and the use of terrorism by Iraq were ample and incontrovertible proof that the regime still posed a serious threat to the security of the region. He maintained that blocking the inspectors of the Special Commission from an entire category of suspect sites was a new situation and a matter of grave concern to the Government of the United States. If the situation persisted, as it had on occasions in the past, the Council would have no choice but to conclude that Iraq was in material breach of its obligations under resolutions 687 (1991), 701 (1991) and 715 (1991).²²

Decision of 14 June 1996 (3674th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3674th meeting, held on 14 June 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Egypt) made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²³

The Security Council condemns the failure of Iraq to comply with its resolution 1060 (1996) of 12 June 1996 by refusing access to sites designated by the Special Commission on 13 June 1996. Coming after the denial of access on 11 and 12 June 1996, this new dimension of non-compliance marks a serious step backwards in Iraq's cooperation with the Special Commission. The Council considers that these events constitute a clear and flagrant violation of its resolutions 687 (1991), 707 (1991) and 715 (1991).

The Council reiterates its full support for the Special Commission in the conduct of its inspections and other tasks entrusted to it by the Council. The Council rejects attempts by Iraq to impose conditions on the conduct of inspections by the Special Commission.

The Council demands once again that Iraq comply with the relevant resolutions of the Council and, in particular, allow the inspection teams of the Special Commission immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to any and all areas, facilities, equipment, records and means of transportation which they wish to inspect.

The Council requests the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission to visit Baghdad as soon as possible with a view to securing immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to all sites which the Special Commission wishes to inspect and to engage in a forward-looking dialogue on other issues under the Commission's mandate. It further requests the Executive Chairman to report immediately afterwards on the results of his visit and on the impact of Iraqi policies on the mandate and work of the Special Commission.

Decision of 23 August 1996 (3691st meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3691st meeting, held on 23 August 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Germany) made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁴

The Security Council, on the eve of the planned visit to Baghdad by the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission, strongly reaffirms its full support for the Special Commission in the conduct of its inspections and the other tasks entrusted to it by the Council. The Council reiterates the importance it attaches to full compliance by Iraq with the relevant resolutions of the Council. It underlines the important role of the Special Commission inspection teams and demands once again that they be given immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to any and all areas, facilities, equipment, records and means of transportation which they wish to inspect, and Iraqi officials whom they wish to interview, so that the Special Commission may fully discharge its mandate.

In this context, the Council remains gravely concerned at the failure by Iraq to comply fully with its resolution 1060 (1996) of 12 June 1996 and with other resolutions of the Council dealing with the Special Commission. The denial by Iraq, on repeated occasions, of immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to sites which they wished to inspect and the attempts made by the Government of Iraq to impose conditions on the conduct of interviews with Iraqi officials by the Special Commission constitute a gross violation of its obligations under resolutions 687 (1991), 707 (1991) and 715 (1991). The Council notes that these actions also contradict commitments made by the Government of Iraq in its joint statement of 22 June 1996 with the Special Commission, and urges the Government of Iraq to respect these commitments. The Council reminds the Government of Iraq that only full compliance with its obligations under the relevant resolutions will enable the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission to present his report in accordance with section C of resolution 687 (1991). The Council will continue to consider how best to ensure Iraq's full compliance.

The Council requests the Executive Chairman to report to it on the results of his visit.

Decision of 30 December 1996 (3729th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3729th meeting, held on 30 December 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Italy) made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁵

The Security Council notes that the Special Commission and the Government of Iraq previously agreed that the investigation of unilateral destruction of proscribed items is a fundamental area to accelerate the verification of the Iraqi declarations. In this regard, the Council deplores the refusal by Iraq to allow the Special Commission to remove approximately 130 missile engines from Iraq for analysis by a team of international experts under the Special Commission. The Council notes that such action complicates the implementation by the Special Commission of its mandate.

The Council reaffirms that a full accounting for Iraq's missiles with a range greater than 150 kilometers is a necessary prerequisite to enable the Commission to report that Iraq has complied with the requirements of section C of resolution 687 (1991). The Council fully supports the intention of the Special Commission to carry out thoroughly the examination and analysis in the missile area, either on the basis of dispatching international teams of experts to Iraq or examining the relevant items abroad.

The Council reminds the Government of Iraq of its obligation to comply with the provisions of the relevant resolutions and the need to cooperate fully with the Special Commission in order to enable it to report that the requirements of section C of resolution 687 (1991) are met. In this perspective, the Council affirms that Iraq is required to allow the Special Commission to remove the missile engines from its territory. The Council welcomes any proposal from Member States to offer their national facilities to the Special Commission in order to enable it to conduct the necessary analysis, if and when the Commission deems it necessary.

The Council strongly reaffirms its full support for the Special Commission in the conduct of its mandate under the relevant resolutions of the Council. The Council reaffirms the right and privileges of the Special Commission as stated in its previous relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 687 (1991), 707 (1991) and 715 (1991).

Decision of 16 April 1997 (3768th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3768th meeting, held on 16 April 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Portugal) made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁶

The Security Council has considered the case of an Iraqi aircraft which flew from Baghdad, Iraq, to Jeddah, Saudi Arabia, on 9 April 1997 and then departed.

The Government of Iraq, in a letter dated 3 February 1997, had requested clearance from the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) for the release of 50 million dollars from the frozen Iraqi assets being held in Saudi Arabia, Bahrain and the United Arab Emirates to cover pilgrimage costs and requested the agreement of the Committee for flights by Iraqi Airways to transport those pilgrims to Jeddah, during the holy pilgrimage season.

The Committee answered in a letter dated 3 March 1997 that it would be in a better position to consider the release of the frozen Iraqi funds if a request was submitted by a country which was willing to release such funds to meet the pilgrimage costs.

The Government of Iraq proceeded with this particular flight without specific consultation with the Committee. Such consultation would have allowed the Committee to consider the matter and to determine whether the flight required Committee approval under the relevant resolutions.

The Council draws to the attention of Member States their obligations under resolutions 661 (1990), 670 (1990) and other relevant resolutions.

The Council underlines its respect for the obligation of Muslims to perform the Hajj.

Decision of 4 June 1997 (3786th meeting):
resolution 1111 (1997)

On 2 June 1997, pursuant to paragraph 11 of resolution 986 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on the distribution of humanitarian supplies throughout Iraq, the work of the Secretariat in processing applications to the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990), the activities of the oil overseers and the United Nations independent inspection agents and the current status of the United Nations Iraq Account. In addition, it included the observations of the Secretary-General on the adequacy of oil revenues received under the resolution in meeting humanitarian needs in Iraq and on the capacity of Iraq to export sufficient quantities of petroleum and petroleum products to generate one billion dollars every 90 days.²⁷ In his report, the Secretary-General noted that the programme authorized by the Council in its resolution 986 (1995) was unique among all humanitarian assistance operations undertaken by the United Nations in that it sought to mitigate some of the negative effects of sanctions being imposed on the recipient country. He observed that, while the Secretariat and the various participating agencies had been able to overcome most of the problems encountered in the initial stages of implementation, he remained troubled by the persistent lags and other difficulties encountered in the processing of applications, which had resulted in major delays in the provision of several items. Bearing in mind the continuing humanitarian crisis in Iraq, he recommended the renewal of the programme for a further period of six months.

By a letter dated 30 May 1997 addressed to the President of the Council,²⁸ the Chairman of the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (199) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait transmitted the report of the Committee pursuant to paragraph 12 of resolution 986 (1995). The report noted that, while the export of oil had proceeded well, there had been delays in the supply of humanitarian goods. However, the Committee was confident that the new measures it had adopted would enable a smoother process of implementation of resolution 986 (1995).

At its 3786th meeting, held on 4 June 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General and the letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.²⁹ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1111 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous resolutions and, in particular, resolution 986 (1995) of 14 April 1995,

Convinced of the need as a temporary measure to continue to provide for the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi people until the fulfilment by Iraq of the relevant Security Council resolutions, including notably resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, allows the Council to take further action with regard to the prohibitions referred to in resolution 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, in accordance with the provisions of those resolutions,

Determined to avoid any further deterioration of the current humanitarian situation,

Convinced also of the need for equitable distribution of humanitarian relief to all segments of the Iraqi population throughout the country,

Welcoming the report submitted by the Secretary-General in accordance with paragraph 11 of resolution 986 (1995), as well as the report submitted in accordance with paragraph 12 of resolution 986 (1995) by the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990),

Reaffirming the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides that the provisions of resolution 986 (1995), except those contained in paragraphs 4, 11 and 12, shall remain in force for another period of 180 days beginning at 0001 hours eastern daylight time on 8 June 1997;

2. Also decides to conduct a thorough review of all aspects of the implementation of the present resolution 90 days after the entry into force of paragraph 1 above and again prior to the end of the 180-day period, on receipt of the reports referred to in paragraphs 3 and 4 below, and expresses its intention, prior to the end of the 180-day period, to consider favourably renewal of the provisions of the present resolution, provided that the reports referred to in paragraphs 3 and 4 below indicate that those provisions are being satisfactorily implemented;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council 90 days after the date of entry into force of paragraph 1 above, and again prior to the end of the 180-day period, on the basis of observation by United Nations personnel in Iraq, and on the basis of consultations with the Government of Iraq, on whether Iraq has ensured the equitable distribution of medicine, health supplies, foodstuffs, and materials and supplies for essential civilian needs, financed in accordance with paragraph 8 (a) of resolution 986 (1995), including in his reports any observations he may have on the adequacy of the revenues to meet Iraq's humanitarian needs, and on Iraq's capacity to export sufficient quantities of petroleum and petroleum products to produce the sum referred to in paragraph 1 of resolution 986 (1995);

4. Requests the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990), in close coordination with the Secretary-General, to report to the Council 90 days after the date of entry into force of paragraph 1 above and again prior to the end of the 180-day period on the implementation of the arrangements in paragraphs 1, 2, 6, 8, 9 and 10 of resolution 986 (1995);

5. Directs the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) to process expeditiously contract applications submitted under the present resolution as soon as the Secretary-General has approved the new plan submitted by the Government of Iraq, guaranteeing equitable distribution and including a description of the goods to be purchased with the revenues of the sale of petroleum and petroleum products authorized by the present resolution;

6. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 13 June 1997 (3789th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3789th meeting, held on 13 June 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Russian Federation) drew the attention of the Council to the following documents: letters dated 9 and 11 June 1997, respectively, from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of resolution 687 (1991) addressed to the President of the Council;³⁰ a letter dated 13 June 1997 from the representative of Iraq addressed to the President of the Council,³¹ transmitting the text of a letter dated 5 June 1997 from the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq addressed to the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of resolution 687 (1991); and a letter dated 13 June 1997 from the representative of Iraq addressed to the President of the Council,³² transmitting the text of a letter dated 6 June 1997 from the Under-Secretary of the Ministry for Foreign Affairs of Iraq addressed to the Deputy Executive Chairman of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of resolution 687 (1991).

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:³³

The Security Council takes note of the letters dated 9 and 11 June 1997 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission, the letter dated 5 June 1997 from the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq and the letter dated 6 June 1997 from the Under-Secretary of the Ministry for Foreign Affairs of Iraq. The Council expresses serious concern at the four incidents on 4, 5 and 7 June 1997 in which Iraqi personnel unacceptably interfered with helicopter flights operating in support of inspection of sites designated by the Special Commission under Council resolutions 687 (1991), 707 (1991) and 715 (1991),

endangering the helicopters and their crews, as well as persons on the ground.

The Council deplores these incidents and underlines the fact that Iraq must immediately take effective steps to put an end to all such actions. The Council reminds Iraq of its obligations under the relevant resolutions of the Council, in particular resolution 1060 (1996). The Council affirms that Iraq is obliged to ensure the security of the personnel of the Special Commission and to permit the Commission to carry out its air operations anywhere in Iraq without interference of any kind in accordance with pertinent provisions of resolution 707 (1991). The Council recalls the commitments contained in the joint statement of the Special Commission and Iraq of 22 June 1996.

The Council reiterates its continuing support to the Special Commission in its efforts to ensure the implementation of its mandate under the relevant resolutions of the Council.

resolution 1115 (1997)

At its 3792nd meeting, held on 21 June 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Russian Federation) drew the attention of the Security Council to a draft resolution submitted by Chile, Costa Rica, Japan, Poland, Portugal, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States.³⁴ The President then drew the attention of the Council to the following documents: letters dated 14, 16, 18, and 20 June 1997, respectively, from the representative of Iraq addressed to the President of the Council;³⁵ and a letter dated 19 June 1997 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission addressed to the President of the Council.³⁶ He further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 12 June 1997 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission addressed to the President of the Council,³⁷ stating that the Government of Iraq had denied the Special Commission access to a site designated for inspection on 10 and 12 June 1997.

Speaking before the vote, the representative of the United Kingdom noted that the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission had declared that Iraq had violated the Joint Programme of Action and the sensitive site modalities drawn up by him in June

³⁵ Letters regarding issues arising from searches by the Special Commission (S/1997/462, S/1997/465, S/1997/473 and S/1997/481).

1996. The investigations of the Special Commission had clearly demonstrated that the Government of Iraq had engaged in a coordinated attempt to conceal from the Special Commission the full extent of its activities, both before and after the passage of resolution 687 (1991), related to weapons of mass destruction. He stressed that the Executive Chairman had told the Council that the organizations responsible for that concealment were closely linked to those responsible for the highest levels of national security in Iraq. He called on Iraq to be completely open with the Special Commission and cease all obstruction and harassment.³⁸

The representative of Egypt stated that although the draft resolution still included certain elements with which his delegation was not totally satisfied, the message contained in the draft was that implementation of resolutions needed to be supported. He emphasized that his country had had many reservations about the original text of the draft resolution, which Egypt would have opposed. The original text had contained additional sanctions upon Iraq at a time when the regional Arab, African and Islamic organizations and those associated with the Non-Aligned Movement wished the Special Commission to end its missions so as to put an end to the suffering of the Iraqi people. Second, it had not referred to the principles of sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Kuwait and Iraq. Third, although the provisions of the Charter gave the Council the main responsibility for safeguarding international peace and security, the original text would have led the Council to give up its prerogatives by handing them over to a technical commission under the Council. Fourth, it would have created an imbalance in the provisions laid down by resolution 687 (1991), the comprehensive resolution under which the sanctions system was set up in an organized, institutional, balanced framework guaranteeing political control by the Council over the work of the Special Commission. He also stressed that paragraph 2 of the resolution needed to be understood to mean that the Commission needed to implement all resolutions and written and oral agreements between the Commission and Iraq, as well as the declaration of 22 June 1996.³⁹

The representative of Japan maintained that the Iraqi actions could not simply be considered technical violations of inspection procedures but that the authority of the Council was being challenged. Japan supported the direction the Council was moving in adopting the draft resolution.⁴⁰

The representative of the United States maintained that, since 1991, Iraq had made every effort to conceal its true weapons capabilities, to destroy evidence of its programmes and supply routes and to lie about it to the Council. In the last two years, Iraqi efforts to interfere with the Special Commission in the execution of its mandate had intensified. He stressed that the continued failure of Iraq to comply with resolutions of the Council was a serious threat to the peace and security of the region. Noting that the action by the Council suspended the reviews of sanctions scheduled for 30 June and 30 August 1997, he stated that the measures sent a strong message that lifting sanctions would be impossible until Iraq fundamentally changed its approach. Similarly, the Council had expressed its intent to impose new measures, targeted precisely at those parties most responsible for the continued concealment of the weapons programmes, if Iraq ignored the latest draft resolution and failed to comply with the substance of the authority of the Special Commission.⁴¹

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1115 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, 707 (1991) of 15 August 1991, 715 (1991) of 11 October 1991 and 1060 (1996) of 12 June 1996,

Taking note of the letter dated 12 June 1997 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission to the President of the Security Council in which the Executive Chairman reported to the Council the incidents on 10 and 12 June 1997 when access by a Special Commission inspection team to sites in Iraq designated for inspection by the Commission was excluded by the Iraqi authorities,

Determined to ensure full compliance by Iraq with its obligations under all previous resolutions, in particular resolutions 687 (1991), 707 (1991), 715 (1991) and 1060 (1996), to permit immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to ⁴⁰ Ibid., pp. 3-4.

⁴¹ Ibid., pp. 4-5.

the Special Commission to any site which the Commission wishes to inspect,

Stressing the unacceptability of any attempts by Iraq to deny access to any such site,

Reiterating the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Kuwait and Iraq,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Condemns the repeated refusal of the Iraqi authorities to allow access to sites designated by the Special Commission, which constitutes a clear and flagrant violation of the provisions of Security Council resolutions 687 (1991), 707 (1991), 715 (1991) and 1060 (1996);

2. Demands that Iraq cooperate fully with the Special Commission in accordance with the relevant resolutions, and that the Government of Iraq allow the Special Commission inspection teams immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to any and all areas, facilities, equipment, records and means of transportation which they wish to inspect in accordance with the mandate of the Special Commission;

3. Demands also that the Government of Iraq give immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to officials and other persons under the authority of the Iraqi Government whom the special Commission wishes to interview, so that the Special Commission may fully discharge its mandate;

4. Requests the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission to include in his consolidated progress reports under resolution 1051 (1996) an annex evaluating Iraq's compliance with paragraphs 2 and 3 above;

5. Decides not to conduct the reviews provided for in paragraphs 21 and 28 of resolution 687 (1991) until after the next consolidated progress report of the Special Commission, due on 11 October 1997, after which time those reviews will resume in accordance with resolution 687 (1991);

6. Expresses its firm intention, unless the Special Commission advises the Council in the report referred to in paragraphs 4 and 5 above that Iraq is in substantial compliance with paragraphs 2 and 3 above, to impose additional measures on those categories of Iraqi officials responsible for the non-compliance;

7. Reaffirms its full support to the Special Commission in its efforts to ensure the implementation of its mandate under the relevant resolutions of the Council;

8. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of China expressed concern about the recent verification problems and urged Iraq to fully implement the relevant resolutions of the Council and better cooperate with the Special Commission. At the same time, his country believed that the legitimate security concerns of a sovereign State needed to be respected by all parties; that resolution 687 (1991) needed to be fully implemented; and that the sovereignty, territorial integrity, and political independence of Iraq needed to be respected. He maintained that the sanctions against Iraq had been in force for six years, during which time Iraq had basically maintained its cooperation with the Special Commission, and the Special Commission had made great progress in discharging the mandate entrusted to it by the Council. Under those circumstances, he suggested considering gradually lifting sanctions against Iraq in order to alleviate its humanitarian difficulties. However, the resolution had decided to suspend the review of sanctions against Iraq by the Council and threatened to impose further sanctions, which was not fair. He reiterated that Government of China had always opposed the willful imposition and threat of sanctions against a country. He also noted that considerable changes had been incorporated into the resolution, including the deletion of new sanctions and of the reference to the larger pattern of non-cooperation, and the addition of the commitment to the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Iraq. For those reasons, the Chinese delegation voted in favour.⁴²

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the Council needed to be guided in its activities by the need to quickly achieve the objectives in the resolutions that set out the obligations of Iraq to the Special Commission. Noting that the Security Council had reached consensus on the issue, he stressed that the consensus was an appropriate response to the situation that had developed with respect to the inspections. The consensus was not based on the "logic of punishment" but formed part of the main thrust of the Council, which was to conclude the disarmament issue as quickly as possible and to achieve a lasting post-conflict settlement in the Persian Gulf on the basis of resolution 687 (1991).⁴³

On 8 September 1997, pursuant to paragraph 3 of resolution 1111 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on the distribution of humanitarian supplies throughout Iraq.⁴⁴

⁴² Ibid., p. 6.

⁴³ Ibid., pp. 6-7.

⁴⁴ S/1997/685.

In his report, the Secretary-General stated that while not all the supplies from the first phase of the Inter-Agency Humanitarian Programme had been delivered, the availability of additional revenues from the sale of oil authorized under resolution 1111 (1997) would help address the continuing humanitarian needs in Iraq. However, the decision by the Government of Iraq to suspend the sale of oil, pending the approval of the new distribution plan, was expected to result in a significant shortfall of funds. In view of the adverse consequences for the humanitarian programme, he suggested that the Council might wish to consider an appropriate mechanism for the shortfall to be met. He continued to be concerned about the adverse impact of delays in the arrival of humanitarian goods on those whom the resolution was designed to assist, and therefore urged all parties involved in the implementation of the resolution to devote renewed effort to ensuring that the processing, approval and delivery of humanitarian goods was carried out expeditiously. Regarding the needs of vulnerable groups in Iraq, he informed the Council that, as no additional resources had been authorized under resolution 1111 (1997), their needs would need to be met outside the framework of the resolution, and that he had received the assurances from the Government of Iraq that additional resources would be available for vulnerable groups in central and southern Iraq.

By a letter dated 8 September 1997 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁴⁵ the Chairman of the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait transmitted the report of the Committee pursuant to paragraph 4 of resolution 1111 (1997). The Chairman informed the Council that the process of the export of petroleum from Iraq had proceeded in full compliance with the provisions of resolutions 968 (1995) and 1111 (1997). At the same time, the Committee had made repeated efforts to expedite the processing of humanitarian supplies to Iraq. Consignments of supplies approved during the initial operation also continued to arrive in Iraq steadily. However, owing to the delay in the export of petroleum in the first two months following the adoption of resolution 1111 (1997), the total revenue generated by Iraqi oil exports had not reached the objective.

At its 3817th meeting, held on 12 September 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General and the letter in its agenda. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by the United Kingdom and the United States.⁴⁶ The President then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 4 September 1997 from the representative of Iraq addressed to the Secretary-General, transmitting a letter dated 4 September 1997 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq addressed to the Secretary-General, stating that Iraq was fulfilling all its obligations under the provisions of the memorandum of understanding and calling on the Secretariat to expedite the contract application procedure and urge the representatives of the United States and the United Kingdom to lift the hold on procurement contracts for food, medicines and other basic humanitarian requirements.⁴⁷

Speaking before the vote, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that his country was determined to ensure that the Iraqi people received the maximum benefit from resolution 1111 (1997), which was why his delegation had taken the initiative in putting forward the draft resolution. The draft resolution would enable Iraq to make up the shortfall in oil sales and thus ensure that the full amount of revenue was available for the purchase of humanitarian supplies.⁴⁸

The representative of Egypt reiterated the position of his delegation that the shortfall in Iraqi oil exports was a technical issue to be dealt with by a procedural, technical resolution. He expressed his country's belief that the two provisions related to oil exports and the implementation of the contracts for humanitarian requirements needed to go side by side within the same time frame. His delegation would have liked the draft resolution to include a frank appeal to the sanctions Committee to redouble its efforts to facilitate the supply of humanitarian goods to Iraq in accordance with the report of the Secretary-General.⁴⁹

goods had been delayed, which was not in keeping with the spirit of resolutions 986 (1995) and 1111 (1997). He urged all sides to accelerate the delivery process.⁵⁰

The representative of France explained that his country had supported efforts for the adoption of a technical, humanitarian text from the outset, and noted that, in such matters, the Council should show its solidarity and cohesiveness. He stated that his country realized that the obligations of all needed to be recalled, and understood the very justified appeal in the text to improve the situation. His delegation understood this appeal as an expression of encouragement to all concerned, and in particular to the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990).⁵¹

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the oil export problem could not be considered in isolation from the delivery of humanitarian goods, and that his delegation found it unacceptable that there was a growing gap between deliveries of Iraqi oil and the provision of humanitarian supplies to Iraq under resolutions 986 (1995) and 1111 (1997). He expressed concern that for some months the sanctions Committee had seen a trend of blocking medical supplies and food contracts to meet very urgent needs. That was being done on the basis of pretexts that had nothing to do with the existing procedure in the sanctions Committee. Sometimes, in spite of the procedure agreed upon, the relevant delegations were blocking requests without even giving any reasons. He stressed that his delegation had always objected to such a practice, and he called upon all their partners in the Council to strictly abide by the agreed procedure. He stated that his country had been prepared for the draft resolution to be strictly technical and suggested that if the sponsors had wished to include explanations of the causes of the current humanitarian crisis, their explanations needed to be objective and to include an honest observation of the facts regarding how things stood in the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990). Finally, he noted that, while both sides bore responsibility for the situation, it was import to remedy the situation in the sanctions Committee as regards the delivery of humanitarian goods to Iraq. Unfortunately, the draft resolution had not taken into account this aspect, and for that reason, his delegation would abstain from voting.⁵²

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted by 14 votes to none, with one abstention (Russian Federation), as resolution 1129 (1997),⁵³ which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous resolutions, in particular resolutions 986 (1995) of 14 April 1995 and 1111 (1997) of 4 June 1997,

Reaffirming that the implementation period of resolution 1111 (1997) began at 0001 hours eastern daylight time, on 8 June 1997, and that the export of petroleum and petroleum products by Iraq pursuant to resolution 1111 (1997) did not require the approval by the Secretary-General of the distribution plan mentioned in paragraph 8 (a) (ii) of resolution 986 (1995),

Taking note of the decision by the Government of Iraq not to export petroleum and petroleum products permitted pursuant to resolution 1111 (1997) during the period 8 June to 13 August 1997,

Deeply concerned about the resulting humanitarian consequences for the Iraqi people, since the shortfall in the revenue from the sale of petroleum and petroleum products will delay the provision of humanitarian relief and create hardship for the Iraqi people,

Noting that, as set out in the report of the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) Iraq will not be able to export petroleum and petroleum products worth two billion United States dollars by the end of the period set by resolution 1111 (1997) while complying with the requirement not to produce a sum exceeding one billion United States dollars every 90 days, set out in paragraph 1 of resolution 986 (1995) and renewed in resolution 1111 (1997),

Acknowledging the situation with regard to the delivery of humanitarian goods to Iraq as described in the report of the Secretary-General and encouraging the continuing efforts to improve this situation,

Stressing the importance of an equitable distribution of humanitarian goods as called for by paragraph 8 (a) (ii) of resolution 986 (1995),

Determined to avoid any further deterioration of the humanitarian situation,

⁵² Ibid., pp. 3-4.

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides that the provisions of resolution 1111 (1997) shall remain in force, except that States are authorized to permit the import of petroleum and petroleum products originating in Iraq, including financial and other essential transactions directly relating thereto, sufficient to produce a sum not exceeding a total of one billion United States dollars within a period of 120 days from 0001 hours eastern daylight time on 8 June 1997 and, thereafter, a sum not exceeding a total of one billion United States dollars within a period of 60 days from 0001 hours eastern daylight time on 4 October 1997;

2. Decides also that the provisions of paragraph 1 above shall apply only to the period of implementation of resolution 1111 (1997), and expresses its firm intention that under any future resolutions authorizing States to permit the import of petroleum and petroleum products originating in Iraq, the time limits within which imports may be permitted established in such resolutions shall be strictly enforced;

3. Expresses its full support for the intention of the Secretary-General, stated in his report to the Security Council, to follow up his observations concerning the needs of vulnerable groups in Iraq by monitoring the actions of the Government of Iraq in respect of these groups;

4. Stresses that contracts for the purchase of humanitarian supplies submitted in accordance with resolution 1111 (1997) must be limited to items which appear on the list of supplies annexed to the second distribution plan prepared by the Government of Iraq and approved by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 8 (a) (ii) of resolution 986 (1995), or appropriate amendments to the plan must be requested prior to the purchase of items not on the annexed list;

5. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States stressed that the resolution was a one-time exception intended solely to prevent unnecessary suffering among the people of Iraq and that the time limits for the sale of Iraqi petroleum under any successor resolutions would be strictly adhered to. He also stressed that the decision of the Baghdad regime to delay oil sales was not required by any of the relevant Security Council resolutions or by the memorandum of understanding with the United Nations. Instead the Government of Iraq had defied the clear conditions of United Nations resolutions and made a decision to put at risk the well-being of its people “in order to seek to score propaganda points”. While expressing regret that one delegation could not support the resolution, he maintained that the notion of introducing language blaming the United Nations for actions that were solely the fault of the Government of Iraq into a resolution was unacceptable.⁵⁴

Decision of 23 October 1997 (3826th meeting):
resolution 1134 (1997)

By a note dated 6 October 1997, the Secretary-General transmitted to the Security Council the fourth report by the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of resolution 687 (1991).⁵⁵ In his report, the Executive Chairman noted that, while the Special Commission had registered significant achievements in the disarmament field and had been well launched in the field of monitoring, there had been continuing difficulties. The Commission was convinced of the need for the Council to insist that Iraq meet its obligations to disclose fully all of its prohibited weapons and associated programmes and demand complete cooperation by Iraq with the exercise by the Special Commission of its rights to full access to sites and persons necessary to verify compliance by Iraq with the relevant decisions of the Council.

At its 3826th meeting, held on 23 October 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the note from the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (Chile) then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Chile, Costa Rica, Japan, Poland, Portugal, the Republic of Korea, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States.⁵⁶

Speaking before the vote, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that his country and the other co-sponsors believed that the Council needed to react robustly to continued Iraqi flouting of resolutions of the Security Council. The draft resolution therefore contained a firm and consistent decision which built on and developed the firmly stated intention in resolution 1115 (1997) “to impose additional measures” by spelling out those measures, while providing a further opportunity over the next six months for Iraq to demonstrate by its good faith that they were unnecessary. He also noted that Iraq had still failed to meet its obligations on missing Kuwaiti prisoners of war, property and the national archives of Kuwait.⁵⁷

⁵⁶ S/1997/816.

The representative of Egypt stressed that his country had drawn certain conclusions, which it would have liked to have seen included in the draft resolution. First, while the reports had indicated certain negative aspects of the conduct of Iraq, there were also some positive aspects that the draft resolution should have reflected and credited to the Government of Iraq. Second, despite his delegation's support for the mandate of the Special Commission, he stressed that the Council needed to be the only body responsible for making the right decision. Third, the reports that had been submitted and the comments made by IAEA and the Special Commission indicated that those two bodies dealt with purely technical matters and, although it was difficult from the purely technical standpoint of IAEA and the Special Commission to assert that nothing remained to be destroyed, it was important that the Council take a clear decision defining the ultimate goal of the activities of those two bodies in order to fully implement the resolution. Fourth, the difference of opinion between the Special Commission and Iraq with regard to the interpretation of those modalities and the manner of implementing them demanded that the Council take the time to study the question objectively. Iraq needed to cooperate further and the Special Commission for its part needed to make an effort to cooperate in establishing clear cut modalities. Fifth, assessing the manner in which Iraq was discharging its responsibility meant taking into consideration that the reports had indicated that Iraq had only sporadically not acted in conformity with Security Council resolutions. Sixth, Egypt was opposed in principle to the imposition of any additional sanctions against Iraq, since Iraq had made further efforts in the past six months to cooperate with the Special Commission and IAEA. Seventh, the preparation of lists of individuals who had impeded the work of the Special Commission, without specifying the person entrusted with preparing the lists or the modality of their preparation, was ambiguous. The Council ought to have mandated the sanctions Committee to determine clear criteria for the modalities of implementation of the resolution. As the sponsors of the draft resolution had insisted on its being put to the vote without taking into consideration the proposals, Egypt would abstain in the voting.⁵⁸

The representative of Kenya stated that for the most part the reports of the Special Commission and IAEA indicated that significant progress had been made on several fronts, particularly in the missile and chemical weapons area, and that in the overall context of the work of the Commission, inspections had been conducted without hindrance. As the draft resolution did not clearly portray the balance and tone of the reports, Kenya would abstain in the voting.⁵⁹

The representative of China noted that, in most cases, Iraq had cooperated with the Special Commission. He stressed that his delegation was never in favour of imposing sanctions against any State indiscriminately or of using sanctions as a threat. He stated that in order to solve problems, the priority was to enhance the cooperation between Iraq and the Special Commission rather than further complicating the matter. As the draft resolution was not conducive to the settlement of the problems concerned, China would have to abstain in the voting.⁶⁰

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that, while it could not be said that Iraq had accounted for all the weapons components and capabilities proscribed by section C of resolution 687 (1991), the isolated incidents concerning inspections that had occurred could not justify the immediate adoption of additional sanctions against Iraq, as provided for in resolution 1115 (1997). He stated that the problems remaining in the relations between the Special Commission and Baghdad deserved serious attention on the part of the Council and needed to be rapidly resolved, inter alia, within the framework of the consultations between the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission and Baghdad. He stressed that there was a lack of balance in the draft resolution: the resolution ignored substantial elements of the fulfillment of relevant provisions of resolution 687 (1991) and omitted any mention of the International Atomic Energy Agency report. The representative noted that there was an attempt in the draft resolution to revise the provision in resolution 1115 (1997) on the need for "substantial compliance" by Iraq with the requirements for access of the Special Commission. Since resolution 1115 (1997) continued in effect, the use of new wording in the form proposed by the sponsors of the draft resolution would confuse the criteria for Iraqi compliance with the resolution. He stressed that the proposed concept of a black list was faulty from both logical and legal standpoints, and therefore could not be acceptable, as lists of persons subject to sanctions should not be drawn up when the Council had not yet decided whether sanctions would be imposed. Taking those factors into account, the Russian Federation would abstain in the voting.⁶¹

⁵⁹ Ibid., pp. 6-7.

⁶⁰ Ibid., p. 7.

A number of speakers made statements in favour of the draft resolution, maintaining that Iraq had repeatedly violated its obligations and stressing that nothing less than full cooperation by Iraq with the Special Commission would enable it to fulfil its task.⁶²

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted by 10 votes to none, with 5 abstentions (China, Egypt, France, Kenya, Russian Federation), as resolution 1134 (1997),⁶³ which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, 707 (1991) of 15 August 1991, 715 (1991) of 11 October 1991, 1060 (1996) of 12 June 1996 and 1115 (1997) of 21 June 1997,

Having considered the report of the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission of 6 October 1997,

Expressing grave concern at the report of additional incidents since the adoption of resolution 1115 (1997), in which access by the Special Commission inspection team to sites in Iraq designated for inspection by the Commission was again denied by the Iraqi authorities,

Stressing the unacceptability of any attempts by Iraq to deny access to such sites,

Taking note of the progress nevertheless achieved by the Special Commission, as set out in the report of the Executive Chairman, towards the elimination of Iraq's programme of weapons of mass destruction,

Reaffirming its determination to ensure full compliance by Iraq with all its obligations under all previous relevant resolutions, and reiterating its demand that Iraq allow immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to the Special Commission to any site which the Commission wishes to inspect and, in particular, allow the Special Commission and its inspection teams to conduct both fixed-wing and helicopter flights throughout Iraq for all relevant purposes, including inspection, surveillance, aerial surveys, transportation and logistics without interferences of any kind and upon such terms and conditions as may be determined by the Special Commission, and to make use of their own aircraft and such airfields in Iraq as they may determine are most appropriate for the work of the Commission,

Recalling that in its resolution 1115 (1997) the Council expressed its firm intention, unless the Special Commission has advised the Council that Iraq is in substantial compliance with paragraphs 2 and 3 of that resolution, to impose additional measures on those categories of Iraqi officials responsible for the non-compliance,

Reiterating the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Kuwait and Iraq,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Condemns the repeated refusal of the Iraqi authorities, as detailed in the report of the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission to allow access to sites designated by the Special Commission, and especially Iraqi actions endangering the safety of Special Commission personnel, the removal and destruction of documents of interest to the Special Commission and interference with the freedom of movement of Special Commission personnel;

2. Decides that such refusals to cooperate constitute a flagrant violation of Security Council resolutions 687 (1991), 707 (1991), 715 (1991) and 1060 (1996), and notes that the Special Commission, in the report of the Executive Chairman, was unable to advise that Iraq was in substantial compliance with paragraphs 2 and 3 of resolution 1115 (1997);

3. Demands that Iraq cooperate fully with the Special Commission in accordance with the relevant resolutions, which constitute the governing standard of Iraqi compliance;

4. Demands in particular that Iraq without delay allow the Special Commission inspection teams immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to any and all areas, facilities, equipment, records and means of transportation which they wish to inspect in accordance with the mandate of the Special Commission, as well as to officials and other persons under the authority of the Iraqi Government whom the Special Commission wishes to interview so that the Special Commission may fully discharge its mandate;

5. Requests the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission to include in all future consolidated progress reports prepared under resolution 1051 (1996) an annex evaluating Iraq's compliance with paragraphs 2 and 3 of resolution 1115 (1997);

⁶¹ Ibid., pp. 8-9.

⁶² Ibid., p. 5 (Portugal); pp. 5-6 (Sweden); p. 6 (Poland); and pp. 7-8 (Japan).

⁶³ For the vote, see S/PV.3826, p. 9.

6. Expresses its firm intention — if the Special Commission reports that Iraq is not in compliance with paragraphs 2 and 3 of resolution 1115 (1997) or if the Special Commission does not advise the Council in the report of the Executive Chairman due on 11 April 1998 that Iraq is in compliance with paragraphs 2 and 3 of resolution 1115 (1997) — to adopt measures which would oblige all States to prevent without delay the entry into or transit through their territories of all Iraqi officials and members of the Iraqi armed forces who are responsible for or participate in instances of non-compliance with paragraphs 2 and 3 of resolution 1115 (1997), provided that the entry of a person into a particular State on a specified date may be authorized by the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990), and provided that nothing in this paragraph shall oblige a State to refuse entry into its own territory to its own nationals or persons carrying out bona fide diplomatic assignments or missions;

7. Decides, on the basis of 11 incidents related to the implementation of paragraphs 2 and 3 of resolution 1115 (1997), to begin to designate, in consultation with the Special Commission, individuals whose entry or transit would be prevented upon implementation of the measures set out in paragraph 6 above;

8. Decides also not to conduct the reviews provided for in paragraphs 21 and 28 of resolution 687 (1991) until after the next consolidated progress report of the Special Commission, due on 11 April 1998, after which those reviews will resume in accordance with resolution 687 (1991), beginning on 26 April 1998;

9. Reaffirms its full support for the authority of the Special Commission under its Executive Chairman to ensure the implementation of its mandate under the relevant resolutions of the Council;

10. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of France stated that his country had wanted the wording of the text to be such that it would not give rise to any hasty or erroneous interpretations, such as the belief that an additional sanctions process had already been set in motion, contrary to the appeal contained in the report of the Special Commission. Because progress had been made, he expressed the belief that the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission ought to have received some encouragement to continue with his efforts and further enhance the effectiveness of the cooperation with the Iraqi authorities. He also expressed the hope that the Council, in the future exercise of its prerogatives, would continue to use very precise wording in its work in order to avoid situations in which people not directly responsible for the problems encountered might find themselves facing sanctions. In light of those considerations, his delegation had abstained in the voting.⁶⁴

The representative of the United States, referring to the suggestion that the Council ought to reward Iraq because it had cooperated with the Special Commission to a greater degree than in the past, underscored that cooperation was not a matter of degree: either Iraq was in compliance with its obligations or it was in breach of those obligations. Regarding the report of IAEA, he maintained that it was clear that Iraq had not answered all the relevant questions necessary to have a full accounting of its programmes.⁶⁵

Decision of 29 October 1997 (3828th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3828th meeting, held on 29 October 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Chile) drew the attention of the Security Council to a letter dated 29 October 1997 from the representative of Iraq addressed to the President of the Council, transmitting a letter of the same date from the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq to the President of the Council.⁶⁶ In the letter, the Deputy Prime Minister informed the Council of the decision taken by the Government of Iraq that it was ready to continue the cooperation with the Special Commission provided that no individuals of American nationality participated in any activity of the Special Commission inside Iraq.

At the same meeting the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶⁷

The Security Council has considered the letter dated 29 October 1997 from the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq to the President of the Security Council conveying the unacceptable decision of the Government of Iraq to seek to impose conditions on its cooperation with the Special Commission, thereby preventing the Special Commission from discharging its responsibilities under resolutions 687 (1991), 699 (1991), 707 (1991), 715 (1991), 1051 (1996), 1060 (1996), 1115 (1997) and 1134 (1997).

The Council recalls its demands in resolution 1134 (1997) that Iraq cooperate fully with the Special Commission in accordance with the relevant resolutions, which constitute the governing standard of Iraqi compliance.

⁶⁴ S/PV.3826, pp. 9-10.

⁶⁵ Ibid., pp. 10-12.

⁶⁷ S/PRST/1997/49.

The Council condemns the decision of the Government of Iraq to try to dictate the terms of its compliance with its obligation to cooperate with the Special Commission. It demands that Iraq cooperate fully, in accordance with the relevant resolutions, without conditions or restrictions, with the Special Commission in the implementation of its mandate. The Council furthermore reminds the Government of Iraq of its responsibility for the safety and security of the Special Commission personnel and inspection teams.

The Council warns of the serious consequences of Iraq's failure to comply immediately and fully with its obligations under the relevant resolutions. The Council is determined to ensure rapid and full Iraqi compliance with the relevant resolutions and for that purpose will remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 12 November 1997 (3831st meeting):
resolution 1137 (1997)

At its 3831st meeting, held on 12 November 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (China) drew the attention of the Security Council to a draft resolution submitted by the United Kingdom and the United States, with Chile, Costa Rica, Japan, Poland, Portugal, the Republic of Korea and Sweden joining as sponsors.⁶⁸ The President then drew the attention of the Council to the following documents: a letter dated 29 October 1997 from the representative of Iraq addressed to the President of the Security Council;⁶⁹ letters dated 6 and 10 November 1997 from the representative of Iraq addressed to the President of the Council and the Secretary-General,⁷⁰ respectively, transmitting letters of the same date from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq addressed to the President of the Council and to the Secretary-General, respectively; letters dated 30 October and 2, 3, 4, 5 and 7 November 1997, respectively, from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of Security Council resolution 687 (1991) addressed to the President of the Security Council;⁷¹ and a letter dated

31 October 1997 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council.⁷²

The representative of Costa Rica stressed that the core of the question was not just the issue of sanctions but the fact that the Government of Iraq was putting to the test the jurisdiction and the legal power of the Council, whose fundamental responsibility was to maintain international peace and security, as stipulated in Article 24 of the Charter.⁷³

The representative of Egypt stated that his country "[did] not see wisdom" in the insistence of Iraq on its position with regard to the Council or in its lack of responsiveness to the efforts by Egypt and others to dissuade it from insisting on that position. However, he suggested that the current crisis needed to be seen as an opportunity to extract lessons regarding the causes and ramifications of the feelings of frustration that led to the taking of unacceptable positions. The Council also needed to review the working methods of the Special Commission to ensure increased efficiency in carrying out its tasks as a subsidiary organ of the Council. He also stated that his delegation shared the conviction of many delegations regarding the necessity to comply with constitutional provisions and legal standards by not depriving any Member State of the United Nations of the right to express its view before the Council, in accordance with Articles 31 and 32 of the Charter, especially if the question related to sanctions imposed on that State under Chapter VII. He stressed that, while his country would vote in favour of the draft resolution, he would like to place on record the understanding that the travel restrictions contained in the draft resolution must not obstruct the discharge of the responsibilities of his Government as the host country of the headquarters of the League of Arab States. He also underlined that the draft resolution contained nothing that could open the way to an escalation of the situation, to the use of force or to resort to a military option.⁷⁴

⁷¹ Letters concerning the prevention by Iraqi authorities of inspections to be carried out by the Special Commission, and implicitly threatening the safety of a reconnaissance aircraft operating on behalf of the Special Commission (S/1997/830; S/1997/836; S/1997/837; S/1997/843; S/1997/848; and S/1997/851; and S/1997/864).

⁷⁴ Ibid., pp. 6-8.

The representative of Guinea-Bissau stated that the Council regarded as unacceptable the decision of the Iraqi authorities of 29 October 1997 that challenged the operational capacity of the Special Commission and certain cardinal principles of the Charter of the United Nations, particularly Article 100.⁷⁵

The representative of France stated that the travel restrictions would not worsen the situation of the Iraqi people, nor would they hamper the search for a peaceful solution. He noted that, as was stated in the French-Russian joint declaration, France continued to advocate strongly that any action with regard to Iraq be considered and conducted strictly within the framework of the Council.⁷⁶

Several speakers condemned the violations by Iraq of its obligations and called on it to cooperate fully with the Special Commission.⁷⁷

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1137 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, 707 (1991) of 15 August 1991, 715 (1991) of 11 October 1991, 1060 (1996) of 12 June 1996, 1115 (1997) of 21 June 1997 and 1134 (1997) of 23 October 1997,

Taking note with grave concern of the letter dated 29 October 1997 from the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq to the President of the Security Council conveying the unacceptable decision of the Government of Iraq to seek to impose conditions on its cooperation with the Special Commission, of the letter dated 2 November 1997 from the Permanent Representative of Iraq to the United Nations addressed to the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission which reiterated the unacceptable demand that the reconnaissance aircraft operating on behalf of the Special Commission be withdrawn from use and which implicitly threatened the safety of such aircraft, and of the letter dated 6 November 1997 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq to the President of the Security Council admitting that Iraq has moved dual-capable equipment which is subject to monitoring by the Special Commission,

Also taking note with grave concern of the letters dated 30 October and 2 November 1997 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission to the President of the Security Council advising that the Government of Iraq had denied entry to Iraq to two Special Commission officials on 30 October and 2 November 1997 on the grounds of their nationality, and of the letters dated 3, 4, 5 and 7 November 1997 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission to the President of the Security Council advising that the Government of Iraq had denied entry to sites designated for inspection by the Special Commission on 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7 November 1997 to Special Commission inspectors on the grounds of their nationality, as well as of the additional information in the letter dated 5 November 1997 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission addressed to the President of the Security Council that the Government of Iraq has moved significant pieces of dual-capable equipment subject to monitoring by the Special Commission and that monitoring cameras appear to have been tampered with or covered,

Welcoming the diplomatic initiatives, including that of the high-level mission of the Secretary-General, which have taken place in an effort to ensure that Iraq complies unconditionally with its obligations under the relevant resolutions,

Deeply concerned at the report of the high-level mission of the Secretary-General on the results of its meetings at the highest levels of the Government of Iraq,

Recalling that in its resolution 1115 (1997) the Council expressed its firm intention, unless the Special Commission advised it that Iraq is in substantial compliance with paragraphs 2 and 3 of that resolution, to impose additional measures on those categories of Iraqi officials responsible for the non-compliance,

Recalling also that in its resolution 1134 (1997) the Council reaffirmed its firm intention, if, inter alia, the Special Commission reports that Iraq is not in compliance with paragraphs 2 and 3 of resolution 1115 (1997), to adopt measures which would oblige States to refuse the entry into or transit through their territories of all Iraqi officials and members of the Iraqi armed forces who are responsible for or participate in instances of non-compliance with paragraphs 2 and 3 of resolution 1115 (1997),

Recalling further the statement by its President of 29 October 1997, in which the Council condemned the decision of the Government of Iraq to try to dictate the terms of its compliance with its obligation to cooperate with the Special Commission and warned of the serious consequences of Iraq's failure to comply immediately and fully and without conditions or restrictions with its obligations under the relevant resolutions,

Reiterating the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Kuwait and Iraq,

Determined to ensure immediate and full compliance without conditions or restrictions by Iraq with its obligations under the relevant resolutions, ⁷⁶ Ibid., pp. 9-10.

⁷⁷ Ibid., p. 3 (Sweden); pp. 3-4 (Portugal); pp. 4-5 (Japan); pp. 5-6 (Poland); p. 6 (Chile); p. 8 (Kenya); and pp. 11 (Republic of Korea).

Determining that this situation continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Condemns the continued violations by Iraq of its obligations under the relevant resolutions to cooperate fully and unconditionally with the Special Commission in the fulfillment of its mandate, including its unacceptable decision of 29 October 1997 to seek to impose conditions on cooperation with the Special Commission, its refusal on 30 October and 2 November 1997 to allow entry to Iraq to two Special Commission officials on the grounds of their nationality, its denial of entry on 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7 November 1997 to sites designated by the Special Commission for inspection to Special Commission inspectors on the grounds of their nationality, its implicit threat to the safety of the reconnaissance aircraft operating on behalf of the Special Commission, its removal of significant pieces of dual-use equipment from their previous sites, and its tampering with monitoring cameras of the Special Commission;

2. Demands that the Government of Iraq rescind immediately its decision of 29 October 1997;

3. Demands also that Iraq cooperate fully and immediately and without conditions or restrictions with the Special Commission in accordance with the relevant resolutions, which constitute the governing standard of Iraqi compliance;

4. Decides, in accordance with paragraph 6 of resolution 1134 (1997), that States shall without delay prevent the entry into or transit through their territories of all Iraqi officials and members of the Iraqi armed forces who were responsible for or participated in the instances of non-compliance detailed in paragraph 1 above, provided that the entry of a person into a particular State on a specified date may be authorized by the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, and provided that nothing in this paragraph shall oblige a State to refuse entry into its own territory to its own nationals, or to persons carrying out bona fide diplomatic assignments, or missions approved by the Committee;

5. Decides also, in accordance with paragraph 7 of resolution 1134 (1997), to designate in consultation with the Special Commission a list of individuals whose entry or transit will be prevented under the provisions of paragraph 4 above, and requests the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) to develop guidelines and procedures as appropriate for the implementation of the measures set out in paragraph 4 above and to transmit copies of those guidelines and procedures, as well as a list of the individuals designated, to all Member States;

6. Decides further that the provisions of paragraphs 4 and 5 above shall terminate one day after the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission reports to the Council that Iraq is allowing the Special Commission inspection teams immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to any and all areas, facilities, equipment, records and means of transportation which they wish to inspect in accordance with the mandate of the Special Commission, as well as to officials and other persons under the authority of the Iraqi Government whom the Special Commission wishes to interview so that the Special Commission may fully discharge its mandate;

7. Decides that the reviews provided for in paragraphs 21 and 28 of resolution 687 (1991) shall resume in April 1998 in accordance with paragraph 8 of resolution 1134 (1997), provided that the Government of Iraq shall have complied with paragraph 2 above;

8. Expresses its firm intention to take further measures as may be required for the implementation of the present resolution;

9. Reaffirms the responsibility of the Government of Iraq under the relevant resolutions to ensure the safety and security of the personnel and equipment of the Special Commission and its inspection teams;

10. Reaffirms also its full support for the authority of the Special Commission under its Executive Chairman to ensure the implementation of its mandate under the relevant resolutions of the Council;

11. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States maintained that in 37 previous reviews of sanctions against Iraq, the Council had concluded that Iraq had not met the simple conditions for lifting sanctions. The current crisis was not just more of the same, but was a violation of the Charter of the United Nations itself, as well as a categorical rejection of resolutions of the Council.⁷⁸

The representative of the United Kingdom reiterated that the successful completion of the work of the Special Commission was essential for maintaining regional and international peace and security.⁷⁹

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the Council had no other way out than to adopt concrete measures on the basis of the consensus established in resolution 1115 (1997). However, his delegation was convinced that any complications that arose needed to be resolved exclusively by political means and strictly within the framework of the relevant resolutions of the Council. Any other approaches, particularly actions involving force or the threat of the use of force, could nullify all the achievements so far in reaching a post-crisis settlement in the Persian Gulf and move the situation a long way back from the goal of eliminating the threat to peace and security in the region.⁸⁰

⁷⁸ Ibid., pp. 11-12.

⁷⁹ Ibid., pp. 12-13.

The representative of China stated that the causes of the current crisis were multifaceted and complex. The Council needed to hear the views of the Special Commission and Iraq on the question of inspections in order to make a fair and reasonable judgment on progress achieved in inspections. Problems that had come up in the course of inspections needed to be appropriately settled through dialogue and cooperation. He stressed that China was opposed to the use or the threat of force or any actions that might exacerbate tensions. In particular, the occurrence of armed conflict needed to be avoided. He also noted that his delegation's vote in favour did not imply a change in the position of China on sanctions.⁸¹

Decision of 13 November 1997 (3832nd meeting): statement by the President

At its 3832nd meeting, held on 13 November 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (China) drew the attention of the Security Council to a letter dated 13 November 1997 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁸² informing the Council that the Government of Iraq had taken the decision to expel all American personnel of the Special Commission and that all U-2 flights needed to cease; and a letter dated 13 November 1997 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of Security Council resolution 687 (1991) addressed to the President of the Security Council, informing the Council that all Americans attached to the Special Commission had been asked to depart from Iraq and that the Chairman had decided to temporarily withdraw the majority of the personnel of the Special Commission and leave behind a skeleton staff.⁸³

At the same meeting the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁸⁴

The Security Council condemns in the strongest terms the unacceptable decision of the Government of Iraq in expelling personnel of the Special Commission of a specified nationality and thereby imposing conditions on the Special Commission in contravention of relevant Security Council resolutions which constitute the governing standard of Iraqi compliance.

The Council demands the immediate and unequivocal revocation of this action, which has prevented the Special Commission from discharging its responsibilities under the relevant resolutions. The Council recalls the statement by its President of 29 October 1997, in which the Council warned of the serious consequences of Iraq's failure to comply immediately and fully and without conditions or restrictions with its obligations under the relevant resolutions. The Council further demands, in accordance with its resolution 1137 (1997), that Iraq comply immediately and fully with its obligations under the relevant resolutions.

The Council expresses its support for the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency and stresses the importance of their ensuring the implementation of all aspects of their mandates, including their vital work in monitoring and verification in Iraq, in accordance with the relevant resolutions of the Council.

The Council stresses that the Government of Iraq has full responsibility for ensuring the safety and security of the personnel and equipment of the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency and their inspection teams.

Decision of 3 December 1997 (3838th meeting): statement by the President

By a letter dated 22 November 1997 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁸⁵ the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of resolution 687 (1991) transmitted the report on the emergency session of the Special Commission, which focused on ways to make it more effective.

At its 3838th meeting, held on 3 December 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letter of the Secretary-General in its agenda.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁸⁶

The Security Council endorses the conclusions and recommendations of the report of the emergency session of the Special Commission aimed at full and expeditious implementation of the relevant resolutions and at increasing the efficiency and effectiveness of the work of the Commission to this end.

The Council reiterates its demand that Iraq fulfil all its obligations as set out in all the relevant resolutions, including resolution 1137 (1997), and cooperate fully with the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency in the implementation of their respective mandates. The Council stresses that the effectiveness and speed with which the Special Commission may accomplish its responsibilities is, above all, determined by the degree to which the Government of Iraq cooperates in disclosing the full extent and disposition of its proscribed programmes and in granting the Commission unimpeded access to all sites, documents, records and individuals. The Council acknowledges the conclusion of the report of the emergency session of the Special Commission that the Commission respects the legitimate national security, sovereignty and dignity concerns of Iraq in the context of the need for full application of the mandate given to it by the Council.

The Council welcomes the progress achieved by the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency in various disarmament areas. The Council encourages intensified efforts, in line with the conclusions and recommendations of the emergency session of the Special Commission, in order to implement fully the mandates of the Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency in each of their respective disarmament arm. The Council acknowledges that, as Iraq complies with its obligations under the relevant resolutions, and the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency so report and the Council agrees, the Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency would make the transition from investigation to monitoring in their respective areas, expanding the use of the ongoing monitoring system functioning in Iraq.

The Council urges Member States to respond positively to the requests contained in the report of the emergency session of the Special Commission, in particular related to the provision of additional personnel, equipment and information required by the mission and the International Atomic Energy Agency for more efficient and effective implementation of their respective mandates.

The Council will remain seized of the matter and will consider whether additional action may be necessary.

Decision of 4 December 1997 (3840th meeting):
resolution 1143 (1997)

On 28 November 1997, pursuant to paragraph 3 of resolution 1111 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on the humanitarian situation in Iraq.⁸⁷ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that, despite the ongoing implementation of resolutions 986 (1995) and 1111 (1997), the population of Iraq continued to face a serious nutritional and health situation and that there was an urgent need to contain the risk of a further deterioration. The slow and erratic pace at which humanitarian inputs had been arriving in Iraq had been very unsatisfactory. He stated that even if all supplies arrived on time, what was being provided under resolutions 986 (1995) and 1111 (1997) would be insufficient to address, even as a temporary measure, all the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi people. Given the scale of the urgent humanitarian requirements in Iraq, he suggested that the Council re-examine the adequacy of the revenues as envisaged by resolutions 986 (1995) and 1111 (1997) and consider the possibility of increasing those revenues to meet the priority humanitarian requirements of Iraq.

By a letter dated 2 December 1997 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁸⁸ the Chairman of the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait transmitted a report on the activities of the Committee.

At its 3840th meeting, held on 4 December 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General and the letter in its agenda. The President (Costa Rica) then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁸⁹

The representative of China noted that the quantity of oil sales stipulated in resolution 1111 (1997) was far from being able to satisfy the basic humanitarian needs of Iraq, and owing to the slow pace of the review and approval procedure, the majority of phase II import applications had yet to be approved. Such a situation, in which the import of humanitarian goods lagged behind the export of oil, was unacceptable. The Chinese delegation believed that, since the current quantity of oil sales could not satisfy the humanitarian needs of Iraq, the Council needed to increase the quantity of oil exports by Iraq in order to guarantee the country's essential humanitarian needs. He also urged the parties concerned to speed up the review and approval procedure so that humanitarian goods might be shipped to Iraq as soon as possible.⁹⁰

The representative of the Russian Federation underlined that, in referring to the reasons for inadequate supplies of humanitarian goods, the Council should not evade the question of the blocking of contracts in the sanctions Committee. He stressed that the current resolution was of an interim nature and that the amount of oil exports needed to be increased to provide adequate financing for humanitarian purchases.⁹¹

The representative of the United States reiterated that Iraq needed to stop playing politics with resolution 986 (1995) and stop submitting contracts that failed to meet the criteria and procedures agreed to. He also called on Iraq to end its threats to cease cooperation with the United Nations.⁹²

All members of the Council made statements in support of the draft resolution and expressed concern about the slow pace of the purchase of humanitarian goods. Most speakers also spoke favourably about a possible increase in the amount of oil permitted to be sold.⁹³ The representatives of Egypt and France also hoped that the draft resolution would reflect a preliminary agreement to increase the amount of oil that Iraq would be allowed to sell to deal with humanitarian needs.⁹⁴

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1143 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous resolutions, in particular resolutions 986 (1995) of 14 April 1995, 1111 (1997) of 4 June 1997 and 1129 (1997) of 12 September 1997,

Convinced of the need as a temporary measure to continue to provide for the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi people until the fulfilment by Iraq of the relevant resolutions, including notably resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, allows the Council to take further action with regard to the prohibitions referred to in resolution 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, in accordance with the provisions of those resolutions,

Convinced also of the need for equitable distribution of humanitarian relief to all segments of the Iraqi population throughout the country,

Welcoming the report submitted by the Secretary-General in accordance with paragraph 3 of resolution 1111 (1997), and his intention to submit a supplementary report, as well as the report submitted in accordance with paragraph 4 of resolution 1111 (1997) by the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990),

Noting with concern that, despite the ongoing implementation of resolutions 986 (1995) and 1111 (1997), the population of Iraq continues to face a serious nutritional and health situation,

Determined to avoid any further deterioration of the current humanitarian situation,

Noting with appreciation the recommendation of the Secretary-General that the Council re-examine the adequacy of the revenues provided by resolution 986 (1995) and consider how best to meet the priority humanitarian requirements of the Iraqi people, including the possibility of increasing those revenues,

Noting also with appreciation the intention of the Secretary-General to include in his supplementary report recommendations on ways to improve the processing and supply of humanitarian goods under resolution 986 (1995),

Welcoming the efforts made by the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) to refine and clarify its working procedures, and encouraging the Committee to go further in that direction in order to expedite the approval process,

Reaffirming the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides that the provisions of resolution 986 (1993), except those contained in paragraphs 4, 11 and 12, shall remain in force for another period of 180 days beginning at 0001 hours Eastern Standard Time, on 5 December 1997;

2. Also decides that the provisions of the distribution plan in respect of goods purchased in accordance with resolution 1111 (1997) shall continue to apply to foodstuffs, medicine and health supplies purchased in accordance with the present resolution pending the approval of the Secretary-General of a new distribution plan, to be submitted by the Government of Iraq before 5 January 1998;

3. Further decides to conduct a thorough review of all aspects of the implementation of the present resolution 90 days after the entry into force of paragraph 1 above and again prior to the end of the 180-day period, on receipt of the reports referred to in paragraphs 4 and 5 below, and expresses its intention, prior to the end of the 180-day period, to consider favourably renewal of the provisions of the present resolution, provided that the reports referred to in paragraphs 4 and 5 below indicate that those provisions are being satisfactorily implemented;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council 90 days after the date of entry into force of paragraph 1 above, and again prior to the end of the 180-day period, on the basis of observation by United Nations personnel in Iraq, and on the basis of consultations with the Government of Iraq, on whether Iraq has ensured the equitable distribution of medicine, health supplies, foodstuffs, and materials and supplies for essential civilian needs, financed in accordance with paragraph 8 (a) of resolution 986 (1995), including in his reports any observations he may have on the adequacy of the revenues to meet Iraq's humanitarian needs, and on Iraq's capacity to export sufficient quantities of petroleum and petroleum products to produce the sum referred to in paragraph 1 of resolution 986 (1995);

5. Requests the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990), in close coordination with the Secretary-General, to report to the Council 90 days after the date of entry into force of paragraph 1 above and again prior to the end of the 180-day period on the implementation of the arrangements in paragraphs 1, 2, 6, 8, 9 and 10 of resolution 986 (1995);

6. Welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to submit a supplementary report, and expresses its willingness, in the light of his recommendations, to find ways of improving the implementation of the humanitarian programme and to take such action over additional resources as needed to meet priority humanitarian requirements of the Iraqi people, as well as to consider an extension of the time-frame for the implementation of the present resolution;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to submit his supplementary report to the Council no later than 30 January 1998;

8. Stresses the need to ensure respect for the security and safety of all persons appointed by the Secretary-General for the implementation of the present resolution in Iraq;

9. Requests the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) to continue, in close coordination with the Secretary-General, to refine and clarify working procedures in order to expedite the approval process and to report to the Council no later than 30 January 1998;

10. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United Kingdom stressed that, with regard to food and medicines, his delegation did not believe that the bulk of the problems lay with the sanctions Committee. He reiterated that the Government of Iraq also had an essential role for which it needed to be held accountable. It needed to produce a distribution plan on time and demonstrate its own efforts to give priority to feeding its people.⁹⁵

Decision of 22 December 1997 (3844th meeting):
statement by the President

By a letter dated 17 December 1997 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of resolution 687 (1991) transmitted a report on his visit to Baghdad from 12 to 16 December 1997.⁹⁶ In his report, the Chairman informed the Security Council that, among other conditions on access to different types of sites, the Government of Iraq had decided that presidential and sovereign sites would not be allowed to be inspected under any circumstances.

At its 3844th meeting, held on 22 December 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letter in its agenda.

At the same meeting, the President (Costa Rica) made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁹⁷

The Security Council has considered the report of 17 December 1997 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission on his discussions with officials of the Government of Iraq, which took place in Baghdad from 12 to 16 December 1997.

The Council recalls all its relevant resolutions, including resolution 1137 (1997) of 12 November 1997 and the statement by its President of 3 December 1997. The Council reiterates its demand that the Government of Iraq cooperate fully with the Special Commission in accordance with all relevant resolutions and that the Government of Iraq allow the Special Commission inspection teams immediate, unconditional access to any and all areas, facilities, equipment, records and means of transportation which they wish to inspect in accordance with the mandate of the Special Commission.

The Council stresses that failure by the Government of Iraq to provide the Special Commission with immediate, unconditional access to any site or category of sites is unacceptable and a clear violation of the relevant resolutions.

The Council expresses its full support for the Special Commission and its Executive Chairman, including in his ongoing discussions with officials of the Government of Iraq.

⁹⁵ Ibid., pp. 12-13.

⁹⁷ S/PRST/1997/56.

The Council acknowledges that discussions are continuing on practical arrangements for implementation of all its relevant resolutions. The Council reiterates that the effectiveness and speed with which the Special Commission may accomplish its responsibilities is, above all, determined by the degree to which the Government of Iraq cooperates in disclosing the full extent and disposition of its proscribed programmes and in granting the Special Commission unimpeded access to all sites, documents, records, and individuals. The Council calls upon the Government of Iraq to cooperate fully with the Special Commission in the implementation of its mandate.

The Council will remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 14 January 1998 (3848th meeting): statement by the President

By a letter dated 12 January 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of resolution 687 (1991) informed the Council of a decision by the Government of Iraq to not permit the inspection team to undertake any activities inside Iraq until such time as its composition was reviewed and made more balanced by the equal participation of the permanent members of the Council.⁹⁸

By a letter dated 13 January 1998 addressed to the President of the Council, the representative of Iraq informed the Council that the reason for the decision of his Government to halt the work of the team was not related to the nature of the sites, but was due to the fact that the composition of nationalities on the team lacked balance. He also added that the lack of balance had an essentially political significance.⁹⁹

At its 3848th meeting, held on 14 January 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the two letters in its agenda. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 12 January 1998 from the representative of Iraq addressed to the President of the Council, which raised concerns about transparency in the reporting of information to the Council.¹⁰⁰

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁰¹

¹⁰⁰ S/1998/26.

¹⁰¹ S/PRST/1998/1.

The Security Council deplores the statement of the Iraqi official spokesman of 12 January 1998 and the subsequent failure of Iraq to fulfil its obligations to provide the Special Commission with full, unconditional and immediate access to all sites. The Council determines that this failure is unacceptable and a clear violation of the relevant resolutions.

The Council recalls the statement by its President of 29 October 1997 in which it condemned the decision of the Government of Iraq to try to dictate the terms of its compliance with its obligations to cooperate with the Special Commission.

The Council reiterates its demand, contained in resolution 1137 (1997), that Iraq cooperate fully and immediately and without conditions or restrictions with the Special Commission in accordance with the relevant resolutions, which constitute the governing standard of Iraqi compliance.

The Council expresses its full support for the Special Commission and its Executive Chairman, including in his forthcoming travel to Iraq to continue his discussions with officials of the Government of Iraq aimed at the full implementation of the relevant resolutions and at increasing the effectiveness and efficiency of the operations of the Special Commission to this end. In this context, the Council recalls the statements by its President of 3 December and 22 December 1997 and encourages the efforts reported to it by the Executive Chairman.

The Council requests a full briefing by the Executive Chairman on these discussions as soon as possible after they have taken place, so that it can decide as necessary on an appropriate response on the basis of the relevant resolutions.

Decision of 20 February 1998 (3855th meeting): resolution 1153 (1998)

On 1 February 1998, pursuant to paragraph 7 of resolution 1143 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on ways to improve the implementation of the humanitarian programme for Iraq.¹⁰² In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the distribution plan remained central to the entire system, and he therefore recommended that the content and presentation of the distribution plan be significantly improved by providing indicators relating to the targeted objectives to be achieved and other factors. Regarding the programme review, he stressed that it had become increasingly apparent that the sum was inadequate to prevent further deterioration in humanitarian conditions and could not effect the improvement hoped for the health and nutritional status of the Iraqi population. He therefore underlined that expanded assistance was urgently required to address the humanitarian situation in Iraq and that, within the framework of resolution 986 (1995), the provision of additional resources was the most effective way of addressing those needs.

By a letter dated 30 January 1998 addressed to the President of the Council, the Chairman of the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait transmitted a report pursuant to paragraph 9 of resolution 1143 (1997) on the refining and clarifying of the working procedures of the Committee.¹⁰³

At its 3855th meeting, held on 20 February 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General and the letter in its agenda. The President (Gabon) then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁰⁴ The President also drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 15 February 1998 from the representative of Iraq addressed to the Secretary-General,¹⁰⁵ transmitting the text of a letter of the same date from the Deputy Prime Minister and Acting Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq, explaining the position of the Government of Iraq concerning the discussions in the Council with regard to the next phase of the oil-for-food programme.

The representative of the Russian Federation noted that the Iraqi oil infrastructure was hardly able to extract oil for export at the required levels for humanitarian purposes, and that repairs were needed. He stressed that the financing for such a project would require additional quotas for oil exports, which needed to be agreed upon by the Secretariat and the Iraqi side.¹⁰⁶

The representative of Bahrain stressed that the draft resolution needed to be implemented with the full cooperation of the Iraqi authorities. He also maintained that the measures proposed in its operative paragraphs were not characterized by flexibility or by distancing from bureaucracy. He stated that Bahrain understood the cautious approach of the Council, which aimed at ensuring that the assistance reached its real destination, but cautioned that too much control would lead to a degree of delay in the delivery of that assistance to the Iraqi people. He also reaffirmed that the draft resolution was not in any way linked to resolution 687 (1991), related to the elimination of weapons of mass destruction.¹⁰⁷

The representative of the United States stated that the Council needed to make certain that food and medicine remained the top priorities under the new resolution; that goods imported into Iraq under the resolution were not diverted to military purposes or used for the personal benefit of the Iraqi leadership; and that the sanctions Committee acted quickly, yet responsibly, to approve contracts. Finally, he also stated that the Council needed to wait until it had more and better information before authorizing any oil infrastructure improvements.¹⁰⁸

All the members of the Council made statements expressing concern at the severe humanitarian situation in Iraq and support for the increase in the volume of oil authorized for export in order to improve the humanitarian situation. They also called on the Government of Iraq to cooperate fully with the resolutions of the Council and with all other relevant organizations. A number of speakers also urged the parties to expedite the review and approval procedures to ensure that oil export earnings were converted into humanitarian supplies without delay.¹⁰⁹

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1153 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 986 (1995) of 14 April 1995, 1111 (1997) of 4 June 1997, 1129 (1997) of 12 September 1997 and 1143 (1997) of 4 December 1997, the fulfilment by Iraq of the relevant resolutions, including notably resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, allows the Council to take further action with regard to the prohibitions referred to in resolution 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, in accordance with the provisions of those resolutions, and emphasizing the temporary nature of the distribution plan envisaged by the present resolution,

Convinced also of the need for equitable distribution of humanitarian supplies to all segments of the Iraqi population throughout the country,

Welcoming the report submitted by the Secretary-General on 1 February 1998 in accordance with paragraph 7 of resolution 1143 (1997) and his recommendations, as well as the report submitted on 30 January 1998 by the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990), in accordance with paragraph 9 of resolution 1143 (1997),

Noting that the Government of Iraq did not cooperate fully in the preparation of the report of the Secretary-General,

Noting with concern that, despite the ongoing implementation of resolutions 986 (1995), 1111 (1997) and 1143 (1997), the population of Iraq continues to face a very serious nutritional and health situation,

Determined to avoid any further deterioration of the current humanitarian situation,

Reaffirming the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides that the provisions of resolution 986 (1995), except those contained in paragraphs 4, 11 and 12, shall remain in force for a new period of 180 days beginning at 0001 hours Eastern Standard Time, on the day after the President of the Security Council has informed the members of the Council that he has received the report of the Secretary-General requested in paragraph 5 below, on which date the provisions of resolution 1143 (1997), if still in force, shall terminate, except as regards sums already produced pursuant to that resolution prior to that date;

2. Decides also that the authorization given to States by paragraph 1 of resolution 986 (1995) shall permit the import of petroleum and petroleum products originating in Iraq, including financial and other essential transactions directly relating thereto, sufficient to produce, in the 180-day period referred to in paragraph 1 above, a sum not exceeding a total of 5.256 billion United States dollars, of which the amounts recommended by the Secretary-General for the food/nutrition and health sectors should be allocated on a priority basis, and of which between 682 million United States dollars and 788 million United States dollars shall be used for the purpose referred to in paragraph 8 (b) of resolution 986 (1995), except that if less than 5.256 billion United States dollars worth of petroleum or petroleum products is sold during the 180-day period, particular attention will be paid to meeting the urgent humanitarian needs in the food/nutrition and health sectors and the Secretary-General may provide a proportionately smaller amount for the purpose referred to in paragraph 8 (b) of resolution 986 (1995);

3. Directs the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) to authorize, on the basis of specific requests, reasonable expenses related to the Hajj, to be met by funds in the escrow account;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to take the actions necessary to ensure the effective and efficient implementation of the present resolution and, in particular, to enhance the United Nations observation process in Iraq in such a way as to provide the required assurance to the Council of the equitable distribution of the goods produced in accordance with the present resolution and that all supplies authorized for procurement, including dual-usage items and spare parts, are utilized for the purpose for which they have been authorized;

5. Also requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council when he has entered into any necessary arrangements or agreements and approved a distribution plan, submitted by the Government of Iraq, which includes a description of the goods to be purchased and effectively guarantees their equitable distribution, in accordance with his recommendations that the plan should be ongoing and should reflect the relative priorities of humanitarian supplies as well as their interrelationships within the context of projects or activities, required delivery dates, preferred points of entry and targeted objectives to be achieved;

6. Urges all States and, in particular, the Government of Iraq, to provide their full cooperation in the effective implementation of the present resolution;

7. Appeals to all States to cooperate in the timely submission of applications and the expeditious issue of export licences, facilitating the transit of humanitarian supplies authorized by the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990), and taking all other appropriate measures within their competence in order to ensure that urgently required humanitarian supplies reach the Iraqi people as rapidly as possible;

8. Stresses the need to ensure respect for the security and safety of all persons directly involved in the implementation of the present resolution in Iraq;

9. Decides to conduct an interim review of the implementation of the present resolution 90 days after the entry into force of paragraph 1 above and a thorough review of all aspects of its implementation prior to the end of the 180-day period, upon receipt of the reports referred to in paragraphs 10 and 14 below, and expresses its intention, prior to the end of the 180-day period, to consider favourably the renewal of the provisions of the present resolution as appropriate, provided that the reports referred to in paragraphs 10 and 14 below indicate that those provisions are being satisfactorily implemented;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to submit an interim report to the Council 90 days after the entry into force of paragraph 1 above, and to submit a full report prior to the end of the 180-day period, on the basis of observations by United Nations personnel in Iraq, and on the basis of consultations with the Government of Iraq, on whether Iraq has ensured the equitable distribution of medicine, health supplies, foodstuffs and materials and supplies for essential civilian needs, financed in accordance with paragraph 8 (a) of resolution 986 (1995), including in his reports any observations he may have on the adequacy of the revenues to meet Iraq's humanitarian needs and on Iraq's capacity to export sufficient quantities of petroleum and petroleum products to produce the sum referred to in paragraph 2 above;

11. Takes note of the observation by the Secretary-General that the situation in the electricity sector is extremely grave, and notes his intention to return to the Council with proposals for appropriate funding, requests him to submit urgently to the Council a report for this purpose prepared in consultation with the Government of Iraq, and further requests him to submit to the Council other studies, drawing upon United Nations agencies as appropriate and in consultation with the Government of Iraq, on essential humanitarian needs in Iraq, including necessary improvements to infrastructure;

12. Requests the Secretary-General to establish a group of experts to determine, in consultation with the Government of Iraq, whether Iraq is able to export petroleum or petroleum products sufficient to produce the total sum referred to in paragraph 2 above and to prepare an independent report on Iraqi production and transportation capacity and necessary monitoring, also requests him, in the light of that report, to make early and appropriate recommendations, and expresses its readiness to take a decision, on the basis of those recommendations and the humanitarian objectives of the present resolution, notwithstanding paragraph 3 of resolution 661 (1990), regarding authorization of the export of the necessary equipment to enable Iraq to increase the export of petroleum or petroleum products and to give the appropriate directions to the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990);

13. Also requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council, if Iraq is unable to export petroleum or petroleum products sufficient to produce the total sum referred to in paragraph 2 above and, following consultations with relevant United Nations agencies and the Iraqi authorities, making recommendations for the expenditure of the sum expected to be available, consistent with the distribution plan referred to in paragraph 5 above;

14. Requests the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990), in coordination with the Secretary-General, to report to the Council 90 days after the entry into force of paragraph 1 above, and again prior to the end of the 180-day period, on the implementation of the arrangements in paragraphs 1, 2, 6, 8, 9 and 10 of resolution 986 (1995);

15. Also requests the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) to implement the measures and take action on the steps referred to in its report of 30 January 1998, with regard to the refining and clarifying of its working procedures, to consider the relevant observations and recommendations referred to in the report of the Secretary-General of 1 February 1998, in particular with a view to reducing to the extent possible the delay between the export of petroleum and petroleum products from Iraq and the supply of goods to Iraq in accordance with the present resolution, to report to the Council by 31 March 1998 and thereafter to continue to review its procedures whenever necessary;

16. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 2 March 1998 (3858th meeting):
resolution 1154 (1998)

By a letter dated 25 February 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹¹⁰ the Secretary-General transmitted a copy of the memorandum of understanding that he had signed with the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq, in which the Government of Iraq reconfirmed its acceptance of all relevant resolutions of the Council, and reiterated its undertaking to cooperate fully with the Special Commission and IAEA.

At its 3858th meeting, held on 2 March 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letter from the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Gambia), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Argentina, Egypt, Kuwait, Malaysia, Mexico, Pakistan and Peru, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Japan and the United Kingdom.¹¹¹

At the same meeting, the Secretary-General stated that, as a result of his trip to Baghdad and the signing of the memorandum of understanding, the mandate of the Council had been reaffirmed and the full and unlimited access of United Nations inspectors to any and all sites had been restored. He cautioned that he was under no illusions about the inherent value of the agreement, as commitments honoured were the only commitments that counted. He stressed that only the complete fulfillment by Iraq of its obligations would make the completion of the United Nations mandated disarmament process and the lifting of sanctions possible. He also underlined that if the effort to ensure compliance through negotiation was obstructed, by evasion or deception, diplomacy might not have a second chance.¹¹²

The representative of the United Kingdom noted that the signing of the memorandum of understanding had not been a success for diplomacy alone, but a success for diplomacy firmly backed by the willingness to use force if diplomacy should fail. He stressed that, if Iraq failed to comply and to honour the agreement it had signed with the Secretary-General, the Council was determined that any violation would result in the severest consequences.¹¹³

The representative of Costa Rica reiterated his delegation's view that international law required that the memorandum of understanding be formally endorsed by the Council in order to make all its terms consistent with previous relevant resolutions and with what was established by Chapter VII of the Charter, in regard to actions "with respect to threats to the peace, breaches of the peace, and acts of aggression", as the sole and inalienable prerogative of the Council. He also stated that the draft resolution did not prejudice the actions of the Council, but simply described the scope of its competence under the Charter and warned of the consequences of a failure by the Government of Iraq to comply, in the terms of the prerogatives and competences set out in Chapter VII of the Charter. In his country's view, those prerogatives and legal competencies were exclusively of the Council and could not be delegated by it.¹¹⁴

The representative of Brazil noted that since 1991, faced with the situation originating from the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq, the United Nations and the Security Council had taken the responsibility to determine the measures necessary to maintain and restore international peace and security, under Chapter VII of the Charter. Accordingly, at the end of the Gulf War, the Council had not limited itself to taking note of a ceasefire but had rather declared that "a formal ceasefire was effective". Furthermore, in paragraph 34 of resolution 687 (1991), the Council had stated its decision "to take further steps as [might] be required for the implementation of the present resolution". Brazil had concluded that the question of implementation of the conditions for the ceasefire with Iraq remained firmly under the wing of the United Nations and that only the Council had the authority to determine if, when, and under what conditions the formal ceasefire it declared on 3 April 1991 held or not.¹¹⁵

The representative of China, noting that his delegation's "misgivings about possible abuse of the draft resolution" had not been eliminated, reiterated that the adoption of the draft resolution would in no way mean that the Council was automatically authorizing any State to use force against Iraq. The Council could and should not prejudge whether Iraq would violate its resolutions; even less should the Council predetermine the course of future action.¹¹⁶

Several speakers welcomed the signing of the memorandum of understanding and called on Iraq to cooperate fully with the Special Commission and IAEA.¹¹⁷ A number of speakers also stressed that the responsibility of the Council for international peace and security should not be circumvented, and that the resolution did not imply any "automaticity" of action without authorization by the Council.¹¹⁸ A few speakers specifically cautioned against the use of force in Iraq.¹¹⁹

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1154 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous relevant resolutions, which constitute the governing standard of Iraqi compliance,

Determined to ensure immediate and full compliance by Iraq without conditions or restrictions with its obligations under resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991 and the other relevant resolutions,

Reaffirming the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Iraq, Kuwait and the neighbouring States,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Commends the initiative by the Secretary-General to secure commitments from the Government of Iraq on compliance with its obligations under the relevant resolutions, and in this regard endorses the memorandum of understanding signed by the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq and the Secretary-General on 23 February 1998, and looks forward to its early and full implementation;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council as soon as possible with regard to the finalization of procedures for presidential sites in consultation with the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission and the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency;

3. Stresses that compliance by the Government of Iraq with its obligations, repeated again in the memorandum of understanding, to accord immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency in conformity with the relevant resolutions is necessary for the implementation of resolution 687 (1991), but that any violation would have severest consequences for Iraq;

4. Reaffirms its intention to act in accordance with the relevant provisions of resolution 687 (1991) on the duration of the prohibitions referred to in that resolution, and notes that by its failure so far to comply with its relevant obligations Iraq has delayed the moment when the Council can do so;

5. Decides, in accordance with its responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations, to remain actively seized of the matter, in order to ensure implementation of the present resolution and to secure peace and security in the area.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States reiterated that any attempt to provide less than immediate, unrestricted and unconditional access to any site would result in the severest consequences for Iraq.¹²⁰

The representative of the Russian Federation emphasized that the resolution clearly stated that it was precisely the Council which would directly ensure its implementation. Therefore, any hint of “automaticity” with regard to the application of force had been excluded. He reiterated that no one could ignore the resolution and attempt to act by bypassing the Council.¹²¹

The representative of Egypt underscored that his country had expressed its rejection of the use of military force as a means of settling international disputes. In general, the use of force was not only prohibited internationally under the rules of international law but also in accordance with Article 2 (4) of the Charter. There were also controls in Article 42 on when force could be resorted to, and also in Article 51, which was related to legitimate self-defence. He stressed that in all cases, those controls needed to be subjected to the discretion of the Council.¹²²

Decision of 25 March 1998 (3865th meeting):

On 4 March 1998, pursuant to paragraph 4 of resolution 1143 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on whether Iraq had ensured the equitable distribution of medicine, health supplies, foodstuffs and materials, and supplies for essential civilian needs.¹²³ In his report, the Secretary-General provided information on the distribution of humanitarian supplies throughout Iraq.

At its 3865th meeting, held on 25 March 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Gambia) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council’s prior consultations.¹²⁴ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1158 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous resolutions, in particular resolutions 986 (1995) of 14 April 1995, 1111 (1997) of 4 June 1997, 1129 (1997) of 12 September 1997, 1143 (1997) of 4 December 1997 and 1153 (1998) of 20 February 1998,

Welcoming the report submitted by the Secretary-General on 4 March 1998 in accordance with paragraph 4 of resolution 1143 (1997), and noting with appreciation, as mentioned in the report, the commitment expressed by the Iraqi Government to cooperate with the Secretary-General in the implementation of resolution 1153 (1998),

Concerned about the resulting humanitarian consequences for the Iraqi people of the shortfall in the revenue from the sale of petroleum and petroleum products during the first 90-day period of implementation of resolution 1143 (1997), due to the delayed resumption in the sale of petroleum by Iraq and a serious price drop since the adoption of resolution 1143 (1997),

Determined to avoid any further deterioration of the current humanitarian situation,

Reaffirming the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides that the provisions of resolution 1143 (1997) shall remain in force, subject to the provisions of resolution 1153 (1998), except that States are authorized to permit the import of petroleum and petroleum products originating in Iraq, including financial and other essential transactions directly relating thereto, sufficient to produce a sum not exceeding a total of 1.4 billion United States dollars within the period of 90 days from 0001 Eastern Standard Time, on 5 March 1998;

2. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 14 May 1998 (3880th meeting):
statement by the President

By a letter dated 9 April 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹²⁵ the Secretary-General transmitted a communication dated 7 April 1998 from the Director General of IAEA, including the fifth consolidated report under paragraph 16 of resolution 1051 (1996). In the report, the Director General stated that the agency's ongoing monitoring and verification activities had not revealed indications of the existence in Iraq of prohibited equipment or materials, or of the conduct of prohibited activities. IAEA was focusing most of its resources on the implementation and strengthening of the technical content of its activities under the ongoing monitoring and verification plan, but would continue to exercise its right to investigate any aspect of the clandestine nuclear programme of Iraq.

By a note dated 9 April 1998,¹²⁶ the Secretary-General transmitted to the Security Council the fifth report following the adoption of resolution 1051 (1996) of 27 March 1996 by the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991. In his report, the Executive Chairman noted that due to the four-month crisis, virtually no progress in verifying disarmament could be reported.

At its 3880th meeting, held on 14 May 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letter and the note from the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Kenya) drew the attention of the Council to letters dated 19 February and 8 April 1998, respectively, from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission addressed to the President of the Council.¹²⁷

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹²⁸

The Security Council has reviewed the report of 16 April 1998 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission and the report of 7 April 1998 from the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency. The Council welcomes the improved access provided to the Special Commission and the Agency by the Government of Iraq following the signature of the memorandum of understanding by the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq and the Secretary-General on 23 February 1998 and the adoption of its resolution 1154 (1998) of 2 March 1998. The Council calls for continued implementation of the memorandum of understanding.

The Council expresses the hope that the agreement by the Government of Iraq to fulfil its obligation to provide immediate, unconditional, and unrestricted access to the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency will reflect a new Iraqi spirit with regard to providing accurate and detailed information in all areas of concern to the Special Commission and the Agency as required by the relevant resolutions.

The Council expresses its concern that the most recent reports of the Special Commission, including the reports of the technical evaluation meetings, indicate that Iraq has not provided full disclosure in a number of critical areas, in spite of repeated requests from the Special Commission, and calls upon Iraq to do so. The Council encourages the Special Commission to continue its efforts to improve its effectiveness and efficiency and looks forward to a technical meeting of the members of the Council with the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission as a follow-up to the review of sanctions held by the Council on 27 April 1998.

The Council notes that the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency must discharge their mandates as defined under resolutions 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991 and 707 (1991) of 15 August 1991 with full Iraqi cooperation in all areas, including fulfillment by Iraq of its obligation to provide full, final and complete declarations of all aspects of its prohibited programmes for weapons of mass destruction and missiles.

The Council notes that the investigations by the International Atomic Energy Agency over the past several years have yielded a technically coherent picture of Iraq's clandestine nuclear programme, although Iraq has not supplied full responses to all of the questions and concerns of the Agency, including those specified in paragraphs 24 and 27 of the report of the Director General of 7 April 1998.

The Council affirms its intention, given the progress of the International Atomic Energy Agency, and in line with paragraphs 12 and 13 of resolution 687 (1991), to agree in a resolution that the Agency dedicate its resources to implementing its ongoing monitoring and verification activities under resolution 715 (1991) of 11 October 1991, upon receipt of a report from the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency stating that the necessary technical and substantive clarifications have been made, including provision by Iraq of the necessary responses to all Agency questions and concerns, in order to permit full implementation of the ongoing monitoring and verification plan approved by resolution 715 (1991). In this regard, the Council requests the Director General to provide this information in his report due on 11 October 1998 and to submit a status report by the end of July 1998 for possible action at that time.

The Council acknowledges that the International Atomic Energy Agency is focusing most of its resources on the implementation and strengthening of its activities under the ongoing monitoring and verification plan. The Council notes that, within the framework of its ongoing monitoring and verification responsibilities, the Agency will continue to exercise its right to investigate any aspect of Iraq's clandestine nuclear programme, in particular through the follow-up of any new information developed by the Agency or provided by Member States and to destroy, remove or render harmless any prohibited items discovered through such investigations falling under resolutions 687 (1991) and 707 (1991) in conformity with the Agency's ongoing monitoring and verification plan approved by resolution 715 (1991).

By a letter dated 15 April 1998 addressed to the Security Council,¹²⁹ the Secretary-General submitted the executive summary of the report of the group of experts established pursuant to paragraph 12 of resolution 1153 (1998) to determine, in consultation with the Government of Iraq, whether Iraq was able to export petroleum or petroleum products sufficient to produce the total sum referred to in paragraph 2 of the resolution, not exceeding a total of 5.256 billion dollars. The overall impression of the group of experts was that the oil industry of Iraq was in a lamentable state and that the developed oilfields had had their productivity seriously reduced, some irreparably, during the previous two decades. The Secretary-General therefore recommended to the Council that it authorize the export to Iraq of the equipment and spare parts necessary to enable Iraq to increase the export of petroleum or petroleum products.

By a letter dated 29 May 1998 addressed to the President of the Council,¹³⁰ the Secretary-General informed the Council that the Government of Iraq had submitted its enhanced distribution plan for the purchase and distribution of humanitarian supplies and that he had approved it.

At its 3893rd meeting, held on 19 June 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the letters from the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Portugal) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Costa Rica, Japan, Portugal, Slovenia, Sweden, and the United Kingdom.¹³¹ The President also drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 18 June 1998 from the representative of Iraq addressed to the President of the Council.¹³²

Speaking before the vote, the representative of China expressed the belief that a settlement of the question of Iraqi import of equipment and spare parts for oil production needed only a simple and technical resolution, and that certain elements contained in the draft resolution were not necessary. He also reiterated that, with the progress made in weapons verification in Iraq, the Council needed to make objective assessments, close the various weapons files as soon as possible and lift the sanctions against Iraq.¹³³

The representative of Kenya noted that the mechanism for the approval of contracts for spare parts remained cumbersome and might create unnecessary complications.¹³⁴

The representatives of France and the Russian Federation expressed regret that the draft resolution did not include the recommendation of the Secretary-General that the oil overseers, rather than the sanctions Committee, approve the contracts.¹³⁵

A number of speakers expressed support for moves to allow Iraq to purchase the spare parts it needed to pump oil in sufficient quantities to meet the shortfall. Several speakers stressed that the oil-for-food programme was temporary, and was designed to mitigate the suffering of the Iraqi people only until sanctions were lifted.¹³⁶

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1175 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 986 (1995) of 14 April 1995, 1111 (1997) of 4 June 1997, 1129 (1997) of 12 September 1997, 1143 (1997) of 4 December 1997, 1153 (1998) of 20 February 1998 and 1158 (1998) of 25 March 1998,

Welcoming the letter from the Secretary-General dated 15 April 1998, to which was annexed the summary of the report of the group of experts established pursuant to paragraph 12 of resolution 1153 (1998), and noting the assessment that under existing circumstances Iraq is unable to export petroleum or petroleum products sufficient to produce the total sum of 5.256 billion United States dollars referred to in resolution 1153 (1998),

Welcoming also the letter from the Secretary-General dated 29 May 1998 expressing his approval of the distribution plan submitted by the Government of Iraq,

Convinced of the need to continue the programme authorized by resolution 1153 (1998) as a temporary measure to provide for the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi people until fulfillment by the Government of Iraq of the relevant resolutions, including notably resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, allows the Council to take further action with regard to the prohibitions referred to in resolution 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, in accordance with the provisions of those resolutions,

Reaffirming its endorsement, in paragraph 5 of resolution 1153 (1998), of the recommendations made by the Secretary-General in his report of 1 February 1998 concerning an improved, ongoing and project-based distribution plan,

Reaffirming also the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Authorizes States, subject to the provisions of paragraph 2 below, to permit, notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 3 (c) of resolution 661 (1990), the export to Iraq of the necessary parts and equipment to enable Iraq to increase the export of petroleum and petroleum products, in quantities sufficient to produce the sum established in paragraph 2 of resolution 1153 (1998);

2. Requests the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990), or a panel of experts appointed by that Committee for this purpose, to approve contracts for the parts and equipment referred to in paragraph 1 above according to lists of parts and equipment approved by the Committee for each individual project;

3. Decides that the funds in the escrow account produced pursuant to resolution 1153 (1998) up to a total of 300 million United States dollars may be used to meet any reasonable expenses, other than expenses payable in Iraq, which follow directly from contracts approved in accordance with paragraph 2 above;

4. Decides also that the expenses directly related to such exports may, until the necessary funds are paid into the escrow account, and following approval of each contract, be financed by letters of credit drawn against future oil sales, the proceeds of which are to be deposited in the escrow account;

5. Notes that the distribution plan approved by the Secretary-General on 29 May 1998, or any new distribution plan agreed on by the Government of Iraq and the Secretary-General, will remain in effect, as required, for each subsequent periodic renewal of the temporary humanitarian arrangements for Iraq and that, for this purpose, the plan will be kept under constant review and amended as necessary through the agreement of the Secretary-General and the Government of Iraq and in a manner consistent with resolution 1153 (1998);

6. Expresses its gratitude to the Secretary-General for making available to the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) a comprehensive review, with comments by the group of experts established pursuant to paragraph 12 of resolution 1153 (1998), of the list of parts and equipment presented by the Government of Iraq, and requests the Secretary-General, in accordance with the intention expressed in his letter dated 15 April 1998, to provide for the monitoring of the parts and equipment inside Iraq;

7. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 9 September 1998 (3924th meeting):
resolution 1194 (1998)

At the 3924th meeting, held on 9 September 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in prior consultations, following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Sweden) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Costa Rica, the United Kingdom and the United States.¹³⁷ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1194 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, 707 (1991) of 15 August 1991, 715 (1991) of 11 October 1991, 1060 (1996) of 12 June 1996, 1115 (1997) of 21 June 1997 and 1154 (1998) of 2 March 1998,

Noting the announcement by Iraq on 5 August 1998 that it had decided to suspend cooperation with the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency on all disarmament activities and restrict ongoing monitoring and verification activities at declared sites, and/or actions implementing the above decision, Stressing that the necessary conditions do not exist for the modification of the measures referred to in section F of resolution 687 (1991),

Recalling the letter dated 12 August 1998 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission to the President of the Security Council, in which the Executive Chairman reported to the Council that Iraq had halted all disarmament activities of the Special Commission and placed limitations on the rights of the Commission to conduct its monitoring operations,

Recalling also the letter dated 11 August 1998 from the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency to the President of the Security Council, in which the Director General reported the refusal by Iraq to cooperate in any activity involving investigation of its clandestine nuclear programme and other restrictions of access placed by Iraq on the ongoing monitoring and verification programme of the Agency,

Taking note of the letters dated 18 August 1998 from the President of the Security Council to the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission and the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency, in which the Council expressed its full support for those organizations in the implementation of the full range of their mandated activities, including inspections,

Recalling the memorandum of understanding signed by the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq and the Secretary-General on 23 February 1998, in which Iraq reiterated its undertaking to cooperate fully with the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency,

Noting that the announcement by Iraq of 5 August 1998 followed a period of increased cooperation and some tangible progress achieved since the signing of the memorandum of understanding,

Reiterating its intention to respond favourably to future progress made in the disarmament process, and reaffirming its commitment to comprehensive implementation of its resolutions, in particular resolution 687 (1991),

Determined to ensure full compliance by Iraq with its obligations under all previous resolutions, in particular resolutions 687 (1991), 707 (1991), 715 (1991), 1060 (1996), 1115 (1997) and 1154 (1998), to permit immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency to all sites they wish to inspect, and to provide the Special Commission and the Agency with all the cooperation necessary for them to fulfil their mandates under those resolutions,

Stressing the unacceptability of any attempts by Iraq to deny access to any sites or to refuse to provide the necessary cooperation,

Expressing its readiness to consider, in a comprehensive review, Iraq's compliance with its obligations under all relevant resolutions once Iraq has rescinded its above-mentioned decision and demonstrated that it is prepared to fulfil all its obligations, including, in particular on disarmament issues, by resuming full cooperation with the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency consistent with the memorandum of understanding, as endorsed by the Council in resolution 1154 (1998), and, to that end, welcoming the proposal of the Secretary-General for such a comprehensive review and inviting the Secretary-General to provide his views in that regard,

Reiterating the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Kuwait and Iraq,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Condemns the decision by Iraq of 5 August 1998 to suspend cooperation with the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency, which constitutes a totally unacceptable contravention of its obligations under resolutions 687 (1991), 707 (1991), 715 (1991), 1060 (1996), 1115 (1997) and 1154 (1998), and the memorandum of understanding signed by the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq and the Secretary-General on 23 February 1998;

2. Demands that Iraq rescind its above-mentioned decision and cooperate fully with the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency in accordance with its obligations under the relevant resolutions and the memorandum of understanding as well as resume dialogue with the Special Commission and the Agency immediately;

3. Decides not to conduct the review scheduled for October 1998 provided for in paragraphs 21 and 28 of resolution 687 (1991), and not to conduct any further such reviews until Iraq rescinds its above-mentioned decision and the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency report to the Council that they are satisfied that they have been able to exercise the full range of activities provided for in their mandates, including inspections;

4. Reaffirms its full support for the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency in their efforts to ensure the implementation of their mandates under the relevant resolutions of the Council;

5. Also reaffirms its full support for the Secretary-General in his efforts to urge Iraq to rescind its above-mentioned decision;

6. Reaffirms its intention to act in accordance with the relevant provisions of resolution 687 (1991) on the duration of the prohibitions referred to in that resolution, and notes that by its failure so far to comply with its relevant obligations, Iraq has delayed the moment when the Council can do so;

7. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 5 November 1998 (3939th meeting):
resolution 1205 (1998)

By a letter dated 31 October 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹³⁸ the Deputy Executive Chairman of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of resolution 687 (1991) informed the Council that, on the evening of 31 October, the Director of the National Monitoring Directorate of Iraq had informed the Special Commission that Iraq had taken the decision to suspend, stop or cease all activities of the Special Commission, including monitoring, although IAEA would be allowed to continue its monitoring activities that were separate from the Commission.

¹³⁸ S/1998/1023.

By a letter dated 2 November 1998 addressed to the President of the Council,¹³⁹ the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of resolution 687 (1991) informed the Council that the decisions of 5 August and 31 October 1998,¹⁴⁰ by the Government of Iraq made it impossible for the Special Commission to implement its disarmament and monitoring rights and responsibility.

By a letter dated 3 November 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁴¹ the Secretary-General transmitted a communication from the Director General of IAEA on the implications of the decision by Iraq to stop all forms of interaction with the Special Commission. The Director General noted that IAEA had been able to continue its schedule of monitoring inspections, but that the efficiency and effectiveness of the activities were dependent on the continuing availability of assistance and cooperation from the Special Commission.

At its 3939th meeting, held on 5 November 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the three letters in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United States) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Japan, the United Kingdom and the United States, with Brazil, Costa Rica, Portugal, Slovenia and Sweden joining as sponsors.¹⁴²

Speaking before the vote, all members of the Council made statements in support of the draft resolution and called on Iraq to resume its cooperation with the Special Commission immediately. The representatives of Sweden and Brazil also stressed that the primary responsibility of the Council for the maintenance of international peace and security should not be circumvented.¹⁴³

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the best way to overcome the crisis lay exclusively in political and diplomatic efforts alongside the active role of the Secretary-General. Any attempt to resolve the problem by force would have highly unpredictable and dangerous consequences, both for the ability of the United Nations to continue to monitor proscribed military activity in Iraq, and for peace and stability in the region and in the Middle East as a whole.¹⁴⁴

The representative of China stated that there was no doubt that Iraq had to fulfil in a comprehensive manner its obligations under relevant resolutions of the Council, but that the Council also had the responsibility to make a fair and objective assessment in the light of the compliance by Iraq. His delegation was of the view that, regarding some weapon files, conditions were ripe to move to the next monitoring and verification stage.¹⁴⁵

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1205 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous relevant resolutions on the situation in Iraq, in particular resolution 1154 (1998) of 2 March 1998 and 1194 (1998) of 9 September 1998,

Noting with alarm the decision of Iraq on 31 October 1998 to cease cooperation with the Special Commission, and its continued restrictions on the work of the International Atomic Energy Agency,

Taking note of the letters from the Deputy Executive Chairman of the Special Commission dated 31 October 1998 and the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission dated 2 November 1998 to the President of the Security Council, which reported to the Council the decision by Iraq and described the implications of that decision for the work of the Special Commission, and taking note also of the letter from the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency dated 3 November 1998, which described the implications of the decision for the work of the Agency were described,

Determined to ensure immediate and full compliance by Iraq without conditions or restrictions with its obligations under resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991 and the other relevant resolutions,

Recalling that the effective operation of the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency is essential for the implementation of resolution 687 (1991),

Reaffirming its readiness to consider, in a comprehensive review, Iraq's compliance with its obligations under all relevant resolutions once Iraq has rescinded its above-mentioned decision and its decision of 5 August 1998 and demonstrated that it is prepared to fulfil all its obligations, including in particular on disarmament issues, by resuming full cooperation with the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency consistent with the memorandum of understanding signed by the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq and the Secretary-General on 23 February 1998, endorsed by the Council in resolution 1154 (1998),

Reiterating the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Kuwait and Iraq,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Condemns the decision by Iraq of 31 October 1998 to cease cooperation with the Special Commission as a flagrant violation of resolution 687 (1991) and other relevant resolutions;

2. Demands that Iraq rescind immediately and unconditionally the decision of 31 October 1998, as well as the decision of 5 August 1998, to suspend cooperation with the Special Commission and to maintain restrictions on the work of the International Atomic Energy Agency, and that Iraq provide immediate, complete and unconditional cooperation with the Special Commission and the Agency;

3. Reaffirms its full support for the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency in their efforts to ensure the implementation of their mandates under the relevant resolutions of the Council;

4. Expresses its full support for the Secretary-General in his efforts to seek full implementation of the memorandum of understanding of 23 February 1998;

5. Reaffirms its intention to act in accordance with the relevant provisions of resolution 687 (1991) on the duration of the prohibitions referred to in that resolution, and notes that by its failure so far to comply with its relevant obligations Iraq has delayed the moment when the Council can do so;

6. Decides, in accordance with its primary responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security, to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United Kingdom stated, regarding the possible use of force, that it was well established that the authorization to use force given by the Council in 1990 might be revived if the Council decided that there had been a sufficiently serious breach of the conditions laid down by the Council for the ceasefire.¹⁴⁶

The representative of the United States observed that the Secretary-General had expressed his own view that the 31 October decision by the Government of Iraq to halt the activities of the Special Commission was a serious breach and major violation of the memorandum of understanding signed on 23 February. He stated that it was significant that the resolution cited the Iraqi decision as a flagrant violation of resolution 687 (1991) and other relevant resolutions. He also recalled that the President and the Secretary of State of the United States had emphasized that all options were on the table and that the United States had the authority to act.¹⁴⁷

On 19 November 1998, pursuant to paragraph 10 of resolution 1153 (1998), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on the distribution of humanitarian supplies throughout Iraq.¹⁴⁸ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that, despite the increase in the volume of exports of oil, the financial target required for the implementation of the enhanced distribution plan had not been met owing to low oil prices. Bearing in mind the magnitude of the overall humanitarian situation in Iraq, he recommended that the Council extend the relevant provisions of resolution 1153 (1998) for a further 180-day period.

By a letter dated 20 November 1998 addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁴⁹ the Chairman of the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait transmitted a report of the Committee adopted on 20 November 1998. The Chairman informed the Council that the Committee would continue to work towards the effective implementation of all relevant arrangements.

At its 3946th meeting, held on 24 November 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General and the above-mentioned letter in its agenda. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 19 November 1998 from the representative of Iraq addressed to the President of the Council.¹⁵⁰

The President also drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by France, Portugal, Sweden and the United Kingdom.¹⁵¹ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1210 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 986 (1995) of 14 April 1995, 1111 (1997) of 4 June 1997, 1129 (1997) of 12 September 1997, 1143 (1997) of 4 December 1997, 1153 (1998) of 20 February 1998 and 1175 (1998) of 19 June 1998,

Convinced of the need as a temporary measure to continue to provide for the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi people until the fulfilment by the Government of Iraq of the relevant resolutions, including notably resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, allows the Council to take further action with regard to the prohibitions referred to in resolution 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, in accordance with the provisions of those resolutions,

Convinced also of the need for equitable distribution of humanitarian supplies to all segments of the Iraqi population throughout the country,

Welcoming the positive impact of the relevant resolutions on the humanitarian situation in Iraq, as described in the report of the Secretary-General of 19 November 1998,

Determined to improve the humanitarian situation in Iraq,

Reaffirming the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides that the provisions of resolution 986 (1995), except those contained in paragraphs 4, 11 and 12, shall remain in force for a new period of 180 days beginning at 0001 hours Eastern Standard Time, on 26 November 1998;

2. Also decides that paragraph 2 of resolution 1153 (1998) shall remain in force and shall apply to the 180-day period referred to in paragraph 1 above;

3. Directs the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) to authorize, on the basis of specific requests, reasonable expenses related to the Hajj, to be met by funds in the escrow account;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to take the actions necessary to ensure the effective and efficient implementation of the present resolution, and to review, by 31 December 1998, the various options to resolve the difficulties enhanced phase IV of the "oil for food" programme by 2 months to allow Iraq to reach the target for oil sales (S/1998/1103).

encountered in the financial process, referred to in the report of the Secretary-General of 19 November 1998, and to continue to enhance as necessary the United Nations observation process in Iraq in such a way as to provide the required assurance to the Council that the goods produced in accordance with the present resolution are distributed equitably and that all supplies authorized for procurement, including dual usage items and spare parts, are utilized for the purpose for which they have been authorized;

5. Decides to conduct a thorough review of all aspects of the implementation of the present resolution 90 days after the entry into force of paragraph 1 above and again prior to the end of the 180-day period, upon receipt of the reports referred to in paragraphs 6 and 10 below, and expresses its intention, prior to the end of the 180-day period, to consider favourably renewal of the provisions of the present resolution as appropriate, provided that the said reports indicate that those provisions are being satisfactorily implemented;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council 90 days after the date of entry into force of paragraph 1 above, and again prior to the end of the 180-day period, on the basis of observations of United Nations personnel in Iraq, and of consultations with the Government of Iraq, on whether Iraq has ensured the equitable distribution of medicine, health supplies, foodstuffs, and materials and supplies for essential civilian needs, financed in accordance with paragraph 8 (a) of resolution 986 (1995), including in his reports any observations he may have on the adequacy of the revenues to meet Iraq's humanitarian needs, and on Iraq's capacity to export sufficient quantities of petroleum and petroleum products to produce the sum referred to in paragraph 2 of resolution 1153 (1998);

7. Also requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council if Iraq is unable to export petroleum and petroleum products sufficient to produce the total sum provided for in paragraph 2 of resolution 1153 (1998) and, following consultations with relevant United Nations agencies and the Iraqi authorities, make recommendations for the expenditure of the sum expected to be available, consistent with the priorities established in paragraph 2 of resolution 1153 (1998) and with the distribution plan referred to in paragraph 5 of resolution 1175 (1998);

8. Decides that paragraphs 1, 2, 3 and 4 of resolution 1175 (1998) shall remain in force and shall apply to the new 180-day period referred to in paragraph 1 above;

9. Requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Government of Iraq, to submit to the Council, by 31 December 1998, a detailed list of parts and equipment necessary for the purpose described in paragraph 1 of resolution 1175 (1998);

10. Requests the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990), in close coordination with the Secretary-General, to report to the Council 90 days after the entry into force of paragraph 1 above and again prior to the end of the 180-day period on the implementation of the arrangements in paragraphs 1, 2, 6, 8, 9 and 10 of resolution 986 (1995);

11. Urges all States, and in particular the Government of Iraq, to provide their full cooperation in the effective implementation of the present resolution;

12. Appeals to all States to continue to cooperate in the timely submission of applications and the expeditious issue of export licences, facilitating the transit of humanitarian supplies authorized by the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990), and to take all other appropriate measures within their competence in order to ensure that urgently required humanitarian supplies reach the Iraqi people as rapidly as possible;

13. Stresses the need to continue to ensure respect for the security and safety of all persons directly involved in the implementation of the present resolution in Iraq;

14. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Deliberations of 16 December 1998 (3955th meeting)

By a letter dated 15 December addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁵² the Secretary-General transmitted the report dated 14 December 1998 from the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency, and the report dated 15 December 1998 from the Executive Director of the Special Commission concerning their work in Iraq. The report from IAEA stated that Iraq had provided the necessary level of cooperation to enable activities to be completed efficiently and effectively. However, the report from the Special Commission presented a mixed picture and concluded that the Special Commission had not enjoyed full cooperation from Iraq.

At its 3955th meeting, held on 16 December 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letter from the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Bahrain), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Iraq, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 15 December 1998 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Council, transmitting the letter dated 14 December 1998 from the representative of Iraq addressed to the Secretary-

General, enclosing a full report on the activities of IAEA and the Special Commission in Iraq since 18 November 1998 as well as the comments of the Government of Iraq.¹⁵³

At the same meeting, the President further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 16 December 1998 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁵⁴ transmitting a letter dated 16 December 1998 from the Director General of IAEA addressed to the President of the Security Council, informing the President that he had decided to temporarily relocate to Bahrain all IAEA personnel in Baghdad at that time after the decision by the Special Commission to withdraw all of its personnel from Iraq and out of concern for the safety and security of personnel. The President then drew the attention of the Council to letters dated 16 December 1998 from the representatives of the United States and the United Kingdom, respectively, addressed to the President of the Council.¹⁵⁵

In his letter, the representative of the United States informed the Council that the armed forces of the United States and United Kingdom had begun substantial military operations against military targets in Iraq. They were attacking the weapons of mass destruction programmes of Iraq and its ability to threaten its neighbours. He stressed that coalition forces were acting under the authority provided by the resolutions of the Council. Following the liberation of Kuwait from Iraqi occupation in 1991, the Council, in its resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, mandated a ceasefire, but also imposed a number of essential conditions on Iraq, including the destruction of Iraqi weapons of mass destruction and acceptance by Iraq of United Nations inspections. Noting that in subsequent resolutions, the Council had elaborated and reiterated those conditions, the representative underscored that Iraqi compliance with all requirements was a fundamental element of international peace and security in the region. Nevertheless, Iraq had repeatedly taken actions that constituted flagrant material breaches of the provisions, and the Council, on a number of occasions, had affirmed that similar Iraqi actions constituted breaches as well as a threat to international peace and security. He stated that it was his country's view that the Council did not need to state those conclusions on each occasion. On 14 November 1998, the Government of Iraq had committed itself to providing full and unconditional cooperation to the Special Commission, although Iraq had offered those assurances only in the face of a credible threat of force. However, as the report of the Special Commission of 15 December 1998 made clear, Iraq had failed to provide the full cooperation it had promised, and left the Special Commission unable to conduct the substantive disarmament work mandated to it by the Council. Following the repeated, flagrant and material breaches of the obligations by Iraq under resolutions 687 (1991), 707 (1991), 715 (1991), 1154 (1998), 1205 (1998) and others, the coalition had exercised the authority given by the Council in its resolution 678 (1990) of 29 November 1990 for Member States to employ all necessary means to secure Iraqi compliance with the resolutions of the Council and to restore international peace and security in the area.¹⁵⁶

In his letter, the representative of the United Kingdom stressed that his country had, acted on the basis of the relevant resolutions of the Council.¹⁵⁷

At the same meeting, the representative of Iraq stated that, at a time when the Council had been discussing reports submitted by IAEA and the Special Commission on the status of compliance by Iraq, and before the Council had reached any conclusion on the subject, the United States and the United Kingdom had launched their attack against Iraq. Basing their aggression on the report of the Special Commission, he maintained that the United States had once again arrogated to itself the authority of the Council and flouted international law and the Charter of the United Nations. He stated that the conduct of the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission had provided additional evidence of his partiality, lack of integrity and lack of objectivity when he singled out only five incidents out of a total of 300 inspection operations. The representative underscored that the "exaggerated uproar about Iraqi weapons of mass destruction [was] nothing but a great lie; the other lie [was] the allegation that Iraq pose[d] a threat to its neighbours". He stated that with regard to weapons of mass destruction, the Special Commission and IAEA had been operating since April 1991, with cooperation from the Iraqi side, and had completed their essential work in the area of disarmament. He challenged the Special Commission to provide physical evidence that Iraq possessed a prohibited weapon or its components to the Council. Finally, he called on the Council to fulfil its responsibilities as set forth in the Charter of the United Nations and requested an immediate and unconditional cessation of the aggression that was under way against Iraq.¹⁵⁸

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the massive missile and bomb strikes by the armed forces of the United States and the United Kingdom had created a threat to peace and security in the region and beyond. Grave harm had been done to the efforts to effect a post-crisis settlement in the Gulf region and to dismantle the capability of Iraq for weapons of mass destruction and their delivery systems. He stressed that, in carrying out the unprovoked act of force, the United States and the United Kingdom had violated the Charter of the United Nations, the principles of international law and the generally recognized norms and rules of responsible behaviour on the part of States in the international arena. Reiterating that the Council alone had the right to determine what steps needed to be taken in order to maintain or restore international peace and security, his country rejected outright the attempts made in the letters from the United States and the United Kingdom to justify the use of force on the basis of a mandate that had been previously issued by the Council, which provided no grounds for such actions. He maintained that the potential for a political and diplomatic resolution of the Iraqi crisis had not been exhausted and that the crisis had been created artificially, partly as a result of the irresponsible acts of the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission in presenting a report that “gave a distorted picture of the real state of affairs”, and who had then evacuated the entire Special Commission staff from Iraq without any consultations with the Council. He appealed for an immediate end to the use of military force. Finally, he expressed the belief that the Council had a part to play in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, including giving an assessment, in principle, of the unilateral military action.¹⁵⁹

The representative of China reiterated that his country had always advocated peaceful settlement of international disputes and was against the use or the threat of use of force in international relations. The differences that existed between the Special Commission and Iraq on the verification issue could properly be settled through dialogue and consultation. He noted that the leader of the Special Commission had played a “dishonorable role” in the crisis as the reports submitted by the Special Commission had been one-sided and evasive regarding the facts. Finally, he called for the immediate cessation of all military actions against Iraq.¹⁶⁰

The representative of the United Kingdom maintained that the continuing history of concealment and deceit had been the reason why the coalition had reached the point of military action. He reiterated that there was a clear legal basis for military action in the resolutions adopted by the Council. Resolution 1154 (1998) had made it clear that any violation by Iraq of its obligations to allow the Special Commission and IAEA unrestricted access would have had the severest consequences. Resolution 1205 (1998) had established that the decision of the Government of Iraq of 31 October 1998 to cease cooperation with the Special Commission was a flagrant violation of resolution 687 (1991), which had laid down the conditions for the 1991 ceasefire. By that resolution, therefore, the Council had implicitly revived the authorization to use force given in resolution 678 (1990). And the report of the Special Commission had made clear that, despite its undertakings to rescind the decision of 31 October, Iraq had not only failed to resume full cooperation with the Special Commission but had imposed new restrictions on its work.¹⁶¹

The representative of Costa Rica stated that his country had actively supported the use, in all cases, of the means for the pacific settlement of disputes provided for in Article 33 of the Charter. Moreover, Costa Rica had reaffirmed that recourse to the use of force, envisaged as an exceptional measure in Chapter VII, Article 42, of the Charter fell within the sole and exclusive purview of the Council, and that only the Council could authorize collective action of that kind.¹⁶²

The representative of the United States reiterated the points made in the letter of 16 December 1998 that, as a result of the material breaches by Iraq of its obligations under Council resolutions and its own commitments, the coalition had exercised the authority given by resolution 678 (1990). Stressing that the policy of Iraq of unremitting defiance and non-compliance necessitated the resort to military force, he stated that the coalition looked to the highest level of the Iraqi leadership for an immediate demonstration of unconditional compliance with the terms of the Council resolution.¹⁶³

A number of speakers expressed concern about the situation characterized by military action against Iraq, and urged Iraq to comply with all its obligations under the relevant resolutions of the Council.¹⁶⁴ Other speakers deplored the use of military force against Iraq and stressed that, the use of force needed to take place within a multilateral framework and that the Council remained the sole body with legal authority to mandate actions aimed at enforcing compliance with its own resolutions.¹⁶⁵

On 28 April 1999, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council the review and assessment of the implementation of the humanitarian programme established pursuant to resolution 986 (1995), covering the period from December 1996 to November 1998.¹⁶⁶ The Secretary-General concluded that, regardless of the improvements that might be brought about in the scope and implementation of the programme, in terms of both approval procedures and funding levels, the magnitude of the humanitarian needs was such that they could not be met within the parameters set in resolution 986 (1995) and succeeding resolutions, in particular resolution 1153 (1998). The very substantial degradation of infrastructure and the magnitude of the funds required for its rehabilitation was far beyond the funding level available under the programme. There was, therefore, a need for the Council to consider arrangements to allow additional funding through either bilateral or multilateral sources, over and above those made under the programme, still subject to existing financial controls established by relevant decisions of the Council.

On 18 May 1999, pursuant to paragraph 6 of resolution 1210 (1998), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the distribution of humanitarian supplies throughout Iraq.¹⁶⁷ In the report, the Secretary-General reiterated the observations and recommendations contained in his report dated 28 April 1999 on the review and assessment of the implementation of the humanitarian programme.¹⁶⁸

By a letter dated 19 May 1999 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁶⁹ the Acting Chairman of the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait transmitted the report of the Committee pursuant to paragraph 10 of resolution 1210 (1998) on 18 May 1999. The Acting Chairman informed the Council that the Committee would continue to work to ensure the effective implementation of all relevant arrangements under the oil-for-food programme.

At its 4008th meeting, held on 21 May 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the assessment and report of the Secretary-General as well as the letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Gabon) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Argentina, the United Kingdom and the United States.¹⁷⁰ The President also drew the attention of the Council to the following documents: letters dated 2 and 12 May 1999, respectively, from the representative of Iraq addressed to the Secretary-General;¹⁷¹ a letter dated 13 May 1999 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Council;¹⁷² and a letter dated 17 May 1999 from the representative of Iraq addressed to the Secretary-General.¹⁷³

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the problem of the humanitarian crisis in Iraq could not be resolved as long as the sanctions regime remained in force, and that his delegation firmly supported the lifting of the sanctions in connection with the establishment of a new monitoring mechanism in Iraq. Although the Russian Federation was aware of the flaws of the United Nations humanitarian operation, his country would agree to extend it only because it offered some hope of easing, to some extent, the sufferings of the Iraqi people. He condemned the continuing aerial bombing of Iraq civilian and military facilities by the United States and the United Kingdom under the illegal pretext of the no-fly zones, which were created unilaterally, in circumvention of the Council.¹⁷⁴

The representative of the United Kingdom called on the Government of Iraq to cooperate constructively in the implementation of the humanitarian programme to ensure that the full potential of the programme was realized. Regarding the activity in the no-fly zones, he called on Iraq to cease targeting coalition aircraft. He stated that the operations of his country were purely reactive: they did not initiate aggressive action and targeted relevant military facilities only. He stressed that the no-fly zones were necessary in order to limit the capacity of Iraq to oppress its own people and in order to monitor its compliance with its obligations under resolution 688 (1991).¹⁷⁵

The representative of the United States observed that, while the primary responsibility for meeting civilian needs continued to reside with the Government of Iraq, it was entirely appropriate that the United Nations acted to ensure that the benefits of the oil revenues of Iraq be directed to civilian needs. Regarding the no-fly zones, he associated the United States completely with the statement of the United Kingdom.¹⁷⁶

The representative of China reiterated that due to the limitations of the oil-for-food programme, only with the necessary political will on the part of the parties concerned and with the lifting of economic sanctions against Iraq could there be any fundamental easing of the humanitarian situation and difficulties in Iraq. He expressed regret that the United States and the United Kingdom were still bombing civilian targets in the so-called no-fly zone, which had aggravated the humanitarian crisis in Iraq. China demanded that the United States and the United Kingdom halt their bombing missions in the so-called no-fly zone. However, based on the consideration of maintaining basic humanitarian supplies to meet the needs of the Iraqi people, China accepted the present technical roll-over of the programme.¹⁷⁷

The representative of France, noting that the current humanitarian programme was only a partial and temporary response to the problem, expressed hope that the Council would quickly reach an agreement that would make it possible to restore the unity of the Council, resolve the humanitarian crisis, ensure the resumption of normal relations between the United Nations and Iraq and ensure regional security.¹⁷⁸

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1242 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 986 (1995) of 14 April 1995, 1111 (1997) of 4 June 1997, 1129 (1997) of 12 September 1997, 1143 (1997) of 4 December 1997, 1153 (1998) of 20 February 1998, 1175 (1998) of 19 June 1998 and 1210 (1998) of 24 November 1998,

8. Decides that paragraphs 1, 2, 3 and 4 of resolution 1175 (1998) shall remain in force and shall apply to the new 180-day period referred to in paragraph 1 above;

9. Requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Government of Iraq, to submit to the Council, by 30 June 1999, a detailed list of parts and equipment necessary for the purpose described in paragraph 1 of resolution 1175 (1998);

10. Requests the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990), in close coordination with the Secretary-General, to report to the Council 90 days after the entry into force of paragraph 1 above, and again prior to the end of the 180-day period, on the implementation of the arrangements in paragraphs 1, 2, 6, 8, 9 and 10 of resolution 986 (1995);

11. Urges all States, and in particular the Government of Iraq, to provide their full cooperation in the effective implementation of the present resolution;

12. Appeals to all States to continue to cooperate in the timely submission of applications and the expeditious issue of export licences, facilitating the transit of humanitarian supplies authorized by the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990), and to take all other appropriate measures within their competence in order to ensure that urgently required humanitarian supplies reach the Iraqi people as rapidly as possible;

13. Stresses the need to continue to ensure respect for the security and safety of all persons directly involved in the implementation of the present resolution in Iraq;

14. Decides to keep these arrangements under review, including, in particular, those in paragraph 2 above, to ensure the uninterrupted flow of humanitarian supplies into Iraq, and expresses its willingness to review the relevant recommendations of the report of the panel established to review humanitarian issues as appropriate with regard to the 180-day period referred to in paragraph 1 above;

15. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 4 October 1999 (4050th meeting):
resolution 1266 (1999)

At the 4050th meeting, held on 4 October 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in prior consultations, the President (Russian Federation) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by the Netherlands.¹⁷⁹ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1266 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 986 (1995) of 14 April 1995, 1111 (1997) of 4 June 1997, 1129 (1997) of 12 September 1997, 1143 (1997) of 4 December 1997, 1153 (1998) of 20 February 1998, 1175 (1998) of 19 June 1998, 1210 (1998) of 24 November 1998 and 1242 (1999) of 21 May 1999,

Recalling also the report of the Secretary-General of 19 August 1999, in particular paragraphs 4 and 94 thereof,

Determined to improve the humanitarian situation in Iraq,

Reaffirming the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides that paragraph 2 of resolution 1153 (1998), as extended by resolution 1242 (1999), shall be modified to the extent necessary to authorize States to permit the import of petroleum and petroleum products originating in Iraq, including financial and other essential transactions directly related thereto, sufficient to produce an additional sum, beyond that provided for by resolution 1242 (1999), equivalent to the total shortfall of revenues authorized but not generated under resolutions 1153 (1998) and 1210 (1998), 3.04 billion United States dollars, within the period of 180 days from 0001 hours Eastern Standard Time on 25 May 1999;

2. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 19 November 1999 (4070th meeting): resolution 1275 (1999)

On 12 November 1999, pursuant to paragraph 6 of resolution 1242 (1999), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on the distribution of humanitarian supplies throughout Iraq, which described developments in the implementation of the oil-for-food programme.¹⁸⁰ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that at the current stage in its implementations, there was a need to strike a balance between initiatives designed to improve the day-to-day workings of the oil-for-food programme and more wide-ranging innovations required to meet its aims more effectively. By a letter dated 17 November 1999 addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁸¹ the Chairman of the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait transmitted the report of the Committee approved on 17 November 1999.

At its 4070th meeting, held on 19 November 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General and the above letter in its agenda. The President (Slovenia) then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁸²

All speakers expressed support for extending the sixth phase of the humanitarian programme for a period of 15 days, but some speakers stressed the need for a comprehensive omnibus resolution dealing with the situation.¹⁸³ A number of speakers emphasized that the technical extension of the resolution was not linked to the consideration of the new omnibus resolution, and that, therefore, the technical extension should not at all determine the timetable for the conclusion on the omnibus resolution.¹⁸⁴

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1275 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 1242 (1999) of 21 May 1999 and 1266 (1999) of 4 October 1999,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides to extend the period referred to in paragraphs 1, 2 and 8 of resolution 1242 (1999) and in paragraph 1 of resolution 1266 (1999) until 4 December 1999;

2. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 3 December 1999 (4077th meeting): resolution 1280 (1999)

prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 6 of resolution 1242 (1999), and a letter dated 17 November 1999 from the Chairman of the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait.¹⁸⁵ Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United Kingdom) then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by the United States.¹⁸⁶

Speaking before the vote, the representative of France noted that the draft resolution related to the renewal of resolution 986 (1995), commonly known as the “oil-for-food” resolution, which had been regularly renewed by the Council for six-month periods until a recent decision to extend its provisions for 15 days, which had proven impracticable. He stated that the draft resolution would extend the provisions of the resolution for seven days, which was so short that it would make it technically impossible to sell oil and, therefore, to fully implement resolution 986 (1995). The draft resolution therefore seemed to be drafted in such a way as to deliberately render incapable of realization, the measure that it proposed. He maintained that it was true that his delegation had been told that the issue was not about adopting a humanitarian text, but about using the vote to bring pressure to bear on the members of the Council with regard to another exercise and another resolution. He stated that for France, it was inconceivable that the Council take a decision on a text that could not be implemented in practice and which owed its existence to considerations that were alien to its purpose. That was why, given the exceptional and extremely unusual process, France saw non-participation in the voting as the only reasonable position to take.¹⁸⁷

The representative of Malaysia reiterated that his country had supported resolution 1275 (1999) on the clear understanding that there would not be any linkage between its adoption and the negotiations on the draft omnibus resolution on Iraq. Nevertheless, the Council was being asked to vote on another draft resolution extending the oil-for-food programme for one week, which clearly established a linkage as the one-week time frame was arbitrary and was based on three assumptions. The first assumption was that the negotiations among the permanent members of the Council on the omnibus draft resolution on Iraq would lead to an agreement within a week. The second was that, once there was agreement among the permanent members of the Council, the Council would immediately act on that draft resolution. His delegation could not share that assumption as one would expect a full and detailed consideration and negotiation of the draft resolution among all 15 members of the Council before action could be taken. The third assumption was that once the Council reached agreement on the omnibus draft resolution, its implementation could be effected immediately, which was too optimistic a scenario. That was why his delegation considered a one-week extension as an arbitrary and artificial time frame and a transparent attempt to stamp the process of reaching an agreement on the larger issues relating to Iraq. Regarding the omnibus draft resolution, he stated that his delegation believed that it needed to be comprehensive, incorporating a sanctions-lifting plan as the Council strove to ensure that Iraq met its remaining disarmament requirement. Any consideration of the Iraq sanctions regime could not be artificially forced or hurried.¹⁸⁸

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted by 11 votes to none, with 3 abstentions (China, Malaysia, Russian Federation) and 1 Council member (France) not participating in the voting, as resolution 1280 (1999),¹⁸⁹ which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 1242 (1999) of 21 May 1999, 1266 (1999) of 4 October 1999 and 1275 (1999) of 19 November 1999,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides to extend the period referred to in paragraphs 1, 2 and 8 of resolution 1242 (1999) and in paragraph 1 of resolution 1266 (1999) until 11 December 1999;

2. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States stated that despite the unjustified decision of the Government of Iraq to curtail authorized oil production and exports, large quantities of humanitarian supplies continued arriving in the country, and that there had been no disruption in the oil-for-food programme, which was a matter of the utmost importance. The resolution ensured that essential humanitarian assistance could continue while the Council prepared for adoption of a comprehensive resolution on Iraq. Authorization of that resolution would clear the way for action on a full six-month extension of the programme. He called upon the Government of Iraq to resume authorized oil production and exports without delay and to cooperate fully with the programme in the future. In closing, he recalled that the oil-for-food programme was a temporary measure, which was never intended to usurp the primary responsibility for meeting civilian needs in Iraq, which continued to reside with the Government of Iraq.¹⁹⁰

The representative of the Russian Federation reiterated that the very serious humanitarian situation in Iraq dictated the urgent need for the adoption of speedy measures to relieve the Iraqi people. Goods and equipment crucial to civilian life were not being delivered within the framework of the humanitarian programme, and those problems were aggravated by the blocking of a significant number of contracts within the sanctions Committee. In connection with the need for carrying out urgent measures to correct the situation, the Russian Federation had proposed the adoption of a draft resolution extending the United Nations humanitarian operations, which reflected the recommendations of the Secretary-General and the conclusions of the humanitarian panel regarding the improvement of the programme, but the approach had not been taken into account by a number of delegations. He stated that the resolution providing a one-week extension of phase VI of humanitarian operations was not in keeping with the realities of the grave humanitarian situation in Iraq. The practical implementation of such an artificial decision was fraught with many obvious difficulties of a technical nature, which would lead to serious interruptions in the entire humanitarian operation. Bearing in mind the fact that the authors of the draft resolution did not find it possible to take into account even the simple, but extremely logical, amendment proposed by France for a longer “technical” roll-over — which would have allowed the humanitarian programme to remain in operation — the Russian Federation had not been able to support the resolution. In that connection, he stated that the Russian Federation in no way linked consideration of priority humanitarian issues with continuing work on the comprehensive resolution on Iraq. He emphasized that the decision adopted by the Council in no way established the timetable for concluding work on an omnibus resolution. In order to find a way out of the Iraqi deadlock, an agreement needed to be reached on the remaining serious problems and attempts to establish any kind of artificial time limits in that regard were totally inappropriate.¹⁹¹

The representative of Canada stated that his delegation would have preferred to adopt a 180-day roll-over into phase VII. However, Canada was able to support the seven-day extension in order to allow time for negotiations among the permanent members on a comprehensive resolution. He stressed that the temporary, technical roll-overs could not continue indefinitely and if one week proved insufficient, he hoped that serious consideration would be given by all members to a 180-day roll-over the next time.¹⁹²

The representative of the Netherlands stated that normally his delegation would have supported a regular roll-over for a new phase of 180 days; however, the circumstances were not normal. Noting that the issue had been entrusted to the five permanent members half a year previously, he observed that the permanent members were now under pressure from the elected members to hammer out a consensus. Given the circumstances, the Netherlands believed that a one-week extension of phase VI maintained that pressure. A longer extension would remove the pressure, and his country was strongly in favour of maintaining it in the hope that the five permanent members would interpret the signal correctly and bring the comprehensive resolution back to the Council before 11 December. The representative also noted that, unlike the permanent five members, elected members could not afford to not take part in the vote on such an important issue, as they could not explain such behaviour to the delegations that had elected them.¹⁹³

The representative of China noted that the deadlock on Iraq had lasted for almost a year without resolution and with long delays, which was extremely disappointing. However, to attribute the situation indiscriminately to the slow progress in the consultations among the five permanent members was inappropriate. He maintained that the unilateral military strike against Iraq the previous December had been the main reason why the United Nations arms verification programme in Iraq had been suspended. He stressed that the countries that had launched the military strike needed to show flexibility. While China hoped to see an early completion of consultations among the five permanent members and the adoption of a resolution, he stressed that China could not accept one week as the deadline for consultations. He underlined that the Council needed to adopt a responsible attitude and try to elaborate a programme that would truly solve the problem. He expressed the belief that the resolution extending the programme for one week did not help improve the humanitarian situation in Iraq nor advance the consultations among the permanent five on the omnibus text on Iraq, which was why China had abstained in the voting.¹⁹⁴

The representative of Namibia expressed his country's frustration that the continued existence of the oil-for-food programme was threatened by the very same political differences which had created the previous impasse, and urged the five permanent members to speed up their consultations so that the omnibus resolution might be brought back to the Council.¹⁹⁵

The representative of France then responded to the representative of the Netherlands who had stated that he could not understand how one could fail to take a position on such a resolution. He noted that the representative of the Netherlands had faced a dilemma between, on one hand, his interest in humanitarian considerations and in obtaining a six-month extension, and on the other hand, supporting the pressure being exerted by other members of the Council. It was precisely in order to avoid such dilemmas, which gave rise to unreasonable solutions, that France believed such a resolution should not have been put to the vote.¹⁹⁶

The representative of the Netherlands responded by pointing out that non-participation in the voting was extremely rare and that few non-permanent members had ever resorted to that extraordinary measure. He noted that his Minister for Foreign Affairs, in the General Assembly, had suggested that it might be useful to start looking for a way in which permanent members might express their absolutely negative attitude without being obliged to cast a veto. He stated that he had hoped that the Council was seeing an example of that procedure, in which a permanent member said no without casting a veto.¹⁹⁷

Decision of 10 December 1999 (4079th meeting):
resolution 1281 (1999)

At its 4079th meeting, held on 10 December 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 6 of resolution 1242 (1999) and a letter dated 17 November 1999 from the Chairman of the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait.¹⁹⁸ Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United Kingdom) then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by the United States.¹⁹⁹ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1281 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 986 (1995) of 14 April 1995, 1111 (1997) of 4 June 1997, 1129 (1997) of 12 September 1997, 1143 (1997) of 4 December 1997, 1153 (1998) of 20 February 1998, 1175 (1998) of 19 June 1998, 1210 (1998) of 24 November 1998, 1242 (1999) of 21 May 1999, 1266 (1999) of 4 October 1999, 1275 (1999) of 19 November 1999 and 1280 (1999) of 3 December 1999,

Convinced of the need as a temporary measure to continue to provide for the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi people until the fulfilment by the Government of Iraq of the relevant resolutions, including notably resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, allows the Council to take further action with regard to the prohibitions referred to in resolution 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, in accordance with the provisions of those resolutions,

Convinced also of the need for equitable distribution of humanitarian supplies to all segments of the Iraqi population throughout the country,

Determined to improve the humanitarian situation in Iraq,

Reaffirming the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides that the provisions of resolution 986 (1995), except those contained in paragraphs 4, 11 and 12, shall remain in force for a new period of 180 days beginning at 0001 hours Eastern Standard Time on 12 December 1999;

2. Also decides that paragraph 2 of resolution 1153 (1998) shall remain in force and shall apply to the 180-day period referred to in paragraph 1 above;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to take the actions necessary to ensure the effective and efficient implementation of the present resolution and to continue to enhance as necessary the United Nations observation process in Iraq in such a way as to provide the required assurance to the Council that the goods produced in accordance with the present resolution are distributed equitably and that all supplies authorized for procurement, including dual-usage items and spare parts, are utilized for the purpose for which they have been authorized;

4. Decides to conduct a thorough review of all aspects of the implementation of the present resolution 90 days after the entry into force of paragraph 1 above, and again prior to the end of the 180-day period, upon receipt of the reports referred to in paragraphs 5 and 10 below, and expresses its intention, prior to the end of the 180-day period, to consider favourably renewal of the provisions of the present resolution, as appropriate, provided that the said reports indicate that those provisions are being satisfactorily implemented;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council 90 days after the date of entry into force of paragraph 1 above and again prior to the end of the 180-day period, on the basis of observations of United Nations personnel in Iraq, and of consultations with the Government of Iraq, on whether Iraq has ensured the equitable distribution of medicine, health supplies, foodstuffs, and materials and supplies for essential civilian needs, financed in accordance with paragraph 8 (a) of resolution 986 (1995), including in his reports any observations he may have on the adequacy of the revenues to meet Iraq's humanitarian needs and on Iraq's capacity to export sufficient quantities of petroleum and petroleum products to produce the sum referred to in paragraph 2 of resolution 1153 (1998);

6. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council if Iraq is unable to export petroleum and petroleum products sufficient to produce the total sum provided for by paragraph 2 above and, following consultations with the relevant United Nations agencies and the Iraqi authorities, make recommendations for the expenditure of sums expected to be available, consistent with the priorities established in paragraph 2 of resolution 1153 (1998) and with the distribution plan referred to in paragraph 5 of resolution 1175 (1998);

7. Decides that paragraph 3 of resolution 1210 (1998) shall apply to the new 180-day period referred to in paragraph 1 above;

8. Also decides that paragraphs 1, 2, 3 and 4 of resolution 1175 (1998) shall remain in force and shall apply to the new 180-day period referred to in paragraph 1 above;

9. Requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Government of Iraq, to submit to the Council no later than 15 January 2000 a detailed list of parts and equipment necessary for the purpose described in paragraph 1 of resolution 1175 (1998);

10. Requests the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990), in close coordination with the Secretary-General, to report to the Council 90 days after the entry into force of paragraph 1 above, and again prior to the end of the 180-day period, on the implementation of the arrangements in paragraphs 1, 2, 6, 8, 9 and 10 of resolution 986 (1995);

11. Urges all States, and in particular the Government of Iraq, to provide their full cooperation in the effective implementation of the present resolution;

12. Appeals to all States to continue to cooperate in the timely submission of applications and the expeditious issue of export licences, facilitating the transit of humanitarian supplies authorized by the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990), and to take all other appropriate measures within their competence in order to ensure that urgently needed humanitarian supplies reach the Iraqi people as rapidly as possible;

13. Stresses the need to continue to ensure respect for the security and safety of all persons directly involved in the implementation of the present resolution in Iraq;

14. Decides to keep these arrangements under review, including in particular those in paragraph 2 above, to ensure the uninterrupted flow of humanitarian supplies into Iraq, and expresses its determination to act without delay to address the recommendations of the report of the panel established to review humanitarian and other issues in Iraq in a further, comprehensive resolution;

15. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 17 December 1999 (4084th meeting): resolution 1284 (1999)

At its 4084th meeting, held on 17 December 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United Kingdom), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Kuwait, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by the United Kingdom.²⁰⁰

The representative of Kuwait stated that his country fully endorsed the content of paragraphs 13 and 14 of part B of the draft resolution, which addressed the Kuwaiti prisoners of war and detainees, and third-country nationals held in Iraqi prisons. He stressed that the Government of Iraq had exploited the preoccupations of the Council with the issues of disarmament and the suffering of the Iraqi people by procrastinating and failing to cooperate with the Tripartite Commission and its Technical Subcommittee. Second, Kuwait attached great importance to the restitution of Kuwaiti property stolen by the Iraqi regime during its occupation of Kuwait. Third, the possession of weapons of mass destruction by Iraq added to his country's concerns, because Kuwait suspected and feared that the intentions of Iraq were not peaceful and because Iraq had not disclosed its stockpiles of such weapons. The impact of those weapons on the peoples of the region increased the risks faced and posed a threat to security and stability. Fourth, Kuwait fully supported the provisions of part C of the draft resolution relating to the humanitarian situation in Iraq. Fifth, Kuwait hoped that the Government of Iraq would respond positively to the draft resolution and cooperate with the United Nations in implementing it. He stressed that failure to carry out the draft resolution would undermine security and peace in the entire region.²⁰¹

The representative of the Russian Federation noted that the blame for the fact that the work of the Council on Iraq had been deadlocked for a year lay with the force used by the United States and the United Kingdom against Baghdad, circumventing the Council. At that time, the Russian Federation and many members of the United Nations had given their principled assessment of the illegal action and advocated an essentially new approach to the Iraqi issue based on strict compliance with the resolutions adopted by the Council and the Charter of the United Nations. He stated that the chance to prepare such a comprehensive approach appeared after the work of the three panels chaired by Ambassador Celso L. N. Amorim, who had submitted to the Council carefully weighed and realistic recommendations. He stated that his country had advocated the adoption of a draft resolution that would have approved those recommendations. However, the initiative had been blocked by those who wanted to do things "in the old way" and to continue using the burden of anti-Iraq sanctions in order to attain their own unilateral goals, which went beyond the scope of the decisions of the United Nations on post-crisis settlement in the Gulf region. Another very important criterion contained in the recommendations was the need to ensure that the resolution on the new monitoring system be acceptable to Iraq because without cooperation from Iraq any plans or projects would just remain on paper. As a result of lengthy discussions, there was agreement on the establishment of a new monitoring body, which, unlike the former Special Commission, would be based on the norms contained in the Charter of the United Nations and on collegial methods of work and would be answerable to the Council. There had also been agreement on radical improvements in the humanitarian programme for Iraq in the period up to the suspension of sanctions. Additional measures had been prepared with a view to speeding up the solution of problems relating to missing persons and Kuwaiti property. The representative noted that, at the same time, the draft resolution submitted by the United Kingdom remained ambiguous on crucial issues, primarily on the criteria for suspending sanctions. He cautioned that vague wordings on that matter in the draft provided certain members of the Council an opportunity to interpret the draft in such a way as to require virtually full completion of the key disarmament tasks by Iraq and then, on that pretext, to postpone suspension endlessly. However, to be in strict alignment with the earlier decisions of the Council, the completion of such disarmament tasks should entail the final lifting of sanctions, while to suspend sanctions, it should be sufficient simply to note progress being made in the remaining disarmament areas. He also stressed that it was unacceptable to have a provision in the draft about the need for Iraq to demonstrate full cooperation with the new monitoring body. He reiterated that the wording “full cooperation” was extremely dangerous as it was under the pretext of an absence of full cooperation from Iraq that the former Special Commission provoked large-scale strikes by the United States and the United Kingdom against Iraq in December the previous year, circumventing the Council. Therefore, the discredited argument about full cooperation had been removed. A clarification was then introduced to the effect that progress on the remaining disarmament tasks, and not their virtual completion, would be grounds for assessing the conditions necessary to the suspension of sanctions. The reference to Chapter VII of the Charter had also been spelled out more clearly so as not to provide any legal grounds for unilateral actions of force against Iraq contrary to positions held in the Council. However, he maintained that not all of the deficiencies of the draft resolution had been removed and that some hidden dangers remained. He noted that the Council had never authorized the establishment of no-fly zones, nor had it authorized subversive acts against the Government of Iraq. He stressed that if the Council sought new approaches to a long-term settlement in the Gulf, such illegal unilateral actions needed to end. In those circumstances, the Russian Federation could not support the draft resolution, but would not hinder its adoption. He cautioned that the fact that his country was not blocking the adoption of the draft resolution could not be taken to indicate that it had to go along with attempts to impose its forcible implementation.²⁰²

²⁰¹ S/PV.4084 and Corr.1, pp. 3-4.

The representative of Malaysia stated that the draft resolution did not go far enough to incorporate the concerns that had been expressed, was not comprehensive enough, and had left out the important issues of financial modalities. He reiterated the view that a consensus approach would contribute enormously to the success of the exercise. He underlined that the resolution was unclear in respect of the triggering of the suspensions of sanctions, and did not establish a definite benchmark or time frame for the final lifting of the sanctions. He stressed that in his country’s view it was reasonable in the absence of such a benchmark or time frame for there to be an element of certainty and predictability in the renewals of the suspensions based on the positive reports of the new commission. He maintained that the indefinite continuation of sanctions violated the “very spirit and purposes of the United Nations enshrined in its Charter”. He noted that while there was consensus on the crucial need for the return of a new monitoring, verification and inspection system to Iraq, any reinforced system needed to take into account the dignity of Iraq as an independent and sovereign State, as well as the religious and cultural sensitivities of its people. He also expressed regret that the draft resolution persisted in effecting stringent controls that could not but impact negatively on innocent civilians. In conclusion, he reiterated that the draft resolution did not have the right balance, was driven by political, rather than humanitarian, considerations and was aimed at keeping Iraq under continued isolation. Moreover, the language of the draft resolution was ambiguous in some important parts, so that it might lend itself to unilateral interpretation and/or action in its implementation, which needed to be avoided. Finally, the text incorporated only some of the recommendations of the Amorim panels. For those reasons, he stated that Malaysia was unable to support the draft resolution.²⁰³

The representative of China stated that his delegation believed that in the formulation of new comprehensive policies on Iraq, at least three core issues needed to be addressed through a comprehensive resolution that could be implemented: a new inspection commission needed to be established; the remaining Iraqi disarmament issues needed to be defined clearly and precisely and resolved gradually and effectively; and there was an urgent need to relieve the Iraqi people of their tremendous suffering. However, the implementation of the draft resolution was highly questionable. He reiterated the belief that Iraq was under the obligation to implement the relevant resolutions, but that the Council was also under the obligation to implement its own resolutions honourably, give an objective assessment of implementation by Iraq, and gradually lift or at least suspend the sanctions accordingly. Therefore, China was of the view that in the draft resolution, the reinstatement of disarmament inspections and the suspension of sanctions needed to be linked. He suggested that as long as the new commission submitted positive reports to the Council on the

continued cooperation by Iraq in addressing the key remaining tasks, the suspension of sanctions should be extended automatically. He stated that, in a situation where no consensus had been reached, putting a draft resolution to the vote would not help to resolve the longstanding issue of Iraq, and China would therefore abstain in the voting. Finally, he reiterated that it was very clear that the use of force or any other means could not substitute for the role of the Council in the maintenance of international peace and security. He also noted that the “no-fly zone” in Iraq had never been authorized or approved by the Council, and that members concerned needed to immediately cease such actions.²⁰⁴

The representative of France stated that there were two regrettable matters in the draft resolution: the refusal to break the isolation of the Iraqi population and, in that connection, to permit the resumption of civil aviation; and the lack of a real exception to the sanctions for religious activities, such as the Hajj and the Omra pilgrimages, because everything remained in the hands of the sanctions Committee, which was subject to veto by any country. He also stressed that the draft resolution entailed one ambiguous element that needed to be resolved, which was the fact that the details for the financial mechanism had not yet been specified. Iraq had been called upon to accept the return of the inspectors without knowing what arrangement would exist in the period after suspension. In future work, therefore, France would insist that monitoring be based on the reasonable proposal that his country had formulated in writing at the end of July 1999. Resolution 986 (1995) also needed to be suspended and different modalities worked out to allow for freedom of trade and civilian activity in conjunction with the retention of prohibitions on arms and dual-use goods. However, he underscored that the criteria for the suspension and then the lifting of sanctions gave rise to difficulties of interpretation. Paragraph 7 of the draft resolution meant that, once the work programme was completed, it would be possible to lift the sanctions outright. Suspension, a partial and interim measure, was in accordance with the spirit of paragraph 21 of resolution 687 (1991) and needed to come into play, once progress was reported in the implementation of the programme, and not be held up until the work programme was completed. Such progress, in keeping with paragraph 34 of the draft resolution needed to be the criterion for cooperation. Cooperation, in keeping with paragraph 33, was itself the criterion for suspension. A different interpretation of the text made any suspension of the sanctions uncertain. His delegation felt that the text needed to be clarified. He stressed that the draft resolution therefore remained imperfect, which was why France would abstain.²⁰⁵

Several other speakers supported the creation of the United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission (UNMOVIC) and calling on Iraq to cooperate with the United Nations so that sanctions could be suspended and eventually lifted. A number of speakers expressed regret that the Council had been unable to produce a draft resolution that reflected a consensus.²⁰⁶

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted by 11 votes to none, with 4 abstentions (China, France, Malaysia, Russian Federation), as resolution 1284 (1999),²⁰⁷ which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous relevant resolutions, including resolutions 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, 699 (1991) of 17 June 1991, 707 (1991) of 15 August 1991, 715 (1991) of 11 October 1991, 986 (1995) of 14 April 1995, 1051 (1996) of 27 March 1996, 1153 (1998) of 20 February 1998, 1175 (1998) of 19 June 1998, 1242 (1999) of 21 May 1999 and 1266 (1999) of 4 October 1999,

Recalling the approval by the Council in its resolution 715 (1991) of the plans for future ongoing monitoring and verification submitted by the Secretary-General and the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency in pursuance of paragraphs 10 and 13 of resolution 687 (1991),

Welcoming the reports of the three panels on Iraq, and having undertaken a comprehensive consideration of those reports and the recommendations contained in them,

Stressing the importance of a comprehensive approach to the full implementation of all relevant Security Council resolutions regarding Iraq and the need for Iraqi compliance with those resolutions,

Recalling the goal of establishing in the Middle East a zone free from weapons of mass destruction and all missiles for their delivery and the objective of a global ban on chemical weapons as referred to in paragraph 14 of resolution 687 (1991),

Concerned at the humanitarian situation in Iraq, and determined to improve that situation,

Recalling with concern that the repatriation and return of all Kuwaiti and third-country nationals or their remains, present in Iraq on or after 2 August 1990, pursuant to paragraph 2 (c) of resolution 686 (1991) of 2 March 1991 and paragraph 30 of resolution 687 (1991), have not yet been fully carried out by Iraq,

Recalling that in its resolutions 686 (1991) and 687 (1991) the Council demanded that Iraq return in the shortest possible time all Kuwaiti property it had seized, and noting with regret that Iraq has still not complied fully with that demand,

Acknowledging the progress made by Iraq towards compliance with the provisions of resolution 687 (1991), but noting that, as a result of its failure to implement the relevant Council resolutions fully, the conditions do not exist which would enable the Council to take a decision pursuant to resolution 687 (1991) to lift the prohibitions referred to in that resolution,

Reiterating the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Kuwait, Iraq and the neighbouring States,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, and taking into account the fact that operative provisions of the present resolution relate to previous resolutions adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter,

1. Decides to establish, as a subsidiary body of the Council, the United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission, which replaces the Special Commission established pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) of resolution 687 (1991);

2. Decides also that the Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission will undertake the responsibilities mandated to the Special Commission by the Council with regard to the verification of compliance by Iraq with its obligations under paragraphs 8, 9 and 10 of resolution 687 (1991) and other related resolutions, that the Commission will establish and operate, as was recommended by the panel on disarmament and current and future ongoing monitoring and verification issues, a reinforced system of ongoing monitoring and verification, which will implement the plan approved by the Council in resolution 715 (1991) and address unresolved disarmament issues, and that the Commission will identify, as necessary in accordance with its mandate, additional sites in Iraq to be covered by the reinforced system of ongoing monitoring and verification;

3. Reaffirms the provisions of the relevant resolutions with regard to the role of the International Atomic Energy Agency in addressing compliance by Iraq with paragraphs 12 and 13 of resolution 687 (1991) and with other related resolutions, and requests the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency to maintain this role with the assistance and cooperation of the Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission;

4. Reaffirms its resolutions 687 (1991), 699 (1991), 707 (1991), 715 (1991), 1051 (1996), 1154 (1998) of 2 March 1998, and all other relevant resolutions and statements by its President, which establish the criteria for Iraqi compliance, affirms that the obligations of Iraq referred to in those resolutions and statements with regard to cooperation with the Special Commission, unrestricted access and provision of information will apply in respect of the Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission, and decides in particular that Iraq shall allow Mission teams immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to any and all areas, facilities, equipment, records and means of transport which they wish to inspect in accordance with the mandate of the Commission, as well as to all officials and other persons under the authority of the Iraqi Government whom the Commission wishes to interview so that it may fully discharge its mandate;

5. Requests the Secretary-General, within 30 days of the adoption of the present resolution, to appoint, after consultation with and subject to the approval of the Council, an Executive Chairman of the Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission who will take up his mandated tasks as soon as possible and, in consultation with the Executive Chairman and the Council members, to appoint suitably qualified experts as a College of Commissioners for the Commission, which will meet regularly to review the implementation of the present and other relevant resolutions and provide professional advice and guidance to the Executive Chairman, including on significant policy decisions and on written reports to be submitted to the Council through the Secretary-General;

6. Requests the Executive Chairman of the Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission, within 45 days of his appointment, in consultation with and through the Secretary-General, to submit to the Council for its approval an organizational plan for the Commission, including its structure, staffing requirements, management guidelines, recruitment and training procedures, incorporating as appropriate the recommendations of the panel on disarmament and current and future ongoing monitoring and verification issues, and recognizing in particular the need for an effective, cooperative management structure for the new organization, for staffing with suitably qualified and experienced personnel, who would be regarded as international civil servants subject to Article 100 of the Charter of the United Nations, drawn from the broadest possible geographical base, including as he deems necessary from international arms control organizations, and for the provision of high quality technical and cultural training;

7. Decides that the Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency, not later than 60 days after they have both started work in Iraq, will each draw up, for approval by the Council, a work programme for the discharge of their mandates, which will include both the implementation of the reinforced system of ongoing monitoring and verification, and the key remaining disarmament tasks to be completed by Iraq pursuant to its obligations to comply with the disarmament requirements of resolution 687 (1991) and other related resolutions, which constitute the governing standard of Iraqi compliance, and further decides that what is required of Iraq for the implementation of each task shall be clearly defined and precise;

8. Requests the Executive Chairman of the Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission and the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency, drawing on the expertise of other international organizations as appropriate, to establish a unit which will have the responsibilities of the joint unit constituted by the Special Commission and the Director General under paragraph 16 of the export/import mechanism approved by resolution 1051 (1996), and also requests the Executive Chairman, in consultation with the Director General, to resume the revision and updating of the lists of items and technology to which the mechanism applies;

9. Decides that the Government of Iraq shall be liable for the full costs of the Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency related to their work under the present and other related resolutions on Iraq;

10. Requests Member States to give full cooperation to the Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency in the discharge of their mandates;

11. Decides that the Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission shall take over all assets, liabilities and archives of the Special Commission, and that it shall assume the part of the Special Commission in agreements existing between the Special Commission and Iraq and between the United Nations and Iraq, and affirms that the Executive Chairman, the Commissioners and the personnel serving with the Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission shall have the rights, privileges, facilities and immunities of the Special Commission;

12. Requests the Executive Chairman of the Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission to report every three months, through the Secretary-General, to the Council, following consultation with the Commissioners, on the work of the Commission, pending submission of the first reports referred to in paragraph 33 below, and to report immediately when the reinforced system of ongoing monitoring and verification is fully operational in Iraq;

13. Reiterates the obligation of Iraq, in furtherance of its commitment to facilitate the repatriation of all Kuwaiti and third-country nationals referred to in paragraph 30 of resolution 687 (1991), to extend all necessary cooperation to the International Committee of the Red Cross, and calls upon the Government of Iraq to resume cooperation with the Tripartite

Commission and the Technical Subcommittee established to facilitate work on this issue;

14. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council every four months on compliance by Iraq with its obligations regarding the repatriation or return of all Kuwaiti and third-country nationals or their remains, to report every six months on the return of all Kuwaiti property, including archives, seized by Iraq, and to appoint a high-level coordinator for these issues;

15. Authorizes States, notwithstanding the provisions of paragraphs 3 (a), 3 (b) and 4 of resolution 661 (1990) and subsequent relevant resolutions, to permit the import of any volume of petroleum and petroleum products originating in Iraq, including financial and other essential transactions directly relating thereto, as required for the purposes and on the conditions set out in paragraphs 1 (a) and 1 (b) and subsequent provisions of resolution 986 (1995) and related resolutions;

16. Underlines, in this context, its intention to take further action, including permitting the use of additional export routes for petroleum and petroleum products, under appropriate conditions otherwise consistent with the purposes and provisions of resolution 986 (1995) and related resolutions;

17. Directs the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) to approve, on the basis of proposals from the Secretary-General, lists of humanitarian items, including foodstuffs, pharmaceutical and medical supplies, as well as basic or standard medical and agricultural equipment and basic or standard educational items, decides, notwithstanding paragraph 3 of resolution 661 (1990) and paragraph 20 of resolution 687 (1991), that supplies of these items will not be submitted for the approval of that Committee, except for items subject to the provisions of resolution 1051 (1996), and that they will be notified to the Secretary-General and financed in accordance with the provisions of paragraphs 8 (a) and 8 (b) of resolution 986 (1995), and requests the Secretary-General to inform the Committee in a timely manner of all such notifications received and actions taken;

18. Requests the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) to appoint, in accordance with resolutions 1175 (1998) and 1210 (1998) of 24 November 1998, a group of experts, including independent inspection agents appointed by the Secretary-General in accordance with paragraph 6 of resolution 986 (1995), decides that this group will be mandated to approve speedily contracts for the parts and equipment necessary to enable Iraq to increase its exports of petroleum and petroleum products, according to lists of parts and equipment approved by that Committee for each individual project, and requests the Secretary-General to continue to provide for the monitoring of these parts and equipment inside Iraq;

19. Encourages Member States and international organizations to provide supplementary humanitarian assistance to Iraq and published material of an educational character to Iraq;

20. Decides to suspend, for an initial period of six months from the date of the adoption of the present resolution and subject to review, the implementation of paragraph 8 (g) of resolution 986 (1995);

21. Requests the Secretary-General to take steps to maximize, drawing as necessary on the advice of specialists, including representatives of international humanitarian organizations, the effectiveness of the arrangements set out in resolution 986 (1995) and related resolutions, including the humanitarian benefit to the Iraqi population in all areas of the country, and further requests the Secretary-General to continue to enhance as necessary the United Nations observation process in Iraq, ensuring that all supplies under the humanitarian programme are utilized as authorized, to bring to the attention of the Council any circumstances preventing or impeding effective and equitable distribution and to keep the Council informed of the steps taken towards the implementation of this paragraph;

22. Also requests the Secretary-General to minimize the cost of the United Nations activities associated with the implementation of resolution 986 (1995) as well as the cost of the independent inspection agents and the certified public accountants appointed by him, in accordance with paragraphs 6 and 7 of resolution 986 (1995);

23. Further requests the Secretary-General to provide Iraq and the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) with a daily statement of the status of the escrow account established by paragraph 7 of resolution 986 (1995);

24. Requests the Secretary-General to make the necessary arrangements, subject to Security Council approval, to allow funds deposited in the escrow account established by resolution 986 (1995) to be used for the purchase of locally produced goods and to meet the local cost for essential civilian needs which have been funded in accordance with the provisions of resolution 986 (1995) and related resolutions, including, where appropriate, the cost of installation and training services;

25. Directs the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) to take a decision on all applications in respect of humanitarian and essential civilian needs within two working days of receipt of these applications from the Secretary-General, and to ensure that all approval and notification letters issued by the Committee stipulate delivery within a specified time, according to the nature of the items to be supplied, and requests the Secretary-General to notify the Committee of all applications for humanitarian items which are included in the list to which the export/import mechanism approved by resolution 1051 (1996) applies;

26. Decides that Hajj flights which do not transport cargo into or out of Iraq are exempt from the provisions of paragraph 3 of resolution 661 (1990) and resolution 670 (1990), provided timely notification of each flight is made to the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990), and requests the Secretary-General to make the necessary arrangements, for approval by the Security Council, to provide for reasonable expenses related to the Hajj to be met by funds in the escrow account established by resolution 986 (1995);

27. Calls upon the Government of Iraq:

(a) To take all steps to ensure the timely and equitable distribution of all humanitarian goods, in particular medical supplies, and to remove and avoid delays at its warehouses;

(b) To address effectively the needs of vulnerable groups, including children, pregnant women, the disabled, the elderly and the mentally ill among others, and to allow freer access, without any discrimination, including on the basis of religion or nationality, by United Nations agencies and humanitarian organizations to all areas and sections of the population for evaluation of their nutritional and humanitarian condition;

(c) To prioritize applications for humanitarian goods under the arrangements set out in resolution 986 (1995) and related resolutions;

(d) To ensure that those involuntarily displaced receive humanitarian assistance without the need to demonstrate that they have resided for six months in their places of temporary residence;

(e) To extend full cooperation to the mine-clearance programme of the United Nations Office for Project Services in the three northern governorates of Iraq and to consider the initiation of the demining efforts in other governorates;

28. Requests the Secretary-General to report on the progress made in meeting the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi people and on the revenues necessary to meet those needs, including recommendations on necessary additions to the current allocation for oil spare parts and equipment, on the basis of a comprehensive survey of the condition of the Iraqi oil-production sector, not later than 60 days from the date of the adoption of the present resolution, and updated thereafter as necessary;

29. Expresses its readiness to authorize additions to the current allocation for oil spare parts and equipment, on the basis of the report and recommendations requested in paragraph 28 above, in order to meet the humanitarian purposes set out in resolution 986 (1995) and related resolutions;

30. Requests the Secretary-General to establish a group of experts, including oil industry experts, to report within 100 days of the date of adoption of the present resolution on Iraq's existing petroleum production and export capacity and to make recommendations, to be updated as necessary, on alternatives for increasing Iraq's petroleum production and export capacity in a manner consistent with the purposes of relevant resolutions, and on the options for involving foreign oil companies in Iraq's oil sector, including investments, subject to appropriate monitoring and controls;

31. Notes that in the event of the Council acting as provided for in paragraph 33 below to suspend the prohibitions referred to in that paragraph, appropriate arrangements and procedures will need, subject to paragraph 35 below, to be agreed upon by the Council in good time beforehand, including suspension of provisions of resolution 986 (1995) and related resolutions;

32. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council on the implementation of paragraphs 15 to 30 of the present resolution within 30 days of the adoption of this resolution;

D

33. Expresses its intention, upon receipt of reports from the Executive Chairman of the Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission and from the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency that Iraq has cooperated in all respects with the Commission and the Agency in particular in fulfilling the work programmes in all the aspects referred to in paragraph 7 above, for a period of 120 days after the date on which the Council is in receipt of reports from both the Commission and the agency that the reinforced system of ongoing monitoring and verification is fully operational, to suspend with the fundamental objective of improving the humanitarian situation in Iraq and securing the implementation of the Council's resolutions, for a period of 120 days renewable by the Council, and subject to the elaboration of effective financial and other operational measures to ensure that Iraq does not acquire prohibited items, prohibitions against the import of commodities and products originating in Iraq, and prohibitions against the sale, supply and delivery to Iraq of civilian commodities and products other than those referred to in paragraph 24 of resolution 687 (1991) or those to which the mechanism established by resolution 1051 (1996) applies;

34. Decides that in reporting to the Council for the purposes of paragraph 33 above, the Executive Chairman of the Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission will include as a basis for his assessment the progress made in completing the tasks referred to in paragraph 7 above;

35. Decides that if at any time the Executive Chairman of the Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission or the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency reports that Iraq is not cooperating in all respects with the Commission or the Agency or if Iraq is in the process of acquiring any prohibited items, the suspension of the prohibitions referred to in paragraph 33 above shall terminate on the fifth working day following the report, unless the Council decides to the contrary;

36. Expresses its intention to approve arrangements for effective financial and other operational measures, including on the delivery of and payment for authorized civilian commodities and products to be sold or supplied to Iraq, in order to ensure that Iraq does not acquire prohibited items in the event of suspension of the prohibitions referred to in paragraph 33 above, to begin the elaboration of such measures not later than the date of receipt of the initial reports referred to in paragraph 33 above, and to approve such arrangements before the Council decision in accordance with that paragraph;

37. Also expresses its intention to take steps, based on the report and recommendations requested in paragraph 30 above, and consistent with the purpose of resolution 986 (1995) and related resolutions, to enable Iraq to increase its petroleum production and export capacity, upon receipt of the reports relating to the cooperation in all respects with the Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency referred to in paragraph 33 above;

38. Reaffirms its intention to act in accordance with the relevant provisions of resolution 687 (1991) on the termination of prohibitions referred to in that resolution;

39. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter, and expresses its intention to consider action in accordance with paragraph 33 above no later than 12 months from the date of the adoption of the present resolution provided the conditions set out in paragraph 33 above have been satisfied by Iraq.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States stated that the resolution represented a reaffirmation by the Council of its fundamental consensus on Iraq. The vote had not been unanimous but no member had asserted that Iraq had met its obligations under the resolutions of the Council, argued that Iraq had disarmed as required, or said that Iraq had met its obligations to Kuwait or to the families of the missing. He noted that overall the United States supported the resolution because of the provisions regarding three main areas: arms controls, humanitarian assistance and the issues relating to Kuwait. Regarding humanitarian considerations, he noted that the Council had never put any prohibition on the religious practices of the Iraqi people and fully supported the provisions in the resolution to exempt from sanctions air travel by Hajj pilgrims. Still he stressed that no measure in the resolution could be seen as a step towards any broader relaxation of the air embargo imposed under resolutions 661 (1990) and 670 (1990). Regarding UNMOVIC, he stated that the United States expected UNMOVIC to employ objective and fully qualified experts in relevant fields, without undue reference to nationality or past organizational affiliation. As in the past, he expected UNMOVIC to act on behalf of the Council in providing a strong and independent voice requiring punctilious cooperation and compliance. Stating the basic position of the United States, he stressed that, if Iraq fulfilled the key remaining tasks and met the requirements set forth in the resolution, then the Council, including the United States, could decide whether to recognize that cooperation and compliance by suspending sanctions. Similarly, if Iraq met the full range of obligations mandated in the resolutions of the Council, the Council could make a decision regarding the lifting of sanctions. He reiterated that the United States was not seeking an excuse to use force. Before considering suspension, the Council would also need to set guidelines on the means of delivering civilian imports during suspension. The United States attached the utmost importance to the requirement for effective control measures, and would work to ensure that what was eventually adopted would be rigorous. He also stressed that the Council had decided that suspension would be temporary and would require an affirmative decision of the Council for renewal, which would thus not be automatic. Furthermore, if Iraqi cooperation with UNMOVIC or IAEA ceased during suspension, then suspension would automatically end.²⁰⁸

The representative of the Netherlands noted that it had become clear that a consensus was not possible if the Council wished to remain faithful to the objective of establishing a genuine and credible reinforced ongoing monitoring and verification system. He stated that the current argument for holding out for a consensus was that Iraq would be ready to cooperate only if all members of the Council voted for the resolution. However, in the statements made by the Iraqi authorities, his delegation had found no indication at all that Iraq would be prepared to cooperate with the Council other than on the basis of an unconditional lifting of the sanctions, and no member of the Council had shown any readiness to meet that condition. Therefore, it did not make a great deal of difference that the resolution was not adopted by consensus. Article 27 of the Charter of the United Nations described how decisions of the Council were made, and Article 25 stipulated that every Member State of the United Nations was obliged to accept and carry out such decisions. Nothing in the Charter allotted a higher degree of legitimacy to a resolution adopted by consensus.²⁰⁹

The representative of the United Kingdom strongly endorsed the concept of the suspension of sanctions, and saw it as a valuable step towards the lifting of sanctions. He stated that the criteria for suspension were clear and were rooted in the obligations of Iraq under existing resolutions, which gave the international community the necessary reassurance that suspension could occur only if Iraq at last began to act according to the rules of international law. He noted that some had argued that the resolution ought to have been designed to ensure that Iraq accept it, which would have meant abandoning all the previous resolutions and which was not a credible approach for the Council. He stated that the resolution had been adopted, explicitly, by the Council as a whole, in the recognition that relief of sanctions and performance on disarmament had to go hand in hand.²¹⁰

Thematic issues

33. Security of United Nations operations

Decision of 12 March 1997 (3750th meeting): resolution 1189 (1998)

At its 3750th meeting, held on 12 March 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Poland), made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹ The statement reads:

The Security Council recalls its resolution 868 (1993) and expresses its grave concern at the recent increase in attacks and the use of force against United Nations and other personnel associated with United Nations operations, as well as personnel of international humanitarian organizations, including murder, physical and psychological threats, hostage-taking, shooting at vehicles and aircraft, mine-laying, looting of assets and other hostile acts. The Council is also gravely concerned at attacks on and violations of United Nations premises. The Council is concerned that these attacks and the use of force have in some instances been carried out by certain groups with the deliberate goal of disrupting negotiating processes and international peacekeeping activities and hampering humanitarian access.

The Council reiterates its condemnation of such acts. It emphasizes the unacceptability of any acts endangering the safety and security of United Nations and associated personnel, as well as personnel of international humanitarian organizations. The Council urges all Member States and others concerned to prevent and bring to an end all such acts. It stresses that the perpetrators of such acts bear responsibility for their actions and should be prosecuted.

The Council reaffirms the importance of ensuring the safety and security of United Nations and associated personnel as well as the inviolability of United Nations premises, which are essential to the continuation and successful implementation of United Nations operations. In this context, it emphasizes that the host country and others concerned must take all appropriate steps to ensure the safety and security of United Nations personnel and premises. It reiterates that the cooperation of all Member States and others concerned is indispensable for the mandates of United Nations operations to be carried out and demands that they respect fully the status of United Nations and associated personnel.

The Council supports all efforts effectively to promote and protect the safety and security of United Nations and associated personnel. In this context, the Council recalls the Convention on the Safety of United Nations and Associated Personnel, adopted by the General Assembly on 9 December 1994.

The Council pays tribute to all military, police and civilian staff of the United Nations and other personnel associated with United Nations operations, as well as personnel of international humanitarian organizations, for their courageous efforts to achieve peace and to alleviate the suffering of the people living in conflict areas.

A. An Agenda for Peace: peacekeeping

Decision of 28 March 1996 (3645th meeting): statement by the President

At its 3645th meeting, held on 28 March 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Botswana) drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 27 March 1996 from the representative of Chile addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹ which reiterated its position that troop-contributing countries had a right to be heard by the Security Council and stated that Chile would join in the consensus to adopt the statement by the President outlining arrangements for consultation and exchange of information between troop-contributing countries, the Secretariat and members of the Council.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²

The Security Council has reviewed the arrangements for consultation and exchange of information with troop-contributing countries, which were established by the statement by its President made on behalf of the Council on 4 November 1994. The Council has given careful consideration to the views expressed on this question in its debate under the item entitled "An Agenda for Peace: peacekeeping" at its 3611th meeting on 20 December 1995, as well as to the views expressed in debates in the General Assembly.

The Council has noted the wish expressed in these debates that arrangements for consultation and exchange of information with troop-contributing countries should be improved. The Council shares this wish. It considers it essential for troop-contributing countries to be heard. It notes that many of the concerns expressed would be met if the arrangements set out in the statement by its President of 4 November 1994 were fully implemented. It is also of the view that those arrangements can be strengthened further as set forth below.

The Council will therefore follow in future the procedures here set out:

(a) Meetings will be held as a matter of course between members of the Council, troop-contributing countries and the Secretariat for the purpose of consultations and the exchange of information and views; the meetings will be chaired by the Presidency of the Council supported by a representative of the Secretariat;

(b) The meetings will be held as soon as practicable and in good time before the Council takes decisions on the extension or termination of, or significant changes in, the mandate of a particular peacekeeping operation;

(c) When the Council considers establishing a new peacekeeping operation, meetings will be held, unless it proves to be impracticable, with any prospective troop contributors who have already been approached by the Secretariat and who have indicated that they may be willing to contribute to the operation;

(d) The President of the Council will, in the course of informal consultations with members of the Council, report the views expressed by participants at each meeting with troop-contributing or prospective troop-contributing countries;

(e) The existing practice of inviting to these meetings Member States which make special contributions to peacekeeping operations other than troops, that is, contributions to trust funds, logistics and equipment, will continue;

(f) The monthly tentative forecast of work of the Council made available to Member States will include an indication of the expected schedule of such meetings for the month;

(g) Ad hoc meetings may be convened in the event of unforeseen developments in a particular peacekeeping operation which could require action by the Council;

(h) These meetings will be in addition to those convened and chaired by the Secretariat for troop contributors to meet with special representatives of the Secretary-General or force commanders, or to discuss operational matters concerning particular peacekeeping operations, to which members of the Council will also be invited;

(i) Background information and an agenda will be circulated by the Secretariat to the participants well in advance of each of the various meetings referred to above; members of the Council may also circulate information as appropriate;

(j) Interpretation services in all the official languages of the Organization will continue to be available; translation of written documents will continue to be available, if possible in advance of the meetings;

(k) The time and venue of each meeting should, where possible, appear in advance in the Journal of the United Nations;

(l) The Council will append to its annual report to the General Assembly information about these meetings.

The Council recalls that the arrangements described above are not exhaustive. They do not preclude consultations in a variety of forms, including informal communication between the President of the Council or the members of the Council and troop-contributing countries and, as appropriate, other countries especially affected, for example, countries from the region concerned.

The Council will continue to keep arrangements for consultations and the exchange of information and views with troop contributors and prospective contributors under review and stands ready to consider further measures and new mechanisms to enhance further the arrangements in the light of experience.

B. Demining in the context of United Nations peacekeeping

Initial proceedings

Decision of 30 August 1996 (3693rd meeting): statement by the President

At its 3689th meeting, held on 15 August 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the item entitled “Demining in the context of United Nations peacekeeping” in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Germany) invited the representatives of Argentina, Australia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Canada, Colombia, Croatia, Hungary, India, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Ireland, Japan, Malaysia, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Ukraine and Uruguay, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. In accordance with the understanding reached in the Council’s prior consultations, he also extended invitations to the Permanent Observer of Switzerland and, under rule 39 of the Council’s provisional rules of procedure, to Mr. Peter Küng, the head of the delegation of the International Committee of the Red Cross to the United Nations.

The President then drew the attention of members of the Council to a letter dated 24 July 1996 from the representative of Germany addressed to the Secretary-General, transmitting the text of a seven-point action programme on anti-personnel mines, presented by the Federal Minister for Foreign Affairs of Germany, on 18 July 1996.³

At the outset, the representative of Italy underlined the need for the United Nations to have more sophisticated equipment as well as better training focused on detection, recognition and reporting of mines.⁴

The representative of the United States stated that his Government was committed to initiating international negotiations towards a global anti-personnel landmine ban and was consulting with other States on what would be the best forum for negotiations. He stressed that the United States was dedicated to eliminating these weapons, “while taking into account [its] global responsibilities and concern for the safety of [its] soldiers”.⁵

The representative of Indonesia maintained that, under the Charter, demining remained within the purview of the General Assembly, and, thus, the involvement of peacekeeping forces in mine clearance did not in itself warrant a shift of responsibility from the General Assembly to the Security Council.⁶

The representative of the Russian Federation observed that, to an increasing extent, demining was becoming an essential part of peacekeeping operations, and argued that, when necessary, it should be included in the mandate of future operations.⁷

The representative of Botswana expressed the belief that demining should always be given top priority in every peacekeeping operation, and stated that it was important that the demobilization of the combatants and the promotion of national reconciliation should go hand in hand with demining in order to facilitate the early return of civilians to their homes.⁸

The representative of France stated that the action of the Council on the subject needed to be seen against the background of the efforts of the international community to eliminate landmines and humanitarian interventions to alleviate the scourge caused by them, and underlined the importance of better integrating questions linked to mines with all stages of the definition and implementation of the mandates of peacekeeping missions.⁹

The representative of Chile expressed particular concern with the proliferation of anti-personnel landmines, noting that 110 million such mines lay planted and that 2 million to 5 million new mines were laid annually and only 100,000 were removed.¹⁰

The representative of the United Kingdom maintained that the United Nations must draw a clear distinction between mine clearance for the operational needs of peacekeeping operations, which was the responsibility of the Department of Peacekeeping Operations, and other humanitarian demining requirements, which fell under the responsibility of the Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "The difficulties encountered in establishing viable national solutions to mine pollution in countries such as Angola and Cambodia resulted, in part, from the ambiguities in mandates between peacekeepers and humanitarian agencies", he stated.¹¹

The representative of Germany called for a rational delineation of mine-clearing responsibilities and clear hierarchies in decision-making within the United Nations system. However, he added that demining in peacekeeping should not "dogmatically" have to limit itself to the concerns of mission personnel. He stated that the welfare of the local people and their protection from the danger of landmines should also be seen as a possible element of conflict resolution and, thus, a task of peacekeeping in a wider sense.¹²

The representative of Canada expressed the hope that all Member States would be able to take practical steps to demonstrate a commitment to achieving a global ban on anti-personnel mines, and announced his delegation's plan to convene an international conference in Ottawa in order to integrate the efforts of various international actors in developing a comprehensive approach to the landmine issue.¹³

The representative of Ireland, speaking on behalf of the European Union and associated and aligned countries, stressed the need to ensure that when a peacekeeping mandate was being considered, the mine-clearance responsibilities were clearly defined among the Department of Peacekeeping Operations, the Department of Humanitarian Affairs and the parties to the conflict. It was also important that a cost estimate for demining was taken into account at the start of the operation.¹⁴

The representative of Uruguay noted with appreciation that, in the framework of peacekeeping operations, the United Nations had carried out an extensive programme of assistance covering not only demining tasks but also the training of local personnel, the dissemination of information on the danger of mines and activities to abate the effects of mines.¹⁵

The representative of Pakistan argued that the linkage between a peacekeeping operation and a humanitarian programme was of critical importance, and, therefore, future peacekeeping operations should include resources for the early establishment of an integrated demining programme. He also underscored the importance of linking the peacekeeping mine-clearing activities closely to the humanitarian activities from the very beginning.¹⁶

The representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran noted with satisfaction the inclusion in the mandates of several peacekeeping operations of provisions relating to mine clearance work. He stated that the Security Council might consider, when necessary, including mine clearance as part of the functions of peacekeeping operations in the future.¹⁷

The representative of India emphasized “intrinsic and structural differences” between peacekeeping operations and peacebuilding activities, pointing to the constraints of mine clearance by the military, such as limited availability of time and resources and possible duplication with specialized agencies. He maintained that the impact of landmines on the economic and social activities of an affected area made demining an integral part of the post-conflict peacebuilding of a nation.¹⁸

A number of other speakers acknowledged that the negative effects of mines often obstructed reconciliation, peace processes, reconstruction and the reintegration of refugees. In particular, speakers shared the concern that the proliferation of land mines constituted a major problem to United Nations peacekeeping operations in terms of the safety of peacekeepers and their freedom of movement. This was the reason why, in their view, mine clearing had already been part of the mandates of many peacekeeping missions, and that, as appropriate, future peacekeeping operations should play a role in demining activities, including demining training and mine-awareness programmes.¹⁹

At its 3693rd meeting, held on 30 August 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council resumed its consideration of the item on the agenda.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁰

The Security Council has reviewed the issue of demining in the context of United Nations peacekeeping and has given careful consideration to the views expressed in the open debate under the item entitled “Demining in the context of United Nations peacekeeping” at its 3689th meeting on 15 August 1996.

The Council, bearing in mind its responsibilities with regard to United Nations peacekeeping, notes that the widespread indiscriminate use of anti-personnel mines in areas of United Nations peacekeeping operations poses serious impediments to such operations and to the safety of United Nations and other international personnel. Against this background, the Council states the following:

1. Operational demining should be, wherever appropriate, an important element and an integral part of peacekeeping mandates. This will facilitate the implementation of those mandates and better enable the Secretary-General to allocate appropriate resources towards achieving their objectives.

2. The early deployment of mine clearance units will often be important to the effectiveness of a peacekeeping operation. The Council encourages the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations to examine options for achieving such early deployment. It also encourages Member States to examine whether and in what form they might be able to help in this respect.

3. The tasks of, on the one hand, operational mine clearance during peacekeeping operations, which is the responsibility of the Department of Peacekeeping Operations, and, on the other hand, longer-term humanitarian mine-clearance activities, which fall under the responsibility of the Department of Humanitarian Affairs, are different. The Council is, however, aware of linkages and complementarities between different elements of conflict resolution as well as of the need to ensure a smooth transition from demining as a peacekeeping requirement to demining as part of peacebuilding in a follow-up phase.

The Council, thus, is of the opinion that coordination and a clear delineation of responsibilities between the two Departments as well as with regard to other United Nations agencies dealing with demining could be further improved so as to avoid duplication of effort and to guarantee a coherent and integrated approach towards the whole range of short- and long-term demining needs. With particular reference to paragraph 51 of the report of the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations of 7 May 1996, the Council requests the Secretary-General to intensify his efforts aiming in this direction.

The Council emphasizes the importance of coordination by the United Nations of activities related to mine clearance in the context of United Nations peacekeeping, including those by regional organizations, in particular in the areas of information and training.

4. The primary responsibility for demining in the context of United Nations peacekeeping lies with parties responsible for the laying of mines. Parties to a conflict must desist from further mine laying once a peacekeeping operation is established. They are also obliged to facilitate humanitarian and military demining efforts by providing detailed maps and other relevant information on those mines that have already been laid by them and by contributing financially or otherwise to their removal.

5. The international community should intensify, multilaterally or bilaterally, its efforts in assisting those parties to a conflict which have shown their readiness to cooperate with mine clearance, mine awareness and training programmes in the context of United Nations peacekeeping operations. In this connection, the Council welcomes the establishment by the Secretary-General of a United Nations Voluntary Trust Fund for Demining as a necessary and timely mechanism to channel funding to humanitarian demining operations.

The Council appeals to all States to contribute to this Fund as well as to other voluntary funds set up by the Secretary-General for certain peacekeeping operations which contain demining elements.

6. Demining activities should, as much as possible, make use of the appropriate modern mine-clearance technologies and specialized equipment and focus on the creation and strengthening of local demining capabilities; training programmes should attach particular importance to this aspect. Where this would be of benefit to the operational effectiveness of a peacekeeping operation, consideration should also be given to including provision for the training of a local demining capability in mandates of peacekeeping operations.

The Council encourages the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations, given its responsibility for a comprehensive review of the whole question of peacekeeping operations, to continue and intensify its consideration of the operational demining aspects of peacekeeping operations. These considerations might include an analysis of mine-clearance experience in previous peacekeeping operations.

The Council is of the view that the elements outlined in this statement are not exhaustive. The Council will thus keep this issue under review in the context of the establishment of peacekeeping operations and the consideration of specific mandates.

C. Civilian police in peacekeeping operations

Initial proceedings

Decision of 14 July 1997 (3801st meeting): statement by the President

At its 3801st meeting, held on 14 July 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the item "Civilian police in peacekeeping operations" in its agenda.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²¹

The Security Council has established or authorized a growing number of peacekeeping operations which contain both civilian and military components. It takes particular note of the increasing role and special functions of civilian police in such operations.

The Council notes the efforts by the General Assembly and its Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations in carrying out their task to review all aspects of peacekeeping operations, including enhancing the capacity of the United Nations system to accommodate the growing demand for civilian police in peacekeeping operations. It furthermore commends the efforts of the Secretary-General in this regard. The Council encourages States to look for further means to enhance the ways in which civilian police components of peacekeeping operations are set up and supported.

The Council considers that in operations mandated by the Security Council or the General Assembly the civilian police perform indispensable functions in monitoring and training national police forces and can play a major role, through assistance to local police forces, in restoring civil order, supporting the rule of law and fostering civil reconciliation. It sees an increasingly important role for civilian police, among others, in contributing to the building of confidence and security between parties and among local populations, in order to prevent conflict, to contain conflict or to build peace in the aftermath of conflict

The Council encourages States to make available to the United Nations at short notice appropriately trained civilian police, if possible through the United Nations standby arrangements. It welcomes the role of United Nations selection assistance teams in this regard.

The Council underlines the importance of the recruitment of qualified civilian police from the widest possible geographic range to serve in United Nations operations. It also expresses the importance of the recruitment of female police officers to United Nations operations.

The Council encourages States individually or collectively to provide appropriate training of civilian police for international service. It encourages the Secretary-General to provide assistance and guidance to Member States in order to promote a standardized approach to the training and recruitment of civilian police.

The Council underlines the necessity for United Nations civilian police, in accordance with their mandates, to be trained as required, inter alia, to render assistance and support in the reorganization, training and monitoring of national police and to help to defuse tension on the ground through negotiations. The Council furthermore considers it essential that United Nations civilian police contingents contain adequate legal expertise.

The Council underlines the need for close coordination between civilian police and the military, humanitarian and other civilian components of United Nations operations. It encourages efforts by Member States to organize joint training between civilian and military components designated for United Nations operations in order to improve coordination and security for personnel in the field.

The Council expresses its gratitude to those countries which have contributed civilian police to the peacekeeping operations of the United Nations.

D. United Nations peacekeeping: Dag Hammarskjöld Medal

Initial proceedings

Decision of 22 July 1997 (3802nd meeting): resolution 1121 (1997)

At its 3802nd meeting, held on 22 July 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the item “United Nations peacekeeping: Dag Hammarskjöld Medal” in its agenda. The President (Sweden) then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council’s prior consultations.²²

The Secretary-General stated that the draft resolution provided a clear way of honouring the memory of those women and men, military and civilian, including United Nations volunteers, who had lost their lives in the service of peace on United Nations peacekeeping operations.²³

²³ S/PV.3802, pp. 2-3.

The President then made a statement on behalf of the Council expressing gratitude to those who had served the United Nations in the cause of peace and honouring those who had lost their lives.²⁴ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1121 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling that maintenance of international peace and security is one of the purposes of the United Nations as set forth in the Charter of the United Nations,

Noting the essential role of United Nations peacekeeping operations in the maintenance of international peace and security,

Recalling the presentation in 1988 of the Nobel Peace Prize to the United Nations peacekeeping forces,

Recognizing the sacrifice of those who have lost their life in the service of United Nations peacekeeping operations,

Remembering the more than 1,500 individuals from 85 countries who have died in United Nations peacekeeping operations,

1. Decides to establish the Dag Hammarskjöld Medal as a tribute to the sacrifice of those who have lost their life as a result of service in peacekeeping operations under the operational control and authority of the United Nations;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to establish, in consultation with the Security Council, criteria and procedures for bestowing and administering the Medal;

3. Requests Member States to cooperate, as appropriate, with the presentation of the Medal.

International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for such Violations Committed in the Territory of Neighbouring States

Decision of 29 February 1996 (3637th meeting):
resolution 1047 (1996)

At its 3637th meeting, held on 29 February 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the item “International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia; International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for such Violations Committed in the Territory of Neighbouring States: appointment of the Prosecutor” in its agenda.

At the same meeting, the President (United States) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council’s prior consultations.¹ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1047 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 808 (1993) of 22 February 1993, 827 (1993) of 25 May 1993, 936 (1994) of 8 July 1994 and 955 (1994) of 8 November 1994,

Noting with regret the resignation of Mr. Richard J. Goldstone taking effect 1 October 1996,

Having regard to article 16, paragraph 4, of the statute of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia and article 15 of the statute of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for

Decision of 11 August 1999 (4033rd meeting):
resolution 1259 (1999)

At its 4033rd meeting, held on 11 August 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council resumed consideration of the item. The President (Namibia) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council’s prior consultations.² The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1259 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Having considered the nomination by the Secretary-General of Ms. Carla Del Ponte for the position of Prosecutor of the above-mentioned Tribunals, Appoints Ms. Carla Del Ponte as Prosecutor of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia and the International Tribunal for Rwanda with effect from the date on which the resignation of Mrs. Louise Arbour takes effect.

Deliberations of 10 November 1999 (4063rd meeting)

At its 4063rd meeting, held on 10 November 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the items “International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia” and “International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for such Violations Committed in the Territory of Neighbouring States” in its agenda. The President (Slovenia), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Rwanda, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The Security Council also extended an invitation, under rule 39 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Council, to the Prosecutor of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia and the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda.

The Prosecutor of the Tribunals stated that in creating the two Tribunals, the Council had designed a powerful enforcement mechanism of international humanitarian law and that the Tribunals would turn to the Council from time to time when its full weight needed to be brought to bear on those who refused to honour the international obligations imposed on them by Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations. In that regard, the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia had already reported to the Security Council the “total defiance” on the part of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in surrendering people who had been indicted, as well as the recent decision by the Republic of Croatia to withhold its cooperation because of its unilateral decision that the Tribunal had no jurisdiction to investigate the actions of its armed forces in Operation Storm and Operation Flash. In Bosnia and Herzegovina, there were accused who were beyond the reach of the Stabilization Force (SFOR) in Bosnia and Herzegovina. She stated that she therefore needed the Council’s help, as well as the support of national Governments and all other key international institutions. She stressed that it was essential for the success of the Tribunal that States not be permitted to dictate to the independent Prosecutor what events should and should not be investigated, as the power to initiate investigations bestowed upon the Prosecutor by the Council was fundamental. Noting that much of their effort that year had concerned Kosovo,³ she gave an update on the preliminary analysis of the first findings.⁴

All members of the Council made statements expressing appreciation for the work of the Tribunals and the Prosecutor. Most speakers stressed the importance of all States cooperating fully with the Tribunals and that States could not unilaterally suspend their cooperation for any reason whatsoever. Several representatives noted that in creating the two Tribunals, the United Nations had contributed significantly to the development of international criminal law, including the first conviction for genocide and crimes against humanity in Rwanda. A few representatives expressed concern at the delays in the administration of justice as accused persons had been in custody awaiting trial for long periods.⁵

The representative of France stated that in creating the two Tribunals, the United Nations had established the foundations for a genuine international criminal system. He stressed that the cooperation of States with the Tribunals was a legal obligation of every State Member of the United Nations, and States did not have the luxury of suspending their cooperation with the Tribunals. Finally, he noted that the success of the Tribunals and of the Prosecutor also depended upon the soundness of the legal framework within which they carried out their missions. In that connection, France was pleased at the effort made by the Tribunals to improve procedures by drawing from various legal systems for inspiration.⁶

The representative of the United Kingdom reiterated that it was the duty of States to hand over to the Tribunals' custody all those indictees residing in their territory, in accordance with their obligations under the relevant Security Council resolutions. They remained particularly concerned that indictees remained at large in Republika Srpska⁷ and in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. He stated that the Serbian performance had been the least satisfactory of all. Croatia had also been at times dilatory, though at times also responsive about compliance with the court, and noted that the court wanted them to remain in direct communication with Croatia to make sure that it responded. The United Kingdom was particularly insistent that Croatia extradite the indictee Mladen Naletilic to The Hague and make progress on handing over documents on Operation Storm and Operation Flash without delay. He suggested that they had to pay more attention to the fact that the Security Council had a responsibility to ensure that States lived up to their obligations. In the expectation that there would soon be an international criminal court, he also suggested that they ought to discuss further the obligation of the Security Council to make sure that the Statutes were implemented.⁸

The representative of China noted that there was still room for improvement in the work of the Tribunals, inter alia, the disputes between the States and the Tribunals in the field of cooperation. He reiterated that both Tribunals were established by Security Council resolutions and the countries concerned needed to cooperate with them, in accordance with the relevant Security Council resolutions, the Statutes of the Tribunals, and their national laws. He also stated that the Tribunals, in requesting cooperation from the States concerned, also needed to take into consideration the public interests and security of those countries, and respect the national laws of those States. Failing that, the Tribunals would continue to face daunting tasks in the future. He expressed the hope that the Tribunal's work would be professional, objective, impartial and free from any political interference.⁹

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that his country supported the demands made on all States to comply with international commitments to cooperate with the Tribunals. In regard to the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, however, all problems relating thereto needed to be resolved through direct cooperation between the parties and the Tribunal, as set forth in Security Council resolutions and in the Statute of the Tribunal. He stressed that indictees should not be detained without the consent of the State in whose territory they were found, nor should it result from the undue coercion of those States. Russia was categorically opposed to sealed indictments. That practice had occurred in connection with the Stabilization Force in Bosnia and went beyond the mandate of such forces. He expressed serious doubts about the propriety of the "so-called sealed lists of indictees" as such practices were contrary to the Statute of the Tribunal and to its rules of procedure. He maintained that the authorities of the States concerned and the indictees themselves were thereby deprived of the opportunity to demonstrate that they were willing to cooperate with the Tribunal. He underscored that every action taken to detain a person accused of war crimes needed to be considered primarily from the point of view of how it might affect international efforts to stabilize the situation in the region and move the peace process forward. He noted that in the recent work of the Tribunal there had been serious instances in which that principle had been allowed to slide, including the indictment of the leader of Serbia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. Such decisions destabilized the situation in Bosnia, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the entire region and were an additional hindrance to moving the Bosnia and Kosovo settlement process forward. As for the activities of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia in Kosovo, they needed to be objective and strictly in accordance with the decisions of the Council, including resolution 1244 (1999), and with the Statute of the Tribunal. He noted that the Tribunal had clearly not been able to achieve objectivity, as to date it had focused primarily on investigating crimes committed against Albanians. Therefore, the International Criminal Tribunal needed to actively investigate the scale of the atrocities committed by Kosovo Albanian extremists against Serbs and other non-Albanian peoples in Kosovo, because otherwise there would be grounds for accusing the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia of double standards, which would not enhance the effectiveness of its work.¹⁰

The representative of the United States maintained that one of the greatest challenges confronting the Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia was obtaining custody of indictees still at large. Serbia had made this difficult to achieve by offering de facto sanctuary to indicted fugitives. He stated that the Security Council needed to stand firm in its insistence that Serbia transfer indictees, including the “Vukovar Three”, General Ratko Mladic, “Arkan” and ultimately, Slobodan Milosevic and his co-indictees. The United States also believed that it was imperative that Radovan Karadzic face justice before the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia. He stressed that those indictees not yet in custody needed to understand that there was no “safe haven” for them, and the United States thus did not agree with some of the points made by the Russian representative. While welcoming recent cooperation on one important case, he also urged the Government of Croatia to comply promptly with the Tribunal’s request for cooperation on Operations Storm and Flash. In conclusion, he stated that his delegation would support measures in the Council that would be effective in improving compliance with the orders of the Tribunals.¹¹

The representative of Slovenia stated that the real question before the Council was whether and what kind of additional decisions by the Council might be necessary. In the opinion of his delegation, it would be important for the Council to start a process of further, more detailed consideration of which steps were to be taken next. He stressed that the Security Council had the responsibility to provide support and strengthen the effectiveness of the judicial bodies it had created.¹²

The Prosecutor of the International Tribunals intervened a second time to respond to points raised by the members of the Council. She refuted the assertion that a one-sided investigations was being carried out in Kosovo. She assured members of the Council that her Office was undertaking investigation in which the accused were not only Serbs, but also Muslims and members of the Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA). In that regard, she noted that the difficulty in investigating KLA suspects arose from the attitude of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and Serbia. Many Serbian victims involved in their investigations had taken refuge in Serbia, where the International Tribunal had no access, having had to close their office in Belgrade. Regarding the sealed indictments, it was true that they were indictments that were not made public. She maintained that in national systems no indictments were published on the Internet or in the press before they were executed, and the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia was working along the same lines. She also stated that her predecessor had found that investigative method very important and had received the blessing of the Trial Chamber and the Appeals Chambers. Juridically and judicially it was provided for in the rules and their Statutes. She stated that she was ready to discuss the sealed indictments with the States concerned, but only after those States had arrested all the individuals still at large.¹³

36. Signature of the African Nuclear-Weapon-Free Zone Treaty (The Treaty of Pelindaba)

Initial proceedings

Decision of 12 April 1996 (3651st meeting): statement by the President

At its 3651st meeting, held on 12 April 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the item “Signature of the African Nuclear-Weapon-Free Zone Treaty (The Treaty of Pelindaba)” in its agenda. The President (Chile) then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 12 April 1996 from the representative of Egypt addressed to the Secretary-General,¹ which transmitted the text of the Cairo Declaration, adopted on the occasion of the signature of the African Nuclear-Weapon-Free Zone Treaty (The Treaty of Pelindaba) by the Ministers for Foreign Affairs and heads of delegation attending the ceremony held in Cairo, Egypt, on 11 April 1996, on the occasion of the signing of the Treaty.

At the same meeting the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²

The Security Council notes with deep satisfaction the signature of the African Nuclear-Weapon-Free Zone Treaty (The Treaty of Pelindaba) on 11 April 1996 in Cairo and notes further the adoption of the Cairo Declaration on that occasion.

This historic event marks a successful formalization of the commitment undertaken thirty-two years ago when the leaders of Africa adopted in July 1964 in Cairo the pioneering resolution of the first ordinary session of the Assembly of the Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity, which declared Africa a denuclearized zone.

The Council considers that the signing of the Treaty by more than forty African countries, as well as the signing of the relevant protocols to the Treaty by the majority of the nuclear-weapon States, constitute important steps towards the effective and early implementation of the Treaty. To that end it emphasizes the importance of early ratification of the Treaty with a view to securing its rapid entry into force.

The Council, reaffirming the statement made by its President on behalf of members of the Council at the meeting held at the level of heads of State and Government on 31 January 1992 that the proliferation of all weapons of mass destruction constitutes a threat to international peace and security, considers that the signature of the Treaty of Pelindaba constitutes an important contribution by the African countries to the maintenance of international peace and security.

The Council seizes this occasion to encourage such regional efforts, and stands ready to support efforts on the international and regional level aimed at achieving the universality of the nuclear non-proliferation regime.

37. Protection for humanitarian assistance to refugees and others in conflict situations

Initial proceedings

Deliberations of 21 May 1997 (3778th meeting)

At its 3778th meeting, held on 21 May 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the item entitled “Protection for humanitarian assistance to refugees and others in conflict situations” in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Republic of Korea), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Albania, Argentina, Armenia, Azerbaijan, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Brazil, Burundi, Canada, Cuba, Germany, India, Iraq, Italy, Malaysia, the Netherlands, Norway, Pakistan, Rwanda, Solomon Islands, Slovenia, Ukraine and Zimbabwe, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The Council also invited the Director of the Liaison Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), the Deputy Executive Director of the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), the head of the delegation of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), and the Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs and Emergency Relief Coordinator, under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure.

In their statements, participants covered a number of general topics, including, inter alia, the changing character of armed conflicts; international security, humanitarian law and human rights; and the interrelationship between political and humanitarian action. Most delegations stressed that humanitarian crises could be solved only if the underlying political crises were also addressed. They noted the increasing number of intra-State conflicts, which generated large numbers of refugees and humanitarian issues, often as a result of deliberate actions. Speakers further stressed the importance of coordination between the political, military and humanitarian aspects of any intervention in a crisis and between different international agencies. Several delegations pointed out that the Council should insist on strict compliance with the international legal instruments regulating the issues of human rights and international humanitarian law. The Council should also ensure that the parties found in violation of their obligations under those instruments bore full responsibility for their acts. In that connection, many speakers pointed out that United Nations peacekeeping operations, which might be required to protect humanitarian assistance, needed to have a clear and appropriate mandate, under Chapter VII of the Charter, if needed, as well as the adequate resources for its fulfillment.¹ A number of speakers expressed the view that the 1994 International Convention on the Safety of United Nations and Associated Personnel should be expanded so as to cover all relief workers; otherwise additional international instruments to that effect should be adopted.²

Several delegations noted that invocation of Chapter VII or the use of armed forces often made the maintenance of political neutrality and impartiality very difficult.³

Several delegations, while noting the importance of sanctions, stressed that they should be clearly aimed at ending the conflicts and be well-coordinated, respected and monitored.⁴

The representative of China expressed the view that the invocation of Chapter VII or the authorization of the use of force would more often complicate problems in peacekeeping and humanitarian assistance. He also expressed the view, also repeated by Cuba, that the Council should be mainly involved with political and security-related issues and that humanitarian operations were outside its purview.⁵

Decision of 19 June 1997 (3790th meeting): statement by the President

At its 3790th meeting, held on 19 June 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Russian Federation) made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶

The Security Council has considered the matter of protection for humanitarian assistance to refugees and others in conflict situations and has given careful consideration to the views expressed in the debate on the matter at its 3778th meeting on 21 May 1997.

The Council notes that massive displacement of civilian populations in conflict situations may pose a serious challenge to international peace and security. The Council, in seeking protection for humanitarian assistance to refugees and others in conflict situations, underlines the importance of pursuing a coordinated and comprehensive approach in accordance with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations.

The Council expresses its grave concern at the recent increase in attacks or use of force in conflict situations against refugees and other civilians, in violation of the relevant rules of international law, including those of international humanitarian law. The Council reiterates its condemnation of such acts and once again calls upon all those concerned to comply strictly with the relevant rules of international law. In particular, it calls upon all parties concerned to ensure the safety of refugees, displaced persons and other civilians, and guarantee the unimpeded and safe access of United Nations and other humanitarian personnel to those in need.

The Council also expresses its grave concern at all attacks or use of force against United Nations and other personnel associated with United Nations operations, as well as personnel of humanitarian organizations, in violation of the relevant rules of international law, including those of international humanitarian law. In this context, the Council recalls its resolution 868 (1993) and the statement by its President of 12 March 1997. It also recalls the Convention on the Safety of United Nations and Associated Personnel adopted by the General Assembly on 9 December 1994. In this context, it calls upon all parties concerned to ensure the safety and security of these personnel as well as personnel of humanitarian organizations, and encourages all States to consider ways and means to strengthen the protection of such personnel.

The Council reminds all States and others concerned of the need to bring to justice those who violate international humanitarian law. In this context, it recalls the resolution on the establishment of an international criminal court adopted by the General Assembly on 17 December 1996.

The Council supports further exploration of ways and means by which the international community may enhance the compliance by parties concerned with the relevant rules of international law, including those of international humanitarian law.

The Council encourages States to consider acceding to the relevant international conventions designed to address the problems of refugees.

The Council underlines the importance of ensuring clear, appropriate and realistic mandates to be implemented in an impartial manner as well as adequate resources for United Nations peacekeeping operations. In this context, the Council, in establishing or authorizing an operation to protect humanitarian assistance to refugees and others in conflict situations, reaffirms the principles of full respect for the sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity of the States concerned. The Council also underlines the importance of ensuring the proper discharge of the mandates conferred upon peacekeeping operations.

The Council stresses the importance of ensuring closer coordination between the relevant United Nations bodies and other international agencies, acting in accordance with their own mandates and status, with a view to effectively providing or protecting humanitarian assistance to those in need. In this context, the Council encourages an enhanced role for the Special Representatives of the Secretary-General in coordination to this end.

The Council stresses the importance of the activities of the relevant United Nations bodies, agencies and other international humanitarian organizations and the need for these activities to continue to be carried out in accordance with the principles of humanity, neutrality and impartiality of humanitarian assistance.

The Council also stresses the importance of crisis prevention, including by addressing the root causes of such crises. It therefore encourages the Secretary-General and all States to look further into practical ways to enhance the United Nations capacity and capability in this regard.

The Council encourages the Secretary-General to study further how to improve the protection for humanitarian assistance to refugees and others in conflict situations.

Decision of 29 September 1998 (3933rd meeting): statement by the President

On 22 September 1998, in response to the statement by the President of 19 June 1997, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on protection for humanitarian assistance to refugees and others in conflict situations.⁷ In his report, the Secretary-General made recommendations on accession to international law instruments; dissemination and advocacy of humanitarian principles; mechanisms to ensure compliance with international law; international solidarity and support for host States; measures to improve security and access; safety of humanitarian personnel; Security Council involvement; and effective coordination.

At its 3932nd meeting, held on 29 September 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Sweden), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Argentina, Austria, Azerbaijan, Canada, Indonesia, Norway, Pakistan and the Republic of Korea, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.⁸ The Council also invited the Deputy Executive Director of the United Nations Children's Fund, the Director of the Liaison Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and the head of the delegation of the International Committee of the Red Cross, under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure.

Introducing the report of the Secretary-General, the Deputy Secretary-General noted that the phenomenon of the direct targeting of civilians and the use of scorched-earth policies were not new, but the scale of those atrocities and of human suffering had reached unprecedented levels. Citing the cases of Afghanistan, Kosovo⁸ and the Democratic Republic of the Congo, she underscored the fact that the effectiveness of humanitarian work was minimized when civilians were targeted and access to humanitarian assistance was denied. In that regard, the Deputy Secretary-General stated there was a dramatic need to rethink what was meant by humanitarian action in today's war zones and to reformulate what was required to protect the well-being of the civilian population. It was the responsibility of the Security Council, she said, to be "bold, committed and determined" when confronted by such crises. The best support the Council could lend to humanitarian agencies was through its own role of securing peace — there was no substitute for ending conflict, stopping the abuses and generating the conditions for lasting peace. The disrespect for basic humanitarian norms also imperiled relief workers, as was clear by the number of deaths this year of United Nations humanitarian peacekeepers. She drew attention to two of the recommendations suggested in the report of the Secretary-General to enhance protection of refugees and relief workers: holding perpetrators of crimes against humanity accountable, and in that regard the rapid establishment of the International Criminal Court; and holding combatants financially responsible when civilians were deliberately targeted, through a trust fund created for that purpose.⁹

A number of speakers made statements generally supporting the recommendations of the Secretary-General. Most speakers stressed the importance of respect by all parties of international humanitarian law and the need to facilitate the provision of humanitarian assistance and to ensure the safety of those providing it. Regarding United Nations peacekeeping forces, many speakers stressed that the mandate needed to be clearly defined and appropriate to the situation and the operation equipped with the necessary resources to accomplish the mission. Several representatives also stressed the importance of better coordination between United Nations instruments.¹⁰

The representative of Brazil urged the application of Article 65 of the Charter, which established a basis for further cooperation between the Economic and Social Council and the Security Council.¹¹

At its 3933rd meeting, held on 29 September 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council again included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda.¹² Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Sweden), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Argentina, Austria, Azerbaijan, Canada, Indonesia, Norway, Pakistan and the Republic of Korea, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹³

The Security Council recalls the statement by its President of 19 June 1997 concerning protection for humanitarian assistance to refugees and others in conflict situations.

The Council welcomes the report of the Secretary-General on protection for humanitarian assistance to refugees and others in conflict situations and notes the recommendations contained therein.

The Council notes that several of the recommendations contained in the report coincide with recommendations made in the report entitled 'The causes of conflict and the promotion of durable peace and sustainable development in Africa.

The Council reaffirms the importance of pursuing a coordinated and comprehensive approach, in accordance with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and principles and provisions of international law, in improving protection for humanitarian assistance to refugees and others in conflict situations.

The Council condemns the attacks or use of force in conflict situations against refugees and other civilians, in violation of the relevant rules of international law, including those of international humanitarian law.

The Council likewise condemns all attacks or use of force against United Nations and other personnel associated with United Nations operations, as well as personnel of humanitarian organizations, in violation of international law, including international humanitarian law. In this context, the Council recalls the statement by its President of 12 March 1997 as well as other relevant statements and decisions. It also recalls the Convention on the Safety of United Nations and Associated Personnel adopted by the General Assembly on 9 December 1994.

The Council affirms its intention to review thoroughly and promptly the recommendations of the Secretary-General with a view to taking steps consistent with its responsibilities under the Charter and, in this context, notes the views expressed in the debate on the matter at its 3932nd meeting on 29 September 1998.

Deliberations of 10 November 1998 (3942nd meeting)

At its 3942nd meeting, held on 10 November 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (United States) extended an invitation to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees under rule 39 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure.

The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees highlighted the importance of political support for humanitarian action. On Africa, she expressed the view that given the complex interrelated nature of the problems, the search for solutions must have a strong regional approach and address the issue of forced population movement. Outlining the areas on which joint efforts on conflict resolution and humanitarian action could be focused, she stressed that when dealing with potential conflicts, human displacement should not be overlooked; focus needed to be kept on the relation between security problems and humanitarian situations; and more attention needed to be paid to post-conflict situations.¹⁴

The representative of the Russian Federation noted that statements had been made that the humanitarian crisis in a given country in itself was already sufficient grounds for unilateral armed intervention. While stressing that this was a "totally unacceptable approach", he asked what the consequences might be for the humanitarian situation and for operations of humanitarian agencies.¹⁵

The representative of China stressed the need to take care not to politicize the question of refugees, which would hinder the settlement of the question.¹⁶

Other members of the Council made statements and asked questions, which included, inter alia, on how to bridge the gap between the traditional UNHCR mandate and the Council's responsibility for peace and security; whether there were sufficient assurances for the protection of humanitarian agencies as they delivered humanitarian assistance to refugees; and what measures were being taken to ensure that assistance meant for bona fide refugees benefited them and not armed elements.¹⁷

The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees then responded to questions and points raised by the members of the Council.¹⁸

38. The responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security

Initial proceedings

Decision of 14 May 1998 (3881st meeting): statement by the President

At its 3881st meeting, held on 14 May 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the item “The responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security”.

At the same meeting, the President (Kenya), made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹

The Security Council strongly deplores the three underground nuclear tests that India conducted on 11 May 1998, and the two further tests conducted on 13 May 1998 despite overwhelming international concern and protests. The Council strongly urges India to refrain from any further tests. It is of the view that such testing is contrary to the de facto moratorium on the testing of nuclear weapons or other nuclear explosive devices and to global efforts towards nuclear non-proliferation and nuclear disarmament. The Council also expresses its concern at the effects of this development on peace and stability in the region.

The Council affirms the crucial importance of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons and the Comprehensive Nuclear-Test-Ban Treaty. The Council appeals to India, and all other States which have not yet done so, to become parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons and to the Comprehensive Nuclear-Test-Ban Treaty without delay and without conditions. The Council also encourages India to participate, in a positive spirit, in the proposed negotiations with other States for a fissile-material cut-off treaty in Geneva with a view to reaching early agreement.

With a view to preventing an escalation in the arms race, in particular with regard to nuclear weapons and their delivery systems, and to preserving peace in the region, the Council urges States to exercise maximum restraint. The Council underlines the fact that the sources of tension in South Asia should be eliminated only through dialogue and not by military build-up.

The Council reiterates the statement by its President of 31 January 1992, in which it was stated, inter alia, that the proliferation of all weapons of mass destruction constituted a threat to international peace and security.

Decision of 29 May 1998 (3888th meeting): statement by the President

The Security Council strongly deplores the underground nuclear tests that Pakistan conducted on 28 May 1998, despite overwhelming international concern and calls for restraint. Reaffirming the statement by its President of 14 May 1998, on Indian nuclear tests of 11 and 13 May, the Council strongly urges India and Pakistan to refrain from any further tests. It is of the view that testing by India and then by Pakistan is contrary to the de facto moratorium on the testing of nuclear weapons or other nuclear explosive devices, and to global efforts towards nuclear non-proliferation and nuclear disarmament. The Council also expresses its concern at the effects of this development on peace and stability in the region.

The Council reaffirms the crucial importance of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons and the Comprehensive Nuclear-Test -Ban Treaty. The Council appeals to India and Pakistan, and all other States which have not yet done so, to become parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons and to the Comprehensive Nuclear-Test-Ban Treaty, without delay and without conditions. The Council also encourages India and Pakistan to participate, in a positive spirit, in the proposed negotiations with other States for a fissile-material cut-off treaty in Geneva with a view to reaching early agreement.

The Council calls upon all parties to exercise maximum restraint and to take immediate steps to reduce and remove tensions between them. The Council reaffirms that the sources of tension in South Asia should be reduced and eliminated only through peaceful dialogue and not by the use of force or other military means.

The Council urges India and Pakistan to resume the dialogue between them on all outstanding issues, including all those that the parties have already discussed, especially matters concerning peace and security, in order to remove the tensions between them and to enhance their economic and political cooperation. The Council calls upon India and Pakistan to avoid any steps or statements that could lead to further instability or impede their bilateral dialogue.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 6 June 1998 (3890th meeting):
resolution 1172 (1998)

At its 3890th meeting, held on 6 June 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Portugal), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Argentina, Australia, Canada, Egypt, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Mexico, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, the Republic of Korea, Ukraine and the United Arab Emirates, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Costa Rica, Japan, Slovenia and Sweden.³

At the same meeting, the President also drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 1 June 1998 from the representative of the United Arab Emirates addressed to the Secretary-General;⁴ a letter dated 2 June 1998 from the representative of the United Kingdom addressed to the Secretary-General;⁵ a letter dated 2 June 1998 from the representative of the Philippines addressed to the Secretary-General;⁶ a letter dated 3 June 1998 from the representative of Belarus addressed to the Secretary-General;⁷ and a letter dated 5 June 1998 from the representatives of China, France, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States addressed to the President of the Security Council.⁸

At the same meeting, the President further drew attention to a letter dated 4 June 1998 from the representative of India addressed to the President of the Council,⁹ stating that the tests conducted by India were not directed against any country, nor had India broken any treaty obligation by conducting the tests. By that letter, the representative of India also asked several questions regarding the draft resolution, including, inter alia, on what basis the Council reserved its readiness to consider further action, contingent on the implementation of the resolution, when no Charter provision or treaty obligation had been breached by those to whom it was addressed. The letter also stated that the tests conducted by India were not directed against any country and were a defensive measure and noted that the right to take measures in self-defence was an inherent right of Member States under the Charter.

The representative of Japan stated that there was a serious danger that the tensions in South Asia could heighten further and escalate to a nuclear confrontation. There was also a danger that the nuclear non-proliferation regime itself was being threatened and that the international community could drift into an uncontrollable world of nuclear proliferation. He stressed that the Council, which was entrusted with the primary responsibility to maintain international peace and security, was duty-bound to take action to fulfil its responsibility under the Charter. He maintained that the international regime for nuclear non-proliferation, with the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons and the Comprehensive Nuclear-Test-Ban Treaty regimes, needed to be maintained at all costs, for that was the only guarantee that could prevent nuclear weapons from spreading on the globe. It was out of that conviction that Japan had lodged strong protests with both India and Pakistan and had frozen its economic assistance for new projects. The representative of Japan further stated that his delegation was firmly convinced that through the draft resolution the Council needed to demonstrate its grave concern about the challenge that the nuclear tests conducted by India and Pakistan constituted to international efforts aimed at strengthening the global regime of the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons, and needed to urge them to become parties to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and the Comprehensive Nuclear-Test-Ban Treaty without delay or conditions. It was also the considered view of Japan that in parallel with efforts to promote the international regime for non-proliferation, steady progress for nuclear disarmament was essential for a safer world.¹⁰

The Russian Federation informed the Council of the results of the meeting of the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the United Kingdom, China, the Russian Federation, the United States and France, held in Geneva on 4 June, which had then been endorsed by the Council. Having condemned the nuclear tests carried out by India and Pakistan, the five permanent members of the Council had firmly stated that no threat to stability should come out of South Asia and the conflict between India and Pakistan should not develop into a nuclear scenario. The five Ministers had called on both countries to refrain from carrying out new nuclear tests, from the deployment of nuclear weapons and nuclear-capable missiles and from the production of fissile material. They had also appealed to Delhi and Islamabad to adhere to the Comprehensive Nuclear-Test-Ban Treaty and to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, based on the fact that India and Pakistan, in accordance with those treaties, did not have the status of nuclear-weapon States. Stating that the Russian Federation was convinced that points of contact could be found in the approaches of Delhi and Islamabad to resolve their conflicts, the representative of the Russian Federation noted that his country viewed the adoption of any type of sanctions against those States as unjustified from the international legal, political and humanitarian points of view.¹¹

The representative of the United States stated that nuclear tests conducted by India and Pakistan represented a profound blow not only to the stability and security of the region but also to the international non-proliferation regime. Referring to the meeting of China, France, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States on 4 June 1998, he noted that all five States would be engaging additional concerned States in a shared effort to bring peace and stability in South Asia, and that adoption of the draft resolution was an important step along the path. He informed the Council that the United States had called upon India and Pakistan to take steps to avert an arms race and reduce tensions. Both nations needed to sign and ratify the Comprehensive Nuclear-Test-Ban Treaty immediately and without conditions; refrain from deploying missiles of all types; cease production of fissile material and enter into negotiations on a fissile material cut-off treaty; formalize their pledge not to export dangerous weapons and technologies; and refrain from missile testing of any sort. He also stressed that India and Pakistan needed to understand that their tests and subsequent declarations did not make them nuclear-weapon States. The United States would not support amendment of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty to permit their accession as nuclear-weapon States, because to do so would completely undermine its very purpose and the international non-proliferation regime. He noted that the Kashmir region had the potential to be the spark that ignited a conflict no one might be able to stop. He also expressed the belief that there were a number of steps they could take to reduce the chances that a miscalculation or misunderstanding would lead to a situation neither side wanted. These steps included avoiding threatening movements near the line of control, any crossing of the line by military or security forces, cross-border infiltrations or other provocative acts in the area.¹²

The representative of the Gambia stated that continued adherence to the international regime on the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons would depend to a large extent on the equal treatment of all States. Having one set of rules for some and another for others could not be justified and was therefore unhelpful and untenable.¹³

The representative of France condemned the tests and stressed that it was a matter of priority to preserve and strengthen the non-proliferation regime established under the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. France called on India and Pakistan as well as the other States that had not yet done so, to accede to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty without delay or conditions. Noting that the disputes between the two countries, particularly on Kashmir, were at the root of the problems, he stated that it was essential that a solution be sought through direct bilateral dialogue, as well as through the establishment of confidence-building measures. He stated if they were to attain all those objectives, France felt that it would be desirable to continue to promote dialogue and cooperation with India and Pakistan and to avoid coercive measures. However, those two countries needed to display restraint and demonstrate, by acting in accordance with the requests of the Council, their willingness to commit themselves to that path.¹⁴

The representative of Gabon stated that in similar circumstances, the ideal would be for the Council to adopt a consistent attitude of firmness and disapproval, regardless of who stood accused. He noted that in certain cases, however, the Council's assessments were subject to equivocation and some subjectivism, which was why Gabon would have preferred, inter alia, that paragraph 1 of the draft resolution under consideration be worded in the same terms as the statements adopted by the Council in similar circumstances.¹⁵

The representative of China stated that the serious development of events had posed grave challenges to international peace and security in the post-cold-war era and had aroused the concern of the whole international community. He noted that to prevent an arms race in South Asia, halt the further escalation of tensions in the region and safeguard the international non-proliferation regime, the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the five permanent members of the Council had issued a joint communiqué on 4 June. In order to defuse the tensions in the region, China called upon India and Pakistan to be calm and restrained, to resume talks between them, to halt any statements or movements that might further escalate the tensions and to refrain from engaging in an arms race. In Kashmir, they needed to respect and adhere to the control line, and should under no circumstances step across the control line or seek to change the state of affairs in the region unilaterally. In conclusion, he noted that in the light of the nature of the dispute in the subcontinent, the Council needed to play a major and pivotal role.¹⁶

A number of other speakers made statements condemning the nuclear tests by India and Pakistan and maintaining that the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction was a threat to international peace and security. Speakers expressed strong support for the Comprehensive Nuclear-Test-Ban Treaty and the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. Many speakers stressed that the acquisition of nuclear weapons would not give them the status of nuclear-weapon States. A number of representatives called on India and Pakistan to exercise restraint and to refrain from carrying out further tests.¹⁷ Canada, New Zealand and Ukraine drew attention to the fact that United Nations Member States that were not members of the Council had not been given the option of expressing their positions in the open debate before the resolution had been adopted.¹⁸ Several speakers also called for the establishment of a nuclear-weapon-free zone in the Middle East or called on Israel to accede to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and rid itself of nuclear weapons.¹⁹

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1172 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming the statements by its President of 14 May and 29 May 1998,

Reiterating the statement by its President of 31 January 1992, in which it was stated, inter alia, that the proliferation of all weapons of mass destruction constituted a threat to international peace and security,

Gravely concerned at the challenge that the nuclear tests conducted by India and then by Pakistan constitute to international efforts aimed at strengthening the global regime of non-proliferation of nuclear weapons, and also gravely concerned at the danger to peace and stability in the region,

Deeply concerned at the risk of a nuclear arms race in South Asia, and determined to prevent such a race,

Reaffirming the crucial importance of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons and the Comprehensive Nuclear-Test-Ban Treaty for global efforts towards nuclear non-proliferation and nuclear disarmament,

Recalling the principles and objectives for nuclear non-proliferation and disarmament adopted by the 1995 Review and Extension Conference of the Parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, and the successful outcome of the Conference,

Affirming the need to continue to move with determination towards the full realization and effective implementation of all the provisions of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, and welcoming the determination of the five nuclear-weapon States to fulfil their commitments relating to nuclear disarmament under article VI of the Treaty,

Mindful of its primary responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security,

1. Condemns the nuclear tests conducted by India on 11 and 13 May 1998 and by Pakistan on 28 and 30 May 1998;

2. Endorses the joint communiqué issued by the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of China, France, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America at their meeting in Geneva on 4 June 1998;

3. Demands that India and Pakistan refrain from further nuclear tests, and in this context calls upon all States not to carry out any nuclear weapon test explosion or any other nuclear explosion in accordance with the provisions of the Comprehensive Nuclear-Test-Ban Treaty;

4. Urges India and Pakistan to exercise maximum restraint and to avoid threatening military movements, cross-border violations, or other provocations in order to prevent an aggravation of the situation;

5. Also urges India and Pakistan to resume the dialogue between them on all outstanding issues, particularly on all matters pertaining to peace and security, in order to remove the tensions between them, and encourages them to find mutually acceptable solutions that address the root causes of those tensions, including Kashmir;

6. Welcomes the efforts of the Secretary-General to encourage India and Pakistan to enter into dialogue;

7. Calls upon India and Pakistan immediately to stop their nuclear weapon development programmes, to refrain from weaponization or from the deployment of nuclear weapons, to cease development of ballistic missiles capable of delivering nuclear weapons and any further production of fissile material for nuclear weapons, to confirm their policies not to export equipment, materials or technology that could contribute to weapons of mass destruction or missiles capable of delivering them and to undertake appropriate commitments in that regard;

8. Encourages all States to prevent the export of equipment, materials or technology that could in any way assist programmes in India or Pakistan for nuclear weapons or for ballistic missiles capable of delivering such weapons, and welcomes national policies adopted and declared in this respect;

9. Expresses its grave concern at the negative effect of the nuclear tests conducted by India and Pakistan on peace and stability in South Asia and beyond;

10. Reaffirms its full commitment to and the crucial importance of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons and the Comprehensive Nuclear-Test-Ban Treaty as the cornerstones of the international regime on the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons and as essential foundations for the pursuit of nuclear disarmament;

11. Expresses its firm conviction that the international regime on the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons should be maintained and consolidated, and recalls that in accordance with the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons neither India nor Pakistan can have the status of a nuclear-weapon State;

12. Recognizes that the tests conducted by India and Pakistan constitute a serious threat to global efforts towards nuclear non-proliferation and disarmament;

13. Urges India and Pakistan, and all other States that have not yet done so, to become parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons and to the Comprehensive Nuclear-Test-Ban Treaty without delay and without conditions;

14. Also urges India and Pakistan to participate, in a positive spirit and on the basis of the agreed mandate, in negotiations at the Conference on Disarmament in Geneva on a treaty banning the production of fissile material for nuclear weapons or other nuclear explosive devices, with a view to reaching early agreement;

15. Requests the Secretary-General to report urgently to the Council on the steps taken by India and Pakistan to implement the present resolution;

16. Expresses its readiness to consider further how best to ensure the implementation of the present resolution;

17. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United Kingdom made a statement on behalf of the European Union and associated and aligned countries.²⁰ The European Union condemned the nuclear tests, which ran counter to the will expressed by the 149 signatories of the Comprehensive Nuclear-²⁰ Ibid., p. 13 (Estonia, Hungary, Lithuania, Poland, Romania, and Slovakia; and Cyprus and Iceland).

Test-Ban Treaty to cease nuclear testing and to efforts to strengthen the global non-proliferation regime. The European Union remained fully committed to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty as the essential foundation for the pursuit of nuclear disarmament, and called on all States which had not yet done so to become parties to it. The European Union also had remained committed to the early entry into force of the Comprehensive Nuclear-Test-Ban Treaty. He stated that the European Union urged India and Pakistan to take early steps to demonstrate their commitment to international efforts on non-proliferation and nuclear disarmament by signing the Comprehensive Nuclear-Test-Ban Treaty and moving to ratify it; by contributing actively and without conditions towards the opening of negotiations at the Conference on Disarmament in Geneva for a treaty banning the production of fissile material for nuclear weapons and other nuclear explosive devices; by exerting stringent controls over the export of material, equipment and technology controlled under the Nuclear Suppliers' Group trigger and dual use lists and the Missile Technology Control Regime annex; and by committing themselves neither to assemble nuclear devices nor to deploy such devices on delivery vehicles, and to cease development and deployment of ballistic missiles capable of delivering nuclear warheads. He stressed that the European Union would follow the situation and take appropriate action should India and Pakistan not sign and move to ratify the relevant international non-proliferation agreements, in particular the Comprehensive Nuclear-Test-Ban Treaty, without conditions. The European Union also urged India and Pakistan to engage in a dialogue that addressed the root causes of the tension between them, and to try to build confidence rather than seek confrontation.²¹

The representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran stated that inadequate attention and the failure to adopt concrete actions on global nuclear disarmament, the unpopular insistence on the part of the nuclear-weapon States to remain on the same course, particularly after the indefinite extension of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and despite the wish of the international community to make progress on the basis of the near universal consensus on the illegality of the threat or use of nuclear weapons, and the selective approach to the implementation of the Treaty's provisions were among the reasons that were said to have contributed to the existing situation. He expressed the belief that the resolution would have been more effective and representative of the views of the international community had it reflected the broader concerns of non-nuclear-weapon States. Those concerns include the fulfillment of the commitment of nuclear-weapon States to nuclear disarmament by agreeing to commence international negotiations on nuclear disarmament within a time-bound framework, the necessity of ensuring the universality of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty in an expeditious manner through urging all States to join the Treaty without exception and a speedy commencement of negotiations at the Conference on Disarmament on a treaty banning the stockpiling and production of fissile material for nuclear weapons or other nuclear explosive devices. Despite the setback in international efforts to prevent nuclear proliferation in the region, the representative stressed that his country, as a party to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and a signatory of the Comprehensive Nuclear-Test-Ban Treaty, remained fully committed to its international obligations under those regimes. He also noted that the developments in India and Pakistan had highlighted the imperative of ensuring the universality of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. That imperative also applied to the Middle East, where Israeli intransigence in refusing to accede to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and to accept International Atomic Energy Agency safeguards had endangered the entire region. It was therefore necessary to develop a non-discriminatory approach at the international level to the issue of non-proliferation and to exert pressure on Israel to heed the call of the international community and, by joining the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, to allow for the establishment of the Middle East as a nuclear-weapon-free zone.²²

The representative of Australia stated that nuclear proliferation constituted the worst possible threat to international peace and security and it was therefore essential that the Council, with its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security under Article 24 of the Charter, take action on the issue and remain seized of it until it was resolved.²³

The representative of Egypt underscored that it was urgent to establish an effective regime of active and passive safeguards by which the Council would unequivocally decide that the use or threat of use of nuclear weapons constituted a threat to international peace and security in accordance with Article 39 of the Charter. Such a threat would require the intervention of the Council to deter it within the framework of the collective security regime laid out in Chapter VII of the Charter. In that respect, the responsibility of the Council for providing urgent and comprehensive assistance to States subject to such a threat needed to be clear and indisputable. He also stressed that the Council should in no circumstances be subject to the veto, since the destructive power of nuclear weapons required that the effectiveness and credibility of the Council's measures be preserved. The voting rules laid out in paragraph 3 of Article 27 of the Charter should not be in force in cases of the use or threat of use of nuclear weapons. He also expressed his country's concern vis-à-vis the consequences of the failure to realize the universality of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, and reiterated their deep conviction that if Israel were to remain outside the framework of the Treaty that would lead to grave consequences not only for stability and security in the region but also for international peace and security and for the credibility and continuity of the non-proliferation regime. He stated that under the current circumstances Egypt had expected the Council to single out Israel by name and urge it to adhere to the Treaty instead of merely introducing a general reference in paragraph 13 of the resolution.²⁴

The representative of Pakistan stated that his country had kept the Secretary-General and the Council fully informed of the developments pertaining to the security crisis in South Asia. He suggested that to some extent, it had been the dereliction of its responsibilities by the Council that had emboldened India to implement its "hegemonic and aggressive designs" by crossing the nuclear threshold, threatening the use of nuclear weapons against Pakistan and resorting to nuclear blackmail to impose a military solution on Kashmir. Faced with the ominous developments resulting from India's deliberate and calculated actions to alter the strategic equation, Pakistan had been left with no choice but to exercise its nuclear option in its supreme national interest to restore the strategic balance and to preserve peace. The representative of Pakistan further maintained that non-proliferation could not be pursued by creating or acquiescing in a situation of a security void, which continued to be a major failure on the part of all those who had sought to promote the goal of non-proliferation. He stated that non-proliferation was no longer an issue in South Asia, as it had been nuclearized thanks to the encouragement and acquiescence of major Powers. He also stressed that Pakistan was convinced that a comprehensive approach to the issues of peace, security, confidence-building, conventional imbalance, and conventional and nuclear arms control was the only realistic way whereby the Council and the international community could contribute to defusing the security crisis in South Asia, which had endangered global peace and stability. Regarding the resolution, he stated that the resolution was deficient in several aspects. Regarding procedural points, he noted that under Article 31 of the Charter, any Member of the United Nations which was not a member of the Council might participate in the discussion of any question brought before the Security Council, without a vote, whenever the latter considered that the interests of that Member were specially affected. He expressed deep regret that the Council had disregarded that Charter provision by not giving Pakistan an opportunity to participate in the discussions on this resolution. He stated that the adoption of this resolution would "further marginalize the role of the Security Council, not only in dealing effectively with the security crisis in South Asia but on global security issues as a whole," and that the approach that the Security Council had adopted was "devoid not only of realism but also of legality and morality". The resolution was not an expression of global concern about the failure of non-proliferation but a "transparent exercise in self-assurance by the official nuclear Five to seek legitimacy for their possession of lethal arsenals of weapons of mass destruction". Reiterating that Pakistan had acquired its nuclear capability only in reaction to India's steady development of its nuclear weapons programme, he stated that Pakistan reserved the right to maintain the ability to deter aggression by conventional or non-conventional means.²⁵

Decision of 19 October 1999 (4053rd meeting): resolution 1269 (1999)

At its 4053rd meeting, held on 19 October 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Russian Federation) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.²⁶

All members of the Council expressed their abhorrence of acts of terrorism, and lamented the death, injuries, fear and destruction of property that resulted from such acts. They called for cooperation and determination in the fight against terrorism in all its forms, whatever their justification. Speakers highlighted, inter alia, the complex roots of terrorism; the idea of a comprehensive convention on international terrorism by the General Assembly; the need for the Council to identify those situations involving acts of terrorism that amounted to threats to international peace and security and act accordingly; the criminal nature of terrorism; the need for Member States to become party to existing international conventions against terrorism; and the role of the Council in creating durable safeguards against the threats to peace and security emanating from terrorism.²⁷

The representative of Slovenia stated that when terrorist acts reached proportions, or had effects, that made them comparable with the use of force prohibited by the Charter, the question of lawful countermeasures might arise. In such situations, available options needed to be considered on the basis of the criteria established in international law, including those of necessity and proportionality of response.²⁸

The representative of the Netherlands noted that when the use of violence was indispensable to respond to terrorism, it needed to be proportionate and limited to the requirements of the maintenance of public order.²⁹

The representative of Malaysia stated that it was pertinent that in defining the term "terrorism", it needed to be differentiated from the legitimate struggle of peoples under colonial or alien domination and foreign occupation for self-determination and national liberation, although this did not justify the use of terrorist methods by any group.³⁰

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1269 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Deeply concerned by the increase in acts of international terrorism which endangers the lives and well-being of individuals worldwide as well as the peace and security of all States,

Condemning all acts of terrorism, irrespective of motive, wherever and by whomever committed,

Mindful of all relevant resolutions of the General Assembly, including resolution 49/60 of 9 December 1994, by which it adopted the Declaration on Measures to Eliminate International Terrorism,

Emphasizing the necessity to intensify the fight against terrorism at the national level and to strengthen, under the auspices of the United Nations, effective international cooperation in this field, on the basis of the principles of the Charter of the United Nations and norms of international law, including respect for international humanitarian law and human rights,

Supporting the efforts to promote universal participation in, and implementation of, the existing international anti-terrorist conventions, as well as to develop new international instruments to counter the terrorist threat,

Commending the work done by the General Assembly, relevant United Nations organs and specialized agencies and regional and other organizations to combat international terrorism,

Determined to contribute, in accordance with the Charter, to the efforts to combat terrorism in all its forms,

Reaffirming that the suppression of acts of international terrorism, including those in which States are involved, is an essential contribution to the maintenance of international peace and security,

1. Unequivocally condemns all acts, methods and practices of terrorism as criminal and unjustifiable, regardless of their motivation, in all their forms and manifestations, wherever and by whomever committed, in particular those which could threaten international peace and security;

2. Calls upon all States to implement fully the international anti-terrorist conventions to which they are parties, encourages all States to consider as a matter of priority adhering to those to which they are not parties, and encourages also the speedy adoption of the pending conventions;

3. Stresses the vital role of the United Nations in strengthening international cooperation in combating terrorism, and emphasizes the importance of enhanced coordination among States, international and regional organizations;

4. Calls upon all States to take, inter alia, in the context of such cooperation and coordination, appropriate steps:

- To cooperate with each other, particularly through bilateral and multilateral agreements and arrangements, to prevent and suppress terrorist acts, protect their nationals and other persons against terrorist attacks and bring to justice the perpetrators of such acts;
- To prevent and suppress in their territories through all lawful means the preparation and financing of any acts of terrorism;
- To deny those who plan, finance or commit terrorist acts safe havens by ensuring their apprehension and prosecution or extradition;

– To take appropriate measures in conformity with the relevant provisions of national and international law, including international standards of human rights, before granting refugee status, for the purpose of ensuring that the asylum-seeker has not participated in terrorist acts;

– To exchange information in accordance with international and domestic law, and cooperate on administrative and judicial matters in order to prevent the commission of terrorist acts;

5. Requests the Secretary-General, in his reports to the General Assembly, in particular those submitted in accordance with its resolution 50/53 of 11 December 1995 on measures to eliminate international terrorism, to pay special attention to the need to prevent and fight the threat to international peace and security as a result of terrorist activities;

6. Expresses its readiness to consider relevant provisions of the reports mentioned in paragraph 5 above and to take necessary steps in accordance with its responsibilities under the Charter of the United Nations in order to counter terrorist threats to international peace and security;

7. Decides to remain seized of this matter.

39. Children and armed conflict

Initial proceedings

Decision of 29 June 1998 (3897th meeting): statement by the President

At its 3896th meeting, held on 29 June 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the item “Children and armed conflict” in its agenda. The Council invited the representatives of Argentina, Burundi, Canada, the Czech Republic, El Salvador, Germany, Indonesia, Italy, Latvia, Morocco, Mozambique, Namibia, Norway, Romania, Slovakia and Ukraine, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The Council also extended an invitation, under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure, to the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Children and Armed Conflict.

Speaking before the Council, the Special Representative described the suffering of children from the impact of armed conflict around the world. He gave data on numbers related to children killed, orphaned, injured, disabled and displaced, and proposed that the Council lead the way by sending forth a clear message that the targeting, use and abuse of children were unacceptable. He also recommended several initiatives to mitigate and prevent the suffering of children caught up in the midst of ongoing conflicts. He requested that whenever the Council considered the imposition of sanctions, to take into account the needs of children, the impact of sanctions on children and how best to protect children in those circumstances. He requested that whenever the Council considered peacemaking efforts, peacekeeping mandates and peacebuilding plans, the central needs of children be there from the outset and inform the plans and the action taken.¹

The representative of China stated that China was in favour of the Council issuing a presidential statement on the question of children affected by armed conflict, so as to demonstrate the importance that the Council attached to this matter. He, however, highlighted that since the protection of children involved a wide range of issues, the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council were the appropriate forums to carry out more comprehensive, fuller and more in-depth deliberations on that question.²

All speakers commended the report of the Special Representative. A number of other speakers endorsed the idea of preparing an additional protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child to raise the minimum age of recruitment and participation in military activities to 18. In addition, other representatives also welcomed efforts to address the unintended adverse consequences of sanctions on the civilian population, especially on its most vulnerable sectors, such as children. Many representatives suggested that sanctions be elaborated in such way as to focus specifically on the targeted regimes without producing negative effects on the civilian population, including innocent children. A number of representatives gave special consideration to the disarmament and demobilization of child soldiers, and to the reintegration of children traumatized as a result of armed conflicts.³

At its 3897th meeting, held on 29 June 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council resumed consideration of the item. In accordance with the decision taken at the 3896th meeting, the President (Portugal) invited the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Children and Armed Conflict to take a seat at the table.

At the same meeting the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴

The Security Council expresses its grave concern at the harmful impact of armed conflict on children.

The Council strongly condemns the targeting of children in armed conflicts, including their humiliation, brutalization, sexual abuse, abduction and forced displacement, as well as their recruitment and use in hostilities in violation of international law, and calls upon all parties concerned to put an end to such activities.

The Council calls upon all parties concerned to comply strictly with their obligations under international law, in particular their obligations under the Geneva Conventions of 1949, the Additional Protocols thereto, of 1977 and the Convention on the Rights of the Child of 1989. The Council stresses the obligation of all States to prosecute those responsible for grave breaches of international humanitarian law.

The Council recognizes the importance of the mandate of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Children and Armed Conflict, supports his activities and welcomes his cooperation with all relevant programmes, funds and agencies of the United Nations system, which he deems appropriate.

The Council expresses its intention to pay serious attention to the situation of children affected by armed conflicts and, to this end, to maintain contact, as appropriate, with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and with the relevant programmes, funds and agencies of the United Nations system.

The Council, while dealing with situations of armed conflict, expresses its readiness to consider, when appropriate, means to assist with the effective provision and protection of humanitarian aid and assistance to civilian populations in distress, in particular women and children; to consider appropriate responses whenever buildings or sites that usually have a significant presence of children, such as schools, playgrounds and hospitals, are specifically targeted; to support efforts aimed at obtaining commitments to put to an end the recruitment and use of children in armed conflicts in violation of international law; to give special consideration to the disarmament and demobilization of child soldiers and to the reintegration into society of children maimed or otherwise traumatized as a result of an armed conflict; and to support or promote child-focused mine-clearance and mine-awareness programmes, as well as child-centred physical and social rehabilitation programmes.

The Council recognizes the importance of special training of personnel involved in peacemaking, peacekeeping and peace-building activities in respect of the needs, interests and rights of children, as well as their treatment and protection.

The Council further recognizes that, whenever measures are adopted under Article 41 of the Charter of the United Nations, consideration should be given to their impact on the civilian population, bearing in mind the needs of children, in order to consider appropriate humanitarian exemptions.

Decision of 25 August 1999 (4037th meeting):

At its 4037th meeting, held on 25 August 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Namibia), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Afghanistan, Algeria, Angola, Bangladesh, Belarus, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Costa Rica, Egypt, Finland, Guyana, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Japan, Kenya, Monaco, Mongolia, Mozambique, New Zealand, Norway, the Philippines, Portugal, the Republic of Korea, Rwanda, Slovakia, South Africa, the Sudan, Uganda, Ukraine, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zambia, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The Council also extended an invitation, under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure, to the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Children and Armed Conflict.

The Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Children and Armed Conflict noted a qualitative shift in the nature and conduct of warfare towards civil wars, which was marked by social breakdown and lawlessness and the proliferation of small arms and light weapons. He urged delegations to (1) apply international norms and standards; (2) reinforce traditional value systems; (3) undertake concrete initiatives to prevent or mitigate the suffering of children caught up in the midst of continuing conflict; (4) bring together countries in a subregional setting where cross-border activities affected children; (5) encourage the business community to refrain from trading with parties to a conflict who had a record of abuse against children; (6) place children's protection and welfare on the peace agenda; (7) address the needs of children in the aftermath of conflict; (8) pay attention to the protection and welfare of children in peace operations; (9) report to the Council on the fate of children; (10) review the effects of sanctions on children; (11) encourage forms of information and entertainment for children in situations of conflict and its aftermath; (12) stem the recruitment and use of children in armed conflict; (13) sign and ratify new international instruments; (14) provide for children; and (15) prevent occurrence and recurrence of conflict.⁵

China was of the view that the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council were more appropriate forums where more comprehensive, adequate and in-depth deliberations on the question of the protection of children could be conducted.⁶

The representative of Iraq noted that under United States pressure, the Council had insisted on the continued enforcement of comprehensive sanctions against Iraq, which had caused the deaths of 500,000 Iraqi children. That situation made sanctions effectively equal to threats emanating from armed conflict.⁷

Members condemned the targeting of children as an immoral act that violated the principles of international law, pointing out that ensuring respect for children's rights was a collective obligation. They stressed that the United Nations, through the Council, should call on States involved in armed conflict to protect children, using the measures available to it. Many delegations stressed the need for a holistic approach to taking children out of armed conflict. They urged that there be a concerted, systematic and organized effort from all actors in the regional and international community. A number of delegations noted that land mines and small arms were imperative issues in the protection of children from the impact of armed conflict. Several delegations called for greater cooperation between the various United Nations agencies on the issue of protection of children from armed conflict.⁸ Several delegates called attention to the importance of the Convention on the Rights of the Child concerning the age of participation in conflicts, and expressed hope that the age limit would be raised to 18.⁹

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁰ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1261 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling the statements by its President of 29 June 1998, 12 February 1999 and 8 July 1999,

Noting recent efforts to bring to an end the use of children as soldiers in violation of international law, in International Labour Organization Convention No. 182 on the Prohibition and Immediate Action for the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour, which prohibits forced or compulsory labour, including the forced or compulsory recruitment of children for use in armed conflict, and in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, in which conscripting or enlisting children under the age of fifteen into national armed forces or using them to participate actively in hostilities is characterized as a war crime,

1. Expresses its grave concern at the harmful and widespread impact of armed conflict on children and the long-term consequences this has for durable peace, security and development;

2. Strongly condemns the targeting of children in situations of armed conflict, including killing and maiming, sexual violence, abduction and forced displacement, recruitment and use of children in armed conflict in violation of international law, and attacks on objects protected under international law, including places that usually have a significant presence of children, such as schools and hospitals, and calls upon all parties concerned to put an end to such practices;

3. Calls upon all parties concerned to comply strictly with their obligations under international law, in particular the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 and the obligations applicable to them under the Additional Protocols thereto, of 1977 and the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child of 1989, and stresses the responsibility of all States to bring an end to impunity, as well as their obligation to prosecute those responsible for grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949;

4. Expresses its support for the ongoing work of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Children and Armed Conflict, the United Nations Children's Fund, the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, other parts of the United Nations system and other relevant international organizations dealing with children affected by armed conflict, and requests the Secretary-General to continue to develop coordination and coherence among them;

5. Welcomes and encourages efforts by all relevant actors at the national and international level to develop more coherent and effective approaches to the issue of children and armed conflict;

6. Supports the work of the open-ended intersessional working group of the Commission on Human Rights on a draft optional protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the involvement of children in armed conflicts, and expresses the hope that it will make further progress with a view to finalizing its work;

7. Urges all parties to armed conflicts to ensure that the protection, welfare and rights of children are taken into account during peace negotiations and throughout the process of consolidating peace in the aftermath of conflict;

8. Calls upon parties to armed conflicts to undertake feasible measures during armed conflicts to minimize the harm suffered by children, such as "days of tranquillity", to allow the delivery of basic necessary services, and further calls upon all parties to armed conflicts to promote, implement and respect such measures;

9. Urges all parties to armed conflicts to abide by concrete commitments made to ensure the protection of children in situations of armed conflict;

10. Also urges all parties to armed conflicts to take special measures to protect children, in particular girls, from rape and other forms of sexual abuse and gender-based violence in situations of armed conflict and to take into account the special needs of the girl child throughout armed conflicts and their aftermath, including in the delivery of humanitarian assistance;

11. Calls upon all parties to armed conflicts to ensure the full, safe and unhindered access of humanitarian personnel and the delivery of humanitarian assistance to all children affected by armed conflict;

12. Underscores the importance of the safety, security and freedom of movement of United Nations and associated personnel to the alleviation of the impact of armed conflict on children, and urges all parties to armed conflicts to respect fully the status of United Nations and associated personnel;

13. Urges States and all relevant parts of the United Nations system to intensify their efforts to ensure an end to the recruitment and use of children in armed conflict in violation of international law, through political and other efforts, including promotion of the availability of alternatives for children to their participation in armed conflict;

14. Recognizes the deleterious impact of the proliferation of arms, in particular small arms, on the security of civilians, including refugees and other vulnerable populations, particularly children, and in this regard recalls resolution 1209 (1998) of 19 November 1998, in which, inter alia, the Council stresses the importance of all Member States, and in particular States involved in manufacturing and marketing of weapons, restricting arms transfers which could provoke or prolong armed conflicts or aggravate existing tensions or armed conflicts, and in which it urges international collaboration in combating illegal arms flows;

15. Urges States and the United Nations system to facilitate the disarmament, demobilization, rehabilitation and reintegration of children used as soldiers in violation of international law, and calls upon in particular the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Children and Armed Conflict, the United Nations Children's Fund and the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and other relevant agencies of the United Nations system to intensify their efforts in this regard;

16. Undertakes, when taking action aimed at promoting peace and security, to give special attention to the protection, welfare and rights of children, and requests the Secretary-General to include in his reports recommendations in this regard;

17. Reaffirms its readiness when dealing with situations of armed conflict:

(a) To continue to support the provision of humanitarian assistance to civilian populations in distress, taking into account the particular needs of children, including the provision and rehabilitation of medical and educational services to respond to the needs of children, the rehabilitation of children who have been maimed or psychologically traumatized, and child-focused mine-clearance and mine-awareness programmes;

(b) To continue to support the protection of displaced children, including their resettlement by the Office of the High Commissioner and others as appropriate;

(c) Whenever adopting measures under Article 41 of the Charter of the United Nations, to give consideration to their impact on children, in order to consider appropriate humanitarian exemptions;

18. Also reaffirms its readiness to consider appropriate responses whenever buildings or sites which usually have a significant presence of children are specifically targeted in situations of armed conflict, in violation of international law;

19. Requests the Secretary-General to ensure that personnel involved in United Nations peacemaking, peacekeeping and peacebuilding activities have appropriate training in respect of the protection, rights and welfare of children, and urges States and relevant international and regional organizations to ensure that appropriate training is included in their programmes for personnel involved in similar activities;

20. Also requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Council by 31 July 2000 a report on the implementation of the present resolution, consulting all relevant parts of the United Nations system and taking into account other relevant work;

21. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States stated that the leadership in Iraq was the only party responsible for the inadequacies of the conditions inside the territory it controlled.¹¹

The representative of Iraq also intervened second time and reiterated that the report of the United Nations Children's Fund had stated that the sanctions had led to the deaths of half a million Iraqi children under the age of five.¹²

40. Threats to peace and security caused by international terrorist acts

Initial proceedings

Decision of 13 August 1998 (3915th meeting): resolution 1189 (1998)

At its 3915th meeting, held on 13 August 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the item

“Threats to peace and security caused by international terrorist acts” in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Slovenia), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council’s prior consultations.¹ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1189 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Deeply disturbed by the indiscriminate and outrageous acts of international terrorism that took place on 7 August 1998 in Nairobi and Dar-es-Salaam,

Condemning such acts which have a damaging effect on international relations and jeopardize the security of States,

Convinced that the suppression of acts of international terrorism is essential for the maintenance of international peace and security, and reaffirming the determination of the international community to eliminate international terrorism in all its forms and manifestations,

Reaffirming the obligations of Member States under the Charter of the United Nations,

Stressing that every Member State has the duty to refrain from organizing, instigating, assisting or participating in terrorist acts in another State or acquiescing in organized activities within its territory directed towards the commission of such acts,

Mindful of General Assembly resolution 52/164 of 15 December 1997 on the International Convention for the Suppression of Terrorist Bombings,

Recalling that, in the statement issued on 31 January 1992 on the occasion of the meeting of the Security Council at the level of heads of State and Government, the Council expressed its deep concern over acts of international terrorism, and emphasized the need for the international community to deal effectively with all such criminal acts,

Stressing the need to strengthen international cooperation between States in order to adopt practical and effective measures to prevent, combat and eliminate all forms of terrorism affecting the international community as a whole,

Commending the responses of the Governments of Kenya, the United Republic of Tanzania and the United States of America to the terrorist bomb attacks in Kenya and the United Republic of Tanzania,

Determined to eliminate international terrorism,

1. Strongly condemns the terrorist bomb attacks in Nairobi and Dar-es-Salaam on 7 August 1998, which claimed hundreds of innocent lives, injured thousands of people and caused massive destruction to property;

2. Expresses to the families of the innocent victims of the terrorist bomb attacks during this difficult time its deep sorrow, sympathy and condolences;

3. Calls upon all States and international institutions to cooperate with and provide support and assistance to the ongoing investigations in Kenya, the United Republic of Tanzania and the United States of America to apprehend the perpetrators of these cowardly criminal acts and to bring them swiftly to justice;

4. Expresses its sincere gratitude to all States, international institutions and voluntary organizations for their encouragement and timely response to the requests for assistance from the Governments of Kenya and the United Republic of Tanzania, and urges them to assist the affected countries, especially in the reconstruction of infrastructure and disaster preparedness;

5. Calls upon all States to adopt, in accordance with international law and as a matter of priority, effective and practical measures for security cooperation, for the prevention of such acts of terrorism, and for the prosecution and punishment of their perpetrators;

6. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representatives of Kenya, the United Republic of Tanzania and the United States made statements condemning the simultaneous terrorist bombings in Nairobi and Dar-es-Salaam on 7 August 1998. They stressed that the meeting of the Council was a demonstration by the international community that such acts could not be tolerated. They called on Member States to support the ongoing investigations and to apprehend the perpetrators if found on their territory.²

41. Maintenance of peace and security and post-conflict peacebuilding

Initial proceedings

Decision of 29 December 1998 (3961st meeting): statement by the President

At its 3954th meeting, held on 16 December 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the item entitled "Maintenance of peace and security and post-conflict peacebuilding" in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Bahrain) invited the representatives of Algeria, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bangladesh, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Canada, Croatia, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Jamaica, Malaysia, Mongolia, Mozambique, Nigeria, Norway, Pakistan, the Republic of Korea, Slovakia, the Sudan, Tunisia and Ukraine, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The representative of China maintained that in the peace consolidation process in post-conflict regions, international efforts should be attuned to the will of the country concerned and the way of development chosen by the people of the country concerned should be respected.¹

The representative of the Russian Federation maintained that, for the most part, peacebuilding fell within the sphere of competence of the Economic and Social Council and the specialized agencies of the United Nations system, and called for the "reactivation" of Article 65 of the Charter with regard to the provision of information and assistance to the Security Council by the Economic and Social Council.²

The representative of the United States argued that peacekeeping mandates should include some short-term activities that would enhance the activities of peacekeepers, including demobilization, disarmament and reintegration of former combatants and demining. He stated that long-term activities like the restructuring of security institutions, such as police, prisons and the judiciary, fell beyond the scope of peacekeeping.³

The representative of Costa Rica maintained that peacebuilding, as an integral and integrating concept, required broad, multidisciplinary involvement by the international community.⁴

The representative of Gambia stated that in addition to short-term programmes, there should be a sustained effort to support medium- and long-term programmes as well, such as the strengthening of national institutions, monitoring elections, the protection of human rights and good governance.⁵

The representative of France called for assistance in organizing free and democratic elections and in the reconstruction and strengthening of State structures, in particular in such areas as justice and the police.⁶

The representative of Brazil stressed the need to develop approaches that would permit a gradual disengagement of the Council and a progressive engagement of other bodies with appropriate and substantive competence.⁷

The representative of Kenya held that peacebuilding was within the proper scope and mandate of the Council, and urged it to rise to the occasion and support such efforts to the extent possible.⁸ The representative of Sweden agreed that peacebuilding elements should be explicitly and clearly integrated into the mandates of peacekeeping operations.⁹ The representative of the United Kingdom acknowledged that peacebuilding did not start where peacekeeping stopped, and that peacekeeping would work best if it incorporated elements of post-conflict peacebuilding.¹⁰

A number of other speakers made statements sharing the view that peacekeeping operations should include peacebuilding aspects so as to prevent countries in the post-conflict phase from relapsing into chaos. Speakers underlined the need for the United Nations to help address the root causes of conflicts, and maintained that the Council should play its role in promoting post-conflict peacebuilding.¹¹

The President then suspended the meeting, and resumed it on 23 December 1998. At the resumed meeting, the representative of Canada maintained that the Council had a crucial role in ensuring that peacekeeping mandates anticipated, to the extent possible, the requirement of peacebuilding and reconstruction, adding that peacebuilding activities must address the security of individuals, including that of women and children.¹²

The representative of Norway considered it important to address the need for post-conflict peacebuilding measures in the very early stages of conflict resolution efforts, and to include such measures in the negotiations on peace accords.¹³

The representative of Egypt maintained that peacebuilding should be carried out in full respect for the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations, in particular the principles of sovereign equality, political independence, and non-intervention in matters that were essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any State.¹⁴

The representative of Austria made a statement on behalf of the European Union and associated and aligned countries, welcoming the Council's continued efforts in responding to the challenges of combining peacekeeping and peacebuilding, in particular with regard to the new peacekeeping operations.¹⁵

The representative of the Republic of Korea emphasized that one of the main focuses should be on exploring practical ways and means to cultivate local capacity to sustain peace in the fragile conditions of the post-conflict period.¹⁶

The representative of Mongolia stated that the reform of the United Nations system should address the question of the roles of appropriate United Nations bodies in more effectively addressing the questions of development, expressing the view that the emerging concept of human security provided the opportunity to address the question in a comprehensive manner.¹⁷

The representative of Slovakia stated that peacebuilding efforts should address various factors of conflict and contribute to the creation of conditions for reconciliation, reconstruction and recovery.¹⁸

The representative of Indonesia argued that for any peace efforts, the request for, or at least acquiescence in, action by regional or international organizations was a conditio sine qua non from the legal as well as the political perspective.¹⁹

The representative of India cautioned against the "creeping misuse" of the Council for purposes not part of its mandate, pointing out that the Council was a purely political body and its decisions reflected a balance of interests and power which was not constant.²⁰

Several other speakers made statements and acknowledged the increasing linkage between peacekeeping and peacebuilding activities. They underlined the need to enhance coordination between the Council and other relevant United Nations bodies in promoting peacebuilding activities.²¹

At its 3961st meeting, held on 29 December 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council resumed its consideration of the item on the agenda.

At the same meeting, the President (Bahrain) made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²² maintenance of peace and security and post-conflict peacebuilding. It recalls also the report of the Secretary-General of 13 April 1998 entitled "The causes of conflict and the promotion of durable peace and sustainable development in Africa", which was submitted to the General Assembly and to the Security Council, as well as the report of the Secretary-General of 27 August 1998 on the work of the Organization, submitted to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session. In this context, it welcomes the recommendations of the Secretary-General concerning the role of the Council in the aftermath of conflict, in particular in ensuring a smooth transition from peacekeeping to post-conflict peacebuilding. The Council recalls further the statement by its President of 30 April 1993 on the report of the Secretary-General entitled "An Agenda for Peace", including the subject of post-conflict peacebuilding.

The Council reaffirms its primary responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security. It stresses the need to prevent the resurgence or escalation of conflict. The Council recognizes the importance of the post-conflict peacebuilding efforts of the United Nations to this end in all regions of the world and with due involvement of all United Nations bodies. In particular, it welcomes the role played by the Secretary-General in this field. It recognizes the timeliness of exploring further means to prevent and settle conflicts, which are based on the Charter and generally recognized principles of peacekeeping, and which would incorporate post-conflict peacebuilding as an important component.

The Council recalls the statement by its President of 24 September 1998, which affirmed that the quest for peace in Africa requires a comprehensive, concerted and determined approach, encompassing the eradication of poverty, the promotion of democracy, sustainable development and respect for human rights, as well as conflict prevention and resolution, including peacekeeping and humanitarian assistance. The Council underlines the fact that efforts to ensure lasting solutions to conflicts require sustained political will and a long-term approach in the decision-making of the United Nations, including by the Council itself. It affirms its commitment to the principles of the political independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of all States in conducting peacebuilding activities, and the need for States to comply with their obligations under the Charter and the principles of international law.

The Council underlines the fact that economic rehabilitation and reconstruction often constitute the major tasks facing societies emerging from conflict and that significant international assistance becomes indispensable to promote sustainable development in such cases. In that context, it recalls that Article 65 of the Charter provides that the Economic and Social Council may furnish information to the Security Council and shall assist the Council upon its request.

The Council, conscious of the emphasis placed by the Secretary-General on the issue of post-conflict peacebuilding, in particular in the context of the reform of the United Nations, encourages him to explore the possibility of establishing post-conflict peacebuilding structures as part of efforts by the United Nations system to achieve a lasting peaceful solution to conflicts, including in order to ensure a smooth transition from peacekeeping to peacebuilding and lasting peace.

The Council recognizes the value of including, as appropriate, peacebuilding elements in the mandates of peacekeeping operations. It agrees with the Secretary-General that relevant post-conflict peacebuilding elements should be explicitly and clearly identified and could be integrated into the mandates of peacekeeping operations. It notes that peacekeeping operations may include military, police, humanitarian and other civilian components. It requests the Secretary-General to make recommendations to the Council to this effect whenever appropriate.

The Council also requests the Secretary-General to make recommendations to the appropriate United Nations bodies concerning the period during the transition to the post-conflict peacebuilding phase when recommending the final drawdown of a peacekeeping operation.

The Council recognizes the need for close cooperation and dialogue between the bodies of the United Nations system, in particular those directly concerned in the field of post-conflict peacebuilding, in accordance with their respective responsibilities, and expresses its willingness to consider ways to improve such cooperation. It also emphasizes the need to improve the exchange of information between all relevant actors in the field of post-conflict peacebuilding, including United Nations agencies and bodies, international financial institutions, regional and subregional organizations, troop contributors and the donor community. In this context, it notes with appreciation the Secretary-General's plans for strategic frameworks to ensure increased coherence and effectiveness in the entire range of United Nations activities in States in and recovering from crisis.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 8 July 1999 (4021st meeting):
statement by the President

At its 4020th meeting, held on 8 July 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the item "Maintenance of peace and security and post-conflict peacebuilding: disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of ex-combatants in a peacekeeping environment" in its agenda. The President (Malaysia) invited the representatives of Australia, Bangladesh, Croatia, El Salvador, Finland, Guatemala, Indonesia, Japan, Mozambique, New Zealand, the Republic of Korea and South Africa, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

Opening the debate, the Deputy Secretary-General underlined the importance of the role that disarmament, demobilization and reintegration played in United Nations peacekeeping. She maintained that success of those activities would be determined to no small extent by how well the international community prepared the following points: first, terms dealing with the disposal of arms and ammunition should be included within peace agreements when they were first negotiated, so that the issue did not become an obstacle to peace at a later stage; second, predictable financing was critical, and starting a programme without the funding to complete it might raise expectations on the part of ex-combatants that could not be fulfilled; third, the special needs of child soldiers, including girl soldiers, should be seen as a crucial element in a peacekeeping operation's mandate; fourth, the deployment of a follow-on political mission after the termination or withdrawal of a peacekeeping operation could be a useful means to avoid setbacks and relapses into insecurity; and fifth, a rigorous media and publicity campaign to educate and mobilize popular support for disarmament, demobilization and reintegration efforts must be built into the operation from the start.²³

The representative of the United Kingdom stressed that the Council and the General Assembly must ensure that a United Nations peacekeeping operation had an appropriate mandate and sufficient budgetary and human resources for the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration tasks assigned to it, adding that half measures did little to contribute to lasting peace.²⁴

The representative of the Russian Federation reaffirmed the relevance of disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of ex-combatants as an essential part of peacekeeping operations and post-conflict peacebuilding, and stated that, in many cases, the disarmament of ex-combatants and the collection and the destruction of their weapons were important conditions for normalizing regional crisis situations.²⁵

The representative of France held that the collection of weapons must go hand in hand with demobilization and the reintegration into civil life of those who bore arms.²⁶

The representative of the United States stated that, while disarmament and demobilization were generally viewed to be under the purview of the Council, reintegration of former combatants into their societies fell into a "grey area" between the two areas of international relief and development.²⁷

The representative of Malaysia was of the view that the Council must be able, from time to time, to discuss thematic issues or receive orientation briefings on cross-cutting issues, which could help it in making decisions that would ultimately bring about positive results.²⁸

Several other speakers reaffirmed the importance of disarmament, demobilization and reintegration, and stressed that it needed to be an integral part of peacekeeping operations. They also underlined the importance of coordination between the Council and other relevant United Nations bodies in promoting activities in this field.²⁹

The representative of China argued that United Nations activities in this field needed to always follow the principles of non-interference in internal affairs of Member States and respect for their sovereignty and territorial integrity.³⁰

The representative of Canada believed that the three elements of disarmament, demobilization and reintegration had to be in place at the beginning of a mission, continue throughout the peacekeeping mandate and remain even after the peacekeepers had left.³¹

The representative of South Africa called for strict control over the transfer of small arms and light weapons as well as their surplus stockpiles, and maintained that the mandates of future peacekeeping operations, as appropriate in specific post-conflict situations, should include weapons collection, disposal and destruction.³²

The representative of Namibia maintained that reintegration of ex-combatants could not be left to the countries involved alone, and called on the international community to assist them.³³

Several other speakers expressed appreciation that an open debate, which they considered timely and significant, had been conducted on the subject. They agreed on the importance of disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of ex-combatants, as it would be impossible to accomplish lasting peace without addressing their problems.³⁴

At its 4021st meeting, held on 8 July 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council resumed its consideration of the item on the agenda.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:³⁵

The Security Council recalls its primary responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security. The Council also recalls the statements made by its President in relation to activities of the United Nations in preventive diplomacy, peacemaking, peacekeeping and post-conflict peacebuilding.

The Council has considered the matter of disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of ex-combatants in a peacekeeping environment as part of its overall and continuing effort to contribute to enhancing the effectiveness of United Nations peacekeeping and peacebuilding activities in conflict situations around the world.

The Council is seriously concerned that in a number of conflicts, armed fighting among various parties or factions continues despite the conclusion of peace agreements by the warring parties and the presence of United Nations peacekeeping missions on the ground. It recognizes that a major contributory factor to such a situation has been the continued availability of large amounts of armaments, in particular small arms and light weapons, to conflicting parties. The Council emphasizes that in order to achieve settlement, parties to a conflict must work towards the successful disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of ex-combatants, including child soldiers whose special needs should be seriously addressed.

The Council recognizes that disarmament, demobilization and reintegration cannot be seen in isolation, but rather as a continuous process which is rooted in and feeds into a broader search for peace, stability and development. Effective disarmament of ex-combatants represents an important indicator of progress towards post-conflict peacebuilding and normalization of the situation. The demobilization effort is only possible when there is some level of disarmament and its success can only be achieved when there is effective rehabilitation and reintegration into society of ex-combatants. Disarmament and demobilization must take place in a secure and safe environment, which will give ex-combatants the confidence to lay down their arms. Taking into account the fact that the process is closely linked to economic and social issues, the question must be addressed comprehensively so as to facilitate a smooth transition from peacekeeping to peacebuilding.

The Council emphasizes that for disarmament, demobilization and reintegration to be successful, there must be political will and a clear commitment by the parties concerned to achieve peace and stability. At the same time, it is vital that such commitment by the parties be reinforced by political will and consistent, effective and determined support from the international community to guarantee the achievement of sustainable peace, including through its contributions of long-term assistance for development and trade.

The Council affirms its commitment to the principles of the political independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of all States in conducting peacebuilding activities, and the need for States to comply with their obligations under international law. Bearing this in mind, the Council stresses the need for the implementation, with the consent of the parties, of practical measures to promote the success of the process which, inter alia, may include the following:

(a) The inclusion, as appropriate, within specific peace agreements and, on a case-by-case basis, within United Nations peacekeeping mandates, of clear terms for disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of ex-combatants, including the safe and timely disposal of arms and ammunition;

(b) The establishment by Governments contributing to peacekeeping operations of databases of experts on disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of ex-combatants. In this context, training in disarmament and demobilization could be a useful component of national programmes for the preparation of peacekeeping troops;

(c) The prevention and reduction of the excessive and destabilizing flow, accumulation and illegitimate use of small arms and light weapons. In this context, the relevant Council resolutions and existing United Nations arms embargoes should be strictly implemented.

The Council is of the view that techniques for executing and coordinating programmes related to the process of disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of ex-combatants and the problems associated with it should be given in-depth consideration. It takes note with appreciation of the efforts by the Secretary-General, United Nations bodies, Member States and international and regional organizations aimed at developing general principles and practical guidelines for disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of ex-combatants in a peacekeeping environment.

The Council underlines the need to address this issue on a regular basis and, in this regard, requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Council, within a period of six months, a report containing his analysis, observations and recommendations, in particular those relating to principles and guidelines as well as practices, experiences and lessons learned to facilitate its further consideration of the matter. The report should pay special attention to the problems of disarmament and demobilization of child soldiers and their reintegration into society.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

42. Items relating to promoting peace and security

A. Promoting peace and security: humanitarian activities relevant to the Security Council

Initial proceedings

Deliberations of 21 January 1999 (3968th meeting)

At its 3968th meeting, held on 21 January 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the item "Promoting peace and security: humanitarian activities relevant to the Security Council" in its agenda. The President (Brazil), with the consent of the Council, then invited the Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs and Emergency Relief Coordinator, under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure.

The Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs and Emergency Relief Coordinator suggested that the Council might consider taking specific action in assisting humanitarian agencies, such as ensuring access to populations in need (in that connection, he recalled the responsibility of States to take care of victims of emergencies occurring on their own territories). He pointed out that, as experience had shown, peacekeeping operations and political action could be used to avert or contain humanitarian crises, strengthen national forces to separate the combatants from the victims and counter hate propaganda. He expressed the belief that the Council could also use well-targeted sanctions to encourage the upholding of international law, combat impunity and help avert or reduce humanitarian crises. On the issue of ensuring the security of humanitarian personnel, he expressed the view that ways of extending the Convention on the Safety of United Nations Personnel of 1994 and ensuring compliance by non-State actors needed to be further explored.¹

All members of the Council made statements noting, inter alia, the importance of humanitarian activities in the context of the maintenance of international peace and security; appreciation for the work of humanitarian personnel and the importance of ensuring their security and safety. A number of speakers expressed the view that the Council should attach particular attention to such humanitarian issues as the protection of refugees and the impact of armed conflict on children. Several representatives highlighted the importance of ensuring compliance with international humanitarian law and stressed that all violators of those norms should be brought to justice. A number of speakers underscored the importance of preventive action and post-conflict peacebuilding in the context of meeting humanitarian needs. They observed that humanitarian activities in peacekeeping should be foreseen and, when necessary, "built into" the mandate of some peacekeeping operations. Several representatives also noted the need to ensure the impartiality and neutrality of humanitarian activities.²

The representative of the United States stressed that the Council should consider addressing situations where violations of international humanitarian law and human rights posed a threat to international peace and security, with due regard to the roles and responsibilities of other bodies.³

The representative of China noted that there was a tendency to politicize humanitarian questions and to use them as a pretext to interfere in the internal affairs of sovereign countries. He stated that without regard to the specific causes of humanitarian crises, frequent recourse to the threat or use of force would not help to solve the problems, but would serve merely to further complicate efforts to solve them. He expressed hope that the countries and organizations concerned would strictly adhere to the provisions of international law and the Charter of the United Nations and respect the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of all countries.⁴

The representative of the Russian Federation, noting that the Council was being increasingly asked for active political support for the work of humanitarian organizations, stated that the Council was responsible for the maintenance of international peace and security, while humanitarian agencies had their own mandates and needed to deal with specific tasks that were different from the functions of peacekeeping contingents. Therefore, when a peacekeeping operation had a humanitarian element, the humanitarian tasks needed to be clearly defined in the mandates, and be feasible and supported by the appropriate human and financial resources. He also stressed that humanitarian assistance could not be used as an instrument for bringing political pressure to bear on any party to a conflict or for supporting just one side to the detriment of the other.⁵

The representative of Brazil expressed the belief that it was important for the Members of the Organization and especially for the members of the Council, to arrive at an understanding among themselves on the limits of action by the Council in the humanitarian area, with the Council reserving its attention and energy for those cases that truly threatened regional or international stability while other bodies, such as the Economic and Social Council and its strengthened humanitarian segment, dealt with other issues. He noted that the President of the Economic and Social Council had indicated that he intended to take up the invitation that had been issued to the Economic and Social Council with a view to dealing with situations of post-conflict reconstruction and rehabilitation, including the implementation of Article 65 of the Charter. The representative of Brazil recalled that the humanitarian organizations themselves were often afraid that the use of military force with humanitarian goals, especially in the context of Chapter VII of the Charter, could compromise their impartiality and neutrality and have a negative impact on their ability to assist the victims of all the parties to the conflict and might increase violence against the personnel of the United Nations and other humanitarian organizations. While not excluding the possibility that there might be cases in which force might be truly indispensable as a last resort, he stressed that it was clear that the approval of the Council was essential. He underscored that Article 51 of the Charter set forth a single exception for the use of force without prior authorization of the Council: legitimate self-defence. Otherwise, accepting unilateral military action in humanitarian emergencies would imply the recognition in some form of one nation or a group of nations not only wielding greater power, but having a certain moral superiority of which they could take advantage in such situations.⁶

The representative of the United States intervened a second time stating that it was his Government's view that there were circumstances in which the international community needed to act to protect civilians against the depredations of their own Governments.⁷

The Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs and Emergency Relief Coordinator then responded to questions and statements from members of the Council.⁸

consultations, the Security Council included the item “Promoting peace and security: humanitarian assistance to refugees in Africa” in its agenda. The President (Malaysia), with the consent of the Council, then extended an invitation to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, under rule 39 of the Council’s provisional rules of procedure.

The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees gave a briefing on humanitarian assistance in Africa and touched on situations relating to refugees in Angola, Burundi, the Central African Republic, Côte d’Ivoire, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Guinea, Liberia, the Republic of the Congo, Rwanda, Sierra Leone, the United Republic of Tanzania and others. She also touched on the humanitarian situation in Kosovo,⁹ and on the perception of disparity in the assistance given to displaced persons from, for example, Kosovo, as opposed to that given to African refugees.¹⁰

⁹ For purposes of this Supplement, the term “Kosovo” is used as the abbreviation for “Kosovo, Federal Republic of Yugoslavia”, without prejudice to issues of status. In other instances, the terminology originally used in official documents has been preserved to the extent possible.

All members of the Council made statements, which, inter alia, expressed concern over the situation of refugees in Africa; welcomed the signing of peace agreements in Sierra Leone and the Democratic Republic of the Congo; stressed the need for the international community to support relief efforts; and stressed the role of the Council in helping African States prevent and contain humanitarian disasters in Africa. Several representatives also noted the disparity in levels of aid received in different areas and appealed to the international community to abide by the principles of humanitarianism, neutrality and fairness in providing assistance. Several representatives also asked questions about specific situations in different areas of Africa, including Sierra Leone, the Democratic Republic of the Congo and the United Republic of Tanzania.¹¹

43. Protection of civilians in armed conflict

Initial proceedings

Decision of 12 February 1999 (3978th meeting): statement by the President

At its 3977th meeting, held on 12 February 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the item “Protection of civilians in armed conflict”. The President (Canada) then extended an invitation to the President of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), the Executive Director of the United Nations Children’s Fund (UNICEF) and the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Children and Armed Conflict, under rule 39 of the Council’s provisional rules of procedure.

The International Committee of the Red Cross, the Executive Director of UNICEF and the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Children and Armed Conflict made statements stressing the importance of protecting civilians, particularly children, in armed conflict.¹

All members of the Council made statements which noted, inter alia, the increasing problem of the deliberate targeting of civilian populations; the importance of the prevention of conflict and ensuring respect for international law; the need to ensure effective and unconditional protection of children in armed conflict and an end to attacks against humanitarian workers and unimpeded access to the population in need; the danger posed by the manufacturing and marketing of weapons, particularly small arms; the danger of landmines to civilians; and the need for clear mandates incorporating protection of civilians for United Nations peacekeeping missions. Several speakers also called for the Secretary-General to report on the issue. Several speakers emphasized the importance of bringing to justice the perpetrators of crimes against civilians and other violations against humanitarian and human rights law. In that regard, a number of speakers also mentioned the importance of the International Tribunals for Rwanda and the former Yugoslavia.² Several speakers also mentioned the need to ensure that sanctions were targeted so they did not negatively affect the civilian population.³

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that, while it was clear that the Council was obliged to take measures to support the activities of international humanitarian organizations, his delegation was convinced that such support needed to be implemented in strict compliance with the Charter and needed first to take the form of political support. Only when all political and diplomatic methods had been exhausted could consideration be given to the question of using force to protect the civilian population and the personnel of the humanitarian organizations, and then only on the basis of the Charter. He noted that attempts to use humanitarian concerns to justify the unilateral use of force ran counter to the Charter.⁴

The representative of Brazil also noted that all peaceful and diplomatic efforts needed to be exhausted before the military option was contemplated.⁵

The representative of the Netherlands noted that the problem became more intractable when the recognized sovereign State was itself the terrorizing party. The Netherlands disagreed with those who believed that even then Article 2 (7), of the Charter of the United Nations provided the ultimate answer. He maintained that Article 2 (7) could never be read in isolation. He noted that the opening words of the Charter did not refer to sovereign States but to the peoples of the United Nations and that nothing contained in the Charter authorized a State to terrorize its own citizens.⁶

The representative of China expressed concern at the tendency in international relations to politicize humanitarian issues and interfere in a country's internal affairs under the guise of humanitarianism. In a humanitarian crisis, the willful invocation of Chapter VII of the Charter to use force, or even the unilateral use or threat of use of force, against a sovereign State without the authorization of the Council, with no consideration given to the specific causes of the crisis, would only complicate matters and further intensify the conflict. He also stated that in the light of the nature and scope of the matter, it was appropriate that the question of the protection of civilians in armed conflict be placed on the agenda of the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council for more thorough and comprehensive discussions.⁷

The Director of the International Committee of the Red Cross, the Executive Director of UNICEF and the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Children and Armed Conflict intervened a second time to respond to comments by members of the Council.⁸

At its 3978th meeting, held on 12 February 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council resumed its consideration of the item.

At the same meeting, the President (Canada) made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁹

⁹ S/PRST/1999/6.

The Security Council has considered the matter of protection of civilians in armed conflict.

The Council expresses its grave concern at the growing civilian toll of armed conflict and notes with distress that civilians now account for the vast majority of casualties in armed conflict and are increasingly directly targeted by combatants and armed elements. The Council condemns attacks or acts of violence in situations of armed conflict directed against civilians, especially women, children and other vulnerable groups, including also refugees and internally displaced persons, in violation of the relevant rules of international law, including those of international humanitarian and human rights law.

The Council is especially concerned about attacks on humanitarian workers, in violation of the rules of international law.

The Council notes that large-scale human suffering is a consequence of and sometimes a contributing factor to instability and further conflict, whether due to displacement, violent assault or other atrocities. Bearing in mind its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, the Council affirms the need for the international community to assist and protect civilian populations affected by armed conflict. The Council calls upon all parties concerned to ensure the safety of civilians and guarantee the unimpeded and safe access of United Nations and other humanitarian personnel to those in need. In this regard, the Council recalls the statement by its President of 19 June 1997 and also recalls its resolution 1208 (1998) of 19 November 1998 on the status and treatment of refugees.

The Council expresses particular concern at the harmful impact of armed conflict on children and, in this regard, recalls the statement by its President of 29 June 1998.

The Council calls upon all parties concerned to comply strictly with their obligations under international law, in particular their relevant obligations under the Hague Conventions, the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and the Additional Protocols thereto, of 1977, and the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child of 1989, as well as with all decisions of the Council.

The Council strongly condemns the deliberate targeting by combatants of civilians in armed conflict and demands that all concerned put an end to such violations of international humanitarian and human rights law. The Council expresses its willingness to respond, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, to situations in which civilians, as such, have been targeted or humanitarian assistance to civilians has been deliberately obstructed.

The Council also condemns all attempts to incite violence against civilians in situations of armed conflict and calls upon States to fulfil their obligations to take action at the national level. The Council affirms the need to bring to justice, in an appropriate manner, individuals who incite or cause violence against civilians in situations of armed conflict or who otherwise violate international humanitarian and human rights law. In this regard, the Council reaffirms the importance of the work being done by the ad hoc Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda and calls upon all States to cooperate with the Tribunals, in accordance with the relevant Council resolutions. The Council acknowledges the historic significance of the adoption of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court.

The Council notes the deleterious impact of the proliferation of arms, in particular small arms, on the security of civilians, including refugees and other vulnerable populations. In this regard, it recalls its resolution 1209 (1998) of 19 November 1998 which, inter alia, stressed the importance of all Member States, and in particular States involved in manufacturing and marketing of weapons, restricting arms transfers which could provoke or prolong armed conflicts or aggravate existing tensions or armed conflicts in Africa, and which urged international collaboration in combating illegal arms flows in Africa.

The Council expresses concern over the widening gap between the rules of international humanitarian law and their application. The Council welcomes the commemorative events planned to mark the fiftieth anniversary of the Geneva Conventions and the centenary of the first International Peace Conference, held at The Hague in 1899. These occasions provide an opportunity for a further exploration of ways and means by which the international community may enhance the compliance of parties to an armed conflict with the relevant rules of international law, including those of international humanitarian law.

The Council welcomes the continuing contribution to the implementation of international humanitarian law of the International Committee of the Red Cross.

The Council considers that a comprehensive and coordinated approach by Member States and international organizations and agencies is required in order to address the problem of the protection of civilians in situations of armed conflicts. To this end, the Council requests the Secretary-General to submit a report containing concrete recommendations to the Council by September 1999 on ways the Council, acting within its sphere of responsibility, could improve the physical and legal protection of civilians in situations of armed conflict. The report should also identify contributions the Council could make towards effective implementation of existing humanitarian law. The report should examine whether there are any significant gaps in existing legal norms, through the review of recent reports in this regard. The Council encourages the Secretary-General to consult the Inter-Agency Standing Committee in formulating his recommendations.

The Council affirms its intention to review the recommendations of the Secretary-General in accordance with its responsibilities under the Charter.

Deliberations of 22 February 1999
(3980th meeting)

At its 3980th meeting, held on 22 February 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council resumed its consideration of the item. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Canada), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Australia, Azerbaijan, Bangladesh, Burkina Faso, Costa Rica, the Dominican Republic, Egypt, El Salvador, Germany, Guatemala, Haiti, India, Indonesia, Jamaica, Japan, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, the Republic of Korea, Togo, Ukraine, Uruguay and Zambia, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The Council also invited the Permanent Observers of Switzerland and Palestine in accordance with the rules of procedure and the previous practice in that regard.

A number of speakers made statements, which stressed the importance, inter alia, of: (1) bridging the gap between existing international norms and their full respect and compliance (the importance of dissemination of knowledge of human rights and international humanitarian law among security forces and other participants in armed conflicts was highlighted); (2) ensuring unimpeded access of humanitarian workers to those in need; (3) enhancing the safety of humanitarian personnel; (4) the consideration of more effective measures to protect children in armed conflict, including raising the age limit for military recruitment to 18 years, and ensuring that children were always identified as a priority in all efforts to build peace and resolve conflicts; (5) dealing with the problem of anti-personnel land mines and small arms proliferation; (6) careful targeting of sanctions, so as to minimize their negative humanitarian impact and strict implementation of arms embargoes; (7) ending impunity from war crimes and crimes against humanity; (8) preventing the use of the news media, to the extent possible, as a tool of conflict; (9) seeking conflict prevention through the Council as a matter of priority; and (10) complementing coherent diplomatic, political and military measures with measures related to economic, humanitarian and development aspects of conflict management.¹⁰

¹⁰ S/PV.3980, pp. 3-4 (Germany on behalf of the European

The representative of New Zealand welcomed what he believed was the growing acceptance of the notion that the protection of individuals transcended the domestic affairs of States, and that national sovereignty was not an absolute in that context.¹¹

The representative of India maintained that there was no automatic right of access for humanitarian agencies, and that to press for it would violate both international humanitarian law and the sovereignty of States. He noted that weakening State authority, particularly that of Governments already under violent internal stress, through claims of a right of intervention not only violated international law, but also worked against the objective of ensuring that civilians under threat were protected as much as possible. Noting the recommendations that targeted sanctions be used both to ensure the protection of civilians and to punish those who violated their rights, he stressed that targeted sanction had two ends: to streamline the process for countries and agencies that imposed sanctions, and to try to limit, not human suffering, but the effects on the economic interests of those imposing sanctions.¹²

The representative of the Republic of Korea stated that the primary responsibility of the Council for the maintenance of international peace and security should not be limited to its involvement in the issues related to the traditional concept of States' security. Therefore, the Council should be encouraged to take a proactive approach to enhance its active engagement in the issue of human security by providing assistance and protection to civilians in armed conflict.¹³

The representative of Indonesia noted that, in this context, international law did not take precedence over national law so a balance needed to be sought so as not to violate national sovereignty or the purposes and principles of the Charter.¹⁴

The representative of Iraq expressed the view that any action to protect civilians should strictly observe Article 2 (7) of the Charter. He expressed the belief that bridging that Article would “throw the door wide open” to intervention into the internal affairs of States, especially at times of “rampant selectivity and double standards” in the Council.¹⁵

The representative of Israel stated that, to ensure respect for the Fourth Geneva Convention, it was necessary to advance education on humanitarian law, to utilize the legal process and to ensure the principle of freedom of access. On the freedom of access, he noted that States should risk unfair criticism rather than compromise it, as visible protection was the only protection for many civilians in times of war.¹⁶

The Permanent Observer of Palestine noted that on 4 December 1975, at the 1859th meeting of the Security Council, the Council had considered a request for participation of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), which had not been made under rule 37 and 39. The Council had decided on that date, by a vote, that an invitation would confer upon it the same rights of participation as were conferred upon a Member State when it was invited under rule 37. However, at the current meeting that practice had not been adhered to. He asked the Council to take another look into that procedural issue and he trusted that the aberration would be without prejudice to the established practice of the Council with regard to the future participation of Palestine.¹⁷

The President indicated that he would formally ask the Secretariat to look into the precedents cited by the Permanent Observer of Palestine.¹⁸

The representative of the United States, United Kingdom, the Russian Federation and Iraq took second interventions to respond to comments regarding the sanctions and no-fly zones in Iraq.¹⁹

Decision of 17 September 1999 (4046th meeting): resolution 1265 (1999)

On 8 September 1999, pursuant to the request in the statement by the President of the Council of 12 February 1999, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on how the Council could act to improve both the physical and legal protection of civilians in situations of armed conflict.²⁰ In his report the Secretary-General provided concrete recommendations to the Council covering a wide range of initiatives. He drew particular attention to nine proposals of particular importance. He began with two recommendations intended to strengthen permanently the capacity of the Council and the Organization to protect civilians in armed conflict: to take steps to strengthen the Organization’s capacity to plan and deploy rapidly; and to establish a permanent technical review mechanism of United Nations and regional sanctions which could ascertain the probable impact of sanctions on civilians. Next, there were four recommendations which could be employed by the Council upon receipt of information indicating that the outbreak of violence aimed at civilians might be imminent. The Secretary-General recommended that the Council impose arms embargoes in situations where civilians and protected persons were targeted by the parties to the conflict, or where the parties were known to commit systematic and widespread violations of international humanitarian and human rights law, including the recruitment of child soldiers. He also recommended that the Council make greater use of targeted sanctions to deter and contain those who commit egregious violations of international humanitarian and human rights law. Additionally, the Council should deploy international military observers to monitor the situation in camps for internally displaced persons and refugees when the presence of arms, combatants and armed elements was suspected; and deploy regional or international military forces prepared to take effective measures to compel disarmament of the combatants or armed elements.

Finally, he put forward three recommendations intended to alleviate the suffering of civilians where conflict had already broken out and where civilians were being targeted. He recommended that the Council, at the onset of a conflict, underscore in its resolutions the imperative for civilian populations to have unimpeded access to humanitarian assistance and for concerned parties, including non-State actors, to guarantee the security of humanitarian organizations, in accordance with the principles of humanity, neutrality and impartiality. The Council also needed to insist that failure to comply would result in the imposition of targeted sanctions. He also recommended that the Council ensure that, wherever required, peacekeeping and peace enforcement operations were authorized and equipped to control or close down hate media assets; and, in the face of massive and ongoing abuses, to consider the imposition of appropriate enforcement action with attention to repercussions upon civilian populations and the environment. When considering the imposition of enforcement actions, the Secretary-General stressed the importance of keeping in mind the following variables: the scope of the breaches of human rights and international humanitarian law, the inability of local authorities to uphold legal order or a pattern of complicity by local authorities, the exhaustion of peaceful or consent-based efforts to address the situation, the ability of the Council to monitor actions undertaken, and the applicability of limited and proportionate use of force.

At its 4046th meeting, held on 16 September 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Netherlands), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Botswana, Egypt, Finland, India, Iraq, Japan, Mongolia, Norway, Pakistan, the Republic of Korea, Rwanda, Slovakia, South Africa, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Tunisia, and Ukraine, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The Council also invited the Permanent Observers of Palestine and Switzerland in accordance with the rules of procedure and the previous practice in that regard. The Council further invited the head of the delegation of the International Committee of the Red Cross, under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure.

At the same meeting, the Secretary-General made a brief statement presenting his report.²¹

Speakers highlighted a variety of issues, including the culture of impunity and accountability for breaches of international humanitarian and human rights law. Speakers' statements addressed, inter alia, compliance of non-State actors with international law; the need to develop targeted sanctions; raising the legal age for military recruitment; and humanitarian access. A number of speakers called for States to ratify the additional protocols of the Geneva Conventions. All speakers expressed their concern over the seriousness of the issue of civilians in armed conflict and welcomed the action-oriented recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-General.²²

The representative of Malaysia stated that the imposition of Article 41 of the Charter and the use of coercive action under Chapter VII needed to be adopted only as a mechanism of last resort.²³

The representative of Norway noted that the Council had consistently reaffirmed its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, and on several occasions had recognized that massive and systematic breaches of international humanitarian and human rights law represent a threat to international peace and security.²⁴

The representative of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia stated that the best things for the Council to do to prevent the spread of the non-observance of international humanitarian law would be for the Council to take immediate action to freeze or to stop a conflict and to undertake measures aimed at finding solutions. The Council needed to be resolute, inventive and innovative and act under Article 24 (2), of the Charter. He also stressed that permanent members needed to avoid acting under Article 27 (3), as under Article 24 (1), the Council was requested to act on behalf of Member States.²⁵

The representative of Egypt stated that Article 24 of the Charter defined the role of the Council, which was its responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security. In carrying out that task, it was duty-bound to respect the purposes and principles of the Charter. The mandate of the Council was to decide whether the continuation of a conflict might threaten international peace and security and to submit a report in that connection containing recommendations on ways to resolve the conflict pursuant to Chapter VI. The Council might also act within the framework of Chapter VII if it felt that peace was threatened or violated or if it believed that incidents constituted aggression pursuant to Article 39 of the Charter. He stressed that the legal framework for Council action was defined by respect for the purposes and principles of the Charter: the non-use of force except in the implementation of Council resolutions adopted pursuant to Chapter VII. That meant that a conflict must threaten or violate international peace or be deemed aggressive. The Council should not intervene in the internal affairs of States pursuant to Article 2 (7) of the Charter. The representative noted that a great deal of the report of the Secretary-General was devoted to humanitarian action and his country found that preponderance reflected neither in law nor in the common endeavours of States embodied in the agreements and resolutions of international organizations. He stated that Egypt questioned the logic of the report, which was to give the Council a role beyond that mandated by the Charter.²⁶

The representative of India stated that the recommendations in the report of the Secretary-General were far-reaching but required much deeper consideration. He recalled that Article 24 of the Charter set out the functions and powers of the Council, and Article 24 (2), noted that the specific powers granted to it were laid down in Chapters VI to VIII and Chapter XII. In each Chapter, the powers of the Council were narrowly defined by the Charter. Where it was given a role in an area not within its specified competence, as in Chapter XII, the Charter specified the limits of the authority of the Council. The representative maintained that the Council had no direct role in any of the other areas listed in Article 83 (3) and that was a principle that applied generally to the place of the Council in the United Nations system. That being the case, India found it odd that the bulk of the recommendations in the report invited the Council to take actions in areas not within its competence. The representative then provided an individual critique for each of the forty recommendations in the report of the Secretary-General.²⁷

The representative of Pakistan noted that at times one needed to “stretch one’s imagination considerably” to find the tenuous linkage between some of the recommendations and the mandate of the Council. He suggested that the Council might consider requesting the General Assembly to undertake the task of inviting the view of Member States on the report itself and its recommendations. Pending that, he suggested that the Council might call for the scrupulous application of the considerable body of existing international law to protect civilians in armed conflict.²⁸

The representative of Iraq stated that his country expected the Council to take into account the views put forward by States that were not members of the Council in the open debate held previously that year on the question of the protection of children and civilians in armed conflict. Those views needed to be integrated into the programme of work of the Council, in accordance with the functions of the Council, as contained in Article 24 of the Charter, under which it was to act as a representative of the States Members of the United Nations in the fulfillment of its duties, thereby complementing the work of the General Assembly, the Economic and Social Council, United Nations agencies and the international community in general.²⁹

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.³⁰ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1265 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling the statement by its President of 12 February 1999,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 8 September 1999, submitted to the Security Council in accordance with the above-mentioned statement,

Taking note of the reports of the Secretary-General on the causes of conflict and the promotion of durable peace and sustainable development in Africa and on the protection for humanitarian assistance to refugees and others in conflict situations, of 13 April and 22 September 1998, respectively, in particular their analysis related to the protection of civilians,

Noting that civilians account for the vast majority of casualties in armed conflicts and are increasingly targeted by combatants and armed elements, gravely concerned by the hardships borne by civilians during armed conflict, in particular as a result of acts of violence directed against them, especially women, children and other vulnerable groups, including refugees and internally displaced persons, and recognizing the consequent impact this will have on durable peace, reconciliation and development,

Bearing in mind its primary responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security, and underlining the importance of taking measures aimed at conflict prevention and resolution,

Stressing the need to address the causes of armed conflict in a comprehensive manner in order to enhance the protection of civilians on a long-term basis, including by promoting economic growth, poverty eradication, sustainable development, national reconciliation, good governance, democracy, the rule of law and respect for and protection of human rights,

Expressing its deep concern at the erosion in respect for international humanitarian, human rights and refugee law and principles during armed conflict, in particular by deliberate acts of violence against all those protected under such law, and expressing its concern also at the denial of safe and unimpeded access to people in need,

Underlining the importance of the widest possible dissemination of international humanitarian, human rights and refugee law and of relevant training for, inter alia, civilian police, armed forces, members of the judicial and legal professions, civil society and personnel of international and regional organizations,

Recalling the statement by its President of 8 July 1999, and emphasizing its call for the inclusion, as appropriate, within specific peace agreements and, on a case-by-case basis, within United Nations peacekeeping mandates, of clear terms for the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of ex-combatants, including the safe and timely disposal of arms and ammunition,

Mindful of the particular vulnerability of refugees and internally displaced persons, and reaffirming the primary responsibility of States to ensure their protection, in particular by maintaining the security and civilian character of camps for refugees and internally displaced persons,

Underlining the special rights and needs of children in situations of armed conflict, including those of the girl child,

Recognizing the direct and particular impact of armed conflict on women as referred to in paragraph 18 of the report of the Secretary-General, and in this regard welcoming the ongoing work within the United Nations system on the implementation of a gender perspective in humanitarian assistance and on violence against women,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 8 September 1999, and takes note of the comprehensive recommendations contained therein;

2. Strongly condemns the deliberate targeting of civilians in situations of armed conflict as well as attacks on objects protected under international law, and calls upon all parties to put an end to such practices;

3. Emphasizes the importance of preventing conflicts which could endanger international peace and security, and, in this context, highlights the importance of implementing appropriate preventive measures to resolve conflicts, including the use of United Nations and other dispute-settlement mechanisms and of preventive military and civilian deployments, in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, resolutions of the Security Council and relevant international instruments;

4. Urges all parties concerned to comply strictly with their obligations under international humanitarian, human rights and refugee law, in particular those contained in the Hague Conventions of 1899 and 1907 and in the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and the Additional Protocols thereto, of 1977, as well as with the decisions of the Security Council;

5. Calls upon States which have not already done so to consider ratifying the major instruments of international humanitarian, human rights and refugee law, and to take appropriate legislative, judicial and administrative measures to implement those instruments domestically, drawing on technical assistance, as appropriate, from relevant international organizations, including the International Committee of the Red Cross and United Nations bodies;

6. Emphasizes the responsibility of States to end impunity and to prosecute those responsible for genocide, crimes against humanity and serious violations of international humanitarian law, affirms the possibility, to this end, of using the International Fact-Finding Commission established by article 90 of Additional Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions, reaffirms the importance of the work being done by the ad hoc Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda, stresses the obligation of all States to cooperate fully with the Tribunals, and acknowledges the historic significance of the adoption of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court which is open for signature and ratification by States;

7. Underlines the importance of safe and unhindered access of humanitarian personnel to civilians in armed conflict, including refugees and internally displaced persons, and the protection of humanitarian assistance to them, and recalls in this regard the statements by its President of 19 June 1997 and 29 September 1998;

8. Emphasizes the need for combatants to ensure the safety, security and freedom of movement of United Nations and associated personnel, as well as personnel of international humanitarian organizations, and recalls in this regard the statements by its President of 12 March 1997 and 29 September 1998;

9. Takes note of the entry into force of the Convention on the Safety of United Nations and Associated Personnel of 1994, recalls the relevant principles contained therein, urges all parties to armed conflicts to respect fully the status of United Nations and associated personnel, and in this regard condemns attacks and the use of force against United Nations and associated personnel, as well as personnel of international humanitarian organizations, and affirms the need to hold accountable those who commit such acts;

10. Expresses its willingness to respond to situations of armed conflict where civilians are being targeted or humanitarian assistance to civilians is being deliberately obstructed, including through the consideration of appropriate measures at the disposal of the Council in accordance with the Charter, and notes, in that regard, the relevant recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-General;

11. Also expresses its willingness to consider how peacekeeping mandates might better address the negative impact of armed conflict on civilians;

12. Expresses its support for the inclusion, where appropriate, in peace agreements and mandates of United Nations peacekeeping missions, of specific and adequate measures for the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of ex-combatants, with special attention given to the demobilization and reintegration of child soldiers, as well as clear and detailed arrangements for the destruction of surplus arms and ammunition, and in this regard recalls the statement by its President of 8 July 1999;

13. Notes the importance of including in the mandates of peacemaking, peacekeeping and peacebuilding operations special protection and assistance provisions for groups requiring particular attention, including women and children;

14. Requests the Secretary-General to ensure that United Nations personnel involved in peacemaking, peacekeeping and peace-building activities have appropriate training in international humanitarian, human rights and refugee law, including child and gender-related provisions, negotiation and communication skills, cultural awareness and civilian-military coordination, and urges States and relevant international and regional organizations to ensure that appropriate training is included in their programmes for personnel involved in similar activities;

15. Underlines the importance of civilian police as a component of peacekeeping operations, recognizes the role of police in assuring the safety and well-being of civilians, and in this regard acknowledges the need to enhance the capacity of the United Nations for the rapid deployment of qualified and well-trained civilian police;

16. Reaffirms its readiness, whenever measures are adopted under Article 41 of the Charter, to give consideration to their impact on the civilian population, bearing in mind the needs of children, in order to consider appropriate humanitarian exemptions;

17. Notes that the excessive accumulation and destabilizing effect of small arms and light weapons pose a considerable impediment to the provision of humanitarian assistance and have a potential to exacerbate and prolong conflicts, endanger the lives of civilians and undermine security and the confidence required for a return to peace and stability;

18. Takes note of the entry into force of the Convention on the Prohibition of the Use, Stockpiling, Production and Transfer of Anti-personnel Mines and on their Destruction, of 1997 and the amended Protocol on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Mines, Booby Traps and Other Devices (Protocol II) annexed to the Convention on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Certain Conventional Weapons Which May Be Deemed to Be Excessively Injurious or to Have Indiscriminate Effects, of 1980, recalls the relevant provisions contained therein, and notes the beneficial effect that their implementation will have on the safety of civilians;

19. Reiterates its grave concern at the harmful and widespread impact of armed conflict on children, recalls its resolution 1261 (1999) of 25 August 1999, and reaffirms the recommendations contained therein;

20. Stresses the importance of consultation and cooperation between the United Nations, the International Committee of the Red Cross and other relevant organizations, including regional organizations, on follow-up to the report of the Secretary-General, and encourages the Secretary-General to continue consultations on this subject and to take concrete actions aimed at enhancing the capacity of the United Nations to improve the protection of civilians in armed conflict;

21. Expresses its willingness to work in cooperation with regional organizations to examine how these bodies might better enhance the protection of civilians in armed conflict;

22. Decides to establish immediately an appropriate mechanism to review further the recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-General and to consider appropriate steps by April 2000 in accordance with its responsibilities under the Charter;

23. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

44. Small arms

Initial proceedings

Decision of 24 September 1999 (4048th meeting): statement by the President

At its 4048th meeting, held on 24 September 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the item entitled “Small arms” in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (the Netherlands) noted that the Council was holding a ministerial meeting on the question of small arms in the context of the challenges facing the international community in this regard.¹

At the outset, the Secretary-General acknowledged the importance of addressing the problem of small arms and light weapons, which posed one of the key challenges in preventing conflict in the next century. He stated that small arms were not only primary tools of violence in many conflicts, but also aggravated the violence associated with terrorism and organized crime. In his view, there was probably no single tool of conflict so widespread, so easily available and so difficult to restrict as small arms. Citing the General Assembly’s decision to convene a conference on all aspects of illicit arms trafficking no later than 2001, the Secretary-General urged the international community to seize the opportunity provided by that conference to demonstrate its political will and its commitment to reversing the global proliferation of small arms. The larger efforts to promote peace and security, he stressed, depended to a greater extent on how the smaller, more specific challenges of limiting the tools of war and violence were tackled.²

The representative of France pointed to the “proliferation of internal conflicts” in which the distinction between combatants and civilians was blurred, and noted that this type of conflict lent itself best to small arms and light weapons. He called for a multifaceted, integrated approach to address the problem.³

The representative of the United Kingdom noted that most of the conflicts had taken place in the developing world, but most of the firearms were made in the industrialized world.⁴

The representative of Malaysia maintained that the United Nations, particularly the Council, could and should play a critical role in checking the proliferation of small arms. The challenge before the Council was to define the problem, which had many complexities — political, legal, technical, economic and social — and formulate appropriate and effective approaches to deal with it.⁵

The representative of Canada highlighted the devastating impact of small arms by pointing out that civilians constituted over 80 per cent of casualties in armed conflict and more than a million people died each year as a result of those conflicts, with 90 per cent of those deaths caused by small arms.⁶

The representative of Namibia stressed that the effort to rid Africa of its superfluous small arms was a shared responsibility for the region's leaders as well as for the international community as a whole.⁷

The representative of Gabon underlined the urgent need to adopt or strengthen measures, on the national, regional and international levels, to regulate the proliferation of small arms and light weapons,⁸ while the representative of Gambia called on the Council to make constructive efforts to ensure the effectiveness of arms embargoes.⁹

The representative of the United States maintained that it was time to address the economy of war that supported illicit arms flows, as, in many instances, these transactions were fuelled by sales of gemstones, precious metals and narcotics.¹⁰

A number of other speakers made statements sharing the concern at the proliferation of small arms and light weapons, and calling for a coherent approach in addressing the question taking into account all aspects of it. Most speakers agreed that the Council had its own distinctive role to play, including improving the effectiveness of arms embargoes and strengthening disarmament, demobilization and reintegration efforts.¹¹

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹²

The Security Council recalls its primary responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security, in view of which its attention is drawn inevitably to small arms and light weapons as the most frequently used weapons in the majority of recent armed conflicts.

The Council notes with grave concern that the destabilizing accumulation of small arms has contributed to the intensity and duration of armed conflicts. The Council also notes that the easy availability of small arms can be a contributing factor to undermining peace agreements, complicating peace-building efforts and impeding political, economic and social development. In this regard, the Council acknowledges that the challenge posed by small arms is multifaceted and involves security, humanitarian and development dimensions.

The Council is deeply concerned that countries involved in, emerging from, or close to protracted armed conflicts are particularly vulnerable to violence resulting from the indiscriminate use of small arms in armed conflict. In this regard, the Council recalls the report of the Secretary-General of 8 September 1999 on the protection of civilians in armed conflict and its resolution 1265 (1999) of 17 September 1999.

The Council emphasizes that the right of individual and collective self-defence recognized in Article 51 of the Charter and the legitimate security demands of all countries should be fully taken into account. The Council recognizes that small arms are traded globally for legitimate security and commercial considerations. Bearing in mind the considerable volume of this trade, the Council underlines the vital importance of effective national regulations and controls on small arms transfers. The Council also encourages the Governments of arms-exporting countries to exercise the highest degree of responsibility in these transactions.

The Council emphasizes that the prevention of illicit trafficking is of immediate concern in the global search for ways and means to curb the wrongful use of small arms, including their use by terrorists.

The Council welcomes the various initiatives that are currently under way, globally and regionally, to address the issue. These initiatives at the regional level include the moratorium of the Economic Community of West African States on the production and trade in small arms, the Inter-American Convention Against the Illicit Manufacturing of and Trafficking in Firearms, Ammunition, Explosives, and Other Related Materials, the European Union Joint Action on Small Arms, and the European Union Code of Conduct on Arms Exports. At the global level, the Council welcomes the negotiation process on the elaboration of an international convention against transnational organized crime, including a draft protocol against the illicit manufacturing of and trafficking in firearms, ammunition and other related materials.

The Council emphasizes the importance of regional cooperation in tackling the issue of illicit trafficking in small arms. Initiatives, such as the work done by the Southern African Development Community and the Southern African Regional Police Commissioners Coordinating Organization, illustrate how regional cooperation can be harnessed to tackle small arms proliferation. The Council recognizes that while regions may sometimes benefit from the experiences of others, one region's experience cannot be extended to others without taking into account their different characteristics.

The Council also welcomes and encourages efforts to prevent and combat the excessive and destabilizing accumulation of and illicit trafficking in small arms, and invites Member States to involve civil society in these efforts.

The Council notes with satisfaction the growing attention paid within the United Nations system to the problems associated with the destabilizing accumulation of small arms. The Council welcomes the initiative by the Secretary-General for Coordinated Action on Small Arms, designed to ensure a coherent and coordinated approach to the small arms issue within the United Nations system.

The Council notes that although the humanitarian impact of small arms in a conflict situation is verifiably serious, a detailed analysis is not available. The Council therefore requests the Secretary-General to include specifically the humanitarian and socio-economic implications of the excessive and destabilizing accumulation and transfer of small arms and light weapons, including their illicit production and trade, in relevant studies he is currently undertaking.

The Council calls for effective implementation of arms embargoes, imposed by the Council in its relevant resolutions. The Council encourages Member States to provide the sanctions committees with available information on alleged violations of arms embargoes and recommends that the chairmen of the sanctions committees invite relevant persons from organs, organizations and committees of the United Nations system, as well as other intergovernmental and regional organizations and other parties concerned, to provide information on issues relating to the implementation and enforcement of arms embargoes.

The Council also calls for measures to discourage arms flows to countries or regions engaged in or emerging from armed conflicts. The Council encourages Member States to establish and abide by voluntary national or regional moratoria on arms transfers with a view to facilitating the process of reconciliation in these countries or regions. The Council recalls the precedents for such moratoria and the international support extended for their implementation. The Council recognizes the importance of incorporating, as appropriate, within specific peace agreements, with the consent of the parties, and on a case-by-case basis within United Nations peacekeeping mandates, clear terms for the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of ex-combatants, including the safe and timely disposal of arms and ammunition. The Council requests the Secretary-General to provide the negotiators of peace accords with a record of best practice based upon experience in the field.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to develop a reference manual for use in the field on ecologically safe methods of weapons destruction in order better to enable Member States to ensure the disposal of weapons voluntarily surrendered by civilians or retrieved from former combatants. The Council invites Member States to facilitate the preparation of such a manual.

The Council welcomes the recommendations of the Group of Governmental Experts on Small Arms, including the convening of an international conference on the illicit arms trade in all its aspects no later than 2001, noting the offer by Switzerland to host the conference. The Council encourages Member States to participate actively and constructively in the conference and any preparatory meetings, taking into account the recommendations contained in this statement, with a view to ensuring that the conference makes a meaningful and lasting contribution to reducing the incidence of illicit arms trafficking.

45. Role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflicts

Initial proceedings

Decision of 30 November 1999 (4073rd meeting): statement by the President

At its 4072nd meeting, held on 29 November 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the item "Role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflicts" in its agenda. The President (Slovenia), with the consent of the Council, then invited the representatives of Australia, Bangladesh, Belarus, Croatia, Egypt, Finland, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Iraq, Japan, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Liechtenstein, New Zealand, Nigeria, Norway, Pakistan, the Republic of Korea, Senegal, South Africa, the Sudan, Ukraine, the United Arab Emirates and Zambia, at their request, to participate in the discussion, without the right to vote.

The Secretary-General stated that it was clear that the prevention of armed conflicts was one of the main tasks of the Organization, and yet the United Nations found itself dealing with the effects of conflict rather than its roots. He noted that the case for prevention was that it was cost-effective, in financial as well as in human terms. He informed the Council that he had tried to strengthen the capacity of the United Nations for preventive diplomacy, preventive disarmament, preventive deployment and both pre-conflict and post-conflict peacebuilding. However, efforts would fall short unless they were complemented by a renewed commitment to effective prevention on the part of the Council and of all Member States. He suggested several steps that the Council could take, including: the greater use of fact-finding missions in accordance with the Council's Charter responsibility to "investigate any dispute, or any situation which might lead to international friction or give rise to a dispute" and "endanger the maintenance of international peace and security"; encouraging States which had become aware of potential conflict within or among their neighbours to bring the issue promptly to the Council's attention; giving urgent attention to the problems of States which suffered acute economic, environmental and security strains; establishing an informal working group or a subsidiary organ, to study early warning and prevention issues and report back; and instituting regular meetings on prevention, at which the Council would identify areas that would require urgent preventive action. The Secretary-General maintained that in the longer term it was even more important to address the deep-rooted causes of conflicts, which often lay in the social and economic sphere. Noting that deterrence also had an important role to play in maintaining international order, he stressed that nothing would be more effective in deterring States and other parties from resorting to the extreme measures that characterize too many present-day conflicts than a clear demonstration that the Council was indeed prepared to take decisive action when faced with crimes against humanity.¹

The representative of the United States expressed hope that the Council would increasingly address conflict prevention by dealing with causes. He stated that there was a need for a comprehensive approach to conflict prevention. The promotion of democracy, human rights, the rule of law, equal economic opportunity and market-based economic systems provided the surest path to long-term global stability and development. He noted that the Secretary-General played an important role in identifying and mitigating potential conflicts and also suggested that the Council needed to become more deeply engaged. However, both the complexity and volume of recent crises demonstrated the need for coordinated and broader responses through better coordination with regional and subregional organizations and international development and financial institutions. He also noted the need to enhance the capability of the United Nations to recruit, train and deploy international civilian police and the importance of effective measures to combat the illicit trade in commodities.²

The representative of France welcomed the contribution of the Secretary-General and noted that it was Article 99 of the Charter that gave the Secretary-General the power and the right to contribute to the maintenance of international peace and security. The Charter also gave the Council a role in the prevention of armed conflict. Chapter VI of the Charter, which related to the pacific settlement of disputes, set out the role the Council could play in assisting the parties, in determining whether the persistence of a dispute seemed to threaten the maintenance of international peace and security, and in recommending procedures or methods of adjustment, or even the terms of a settlement. Chapter VII of the Charter dealt with actions in the event of a threat to the peace. He noted that even there it was still in the preventive stage, and the Council had a range of resources that could go as far as the use of enforcement measures. He stated that preventive action often required discretion and tenacity, virtues that were not well adapted to the constraints of an "ultra-media-oriented world". He suggested that while sometimes it could be useful for the Council to deal openly and publicly with an issue so as to mobilize attention and put pressure on the parties, in other cases it could be preferable to act with discretion. He further noted that, as most recent conflicts were internal, their prevention could be seen as an infringement of the principle of State sovereignty. However, if action was not taken soon enough, an internal crisis could rapidly degenerate into an armed conflict which often had international repercussions. It was therefore necessary to find a balance between those "apparently contradictory preoccupations" in such a way that the Council could be called upon early enough to prevent a spiral of violence. He noted that in this respect the text of the Charter did not exclude the Council from debating an internal situation if, according to Article 34 the continuance of the situation was "likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security" or, as in Article 39, if the Security Council should determine the existence of any threat to the peace". However, he stressed that one must not confuse debate with having recourse to force, which came under other provisions that were precise and limiting. The Council could take up an issue and take preventive measures without necessarily envisaging the use of force.³

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that his Government shared the Secretary-General's belief that there was a joint responsibility to act when confronted by genocide, mass displacement of people or major breaches of international humanitarian law. He maintained that preventive actions could take many forms, and military action would not always be desirable or feasible. But when the international community did use force in response to humanitarian crises, it needed a framework for that response: a common understanding within the Council and wider United Nations membership of the circumstances and conditions of action. Force needed to be used as a last resort, be limited in scope, and be proportionate to the humanitarian objective of preventing major loss of civilian life.⁴

The representative of China stated that there was often debate on intervention and even invocation of Chapter VII of the Charter, while neither the issue of prevention nor serious study into the root causes of conflicts was given adequate attention. He noted that there were various kinds of measures that could be taken. However, they had to abide by the general principle that actions needed to be taken in accordance with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations. The Chinese delegation maintained that all preventive measures needed to be taken only under the prerequisite of respect for the political independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of all countries and the will of the Government and people of the country concerned. He underscored that the principle of non-interference in internal affairs was the primary principle guiding United Nations actions in conflict prevention. He recommended that to prevent armed conflicts from occurring in the first place, the Council needed to take a long-term view and take meaningful steps to help developing countries in their economic development. In conclusion, he noted that the Council needed to treat all regions of the world equally, especially in the case of Africa. There could be no preferential treatment for one or neglect of another.⁵

The Russian Federation stated that a key role in preventive diplomacy rightly belonged to the United Nations, and the main issues of preventive strategy as well as political monitoring of their implementation needed to remain exclusively within the purview of the Council. He maintained that in fulfilling its Charter role as the body that bore major responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, the Council had the right to use a broad set of instruments established within the framework of the United Nations to prevent disputes from erupting into armed conflicts. However, his delegation was convinced that preventive services to Member States needed to be provided only with their consent and with respect for the principle of non-interference in internal affairs. Only the unequivocally expressed agreement of the host country to preventive actions could serve as a legal and political basis for the adoption of relevant measures and also serve as a guarantee for their effectiveness. In that connection, the Russian Federation proceeded from the premise that any United Nations response, including in situations of a humanitarian nature, needed to be undertaken pursuant to the Charter and through a decision of the Security Council.⁶

The representative of the Netherlands observed that all Council members subscribed to the purposes and principles of the Charter. These were contained in Chapter I of the Charter and included Article 2 (7), which stipulated that nothing shall authorize the United Nations to intervene in matters which were essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any State. He pointed out that everything the Charter said with regard to the prevention of armed conflict in Chapters VI and VII and in Article 99 appeared to have been drafted with conflicts between States in mind, while the overwhelming majority of conflicts on the Council's agenda were of an internal, domestic nature. Against that background, a rigid interpretation of Article 2 (7), would preclude adaptation to that reality and, in effect, make all the Charter's provisions on the prevention of armed conflict ineffectual. However, he noted that the Council should not feel restricted to the measures for preventing armed conflict found in Chapters VI and

VII as peacekeeping operations had not been mentioned in the Charter, but had become a major tool in the Council's hands.⁷

The representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya stated that the principles governing the work of the United Nations and its organs were set forth in Article 2 of the Charter, which provided for, inter alia, the sovereign equality of all its Members, settlement of disputes by peaceful means, Members' refraining from the threat or use of force in their international relations and non-interference in the internal affairs of States. Under Article 11 (1), the General Assembly might consider the general principles of cooperation in the maintenance of international peace and security, and make recommendations with regard to such principles to its Members, to the Council or to both. Under Article 24 of the Charter, Members of the United Nations had entrusted the Council with the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, and Member States agreed that the Council, in carrying out its duties under this responsibility, act on their behalf. In discharging these duties, the Council should act in accordance with the purposes and principles of the United Nations and the powers vested in the Council. Hence, the mandate for the maintenance of international peace and security was a joint responsibility of the General Assembly and the Security Council and, therefore, the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security was not an exclusive function of the Council. He continued that the Council's work and resolutions could not be respected or complied with by Member States unless they reflected the will of the majority of Member States, which was embodied in Article 25 of the Charter. He suggested that the majority of States represented in the General Assembly therefore needed to participate in the open debates held by the Council from time to time before the adoption of any important decisions by the Council, and should form the basis of any resolution adopted by the Council. He also suggested that the Council should not deal with subjects such as the illicit arms trade, human rights and drugs, because there were other competent organs in the United Nations system that could adequately deal with such subjects. He also stressed that his country expected the Council to respond to genuine potential threats anywhere in the world, in the real interest of world peace and security. Finally, he noted that regarding "humanitarian intervention" it was not difficult to cite problems in a given country in order to "justify and provide cover for an intervention" that had implicit and predetermined purposes that affected the interests of those who would intervene. Therefore, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya was not prepared to accept any resolution that would contravene paragraph 7 of Article 2 of the Charter, conveying the right to intervene in the domestic affairs of any State, even under the pretext of humanitarian considerations.⁸

The representatives of South Africa and the Sudan noted that the Council would be unable to assume its full role in the maintenance of international peace and security, particularly in the prevention of conflicts until it was transformed into a more representative body.⁹

A number of speakers made statements that stressed the importance of the Council's role in the prevention of armed conflicts in the context of its maintenance of international peace and security as set out in Articles 1 and 24 of the Charter. They noted, inter alia, the need for better information-gathering and analysis and for enhancing its early-warning capacity; the importance of coordination between different parts of the United Nations system; and the importance of coordination with regional organizations on the basis of Chapter VIII of the Charter. A number of speakers stressed the particular importance of the Council involvement in Africa in regard to prevention of conflicts. Several representatives stressed the importance of the use of provisions of Chapter VI of the Charter, in particular Article 33, in prevention of conflicts and the use of Chapter VII when appropriate. A number of speakers spoke in favor of the development of an early-warning system to identify potential conflicts. A number of delegations noted the particular importance of the role of the Secretary-General in providing information to the Council and other tasks in conformity with Article 99 of the Charter.¹⁰ Several delegations noted that before sanctions were imposed their scope and purpose needed to be defined and their duration clearly specified.¹¹

At the resumption of the meeting on 30 November 1999, the representative of Egypt stated that in implementing Chapter VI of the Charter, the Council had a mandate to take measures to prevent disputes and situations that were likely to endanger international peace and security. Yet, its means to do so were voluntary and fell within the framework of the peaceful resolution of conflicts. That required absolute respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of States and non-intervention in their internal affairs by attempting to obtain their approval before adopting or implementing such measures. Chapter VII also enabled the Council to assume a preventive role by calling on the parties to a conflict to take interim measures until the dispute was settled peacefully. Problems arose when the Council was either called upon or acted on its own to intervene and deal with situations within its mandate under Chapter VI by using the means provided by Chapter VII. Those Chapter VII provisions pertained to coercive and punitive measures and ranged from interim measures to the use of force. However, the use of Chapter VII to deal with situations that fell under Chapter VI transcended the authority of the edifice that was set up by the Charter, which was based on a careful and clear respect for the dividing line between those two Chapters. It was, therefore, absolutely important that any preventive intervention by the Council not cause collateral damage to the parties directly involved or to third parties whose interests were linked to one of the parties to the dispute. The Council needed to give the parties directly involved an opportunity to present their points of view to it before it made recommendations or implemented specific measures. He also called upon the Council to permit States that were not members of the Council and that might believe that their interests might be harmed by the Council's action to discuss the measures under consideration, in accordance with Article 31 of the Charter. He suggested that if the Council failed to fulfil its functions, then the only option was to resort to the General Assembly on the basis of the resolution "Uniting for Peace".¹² He expressed the belief that in its work the Council should not take up concepts that did not enjoy full acceptance by Member States, particularly those which remained controversial. Concepts such as "humanitarian intervention and humanitarian security" could prove to be more harmful than useful. He also stated that the Council should only adopt measures when it determined that a threat to peace existed or that an internal conflict might threaten international peace and security. It needed to do this in accordance with the provisions of Article 39 and with a full awareness of the serious implications of its actions if it decided to intervene by using force.¹³

The representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran cited the use of the veto and a "lack of transparency" in the work of the Council, and noted that that had been at the core of the Council's inaction in the face of the Kosovo tragedy and had prompted the use of force without the authorization of the Council. He called for better management of the mechanism of the veto.¹⁴

The representative of Pakistan stated that his country saw the concept of preventive disarmament as a possible means to militate against the inherent right to self-defence, which, would most likely be applied against the small and the weak. He also urged the Council to resist the temptation to seek to assume jurisdiction over some of the tasks assigned to other bodies of the United Nations.¹⁵

The representative of Iraq expressed the view that the Council should have been guided by the principle of the prevention of conflicts by using peaceful means and by avoidance of coercive measures, such as the resort to force, and punitive measures, such as full-scale sanctions. However, he continued that the Council's record in fulfilling that goal was very unsatisfactory for two main reasons: the manipulation by the United States of the mechanisms of the Council to enforce its policies and the use of force without specific authorization by the Council in order to intervene in the internal affairs of States. As an example, he cited the use of force by the United States and the United Kingdom against Iraq since 1991 in the “illegal no-fly-zones”.¹⁶

The representative of Slovenia stated that the powers of the Council should be used in situations of imminent armed conflicts, which at times meant situations of particular sensitivity and risk. In such circumstances, he noted, the States and others involved could be reluctant to accept the Council’s intervention. In his view, the argument of preservation of sovereignty could be used irrationally, even to the extent of actually endangering sovereignty in a potential armed conflict, which could be prevented by timely action by the Council.¹⁷

At its 4073rd meeting, held on 30 November 1999, the Security Council continued its consideration of the item. At the same meeting, the President (Slovenia) made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁸

The Security Council has considered, within its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, its role in the prevention of armed conflicts. The Council emphasizes the need fully to respect and implement the principles and provisions of the Charter of the United Nations and norms of international law, in particular, in this context, those related to prevention of armed conflicts and settlement of disputes by peaceful means. It affirms its commitment to the principles of the political independence, sovereign equality and territorial integrity of all States. The Council also affirms the need for respect for human rights and the rule of law. It will give special attention to the humanitarian consequences of armed conflicts. The Council recognizes the importance of building a culture of prevention of armed conflicts and the need for a contribution from all principal organs of the United Nations in that regard.

The Council stresses the importance of a coordinated international response to economic, social, cultural or humanitarian problems, which are often the root causes of armed conflicts. Recognizing the need for the development of effective long-term strategies, it emphasizes the need for all United Nations organs and agencies to pursue preventive strategies and to take action within their respective areas of competence to assist Member States to eradicate poverty, strengthen development cooperation and assistance and promote respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms.

The Council recognizes that early warning, preventive diplomacy, preventive deployment, preventive disarmament and post-conflict peace-building are interdependent and complementary components of a comprehensive conflict-prevention strategy. The Council emphasizes its continuing commitment to addressing the prevention of armed conflicts in all regions of the world.

The Council is aware of the importance of its early consideration of situations which might deteriorate into armed conflicts. In this context it underlines the importance of the settlement of disputes by peaceful means, in accordance with Chapter VI of the Charter of the United Nations. The Council recalls that parties to any dispute, the continuance of which is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security, have an obligation to seek peaceful means of settlement.

The Council reaffirms its responsibility under the Charter to take action on its own initiative in order to maintain international peace and security. The results of the Council’s mission to Jakarta and Dili from 6 to 12 September 1999 demonstrate that such missions undertaken with the consent of the host country and with clear goals can be useful if dispatched in a timely and appropriate manner. The Council expresses its intention to support, with appropriate follow-up action, efforts by the Secretary-General to prevent conflict through such areas as fact-finding missions, good offices and other activities requiring action by his envoys and Special Representatives.

The Council emphasizes the important role of the Secretary-General in the prevention of armed conflicts. The Council expresses its readiness to consider appropriate preventive action in response to the matters brought to its attention by States or the Secretary-General and which it deems likely to threaten international peace and security. It invites the Secretary-General to present to the members of the Council periodic reports on such disputes, including, as appropriate, early warnings and proposals for preventive measures. In this regard the Council encourages the Secretary-General to improve further his capacity to identify potential threats to international peace and security and invites him to indicate any requirements to fulfil that capacity, including the development of the expertise and resources of the Secretariat.

The Council recalls that the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force, as the first United Nations preventive deployment mission, has prevented the spillover of conflict and tensions from the region to the host country. The Council will continue to consider the establishment of such preventive missions in appropriate circumstances.

The Council will also consider other preventive measures such as the establishment of demilitarized zones and preventive disarmament. While fully conscious of the responsibilities of other United Nations organs, it emphasizes the crucial importance of disarmament and the non-proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and the means of their delivery for the maintenance of international peace and security. In particular, progress in preventing and combating the excessive and destabilizing accumulation of and illicit trafficking in small arms and light weapons is of vital importance to the prevention of armed conflicts. The Council will also take appropriate measures in situations of post-conflict peace-building aimed at preventing the recurrence of armed conflicts, including through adequate programmes for the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of ex-combatants. The Council acknowledges the increasingly important role of the civilian components of multifunctional peacekeeping operations and will look towards their playing a greater role in wider preventive efforts.

The Council recalls the provisions of Article 39 of the Charter concerning measures to prevent armed conflicts. Such measures may include targeted sanctions, in particular arms embargoes and other enforcement measures. In imposing such measures the Council will pay special attention to their likely effectiveness in achieving clearly defined objectives, while avoiding negative humanitarian consequences as much as possible.

The Council recognizes the link between the prevention of armed conflicts, the facilitation of the peaceful settlement of disputes and the promotion of security for the civilian population, in particular the protection of human life. Furthermore, the Council underlines the fact that the existing international criminal tribunals represent useful instruments to combat impunity and can, by helping to deter crimes against humanity, contribute to the prevention of armed conflicts. In this context, the Council acknowledges the historic significance of the adoption of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court.

The Council recognizes the important role that regional organizations and arrangements are playing in the prevention of armed conflicts, including through the development of confidence- and security-building measures. The Council also emphasizes the importance of supporting and improving regional capacities for early warning. It emphasizes the importance of cooperation between the United Nations and regional organizations in preventive activities in accordance with Chapter VIII of the Charter. The Council welcomes meetings between the United Nations, including the Security Council, and regional organizations, and encourages participants to continue to keep those meetings focused on issues related to prevention of armed conflicts.

The Council will continue to review its activities and strategies for the prevention of armed conflicts. It will consider the possibility of holding further orientation debates and strengthening its cooperation with the Economic and Social Council. The Council will also consider the possibility of a meeting at the level of Ministers for Foreign Affairs on the issue of prevention of armed conflicts during the Millennium Assembly.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Chapter IX

Decisions taken by the Security Council in the exercise of its other functions and powers

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council took a number of decisions in the exercise of its functions and powers other than those relating to the maintenance of international peace and security. The Council's practice relating to those decisions has been addressed elsewhere in this Supplement.

The practice of the Council in connection with (a) the appointment of the Secretary-General, and (b) the election of members of the International Court of Justice is dealt with in chapter VI.

Decisions of the Security Council on the question of the admission of new Members to the United Nations are dealt with in chapter VII.

Introductory note

Chapter X deals with the practice of the Security Council in relation to the peaceful settlement of disputes within the framework of Articles 33 to 38 of Chapter VI and Articles 11 and 99 of the Charter. The period under review was marked by a considerably expanded scope of Council action within the framework of Chapter VI of the Charter, the aim of which is to promote and institute appropriate methods for the peaceful settlement of disputes.

As chapter VIII of this volume sets out a full account of Council proceedings with regard to the peaceful settlement of disputes, the present Chapter will not consider in a comprehensive manner the practice of the Security Council aimed at the peaceful settlement of disputes. Instead, it will focus on selected material which may best serve to highlight how the provisions of Chapter VI of the Charter were interpreted in deliberations and applied in the relevant decisions of the Council.

The manner of presenting and classifying the relevant material has been devised to set forth the practices and procedures to which the Council has had recourse in a readily accessible form. As in the previous volume of the Repertoire, covering the period 1993-1995, the material has been categorized under thematic headings rather than individual Articles of the Charter, so as to avoid ascribing to specific Articles of the Charter Council proceedings or decisions, which do not themselves refer to any such Article.

Thus, part I illustrates how, under Article 35, Member States and non-Member States have brought new disputes and situations to the attention of the Security Council. This part also includes the practice of the General Assembly in calling the attention of the Security Council under Article 11, paragraph 3, to situations which are likely to endanger international peace and security, and the Secretary-General's practice in bringing to the attention of the Security Council matters which may threaten the maintenance of international peace and security, as ascribed under Article 99. Part II sets out investigative and fact-finding activities performed and initiated by the Security Council that may be deemed to fall under the scope of Article 34. Part III provides, under the relevant Articles of the Charter, an overview of Council recommendations and decisions with regard to the peaceful settlement of disputes. Specifically, it illustrates Council recommendations to the parties to a conflict and the Council's support for the endeavours of the Secretary-General in the peaceful settlement of disputes. Finally, part IV reflects constitutional discussions within the Security Council on the interpretation or application of the provisions of Chapter VI of the Charter.

The following articles of the Charter are cited in this chapter:

Article 11, paragraph 3

The General Assembly may call the attention of the Security Council to situations which are likely to endanger international peace and security.

Article 33

1. The parties to any dispute, the continuance of which is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security, shall, first of all, seek a solution by negotiation, enquiry, mediation, conciliation, arbitration, judicial settlement, resort to regional agencies or arrangements, or other peaceful means of their own choice.

2. The Security Council shall, when it deems necessary, call upon the parties to settle their dispute by such means.

Article 34

The Security Council may investigate any dispute, or any situation which might lead to international friction or give rise to a dispute, in order to determine whether the continuance of the dispute or situation is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security.

Article 35

1. Any Member of the United Nations may bring any dispute, or any situation of the nature referred to in Article 34, to the attention of the Security Council or of the General Assembly.

2. A state which is not a Member of the United Nations may bring to the attention of the Security Council or of the General Assembly any dispute to which it is a party if it accepts in advance, for the purposes of the dispute, the obligations of pacific settlement provided in the present Charter.

3. The proceedings of the General Assembly in respect of matters brought to its attention under this Article will be subject to the provisions of Articles 11 and 12.

Article 36

1. The Security Council may, at any stage of a dispute of the nature referred to in Article 33 or of a situation of like nature, recommend appropriate procedures or methods of adjustment.

2. The Security Council should take into consideration any procedures for the settlement of the dispute which have already been adopted by the parties.

3. In making recommendations under this Article the Security Council should also take into consideration that legal disputes should as a general rule be referred by the parties to the International Court of Justice in accordance with the provisions of the Statute of the Court.

Article 37, paragraph 1

Should the parties to a dispute of the nature referred to in Article 33 fail to settle it by the means indicated in that Article, they shall refer it to the Security Council.

Article 38

Without prejudice to the provisions of Articles 33 to 37, the Security Council may, if all the parties to any dispute so request, make recommendations to the parties with a view to a pacific settlement of the dispute.

Article 99

The Secretary-General may bring to the attention of the Security Council any matter which in his opinion may threaten the maintenance of international peace and security.

Part I

Referral of disputes and situations to the Security Council

Note

Within the framework of the Charter, Articles 35, 37 (1) and 38 are generally regarded as the provisions on the basis of which States may or, in the case of Article 37 (1), shall, refer disputes to the Security Council. During the period under review, disputes and situations were exclusively referred to the Council by communications from Member States. While Article 35 was expressly referred to in a small number of communications,¹ most communications did not cite any specific Article as the basis on which they were submitted. Also considered are referrals of such situations by the Secretary-General under Article 99 and the General Assembly under Article 11 (3).

¹ See the following communications addressed to the President of the Security Council: letter dated 9 January 1996 from the representative of Ethiopia (S/1996/10), concerning the extradition of the suspects wanted in the assassination attempt on the life of the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia; letter dated 8 June 1996 from the representative of Zaire (S/1996/413), concerning an alleged military attack by Uganda against Zaire; letter dated 30 July 1996 from the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya (S/1996/609), concerning alleged terrorist activities against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya; letter dated 25 August 1996 from the representative of Burundi (S/1996/690), concerning “an illegal economic blockade imposed by the States of the Great Lakes region”; letter dated 25 September from the representative of Afghanistan, concerning “an aggravated and alarming situation in Afghanistan” (S/1996/781); letter dated 3 February 1997 from the representative of Zaire (S/1997/98), concerning an alleged aggression by the armed forces of Uganda, Rwanda and Burundi; letter dated 12 March 1997 from the representative of Italy (S/1997/214), concerning the situation in Albania; letter dated 13 March 1997 from the representative of Albania (S/1997/215), concerning the situation in Albania; letter dated 5 July 1997 from the representative of Eritrea (S/1997/517), concerning “an aborted assassination plot by the National Islamic Front regime of the Sudan on Mr. Isaias Afwerki, President of Eritrea”; and letter dated 31 August 1998 from the representative of the Democratic Republic of the Congo (S/1998/827), concerning an alleged armed aggression by the Rwandan-Ugandan coalition against the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

In a note by the President,² the Security Council considered the simplification of the list of matters of which the Security Council is seized. As part of their efforts to improve the documentation of the Security Council, the President noted that the members of the Council had reviewed the list of matters of which it was seized. In that regard, he stated that the Council had decided that matters which had not been considered by the Council in the preceding five years would be automatically deleted from the list of matters of which the Security Council was seized. Furthermore, the Council noted that the removal of a matter from the list of matters of which the Security Council was seized had no implication for the substance of the matter and did not affect the exercise by Member States of their right to bring matters to the attention of the Security Council in conformity with Article 35 of the Charter of the United Nations.

Referrals by States

While Article 35 (2) provides that a State which is not a member of the United Nations may bring a dispute to the Security Council, no dispute or situation was submitted by a State other than a member of the United Nations during the period under review. For the most part, situations were referred to the Security Council by directly affected States, either exclusively³ or simultaneously with communications from third States.⁴ For example, the situation in Albania was brought to the Council's attention in a letter dated 12 March 1997 from the representative of Italy addressed to the President of the Security Council requesting the Council to convene a meeting.⁵ A similar request was made in a letter dated 13 March 1997 from the representative of Albania addressed to the President of the Security Council.⁶ Following both requests, the Council held its 3751st meeting to consider the situation in Albania, during which it issued a statement explicitly referring to the letters from the representatives of Italy and Albania,⁷ and requested the Secretary-General to keep it informed of any developments. In another instance, the situation in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia was brought to the Council's attention in a letter dated 24 March 1999 from the representative of the Russian Federation addressed to the President of the Security Council requesting a meeting.⁸ Following the request, the Council convened a meeting,⁹ and drew attention to letters from the representatives of the Federal Republic

⁴ For instance, the situation in Somalia was brought to the Council's attention by a letter dated 17 May 1999 from the representative of Ethiopia addressed to the President of the Council (S/1999/563). The situation in Somalia was also brought to the Council's attention by a letter dated 24 May 1999 from the representative of Djibouti addressed to the President of the Council (S/1999/600).

of Yugoslavia and Belarus requesting a similar meeting.¹⁰

Referrals by the Secretary-General

While Article 99 stipulates that the Secretary-General may bring any matter to the attention of the Security Council, he did not invoke Article 99, either expressly or by implication, during the period under review. However, he drew the attention of the Security Council to a deteriorating situation which was already on the Council's agenda, and requested the Council to consider taking appropriate action. In connection with the situation in the Great Lakes region, by a letter dated 14 October 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the Secretary-General referred to developments in eastern Zaire,¹¹ and especially in South Kivu Province, where the situation had been deteriorating.¹² In a subsequent letter, the Secretary-General informed the Council that the situation had further deteriorated.¹³ In response, the Council convened a meeting to consider both letters of the Secretary-General.¹⁴

In addition to the above-mentioned communications, the Secretary-General, as part of his general reporting obligations, informed the Security Council of relevant developments on matters of which the Council was seized.

Referrals by the General Assembly

Under Article 11 (3) of the Charter, the General Assembly may call the attention of the Security Council to situations which are likely to endanger international peace and security. During the period

under review, the General Assembly did not refer any matters to the Security Council under this Article.¹⁵

Nature of matters referred to the Security Council

According to Article 35, which, in the absence of evidence pointing to other Charter provisions, is commonly regarded as the basis on which matters are referred to the Security Council by States, any Member State may bring to the Council's attention "any dispute", or "any situation" which might lead to international friction or give rise to a "dispute". During the period under review, several new items were brought to the Council's attention, which were mostly referred to as "situation[s]".¹⁶ In other instances, the subject matter of the relevant communication was referred to by a different term, such as "conflict", or described in a narrative form.¹⁷

It should also be noted that, while the provisions of the Charter setting out the basis on which States may bring matters concerning international peace and security to the attention of the Council form part of Chapter VI of the Charter, the subject matter of communications submitted to the Council and the type of action requested in relation thereto are not limited by the scope of that Chapter. During the period under review, several communications submitted to the Council described situations as threatening¹⁸ or endangering regional or international peace and security, or as acts of aggression.¹⁹ For example, in connection with the situation concerning the Democratic Republic of Congo, by a letter dated 31 August 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the representative of the Democratic Republic of the Congo drew the attention of the Council to the aggression by the regular armies of Rwanda and Uganda against his country and stated that it posed a serious "threat to peace and security in the Central African region in general and in the Great Lakes region in particular".²⁰ By a statement of the President dated 31 August 1998, Council members expressed their deep concern about the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, which posed a serious threat to regional peace and security.²¹ Situations in which the Council did indeed determine the existence of a threat to the peace, a breach of the peace or an act of aggression are considered in chapter XI of this volume.

Action requested of the Security Council

In their communications to the Security Council, States for the most part requested the Council to convene a meeting of the Council (see table). In several instances, more concrete actions requested of the Council were specified. For example, in connection with the agenda item entitled "Letter dated 9 January 1996 from the representative of Ethiopia to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council, concerning the extradition of the suspects wanted in the assassination attempt on the life of the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt in Addis Ababa, on 26 June 1995", the representative of Ethiopia called on the Council to adopt a resolution commensurate with the gravity of the crime.²² Furthermore, in connection with the situation relating to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, following the air strikes by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, the representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia requested the Council to convene, "on the basis of Chapter VII of the Charter", an urgent meeting of the Security Council so that the Council might take immediate action to condemn and to stop the NATO aggression against his country and to protect its sovereignty and territorial integrity.²³

Communications

Disputes and situations were generally submitted to the Security Council by means of a communication to the President of the Security Council. In one instance, a Member State, by asserting that a dispute or situation did not pose a threat to international peace and security, also challenged the Council's general competence, under Chapter VI, to consider certain matters or make recommendations in relation thereto. Such instances may therefore be illustrated in this section even though the expression "threat to the peace" usually indicates the consideration of a situation before the Council under Chapter VII of the Charter.

In a letter dated 24 May 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the representative of Rwanda drew to the attention of the Security Council the fate of 3,000 Rwandan and Zairian families who were under siege by former Rwandan Government forces "responsible for the massacre of more than one million Tutsis and moderate Hutus in Rwanda" two years earlier. For that reason, he called for an emergency meeting of the Security Council "to take immediate action to prevent genocide in eastern Zaire".²⁴

In response, by a letter dated 3 June 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the representative of Zaire raised objections to the content of the above-mentioned letter and rejected the action by the representative of Rwanda which, in his opinion, was taken "in complete ignorance" of all the texts that governed the functioning of the Security Council. He stated that the unrest that had been occurring for some time in the Massisi region was a completely internal situation which the Zairian authorities were taking steps to resolve. Consequently, he argued that the situation referred to by that Rwanda was not one of the situations described in Article 33 of the Charter of the United Nations, as a dispute between parties which was "likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security". Moreover, he maintained that Rwanda was not involved in the unrest in Massisi and therefore could not invoke Article 35 of the Charter.

In several instances, however, matters were brought to the Council's attention through communications addressed to the Secretary-General.²⁵ For instance, by a letter dated 14 April 1998 addressed to the Secretary-General, the representative of Georgia made a complaint, concerning an alleged "ethnic-related massacre of Georgian civilians in the Gali region" by Abkhaz separatists, and requested that the letter be circulated as a document of the Council.²⁶

In accordance with rule 6 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure, the Secretary-General is obliged immediately to bring such communications to the attention of the Security Council.

Communications by which new disputes or situations were referred to the Council and on the basis of which the Council convened meetings under new agenda items during the period under review are listed in the table in this section entitled "Communications bringing disputes or situations to the attention of the Security Council during the period 1996-1999". It should be borne in mind that the designation of a new agenda item does not necessarily imply the existence of a new dispute or situation, as it can simply be a change in the formulation of the item on the agenda which has been before the Council. Communications by which Member States merely conveyed information, but did not request a Council meeting or other specific Council action, have not been included in the table, as such communications cannot be considered as referrals under Article 35. Furthermore, as in the previous Supplement, the table does not include communications referring to disputes or situations considered under the then-existing agenda items by the Council, so as not to codify or classify new developments and deterioration of situations in the ongoing conflicts. The above-mentioned delimitation criteria have been used only for the purpose of the table.

Investigation of disputes and fact-finding

Note

Article 34 provides that the Security Council may investigate any dispute or any situation which might lead to international friction or give rise to a dispute, in order to determine whether the continuation of the dispute or situation is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security. However, Article 34 does not exclude other organs from performing investigative functions, nor does it limit the Council's general competence to obtain knowledge of the relevant facts of any dispute or situation to dispatching a fact-finding mission.

During the period under review, the Council performed and initiated a number of investigative and fact-finding activities that may be deemed to fall within the scope of Article 34 or be related to its provisions. In one instance, the Council dispatched a mission consisting of Council members to Jakarta and Dili, which was specifically mandated to discuss with the Government of Indonesia concrete steps to allow the peaceful implementation of the 5 May 1999 agreement on the question of East Timor.²⁷ The Council mission was not expressly charged with concrete investigative tasks, but did serve, inter alia, to form an impression of the respective situation on the ground. Further details of the mission are laid out in case 1. References to the Security Council mission were also made in connection with mechanisms used for conflict prevention during the Council's consideration of the agenda item entitled "Role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflicts" as set out in case 2.

During the period under consideration, the Security Council adopted several decisions containing an explicit request to the Secretary-General to initiate or perform fact-finding or investigative functions. By resolution 1193 (1998) of 28 August 1998, the Council requested the Secretary-General to continue investigations into alleged mass killings of prisoners of war and civilians as well as the forced displacement of large groups of the population based on their ethnic origin and other forms of mass persecution in Afghanistan.²⁸ In connection with the situation concerning Rwanda, by resolution 1161 (1998) of 9 April 1998, the Security Council requested the Secretary-General to reactivate the International Commission of Inquiry to collect information and investigate reports relating to the sale, supply and shipment of arms and related materiel to former Rwandan government forces and militias in the Great Lakes region of central Africa, in violation of Security Council resolutions 918 (1994), 997 (1995) and 1011 (1995).²⁹

In another instance, in connection with the situation in Burundi, by a letter dated 25 July 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁰ the Secretary-General referred to resolution 1012 (1995) in which the Council had requested him to establish the International Commission of Inquiry concerning the assassination of the President of Burundi and the massacres that followed. In that regard, he enclosed a copy of the final report of the Commission. In the report, the Commission concluded that with the evidence at hand, it was not in a position to identify the persons that should be brought to justice for the crime. In response, by a letter dated 24 September 1996 addressed to the Secretary-General,³¹ the President noted that the members of the Council took note of the recommendations made by the Commission, and also noted its conclusion that its recommendations could not be implemented under the current conditions in Burundi.

In other instances, the Security Council, through letters, resolutions and statements by its President, welcomed, supported, encouraged or noted with satisfaction the dispatch by the Secretary-General of fact-finding missions to areas in conflict. For example, in connection with the agenda item entitled “Communications concerning relations between the Republic of Cameroon and the Federal Republic of Nigeria”, the members of the Security Council by a letter dated 29 February 1996 addressed to the President of the Republic of Cameroon and the Head of State and Commander-in-Chief of the armed forces of the Federal Republic of Nigeria,³² welcomed the Secretary-General’s proposal to the parties that he should send a fact-finding mission to the Bakassi peninsula, and also requested the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Secretary-General, of the Organization of African Unity, to continue to monitor the matter closely and to report to the Council on the results of the fact-finding mission and any other significant developments.

In connection with the situation in Afghanistan, by a statement of the President dated 16 December 1997,³³ the Council noted with deep concern the reports about mass killings of prisoners of war and civilians in Afghanistan and supported the Secretary-General’s intention to continue to investigate fully such reports. By two subsequent statements of the President dated 6 April 1998,³⁴ and 14 July 1998,³⁵ respectively, the Council expressed support for the Secretary-General to launch an investigation into alleged mass killings of prisoners of war and civilians in Afghanistan, the outcome of which was to be submitted to the General Assembly and the Security Council. By resolution 1214 (1998) of 8 December 1998, the Security Council expressly encouraged the Secretary-General to continue his efforts to dispatch a mission to Afghanistan to investigate numerous reports of grave breaches and serious violations of international humanitarian law in that country, in particular mass killings and mass graves of prisoners of war and civilians and the destruction of religious sites.³⁶

On one occasion, Member States and regional organizations requested the Security Council to carry out an investigation or a fact-finding mission to the Sudan, following the strike on the Al-Shifa Pharmaceutical Factory in the north of Khartoum.³⁷

21 August 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the representative of the Sudan requested the Council to send a technical mission of inquiry to establish the facts of the United States’ allegations and to take whatever steps were necessary to ensure that there was no recurrence, and to preserve the security and peace of his country (S/1998/786). By a subsequent letter dated 21 August 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the representative of Qatar, Chairman of the Group of Islamic States, endorsed that request and called upon the Security Council to send a fact-finding mission to the Sudan (S/1998/790). By a letter dated 21 August 1998 addressed to the President of the Council, the representative of Kuwait, acting in his capacity as Chairman of the Arab Group, noted that the Group had decided to support the request of the Sudan that the Security Council consider the matter of the United States’ attack on a pharmaceutical plant in Khartoum (S/1998/791). That request was reiterated again in a letter dated 22 August 1998 from the representative of the Sudan addressed to the President of the Security Council, requesting the Council to send a fact-finding and verification team to visit the Sudan (S/1998/792). By a letter dated 24 August 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the representative of Kuwait, in his capacity as Chairman of the Arab Group and on behalf of the States members of the League of Arab States, reiterated his request that the Council send a fact-finding mission to establish the nature of the products manufactured by the Al-Shifa Pharmaceutical Factory in Khartoum and to satisfy itself that the factory is not producing chemical weapons (S/1998/800). By a letter dated 25 August 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the representative of Namibia, Chairman of the African Group, requested the Council to dispatch a fact-finding mission to the Sudan to establish the facts surrounding the activities of the said pharmaceutical plant (S/1998/802). By a subsequent letter dated 25 August 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the representative of Colombia, acting in his capacity as Chairman of the Coordinating Bureau of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries again called for the Council to examine the situation and send a fact-finding mission to the Sudan (S/1998/804). By a letter dated 22 September 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the representative of the Sudan transmitted a statement made on 21 September 1998 by the Chairman of the Organization of African Unity on the Sudan, during which the latter stated that Africa supported the request made by the Sudan to the Security Council to send a fact-finding mission to the Sudan (S/1998/886). At its 3931st meeting, on 24 September 1998, the Council met to consider the agenda item entitled “The situation in Africa”. During the

Those requests for investigations did not result in the establishment or dispatch of an investigative body or fact-finding mission, neither did the Security Council adopt a decision referring to the matter nor meet to discuss the issue.

The following case studies set out details of the decision-making process involved in the Security Council mission to East Timor and Indonesia (case 1); and the “Role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflicts” (case 2).

*The situation in East Timor*³⁸

In connection with the situation in East Timor, by resolution 1236 (1999) of 7 May 1999, the Security Council welcomed the concluding of the Agreement between Indonesia and Portugal on 5 May 1999 on the question of East Timor.³⁹ It further welcomed the intention of the Secretary-General to establish as soon as practicable a United Nations presence in East Timor, with a view to assisting in the implementation of the Agreement.⁴⁰ meeting, the representative of Burkina Faso, speaking in his capacity as Chairman of the Organization of African Unity, referred to the bombing of the pharmaceutical factory in the Sudan, and reiterated that the Non-Aligned Movement, the States of the Arab League, and the Organization of African Unity supported the dispatch of an international commission of inquiry, as requested by the Sudan, to clarify fully the matter (S/PV.3931, p. 4). By a letter dated 25 November 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the representative of Yemen, acting in his capacity as Chairman of the Arab Group and on behalf of States members of the League of Arab States, transmitted a draft resolution prepared by the Arab Group. The text contained a request to the Secretary-General to dispatch a fact-finding mission to the Sudan “to verify the facts about the said factory, including its production and ownership” (S/1998/1120).

⁴⁰ Resolution 1236 (1999), paras. 1 and 3.

At its 4041st meeting, on 3 September 1999, the Council met to consider the situation in East Timor. During the debate, the Secretary-General made a statement announcing the result of the popular consultation conducted on 30 August 1999. In fulfilling the task entrusted to him by the Agreement, the Secretary-General announced that the result of the vote was 94,388 or 21.5 per cent, in favour and 344,580 or 78.5 per cent, against the proposal for special autonomy. By that result, the people of East Timor had thus rejected the proposed special autonomy and expressed their will to begin a process of transition towards independence.⁴¹

By a statement of the President dated 3 September 1999,⁴² the Council welcomed the successful popular consultation of the East Timorese people on 30 August 1999 and the letter dated 3 September 1999 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Council announcing the ballot result.⁴³ In the same statement, it recognized that the Agreement of 5 May 1999 which led to the popular consultation of the East Timorese people would not have been possible without the timely initiative of the Government of Indonesia and the constructive attitude of the Government of Portugal. Furthermore, it commended the sustained efforts of the Governments of Indonesia and Portugal, through the good offices of the Secretary-General, to find a just, comprehensive and internationally acceptable solution to the question of East Timor, and expressed its appreciation to the Government of Indonesia for its cooperation with the United Nations in the process.

By a letter dated 5 September 1999 addressed to the Secretary-General, the President of the Council informed the Secretary-General that it had agreed to dispatch a Security Council mission to discuss with the Government of Indonesia concrete steps to allow the peaceful implementation of the ballot result in East Timor.⁴⁴ The mandate of the mission was to welcome the undertaking by the Government of Indonesia to fulfil its obligations under the Agreement but also to note that the Government’s efforts so far had not been able to prevent an intensification of violence in the Territory. It was to state its particular concern at the recent campaign of violence against the United Nations Mission in East Timor (UNAMET) and urge the Government to ensure security and to allow UNAMET to implement its mandate without hindrance. The mission was asked to stress that the people of East Timor had made a clear choice in favour of independence, that their will must be respected and that the international community looked forward to working with the Government of Indonesia in bringing East Timor to independence.⁴⁵

In a letter dated 6 September 1999 from the President of the Council addressed to the Secretary-General,⁴⁶ the President informed him that its members had agreed on the terms of reference of the mission. He also stated that it was the intention of the mission to depart for Indonesia on 6 September 1999. The terms of reference for the presentation of the Security Council mission to the Government of Indonesia were the following:⁴⁷

1. The Security Council commends the sustained efforts of the Government of Indonesia through the good offices of the Secretary-General to find a just, comprehensive and internationally acceptable solution to the question of East Timor. It expresses its appreciation to the Government of Indonesia for its cooperation with the United Nations in this process.

2. The Council is nevertheless seriously concerned about the deteriorating security situation in East Timor, particularly since the popular consultation. The Council welcomes the undertaking by the Government of Indonesia that it will fulfil its obligations under the Agreement of 5 May 1999. But the Government's effort so far have not been able to prevent an intensification of violence in the territory.

3. The Council is particularly concerned at the campaign of violence against the United Nations Mission in East Timor in recent days. This has meant the closure of all but four of the Mission's regional offices; the Mission's headquarters is now under a virtual state of siege. The Council deplors the murders of local staff members of the Mission and the attack on 4 September 1999 which left an international staff member seriously wounded.

4. Reflecting the will of the international community, the Council is determined to see the Agreements of 5 May 1999 implemented fully. The people of East Timor have made a clear choice in favour of independence; their will must be respected.

5. For its part, the United Nations is bringing forward planning for phase III of the transition process. This will be done in consultation with the Government of Indonesia.

6. The International community is looking forward to working with the Government of Indonesia in bringing East Timor to independence. The Council urges the Government of Indonesia to ensure security and allow the Mission to implement its mandate without hindrance.

The Security Council mission to Jakarta and Dili transmitted its report⁴⁸ on 14 September 1999 to the Council. As one of its recommendations, the mission suggested that the Security Council should welcome the decision of the President of Indonesia to invite an international peacekeeping force to cooperate with Indonesia in restoring peace and security in East Timor, and should adopt a resolution without delay to provide a framework for the implementation of that proposal.

By resolution 1264 (1999) of 15 September 1999, the Council, welcoming the statement by the President of Indonesia of 12 September 1999 in which he expressed the readiness of Indonesia to accept an international peacekeeping force through the United Nations in East Timor, endorsed the report of the Security Council mission to Jakarta and Dili.⁴⁹

By resolution 1272 (1999) of 25 October 1999, the Security Council decided to establish, in accordance with the report of the Secretary-General,⁵⁰ a United Nations Transitional Administration in East Timor, which would be endowed with overall responsibility for the administration of East Timor and would be empowered to exercise all legislative and executive authority, including the administration of justice.⁵¹

By a statement of the President dated 30 November 1999 in connection with the agenda item entitled "Role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflicts", the Council reaffirmed its responsibility under the Charter to take action on its own initiative in order to maintain international peace and security. In that regard, it noted that the results of the Council's mission to Jakarta and Dili from 6 to

Role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflicts

At its 4072nd meeting, on 29 November 1999, the Council met to consider its role in the prevention of armed conflicts. During the debate, the Secretary-General stated that the Council should use the meeting to examine how it could make prevention a tangible part of its day-to-day work. In that regard, he suggested, inter alia, that the Council could make greater use of fact-finding missions, either by the Secretary-General or by the Council itself, at much earlier stages of a dispute in accordance with the Council's Charter responsibility to "investigate any dispute, or any situation which might lead to international friction or give rise to a dispute" and "endanger the maintenance of international peace and security"; and encourage States which became aware of potential conflict to bring the issue promptly to the Council's attention.⁵³

Speakers drew attention to the usefulness of the Security Council mission sent to Jakarta and Dili, noting that it had made international intervention possible following the popular consultation in East Timor in August 1999.⁵⁴

The representative of Canada stressed that the Council was served by the Office of the Secretary-General with the ability to mediate, investigate disputes, promote dialogue and send peace envoys. In that connection, he stated that the Council should take full advantage of this preventive capacity by backing the Secretary-General in those efforts. He further stated that the Council should make greater use of the provisions for the peaceful settlement of disputes under Chapter VI of the Charter, in particular by launching its own investigations into potential conflicts and encouraging Member States to bring such matters to the Council's attention. He noted that the practice of dispatching delegations of Council members to conflict situations to bring the will and commitment of the Council should be used sparingly as a preventive measure.⁵⁵ Similarly, the representative of Brazil said that in discussing the means to prevent armed conflict, there should be clarity about which tools were available to the Security Council in that endeavour. He emphasized that, guided by the provisions of Chapter VI of the Charter, the Security Council was in a unique position to promote, through negotiation and persuasion, "the ascendancy of reason where intolerance and misunderstanding prevail". In that regard, missions by Security Council members, based on the model of that to Timor and to Indonesia, should also perhaps become common practice.⁵⁶

The representative of Malaysia emphasized that there should be greater recourse to the use of preventive diplomacy, and that the positive outcome of the Council's mission to Jakarta and Dili would argue for greater utilization of this mechanism by the Council in respect of future conflict situations, before they got out of hand. He stated that it was perhaps timely to dispatch such a mission to Africa, as had been proposed by the Council.⁵⁷ Similarly, the representative of Finland, speaking on behalf of the European Union and associated and aligned countries,⁵⁸ stated that the Council's mission to East Timor and Indonesia was a good example of its success in using some of the tools at its disposal in a swift and decisive manner.⁵⁹

The representative of Japan pointed out that the mission had been effective not only in ensuring that the Council's debate was based on first-hand information but also in gaining the cooperation of the Government of Indonesia.⁶⁰ The representative of France described the mission as an example of the value of preventive Council action carried out publicly, but noted that in other cases it was preferable to act with discretion.⁶¹

The representative of Australia reiterated that the Council should be ready more often to deal directly with the parties to a dispute. She stated that such dialogue might take place in New York or through special missions, such as the highly successful Council mission to Indonesia to discuss the situation in East Timor. She believed that such missions could help ease tensions, could provide a very important circuit-breaker for a dispute or could clearly inform both sides of the risks of escalation and of the possible responses of the Council and of the international community should conflict ensue.⁶²

The representative of Argentina stated that the power to adopt preventive measures resided mainly with the Security Council, and that the Council should intensify its use of all options available under the Charter to establish conflict prevention. In that regard, he noted that the Charter provided a series of measures whose timely use could resolve situations of potential danger: for example, prompt investigation, in accordance with Article 34.⁶³

Reiterating the provisions contained in Article 34, the representative of New Zealand argued that there had also been some very positive developments in the Council's recent handling of its conflict prevention responsibilities. He noted that perhaps the highlight was the rapid dispatch of a mission of the Security Council to Indonesia and to East Timor in response to the violence following the popular consultation.⁶⁴

In contrast, the representative of the Sudan noted that in many of the issues the Council considered, and particularly those dealing with aggression, the Council had undertaken a policy of double standards. In his view the Council sometimes ignored cases of threats that actually endangered international peace and security. Referring to the bombing of the Al-Shifa pharmaceutical plant in Khartoum by the United States, he stated that although the issue had been on the Council's agenda for over a year, his country's request for the dispatch of a fact-finding mission had been ignored. He considered this to be "a clear indication of the injustice wrought towards the Sudan by the Council by not even sending a fact-finding mission to the Sudan".⁶⁵

By a statement of the President dated 30 November 1999 in connection with the role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflicts, the Council noted that it was aware of the importance of its early consideration of situations which could deteriorate into armed conflicts. In that context, it underlined the importance of the settlement of disputes by peaceful means, in accordance with Chapter VI of the Charter of the United Nations. The Council recalled that parties to any dispute, the continuance of which was likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security, had an obligation to seek peaceful means of settlement. Moreover, the Security Council reaffirmed its responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations to take action on its own initiative in order to maintain international peace and security.⁶⁶

Part III

Decisions of the Security Council concerning the pacific settlement of disputes

Note

Chapter VI of the Charter contains various provisions according to which the Security Council may make recommendations to the parties to a dispute or situation. According to Article 33 (2) of the Charter, the Council may call on the parties to settle their disputes by such peaceful means as provided for in Article 33 (1). According to Article 36 (1) the Council may “recommend appropriate methods or procedures of adjustment”. Article 37 (2) envisages that the Council may “recommend such terms of settlement as it may consider appropriate”, and Article 38 provides that it may “make recommendations to the parties with a view to a pacific settlement of the dispute”.

As part of its efforts aimed at the pacific settlement of disputes within the framework of Chapter VI of the Charter, the Council frequently endorsed or supported peace agreements concluded by the parties to a conflict, or recommended various methods or procedures of settlement, such as bilateral or multilateral negotiations,⁶⁷ political settlement or dialogue aimed at achieving national reconciliation,⁶⁸ such democratic means as elections⁶⁹ or the establishment of a representative government.⁷⁰ In several instances, the Council made recommendations with regard to good offices, mediation or conciliation efforts to be undertaken by the Secretary-General, or with regard to such efforts undertaken by Governments of neighbouring countries or regional leaders,⁷¹ or ⁶⁷ For instance, in connection with the situation in Burundi, by resolution 1049 (1996), the Security Council called upon all concerned in Burundi to engage, as a matter of urgency, in serious negotiations. In connection with the situation in Tajikistan and along the Tajik-Afghan border, by a statement of the President (S/PRST/1997/6), the Council urged the parties to make further substantive progress at the next rounds of the inter-Tajik talks. In connection with the situation in Afghanistan, by a statement of the President (S/PRST/1997/20), the Council called upon the Afghan parties to enter into sustained negotiations. By a subsequent statement of the President (S/PRST/1997/35), the Council expressed the belief that peace and stability in Afghanistan could best be attained through intra-Afghan political negotiations under United Nations auspices with the active and coordinated assistance of all countries concerned. In connection with the situation in Croatia, by resolution 1147 (1998), the Security Council urged the parties to take concrete steps towards a negotiated solution of the disputed issue of Prevlaka in good faith and without delay.

⁶⁸ For example, in connection with the situation in Burundi, by resolution 1049 (1996), the Security Council reiterated the urgent need for all concerned in Burundi to commit themselves to a dialogue aimed at establishing a permanent political settlement and the creation of conditions conducive to national reconciliation. In connection with the situation concerning the Democratic Republic of the Congo, by a statement of the President (S/PRST/1998/26), the Council called for the initiation of a peaceful process of political dialogue with a view to national reconciliation. In connection with the situation in Afghanistan, by a statement of the President (S/PRST/1996/40), the Council called upon the leaders of the Afghan parties to engage in a political dialogue aimed at achieving national reconciliation.

⁶⁹ To illustrate, in connection with the situation in Liberia, by resolution 1100 (1997), the Security Council emphasized that the holding of free and fair elections as scheduled was an essential phase of the peace process in Liberia. In connection with the situation concerning the Democratic Republic of the Congo, by a statement of the President (S/PRST/1997/31), the Council reiterated its call for rapid agreement on peaceful transitional arrangements leading to the holding of democratic and free elections with the participation of all parties.

undertaken under regional arrangements,⁷² by expressing its support and calling upon the parties to a conflict to cooperate with such efforts.⁷³

A useful example is the letter dated 31 March 1998 from the representative of Papua New Guinea addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁷⁴ which demonstrates how new practices of Member States can contribute to the evolving interpretation of Chapter VI and, in particular, to the role of the Security Council in the pacific settlement of disputes. In the aforementioned communication, the representative of Papua New Guinea requested that the Security Council deal with the conflict in Bougainville by endorsing a peace agreement and sending a peace monitoring group, whereas the Charter leaves such decisions to the Council's discretion. In response, the Council issued a welcomed the offers made by leaders in the region, aimed at resolving the conflict and in that context urged them to facilitate the peace process. In connection with the situation in Sierra Leone, by a statement of the President (S/PRST/1999/13), the Council underlined its strong support for the mediation efforts and for the key role being played by the President of Togo.

presidential statement dated 22 April 1998,⁷⁵ expressing support for the Agreement on Peace, Security and Development on Bougainville of January 1996 (Lincoln Agreement).⁷⁶

During the period under review, the Council dealt with a growing number of intra-State conflicts characterized by inter-ethnic and/or interreligious violence, collapse of central State authority, humanitarian crisis and regional implications threatening the stability of the whole subregion. For example, in connection with the situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, by a statement of the President dated 11 December 1998,⁷⁷ the Council members called for a peaceful solution to the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, including an immediate ceasefire, the orderly withdrawal of all foreign forces, arrangements for security along the country's international borders, the re-establishment of the authority of the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo over the whole territory of the country and the initiation of an all-inclusive national reconciliation process which fully respected the equality and rights of all, irrespective of ethnic origin.

In setting out the parameters for a peaceful settlement in order for a peace process to achieve its objective and to prevent a relapse into conflict, the Council often made precise recommendations. For instance, in connection with the situation in Liberia, the Council emphasized that the holding of free and fair elections as scheduled was an essential phase of the peace process.⁷⁸ In addition, in connection with the situation in the Republic of the Congo, by a statement of the President dated 13 August 1997,⁷⁹ the Council called upon the two parties to the conflict to resolve the crisis on the basis of the proposals submitted by the President of Gabon, including agreement on an interim government of national unity and a timetable for the holding of presidential elections. Furthermore, in connection with the situation in Cyprus, the Council continued to reaffirm its position that a Cyprus settlement must be based on a State of Cyprus with a single sovereignty and international personality and a single citizenship, with its independence and territorial integrity safeguarded, and comprising two politically equal communities in a bicomunal and bizonal federation, and that such a settlement had to exclude union in whole or in part with any other country or any form of partition or secession.⁸⁰

A. Recommendations relating to terms, methods or procedures of settlement

The objective of this section is to provide an overview of the Council's practices aimed at the pacific settlement of disputes in application of Chapter VI of the Charter. It lists Council decisions containing recommendations made in relation to terms, methods or procedures of pacific settlement. Relevant decisions are set out in a systematic order, without ascribing them to any specific Articles of the Charter. While Council decisions related to investigation and fact-finding missions have been already covered in part II of this chapter, this section provides in regional and chronological order examples of instances in which the Council proposed or endorsed, welcomed or supported terms of settlement; requested or called upon parties to settle their disputes by peaceful means; or recommended procedures or methods of settlement.

The situation in Angola

By three subsequent resolutions, the Security Council stressed the urgent need for the Government of Angola and in particular the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola (UNITA) to complete, in accordance with the timetable approved by the Joint Commission on 9 January 1998,⁸¹ the implementation of their obligations under the Lusaka Protocol⁸² as well as to complete the implementation of their obligations under the "Acordos de Paz"⁸³ and relevant Security Council resolutions.⁸⁴

By resolution 1164 (1998) of 29 April 1998, the Security Council called upon the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation and in particular UNITA to complete all remaining obligations under the "Acordos de Paz", the Lusaka Protocol and relevant Security Council resolutions.⁸⁵

By resolution 1195 (1998) of 15 September 1998, the Security Council strongly urged the Government of Angola, UNITA and States in the region to reject military action, to pursue dialogue to resolve the crisis and to refrain from any steps which could exacerbate the current situation, and urged the Government of Angola and UNITA to cooperate fully with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and with other relevant initiatives by Member States to seek a peaceful resolution of the crisis.⁸⁶

By a series of resolutions, the Security Council reiterated the validity of the "Acordos de Paz", the Lusaka Protocol and relevant Security Council resolutions as the fundamental basis of the peace process.⁸⁷ In addition, by resolution 1202 (1998) of 15 October 1998, the Security Council stressed that there could be no military solution to the conflict in Angola, and called upon the Government of Angola and in particular UNITA to seek a political settlement, and to cooperate fully with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, including by facilitating his contact with all those key to the peace process in order to convey, inter alia, the demands reiterated in the resolution.⁸⁸

The situation in Sierra Leone

By a statement of the President dated 4 December 1996,⁸⁹ the Council warmly welcomed the Peace Agreement signed by the Government of Sierra Leone and the Revolutionary United Front in Abidjan on 30 November 1996.

By several subsequent decisions, the Council underlined the necessity of implementing the Abidjan Agreement,⁹⁰ which continued to serve as a viable framework for peace, stability and reconciliation in Sierra Leone.⁹¹

By a statement of the President dated 14 November 1997,⁹² expressing its full support and appreciation for the continued efforts of the Committee of Five on Sierra Leone of the Economic Community of West African States to seek a peaceful settlement of the crisis and the restoration of the democratically elected Government and constitutional order, the Council welcomed the peace plan agreed in Conakry on 23 October 1997 between the Committee and representatives of the junta as set out in the documents issued after the meeting.⁹³ In the statement, it called upon the junta to fulfil its obligations under the peace plan, and in particular the ongoing maintenance of the ceasefire. In addition, it called upon all parties concerned to work for the early and effective implementation of the peace plan.

By a statement of the President dated 26 February 1998,⁹⁴ the Council expressed the view that the Conakry Agreement⁹⁵ and the Abidjan Agreement provided important elements for a framework for peace, stability and national reconciliation in Sierra Leone. The Council also called upon all parties in Sierra Leone to work towards those objectives through peaceful means and political dialogue.

By a statement of the President dated 7 January 1999,⁹⁶ the Council stressed the importance of dialogue and national reconciliation for the restoration of lasting peace and stability to Sierra Leone. It welcomed the offers made by leaders in the region aimed at resolving the conflict and, in that context urged them, including the Committee of Six on Sierra Leone of the Economic Community of West African States, to facilitate the peace process.

By a statement of the President dated 15 May 1999,⁹⁷ the Council called upon all concerned to remain committed to the process of negotiation and to demonstrate flexibility in their approach to the process.

In that context, the Council underlined its strong support for the mediation efforts of the United Nations within the Lomé process, in particular the work of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General to facilitate dialogue, and for the key role being played by the President of Togo. Furthermore, the Council urged both parties to commit themselves to a cessation of hostilities for the duration of the Lomé talks, to ensure that this was fully respected on the ground and to work constructively and in good faith for a ceasefire agreement. It called upon both sides to refrain from any hostile or aggressive act which could undermine “the talks process”.

By resolution 1260 (1999) of 20 August 1999, the Security Council welcomed the signing of the Peace Agreement between the Government of Sierra Leone and the Revolutionary United Front of Sierra Leone in Lomé on 7 July 1999. Furthermore, the Council called upon both sides to ensure that the provisions of the Peace Agreement were fully implemented.⁹⁸

The situation in the Central African Republic

By a statement of the President dated 18 February 1999,⁹⁹ the Council took note with satisfaction of the commitment expressed by the President of the Central African Republic to maintain peace in the Central African Republic through dialogue and consultation. In that context, it strongly reaffirmed that the complete implementation of the Bangui Agreements¹⁰⁰ and of the National Reconciliation Pact¹⁰¹ was essential to peace and national reconciliation in the Central African Republic. Furthermore, the Council emphasized the importance of continuing efforts in the Central African Republic to settle outstanding contentious issues peacefully and democratically in accordance with the Bangui Agreements, and stressed the need for both the “mouvance présidentielle” and the opposition parties to cooperate closely and work actively with the aim of achieving the political consensus indispensable to stability in the Central African Republic.

The situation in Liberia

Following the agreement between the Council of States and the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) on a basic framework for the holding of elections in Liberia scheduled for 30 May 1997, by resolution 1100 (1997) of 27 March 1997, the Security Council emphasized that the holding of free and fair elections as scheduled was an essential phase in the peace process in Liberia and urged all Liberian parties to cooperate with the peace process.¹⁰²

By resolution 1116 (1997) of 27 June 1997, noting the decision of ECOWAS to postpone the election date to 19 July 1997, the Security Council called upon the Liberian parties to implement fully all the agreements and commitments they had entered into, and urged all Liberians to participate peacefully in the electoral process.¹⁰³

By a statement of the President dated 30 July 1997,¹⁰⁴ the Council welcomed the successful holding of presidential and legislative elections in Liberia on 19 July 1997.

The situation in Burundi

By a statement of the President dated 5 January 1996,¹⁰⁵ the Council reaffirmed its support for the Convention of Governance of 10 September 1994, which constituted the institutional framework for national reconciliation in Burundi and for the institutions of Government established in line with it.

By resolution 1040 (1996) of 29 January 1996, the Security Council stressing the paramount importance and imperative need for all concerned in Burundi to pursue dialogue and national reconciliation, called upon all concerned in Burundi to participate in a positive spirit and without delay in a comprehensive political dialogue and to support the efforts of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and others seeking to facilitate such dialogue.¹⁰⁶

By resolution 1049 (1996) of 5 March 1996, the Security Council, reiterating the urgent need for all concerned in Burundi, including extremists inside and outside the country, to make concerted efforts to defuse the crisis and to commit themselves to a dialogue aimed at establishing a permanent political settlement and the creation of conditions conducive to national reconciliation, called upon all concerned in Burundi to engage, as a matter of urgency, in serious negotiations and mutual accommodation within the framework of the national debate agreed upon by the signatories to the Convention on Governance and to increase efforts towards national reconciliation.¹⁰⁷

By a statement of the President dated 25 April 1996,¹⁰⁸ the Council extended its full support for and confidence in the efforts of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and those of former President Julius Nyerere and other envoys to facilitate negotiations to resolve the crisis.

By a statement of the President dated 15 May 1996,¹⁰⁹ the Council reiterated its full support for the ongoing efforts of former President Nyerere to facilitate negotiations and political dialogue to resolve the crisis in Burundi and looked forward to a successful outcome of the meeting in Mwanza, United Republic of Tanzania, on 22 May 1996. The Council also called upon the parties to make full use of the meeting to achieve progress towards national reconciliation. In a subsequent presidential statement dated 24 July 1996,¹¹⁰ the Council again stressed its full support for the efforts of former President Nyerere, including the agreements of the Arusha Regional Summit of 25 May 1996. In that regard, the Council encouraged all parties to work in a constructive manner with former President Nyerere.

By resolution 1072 (1996) of 30 August 1996, the Security Council reiterating its support for the immediate resumption of dialogue and negotiations under the auspices of the Mwanza peace process facilitated by former President Nyerere and the joint communiqué of the Second Arusha Regional Summit on Burundi of 31 July 1996, demanded that all of

Burundi's political parties and factions without exception, whether inside or outside the country and including representatives of civil society, initiate unconditional negotiations immediately, with a view to reaching a comprehensive political settlement.¹¹¹

By a statement of the President dated 30 May 1997,¹¹² the Council welcomed the fact that the talks held in Rome were complementary to the Arusha process. It also welcomed the commitment of the Government of Burundi to the comprehensive political dialogue among all the parties within the framework of the Arusha process. Furthermore, it urged all the parties in Burundi to continue to pursue a negotiated settlement and to refrain from actions which were detrimental to such dialogue. In the same statement, the Council expressed its support and appreciation to former President Nyerere as well as to the Special Representative of the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity in their efforts to find a peaceful solution to the crisis in Burundi.

By a statement of the President dated 12 November 1999,¹¹³ the Council, noting with concern the outbreak of violence in Burundi and the delays in the peace process, called on all the parties to put an end to the violence and pursue negotiations towards the peaceful resolution of Burundi's ongoing crisis. In the same statement, the Council reiterated its support for the Arusha peace process and expressed its firm belief that the process chaired by former President Nyerere offered the best hope for peace in Burundi, and should be the foundation for all-party talks leading to the conclusion of a peace agreement. In addition, the Council commended those Burundian parties, including the Government, that had demonstrated their commitment to continue negotiations and called on those parties that remained outside the process to cease hostilities, and to participate fully in Burundi's inclusive peace process.

The situation in the Republic of the Congo

Following the outbreak of factional fighting in Brazzaville on 5 June 1997, by a statement of the President dated 13 August 1997,¹¹⁴ the Council expressed its full support for the efforts of the International Mediation Committee, under the chairmanship of the President of Gabon, and the National Mediation Committee, under the chairmanship of the Mayor of Brazzaville, to persuade the parties involved to reach an agreement on a ceasefire and a peaceful settlement of the crisis. Furthermore, it called upon the two parties to resolve the crisis on the basis of the proposals submitted by the President of Gabon which were under discussion in Libreville, including agreement on an interim government of national unity and a timetable for the holding of presidential elections.

By a statement of the President dated 16 October 1997,¹¹⁵ the Council reiterated the importance of a political settlement and national reconciliation, and called upon the parties to cooperate with the International Mediation Committee and the joint United Nations/Organization of African Unity Special Envoy in reaching rapid agreement on peaceful transitional arrangements leading to the holding of democratic free and fair elections with the participation of all parties.

The situation in Guinea-Bissau

By a statement of the President dated 6 November 1998,¹¹⁶ the Council welcomed the agreement reached on 1 November 1998, in Abuja, between the Government of Guinea-Bissau and the Self-Proclaimed Military Junta. The Council considered the agreement to be a positive step towards national reconciliation and lasting peace in Guinea-Bissau. Also, it called upon the Government and the Self-Proclaimed Military Junta to respect fully their obligations under the Abuja Agreement and the Praia Agreement of 26 August 1998.¹¹⁷

By resolution 1216 (1998) of 21 December 1998, the Security Council welcomed the agreements between the Government of Guinea-Bissau and the Self-Proclaimed Military Junta signed in Praia on 26 August 1998,¹¹⁸ and in Abuja on 1 November

The situation in the Great Lakes region

By resolution 1097 (1997) of 18 February 1997, welcoming the letter dated 18 February 1997 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council¹²² regarding progress in the efforts to resolve the crisis in the Great Lakes region, the Security Council endorsed the five-point peace plan for eastern Zaire, as set out in the letter from the Secretary-General of 18 February 1997.¹²³

The situation concerning the Democratic Republic of the Congo

Expressing its support for the people of the Democratic Republic of the Congo as they began a new period in their history, by a statement of the President dated 29 May 1997,¹²⁴ the Council, in accordance with the United Nations five-point peace plan, called for the rapid and peaceful settlement of the crisis through dialogue and the convening of an international conference on peace, security and development in the Great Lakes region.

By a statement of the President dated 31 August 1998,¹²⁵ the Council called for a peaceful solution to the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, including an immediate ceasefire, the withdrawal of all foreign forces, and the initiation of a peaceful process of political dialogue with a view to national reconciliation. Furthermore, it expressed its view that the problems of the Democratic Republic of the Congo must be solved on the basis of a process of all-inclusive national reconciliation which fully respected the equality and harmony of all ethnic groups and which led to the holding of democratic, free and fair elections, as soon as possible.

By a statement of the President dated 11 December 1998,¹²⁶ the Council, expressing concern about the continuing conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, called for a peaceful solution to the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, including an immediate ceasefire, the orderly withdrawal of all foreign forces, arrangements for security along the international borders of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the re-establishment of the authority of the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo over the whole territory of the country, and the initiation of an all-inclusive national reconciliation process in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. Furthermore, the Council welcomed the public commitments made in Paris by the Presidents of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Uganda and Rwanda and the Presidents and heads of delegation of Namibia, Zimbabwe, Angola and Chad, and strongly urged them to give effect to these commitments.

By resolution 1234 (1999) of 9 April 1999, the Security Council urged all parties to the conflict to continue to work constructively through the regional mediation process towards the signing of a ceasefire agreement and settlement of the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo.¹²⁷

By a statement of the President dated 24 June 1999,¹²⁸ the Council called upon all parties to demonstrate commitment to the peace process and to participate with a constructive and flexible spirit in the summit in Lusaka scheduled for 26 June 1999. In that context, it further called upon the parties to sign immediately a ceasefire agreement which included the appropriate modalities and mechanisms for its implementation. Also, the Council emphasized the need for a peaceful settlement of the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo in order to permit the economic reconstruction of the country, so as to enhance development and foster national reconciliation.

By resolution 1258 (1999) of 6 August 1999, the Security Council welcomed the signing of the Ceasefire Agreement on the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo by the States concerned in Lusaka on 10 July 1999 which represented a viable basis for a resolution of the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. It also welcomed the signing of the Ceasefire Agreement on 1 August 1999 by the Movement for the Liberation of the Congo and called upon the Congolese Rally for Democracy to sign the Agreement without delay in order to bring about national reconciliation and lasting peace in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. By the same resolution, the Security Council called upon all parties to the conflict, in particular the rebel movements, to cease hostilities, to implement fully and without delay the provisions of the Ceasefire Agreement, to cooperate fully with the Organization of African Unity and the United Nations in the implementation of the Ceasefire Agreement and to desist from any act that may further exacerbate the situation. Furthermore, it stressed the need for a continuing process of genuine national reconciliation, and encouraged all Congolese to participate in the national debate to be organized in accordance with the provisions of the Ceasefire Agreement.¹²⁹

By resolution 1279 (1999) of 30 November 1999, the Security Council reaffirmed that the Ceasefire Agreement signed at Lusaka on 10 July 1999¹³⁰ represented the most viable basis for a resolution of the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. In addition, it expressed its concern at the alleged violations of the Ceasefire Agreement, and urged all parties to refrain from any declarations or action that could jeopardize the peace process. Furthermore, the Council stressed the need for a continuing process of genuine national reconciliation, encouraged all Congolese to participate in the national dialogue, and called upon all Congolese parties to finalize agreement on the facilitator for the national dialogue.¹³¹

The situation in Somalia

By a statement of the President dated 24 January 1996,¹³² the Council deeply concerned about the absence of any credible progress towards national reconciliation, called upon all Somali political leaders and parties to return to an inclusive process of consultation and negotiation aimed at national reconciliation leading to the establishment of a broad-based national government.

By a statement of the President dated 20 December 1996,¹³³ the Council fully supported the efforts of the countries in the region, as well as of international and regional organizations, in particular the Organization of African Unity (OAU) and the League of Arab States (LAS), to facilitate a political settlement of the crisis in Somalia. It appealed to all Somali factions to join in such efforts and to start a process of national reconciliation aimed at the establishment of a broad-based national Government.

By a statement of the President dated 27 February 1997,¹³⁴ the Council called upon all Somali factions to cease immediately all hostilities and to cooperate with the regional and other efforts for peace and national reconciliation in Somalia, including the initiatives taken at Sodere, Ethiopia, and Nairobi.

By a statement of the President dated 23 December 1997,¹³⁵ the Council welcomed the outcome of meetings between the Somali leaders held in Cairo, which concluded on 22 December 1997, in particular their decision to adopt a federal system with regional autonomy and their agreement to form a transitional government of national unity and to hold an inclusive conference of national reconciliation in Baidoa, Somalia, through which a presidential council and a Prime Minister would be elected. Furthermore, it welcomed the signing of the Cairo Declaration on Somalia¹³⁶ and other important agreements attached thereto, particularly on the creation of an elected Constituent Assembly, the establishment of an independent judicial system and the preparation of a transitional charter. Finally, the Council called upon all Somali leaders to contribute positively to the current momentum for peace and reconciliation created by the significant progress achieved in Cairo and by the other previous initiatives of Sodere, Nairobi and Sanaa, through the widest possible participation in the planned conference, and to cease immediately all acts of violence and to observe the ceasefire.

Expressing its support for the activities of the Standing Committee on Somalia, by a statement of the President dated 27 May 1999,¹³⁷ the Council called upon all Somali factions to cease immediately all hostilities and to cooperate with the regional and other efforts to achieve peace and reconciliation.

By a statement of the President dated 12 November 1999,¹³⁸ the Council expressed its full support for the efforts exerted by the Intergovernmental Authority on Development to find a political solution to the crisis in Somalia. In that context, it welcomed the initiative of the President of Djibouti aimed at restoring peace and stability in Somalia.¹³⁹ In the same statement, the Council endorsed the call made by the President of Djibouti to the warlords to recognize fully and accept the principle that the Somali people are free to exercise their democratic right to choose their own regional and national leaders. Furthermore, the Council called upon the leaders of the Somali factions and all others concerned to cooperate constructively and in good faith in the efforts to resolve the crisis.

The situation between Eritrea and Ethiopia

By resolution 1177 (1998) of 26 June 1998, the Security Council, welcoming the official statements by the Government of Ethiopia and the Government of Eritrea that they shared the ultimate goal of delimiting and demarcating their common border on the basis of a mutually agreeable and binding arrangement, taking into account the charter of OAU, colonial treaties and international law applicable to such treaties, called upon the parties to avoid any steps which would aggravate tensions such as provocative actions or statements, and to take steps to build confidence between them including by guaranteeing the rights and safety of each other's nationals.¹⁴⁰

By resolution 1226 (1999) of 29 January 1999, the Security Council expressed its strong support for the mediation efforts of OAU and for the Framework Agreement as approved on 17 December 1998 by the Summit of the Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution of

OAU,¹⁴¹ and affirmed that the Framework Agreement provided the best hope for peace between the two parties. The Council stressed that it was of primary importance that the Framework Agreement be accepted. In addition, the Council welcomed the acceptance by Ethiopia of the Framework Agreement. It also welcomed Eritrea's engagement in the process undertaken by OAU, and strongly urged Eritrea to accept the Framework Agreement as the basis for a peaceful resolution of the border dispute between Ethiopia and Eritrea without delay. Furthermore, the Council strongly urged Ethiopia and Eritrea to maintain their commitment to a peaceful resolution of the border dispute and called upon them in the strongest terms to exercise maximum restraint and to refrain from taking any military action.¹⁴²

Letters dated 23 September and 3 and 11 October 1996 from the Permanent Representative of the Republic of Korea to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council

Letters dated 23 September 1996 from the Permanent Representative of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council and 27 September 1996 addressed to the Secretary-General

Following the incident involving a submarine of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea on 18 September 1996, by a statement of the President dated 15 October 1996,¹⁴³ the Council urged that the Korean Armistice Agreement¹⁴⁴ should be fully observed and that no action should be taken that might increase tension or undermine peace and stability on the Korean peninsula. The Council stressed that the Armistice Agreement should remain in force until it was replaced by a new peace mechanism. Furthermore, the Council encouraged both sides of the Korean peninsula to settle their outstanding issues by peaceful means through dialogue, so that peace and security on the peninsula would be strengthened.

The responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security

Following the nuclear tests conducted by India on 11 and 13 May 1998 and by Pakistan on 28 and 30 May 1998, by resolution 1172 (1998) of 6 June 1998, the Security Council urged India and Pakistan to resume the dialogue between them on all outstanding issues, particularly on all matters pertaining to peace and security, in order to remove the tensions between them, and encouraged them to find mutually acceptable solutions that addressed the root causes of those tensions, including Kashmir.¹⁴⁵

The situation in Timor

By resolution 1236 (1999) of 7 May 1999, the Security Council welcomed the progress made at the last round of talks between the Governments of Portugal and Indonesia,¹⁴⁶ under the auspices of the Secretary-General, which led to the conclusion of a series of agreements in New York on 5 May 1999. By the same resolution, it welcomed the concluding of the Agreement between the Republic of Indonesia and the Portuguese Republic on the question of East Timor on 5 May 1999.¹⁴⁷

The situation in Tajikistan and along the Tajik-Afghan border

By a statement of the President dated 7 February 1997,¹⁴⁸ the Council welcomed the signing in Moscow on 23 December 1996 by the President of Tajikistan and the leader of the United Tajik Opposition of the Agreement,¹⁴⁹ including the Protocol on the Commission on National Reconciliation,¹⁵⁰ and noted the progress made in the inter-Tajik talks in Tehran. The Council believed that those agreements, provided that they were carried out as written, represented a qualitative change for the better and gave a new impetus to efforts aimed at achieving national reconciliation. Furthermore, the Council urged the parties to honor and implement consistently and in good faith the agreements already reached, in particular in the course of negotiating future agreements. It also urged them to make further substantive progress at the next rounds of the inter-Tajik talks.

Letter dated 31 March 1998 from the Permanent Mission of Papua New Guinea to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council

By a statement of the President dated 22 April 1998,¹⁵¹ the Council expressed support for the Agreement on Peace, Security and Development on Bougainville, signed at Lincoln University, New Zealand, on 23 January 1998,¹⁵² achieved by the Government of Papua New Guinea, the Bougainville Transitional Government, the Bougainville Resistance Force, the Bougainville Interim Government, the Bougainville Revolutionary Army and the Bougainville leaders, with regard to a ceasefire among conflicting parties. In that context, it encouraged all parties to cooperate in promoting reconciliation, so that the objectives of the Lincoln Agreement could be met, and urged all parties to continue to cooperate in accordance with the Lincoln Agreement in order to achieve and maintain peace, to renounce the use of armed force and violence, to resolve any differences by consultation, both now and in the future, and to confirm their respect for human rights and the rule of law.

The situation in Afghanistan

By resolution 1076 (1996) of 22 October 1996, the Security Council urged all Afghan parties to resolve their differences through peaceful means and achieve national reconciliation through political dialogue.¹⁵³ By the same decision and in a prior statement,¹⁵⁴ the Council called upon all Afghan parties immediately to cease all armed hostilities, to renounce the use of force, to put aside their differences, and to engage in a political dialogue aimed at achieving national reconciliation and a lasting political settlement of the conflict and establishing a fully representative and broad-based transitional government of national unity.

By a statement of the President dated 16 April 1997,¹⁵⁵ the Council called upon the Afghan parties to cease all hostile actions and to enter into sustained negotiations. It strongly believed that a negotiated settlement was the only solution to the long-standing conflict in that country.

By a statement of the President dated 9 July 1997,¹⁵⁶ the Council called upon all Afghan parties to return to the negotiating table immediately and to work together towards the formation of a broad-based, fully representative government that would protect the rights of all Afghans and abide by Afghanistan's international obligations. In the same statement, the Council, taking into account risks of regional destabilization, expressed its belief that peace and stability in Afghanistan could best be attained through intra-Afghan political negotiations under United Nations auspices with the active and coordinated assistance of all countries concerned.

By a statement of the President dated 16 December 1997,¹⁵⁷ the Council stressed that the Afghan conflict had no military solution and that the primary responsibility for finding a peaceful settlement rested with the Afghan parties themselves. It also urged all Afghan parties to take genuine confidence-building measures, to agree immediately on a ceasefire, and to engage without preconditions in a political dialogue aimed at achieving national reconciliation, a lasting political settlement of the conflict and the formation of a broad-based, fully representative government that would protect the rights of all Afghans and abide by Afghanistan's international obligations.

By a statement of the President dated 6 August 1998,¹⁵⁸ the Council called upon all Afghan parties to return to the negotiating table without delay and preconditions and to cooperate with the aim of creating a broad-based and fully representative government, which would protect the rights of all Afghans and observe the international obligations of Afghanistan.

In two subsequent decisions,¹⁵⁹ the Council reiterated that the Afghan crisis could be settled only by peaceful means, through direct negotiations between the Afghan factions under United Nations auspices, aimed at achieving mutually acceptable solutions accommodating the rights and interests of all ethnic, religious and political groups of Afghan society.

By a statement of the President dated 15 September 1998,¹⁶⁰ the Council called upon the parties, in particular the Taliban, to take action in response to the strong concerns expressed by the international community, to stop fighting and resume negotiations aimed at achieving a peaceful settlement of the conflict on the basis of the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly and of the Council.

By resolution 1214 (1998) of 8 December 1998, the Security Council demanded that the Taliban, as well as other Afghan factions, stop fighting, conclude a ceasefire and resume negotiations without delay and preconditions under United Nations auspices, and cooperate with the aim of creating a broad-based and fully representative government, which would protect the rights of all Afghans and observe the international obligations of Afghanistan.¹⁶¹

By a statement of the President dated 22 October 1999,¹⁶² the Council reiterated that there was no military solution to the conflict in Afghanistan and that only a negotiated political settlement aimed at the establishment of a broad-based, multi-ethnic and fully representative government acceptable to all Afghans could lead to peace and reconciliation. It recalled its demand that the parties to the conflict, especially the Taliban, resume negotiations under United Nations auspices without delay and preconditions in full compliance with the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly and the Council.

negotiations in the spirit of the Charter of the United Nations and good neighbourly relations, the Security Council urged the parties to abide by their mutual commitments and to implement fully the Agreement on Normalization of Relations and stressed that those were critical for the establishment of peace and security throughout the region.¹⁶⁴

By a statement of the President dated 25 April 1997,¹⁶⁵ the Council called upon the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to resolve the disputed issue of Prevlaka through bilateral negotiations pursuant to the Agreement on Normalization of Relations and in the spirit of the Charter of the United Nations and good neighborly relations.

By resolution 1119 (1997) of 14 July 1997, the Security Council renewed its calls upon the parties to abide by their mutual commitments, implement fully the Agreement on Normalization of Relations between the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, adopt the practical options proposed by the United Nations military observers for the improvement of safety and security in the area, cease all violations of the demilitarization regime and military or other activities which may increase tension, and cooperate fully with the United Nations military observers and ensure their safety and freedom of movement, including through the removal of landmines.¹⁶⁶

By resolution 1147 (1998) of 13 January 1997, the Security Council urged the parties to take concrete steps towards a negotiated resolution of the disputed issue of Prevlaka in good faith and without delay.¹⁶⁷

By resolution 1222 (1999) of 15 January 1999, the Security Council, noting with approval the continuing bilateral negotiations between the parties pursuant to the Agreement on Normalization of Relations between the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, expressed serious concern that such negotiations had not yet resulted in any substantive progress towards a settlement of the disputed issue of Prevlaka.¹⁶⁸

By several subsequent resolutions,¹⁶⁹ the Security Council continued to urge the parties to abide by their mutual commitments and to implement fully the Agreement on Normalization of Relations between the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.

Items relating to the situation in Kosovo, Federal Republic of Yugoslavia

By a statement of the President dated 19 January 1999,¹⁷⁰ the Council called upon all parties to respect fully their commitments under the relevant resolutions and affirmed once again its full support for international efforts to facilitate a peaceful settlement on the basis of equality for all citizens and ethnic communities in Kosovo.

By a statement of the President dated 29 January 1999,¹⁷¹ the Council welcomed and supported the decisions of the Contact Group, following their meeting in London on 29 January 1999,¹⁷² aimed at reaching a political settlement between the parties and establishing a framework and timetable for that purpose.

The situation in Albania

By a statement of the President dated 13 March 1997,¹⁷³ expressing its deep concern about the deteriorating situation in Albania, the Council urged all concerned to refrain from hostilities and acts of violence and to cooperate with diplomatic efforts to reach a peaceful solution to the crisis. In addition, the Council called upon the parties involved to continue the political dialogue and to live up to the commitments undertaken on 9 March 1997 in Tirana. It further urged all political forces to work together to lower tension and facilitate the stabilization of the country.

The situation in Georgia

By resolutions 1036 (1996) of 12 January 1996 and 1065 (1996) of 12 July 1996, the Council stressed the need for the parties to intensify efforts, under the auspices of the United Nations and with the assistance of the Russian Federation as facilitator, to achieve an early and comprehensive political settlement of the conflict, including on the political status of Abkhazia, fully respecting the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia.¹⁷⁴ Furthermore, the Council called upon the parties, in particular the Abkhaz side, to achieve substantive progress without further delay towards a comprehensive political settlement, and also called upon them to cooperate fully with the efforts undertaken by the Secretary-General with the assistance of the Russian Federation as facilitator.¹⁷⁵

By several subsequent decisions, the Council continued to express concern that no significant progress had yet been achieved towards a comprehensive political settlement of the conflict. It also continued to call upon the parties, in particular the Abkhaz side, to achieve substantive progress without further delay.¹⁷⁶

By resolutions 1096 (1997) of 30 January 1997 and 1124 (1997) of 31 July 1997, as well as by two presidential statements dated 8 May 1997¹⁷⁷ and 6 November 1997¹⁷⁸, the Security Council recalled its position with regard to a comprehensive political settlement in Georgia, as contained in previous resolutions.¹⁷⁹ In the above-mentioned decisions, the Security Council continued to welcome the renewal of direct dialogue at a high level between the parties, and called upon them to intensify the search for a peaceful solution by further expanding their contacts, and requested the Secretary-General to make available all appropriate support if so requested by the parties.¹⁸⁰

By a statement of the President dated 28 May 1998,¹⁸¹ the Council expressed its deep concern at the slowing of the peace process. It called upon the parties to display the necessary political will to achieve substantial results on the key issues of the negotiations within the framework of the United Nations-led peace process and through direct dialogue, with full respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia.

By resolution 1225 (1999) of 28 January 1999, the Security Council demanded that both sides widen their commitment to the United Nations-led peace process, continue to seek and engage in dialogue, expand their contacts at all levels and display without delay the necessary will to achieve substantial results on the key issues of the negotiations, and underlined the necessity for the parties to achieve an early and comprehensive political settlement, which included a settlement on the political status of Abkhazia within the State of Georgia, which fully respected the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia within its internationally recognized borders.¹⁸²

By two subsequent decisions,¹⁸³ the Council reiterated its demand that both sides widen their commitment to the United Nations-led peace process, continue to seek and engage in dialogue, expand their bilateral contacts and display without delay the necessary will to achieve substantial results on the key issues of the negotiations, and underline the necessity for the parties to achieve an early and comprehensive political settlement, which included a settlement on the political status of Abkhazia within the State of Georgia.

The situation in Cyprus

By resolution 1062 (1996) of 28 June 1996, the Security Council reiterated its concern that there had been no progress towards a final political solution, and agreed with the assessment of the Secretary-General that the negotiations had been at an impasse for too long.¹⁸⁴ It also reiterated that the status quo was unacceptable, and called upon the parties to demonstrate concretely their commitment to an overall political settlement.¹⁸⁵ It urged the leaders of the two communities to respond positively and urgently to the Secretary-General's call upon them to work with him and with the many countries who supported his mission of good offices to break the present impasse and establish common ground on which direct negotiations could be resumed.¹⁸⁶

In several subsequent resolutions,¹⁸⁷ the Security Council reiterated that the status quo was unacceptable, and stressed its support for the Secretary-General's mission of good offices and the importance of the concerted efforts to work with the Secretary-General towards an overall comprehensive settlement.

By resolution 1179 (1998) of 29 June 1998, the Security Council reiterated its growing concern that negotiations on a comprehensive political solution had yet to make progress, despite the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Adviser and others in support of the United Nations efforts to promote a comprehensive settlement.¹⁸⁸

By resolution 1217 (1998) of 22 December 1998, the Security Council reaffirmed that the status quo was unacceptable and that negotiations on a final political situation of the Cyprus problem had been at an impasse for too long. The Council also reaffirmed its position that a Cyprus settlement was to be based on a State of Cyprus with a single sovereignty and international personality and a single citizenship, with its independence and territorial integrity safeguarded, and comprising two politically equal communities as described in the relevant Security Council resolutions, in a bicomunal and bizonal federation, and that such a settlement was to exclude union in whole or in part with any other country or any form of partition or secession. Furthermore, it called once again upon the leaders of the two communities to commit themselves to this process of negotiations, to cooperate actively and constructively with the Secretary-General, his Special Adviser and Deputy Special Representative and to resume when appropriate the direct dialogue.¹⁸⁹

By resolution 1250 (1999) of 29 June 1999, the Security Council expressed the view that both sides had legitimate concerns that should be addressed through comprehensive negotiations covering all relevant issues. In that regard, it called upon the two leaders to give their full support to such a comprehensive negotiation, under the auspices of the Secretary-General, and to commit themselves to the following principles: no preconditions; all issues on the table; commitment in good faith to continue to negotiate until a settlement was reached; and full consideration of relevant United Nations resolutions and treaties.¹⁹⁰

By resolution 1251 (1999) of 29 June 1999, the Security Council reiterated the need to make progress on a comprehensive political solution.¹⁹¹

Middle East

The situation in the occupied Arab Territories

Expressing concern about the clashes between the Israeli army and the Palestinian police and the casualties on both sides, by resolution 1073 (1996) of 28 September 1996, the Security Council called for an immediate resumption of negotiations within the Middle East peace process on its agreed basis and the timely implementation of the agreements reached.¹⁹²

B. Decisions involving the Secretary-General in the Council's efforts at the pacific settlement of disputes

While Article 99 of the Charter provides that the Secretary-General may bring to the attention of the Security Council any matter which in his opinion may threaten the maintenance of international peace and security, the Charter does not otherwise describe or define the role of the Secretary-General in relation to matters of peace and security.

Nevertheless, Security Council efforts aimed at the peaceful settlement of disputes frequently require the involvement of the Secretary-General, who, in coordination with the Council or at its request, facilitates peace efforts in various ways. With regard to the situation in the Great Lakes, the Secretary-General informed the Council, by a letter dated 18 February 1997 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁹³ that the joint

United Nations/Organization of African Unity Special Representative for the Great Lakes region, Mr. Mohammed Sahnoun, was working on a five-point peace plan,¹⁹⁴ which was based on the Council's statement¹⁹⁵ of 7 February 1997, and that Mr. Sahnoun hoped it would be accepted by all parties. In light of the numerous peace initiatives undertaken to restore peace in eastern Zaire, the Secretary-General asked for immediate Council acknowledgement and support for Mr. Sahnoun's initiative. In response, by resolution 1097 (1997) of 18 February 1997, the Security Council welcomed the letter addressed to the President¹⁹⁶ regarding progress in the efforts to resolve the crisis in the Great Lakes region.¹⁹⁷ It also endorsed the five-point peace plan for eastern Zaire, as set out in the letter from the Secretary-General of 18 February 1997.¹⁹⁸

During the period under review, the Council frequently called on the parties to a dispute or situation to cooperate in negotiations held under the auspices of the Secretary-General, expressed support for conciliation efforts undertaken by the Secretary-General, expressly requested the Secretary-General to assume an active role in the process of achieving a political settlement, or endorsed the initiative of the Secretary-General within the framework of his mission of good offices.

The following overview sets out examples of decisions by which the Security Council specifically requested, supported, endorsed, encouraged or welcomed the Secretary-General's endeavors in the peaceful settlement of disputes.

¹⁹⁴ The plan called for the immediate cessation of hostilities; withdrawal of all external forces, including mercenaries; reaffirmation of respect for the national sovereignty and territorial integrity of Zaire and other States of the Great Lakes region; protection and security for all refugees and displaced persons and facilitation of access to humanitarian assistance; and rapid and peaceful settlement of the crisis through dialogue, the electoral process and the convening of an international conference on peace, security and development in the Great Lakes region.

By resolution 1195 (1998) of 15 September 1998, the Security Council reiterated its support to the Secretary-General for his personal engagement in the peace process, and urged the Government of Angola and UNITA to cooperate fully with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and with other relevant initiatives by Member States to seek a peaceful resolution of the crisis.¹⁹⁹ By resolution 1202 (1998) of 15 October 1998, the Security Council encouraged the Special Representative of the Secretary-General to coordinate his efforts with regional and subregional organizations in order to bring about a solution within the framework of the Lusaka Protocol.²⁰⁰

While welcoming the offers made by leaders in the region aimed at resolving the conflict and in that context urged them, including the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) Committee of Six, to facilitate the peace process, by a statement of the President dated 7 January 1999,²⁰¹ the Council called on the Secretary-General to do all he could to assist in those efforts, including through his Special Representative. By resolution 1231 (1999) of 11 March 1999, the Security Council expressed its support for all efforts, in particular by States members of ECOWAS, aimed at peacefully resolving the conflict and restoring lasting peace and stability to Sierra Leone, and encouraged the Secretary-General, through his Special Representative for Sierra Leone, to facilitate dialogue to those ends.²⁰²

The situation in the Republic of the Congo

By a statement of the President dated 13 August 1997,²⁰³ while expressing its full support for the efforts of the International Mediation Committee, under the chairmanship of the President of Gabon, and the National Mediation Committee, under the Chairmanship of the Mayor of Brazzaville, to persuade the parties involved to reach agreement on a ceasefire and a peaceful settlement of the crisis, the Council affirmed its support for the important and constructive role of the Joint United

The situation concerning the Democratic Republic of the Congo

By a statement of the President dated 11 December 1998,²⁰⁴ the Council welcomed in particular the initiative taken by the Secretary-General at the Twentieth Conference of Heads of State of Africa and France, held in Paris from 26 to 28 November 1998, to bring about an end to the conflict and reach an immediate, unconditional ceasefire. By a statement of the President dated 24 June 1999,²⁰⁵ the Council expressed its appreciation and full support for the continuing efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Envoy for the peace process in the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

The situation in Cyprus

By resolution 1179 (1998) of 29 June 1998, the Security Council stressed its full support for the Secretary-General's mission of good offices and for the efforts of his Special Adviser on Cyprus to resume a sustained process of direct negotiations aimed at achieving a comprehensive settlement on the basis of the relevant Security Council resolutions, and stressed also the importance of concerted efforts to work with the Secretary-General to that end.²⁰⁶

By resolution 1218 (1998) of 22 December 1998, the Security Council endorsed the initiative of the Secretary-General announced on 30 September 1998 within the framework of his mission of good offices, with the goal of reducing tensions and promoting progress towards a just and lasting settlement in Cyprus. The Council also requested the Secretary-General, in view of the objectives of promoting progress towards a just and lasting settlement and of reducing tension, set out in his initiative of 30 September 1998, and building on the serious engagement already demonstrated by the two sides, to continue to make progress towards these two objectives, on the basis of relevant Security Council resolutions. Furthermore, taking into account resolution 1178 (1998) of 29 June 1998, it requested the Secretary-General, in particular, to work intensively with the two sides on the following: (a) an undertaking to refrain from the threat or use of force or violence as a means to resolve the Cyprus problem; (b) a staged process aimed at limiting and then substantially reducing the level of all troops and armaments on Cyprus; (c) implementation of the package of measures of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus (UNFICYP) aimed at reducing tensions along the ceasefire lines, and a commitment to enter into discussions with the Force with a view to early agreement on further specific and related tension-reducing steps, including demining along the buffer zone; (d) further progress in the area of tension-reduction; (e) efforts to achieve substantive progress on the core aspects of a comprehensive Cyprus settlement; and other measures that will build trust and cooperation between the two sides.²⁰⁷

By resolution 1250 (1999) of 29 June 1999 the Council reiterated its endorsement of the initiative of the Secretary-General announced on 30 September 1998, within the framework of his mission of good offices, with the goal of reducing tensions and promoting progress towards a just and lasting settlement in Cyprus.²⁰⁸

C. Decisions involving regional arrangements or agencies

During the period under review, the Security Council not only called upon the parties to the conflict to cooperate with regional arrangements but also, in accordance with Article 52 of the Charter, frequently expressed its support and appreciation for the peace efforts undertaken by regional arrangements or requested the Secretary-General to undertake such efforts in conjunction with regional arrangements. Council decisions regarding the joint or parallel efforts undertaken by the Council and regional agencies or arrangements in the pacific settlement of disputes during the period under review are covered in detail in chapter XII.

Part IV

Constitutional discussion bearing on the interpretation or application of the provisions of Chapter VI of the Charter

Note

Part IV highlights the most important arguments raised in the deliberations of the Council with regard to the interpretation of specific provisions of the Charter concerning the Council's role in the peaceful settlement of disputes. It includes in particular discussions concerning the competence of the Council to consider a dispute or situation and its power to make appropriate recommendations within the framework of Chapter VI of the Charter. It also includes the consideration by the Council of the conditions under which it is appropriate for Member States and non-Member States to bring any dispute or situation to the attention of the Security Council.

In accordance with the relevant provisions of Chapter VI, the Council shall, when it deems necessary, make recommendations in relation to disputes or situations which are likely to endanger international peace and security. Accordingly, this part will focus on discussions concerning the existence of a dispute or situation within the meaning of Chapter VI of the Charter. When making recommendations to the parties, the Council is also required, pursuant to Article 36 of the Charter, to take into consideration (a) procedures for settlement which have already been adopted by the parties, and (b) the general rule that disputes of a legal nature ought to be referred to the International Court of Justice. Instances in which the requirements stipulated by Article 36 (2) and (3) became the subject of deliberations will, therefore, also be considered below.

Part IV is divided into seven thematic subheadings in accordance with the relevant provisions of Chapter VI, with the inclusion of Article 99 dealing with matters brought to the attention of the Security Council by the Secretary-General. The thematic subheadings that include more than one item are organized by agenda item of the Council. Further, those agenda items under which more than one provision of Chapter VI was dealt with at once are included under different subheadings. It is important to note that in some cases it is difficult to establish a clear-cut distinction between the constitutional developments relevant to Chapter VI and Chapter VII. In several instances, Member States provided different interpretations of the provisions of Chapter VI or challenged the Security Council's interpretation of those provisions, or even its role in the peaceful settlement of disputes. Since the referral of a situation or dispute to the Council was challenged by Member States on the basis of distinct arguments, some items are considered under several subheadings.

Assertion that peaceful means of settlement were not exhausted in the light of Article 33 (1) of the Charter

During the Council's deliberations, Article 33 was explicitly invoked to underline that the imposition of measures against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had taken place without exhausting the provisions and arrangements for the peaceful settlement of disputes set forth in Article 33.

*Letters dated 20 and 23 December 1991, from France, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America*²⁰⁹

At its 3864th meeting, on 20 March 1998, the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya argued that resolutions 731 (1992), 748 (1992) and 883 (1993) had been adopted in clear violation of Article 33 of the Charter, thus challenging the relevance of the Council's procedures. He argued that his country had applied the provisions contained in Article 33 of the Charter, resorting to regional and international organizations to seek a solution by negotiation, enquiry, mediation, conciliation, arbitration or judicial settlement. He stated that his Government had submitted the issue to the League of Arab States, the Organization of African Unity, the Organization of the Islamic Conference and the Non-Aligned Movement. Those organizations established committees which contacted the parties concerned in search of a solution that would satisfy all parties. However, their noble endeavours had been aborted through rejection, disregard and worse. He further stated that those organizations, once their efforts of mediation or conciliation had failed, submitted proposals aimed at the judicial settlement of the question through one of three options.²¹⁰ Three options were proposed for the trial of the two Libyan nationals suspected in the Lockerbie bombing: they could be tried in a neutral country chosen by the Council; at the World Court in the Hague by Scottish judges; or in a special tribunal to be created at The Hague.

Several speakers²¹¹ supported the view of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. In that connection, referring to the provisions in Article 33 stating that disputes between States must be resolved, the representative of Pakistan questioned whether all those options had been exhausted before sanctions were imposed on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. He argued that the Security Council should reconsider whether it can remain seized of an issue which was now sub judice in the ICJ.²¹²

The representatives of the Organization of African Unity and the Organization of the Islamic Conference explicitly referred to the provisions under Article 33 of the Charter calling on the parties to any dispute to seek a solution by negotiation, enquiry, mediation, conciliation, arbitration, judicial settlement, resort to regional agencies or arrangements, or other peaceful means of their own choice.²¹³ The representative of the Organization of African Unity considered that the dispute between the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and two permanent members of the Security Council fell under Article 33 of the Charter of the United Nations.²¹⁴

Speaking on behalf of the Group of African States, the representative of Mali referred to the resolutions of the Organization of African Unity inviting all the parties to begin negotiations with a view to arriving at a negotiated solution to the dispute, in accordance with Article 33 of the Charter, which calls for the solution of disputes by negotiation, mediation and judicial settlement, in accordance with the norms of international law.²¹⁵

The representative of the Sudan echoed the belief of his Government that the peaceful settlement of disputes in accordance with the provisions of the Charter was a necessity in the context of the maintenance of international peace and security, as reflected in the provisions contained in Article 33 (1). For this reason, the Sudan believed that the Security Council was, first and foremost, duty-bound to compel the parties to the conflict to settle their dispute by peaceful means.²¹⁶

No action was taken at the end of the deliberations at the 3864th meeting.

Relevance of recommendations for the settlement of disputes by the Security Council, in the light of Article 33 (2) of the Charter

Whereas Article 33 (1) gives primary responsibility in resolving a dispute to the parties concerned, the Security Council is vested, under Article 33 (2), with discretionary power to request the parties to settle their dispute by peaceful means.

Article 33 (2) provides that “the Security Council shall, when it deems necessary, call upon the parties to settle their disputes by such means”, as referred to in Article 33 (1), namely, negotiation, enquiry, mediation, conciliation, arbitration, judicial settlement, resort to regional agencies or arrangements, or other peaceful means of the choice by the parties to a dispute or situation. The importance placed on the parties’ efforts to reach a settlement is also reflected in Article 36 (2), which provides that “the Security Council should take into consideration any procedures for the settlement of the dispute which have already been adopted between the parties”. In the following instance, the Security Council called upon the parties to resolve their dispute through dialogue and negotiation.

The responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security

For example, following the nuclear tests conducted by India and Pakistan, by resolution 1172 (1998), adopted at its 3890th meeting held on 6 June 1998, the Security Council demanded that those countries refrain from further nuclear tests, and called upon them immediately to stop their nuclear weapon development programmes, to refrain from weaponization or from the deployment of nuclear weapons, to cease development of ballistic missiles capable of delivering nuclear weapons and any further production of fissile material for nuclear weapons, to confirm their policies not to export equipment, materials or technology that could contribute to weapons of mass destruction or missiles capable of delivering them and to undertake appropriate commitments in that regard. Furthermore, the Council urged them to become parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons and to the Comprehensive Nuclear-Test-Ban Treaty without delay and without conditions.²¹⁷

At the same meeting, speakers unanimously expressed concern about the threat posed to the peace and stability of the South Asia region, and called upon India and Pakistan to resolve their disputes by peaceful means, through dialogue and negotiation. Expressing grave concern at the negative effect of the nuclear tests on peace and stability in South Asia and beyond, speakers unanimously urged India and Pakistan to exercise maximum restraint and to avoid threatening military movements. They were also urged to resume their dialogue on all outstanding issues, particularly on all matters pertaining to peace and security, in order to remove the tensions between them. Several speakers²¹⁸ emphasized the need to address the root causes of the tension between them, and to try to build confidence rather than seek confrontation.

The representative of Sweden encouraged India and Pakistan to resume and strengthen a political dialogue on all outstanding issues, including Kashmir. In that regard, he stated that the international community should stand ready to facilitate such dialogue, at the request of the parties, in order to reduce tension and build confidence and security between them.²¹⁹

The representative of the Russian Federation stressed his delegation’s readiness to help India and Pakistan in their search for reconciliation and cooperation through direct dialogue.²²⁰

Speaking after the adoption of resolution 1172 (1998), the Secretary-General said that he particularly welcomed the call by the Council on India and Pakistan to resume their bilateral talks on the issues that divided them. He stated that he would continue with his own efforts to encourage dialogue in the hope that it would reduce tensions and the danger of an escalation into a nuclear arms race.²²¹ Responding to this, the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran noted that the situation at hand was a good example of an area where the good offices of the Secretary-General could be best utilized.²²²

The representative of the United Arab Emirates appealed to the international community, which was represented by the Security Council whose mission was to preserve international peace and security, to follow that peaceful path and use its good offices as a preventive measure so as to contain any escalation of tensions between the two countries.²²³

Commenting on statements made by other speakers, the representative of Pakistan considered the approach of giving responsibility in resolving the dispute to the parties involved erroneous, given the failure of the two parties to find a peaceful solution. He argued that the Council had failed to address the root causes of tensions between India and Pakistan, by merely “deal[ing] with the non-proliferation aspects”. He asserted that non-proliferation was no longer an issue in South Asia, which was nuclearized “thanks to the encouragement and acquiescence of major Powers”. Furthermore, he maintained that the resolution calling upon India and Pakistan to settle by themselves the issues bedeviling their relations was irrelevant given the failure of the two States to find a negotiated solution. He added that if Pakistan and India could have sorted out those problems themselves, South Asia would not be nuclearized. In conclusion, the representative of Pakistan emphasized that his country was ready to enter into talks with India on all matters of mutual concern, including a non-aggression pact, on the basis of a just, equitable and expeditious settlement of the Jammu and Kashmir dispute.²²⁴

At the end of deliberations, the Council adopted resolution 1172 (1998), by which it urged India and Pakistan to resume the dialogue between them on all outstanding issues, particularly on all matters pertaining to peace and security, in order to remove the tensions between them, and encouraged them to find mutually acceptable solutions that addressed the root causes of those tensions, including Kashmir.

Role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflicts

During the period under review, in thematic debates of the Security Council speakers suggested new ideas and new approaches to the role of the Security Council as defined under Chapter VI. The idea of early-warning mechanisms, likely to enable the Council to take early action with regard to emerging disputes, was the most outstanding example of the evolving interpretation of Chapter VI. In his report²²⁵ entitled “The causes of conflict and the promotion of durable peace and sustainable development in Africa”, the Secretary-General suggested that a better response to rising conflicts could be given by the Council if it were informed at the earliest stage possible. He noted that early warning mechanisms were widely regarded as serving an important role in conflict prevention but, without early action, early warning was of little use. He argued that the critical concern today was no longer lack of early warning of impending crisis, but rather the need to follow up early warning with early and effective action.

At its 3875th meeting, on 24 April 1998, the Council considered the report of the Secretary-General.

During the debate, speakers discussed ways to detect the early signs of a conflict, with regard to the referral of the Council about any situation or any dispute likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security. The representative of Guyana affirmed that stronger regional bodies which were closer to the local situation and therefore better able to understand and respond to them could help stem the tide of conflict through the early initiation of the procedures for peaceful settlement set out in Article 33 of the Charter.²²⁶ At its 4081st meeting, on 15 December 1999, one of the several themes of discussion included the identification of additional instruments that the Council could bring to bear to help solve and, where possible, prevent conflicts in Africa. Noting that the United Nations Charter provided a number of tools which could and should be used in conflict prevention, the representative of Finland, speaking on behalf of the European Union and the associated and aligned countries,²²⁷ emphasized that existing methods, such as those enumerated in Article 33 of the Charter, should be strengthened and complemented.²²⁸

In connection with the agenda item entitled “Role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflicts”, at its 4072nd meeting, on 29 November 1999, several speakers highlighted the importance and effectiveness of the provisions enshrined in Article 33, and how they could play an important role in settling many disputes and preventing armed conflicts. The representative of Bahrain underlined that there were many important tools available for the settlement of disputes under Article 33 of the Charter: negotiation, enquiry, mediation, conciliation, arbitration, judicial settlement and other peaceful means.²²⁹ The representative of Gabon noted that the provisions stipulated in Article 33, calling on the parties to settle their disputes through the use of peaceful means, gave a mandate to the Council in the field of prevention of armed conflict.²³⁰ Referring to the tools that could and should be used in conflict prevention, the representative of Finland, speaking on behalf of the European Union and the associated and aligned countries,²³¹ called on such methods enumerated in Article 33 to be strengthened and complemented.²³² The representative of Norway noted that early consideration and preventive action by the Security Council in disputes or potential conflict situations should remain the primary instrument of the international community's conflict prevention efforts. He stated that the higher the readiness of the Council for preventive action, the more likely it was that disputes could be settled peacefully, in accordance with Article 33 of the Charter.²³³

Recourse to investigation by the Security Council in the light of Article 34

Article 34 of the Charter provides that the Security Council may investigate any dispute, or any situation which might lead to international friction or give rise to a dispute, in order to determine whether the continuance of the dispute or situation is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security. In the instance described below, the Article was explicitly invoked during the consideration of measures whose timely use could resolve situations of conflict.

On 8 September 1999, the Secretary-General submitted his report entitled "Protection of civilians in armed conflict",²³⁴ in which he noted that while causes of conflict were complex and needed to be addressed in a comprehensive manner, there were a number of steps which the Council could take, acting within its sphere of responsibility, to identify potential conflict situations much sooner. In that regard, he recommended, inter alia, that the Security Council increase its use of relevant provisions in the Charter, including Article 34, by investigating disputes at an early stage, inviting Member States to bring disputes to the Security Council's attention, and recommending appropriate procedures for dealing with disputes.²³⁵

At its 4046th meeting, on 16 September 1999, the Council met to discuss the above-mentioned report of the Secretary-General. During the course of the debate, speakers unanimously expressed their concern over the seriousness of the issue of civilians in armed conflict and welcomed the action-oriented recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-General. The representative of Canada expressed support for the suggestion in the Secretary-General's report that the Council should make greater use of, inter alia, Article 34 of the Charter, which allows the Council to investigate any situation.²³⁶

Appropriateness of bringing disputes to the Security Council in the light of Article 35

Article 35 (1) and (2) grants Member States and non-Member States the right to bring any dispute, or any situation of the nature referred to in Article 34, to the attention of the Security Council. The instance described below reflects the action by a party to a dispute to seek a peaceful settlement through a regional organization.

Letter dated 9 January 1996 from the Permanent Representative of Ethiopia to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council concerning the extradition of the suspects wanted in the assassination attempt on the life of the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, on 26 June 1995

In a letter dated 9 January 1999 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²³⁷ the representative of Ethiopia referred to the refusal of the Government of the Sudan to comply with repeated demands for extradition to Ethiopia of the terrorists sought for their role in the assassination attempt against President Mubarak of Egypt. In that connection, he requested, in accordance with Article 35 of the Charter of the United Nations, an urgent meeting of the Council to consider the matter.

At its 3627th meeting, on 31 January 1996, which was held in response to the above-mentioned letter, discussions revolved around the possibility of parallel implementation by Member States of their power of initiative under Article 35 (1) of the Charter and their obligations within regional arrangements under Article 52 (2) of the Charter.

The representative of Ethiopia expressed regret that his delegation had brought before the Council the matter regarding the extradition of suspects to his country, and stated that it had been the intention of his Government to resolve the issue at the bilateral level with the Government of the Sudan. He presented arguments for the referral of the issue of extradition to the Council, asserting that his Government had, first, sought to resolve the issue at the bilateral level and, after the Sudan had failed to reciprocate, brought the matter to the attention of the Organization of Africa Unity. Referring to the fact that the Sudan opposed the efforts of OAU and refused to implement its resolution, he argued that his Government felt compelled to bring the matter to the Council.²³⁸ On a similar note, the representative of Egypt asserted that when Ethiopia resorted to the Security Council, it did so using its rights under the Charter, as ascribed under Article 35. He stated that the provisions enshrined in the article made it clear that any Member of the United Nations might bring to the Security Council's attention any dispute which could threaten international peace and security.²³⁹

Nevertheless, the representative of the Sudan questioned the haste with which Ethiopia had taken the matter to the Council and asked why some Council members had refused to await the outcome of the efforts of OAU on the matter. He expressed the view that resolution 1044 (1996) was imbalanced, and stated that it did not take into consideration the repeated position of the Sudan to cooperate fully and unconditionally. He declared his country's readiness to cooperate fully and unconditionally with all the parties concerned and pledged its "tireless help" to the Secretaries-General of OAU and the United Nations in accordance with the provisions of the resolution.²⁴⁰

The representative of Botswana held that it pained his delegation to discuss the issue before the Council, because it was an African problem that deserved an African solution. In that regard, he would have preferred the issue to be resolved without reference to the Council.²⁴¹

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that given that the Organization of African Unity had adopted a number of important decisions designed to help solve the problem of the extradition of the suspects, his delegation was convinced that the greatest possible involvement by the regional machinery, OAU, was the best way to go. While welcoming constructive cooperation between the United Nations and regional organizations, he believed that there was no justification for the Council taking their place on the issue in question.²⁴²

At the end of the deliberations, the Council adopted resolution 1044 (1996), by which it commended the efforts of the Government of Ethiopia to resolve the issue through bilateral and regional arrangements. It also called upon the Government of the Sudan to comply with the requests of OAU.

The legal nature of disputes, in the light of Article 36 (3) of the Charter

Article 36 (3) of the Charter stipulates that the Security Council, in making recommendations under Article 36, "should take into consideration that legal disputes should as a general rule be referred by the parties to the International Court of Justice in accordance with the provisions of the Statute of the Court".

In the following instance, Member States debated the question of whether the Security Council was competent to decide on a matter of which the International Court of Justice was seized.

and in the context of the review of the sanctions.²⁴⁴ The representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya²⁴⁵ affirmed that resolutions 731 (1992), 748 (1992) and 883 (1993) were adopted in clear violation of Article 36 of the Charter. Rejecting those resolutions as an attempt to politicize a legal question, the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya referred to the judgments of the International Court of Justice rendered on 27 February 1998. In that regard, the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya concluded that the Lockerbie matter was a legal dispute between his country, on the one hand, and the United States and the United Kingdom, on the other. Hence, the sanctions provided for in Security Council resolutions 748 (1992) and 883 (1993) became irrelevant since the Court accepted jurisdiction in the matter on which the resolutions were based. Referring to the imposition of sanctions since 1992, he emphasized that his Government's point of view had been that the disputes between it and the United States and the United Kingdom were legal disputes, and that application of the provisions of Article 36, paragraph 3, of the Charter made it incumbent on the Council in making its recommendations, as in resolution 731 (1992), to take into consideration the fact that legal disputes should be referred by the parties to the Court.²⁴⁶

Several speakers²⁴⁷ supported the position of the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, maintaining that the dispute was legal and not political in nature, and that in the light of the judgments of the Court, it was clearly in the Court's authority to decide on the case. They argued that by confirming its jurisdiction, the Court deprived the Security Council's decisions on the imposing of sanctions of their legal basis. The representative of Ghana asserted that the judgments of the Court appeared to weaken the foundations of the Council's resolutions 748 (1992),

The representative of the Sudan maintained that sanctions gave "hegemonic forces" a pretext to use double standards by imposing sanctions on weaker countries without the necessary objective and legal conditions being met, which constituted a violation of the principles and values of justice enshrined in the Charter. He further stated that the judgments of the Court regarding its competence in this case demonstrated beyond any doubt that the conflict was of a legal nature. It was therefore incumbent upon the Council to assume the sacred duty bestowed upon it by the Charter of the United Nations and refer the case to the International Court of Justice in accordance with Article 36, paragraph 3 of the Charter, which was clear and unequivocal in this regard.²⁴⁹

Similarly, the representative of the League of Arab States asserted that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had, from the beginning, followed the correct path as it resorted to the Court, in accordance with Articles 33 and 36 of the Charter. He noted that this had taken place before the United States and United Kingdom resorted to the Council and before the renewal of the imposition of sanctions. In his delegation's view, the Council should have taken into account the nature of the dispute in accordance with Article 36 of the Charter.²⁵⁰

On the contrary, the representatives of France,²⁵¹ the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland²⁵² and the United States of America²⁵³ considered that the judgments of the Court were procedural in nature, and thus did not affect the relevant resolutions of the Security Council. The representative of the United States affirmed that the rulings of the Court in no way questioned the legality of the Security Council's actions affecting the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya or the merits of the criminal cases against the two accused suspects. He stated that the rulings of the Court involved technical, procedural issues and, contrary to the assertions of the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, was not calling for the review or suspension of Security Council resolutions.²⁵⁴ Other speakers expressed similar views with regard to the validity of relevant resolutions of the Security Council.²⁵⁵ The representative of Japan pointed out that the judgments of the Court concerned exclusively the jurisdictional phase of the case and did not deal with the merits of the case regarding the destruction of Pan Am flight 103. In the light of the legal nature of those decisions, it was the view of his Government that they could not prejudice the power of the Security Council on an issue of which the Council had been legitimately seized.²⁵⁶

The representative of Slovenia expressed a view divergent from the aforementioned positions. He argued that situations in which the Security Council on the one hand and the Court on the other hand were both engaged in dealing with different aspects of a given situation, occurred as a result of the fact that international issues often had both political and legal aspects.²⁵⁷ He stated that in most situations in which the Council and the Court addressed the same events, the approach was different. In that regard, he gave the example of the judgment concerning military and paramilitary activities in and against Nicaragua. In that instance, he recalled that the Court explained that “the Charter confers primary and not exclusive responsibility upon the Security Council for the purpose of the maintenance of international peace and security”. The Court then noted that the Council has functions of a political nature assigned to it whereas the Court exercises purely judicial functions. Both organs can therefore perform their separate but complementary functions with respect to the same events.²⁵⁸ The representative of Slovenia drew the conclusion that those examples demonstrated that situations of parallel pursuit of the separate but complementary functions of the Court and the Security Council were not new, and that there was no conflict of jurisdiction involved.²⁵⁹

No action was taken at the end of the deliberations at the 3864th meeting.

Utilization of Article 99 by the Secretary-General for the peaceful settlement of disputes

Article 99 of the Charter empowers the Secretary-General to bring to the attention of the Security Council any matter which in his opinion may threaten the maintenance of international peace and security. In the discussions below, Member States welcomed the recommendation made by the Secretary-General to strengthen the relevance of Article 99, and some underlined the importance of the role of the Secretary-General to this effect.

Protection of civilians in armed conflict

In his report of 8 September 1999 entitled “The protection of civilians in armed conflict”,²⁶⁰ the Secretary-General offered recommendations on measures that the Security Council could adopt within its sphere of responsibility to protect civilians. One of several recommendations was that the Council should strengthen the relevance of Article 99 of the Charter by taking concrete action in response to threats against peace and security as these were identified by the Secretariat.²⁶¹ Among them, the Secretary-General recommended that the Security Council “urge neighbouring Member States to ensure access for humanitarian assistance and call on them to bring any issues that might threaten the right of civilians to assistance to the attention of the Security Council as a matter affecting peace and security.”²⁶²

At its 4046th meeting, on 16 September 1999, the Council met to consider the above-mentioned report of the Secretary-General. During the debate, the representative of Canada welcomed the recommendation of the Secretary-General to strengthen the relevance of Article 99, as it would allow him to bring to the attention of the Council any matter which in his opinion might threaten the maintenance of international peace and security.²⁶³

The representative of India disagreed with recommendation 19 of the report of the Secretary-General, and expressed concern about the possibility that neighbouring countries might bring to the Council's notice, as a matter affecting peace and security, any issue that might threaten the right of civilians to assistance. He asserted that it meant that even if there was no threat to peace and security, such a threat could be manufactured in the complaint, or that the complaint in itself would be considered proof that such a threat existed. In that regard, this would automatically sow dissension between neighbours, and undermine regional peace. The representative stated that as a matter of procedure, it would call into question the sovereign right of nation States to make decisions on matters which they considered to be a threat to peace and security in their region, by laying down parameters which were arbitrary and ill-defined.²⁶⁴

Role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflicts

At its 4072nd meeting, on 29 November 1999, a number of speakers explicitly invoked Article 99, and emphasized the importance of the role of the Secretary-General under Article 99 of the Charter.²⁶⁵ The representative of Australia encouraged the Secretary-General to make greater use of his authority under Article 99 of the Charter to bring to the attention of the Council any matter which in his opinion might threaten the maintenance of international peace and security.²⁶⁶

The representative of Liechtenstein noted that an enhanced role for the Secretary-General was a further key element of successful United Nations action in the area of prevention. She further noted that Article 99 of the Charter gave a legally and politically sound basis for such an enhanced role.²⁶⁷

The representative of New Zealand noted that the Secretary-General had been given a particular role under Article 99, a role that would seem quite relevant to the idea of "early warning" so often mentioned in discussions of preventive diplomacy. In that regard, he was able to bring any matter that in his opinion might threaten international peace and security to the attention of the Council.²⁶⁸ The representative of Norway called for the enhancement of the role of the Secretary-General through the allocation of human and financial resources to enable him to fulfil his obligations under the Charter to bring threats to the attention of the Council.²⁶⁹

The situation in Africa

At its 4081st meeting, on 15 December 1999, the representative of Finland, speaking on behalf of the European Union, stated that the possibilities of the Secretary-General and his Secretariat were not fully utilized, and recalled the provisions contained in Article 99 of the Charter. For that purpose, the European Union considered that the Secretariat's capacity needed to be enhanced to enable the Security Council to conduct regular surveys of potential conflict areas.²⁷⁰

The representative of New Zealand emphasized that there should be a greater focus on prevention, especially through the Secretary-General exercising his early-warning role, as provided for in Article 99 of the Charter.²⁷¹

Introductory note

Chapter XI deals with action taken by the Security Council with respect to threats to the peace, breaches of the peace and acts of aggression, within the framework of Chapter VII of the Charter.

During the period under review Chapter VII of the Charter was invoked by the Security Council in a greater number of its decisions than in the previous period. While most of those decisions related to the situations in Afghanistan, Angola, the Central African Republic, East Timor, the former Yugoslavia and Sierra Leone, the Council also adopted measures under Chapter VII of the Charter in connection with the situations in Albania, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, East Timor, the Great Lakes region, Iraq and Kuwait, and Liberia; in connection with the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, to ensure the Government's full cooperation in surrendering the suspects in the terrorist attacks against Pan Am flight 103 and Union de Transports Aeriens flight 772; and in connection with the extradition of the suspects wanted in the assassination attempt of the President of Egypt.

This chapter will focus on material selected to highlight how the provisions of Chapter VII of the Charter were interpreted by the Council in its deliberations and applied in its decisions. Given the increase in the Council's practice under Chapter VII during the period under review, and in order to give due focus to the key relevant elements that arose in its decisions or deliberations, individual Articles of the Charter have been dealt with in separate parts of the chapter. Thus parts I to IV of this chapter focus on the practice of the Council in accordance with Articles 39 to 42; part V focuses on Articles 43 to 47; part VI deals with Articles 48; part VII addresses the obligations of Member States under Article 49; and parts VIII and IX deal, respectively, with the practice of the Council with respect to Articles 50 and 51. In addition, each part contains a section that focuses on the decisions of the Council which illustrate its practice with respect to the Article(s) considered and, where relevant, a section that highlights excerpts of the Council's deliberations in respect to those Articles. Each section treats the different aspects of the Council's consideration of the Article in focus under different subheadings.

Part I

Determination of a threat to the peace, breach of the peace, or act of aggression under Article 39 of the Charter

Article 39

The Security Council shall determine the existence of any threat to the peace, breach of the peace, or act of aggression and shall make recommendations, or decide what measures shall be taken in accordance with Articles 41 and 42, to maintain or restore international peace and security.

Note

During the period under review, the Council did not explicitly invoke Article 39 in any of its decisions. The Council did, however, adopt several resolutions that determined or expressed concern at the “existence of a threat to the peace”, for example, in connection with the situations in Albania, Afghanistan, the Central African Republic, East Timor, Sierra Leone, and the Great Lakes region. The Council also determined that there existed a continued threat to the peace in the following situations: in Angola; in the former Yugoslavia; and between Iraq and Kuwait. In some instances, the Council regarded widespread violations of international humanitarian law and human rights, terrorist activities by external State actors and the staging of a military coup d'état as threats to international peace and security.

During the period under consideration, the Council also identified certain generic threats to peace and security. For instance, in the deliberations¹ held in connection with the item entitled “The responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security”, members of the Council expressed the view that the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction constituted a threat to international peace and security.

Section A outlines the decisions of the Council in which determinations were made regarding the existence of a threat to the peace. Section B reflects the constitutional discussion in the meetings of the Council arising in connection with the adoption of some of these resolutions.

A. Decisions of the Security Council relating to Article 39

Africa

Letter dated 9 January 1996 from the Permanent Representative of Ethiopia to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council concerning the extradition of the suspects wanted in the assassination attempt on the life of the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, on 26 June 1995.

By resolutions 1054 (1996) of 26 April 1996 and 1070 (1996) of 16 August 1996, the Council expressed alarm at the terrorist assassination attempt on the life of the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia on 26 June 1995, convinced that those responsible for the act should be brought to justice. By the same resolution, the Council determined that the non-compliance of the Government of Sudan with the requests set out in paragraph 4 of resolution 1044 (1996) constituted a threat to international peace and security.

By a statement of the President dated 1 November 1996,² the Council members agreed with the Secretary-General that the situation in eastern Zaire³ constituted a serious threat to the stability of the Great Lakes region.⁴ By resolution 1078 (1996) of

² S/PRST/1996/44.

⁴ By a letter dated 14 October 1996 addressed to the President, the Secretary-General informed the Council that he had concluded that the deteriorating situation in eastern Zaire presented a threat to peace and security in the region (S/1996/875).

9 November 1996, the Council particularly expressed concern at the humanitarian situation and the large-scale movements of refugees and internally displaced persons, and determined that the magnitude of the humanitarian crisis in eastern Zaire constituted a threat to peace and security in the region. By resolution 1080 (1996) of 15 November 1996, the Council expressed grave concern at the continued deteriorating situation in the Great Lakes region in particular eastern Zaire, and determined that the situation in eastern Zaire constituted a threat to international peace and security in the region.

The situation in Sierra Leone

By a statement of the President dated 11 July 1997,⁵ the Council expressed concern about the grave crisis in Sierra Leone, which endangered the peace, security and stability of the whole region, and in particular, about its negative impact on the peace process in neighbouring Liberia. By resolution 1132 (1997) of 8 October 1997, the Council expressed concern at the continuing violence, loss of life and the deteriorating humanitarian conditions in Sierra Leone following the military coup of 25 May 1997. The Council determined that the situation in Sierra Leone constituted a threat to international peace and security in the region. By resolution 1270 (1999) of 22 October 1999, the Council recalled its resolutions 1171 (1998) of 5 June 1998, 1181 (1998) of 13 July 1998, 1231 (1999) of 11 March 1999, 1260 (1999) of 20 August 1999 and other relevant resolutions, and by the statement by its President of 15 May 1999,⁶ thereby determining that the situation in Sierra Leone continued to constitute a threat to international peace and security in the region.

The situation in the Central African Republic

By resolution 1125 (1997) of 6 August 1997, the Council expressed concern at the fact that, in the Central African Republic, former mutineers, members of militias and other persons continued to bear arms in contravention of the Bangui Agreements, and determined that the situation in the Central African Republic continued to constitute a threat to international peace and security in the region. By resolutions 1136 (1997) of 6 November 1997, 1152 (1998) of 5 February 1998, 1155 (1998) of 16 March 1998, and 1159 (1998) of 27 March 1998, the Council reaffirmed its resolution 1125 (1997), and determined that the situation in the Central African Republic continued to constitute a threat to international peace and security in the region.

The situation in Angola

By resolution 1127 (1997) of 28 August 1997, the Council expressed its grave concern at the serious difficulties in the peace process, which were mainly the result of delays by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola (UNITA) in the implementation of its obligations under the Lusaka Protocol, and determined that the situation in Angola constituted a threat to international peace and security in the region. By resolution 1135 (1997) of 29 October 1997, the Council strongly deplored the failure by UNITA to comply fully with its obligations under the “Acordos de Paz”, the Lusaka Protocol and with relevant Security Council resolutions, in particular resolution 1127 (1997) of 28 August 1997. As a result of this, the Council determined that the situation constituted a threat to international peace and security in the region. By resolution 1173 (1998) of 12 June 1998, the Council expressed its grave concern at the critical situation in the peace process, which had been the result of the failure by UNITA to implement its obligations under the “Acordos de Paz”, the Lusaka Protocol, and relevant Security Council resolutions. The Council, thereby, determined that the situation in Angola constituted a threat to international peace and security in the region. By resolutions 1176 (1998) of 24 June 1998 and 1237 (1999) of 7 May 1999, the Council reaffirmed its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions, in particular resolution 1173 (1998) of 12 June 1998, and determined that the situation in Angola constituted a threat to international peace and security in the region.

Asia

The situation in Afghanistan

By resolution 1267 (1999) of 15 October 1999, the Council reiterated its deep concern over violations of international humanitarian law and of human rights, and determined that the failure of the Taliban authorities to respond to the demands in resolution

1214 (1998) constituted a threat to international peace and security.⁷

The situation in East Timor

By resolution 1264 (1999) of 15 September 1999 and resolution 1272 (1999) of 25 October 1999, the Council expressed deep concern at the deterioration in the security situation in East Timor, and, in particular by the violence against and large-scale displacement and relocation of East Timorese civilians, thereby, determining that the situation in East Timor constituted a threat to peace and security.

Europe

Items relating to the situation in the former Yugoslavia

The situation in Croatia

By resolutions 1037 (1996) and 1038 (1996) of 15 January 1996, the Council recalled all of its relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 1023 (1995) of 22 November 1995 and 1025 (1995) of 30 November 1995, and determined that the situation in Croatia continued to constitute a threat to international peace and security. By resolution 1066 (1996) of 15 July 1996, the Council determined that the situation in Croatia continued to constitute a threat to international peace and security, and authorized United Nations military observers to continue monitoring the demilitarization of the Prevlaka peninsula. By resolution 1079 (1996) of 15 November 1996, the Council determined that the situation in Croatia continued to constitute a threat to international peace and security and welcomed the report of the Secretary-General.⁸ The Council noted in particular the recommendations of the Secretary-General that the mandate of the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium should be extended by six months. By resolution 1093 (1997) of 14 January 1997, the Council noted with concern the violations in the zones designated by the United Nations in the region and other activities, including restrictions on the freedom of movement of United Nations military observers, and determined that the situation in Croatia continued to constitute a threat to international peace and security. By resolution 1119 (1997) of 14 July 1997, the Council noted with concern that the parties had failed to make any progress in adopting the practical options proposed by the United Nations military observers in May 1996, and determined that the situation in Croatia continued to constitute a threat to international peace and security. By resolution 1120 (1997) of 14 July 1997, the Council expressed its grave concern over the lack of improvement in respect to human rights and strongly deplored incidents of ethnically motivated violence in Hrvatska Kostajnica. By the same resolution, the Council determined that the situation in Croatia continued to constitute a threat to international peace and security.

The situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina

By resolutions 1088 (1996) of 12 December 1996 and 1174 (1998) of 15 June 1998, having considered the report of the Secretary-General,⁹ the Council determined that the situation in the region continued to constitute a threat to international peace and security. By resolution 1247 (1999) of 18 June 1999, the Council emphasized that a comprehensive and coordinated return of refugees and displaced persons throughout the region continued to be crucial to lasting peace, and determined that the situation in the region continued to constitute a threat to international peace and security.

Herzegovina and other European countries as a result of the use of force in Kosovo. Moreover, the Council was concerned by the deterioration in the humanitarian situation throughout Kosovo and by reports of increasing violations of human rights and of international humanitarian law. It thereby affirmed that the deterioration of the situation in Kosovo, Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, constituted a threat to peace and security in the region. By resolution 1203 (1998) of 24 October 1998, the Council was deeply alarmed and concerned at the grave humanitarian situation throughout Kosovo, and affirmed that the unresolved situation there constituted a threat to peace and security in the region. By resolution 1244 (1999) of 10 June 1999, the Council condemned all acts of violence against the Kosovo population as well as all terrorists acts by any party, and determined that the situation in the region continued to constitute a threat to international peace and security.

The situation in Albania

By resolutions 1101 (1997) of 28 March 1997 and 1114 (1997) of 19 June 1997, the Council determined that the situation in Albania constituted a threat to peace and security in the region. By the same resolutions, the Council underlined the need for all concerned to refrain from hostilities and acts of violence, and reiterated its call to the parties involved to continue the political dialogue.

Middle East

The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

By resolution 1137 (1997) of 12 November 1997, the Council condemned the continuous violations by Iraq of its obligations under the relevant resolutions to cooperate fully and unconditionally with the Special Commission in the fulfilment of its mandate, and determined that the situation continued to constitute a threat to international peace and security.

B. Constitutional discussion relating to Article 39

During the period under review, the Council, in the course of its deliberations relating to a number of salient issues, determined the existence of a threat to the peace. The following overview of those cases will shed light on the interpretation and application of Article 39. In some instances, during the deliberations of the Council,¹² no substantive issues relating to the provision of Article 39 were raised.

Case 1

Letter dated 9 January 1996 from the Permanent Representative of Ethiopia to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council concerning the extradition of the suspects wanted in the assassination attempt on the life of the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, on 26 June 1995

In response to a request in a letter addressed to the President of the Security Council from the representative of Ethiopia,¹³ the Council, at its 3660th meeting on 26 April 1996, considered the situation concerning the extradition of the suspects wanted in the assassination attempt on the life of the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt. At the same meeting, the Council adopted resolution 1054 (1996), by which it stated that should the Sudan fail to comply with the demands set out in resolution 1044 (1996) of 31 January 1996,¹⁴ it would impose measures against the country. During the debate, in response to resolution 1044 (1996) which called upon the Government of the Sudan to extradite the suspects, the representative of the Sudan denied that his Government had any connection with any terrorist act. He stated that his Government had no knowledge about the suspects, including information that would help them to determine their location.¹⁵ The representative of Uganda stated that in spite of his Government's efforts to maintain a "policy of good neighbourliness" with all its neighbours, the Government of Sudan had continued its activities of assisting, supporting, facilitating and giving shelter to rebel movements based on its soil. He recalled that on 13 April 1995, his Government had severed diplomatic relations with the Government of the Sudan, over incidents aimed at destabilizing Uganda and compromising its security and stability.¹⁶

The Council members unanimously viewed the assassination attempt on the life of President Hosni Mubarak as an act of international terrorism. The representative of the Republic of Korea stated that his Government viewed international terrorism as a major threat to international peace and security. His delegation deeply regretted that the Security Council had come to where it stood in the implementation of its resolution 1044 (1996). In the case at hand, however, it saw no alternative but to resort to Chapter VII as the ultimate means of ensuring the implementation of resolution 1044 (1996).¹⁷ The representative of the United States noted that the Sudan's complicity in, and efforts to cover up, the attack on President Mubarak were only part of a broader pattern of Sudanese support for terrorism, which demanded action by the international community. He also noted that under the policy of the National Islamic Front, the Sudan welcomed a long list of terrorist organizations, providing a meeting point and training centre for their violent activities outside of the Sudan. Those terrorist organizations threatened Governments in Egypt, Algeria, Israel and elsewhere. Furthermore, he emphasized that the Sudan's actions in fostering terrorism around the globe were indeed a threat to international peace and security.¹⁸

The representative of Egypt recalled that the Organization of African Unity (OAU) considered the assassination attempt against the life of President Mubarak to be an attack on the whole of Africa, threatening regional stability and international peace and security. He stated that by the adoption of resolution 1054 (1996), the Council reaffirmed that the dangers of international terrorism represented a grave threat to international peace and security and that concerted efforts by countries to eliminate that threat and to deter those who assisted in its perpetration were a basic requirement for the maintenance of international peace and security.¹⁹

opposed imposing sanctions on the Sudan. The representative of the Russian Federation, who abstained from voting on resolution 1054 (1996), condemned the attempted assassination of the President of Egypt and reiterated his Government's stance on the imposition of sanctions. The representative of China, who also abstained from voting, stated that his Government opposed and condemned all forms of terrorism. His Government believed that terrorist activities not only wreaked havoc on life, property and social stability, but also threatened international peace and security.²⁰

Case 2

The situation in the Great Lakes region

At its 3713th meeting, on 15 November 1996, the Council considered a letter dated 15 November 1996 from the representative of Zaire addressed to the President of the Security Council.²¹ The text of the letter stated that since the Council planned to deploy a multinational force in eastern Zaire in order to deal with the vast humanitarian crisis, which constituted a threat to peace and security in the region, his Government should be formally consulted on the composition and mandate of that force and on the measures needed to implement the decision of the Council.²²

During the debate, the Council members expressed concern about the displacement of millions of refugees in eastern Zaire, which had a humanitarian impact in the Great Lakes region. The representative of France stated that the countries of the Great Lakes region were threatened by a humanitarian catastrophe, resulting from the disturbances which had taken place in eastern Zaire and the exodus of 1.2 million refugees and displaced persons.²³ The representative of Botswana emphasized that the refugee camps had become recruitment grounds for those determined to train and equip an army to fight against the Government of Rwanda. Therefore, the prolonged stay of the refugees in camps in Zaire had been a source of insecurity and instability to the country of asylum, which was a serious threat to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Zaire.²⁴ The representative of the Republic of Korea stated that the humanitarian catastrophe, unless tackled properly by the international community, was bound to have serious consequences, which would threaten peace and security in the entire Great Lakes region.²⁵ The representative of Honduras expressed his delegation's deep concern at the events unfolding in eastern Zaire, which had caused more than a million refugees to abandon their camps, thereby threatening peace and security in the Great Lakes region.²⁶ The representative of the Russian Federation also expressed deep concern about the loss of human life and displacement of over one million Rwandese and Burundian refugees and thousands of Zairians who had found themselves cut off from external aid. He believed that the situation threatened to grow into a regional military conflict that would doom all hopes for the restoration of peace and stability in the Great Lakes region.²⁷

At the same meeting, the Council unanimously adopted resolution 1080 (1996), which authorized the establishment of a temporary multinational force to facilitate the delivery of humanitarian aid to alleviate the suffering of the displaced persons and refugees.

The situation in the Central African Republic

At its 3808th meeting, on 6 August 1997, the Council considered a letter dated 22 July 1997 from the representative of the Central African Republic addressed to the President of the Council,²⁸ transmitting a letter from President Ange-Félix Patassé, who had requested that the Council authorize the member States of the Inter-African Mission to monitor the Implementation of the Bangui Agreements (MISAB) to carry out the necessary operations to attain the objectives defined by its mandate. At the same meeting, the Council adopted resolution 1125 (1997), and authorized the Member States participating in MISAB and those States providing logistical support to ensure the security and freedom of movement of their personnel.

The Council members unanimously supported resolution 1125 (1997), and similarly viewed the situation of the armed conflict in the Central African Republic as posing a threat to regional stability. The representative of Kenya stated that the conflict in the Central African Republic had plunged the country into a political crisis and "economic catastrophe", which had affected every aspect of civil life in that country and could destabilize the whole region. He expressed concern that the situation in the Central African Republic posed a threat to international peace and security.²⁹ The representative of Guinea-Bissau noted that the Government of the Central African Republic had been unable to bring about respect for public order, and the lack of security had been worsening and threatened to spread throughout the country. Those serious tensions were likely to affect regional stability and thus posed a threat to international peace and security.³⁰ The representative of the Republic of Korea expressed concern about the crisis in the Central African Republic and its implications for the whole Central African region. He also shared the view of the regional countries in the Central African region that the crisis in that region posed a serious threat to regional peace and stability.³¹ The representative of Poland noted that his delegation had voted in favour of resolution 1125 (1997), because in his view, despite regional efforts, the situation in the Central African Republic constituted a threat to international peace and security.

The situation in Angola

The Council held its 3814th meeting on 28 August 1997, during the course of which it adopted resolution 1127 (1997) expressing concern at the difficulties in the peace process.

The meeting was welcomed by the representative of Angola who supported the measures set fourth in paragraph 4 of resolution 1127 (1997).³² He expressed the hope that the resolution would contribute to the acceleration of the peacekeeping process in Angola.³³ Similar views were expressed by the other representatives of the Southern African Development Community: the representative of Malawi expressed grave concern over the developments in Angola and condemned the acts of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola which threatened the peace process;³⁴ the representative of Lesotho was particularly concerned that tensions in northern Angola were rapidly spreading to the central and southern provinces, thus posing a threat to the peace process;³⁵ the representative of Zimbabwe also expressed concern about the developments in Angola. In his view, UNITA actions had threatened the peace process;³⁶ and the representative of South Africa stated that for the States members of the Southern African Development Community, the normalization of State administration and peace in Angola was a priority concern, because it would serve as a vital contribution to the extension of the frontiers of stability to the whole subregion.³⁷

On the same note, the representative of Luxembourg, speaking on behalf of the European Union and the associated and aligned countries,³⁸ expressed concern at the tension throughout the country, which threatened to jeopardize the peace process. He stated that the future of the peace process depended on the Government of Angola and UNITA, both of which had to refrain from any action liable to lead to a resumption of the fighting.³⁹ The representative of the Republic of Korea emphasized that despite numerous warnings by the Council, UNITA had yet to fulfil its obligations under the Lusaka Protocol and those repeatedly called for in the relevant Council resolutions. The delay in the peace process in its final stage was not only inflicting unbearable suffering on the Angolan people themselves, it was also posing a greater threat to the region.⁴⁰ The representative of China stated that by implementing in real earnest the measures set forth in the Lusaka

Protocol and the agreements reached by the Government of Angola and UNITA, peace and stability could be truly achieved in Angola.⁴¹ The representative of the United States expressed grave concern that, since UNITA had failed to fulfil some key commitments, the peace process was not moving forward and the possibility of renewed fighting threatened the people of Angola. He stated that the international community could not sit idly by hoping that the parties would somehow put the peace process back on track. He emphasized that there was too much at the stake for Angola and for peace in the southern African region.⁴²

The situation in Sierra Leone

Following the military coup d'état in Sierra Leone, which took place on 25 May 1997,⁴³ the Security Council held its 3822nd meeting on 8 October 1997, during the course of which it adopted resolution 1132 (1997) expressing full support for the mediation efforts of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS). By the same resolution, the Council determined that the situation in Sierra Leone constituted a threat to international peace and security in the region and imposed mandatory measures against the military junta and their families.

During the debate, the Council unanimously condemned the coup d'état and welcomed the regional initiatives undertaken by ECOWAS to restore constitutional order in Sierra Leone. The representative of Nigeria emphasized that in view of its potential to destabilize the subregion, the situation in Sierra Leone was a clear threat to international peace and security.⁴⁴ The representative of the United Kingdom recalled a previous meeting between Council members and the Chairman and the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity, which focused on regional initiatives that dealt with the threats to peace and security in the region.⁴⁵ The representative of the Russian Federation stated that a new threat had emerged affecting the stability in the region. He noted that the coup had interrupted Sierra Leone's progress on the path to democratic development and had derailed the peace process that had been established.⁴⁶ The representative of Japan similarly condemned the coup and expressed grave concern about the threat to international peace and security in the region.⁴⁷

The situation concerning the Democratic Republic of Congo

In response to a request contained in a letter dated 4 March 1999 from the representative of the Democratic Republic of Congo addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴⁸ the Council considered the situation in the Democratic Republic of Congo at its 3987th meeting on 19 March 1999.

The representative of the Democratic Republic of Congo stated that his Government had requested the meeting, with the legitimate goal of drawing the Council's attention to the danger posed by the conflict in his country. He stated that in view of the Council's powers in the area of international peace and security, and until the international community took additional steps to bring peace to the Great Lakes region, his Government expected the Council, inter alia, to make use of the provisions of Articles 39 to 42 of the Charter of the United Nations.⁴⁹

Similar views were expressed by other countries sharing borders with the Democratic Republic of Congo, notably Gabon and Namibia. The representative of Gabon stated that the ongoing crisis in the Democratic Republic of Congo was of grave concern. It had inflicted untold suffering on the Congolese people, was thwarting the efforts of the Government to reconstruct the country and threatened peace and stability in the region.⁵⁰ The representative of Namibia noted that the events that were unfolding in the Democratic Republic of Congo could destabilize the region.⁵¹

The representative of Canada stressed that all forces involved in the conflict had to participate in a ceasefire, which had to be accompanied by a timetable for withdrawal of all foreign forces involved in the conflict. In his view, that was an essential condition for the restoration of peace and stability in central Africa.⁵² The representative of France noted that his delegation was aware of the effects of the crisis, particularly the risks of political destabilization in the States of the region and the humanitarian consequences.⁵³ The representative of the United States stated that the ongoing conflict in the Democratic Republic of Congo represented one of the gravest threats to peace, stability and development in sub-Saharan Africa in decades. He emphasized that conflict in the Democratic Republic of Congo had led to a deepening humanitarian crisis, exacerbated the plight of refugees and internally displaced persons, impeded the delivery of critical food and medical assistance, and in general hampered international and domestic efforts towards development and democracy. He stated that if the crisis widened the implications for the region and the subcontinent could be catastrophic.⁵⁴ The representative of Bahrain expressed concern that, due to the great number of parties involved, the continuing conflict posed a threat not only to the peace, security and stability of the Great Lakes region, but also to the entire African continent.⁵⁵ The representative of Germany, speaking on behalf of the European Union and associated and aligned countries,⁵⁶ expressed his deep concern about the crisis in the Democratic Republic of Congo, which had escalated into a large-scale regional war. He stated that the involvement of several countries of the region had not led to the intended stabilization, but had instead led to a dangerous escalation, which threatened the stability of the region as a whole.⁵⁷

The situation in Afghanistan

As its 4051st meeting, on 15 October 1999, the Council adopted resolution 1267 (1999), which determined that the failure of the Taliban authorities to respond to the demands in resolution 1214 (1998) constituted a threat to international peace and security.

During the deliberations, the representative of Afghanistan expressed support for the set of measures imposed against the Taliban. He stated that his Government viewed the set of measures contained in the resolution as “an adequate signal to the Taliban and to their Pakistani mentors” that the international community was extremely concerned about the “adventurist policy” of Pakistan and the Taliban, which had become a major threat to international peace and security.⁵⁸ The representative of the United States expressed concern over the violations of international humanitarian law and of human rights carried out by the Taliban. She also expressed her Government’s concern about the significant rise in illicit opium production under areas of Taliban control and the “deplorable” treatment of diplomatic personnel and journalists of the Islamic Republic of Iran. She emphasized that the actions of the Taliban posed a threat to their neighbours and to the international community at large. Furthermore, she underlined that the Security Council had sent a strong message to the Taliban stating that their continued harbouring of Osama bin Laden posed a threat to international peace and security.⁵⁹ Other Council members expressed their opposition to terrorism, and to States harbouring individual terrorists.⁶⁰

Case 8

*Letter dated 11 March 1998 from the Deputy Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council*⁶¹

*Letter dated 27 March 1998 from the Permanent Representative of the United States of America to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council*⁶²

At its 3868th meeting, on 31 March 1998, the Council considered, inter alia, a letter dated 30 March 1998 from Mr. Vladislav Jovanovic⁶³ of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁶⁴ expressing his Government’s concern about the inclusion of Kosovo and Metohija on the agenda of the Security Council. He stated that the situation in Kosovo and Metohija was being deliberately dramatized and the contention about an alleged threat to international peace and security was “aggressively propounded” so as to obtain a pretext for invoking Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations.⁶⁵

During the debate of the Council, the representative of Japan expressed deep concern about the deterioration of the situation in Kosovo and condemned the use of excessive force by the Serbian police against civilians in Kosovo. His delegation recognized that the current situation in Kosovo posed a threat to international peace and security in the region, and that the further spread of violence there could lead to the destabilization of the entire Balkans.⁶⁶ The representative of Costa Rica emphasized that the use of force by the Serbian police forces against peaceful demonstrators and other acts of violence, in the context of the very sensitive political and security balance in the Balkans, constituted a clear threat to international peace and security, which obligated the Council to take firm and decisive action. In the same vein, he expressed concern about human rights violations in Kosovo and stated that the violation of fundamental rights had been so serious that it constituted a threat to international peace and security, and therefore fully justified the Security Council's invoking the powers granted to it under Chapter VII of the Charter.⁶⁷

The representative of Sweden emphasized that peace and stability in Balkans were necessary prerequisites for European security and, therefore, welcomed the imposition of an arms embargo on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia including Kosovo. He stated that the situation in Kosovo remained serious and clearly constituted a threat to international peace and security.⁶⁸ The representative of Slovenia stated that the situation in Kosovo in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had the potential for serious destabilization in the region. Nevertheless, if managed towards a genuine political solution it could represent an important building block in the structure of security and political stability in Balkans. He recalled that in the past, the unilateral dismantling of Kosovo's autonomy and the use of force against the Albanians of Kosovo represented one of the major sources of political deterioration and instability in the region. Consequently, efforts had to be directed towards the elimination of that threat.⁶⁹ The representative of the United Kingdom stated that by adopting the resolution, which imposed an arms embargo on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, the Security Council sent an unmistakable message: that by acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Council considered that the situation in Kosovo constituted a threat to international peace and security in the Balkans region.⁷⁰ Speaking on behalf of the European Union and associated and aligned countries,⁷¹ the representative of the United Kingdom emphasized that the international community had to send a clear message to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the Serbian authorities that the excessive violence by military police units, involving deaths and injury among the civilian population, was unacceptable.⁷² The representative of Poland reported that the Head of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE), together with other members of that Organization's Troika, visited Albania, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. The main conclusion drawn from the extensive talks with leaders of those countries bordering the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia was that they perceived the situation in Kosovo as a real threat to the stability of the whole area and, consequently, that they expected the international community to play a role in resolving the crisis.⁷³

On the other hand, the representative of the Russian Federation stated that his Government viewed the events in Kosovo as an internal affair of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. He stated that the situation in Kosovo, despite its complexity, did not constitute a threat to regional, much less international peace and security.⁷⁴ The representative of China similarly viewed the situation as an internal matter of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and noted that it should be resolved properly through negotiations between both parties concerned on the basis of the principle of respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. He further noted that the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had taken a series of positive measures in that regard and that the situation on the ground was moving towards stability. Therefore, he did not think that the situation to Kosovo endangered regional and international peace and security.⁷⁵ In the subsequent vote in connection with the adoption of resolution 1160 (1998), China abstained.

By a letter dated 30 March 1998 addressed to the President of the Council, Mr Jovanovic informed the Council that the situation in Kosovo and Metohija was stable and under full control.⁷⁶ Hence, there had not been any danger of a spillover into neighbouring countries, there had been no threat to peace and security, and there had been no basis for invoking Chapter VII of the Charter.

The representative of Egypt pointed out that the Council candidly referred to the fact that the resolution had been "adopted under the provisions of Chapter VII of the Charter without a prior reference to a determination by the Security Council that there exist[ed] a threat to international peace and security as required by the provisions of Article 39 of the Charter". He noted that the Council was the master of its own procedures. However, in principle, the constitutional requirements in the Charter should be scrupulously followed and respected.⁷⁷

⁷⁵ Ibid., pp. 11-12.

Following a rapid determination in the humanitarian situation throughout Kosovo,⁷⁸ the Security Council held its 3930th meeting, on 23 September 1998, to consider the situation. At the same meeting, the Council adopted resolution 1199 (1998), with one abstention (China). During the debate, the representative of China was of the view that the situation in Kosovo had stabilized and there was no large-scale armed conflict. He believed that the international community should evaluate the positive efforts by the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in an objective and just manner. Therefore, he did not see the situation in Kosovo as being a threat to international peace and security.⁷⁹

In contrast, the representative of the United Kingdom emphasized that by acting under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter and by explicitly characterizing the deterioration of the situation in Kosovo as a threat to peace and security in the region, the Security Council was putting President Slobodan Milosevic on notice that he would be held accountable for his actions.⁸⁰ The representative of the United States stated that his Government supported resolution 1199 (1998), because it increased pressure on Belgrade to negotiate with the Kosovo Albanians to achieve a political settlement that provided for a democratic self-government for the people of Kosovo and avoided the consequences of continued conflict. He also affirmed that the situation constituted a serious threat to peace and security in the region.⁸¹

At its 4011th meeting on 10 June 1998, the Council adopted resolution 1244 (1999). During the debate, Mr. Jovanovic stated that in order to achieve lasting and stable peace in the region and to reaffirm the roles of the United Nations and the Security Council as the highest bodies for the maintenance of international peace and security, it was necessary to deploy a United Nations peacekeeping mission in Kosovo and Metohija. He further argued that the deployment should be based on decisions of the Council and Chapter VI of the Charter of the United Nations and with the prior and full agreement of the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. He noted that resolution 1244 (1999) should contain a condemnation of North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) aggression against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia as an act in violation of the Charter of the United Nations and a threat to international peace and security.⁸²

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that his Government supported and took an active part in efforts to find a comprehensive approach to the social and economic reconstruction, stabilization and development of the Balkan region. He was convinced that the effectiveness of those efforts depended directly on full, constructive involvement by all States of the region, including the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.⁸³ The representative of Slovenia believed that resolution 1244 (1999) was a timely and necessary resolution that contained all the necessary elements with which the Security Council had to address the situation in Kosovo. He emphasized that with resolution 1244 (1999) the Security Council realistically recognized the existence of the threat to international peace and security and, acting under Chapter VII, provided the legitimacy for the necessary measures of implementation of the resolution. The representative of Slovenia further emphasized that it was equally clear that State sovereignty was not absolute and that it could not be used as a tool of denial of humanity resulting in threats to peace. While the situation in Kosovo in the prior year had escalated to a serious threat to peace, there was a genuine opportunity to reverse the situation and to create the balance necessary for political stability and durable peace for the future.⁸⁴ Other Council members also expressed support for the adoption of the resolution and believed that it was geared towards ending the humanitarian tragedy in Kosovo.⁸⁵ The representative of France similarly considered that the adoption of the resolution was a decisive step towards settling the crisis in Kosovo.⁸⁶ The representative of Canada noted that from Rwanda to Kosovo, there was mounting historical evidence which showed how internal conflicts had threatened human security, spilled over borders and destabilized entire regions.⁸⁷

The representative of China, who abstained from the vote, stated that NATO had waged an unprecedented and indiscriminate bombing campaign against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, killing over 1,000 civilians, injuring thousands and leaving nearly 1 million displaced persons and refugees. He further stated that the war had produced the greatest humanitarian catastrophe in post-Second World War Europe and had seriously undermined peace and stability in the Balkans.⁸⁸

The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

Following the refusal of Iraq fully to cooperate with the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of Security Council resolution 687 (1991) and its weapon inspectors,⁸⁹ the Council held its 3831st meeting on 12 November 1997, at which it considered a letter dated 29 October 1997 from the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq, Mr. Tariq Aziz, addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁹⁰ in which the former announced, inter alia, that Iraq would not “deal with Americans working with the Special Commission”. The Council also considered a letter from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq addressed to the Secretary-General,⁹¹ concerning the violation of Iraq’s airspace by a United States U-2 spy plane and several formations of United States warplanes. In the latter, the Minister stated that the United States had violated, by military threat, the sovereignty of an independent State and a founding Member of the United Nations.

During the debate, the representative of the United States noted that Iraq had to understand that only through full compliance with the relevant Security Council resolutions could its objectives be reached. He recalled that on 29 October 1997 Iraq had sought to bar inspectors of the Special Commission with American citizenship, out of more than 20 nations represented in the Special Commission. Then it blocked inspections by the Special Commission, interfered with monitoring operations and menaced the Special Commission’s reconnaissance aircraft. He stated that, therefore, all of those actions were gross violations of Iraq’s obligations under Security Council resolutions, and as stated in resolution 1137 (1997), threatened international peace and security. He further stated that Iraq had failed in other areas mandated by the Council and it had given no sign that it would cease activities and policies intended to threaten its neighbours.⁹²

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the successful completion of the work of the Special Commission was essential for maintaining regional and international peace and security. He further stated that the report of the Special Commission made clear that there still remained much work to be done, especially in the chemical and biological weapons areas, before it could report that it had accomplished its task and the world was free from the threat posed by Iraqi weapons of mass destruction.⁹³ The representative of Sweden recalled the initiative taken by the Secretary-General in which he had sent a high-level mission a month prior to Baghdad, to avert a potentially serious threat to international peace and security.⁹⁴ The Council unanimously expressed support for resolution 1137 (1997) and called on Iraq to cooperate fully with the relevant Security Council resolutions with the Special Commission.

Part II

Provisional measures to prevent the aggravation of a situation under Article 40 of the Charter

Article 40

In order to prevent an aggravation of the situation, the Security Council may, before making the recommendation or deciding upon the measures provided for in Article 39, call upon the parties concerned to comply with such provisional measures as it deems necessary or desirable. Such provisional measures shall be without prejudice to the rights, claims, or position of the parties concerned. The Security Council shall duly take account of failure to comply with such provisional measures.

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council various measures that might be considered of a provisional nature to prevent aggravation of a situation, although they did not contain specific reference to Article 40. This part focuses on decisions adopted under Chapter VII and also contain a prior determination of a threat to the peace in accordance with Article 39 of the Charter.

In a number of resolutions, the Council called upon the parties to comply with certain provisional measures in order to prevent an aggravation of the situation concerned. The type of measures called for included the following: (a) calls for the fulfilment of a peace agreement; (b) the creation of conditions necessary for the unimpeded delivery of humanitarian assistance; (c) the cessation of hostilities; (d) the demand to turn over an alleged terrorist; (e) the call for demilitarization; and (f) the call to end all offensive actions.

A number of the Council resolutions contained warnings that, in the event of failure to comply with the terms of those resolutions, the Council would meet again and consider further steps. Those warnings, which might be considered as having a bearing on the provisions contained in Article 40, were expressed in various ways. In several instances,⁹⁵ the Council warned that it would consider further action and additional measures should the measures demanded in its decision not be implemented. During the Council's deliberations, an explicit reference to Article 40 was invoked in order to support a specific demand relating to the question under consideration.⁹⁶

The decisions that might be interpreted as bearing implicit references to Article 40 are set out below.

A. Decisions of the Security Council relating to Article 40

Africa

Letter dated 9 January 1996 from the Permanent Representative of Ethiopia to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council concerning the extradition of the suspects wanted in the assassination attempt on the life of the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, on 26 June 1995

By resolution 1054 (1996) of 26 April 1996, the Council demanded that the Government of the Sudan in Afghanistan, S/PRST/1999/29; in connection with the situation in Angola, resolutions 1127 (1997), para. 9, 1135 (1997), para. 6 and 1173 (1998), para. 16; and in connection with the items relating to the situation in the former Yugoslavia, resolution 1199 (1998), para. 16.

⁹⁶ In connection with the item entitled "Role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflicts", the representative of Malaysia maintained that in the context of the changing nature of the conflicts, the Council had to re-examine past and present approaches and strategies and formulate new ones in keeping with the demands of the times. In that regard, he stated that the Charter provided the Council with options, including the invoking of certain provisional measures not involving the use of force, in order to defuse such situations. One such option came under Article 40, which provided an avenue for Council action, including the imposition of arms embargoes and targeted sanctions. However, in contemplating such actions, every effort should be made to ensure that they would not lead to any undesirable humanitarian impact on the general population (S/PV.4072, p. 20).

take immediate action to ensure extradition to Ethiopia for prosecution of the three suspects sheltered in the Sudan and wanted in connection with the assassination attempt of 26 June 1995 on the life of the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia. In addition, the Council demanded that the Sudan desist from engaging in activities of assisting, supporting and facilitating terrorist activities and from giving shelter and sanctuary to terrorist elements.

The situation in the Great Lakes region

Having determined that the magnitude of the humanitarian crisis in eastern Zaire constituted a threat to peace and security in the region, by resolution 1078 (1996) of 9 November 1996, the Council called upon all States in the region to create the conditions necessary for the speedy and peaceful resolution of the crisis and to desist from any act that may further exacerbate the situation, and urged all parties to engage in a process of political dialogue and negotiation without delay.

By resolution 1080 (1996) of 15 November 1996, the Council reiterated its condemnation of all acts of violence, and its call for an immediate ceasefire and a complete cessation of all hostilities in the region.

The situation in Angola

By resolution 1127 (1997) of 28 August 1997, the Council expressed its grave concern at the serious difficulties in the peace process, which were mainly the result of delays by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola (UNITA) in the implementation of its obligations under the Lusaka Protocol. The Council demanded that the Government of Angola and in particular UNITA complete fully and without further delay the remaining aspects of the peace process and refrain from any action which might lead to renewed hostilities. It also demanded that UNITA implement immediately its obligations under the Lusaka Protocol, including demilitarization of all its forces, transformation of its radio station Vorgan into a non-partisan broadcasting facility and full cooperation in the process of the normalization of State administration throughout Angola. The Council further demanded that UNITA provide immediately to the Joint Commission, as established under the Lusaka Protocol, accurate and complete information with regard to the strength of all armed personnel under its control, including the security detachment of the leader of UNITA, the so-called “mining police”, armed UNITA personnel returning from outside the national boundaries, and any of its other armed UNITA personnel not previously reported to the United Nations, in order for them to be verified, disarmed and demobilized in accordance with the Lusaka Protocol and agreements between the parties in the context of the Joint Commission, and condemned any attempts by UNITA to restore its military capabilities. By the same resolution, the Council expressed its readiness to consider the imposition of additional measures, such as trade and financial restrictions, if UNITA did not fully comply with its obligations under the Lusaka Protocol and all relevant Security Council resolutions.

By resolution 1135 (1997) of 29 October 1997, the Council deplored the failure by UNITA to comply fully with its obligations under the “Acordos de Paz” and the Lusaka Protocol and with the relevant Security Council resolutions, in particular resolution 1127 (1997). The Council reiterated these calls and demanded that the Government of Angola and in particular UNITA cooperate fully with the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola, including by providing full access for its verification activities, and reiterated its call on the Government of Angola to notify the Mission in a timely manner of its troop movements, in accordance with the provisions of the Lusaka Protocol and established procedures. It further demanded that UNITA comply immediately and without any conditions with the obligations set out in resolution 1127 (1997), including full cooperation in the normalization of State administration throughout Angola, including in Andulo and Bailundo. The Council noted that the measures specified in paragraph 4 of resolution 1127 (1997) would come into force on 30 October 1997 in accordance with paragraph 2 of resolution 1130 (1997), and reaffirmed its readiness to review those measures or to consider the imposition of additional measures in accordance with paragraphs 8 and 9 of resolution 1127 (1997).

Recognizing the steps taken by the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation to fulfil its obligations in the Lusaka Protocol and condemning UNITA for its failure to implement fully its obligations contained in the Lusaka Protocol, by resolution 1173 (1998) of 12 June 1998 the Council demanded that UNITA fully cooperate without conditions in the immediate extension of State administration throughout the national territory, including in particular in Andulo, Bailundo, Mungo and Nharea, and stop any attempts to reverse this process. The Council reiterated its demand that UNITA complete its demilitarization and stop any attempts to restore its military capabilities. It further demanded that UNITA stop any attacks by its members on the personnel of the Observer Mission, international personnel, the authorities of the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation, including the police, and the civilian population. By the same resolution, the Council expressed its readiness to consider the imposition of further additional measures if UNITA did not fully comply with its obligations under the “Acordos de Paz”, the Lusaka Protocol and relevant Security Council resolutions.

Throughout the remainder of 1998 and 1999, the Council reiterated its demand that UNITA comply fully and unconditionally with the obligations referred to in resolution 1173 (1998).⁹⁷ By a statement of the President dated 24 August 1999,⁹⁸ the Council members reiterated that the primary cause of the crisis in Angola was the failure by the leadership of UNITA to comply with its obligations under the Lusaka Protocol, and again demanded that UNITA comply immediately and without conditions with its obligations to demilitarize and permit the extension of State administration to areas under its control.

By resolution 1132 (1997) of 8 October 1997, the Council determined that the situation in Sierra Leone constituted a threat to international peace and security in the region. It demanded that the military junta take immediate steps to relinquish power in Sierra Leone and make way for the restoration of the democratically elected Government and a return to constitutional order. The Council reiterated its call upon the junta to end all acts of violence and to cease all interference with the delivery of humanitarian assistance to the people of Sierra Leone.

Having determined that the situation in Sierra Leone continued to constitute a threat to international peace and security in the region, the Council adopted resolution 1270 (1999) of 22 October 1999, by which it called upon the parties to fulfil all their commitments under the Peace Agreement to facilitate the restoration of peace, stability, national reconciliation and development in Sierra Leone. The Council also called upon the Revolutionary United Front, the Civil Defence Forces, former Sierra Leone Armed Forces/Armed Forces Revolutionary Council and all other armed groups in Sierra Leone to begin immediately to disband and give up their arms in accordance with the provisions of the Peace Agreement, and to participate fully in the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration programme. Moreover, in the same resolution, the Council called upon all parties to ensure safe and unhindered access for humanitarian assistance to those in need in Sierra Leone, to guarantee the safety and security of humanitarian personnel and to respect strictly the relevant provisions of international humanitarian and human rights law.

By a statement of the President dated 14 November 1997,⁹⁹ the Council called upon the junta to fulfil its obligations under the peace plan, and in particular the ongoing maintenance of the ceasefire. It also called upon all parties concerned to work for the early and effective implementation of the peace plan. It further reiterated the need for the provision and distribution of humanitarian assistance in response to local needs, and called upon the junta to ensure its safe delivery to its intended recipients.

Asia

The situation in Afghanistan

By resolution 1267 (1999) of 15 October 1999, the Council determined that the failure of the Taliban authorities to respond to the demands in paragraph 13 of resolution 1214 (1998) constituted a threat to international peace and security. It insisted that the Afghan faction known as the Taliban comply promptly with its previous resolutions and in particular cease the provision of sanctuary and training for international terrorists and their organizations, take appropriate effective measures to ensure that the territory under its control would not be used for terrorist installations and camps, or for the preparation or organization of terrorist acts against other States or their citizens, and cooperate with efforts to bring indicted terrorists to justice. It demanded that the Taliban turn over Osama bin Laden without further delay to appropriate authorities in a country where he had been indicted, or to appropriate authorities in a country where he would be returned to such a country, or to appropriate authorities in a country where he would be arrested and effectively brought to justice.

By a statement of the President dated 22 October 1999,¹⁰⁰ the Council expressed its grave concern at the seriously deteriorating humanitarian situation in Afghanistan, and called upon all Afghan parties, and in particular the Taliban, to take the necessary steps to secure the uninterrupted supply of humanitarian aid to all in need of it and, in that connection, not to create impediments to the activities of the United Nations humanitarian agencies and international humanitarian organizations. The Council urged all Afghan factions to cooperate fully with the United Nations Special Mission in Afghanistan and international humanitarian organizations, and called upon them, in particular the Taliban, to take the necessary steps to ensure the safety and freedom of movement of such personnel. In addition, the Council demanded once again that the Taliban turn over indicted terrorist Osama bin Laden to appropriate authorities as set out in its resolution 1267 (1999) of 15 October 1999. Further, the Council reaffirmed its decision to implement on 14 November 1999 the measures contained in that resolution, unless the Secretary-General reported that the Taliban had fully complied with the obligation set out in paragraph 2 of that resolution.

Europe

The situation in Albania

By a statement of the President dated 13 March 1997,¹⁰¹ the Council expressed its deep concern about the deteriorating situation in Albania. It urged all concerned to refrain from hostilities and acts of violence and to cooperate with diplomatic efforts to reach a peaceful solution to the crisis. It called upon the parties involved to continue the political dialogue and to live up to the commitments undertaken on 9 March 1997 in Tirana. It urged all political forces to work together to lower tension and facilitate the stabilization of the country. Furthermore, the Council called upon the parties not to impede the provision of humanitarian assistance to the civilian population and, in that context, recalled the importance of keeping open all means of communication in the country.

By resolution 1101 (1997) of 28 March 1997, determining that the situation in Albania constituted a threat to peace and security in the region, the Council called upon all those concerned in Albania to cooperate with the multinational protection force and international humanitarian agencies for the safe and prompt delivery of humanitarian assistance.

By resolution 1114 (1997) of 19 June 1997, the Council underlined the need for all concerned to refrain from hostilities and acts of violence, and called on the parties involved to continue the political dialogue and facilitate the electoral process.

Items relating to the situation in the former Yugoslavia

The situation in Croatia

By resolution 1037 (1996) of 15 January 1996, the Council strongly urged the parties to refrain from any unilateral actions which could hinder the handover from the United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation in Croatia (UNCRO) to the Transitional Administration or the implementation of the Basic Agreement, and encouraged them to continue to adopt confidence-building measures to promote an environment of mutual trust. It called upon the parties to comply strictly with their obligations under the Basic Agreement and to cooperate fully with the Transitional Administration. By the same resolution, the Council also called upon the parties to the Basic Agreement to cooperate with all agencies and organizations assisting in the activities related to the implementation of the Basic Agreement, consistent with the mandate of the Transitional Administration.

Reminding the Government of Croatia that the promotion of respect for the rights of persons belonging to the Serb minority was relevant to the successful implementation of the Basic Agreement, the Security Council, in a presidential statement issued on 23 February 1996,¹⁰² expressed deep concern at the situation of those refugees from the Republic of Croatia who wished to return. It condemned the fact that effective measures had so far not been taken in that respect. It called upon the Croatian Government to ensure the expeditious processing of all requests from refugees. It underlined the fact that the exercise by members of the local Serb population of their rights, including their right to remain, leave or return to their homes in safety and dignity, and reclaim possession of their property, could not be made conditional upon an agreement on the normalization of relations between the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. The Council demanded that the Croatian Government take measures forthwith to ensure that those concerned might fully exercise those rights. The Council also called upon the Croatian Government to rescind its earlier decision to suspend articles of the constitutional law affecting the rights of national minorities and to proceed with the establishment of a provisional human rights court.

By a statement of the president dated 20 September 1996,¹⁰³ the Council recognized the steps taken by the Government of Croatia to reintegrate refugees and displaced persons into Croatia. By resolution 1079 (1996) of 15 November 1996, the Council called upon the Government of the Republic of Croatia and the local Serb community to cooperate with the Transitional Administration in creating the conditions and in taking the other steps necessary for holding local elections in the region, in accordance with the Basic Agreement. The Council reaffirmed the importance of full compliance by the parties with their commitments, as specified in the Basic Agreement, to respect the highest standards of human rights and fundamental freedoms and to promote an atmosphere of confidence among all local residents irrespective of their ethnic origin, and in that context, urged the Government of the Republic of Croatia to ensure respect for the rights of all national ethnic groups.

The situation in the former Yugoslavia

By resolution 1074 (1996) of 1 October 1996, the Council called upon all parties to comply strictly with all their commitments under the Peace Agreement and stated its intention to consider the imposition of measures if any party failed significantly to meet its obligations under the Peace Agreement.

By resolution 1199 (1998) of 23 September 1998, the Council demanded that all parties, groups and individuals immediately cease hostilities and maintain a ceasefire in Kosovo, Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, which would enhance the prospects for a meaningful dialogue between the authorities of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the Kosovo Albanian leadership and reduce the risks of a humanitarian catastrophe. It further demanded that the authorities of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the Kosovo Albanian leadership take immediate steps to improve the humanitarian situation and to avert the impending humanitarian catastrophe. Furthermore, the Council decided, should the concrete measures demanded in resolution 1199 (1998) and 1160 (1998) were not taken, to consider further action and additional measures to maintain or restore peace and stability in the region.

By resolution 1244 (1999) of 10 June 1999, the Council demanded in particular that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia put an immediate and verifiable end to violence and repression in Kosovo, and begin and complete a verifiable phased withdrawal from Kosovo of all military, police and paramilitary forces according to a rapid timetable, with which the deployment of the international security presence in Kosovo would be synchronized. It also demanded that the Kosovo Liberation Army and other armed Kosovo Albanian groups end immediately all offensive actions and comply with the requirements for demilitarization as laid down by the head of the international security presence in consultation with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General.

Part III

Measures not involving the use of armed force under Article 41 of the Charter

Article 41

The Security Council may decide what measures not involving the use of armed force are to be employed to give effect to its decisions, and it may call upon the Members of the United Nations to apply such measures. These may include complete or partial interruption of economic relations and of rail, sea, air, postal, telegraphic, radio, and other means of communication, and the severance of diplomatic relations.

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council adopted two resolutions¹⁰⁶ in which Article 41 was explicitly invoked, in connection with the items of which the Council is seized “Children and armed conflict” and “Protection of civilians in armed conflict”.¹⁰⁷

The Council took measures under Chapter VII of the type provided for in Article 41 in connection with the following, having determined that each situation constituted a threat to the peace: the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola (UNITA) in Angola, the Revolutionary United Front (RUF) in Sierra Leone and the Taliban in Afghanistan; and, the Sudan, Iraq and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia including Kosovo. The Council also terminated the sanctions previously imposed under Article 41 against the former Yugoslavia and the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya

During the period under consideration, by a statement of the President dated 29 June 1998,¹⁰⁸ in connection with the item entitled “Children and armed conflict”, the Council recognized that, whenever measures were adopted under Article 41, consideration should be given to their impact on the civilian population, bearing in mind the needs of children, in order to consider appropriate humanitarian exemptions.

The decisions of the Security Council by which measures based on the principles of Article 41 were imposed set out in A; section B reflects salient issues that were raised in the deliberations of the Council.

A. Decisions of the Security Council relating to Article 41

Measures taken in connection with União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola

By resolution 1127 (1997) of 28 August 1997, the Council decided that all States should prevent the entry into or transit through their territories of all senior officials to the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola and of adult members of their immediate families. The Council also decided that all States should suspend or cancel all travel documents, visas or residence permits issued to senior UNITA officials and adult members of their immediate families, and required the immediate and complete closure of all offices of UNITA in their territories. By the same resolution, it also requested the sanctions Committee established pursuant to resolution 864 (1993) to monitor the implementation of the measures.

By resolution 1173 (1998) of 12 June 1998, the Council decided that all States, except Angola, in which there were funds and financial resources, including any funds derived or generated from property of UNITA as an organization or of senior officials of UNITA or adult members of their immediate families designated pursuant to resolution 1127 (1997) should require all persons and entities within their own territories holding such funds and financial resources to freeze them and ensure that they were not made available directly or indirectly to or for the benefit of UNITA. By the same resolution, the Council decided that all States should take the necessary measures to prevent all official contacts with the leadership of UNITA in areas of Angola to which State administration has not been extended. The Council also prohibited the direct or indirect import from Angola to their territory of all diamonds not controlled through the certificate of origin issued by the Government of Angola. The imposition of a diamond embargo was the first of its kind.

Measures taken in connection with the Revolutionary United Front (Sierra Leone)

By resolution 1132 (1997) of 8 October 1997, the Council decided that all States should prevent the entry into or transit through their territories of members of the military junta and adult members of their families, as designated in accordance with paragraph 10 of the resolution, unless the entry into or transit through a particular State of any such person was authorized by the sanctions Committee. Moreover, the Council also decided that all States should prevent the sale or supply to Sierra Leone, by their nationals or from their territories, or using their flag vessels or aircraft, of petroleum and petroleum products and arms and related materiel of all types, including weapons and ammunition, military vehicles and equipment, paramilitary equipment and spare parts. By the same resolution, the Council decided to establish a Committee of the Security Council consisting of all Council members to monitor its implementation and report on its work to the Council with its observations and recommendations.

By resolution 1156 (1998) of 16 March 1998, the Council decided to terminate, with immediate effect, the prohibitions on the sale or supply to Sierra Leone of petroleum and petroleum products referred to in paragraph 6 of resolution 1132 (1997).

By resolution 1171 (1998) of 5 June 1998, the Council decided that the restrictions mentioned in resolution 1132 (1997) should not apply to the sale or supply of arms and related materiel for the sole use in Sierra Leone of the Military Observer Group of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOMOG) or the United Nations.

Measures taken in connection with the Taliban (Afghanistan)

By resolution 1267 (1999) of 15 October 1999, the Council decided that on 14 November 1999 all States should deny permission for any aircraft to take off from or land in their territory if it was owned, leased or operated by or on behalf of the Taliban as designated by the sanctions Committee established by the same resolution to monitor its implementation. The Council also decided that all States should freeze funds and other financial resources, including funds derived or generated from property owned or controlled directly or indirectly by the Taliban, as designated by the sanctions Committee.

Measure taken in connection with the extradition of the suspects wanted in the assassination attempt on the life of the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, on 26 June 1995

By resolution 1054 (1996) of 26 April 1996, the Council decided that all States should significantly reduce the number and the level of the staff at diplomatic missions and consular posts in the Sudan and restrict or control the movement within their territory of all such staff who remain. In addition, it called on all States to take steps to restrict the entry into or transit through their territory of members of the Government of the Sudan, officials of that Government and members of the Sudanese armed forces.

By resolution 1070 (1996) of 16 August 1996, the Council decided that all States should deny aircraft permission to take off from, land in, or overfly their territories if the aircraft was registered in the Sudan, or owned, leased or operated by or on behalf of Sudan Airways or by any undertaking, wherever located or organized, which was substantially owned or controlled by Sudan Airways, or owned, leased or operated by the Government or public authorities of the Sudan.

Measures taken in connection with Iraq

By resolution 1137 (1997) of 12 November 1997, the Council condemned the continued violations by Iraq of its obligations under the relevant resolutions to cooperate fully with the Special Commission in the fulfilment of its mandate, including its unacceptable decision to seek to impose conditions on cooperation with the Special Commission. By the same resolution, the Council decided, in accordance with paragraph 6 of resolution 1134 (1997) that States should without delay prevent the entry into or transit through their territories of all Iraqi officials and members of the Iraqi armed forces who were responsible for or participated in the instances of non-compliance detailed in paragraph 1 of the resolution.

Measures taken in connection with the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, including Kosovo

By resolution 1160 (1998) of 31 March 1998, the Council decided that all States should, for the purposes of fostering peace and stability in Kosovo, prevent the sale or supply to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, including Kosovo, by their nationals or from their territories or using their flag vessels and aircraft, of arms and related materiel of all types, such as weapons and ammunition, military vehicles and equipment and spare parts for the aforementioned, and should prevent arming and training for terrorist activities there. By the same resolution, the Council decided to establish a committee of the Security Council to monitor its implementation.

Measures taken in connection with the former Yugoslavia

By resolution 1074 (1996) of 1 October 1996, the Council noted with satisfaction that the elections called for in the Peace Agreement took place on 14 September 1996 in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and stated that their holding constituted an essential step towards achieving the objectives of the Peace Agreement. By the same resolution, the Council decided in accordance with paragraph 4 of its resolution 1022 (1995), to terminate, with immediate effect, the measures referred to in paragraph 1 of that resolution.

Measures taken in connection with the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya

By resolution 1192 (1998) of 27 August 1998, the Council reaffirmed that the measures set forth in its resolutions 748 (1992) and 883 (1993) remained in effect and binding on all Member States, and in that context reaffirmed the provisions of paragraph 16 of resolution 883 (1993), and decided that the aforementioned measures would be suspended if the Secretary-General reported to the Council that the two accused had arrived in the Netherlands for the purpose of trial before the court, and that the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had satisfied the French judicial authorities with regard to the bombing of UTA 772.

By a letter dated 5 April 1999 addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁰⁹ the Secretary-General reported that the conditions set forth in resolution 1192 (1998) had been met. By a statement of the President dated 8 April 1999,¹¹⁰ the Council noted that the conditions for suspending the wide range of aerial, arms-related and diplomatic measures against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had been fulfilled as of 5 April 1999. In a subsequent statement, the Council recalled that the measures set forth in resolutions 748 (1992) and 883 (1993) had been suspended, and reaffirmed its intention to lift those measures, in conformity with the relevant resolutions.¹¹¹

Children and armed conflict

By resolution 1261 (1999) of 25 August 1999, the Council reaffirmed its readiness when dealing with situations of armed conflict, whenever adopting measures under Article 41 of the Charter, to give consideration to their impact on children, in order to consider appropriate humanitarian exemptions.

Protection of civilians in armed conflict

By resolution 1265 (1999) of 17 September 1999, the Council reaffirmed its readiness, whenever measures under Article 41 of the Charter are adopted, to give consideration to their impact on the civilian population, bearing in mind the needs of children, in order to consider appropriate humanitarian exemptions.

B. Constitutional discussion relating to Article 41

This section outlines the practice of the Council, which may be viewed as illustrating its interpretation of the principles set out in Article 41. This section sets out in case studies the arguments raised relating to the Council's practice concerning the measures taken in connection with UNITA in Angola, RUF in Sierra Leone and the Taliban regime in Afghanistan; with the Sudan and Iraq; and with the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, including Kosovo, and the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. In addition, case 18 addresses the impact of sanctions on children in armed conflict, and case 19 deals with the impact of sanctions on civilians in armed conflict.

Case 11

Measures taken in connection with the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola (Angola)

At its 3814th meeting, on 28 August 1997, the Council adopted resolution 1127 (1997), which provided for additional measures to be imposed against UNITA in the event that it failed to implement its obligations under the Lusaka Protocol. During the debate, the representative of Angola noted that the time had come to apply the second package of sanctions, as provided in resolution 864 (1993). In that regard, his Government fully supported the measures set forth in resolution 1127 (1997) because it firmly believed that it was an effective instrument that would help prevent war and speed up the peace process. He stated that they would underscore in a fair manner the distinction that should be made between those who complied with the Lusaka Protocol and those who would rather treat it as a dead letter. His Government had complied with its obligations, acting in good faith and with a spirit of great flexibility.¹¹²

The representatives of the Southern African Development Community supported the imposition of additional measures if UNITA did not comply with provisions in the Lusaka Protocol.¹¹³ The representative of Lesotho urged all Member States to implement the measures envisaged in resolution 1127 (1997), to adopt measures necessary to restrict the movements of UNITA personnel, and to comply with earlier measures imposed by the Council.¹¹⁴

The representative of Brazil reiterated his Government's position on sanctions, stating that sanctions were a serious expedient, reserved for situations of extreme gravity. He stated that the imposition of sanctions could result in deleterious effects on innocent populations and neighbouring countries, and that utmost restraint must be exercised when it came to contemplating any action under

Chapter VII of the Charter. He further stated that sanctions had to be regarded as an instrument of last resort when the prospects for diplomatic efforts yielding results no longer seemed viable. However, it had become apparent that in Angola, the Council was faced with such a situation.¹¹⁵

The representative of the Russian Federation, a member of the observer troika regarding a settlement in Angola, emphasized that the imposition of additional sanctions on UNITA was precisely targeted, and concrete, and would not affect those representatives of UNITA who were members of Parliament or the Government or who were cooperating with the Joint Commission. Provisions were made for deferring the imposition of the sanctions and for the possibility of their being lifted, as well as for the adoption of further sanctions against UNITA if it failed fully and expeditiously to fulfil its obligations under the Lusaka Protocol. It was his Government's belief that this sent a tough but necessary and clear signal that the patience of the international community was at an end, and that it would no longer accept either the obstacles placed in the way of the implementation of the peace process in Angola or the disregard of the international community's decisions.¹¹⁶ The representative of Japan noted the importance of the implementation of those measures, for which cooperation from the neighbouring States was essential. He stated that UNITA should bear in mind the Security Council's readiness to consider still further measures in the event that UNITA persisted in its refusal to meet its obligations.¹¹⁷

The representative of Kenya stated that his Government had been associated with the peace process in Angola since 1975, and was disappointed at the situation. His delegation believed that the international community was running out of patience and that the time had come to take measures against UNITA for delaying the implementation of its obligations under the peace process.¹¹⁸

The representative of Egypt, while voting in favour of the resolution, held a different view with regard to all States denying the families of UNITA's leaders entry into or transit through their territories: he contended that those measures constituted a breach of a legal norm: no punishment without a crime. It was inadmissible to punish families whose only crime was their relationship to those leaders. In addition, those measures constituted a form of collective punishment, which Egypt strongly rejected in principle. This view was also shared by the representative of Costa Rica, who expressed reservations about the references made to the immediate families of UNITA officials, as such reference would imply the imposition of responsibility simply by virtue of being a family member. He stated that any sanctions regime must be solely a temporary means of exercising pressure on those Governments or entities that threaten international peace and security. In his view, sanctions were a means of legitimate, collective defence for international society in the framework of the legal system established under the Charter of the United Nations. For that reason, sanctions should not become a more or less covert method of conducting war or intervening in matters that were essentially under the domestic jurisdiction of States, but should be carefully designed so that they could achieve the objective of altering the illegal policies of the Government or entity in question. For that reason, sanctions must not become a method of punishment for an innocent population, and they must always be interpreted restrictively. In this context, he pointed out the positive aspects of the resolution: the sanctions would enter into force only after a reasonable time, which would make it possible for UNITA to stop in its tracks and reverse its illegal policies before implementation; and the sanctions were designed to operate against the leadership of UNITA and its functioning as a political entity, so as to avoid suffering in the civilian population that would result from economic sanctions.¹¹⁹

The representative of Portugal, while condemning the tactics of UNITA, stated that UNITA had to understand that its behaviour had left the Security Council without other options besides the one of imposing additional sanctions, which was designed to stimulate UNITA to move in the right direction. The representative of the United States believed that the sanctions were strong, practical and enforceable, and was ready to examine further measures by the Council should UNITA fail to respond.¹²⁰ This view was shared by the representative of France, who reiterated his Government's position that the sanctions should be time-bound, with a set duration and the question of their extension decided by the Security Council.¹²¹

At its 3891st meeting, on 12 June 1998, the Council adopted resolution 1173 (1998). During the deliberations in connection with the adoption of the resolution, the majority of the Council members, regretting the continued lack of progress in the peace process, again called on UNITA to implement fully its obligation under the Lusaka Protocol.¹²² The representative of Angola supported the contents of the resolution, with the hope that it would promote tangible action allowing for the preservation of progress already made in the course of the peace process.¹²³ The representative of the United Kingdom, speaking on behalf of the European Union, expressed support for further Security Council action against UNITA. He stated that the existing sanctions had a positive impact. Moreover, he stated that further sanctions were not intended to punish, but to encourage UNITA to finalize the implementation of the peace process.¹²⁴

The representative of Brazil stated that if the Security Council was given no choice but to impose additional sanctions on UNITA, the responsibility for those measures lay exclusively with UNITA's own short-sighted leadership.¹²⁵ The representative of Costa Rica noted that the sanctions established by the resolution were precisely targeted. For the first time they focused on UNITA's real interests and sought only to ensure that that group fulfilled its commitments. Moreover, the Security Council had gone further by giving UNITA the benefit of an additional grace period, until 23 June 1998, to do what it must do. Thus, it had a temporary warning before the sanctions were enacted.¹²⁶ The representative of Sweden stated that the scope of the measures in the resolution, backed by a unanimous Council, would send a clear message to

Mr. Savimbi that the international community would not accept UNITA's continued obstruction of the peace process. At the same time, he believed that the delayed entry into force of those measures would serve as a useful incentive for UNITA to fulfil its obligations.¹²⁷

The representative of Japan emphasized that if the UNITA leaders contemplated the impact which the sanctions called for in the resolution would have on their very political survival, they would realize that they had no recourse but to cooperate, fully and without delay, in completing the tasks remaining under the Lusaka Protocol.¹²⁸ The representative of Slovenia drew on the experience from previous months, which had shown that targeted sanctions could have a positive effect. He observed that "targeted sanctions bite", and stated that they could modify the behaviour of UNITA and the option of sanctions must be available to ensure the implementation by UNITA of the remaining tasks of the Lusaka Protocol.¹²⁹

The representative of the United States stated that the sanctions contained in the resolution were targeted and strong, and that there were clear criteria for their imposition as well as for their lifting.¹³⁰ The representative of Kenya believed that the imposition of additional measures would force UNITA to proceed with the peace process and would further re-establish the authority of the Security Council. There was therefore a need for the Security Council to take additional measures, and, in his opinion, the resolution contained such measures.¹³¹

The representative of Portugal noted that the Security Council was about to take a decision imposing a third package of mandatory measures on UNITA. He stated that it was regrettable but a necessary decision in view of the persistent pattern of non-compliance by UNITA with the provisions of the Angolan peace process, namely the Lusaka Protocol, the relevant Security Council resolutions and the plan approved by the Joint Commission on 19 May 1998. He further stated that those additional measures were not being imposed for their own sake; they had a clear goal: the successful completion of the peace process, which was in the interest, above all, of the Angolan people themselves, including UNITA.¹³²

Measures taken in connection with the Revolutionary United Front (Sierra Leone)

Following the military coup d'état staged by the Revolutionary United Front on 25 May 1997, the Council adopted resolution 1132 (1997) at its 3822nd meeting, on 8 October 1997. By that resolution, the Council imposed arms and petroleum embargoes and restrictions on the travel of members of the military junta and their families.

During the debate, the Council members unanimously condemned the military coup and supported the measures contained in the resolution. The representative of Nigeria welcomed the provisions contained in the resolution, and stated that ECOWAS had wanted additional and stronger measures to be included in the resolution. However, his Government regarded the resolution as a positive development and believed that what was important was that the message of the international resolve to restore constitutional order and peace in Sierra Leone be heard loud and clear by all concerned, especially the junta. In his Government's view, the draft resolution adequately conveyed that unambiguous message.¹³³ The representative of Kenya stated that by imposing sanctions on the military junta, the international community was reaffirming its commitment to democracy. The sanctions would be lifted as soon as the junta relinquished power and President Kabbah's Government was reinstated. He expressed concern about the added impact of those sanctions, but his delegation believed that that was a necessary and "well thought-out push by the international community to dislodge the illegal junta in Freetown".¹³⁴

The representative of France stated that the resolution provided for the imposition of sanctions. Those measures had the same goal as the regional efforts, the speedy restoration of democratic government and constitutional order. The sanctions were defined so as to limit the humanitarian effects on the population. He further stated that they covered only the travel of members of the military junta and their families, as well as the supply of weapons and petroleum. There was provision for exemptions, in particular for humanitarian purposes. It would be up to the Committee established by the resolution to ensure that those exemptions protected the people of the country from being seriously affected by the embargo.¹³⁵

The representative of the United Kingdom noted that by establishing an international arms and oil embargo, and visa restrictions on members of the junta, the Security Council would be making clear to the illegal regime in Freetown that the entire international community was committed to reversing the military coup and restoring the democratically elected Government.¹³⁶

While expressing support for the imposition of sanctions, the representative of Poland stated that his Government was aware of the potential risks related to the use of such measures, especially with regard to their possible adverse effects on the humanitarian situation in Sierra Leone. He further stated that in this context, it was essential that the proposed sanctions regime be equipped, inter alia, with a mechanism for humanitarian exemptions with regard to petroleum and petroleum products, subject to effective monitoring of delivery. He stressed that the measures envisioned in the resolution, including the comprehensive arms embargo, to which his delegation attached the utmost importance, were strictly targeted on the military junta and its representatives.¹³⁷ The representative of the Republic of Korea believed that imposing sanctions as provided for in the resolution was an inevitable choice to help restore the constitutional Government.¹³⁸ The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the powerful means of pressure on the junta brought into play by the Council, which included the embargo on the delivery of arms, military equipment, petroleum and petroleum products and visa restrictions on the leaders of the coup, had been fine-tuned and were aimed at specific targets. He was pleased that the Security Council had taken additional precautionary measures to try to minimize any unintended side effects of the sanctions, in particular, any negative impact on the humanitarian situation. His delegation was convinced that the point of sanctions was not to punish the party that had threatened international peace and security, but to change the conduct of that party. The logic and practice of indefinite sanctions regimes could not, in principle, do that, and in his view they were counterproductive.¹³⁹ The representative of Portugal observed that the resolution sought the restoration of the democratically elected Government of Sierra Leone by peaceful means. His delegation understood that sanctions as a political tool were designed to make the junta realize that its unlawful actions had not been received with indifference by the international community. Those sanctions were tailored to penalize those who had consistently refused to abide by the rules of democracy, and were not addressed against the people of Sierra Leone.¹⁴⁰

The representative of the United States noted that the sanctions had been carefully targeted: prohibitions against the supply of arms and petroleum products, and restrictions on the travel of members of the junta and their families. The resolution called upon all States to cooperate with those measures and authorized ECOWAS, as necessary and in conformity with applicable international standards, to inspect incoming ships to ensure compliance. The resolution did not limit shipments of food or medicines or other basic necessities. It contained provisions for regular review of the implementation and impact of the sanctions. The sanctions were designed to have maximum impact against the illegal junta of Sierra Leone, while imposing a minimum burden on the civilian population. He further stated that the resolution made clear how the junta could end the sanctions: by restoring the legitimate Government of Sierra Leone.¹⁴¹ The representative of Chile emphasized that the Security Council was increasingly moving towards imposing sanctions on leaders, not on innocent populations. At the same time, the resolution contained the concept of periodic review of the humanitarian situation in Sierra Leone, including the impact of sanctions.¹⁴²

Measures taken in connection with the Taliban (Afghanistan)

Following the failure of the Taliban to respond to the demands in paragraph 13 of resolution 1214 (1998),¹⁴³ the Council held its 4051st meeting in connection with the adoption of resolution 1267 (1999). During the debate, the representative of Afghanistan expressed support for the resolution, and stated that it was his Government's view that the set of measures contained in the resolution provided an adequate signal to the Taliban and to their "Pakistani mentors" that the international community was extremely concerned about the "adventurist policy" of Pakistan and the Taliban, which was a major threat to international peace and security. He further stated that resolution 1267 (1999) affected the financial resources of the Taliban, which came mainly from the proceeds of drug trafficking and had no effect on the Afghan nation itself. He recalled the provisions contained in the resolution on humanitarian exceptions, which assured the delivery of humanitarian assistance to the Afghan people. His Government expected the Security Council to use every mechanism at its disposal for a meticulous and strict application of the sanctions by all Member States and international agencies.¹⁴⁴

The representative of the United States stated that if the Taliban did not turn over Osama bin Laden in 30 days, the sanctions would take effect. She recalled that measures in the resolution would restrict foreign landing rights on aircraft operated by the Taliban, freeze Taliban accounts around the world and prohibit investment in any undertaking owned or controlled by the Taliban. She emphasized that it was important to remember that those sanctions were limited and that they were targeted very specifically to limit the resources of the Taliban authorities. Those sanctions did not harm the people of Afghanistan, and her Government would work with the sanctions review Committee to implement them in a way that did not hinder the provision of humanitarian assistance to the Afghan people.¹⁴⁵

Nonetheless, the representative of Malaysia expressed concern about the effect and impact of the measures contained in the resolution on the people of Afghanistan. It was his Government's conviction that sanctions against a country and a people should be resorted to only when all other peaceful measures had been utilized and had failed. He stated that as an instrument of coercion they should be used with great caution because of their unintended grave consequences to the innocent population. He further stated that his delegation had reservations on the use of sanctions to effect the desired changes on a targeted regime. Experience had shown that they rarely worked on the intended target or targets, but instead brought suffering to ordinary people. He noted that sanctions directed at the Taliban would have a direct and indirect effect on the general population of Afghanistan in virtually every aspect of their lives. His delegation would have preferred a phased approach in handling the situation. The Council should have adopted, as a first step, a strong resolution signalling the serious intention of the Council to institute measures to impose sanctions on the Taliban if certain stipulated actions in respect of its support for terrorism were not taken by the Taliban. He believed that the sanctions intended for the Taliban would affect the Afghan people in a punitive way since they were in effective control of most parts of the country and administered virtually every aspect of life in the parts of Afghanistan under their control. His delegation had nevertheless voted in favour of the resolution but with a request to the Taliban to comply with the requirements of the resolution so as to spare the people of Afghanistan from further suffering.¹⁴⁶ Those views were shared by the representative of China, who believed that sanctions would only exacerbate the suffering and hardships of the Afghan people, who had been the victims of perennial warfare. In his view, sanctions could be used only as a means of last resort and must be well targeted.¹⁴⁷

¹⁴³ By resolution 1214 (1998), para. 13, the Council demanded that the Taliban stop providing sanctuary and training for international terrorists and their organizations, and that all Afghan factions cooperate with efforts to bring indicted terrorists to justice.

*Measures taken in connection with the extradition of the suspects wanted in the assassination attempt on the life of the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, on 26 June 1995*¹⁴⁸

At its 3660th meeting, on 26 April 1996, the Council considered the Secretary-General's report on the implementation of resolution 1044 (1996),¹⁴⁹ which called on the Government of the Sudan to extradite to Ethiopia the three suspects wanted in connection with the attempted assassination of the Egyptian President. At the same meeting, the Council adopted resolution 1054 (1996).

During the deliberations of the Council, the representative of the Sudan refuted the allegations levelled against it and stated that the imposition of any sanctions against the Sudan would undermine all regional initiatives and set back progress towards cooperation and development.¹⁵⁰

The representative of Ethiopia recalled the Secretary-General's report, which made clear that the Sudan had not complied with the Council's demands contained in resolution 1044 (1996). He stated that it was precisely for that reason an arms embargo would have been one of the most appropriate steps that the Council could have taken to secure the compliance by the Sudan with its demands. He further stated that all arguments against such a step by the Council were "patently hollow, extremely unconvincing and lacking in transparency". While insisting that the Sudan abide by the demands of resolution 1044 (1996), the representative of Egypt underlined the deep links between the peoples of the two countries, and stressed that the sanctions provided by the draft resolution were not intended to harm the people of the Sudan, but were a "message of warning".¹⁵¹

Expressing disappointment at the resolution, the representative of Uganda stated that it did not send the strong signal he had hoped for. He called on the Council to take any measures necessary, including an arms embargo against the Sudan, to ensure that it desisted from engaging in activities that were destabilizing Uganda and plunging the entire subregion into chaos.¹⁵² Similarly, the representative of the United States said his Government supported the resolution, albeit with reservations. His Government did not believe that the sanctions outlined in the resolution were sufficient to convince the Government of the Sudan to cease its sponsorship of international terrorism and return to the fold of responsible, law-abiding nations. He welcomed the Council's concern to combat terrorism. However, in failing to impose more meaningful sanctions against the Sudan, it risked further insecurity and instability for the people of Eastern Africa, the Middle East and the Sudan.¹⁵³

Some speakers also acknowledged that measures contained in the resolution did not have economic implications that could adversely affect the civilian population of the Sudan.¹⁵⁴ Speaking in the same vein, the representative of Germany expressed appreciation for the effort to target the sanctions in such a way that they did not target the population but only those who were in a position to take the required measures. He appealed to the Government to use the 60-day period provided by the text to avoid further measures and to allow for an early lifting of the measures being imposed.¹⁵⁵ The representative of France underlined that the Council had chosen not to impose sanctions on the Sudan that would have had a noticeable economic impact on the population of one of the poorest countries in Africa.¹⁵⁶

In contrast, the representatives of the Russian Federation and China, who abstained from voting on the resolution, believed that such measures would not help to settle the question. The representative of Russia emphasized the need for precise and objective criteria in the imposition of sanctions and for lifting them. He stated that his country was opposed to the use of sanctions to punish certain regimes or attain the political goals of one or more Member States. In an explanation, he noted that his delegation was not able to prevent the adoption of the resolution, only because implementation of the measures it specified depended on the actions of individual States.¹⁵⁷ The representative of China stated that his Government opposed in principle the frequent recourse to sanctions under Chapter VII. He further stated that no matter how complex the question might be, dialogue and mediation should be insisted upon, with the aim of reaching a peaceful solution. He noted that it was necessary that the resolution be based on facts.¹⁵⁸

Along the same lines, the representative of Indonesia contended that the Government of the Sudan had not yet fully fulfilled all its obligations to the efforts undertaken by OAU. However, the Sudan had taken some steps and continued its efforts to fulfil its obligations under Council resolution 1044 (1996). He stated that if, however, after all avenues had been explored and all efforts exhausted, the Council ultimately assessed that the Government of the Sudan had still not yet fully complied with its requests, only then should the Council consider adopting further measures to ensure implementation of resolution 1044 (1996).¹⁵⁹

Measures taken in connection with Iraq

At its 3831st meeting, on 12 November 1997, the Council adopted resolution 1137 (1997). During the deliberations of the Council, members unanimously expressed concern at Iraq's failure to fully cooperate with the Special Commission and supported the imposition of additional measures. Several speakers emphasized that the only way sanctions could be lifted was through Iraq's full compliance with its obligations in connection with the Special Commission.¹⁶⁰ Other Council members recalled previous resolutions by which the Council had expressed its readiness to impose additional measures against Iraq if it did not cooperate with the Special Commission.¹⁶¹

The representative of Costa Rica noted that the sole purpose of the sanctions was to impress upon the political and military authorities of Iraq that they had to comply with their international commitments, and it was not to affect the capacity for economic, social and political development of the Iraqi people. His country took the view that the sanctions must be carefully designed so as to fulfil a single objective, that of changing the unlawful policies of the Government of Iraq and securing its full reintegration into the international community's legal framework.¹⁶² The representative of Sweden stated that the resolution underscored that full cooperation with the Special Commission and implementation of the relevant resolutions was the only way forward towards having the sanctions lifted.¹⁶³ The representative of Portugal recalled resolution 1115 (1997) and stated that the additional sanctions foreseen were sharply targeted in order not to impose further suffering on the Iraqi population.¹⁶⁴ They were designed to affect those Iraqi officials and members of the Iraqi armed forces who were responsible for Iraq's non-compliance with its obligations.¹⁶⁵

The representative of Egypt stated that it found itself in a very sensitive position of voting on a resolution that imposed any kind of sanctions on an Arab State. He further stated that despite his country's difficult position, Iraq's lack of responsiveness left it with no choice but to vote in favour of the resolution in the hope that Iraq would alter its position and resume its cooperation with the Special Commission in a manner that would ensure the lifting of the sanctions and an end to the suffering of the Iraqi people. On the other hand, he stated that it was his understanding that the travel restrictions in resolution 1137 (1997) should not obstruct Egypt's discharge of its responsibilities as the host country of the headquarters of the League of Arab States. This involved facilitating the participation of the States members of the League in its meetings held in Cairo. He added that this was a responsibility, which Egypt had the honour to undertake in its capacity as the host country, under the Charter of the League of Arab States.¹⁶⁶

The representative of France stated that travel restrictions would not worsen the situation of the Iraqi people, who were already sorely tried by seven years of economic embargo. The search for a peaceful solution to end the crisis would in no way be hampered by the travel bans covered in the resolution.¹⁶⁷ The representative of the United States emphasized that the lifting of sanctions had to be followed by compliance, and not precede it. He stated that because Iraq's obstructionist actions had been taken under orders of the highest authorities in Baghdad, the new sanctions targeted only Iraq's leaders, not its people. He further stated that resolution 1137 (1997) was a clear call for Iraqi compliance and a reaffirmation that the Council was willing to use the tools of the Charter to ensure compliance.¹⁶⁸

*Measures taken in connection with the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, including Kosovo*¹⁶⁹

At its 3868th meeting, on 31 March 1998, the Council adopted resolution 1160 (1998), by which it decided to ban the sale or supply to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, including Kosovo, of arms and related materiel of all types, including weapons and munitions, military vehicles and equipment and spare parts for them.

During the debate, the majority of the Council members indicated their support for the measures contained in the resolution, with the exception of the representative of China who abstained from the vote. The representative of Japan stated that the situation in Kosovo posed a threat to international and regional peace and security, with the further spread of violence raising the spectre of destabilizing the entire Balkan region. He further stated that the resolution, which imposed an arms embargo against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, including Kosovo, would be an effective instrument in preventing such destabilization.¹⁷⁰ The representative of France noted that the measures stipulated in the resolution would be seen as a means to achieve a negotiated settlement of the crisis. The text provided that the Council would review the prohibitions that had been decided on and would be able to lift them as soon as the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had met the conditions set out in the resolution.¹⁷¹ The representative of Sweden welcomed the adoption of the resolution, and stated that the arms embargo imposed by the Council had to be strictly implemented by all States. He further stated that as a member of the European Union, his country had already decided to implement the arms embargo and the other sanctions recommended by the Contact Group, including the refusal to supply equipment that could be used for internal repression or for terrorism, the denial of visas to officials responsible for the repression and a moratorium on government-financed export credits.¹⁷²

While supporting the imposition of an arms embargo, the representative of Brazil stressed that it would not yield the desired effect if it were not accompanied by parallel diplomatic efforts to promote a safer and more harmonious environment for those who had been most directly affected by the unrest.¹⁷³

The representative of the Russian Federation emphasized that it was difficult for his country to agree to impose an arms embargo on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, including Kosovo. He noted that the resolution contained measures that would prevent mounting tensions and lead to a political settlement. His Government would continue to advocate the need to limit the arms embargo by calling for a clear time frame. Furthermore, he noted that the resolution had been able to define strict criteria that would cause the Council to lift the embargo.¹⁷⁴

The representative of the United States emphasized that by imposing an arms embargo on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, the Council would send an unambiguous message that the international community would not tolerate violence and "ethnic cleansing” in the region of the former Yugoslavia.¹⁷⁵ Speaking in the same vein, the representative of Gambia added that the lack of access by the parties to military materiel would reduce their capability to fight, and hence, the incidence of violence. In that context, his delegation welcomed the establishment of a Committee to monitor the implementation of the measures contained in the resolution and urged all States to respect them.¹⁷⁶ Similarly, the representative of Germany emphasized that the arms embargo represented an attempt to prevent an arms build-up by the opposing sides. It was also a political measure, which illustrated that the resort to violence and a refusal to enter into meaningful dialogue would bring those responsible farther away from the beneficial normalizing of their relations with the outside world.¹⁷⁷

The representative of the United Kingdom, making a statement on behalf of the European Union and the associated and aligned countries,¹⁷⁸ stated that the European Union already had a comprehensive arms embargo in place against the countries of the former Yugoslavia. He further stated that resolution 1160 (1998) sent a powerful signal to the authorities in Belgrade that the international community was united in its desire to see real progress in Kosovo and was monitoring events there closely.¹⁷⁹

The representative of China, however, who abstained from the vote, expressed the view that the situation in Kosovo did not endanger regional and international peace and security. He believed that the resolution would not help move the parties to negotiations and that it was not appropriate to bring into the Council the differences between the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, as well as the human rights issue in Kosovo.¹⁸⁰

Mr. Jovanovic stressed that the meeting of the Security Council and the proposal to adopt a resolution were not acceptable to the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia since that internal question could not be a subject of deliberation of any international forum without the consent of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia authorities. He further asserted that there was not and had never been any armed conflict in Kosovo and Metohija; thus there was no danger of a spillover, no threat to peace and security and no basis for invocation of Chapter VII of the Charter.¹⁸¹

*Measures taken in connection with the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya*¹⁸²

At its 3864th meeting, on 20 March 1998, the Council held an open debate to discuss the operation of sanctions imposed on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. On the issue of sanctions, the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya stated that the International Court of Justice had confirmed that the dispute was a legal one in which the court had jurisdiction. He further stated that the Council must take the necessary measures to give effect to the Judgments rendered by the Court on 27 February 1998 and, inter alia, should promptly and urgently refrain from renewing the sanctions imposed on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya pursuant to resolutions 748 (1992) and 883 (1993).¹⁸³

The representative of the United States, however, expressed the view that the ruling of the International Court of Justice in no way questioned the legality of the Security Council’s actions affecting the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya or the merits of the criminal cases against the two accused suspects. He stated that contrary to the assertions of the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the Court was not calling for the review or suspension of the Security Council resolutions.¹⁸⁴ The representatives of the United States and the United Kingdom contended that the sanctions were carefully targeted to minimize their impact on the Libyan population. Moreover, they asserted that if the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya wanted the sanctions lifted, it should surrender the two suspects so that they could receive a fair trial in the appropriate criminal court.¹⁸⁵

Several Council members called on the Committee to continue to respond promptly to requests for humanitarian exemptions.¹⁸⁶ The representative of the Russian Federation emphasized that sanctions were not a weapon to punish “unpalatable regimes”, but a means to support political efforts towards the settlement of a given conflict. He stated that the process of imposing, implementing, easing and tightening sanctions should be closely and flexibly linked to the political process.¹⁸⁷

Several speakers expressed the belief that the relevant decision of the International Court of Justice provided a good basis for an agreement as to the conduct of a fair trial and for the suspension and early lifting of the sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.¹⁸⁸ The representative of Bahrain added that the judgment of the Court, which confirmed its competence in this connection, logically required that the Security Council consider the suspension of sanctions, at least until the Court took a decision on the substance of the matter. He further stated that the harmful effects of those sanctions in the long term had begun to be felt by the Libyan people in spite of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya’s oil riches.¹⁸⁹ The representative of the Organization of African Unity emphasized that it wanted to see a speedy resolution of the dispute and the immediate lifting of the harsh measures imposed against the people of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.¹⁹⁰

In that connection, several speakers called for a thorough examination of the issue of sanctions,¹⁹¹ the criteria for their application and lifting, their effect on third countries and their humanitarian impact on the population of the affected States. The representative of Malta stated that as a neighbouring country to a country hit by sanctions, an open debate should be launched to explore alternative measures for the application of sanctions and on measures that offered built-in incentives that encouraged changes in the behaviour of targeted countries. He noted that such sanctions must be a mechanism for the promotion of peace and not for the indiscriminate mass punishment of whole populations. He further noted that sanctions had profound consequences, not only for the target countries, but also for the neighbouring ones. In his view, the sanctions imposed against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya were not achieving their desired objective.¹⁹²

Children and armed conflict

At its 4037th meeting, on 25 August 1999, the Council adopted resolution 1261 (1999). During the debate, the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Children and Armed Conflict, Mr. Olara Otunnu, while highlighting the suffering of children during armed conflict, stated that there was the need to review the effects of sanctions on children. He stated that all efforts should be made to relieve the suffering of children living under sanctions regimes. Whenever the Security Council adopted measures under Article 41, it was critical to give consideration to their impact on children and to provide appropriate humanitarian exemptions.¹⁹³

Several speakers emphasized that it was important for the Council to take into account the impact of sanctions on children in those situations in which sanctions were imposed.¹⁹⁴ The representative of Argentina noted that the Council had to improve the design of sanctions so that they would not have an impact on innocent civilians and on children in particular.¹⁹⁵ The representative of Finland, speaking on behalf of the European Union and the associated and aligned countries¹⁹⁶ recommended that whenever sanctions were adopted in the handling of crises, their impact on children be assessed and monitored, and that humanitarian exceptions be child-focused.¹⁹⁷

The representative of Costa Rica stated that in the context of the work of the Security Council, studies had to be conducted on possible impacts on the vulnerable population, especially on children, before any sanctions regime was adopted.¹⁹⁸

The representative of India recalled the statement that was made by the Executive Director of the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) to the Security Council on 12 February 1999, in which she had stated that sanctions should not be imposed without obligatory, immediate and enforceable humanitarian exemptions. He stated that the extreme impact on child malnutrition and on child and maternal mortality and illiteracy in countries subjected to comprehensive sanctions had to be addressed. This was something within the competence of the Security Council and would go a long way towards alleviating the suffering of children, many of whom had spent their entire childhood in situations of conflict.¹⁹⁹

The representative of Iraq stated that the enforcement of sanctions against his country had caused the deaths of 500,000 Iraqi children under 5 years of age, as indicated in the UNICEF report published on 12 August 1999. He stated that sanctions had also been the cause of death of more than a million Iraqi citizens from the other groups, particularly women and the elderly. In his view, that situation made sanctions effectively equal to threats emanating from armed conflict. He further stated that the imposition of sanctions on Iraq in 1990 was a form of collective punishment imposed on the people of Iraq. It was his view that sanctions moved Iraq from a state of relative prosperity into full poverty.²⁰⁰

The representative of Slovakia emphasized that economic sanctions should prevent war criminals from "enjoying the fruits of their evil without harming innocent women and children". He stated that well-targeted sanctions could have a real impact without necessarily leading to unbearable humanitarian consequences for the most vulnerable group of the population, the children.²⁰¹

Protection of civilians in armed conflict

At its 4046th meeting, on 17 September 1999, the Council adopted resolution 1265 (1999). In the beginning of the debate, the Council considered the report of the Secretary-General on the protection of civilians in armed conflict,²⁰² in which he stated that experience had shown that sanctions could have a highly negative impact on civilian populations, especially on vulnerable groups. He also expressed concern about regional sanctions and embargoes that were hastily imposed by neighbouring countries and lacked clear guidelines regarding the minimization of their humanitarian impact. The Secretary-General recommended that the Security Council underscore in its resolutions, at the onset of a conflict, the imperative for civilian populations to have unimpeded access to humanitarian assistance and for concerned parties, including non-State actors, to cooperate fully with the United Nations humanitarian coordinator in providing such access, as well as to guarantee the security of humanitarian organizations, in accordance with the principles of humanity, neutrality and impartiality, and insist that failure to comply will result in the imposition of targeted sanctions.²⁰³ He described the concept of targeted sanctions as constituting a potentially valuable means for pressuring targeted elites, while minimizing the negative humanitarian impact on vulnerable civilian populations that had been a characteristic of comprehensive economic sanctions. In this regard, he recommended that the Council make greater use of targeted sanctions; establish a permanent technical review mechanism of the United Nations and regional sanctions regimes; further develop standards and rules to minimize the humanitarian impact of sanctions on the basis of proposals made by the President of the Council to the sanctions committees; and request regional organizations or groups of countries to submit complete information regarding the establishment of proper humanitarian exemption mechanisms and clearance procedures prior to authorizing the imposition of regional sanctions.²⁰⁴

During the debate, several speakers supported the recommendations of the Secretary-General in making greater use of targeted sanctions,²⁰⁵ so as to penalize the wrongdoers, rather than aggravating the suffering of the civilian populations. The representative of Brazil stated that, together with the assessment of the impact of sanctions regimes, the Security Council had to consider applying humanitarian exemptions, as appropriate, to measures adopted under Article 41. Secondly, priority should be given to the development of so-called targeted or smart sanctions, so as to penalize those directly responsible for wrongdoing rather than aggravating the hardship facing the population as a whole.²⁰⁶ The representative of the United States highlighted that it was imperative for concerned parties to cooperate fully with the United Nations humanitarian coordinator in providing access to civilian populations, and that failure to do so should result in the imposition of targeted sanctions. Secondly, his Government supported using sanctions as a possible method to deter and contain those who committed violations of international humanitarian and human rights law, as well as those parties to conflicts, which continually defied Security Council resolutions. He further stated that the sanctions committees should convene periodic meetings and the Council should monitor the humanitarian impact of sanctions on vulnerable groups and make required adjustments of the exemption mechanisms to facilitate the delivery of humanitarian assistance.²⁰⁷

The representative of France emphasized that the Security Council had all the tools of the Charter to pursue the guilty and to cause them to change their behaviour, including through the use of sanctions, which however, had to be carefully targeted and proportionate, so that they would not harm civilian populations.²⁰⁸ The representative of Malaysia noted that when the Security Council took decisions to resort to the use of sanctions and, ultimately, military force for the protection of civilian populations, there was a need to give careful thought to their effectiveness and their negative consequences on the civilian population. The imposition of Article 41 of the Charter and the use of coercive action under Chapter VII should be adopted as a mechanism of last resort.²⁰⁹

The representative of the Republic of Korea stated that the Security Council had made consistent efforts to refine the use of sanctions. While his Government recognized the difficulty of achieving “smart sanctions” in the real world, it also believed that there was a need to minimize collateral, unintended humanitarian suffering through the imposition of more specifically targeted sanctions and mechanisms for periodic substantive reviews. He stated that the Security Council should also devise a more reliable mechanism to better implement the arms embargoes, which had already been imposed by the Council in some conflict areas but which had been deemed ineffective.²¹⁰

The representative of Ukraine stated that the Security Council should examine practical ways to avoid, or at least greatly minimize, a negative impact on the civilian population. His delegation felt that further thinking had to be done in the area of the impact of sanctions on third States. For this purpose, the Security Council should, in his opinion, give careful consideration to the potential social, economic and humanitarian impact of sanctions on the population of the target State and those of third countries prior to the imposition of sanctions. Following the imposition of sanctions, the possible options should be envisaged so that appropriate adjustments could be promptly introduced to sanctions regimes in order to mitigate their adverse collateral effects.²¹¹ The representative of Botswana, while endorsing the recommendations of the Secretary-General, stated that there should be no hesitation over imposing an arms embargo or other targeted sanctions where evidence existed that a party or parties to an armed conflict were deliberately targeting civilians.²¹²

Other measures to maintain or restore international peace and security in accordance with Article 42 of the Charter

Article 42

Should the Security Council consider that measures provided for in Article 41 would be inadequate or have proved to be inadequate, it may take such action by air, sea, or land forces as may be necessary to maintain or restore international peace and security. Such action may include demonstrations, blockade, and other operations by air, sea, or land forces of Members of the United Nations.

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council did not invoke Article 42 explicitly in any of its decisions. The Council did, however, adopt several resolutions by which it called upon States to use all “necessary measures” or “necessary means” to enforce its demands related to the maintenance or restoration of peace and security, which are therefore relevant to the interpretation of Article 42. In all the resolutions, determination under Article 39 of a threat to the peace provided the basis for the application of measures contained in Article 42.

This section will briefly examine four case studies relating to the Council’s authorization of enforcement action under Chapter VII of the Charter, for the maintenance of peace and security. The first case study (case 20) relates to the decision of the Council authorizing a temporary multinational force in eastern Zaire, to conduct a humanitarian operation, by using “all necessary means”. In the second case study (case 21), the Council authorized the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone (UNAMSIL) to “take the necessary action” in the context of a specific aspect of its peacekeeping operations. The third case study (case 22) relates to the decision of the Council authorizing a multinational force to use of “all necessary measures” to restore peace and security, and to facilitate the delivery of humanitarian assistance in East Timor. In case 23, the Council authorized the deployment of the Stabilization Force (SFOR), led by NATO, to achieve, by using “all necessary means”, the objectives set out in its decision. In the last case study (case 24), the Council authorized the International Security Force in Kosovo (KFOR), also led by NATO, to establish an international security presence in Kosovo, with “all necessary means” to fulfil its responsibilities.

The decisions of the Security Council by which measures enshrined in Article 42 were authorized are set out in section A. Section B reflects constitutional discussions in the meetings of the Council arising in connection with the adoption of those resolutions.

A. Decisions of the Security Council relating to Article 42

Africa

The situation in the Great Lakes region

By resolution 1080 (1996) of 15 November 1996, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Council welcomed the offers made by Member States, in consultation with the concerned States in the region, in respect of the establishment of a temporary multinational force to facilitate the immediate return of humanitarian organizations and the effective delivery by civilian relief organizations of humanitarian aid to alleviate the immediate suffering of displaced persons, refugees and civilians at risk in eastern Zaire. By the same resolution, the Council authorized the Member States cooperating with the Secretary-General to conduct the above-mentioned operation to achieve, by using “all necessary means”, the humanitarian objectives set out therein.

The situation in Sierra Leone

By resolution 1270 (1999) of 22 October 1999, the Security Council decided to establish the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone, and acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, decided that in the discharge of its mandate UNAMSIL might “take the necessary action” to ensure the security and freedom of movement of its personnel and, within its capabilities and areas of deployment, to afford protection to civilians under imminent threat of physical violence.

Asia

The situation in East Timor

By resolution 1264 (1999) of 15 September 1999, the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, authorized the establishment of a multinational force, the International Force for East Timor (INTERFET), under a unified command structure, with the following tasks: to restore peace and security in East Timor; to protect and support the United Nations Mission in East Timor in carrying out its tasks; and to facilitate humanitarian assistance operations. It also authorized the States participating in the multinational force to take “all necessary measures” to fulfil this mandate.

Europe

The situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina

By resolution 1088 (1996) of 12 December 1996, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Council authorized Member States to establish a multinational Stabilization Force as the legal successor to the Implementation Force, under unified command and control, in order to fulfil the role specified in annexes 1-A and 2 of the Peace Agreement. Moreover, it also authorized Member States to take “all necessary measures”, at the request of the Stabilization Force, either in defence of the Force or to assist the Force in carrying out its mission, and recognized the right of the Force to take “all necessary measures” to defend itself from attack or threat of attack. By the same resolution, the Council authorized the Member States acting under paragraph 18,²¹³ in accordance with annex 1-A of the Peace Agreement, to take “all necessary measures” to ensure compliance with the rules and procedures, to be established by the Commander of the Stabilization Force, governing command and control of airspace over Bosnia and Herzegovina with respect to all civilian and military air traffic.

²¹³ In para. 18 of resolution 1088 (1996), the Council authorized the Member States acting through or in cooperation with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to establish for a planned period of 18 months a multinational Stabilization Force.

The situation in Kosovo, Federal Republic of Yugoslavia

By resolution 1244 (1999) of 10 June 1999, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Security Council decided on the deployment in Kosovo, under United Nations auspices, of international civil and security presences, with appropriate equipment and personnel as required, and welcomed the agreement of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to such presence. It authorized Member States and relevant organizations to establish the International Security Force in Kosovo, with all necessary means to fulfil its responsibilities.²¹⁴ The Force’s assigned tasks included deterring hostilities, demilitarizing the Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) and other armed Kosovo Albanian groups; and establishing a secure environment in which refugees and displaced persons could return home in safety, the international civil presence could operate, a transitional administration could be established and humanitarian aid could be delivered. By the same resolution, the Council authorized the Secretary-General with the assistance of relevant international organizations, to establish an international civil presence in Kosovo in order to provide an interim administration for Kosovo.

The situation in the Great Lakes region

Following the deterioration of the humanitarian situation in the Great Lakes region caused by the military activities within and across borders, by a letter dated 7 November 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²¹⁵ the Secretary-General informed the Council that more than 1.2 million Burundian and Rwandan refugees and tens of thousands of Zairians had been displaced by the fighting, in particular in eastern Zaire. He stated that he had been considering various options for the establishment and deployment of a multinational force and believed that the best response to the crisis would be for Member States with the necessary capacity to take the lead in putting together a multinational force, in consultation with the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity and the regional States concerned, and the authorization of the Security Council to deploy it.

By a letter dated 14 November 1996 addressed to the president of the Security Council,²¹⁶ the Secretary-General transmitted a letter from the representative of Canada stating that his Government was prepared to work without delay with other Governments to enable the deployment of a temporary humanitarian operation for eastern Zaire, had secured the agreement of a number of Member States to participate in such an operation, and were in contact with the Organization of African Unity. He further stated that the Government of Canada would be ready to take the lead in organizing and commanding such an operation. The objectives assigned to that operation would be consistent with the ones outlined in resolution 1078 (1996).

By resolution 1080 (1996), the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter welcomed the offers made by Member States, in consultation with the States concerned in the region, the establishment of a temporary multinational force to facilitate the immediate return of humanitarian organizations and the effective delivery by civilian relief organizations of humanitarian aid to alleviate the immediate suffering of displaced persons, refugees and civilians at risk in eastern Zaire. By the same resolution, the Council authorized Member States cooperating with the Secretary-General to use "all necessary means", to achieve the humanitarian objectives set out therein.

At its 3713th meeting, on 15 November 1996, the Council adopted resolution 1080 (1996). During the debate, the representative of Zaire expressed support for the measures envisaged in the resolution and believed that it would serve its humanitarian purposes.²¹⁷ The representative of Burundi highlighted the causes of the overall problem that existed in the region of the Great Lakes, and emphasized that the primary task of the multinational force should be to disarm the former Rwandan troops and quarter them in the areas remote from the Burundi-Rwanda-Zaire borders.²¹⁸ The representative of Canada noted that his Government had decided to take the lead role in mounting a multinational humanitarian intervention force, which would make possible the safe delivery of humanitarian aid and facilitate the voluntary repatriation of refugees. He stated that the multinational force would facilitate the immediate return of humanitarian organizations and the effective delivery of humanitarian aid to alleviate the suffering of displaced persons, refugees and civilians at risk in eastern Zaire. His Government, however, did not envisage disarmament as part of the force's mandate. He explained that if soldiers engaged in disarmament, they could not undertake their primary mission, which was to make possible the delivery of humanitarian assistance.²¹⁹

The representative of France recalled the principal objective of the force, which was solely humanitarian. He stated that the multinational force would be in place for a maximum period of four months, which could be reduced if the Council so decided. He further stated that the force would be followed by another operation, most likely a United Nations operation, whose mandate would be specifically to pursue the humanitarian work. He hoped that all of those efforts would provide such help as was necessary to stabilize the region.²²⁰ The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the deployment of a multinational force was the only feasible option and that it was "an immediate response to an immediate crisis".²²¹ Botswana believed that the deployment of the force would certainly avert what was likely to become a human tragedy of immense proportions.²²²

The representative of Rwanda, however, opposed the deployment of the proposed multinational force. He emphasized that conditions were in place for the return of refugees, and that majority of them had already crossed the border from Zaire into Rwanda. He stated that the local and Government machinery had been mobilized throughout the country in order to prepare the welcome centres for refugees, where they would be received before returning to their respective homes. In the light of those new developments, it was the view of the Government of Rwanda that the proposed multinational force was no longer relevant, at least as far as rescuing the Rwandan refugees in eastern Zaire was concerned. In his view, as the situation in eastern Zaire had changed, the plans for the proposed multinational force should also be changed to adapt to the changing situation on the ground. In that regard, he stated that the multinational force should be smaller, the location of its troops should be reconsidered, and a new mandate should be sought. For those reasons, he stated that the mandate of the multinational force should be for a limited period of two to three months at the most.²²³

Following the return of the majority of the refugees to Rwanda and the increasing access of international humanitarian agencies to the refugees, the representative of Canada, by a letter dated 13 December 1996 addressed to the Secretary-General,²²⁴ emphasized that after consulting with its partners in the Steering Group, Canada had concluded that the multinational force had very little utility. Therefore, Canada would withdraw its command and Canadian elements of the multinational force by 31 December 1996. Furthermore, he stated that his Government recommended that the Council terminate the mandate of the multinational force, effective 31 December 1996.

The situation in Sierra Leone

At its 4054th meeting, on 22 October 1999, the Council adopted resolution 1270 (1999) establishing the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone, and decided that in the discharge of its mandate UNAMSIL could “take the necessary action” to fulfil that mandate. During the debate, the Council members unanimously welcomed the establishment of UNAMSIL, and believed that it was an important step in the implementation of the provisions in the Lomé Peace Agreement. The representative of Sierra Leone, who expressed support for the provisions in the resolution, stated that his Government approved of the establishment and deployment of a peacekeeping operation. He highlighted paragraph 14 of the resolution, which stated that, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, UNAMSIL could take the necessary measures to ensure the safety and freedom of movement of the United Nations personnel and, circumstances permitting, to afford protection to civilians under imminent threat of physical violence. In the view of his delegation, this was an insurance policy for both international peacekeepers and innocent civilians. He believed that it also sent a clear message to any potential violator of human rights on a gross scale: the international community would not turn a blind eye if and when innocent civilians were under threat of physical violence.²²⁵ The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the establishment of UNAMSIL provided a clear opportunity for the Security Council and the United Nations membership generally to demonstrate that their commitment to conflict resolution applied as much to Africa as to other trouble spots around the world. The fact that the Council was ready to authorize a major operation in Africa, with an ambitious and wide-ranging mandate, showed clearly that the readiness to act in Africa was there.²²⁶ The representative of the United States stated that by adopting resolution 1270 (1999), the Council would be doing much more than merely deploying another United Nations peacekeeping force. The Council would be acknowledging the end of one of the most brutal civil wars and the beginning of one of the most well-deserved transitions to peace.²²⁷

In an explanation of his vote, the representative of France stated that his delegation was in favour of the recommendations of the Secretary-General calling for the establishment of UNAMSIL, with significant levels of military personnel and robust rules of engagement so that it could defend itself and be able to guarantee the protection of threatened civilian populations.²²⁸

The representative of Argentina highlighted paragraph 14 of the resolution, authorizing UNAMSIL to act under Chapter VII, towards “ensuring the security and freedom of movement of its personnel and to afford protection to civilians under imminent threat of physical violence”. He noted that the protection of civilians under Chapter VII was a pertinent development in the context of the mandate of a peacekeeping operation. Resolution 1270 (1999) was significant in that it introduced a new, fundamental, political, legal and moral dimension.²²⁹

The situation in East Timor

Following the deterioration in the security situation in East Timor, and in particular the continued violence against and large-scale displacement and relocation of East Timorese civilians,²³⁰ on 12 September 1999, the Government of Indonesia agreed to accept an international peacekeeping force through the United Nations in East Timor.²³¹

At its 4045th meeting, the Council adopted resolution 1264 (1999), authorizing the establishment of International Force for East Timor, “to take all necessary measures” to fulfil its mandate. During the debate, the representative of Portugal stated that his delegation saw the deployment of the multinational force as the first step towards restoring a security environment which would allow the East Timorese to begin to rebuild their lives free from any fear and interference. He further stated that the sole precondition for the structure and composition of the multinational force was its capacity to respond to the shocking situation on the ground.²³²

The representative of Indonesia expressed concern about the situation and noted that his Government was ready to accept the United Nations peacekeeping forces in order to restore peace and security in East Timor. He stated that his Government’s main objective throughout the whole process remained, as stated by President Habibie, to enhance the effectiveness of common efforts and restore peace and security in East Timor.²³³

The representative of Australia stated that his Government welcomed the decision of the Government of Indonesia to invite a multinational force to assist in restoring peace and security in East Timor, and, at the Secretary-General’s request, Australia was willing to accept the leadership of the multinational force.²³⁴

Endorsing the objectives of resolution 1264 (1999), the representative of Finland, speaking on behalf of the European Union and associated and aligned countries,²³⁵ welcomed President Habibie’s announcement that Indonesia would be ready to accept an international force to help to create peace in East Timor, protect the population of the territory and implement the outcome of the popular consultation.²³⁶

The representative of Japan stated that his delegation welcomed the decision taken by the Council in authorizing the establishment of a multinational force to restore peace and security in East Timor. He stated that it was clear that resolution 1272 (1999) was the first step in restoring peace and order in East Timor. He further stated that the international community had to cooperate in organizing and deploying the necessary forces.²³⁷

By resolution 1272 (1999) of 25 October 1999, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Security Council established the Transitional Administration in East Timor (UNTAET), and endowed it with the overall responsibility for the administration of East Timor, including executive, legislative and judicial duties.

The situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina

Following the expiry of the mandate for the Multinational Military Implementation Force (IFOR), by a letter dated 9 December 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²³⁸ the Secretary-General transmitted a letter from the Secretary-General of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in which the Secretary-General of the NATO stated that NATO was proceeding with preparations for a follow-up force, which would be named the Stabilization Force in

Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Stabilization Force would be organized and led by NATO, and would become the legal successor to IFOR, which had played an important role in the implementation of the military aspects of the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina (Dayton Peace Accords).²³⁹

At its 3723rd meeting, on 12 December 1996, the Council adopted resolution 1088 (1996), authorizing Member States to establish a multinational stabilization force in order to fulfil the role specified in annexes 1-A and 2 of the Peace Agreement. During its deliberations, the Council members unanimously supported the provisions in the resolution, and agreed that the presence of a multinational force was required in Bosnia and Herzegovina to assist in the implementation of the Peace Agreement. The representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina expressed support for the resolution and welcomed the provisions contained in the implementation of the Dayton Peace Accords.²⁴⁰ The representative of Ireland, speaking on behalf of the European Union and associated and aligned countries²⁴¹ stated that the resolution marked a reaffirmation by the international community that it was willing to support the consolidation of peace and democracy in Bosnia and Herzegovina, by continuing to provide the necessary stable and secure environment within which the important objectives of the Peace Agreement could be achieved. He also stated that many members of the European Union would participate in the follow-on multinational stabilization force, and welcomed the decision to authorize the establishment of the force.²⁴² The representative of Canada noted that an ongoing military presence was an important and necessary part of this international engagement. He stated that the stabilization force would help to ensure a stable security environment for the consolidation period, provide support for municipal elections next year, contribute to the achievement of arms-control objectives, support civilian implementation of the Peace Agreement and deter outbreaks of fighting.²⁴³ The representative of Germany agreed that peace was still fragile and that there was a compelling need to safeguard the progress achieved so far and to stabilize peace in the region by a further and substantial commitment on the part of Member States. He stated that the commitment authorized by the Council included a continued military presence in the field, which was tasked to secure the environment for consolidation, stabilization and, in the end, for political reconciliation and economic reconstruction.²⁴⁴ The representative of Indonesia emphasized that the continued deployment of international military forces would be necessary, not only to reflect the commitment of the global community to facilitate the transition to a lasting peace, but also to prevent the resumption of conflict, with its attendant consequences. In that regard, his delegation was of the view that the creation of SFOR to replace IFOR was imperative to keeping the momentum of the peace process going.²⁴⁵

The representative of China, while welcoming the positive developments that had occurred in Bosnia and Herzegovina and voting in favour of the resolution stated that with regard to the invocation of Chapter VII of the Charter in the resolution, authorizing the use of force, his Government continued to have reservations. It was his Government's view that SFOR had to maintain strict neutrality and fairness and not misuse force in its operations and that it should steadfastly promote peace and stability in Bosnia and Herzegovina.²⁴⁶

The situation in Kosovo, Federal Republic of Yugoslavia

At its 4011th meeting, on 10 June 1999, the Council adopted resolution 1244 (1999) by which it decided on the deployment in Kosovo, under the auspices of the United Nations, of international civil and security presences. During the debate, Mr. Jovanovic, stating the position of the Government of Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, emphasized that NATO was responsible for the unauthorized and brutal bombing of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, which had resulted in a massive humanitarian catastrophe, and the destruction of the civilian infrastructure and the economy of the country.²⁴⁷ On the same note, the representative of the Russian Federation condemned NATO aggression against Kosovo. He pointed out that the humanitarian crisis in the former Yugoslavia was transformed by the NATO bombing into a most serious humanitarian catastrophe. He further stated that the reference to Chapter VII of the Charter in resolution 1244 (1999) related exclusively to ensuring the safety and security of international personnel and compliance with the provisions of the draft resolution. It did not hint at the possibility of any use of force beyond the limits of the tasks clearly set out by the Security Council.²⁴⁸ Similarly, the representative of China, who abstained from voting, stated that the military campaign against the former Yugoslavia by NATO violated the Charter. He further stated that his Government opposed NATO military action against the former Yugoslavia. He also made reference to the resolution, which failed fully to reflect China's principled stand and justified concerns. In particular, it made no mention of the disaster caused by NATO bombing in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and it had failed to impose necessary restrictions on the invoking of Chapter VII of the Charter.²⁴⁹

The representative of Slovenia, who voted in favour of the resolution, emphasized that the Security Council recognized the existence of the threat to international peace and security and, acting under Chapter VII, provided the legitimacy for the necessary measures of implementation of the resolution. He further noted that the resolution provided for a credible military force and authorized it to use all necessary means to fulfil its mandate. This was a prerequisite for the force to establish a safe and secure environment for the return of refugees and internally displaced persons.²⁵⁰ The representative of France stated that the continued and worsening repression of the civilian population compelled the members of the Atlantic alliance to resort to military means in order to put an end to a senseless and unacceptable policy of destruction and deportation.²⁵¹

The representative of the United States emphasized that the resolution established an international security force in Kosovo, which would create a safe and secure environment in which the people of Kosovo could return to their homes and rebuild their lives. He stated that NATO had signed a military-technical agreement with the authorities of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia that specified the details for the rapid withdrawal of all forces of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia from Kosovo and the details of the role and authorities of the international security force (KFOR). He further stated that the authorities of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had accepted that KFOR would operate with a unified NATO chain of command, under the political direction of the North Atlantic Council, in consultation with non-NATO force contributors.²⁵²

Part V

Decisions and deliberations having relevance to Articles 43 to 47 of the Charter

Article 43

1. All Members of the United Nations, in order to contribute to the maintenance of international peace and security, undertake to make available to the Security Council, on its call and in accordance with a special agreement or agreements, armed forces, assistance, and facilities, including rights of passage, necessary for the purpose of maintaining international peace and security.

2. Such agreement or agreements shall govern the numbers and types of forces, their degree of readiness and general location, and the nature of the facilities and assistance to be provided.

3. The agreement or agreements shall be negotiated as soon as possible on the initiative of the Security Council. They shall be concluded between the Security Council and Members or between the Security Council and groups of Members and shall be subject to ratification by the signatory states in accordance with their respective constitutional processes.

Article 44

When the Security Council has decided to use force it shall, before calling upon a Member not represented on it to provide armed forces in fulfillment of the obligations assumed under Article 43, invite that Member, if the Member so desires, to participate in the decisions of the Security Council concerning the employment of contingents of that Member's armed forces.

Article 45

In order to enable the United Nations to take urgent military measures, Members shall hold immediately available national air-force contingents for combined international enforcement action. The strength and degree of readiness of these contingents and plans for their combined action shall be determined within the limits laid down in the special agreement or agreements referred to in Article 43, by the Security Council with the assistance of the Military Staff Committee.

Article 46

Plans for the application of armed force shall be made by the Security Council with the assistance of the Military Staff Committee.

Article 47

1. There shall be established a Military Staff Committee to advise and assist the Security Council on all questions relating to the Security Council's military requirements for the maintenance of international peace and security, the employment and command of forces placed at its disposal, the regulation of armaments, and possible disarmament.

2. The Military Staff Committee shall consist of the Chiefs of Staff of the permanent members of the Security Council or their representatives. Any Member of the United Nations not permanently represented on the Committee shall be invited by the Committee to be associated with it when the efficient discharge of the Committee's responsibilities requires the participation of that Member in its work.

3. The Military Staff Committee shall be responsible under the Security Council for the strategic direction of any armed forces placed at the disposal of the Security Council. Questions relating to the command of such forces shall be worked out subsequently.

4. The Military Staff Committee, with the authorization of the Security Council and after consultation with appropriate regional agencies, may establish regional sub-committees.

Note

Articles 43 to 47 of the Charter set out arrangements intended to govern the relationship between the Security Council and Member States contributing troops for the purpose of the maintenance of international peace and security. The Council, in its deliberations during the period under review, considered the relevance of the provisions contained in Articles 43 and 44, in particular as they related to the command and control of the military forces acting pursuant to an authorization by the Security Council, including in the adoption of decisions related to the Central African Republic, East Timor, Kosovo, Liberia and the Great Lakes region, as well as the item entitled "An Agenda for Peace: peacekeeping".

During the same period, the Council did not explicitly refer to Articles 43 to 47 in any of its decisions. The Council, however, adopted decisions by which it called upon States to enforce demands related to the maintenance of peace and security, and which are therefore believed to be of relevance to the interpretation of Articles 43 and 44.

The following overview is divided into four sections: section A contains decisions of the Council by which measures based on the principles of Article 43 were imposed, and section B attempts to draw out the salient issues raised in the Council's deliberations relevant to Article 43. Section C provides an overview of the Council's decisions that may be interpreted as having reference to the principles contained in Article 44, while section D outlines the relevant discussion in this connection which has taken place in the Council's deliberations,

During the period under review, the Council did not adopt any resolutions referring to Articles 45, 46 and 47 of the Charter, nor were there any constitutional discussions regarding the application and interpretation of these articles.

A. Decisions of the Security Council relating to Article 43

Africa

The situation in the Great Lakes region

By resolution 1080 (1996) of 15 November 1996, the Council welcomed the offers made by Member States, in consultation with the States concerned in the region, concerning the establishment for humanitarian purposes of a temporary multinational force to facilitate the immediate return of humanitarian organizations and the effective delivery by civilian relief organizations of humanitarian aid to alleviate the immediate suffering of displaced persons, refugees and civilians at risk in eastern Zaire. The Council also welcomed the offer by a Member State to take the lead in organizing and commanding this temporary multinational force. The Council called upon all concerned in the region to cooperate fully with the multinational force and humanitarian agencies and to ensure the security and freedom of movement of their personnel. The Council further requested the Member States participating in the multinational force to provide periodic reports at least twice monthly to the Council, through the Secretary-General.

The situation in the Central African Republic

By resolutions 1125 (1997) of 6 August 1997 and 1136 (1997) of 6 November 1997, the Council, acting under Chapter VII, authorized the Member States participating in the Inter-African Mission to Monitor the Implementation of the Bangui Agreements (MISAB), and those States providing logistical support to ensure the security and freedom of movement of their personnel. The Council stressed that the expenses and logistical support for the force would be borne on a voluntary basis in accordance with Article 11 of the mandate of the Inter-African Mission. The Council also requested the Member States participating in the Inter-African Mission to provide periodic reports at least every two weeks through the Secretary-General, the first report to be made within 14 days after the adoption of the resolution.

Asia

The situation in East Timor

By resolution 1264 (1999) of 15 September 1999, acting under Chapter VII, the Council authorized the establishment of a multinational force under a unified command structure, pursuant to the request of the Government of Indonesia conveyed to the Secretary-General on 12 September 1999, with the following tasks: to restore peace and security in East Timor; to protect and support the United Nations Mission in East Timor in carrying out its tasks; and, within force capabilities, to facilitate humanitarian assistance operations; and authorized the States participating in the multinational force to take all necessary measures to fulfil that mandate. The Council welcomed the offers made by Member States to organize, lead and contribute to the multinational force in East Timor, called upon Member States to make further contributions of personnel, equipment and other resources and invited Member States in a position to contribute to inform the leadership of the multinational force and the Secretary-General. The Council further requested the leadership of the multinational force in East Timor to provide periodic reports on progress towards the implementation of its mandate.

Europe

The situation in Kosovo, Federal Republic of Yugoslavia

By resolution 1244 (1999) of 10 June 1999, acting under Chapter VII, the Council decided on the deployment in Kosovo, under the auspices of the United Nations, of international civil and security presences, with appropriate equipment and personnel as required, and welcomed the agreement of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to such presences. The Council also authorized Member States and relevant international organizations to establish the international security force in Kosovo as set out in item 4 of annex 2 with all necessary means to fulfil its responsibilities. The Council further affirmed the need for the rapid early deployment of effective international civil and security presences to Kosovo, and demanded that the parties cooperate fully in their deployment. Moreover, the Council decided that the international civil and security presences would be established for an initial period of 12 months, to continue thereafter unless the Security Council decided otherwise.

B. Constitutional discussion relating to Article 43

Case 25

The situation in the Great Lakes region

At its 3713th meeting, on 15 November 1996, held in connection with the adoption of resolution 1080 (1996), the Council authorized the establishment of a “temporary” multinational force to facilitate the immediate return of humanitarian organizations and the effective delivery by civilian relief organizations of humanitarian aid to alleviate the immediate suffering of displaced persons, refugees and civilians at risk in eastern Zaire. During the debate, speakers unanimously paid tribute to the Government of Canada for having offered to organize and command the proposed multinational force, as well as to the States that had offered troops for the operation.

The representative of Canada noted that countries were responding generously to the Secretary-General’s call to action in eastern Zaire. In this regard, he reported that over 20 countries had already committed over 10,000 troops to the proposed multinational force, while African participation, which was vital to the force’s legitimacy and effectiveness, was represented by the firm offer of battalions from Ethiopia, Malawi and Senegal. He stated that his Government had firm offers from Europe, North America, Africa and Latin America, as well as expression of interest from Asia. However, he stressed the need for additional elements if the force was to have the proper balance and the maximum desired impact on the ground. He welcomed the role that regional leaders and the Organization of African Unity had played in responding to the crises in Central Africa, and their advice and support in launching this effort. He emphasized that such participation was expensive, and urged other countries to assist African countries to bear those costs and, in addition, to provide the strategic transport and equipment that would be required by African partners in this venture. He added that a few countries were truly capable in the field of strategic transport, and the multinational force would be relying heavily on their generosity and commitment.²⁵³

The representative of the United Kingdom, whose Government was involved in the contingency planning, noted that a British military reconnaissance team had gone to the region to assess the conditions on the ground.²⁵⁴ The representative of the United States noted that some outstanding questions concerning the organization and operation of the mission remained to be worked out. In addition, she noted that planning for an appropriate operation to follow the temporary multinational force must also begin right away, due to its complexity.²⁵⁵

Some speakers informed the Council that their respective Governments would participate in the multinational operation. The representative of Korea stated that his Government stood ready to contribute to the cause of the multinational force.²⁵⁶ The representative of Guinea-Bissau also expressed his Government’s readiness to participate in the multinational force under the conditions and terms set out in the resolution.²⁵⁷ The representative of Italy informed the Council that Italian airplanes were ready to fly to the airports in the region to transport the relief supplies as urgently needed. On the composition of the force, he emphasized that the multinational force should be balanced in composition in order to represent the international community as a whole. No country should be predominant. He stated that the force should reflect the commitment of the international community as a whole, and in particular of a wide range of European and African countries as well as the United States. He concluded by stating that Italy would participate in the force as a troop contributor.²⁵⁸

The representative of Chile thanked all the countries that had shown interest in contributing to the mission, some of which had operational capabilities not possessed by all Member States. He highlighted the countries from Latin America and the Caribbean, such as Argentina and Brazil, that had indicated their desire to participate in the mission. He recalled the provisions in resolution 1078 (1996), which called upon the Secretary-General, in consultation with his Special Envoy, to draw up a conceptual framework of the operations and structure of a humanitarian task force with the objective, among others, of assisting the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) in the voluntary repatriation of refugees to their countries of origin, including through the establishment of humanitarian corridors.²⁵⁹

The situation in the Central African Republic

At its 3808th meeting, held in connection with the adoption of resolution 1125 (1997), the Council welcomed the efforts of the Member States which had participated in the Inter-African Mission to Monitor the Implementation of the Bangui Agreement, and of the States supporting them in their endeavours to ensure the return to peace and security in the Central African Republic. The representatives of Japan and the Republic of Korea noted that, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Council would authorize the Member States participating in MISAB and those States providing logistical support to ensure the security and the freedom of movement of their personnel.²⁶⁰ The representative of the United States took note of the financial and other contributions of France, Kenya and other States that had contributed towards assisting MISAB in carrying out its mandate. In that regard, he stated that the resolution showed that the expenses and logistical support for the force would continue to be borne on a voluntary basis.²⁶¹ The representative of the United Kingdom welcomed the contribution of those countries that had provided troops to MISAB, and the French commitment to support the operation.²⁶²

The situation in East Timor

At its 4045th meeting, held in connection with the adoption of resolution 1264 (1999), the Council considered a letter dated 14 September 1999 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Australia addressed to the Secretary-General,²⁶³ in which he informed the Secretary-General that Australia would be willing to accept the leadership of a proposed multinational force in East Timor and was prepared to make a substantial contribution to the force itself.

During the debate, several speakers expressed their readiness to participate in the multinational force, and welcomed the decision of the Council in authorizing a multinational force.²⁶⁴ The representative of Portugal stated that his country stood ready to participate in the multinational force, and was prepared to deploy a significant aid operation, in coordination with the United Nations.²⁶⁵ The representative of Indonesia noted that several details had been worked out between his Government and the United Nations, which included concerns regarding the deployment of the multinational force, including its composition and its command structure, as well as the modalities of cooperation defining the respective duties and responsibilities of the Indonesian defence forces and the multinational force. He assured the Council that adequate measures would be taken for the safety and security of those rendering humanitarian aid.²⁶⁶

The representative of Australia stated that his country was working with other contributors to ensure the earliest possible arrival of the force.²⁶⁷ The representative of Japan stressed that the international community had to cooperate in organizing and deploying the necessary forces as quickly as possible. He called upon the Indonesian authorities concerned to cooperate fully with the multinational force to facilitate the process of its deployment and the implementation of its mandate. The representative of Japan reaffirmed that his country would continue to provide support and assistance to the political and humanitarian process of restoring peace.²⁶⁸

The representative of New Zealand noted that his country would be among the earliest participants, with others from the region, in the deployment of a multinational force to East Timor. Speed was of the essence in view of the gravity of the humanitarian situation there.²⁶⁹

Case 28

The situation in Kosovo, Federal Republic of Yugoslavia

At its 4011th meeting, held in connection with the adoption of resolution 1244 (1999), the Council met to discuss the establishment of international civil and security presences in Kosovo under the auspices of the United Nations.

Stating the position of the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, Mr. Jovanovic noted that the United Nations mission in Kosovo, which would include military and civil components, should have the mandate of and be under the command of the Security Council, which would supervise implementation of the resolution and provide protection to all who needed it. He emphasized that the mission should reflect equal, regional and political representation, which included participation by countries such as China, India, the Russian Federation and non-aligned and developing countries from various regions of the world. He stated that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia requested that the Commander of the military part be appointed by the Secretary-General on the basis of consultations with the Council and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.²⁷⁰

A similar view was expressed by the representative of the Russian Federation, who noted that the presence of the international civil and military contingents in Kosovo should be carried out under the political control of the Council, to which the Secretary-General would regularly submit reports on the course of the entire operation.²⁷¹ The representative of France emphasized that it was the Council authorizing Member States and international organizations concerned to establish the international security presence in Kosovo. He also noted that it was the Council that would remain in control of the implementation of the peace plan for Kosovo because it requested the Secretary-General to report to it regularly on the implementation of the resolution.²⁷²

With regard to the contribution of troops, several speakers expressed their readiness in this matter. The representative of Canada stated that his Government was committed to the effort, and would contribute actively. It was currently deploying a substantial number of Canadian Forces personnel to participate in the international security force for Kosovo.²⁷³ The representative of Norway stated that his country stood ready to contribute troops for the deployment of the international security force and resources for humanitarian needs, demining operations and the rehabilitation of war-torn infrastructure. In addition, as Chairman-in-Office of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE), the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Norway welcomed the decision to place the overall responsibility for the civilian presence with the United Nations.²⁷⁴ The representative of Ukraine reaffirmed his country's readiness to contribute military units to the international force in Kosovo mandated by the Security Council, as well as its civilian police officers to the United Nations Civilian Police operation.²⁷⁵ The representative of Croatia stated that his country stood ready to share its extensive experience and contribute to the success of the efforts of the international community in the implementation of the resolution.²⁷⁶

While embracing the role of the United Nations in the operation, the representatives of the United States and the United Kingdom believed that the operation should be under the control of NATO. The representative of the United States stated that the authorities of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had accepted that the international security force would operate with a unified NATO chain of command, under the political direction of the North Atlantic Council, in consultation with non-NATO force contributors.²⁷⁷ Similarly, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that the resolution provided for the deployment of an international civil presence, led by the United Nations, and for an effective international security presence to re-establish a safe environment in Kosovo. He further stated that the force should command the confidence of the refugees, if they were to return home. That was why NATO had made clear that it would be essential to have a unified NATO chain of command under the political direction of the North Atlantic Council, in consultation with non-NATO force contributors. With NATO at its core, the force would be commanded by a British General and the United Kingdom would provide the leading contribution, at least 13,000 troops.²⁷⁸

C. Decisions of the Security Council relating to Article 44

An Agenda for Peace: peacekeeping

By a statement of the President, dated 28 March 1996,²⁷⁹ the Council acknowledged the views expressed at its 3611th meeting, held in consideration of the item entitled “An Agenda for Peace: peacekeeping”.²⁸⁰ In the text, the Council outlined a series of procedures that it would follow, aimed at improving its consultations with troop-contributing countries, including the holding of regular meetings with them. It decided not only to hold regular meetings with the representatives of troop-contributing countries and the Secretariat, but also to convene ad hoc meetings with them in the event of unforeseen developments in a particular peacekeeping operation, which could require Council action. The statement further noted that regular meetings should be held as soon as practicable and in good time before the Council took decisions on the extension or termination of, or significant changes in, the mandate of a particular peacekeeping operation. The statement underlined that if possible, the Council would hold meetings with prospective troop-contributors when it considered establishing a new peacekeeping operation. Furthermore, the President of the Council would chair all meetings with troop contributors and report their views to the Council during its informal consultations. Moreover, the statement noted that the meetings envisaged would be in addition to those convened by the Secretariat for troop contributors to meet with special representatives of the Secretary-General or force commanders, or to discuss operational matters. In the light of the above, the Council would consider further measures and mechanisms to enhance further the arrangements.

D. Constitutional discussion relating to Article 44

The situation in Liberia

At its 3621st meeting, on 25 January 1996, in connection with the situation in Liberia, the Council had before it the report of the Secretary-General,²⁸¹ recommending the extension of the mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia (UNOMIL). During the debate, the representative of the Czech Republic stated that the interests of the Czech Republic were “specially affected” by the situation in Liberia and referred to Article 44 of the Charter, which provided his country with grounds to participate, inasmuch as the employment of contingents of the Czech armed forces was involved. He stressed that the Czech Republic was the only European country that was participating in UNOMIL. He further stated that his remarks would have been addressed to the troop-contributors meeting, but he was grateful for the opportunity to put them on record.²⁸²

Part VI

Obligations of Member States under Article 48 of the Charter

Article 48

1. The action required to carry out the decisions of the Security Council for the maintenance of international peace and security shall be taken by all the Members of the United Nations or by some of them, as the Security Council may determine.

2. Such decisions shall be carried out by the Members of the United Nations directly and through their action in the appropriate international agencies of which they are members.

Note

During the period under review, the Council did not adopt any decisions referring expressly to Article 48. The Council, however, did adopt several decisions that underlined the mandatory nature of measures imposed under Chapter VII and contained provisions that might be construed as implicit references to the principles enshrined in Article 48.²⁸³

The Council's decisions calling upon States to take measures necessary to ensure the strict implementation of measures not involving the use of force, in accordance with the provisions of Article 41 of the Charter, are set out in section A. Section B focuses on decisions by the Council imposing measures involving the use of force, in accordance with Article 42 of the Charter.

A. Decisions of the Security Council imposing measures not involving the use of force

In its decisions imposing measures not involving the use of force, in accordance with the provisions of Article 41 of the Charter, the Security Council consistently called upon "all States" to comply with relevant provisions in the resolution.

When imposing measures against Afghanistan, the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola in Angola, Kosovo, the Revolutionary United Front in Sierra Leone, and the Sudan, the Security Council in each case expressly stated in its decision that States were to act strictly in conformity with the resolution "notwithstanding the existence of any rights granted or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or of any contract entered into or any licence or permit granted" prior to the entry into force of the provisions set out in the resolution.²⁸⁴ By those resolutions, the Council required that "all States" report to the Committee specifically mandated to monitor the implementation of sanctions on those States' compliance with relevant measures imposed against the parties to the conflict.²⁸⁵ In other decisions,

In connection with the situation in Angola, see resolution 1127 (1997), para. 10, and 1173 (1998), para. 17. In connection with the situation in Kosovo, see resolution 1160 (1998), para. 10. In connection with the measures imposed against RUF in Sierra Leone, see resolution 1132 (1997), para. 11. In connection with sanctions against the Sudan, see resolution 1054 (1996), para. 5.

²⁸⁵ In connection with the measures imposed against Afghanistan, by resolution 1267 (1999), para. 10, the Council requested "all States" to report to the Committee within 30 days of the coming into force of the measures imposed on the steps they had taken, with a view to implementing them effectively. In connection with the measures imposed against UNITA, by resolution 1127 (1997), para. 13, the Council requested Member States to provide to the Committee established pursuant to resolution 864 (1993), no later than 1 November 1997, information on the measures they had adopted to implement the provisions of para. 4 of that resolution. By resolution 1173 (1998), para. 21, the Council requested Member States to provide to the Committee, no later than 15 July 1998, information on the measures they had adopted to implement the provisions of paras. 11 and 12 of that resolution; and by resolution 1176 (1998), para. 4, the Council requested Member States to provide to the Committee information on the measures they had adopted to implement the provisions

the Council requested States to report to the Secretary-General on the steps they had taken to give effect to the provisions set out in the resolution.²⁸⁶

In connection with the measures imposed against Afghanistan, the Council decided that “all States” should impose the measures set out in its resolution, unless the party to the conflict fully complied with the obligations set out in its decisions.²⁸⁷ In addition, the Security Council urged “all States” to cooperate with efforts to fulfil the demand that the Taliban turn over Osama bin Laden, and to consider further measures against him and his associates.²⁸⁸ The same resolution contained a reference calling upon States to bring proceedings against persons and entities within their jurisdiction that violated the measures imposed by the relevant provisions of the Council and to impose appropriate penalties.²⁸⁹

In connection with the discussion of sanctions against Libyan Arab Jamahiriya,²⁹⁰ by resolution 1192 (1998) of 27 August 1998, the Council called upon “the Government of the Netherlands and the Government of the United Kingdom” to take such steps as are necessary to implement the initiative, including the conclusion of arrangements with a view to enabling the of resolution 1173 (1998). In connection with the measures imposed against Kosovo, by resolution 1160 (1998), para. 12, the Council requested States to report to the Committee established under that resolution within 30 days of its adoption on the steps they had taken to give effect to the prohibitions imposed. In connection with the measures imposed against Sierra Leone, by resolution 1132 (1997), para. 10 (a), the Council sought from “all States” further information regarding the action taken by them with a view to implementing effectively the measures in the resolution.

²⁸⁶ In connection with the measures imposed against RUF in Sierra Leone, by resolution 1132 (1997), the Council requested “all States” to report to the Secretary-General within 30 days of the date of adoption of the resolution on the steps they had taken to give effect to the provisions set out in the resolution. court to exercise jurisdiction in the terms of the intended Agreement between the two Governments. By the same resolution, the Council decided that “all States” should cooperate to that end, and “in particular that the Libyan Government” should ensure the appearance in the Netherlands of the two accused for the purpose of trial.

In order to ensure full compliance with relevant measures, the Security Council called on “all States” to take “the necessary measures” to enforce the sanctions regime imposed against UNITA.²⁹¹ By the same decision, the Council also called upon “all States” to implement strictly the measures imposed in the resolution.²⁹²

In its resolutions and decisions establishing the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia and the International Tribunal for Rwanda, the Council decided that “all States” should cooperate fully with the respective Tribunal and its organs in accordance with the relevant resolution,²⁹³ and statutes of the Tribunal, and that consequently “all States” should take any measures necessary under their domestic law to implement the provisions of the resolution and the statute.²⁹⁴ In addition, the Council called upon “all States” and “others concerned” to comply fully with their obligations with respect to cooperation with the Tribunal, and in particular their obligation to execute arrest warrants transmitted to them by the Tribunal.²⁹⁵

In accordance with Article 48 (2), action required to carry out the Council’s decisions should be taken by the Members of the United Nations directly and through their action in the appropriate international agencies of which they are members. In connection with the measures imposed on UNITA in Angola, on RUF in Sierra Leone and on the Sudan, the Council expressly included “international organizations” among the addressees of its decisions,²⁹⁶ and urged States to provide support to assist the international organizations in the implementation of the resolution.²⁹⁷

In connection with the situation in Angola, the Council urged “all States” and “international and regional organizations” to stop travel by their officials and official delegations to the central headquarters of UNITA, except for the purposes of travel to promote the peace process and humanitarian assistance.²⁹⁸

In connection with the situation in Sierra Leone, the Council urged “all States”, “international organizations” and “financial institutions” to assist States in the region in addressing the economic and social consequences of the influx of refugees from Sierra Leone.²⁹⁹ It also urged “all States” to provide technical and logistical support to assist the Economic Community of West African States in carrying out its responsibilities in the implementation of the resolution.³⁰⁰ In addition, the Council explicitly authorized ECOWAS, in cooperation with the democratically elected Government of Sierra Leone, to ensure strict implementation of the provisions of the resolution. In that regard, the Council called upon “all States” to “cooperate with ECOWAS”,³⁰¹ and requested that ECOWAS report every 30 days to the Committee on all activities.³⁰²

B. Measures involving the use of force

In general, while the decisions referred to in section A were formulated so as to achieve universal compliance and create binding obligations for all States, decisions providing for the use of “all necessary measures” to enforce previous resolutions of the Council sometimes took the form of authorizations or calls on States willing and in a position to take such action. In this regard, four decisions authorizing the use of “all necessary measures” expressly envisaged possible action through regional agencies or arrangements.³⁰³ In its decisions adopted in connection with the situations in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia and East Timor, the Council authorized Member States participating in the respective multinational forces to take “all necessary measures” to fulfil their mandate.³⁰⁴ In connection with the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Council requested the Member States acting through or in cooperation with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to report to the Council, through the appropriate channels and at least at monthly intervals.³⁰⁵

²⁹⁶ In connection with the measures imposed on UNITA, by resolution 1127 (1997), para. 6, the Council urged “all States” and “international and regional organizations” to stop travel by their officials and official delegations to the central headquarters of UNITA, except for the purposes of travel to promote the peace process and humanitarian assistance. In connection with the measures imposed on RUF in Sierra Leone, by resolution 1132 (1997), para. 14, the Council requested all those concerned, including the Economic Community of West African States, the United Nations and other international humanitarian agencies, to establish appropriate arrangements for the provision of humanitarian assistance and to endeavour to ensure that such assistance responded to local needs and was safely delivered to, and used by, its intended recipients. In connection with sanctions against the Sudan, by resolution 1054 (1996), para. 4, the Council called upon all international and regional organizations not to convene any conference in the Sudan.

By resolution 1174 (1998), para. 10, the Council authorized the Member States acting through or in cooperation with the organization referred to in annex 1-A of the Peace Agreement to continue for a further planned period of 12 months the multinational Stabilization Force (SFOR). By resolution 1247 (1999), para. 11, the Council authorized the Member States acting through or in cooperation with the organization referred to in annex 1-A of the Peace Agreement to take all necessary measures to effect the implementation of and to ensure compliance with annex 1-A of the Peace Agreement. In connection with the situation in Kosovo, by resolution 1244 (1999), para. 7, the Council authorized Member States and relevant international organizations to establish the international security presence in Kosovo with “all necessary means” to fulfil its responsibilities.

³⁰⁴ In connection with the situation in East Timor, see

In connection with the situation in Croatia,³⁰⁶ the Council decided that Member States, acting nationally or through regional organizations or arrangements, could, at the request of the Transitional Administration and on the basis of procedures communicated to the United Nations, take “all necessary measures”, including close air support, in defence of the Transitional Administration and, as appropriate, to assist in the withdrawal of the Transitional Administration. The Council also called upon States and international financial institutions to support and cooperate with efforts to promote the development and economic reconstruction of the region.³⁰⁷

In connection with the situation in East Timor,³⁰⁸ the Council encouraged Member States and “international agencies” and organizations to provide personnel, equipment and other resources to the United Nations Transitional Administration in East Timor, as requested by the Secretary-General, including for the building of basic institutions and capacity, and stressed the need for the closest possible coordination of these efforts.

The discussions leading to the adoption of the above-mentioned resolutions did not give rise to constitutional arguments regarding the interpretation or application of Article 48.

Part VII

Obligations of Member States under Article 49 of the Charter

Article 49

The Members of the United Nations shall join in affording mutual assistance in carrying out the measures decided upon by the Security Council.

Note

During the period under review, the obligation of States to join in affording mutual assistance assumed specific relevance in connection with decisions under Chapter VII of the Charter by which the Security Council authorized or called on Member States to take all necessary measures to enforce its decisions, even though they contained no explicit references to Article 49. It should be noted, however, that in connection with the situations in Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, East Timor, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, including Kosovo, and Sierra Leone, the Council adopted a number of resolutions, certain provisions of which might be considered as falling implicitly within the scope of Article 49.

While such authorizations or calls under Article 49 were primarily addressed to States willing and in a position to take relevant enforcement action, the Council regularly requested “all States” to provide appropriate support and assistance to those States. Such requests were made in the context of measures adopted in accordance with Articles 40, 41 and 42.

An overview of decisions of the Council calling for mutual assistance in connection with measures adopted under Article 40 is set out in part A. Section B focuses on measures adopted under Article 41, and section C deals with measures adopted under Article 42.

A. Calls for mutual assistance in connection with measures adopted under Article 40

The situation in Sierra Leone

By a statement of the President dated 6 August 1997,³⁰⁹ the Council expressed its concern at the effects of the continuing influx of refugees into neighbouring countries, in particular Guinea, due to the crisis in Sierra Leone. The Council called upon all States and relevant international organizations to provide help to those countries in dealing with this problem.

By resolution 1132 (1997) of 8 October 1997, the Council requested all those concerned, including ECOWAS, the United Nations and other international humanitarian agencies, to establish appropriate arrangements for the provision of humanitarian assistance and to endeavor to ensure that such assistance responded to local needs and was safely delivered to, and used by, its intended recipients.

B. Calls for mutual assistance in connection with measures adopted under Article 41

*Letters dated 20 and 23 December 1991, from France, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America*³¹⁰

By resolution 1192 (1998) of 27 August 1998, the Council called upon the Government of the Netherlands and the Government of the United Kingdom to take such steps as were necessary to implement the initiative for the trial of the two persons charged with the bombing of Pan Am flight 103, including the conclusion of arrangements with a view to enabling the court to exercise jurisdiction in the terms of the intended Agreement between the two Governments. By the same resolution, the Council decided that "all States" should cooperate to that end, and in particular that the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya should ensure the appearance in the Netherlands of the two accused for the purpose of trial.

C. Calls for mutual assistance in connection with measures adopted under Article 42

The situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina

By resolution 1088 (1996) of 12 December 1996, the Council welcomed the willingness of Member States to assist the parties to the Peace Agreement by continuing to deploy a multinational implementation force. In addition, the Council authorized Member States acting through or in cooperation with NATO to establish a multinational Stabilization Force as the legal successor to the Multinational Military Implementation Force, and to continue to provide appropriate support and facilities, including transit facilities. By resolution 1174 (1998) of 15 June 1998, the Council invited all States, in particular those in the region, to continue to provide appropriate support and facilities, including transit facilities, for the Member States participating in the Stabilization Force.

The situation in East Timor

By resolution 1264 (1999) of 15 September 1999, the Council welcomed the offers by Member States to organize, lead and contribute to the multinational force in East Timor; called upon Member States to make full contributions of personnel, equipment and other resources; and invited Member States in a position to contribute to inform the leadership of the multinational force and the Secretary-General.

The situation in Kosovo, Federal Republic of Yugoslavia

By resolution 1244 (1999) of 10 June 1999, the Council authorized Member States and relevant international organizations to establish the international security presence in Kosovo with all necessary means to fulfil its responsibilities. None of the preceding implicit references in the decision of the Council leading to the adoption of the above-mentioned resolutions gave rise to constitutional arguments regarding the interpretation or application of Article 49.

Part VIII

Special economic problems of the nature described in Article 50 of the Charter

Article 50

If preventive or enforcement measures against any State are taken by the Security Council, any other State, whether a Member of the United Nations or not, which finds itself confronted with special economic problems arising from the carrying out of those measures shall have the right to consult the Security Council with regard to a solution of those problems.

If preventive or enforcement measures against any State are taken by the Security Council, any other State, whether a Member of the United Nations or not, which finds itself confronted with special economic problems arising from the carrying out of those measures shall have the right to consult the Security Council with regard to a solution of those problems.

During the period under review, the Security Council did not adopt any decisions containing explicit or implicit references to Article 50. However, the Article was explicitly invoked in relation to the implementation of measures taken in connection with the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) and the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. In connection with measures imposed on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), the representatives of Bulgaria,³¹¹ Croatia,³¹² and Ukraine,³¹³ invoked the provisions of Article 50. In the case of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, India expressed its concern over the special economic problems in accordance with Article 50.³¹⁴ In its report dated 26 August 1996,³¹⁵ the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait described its work in addressing the requests of the States faced with special economic problems.³¹⁶

The principle enshrined in Article 50 was also invoked in a letter dated 19 December 1996 from the representative of the Russian Federation addressed to the Secretary-General³¹⁷ transmitting a decision taken on 15 November 1996 by the State Duma of the Federal Assembly of the Russian Federation concerning its position on the Council's resort to sanctions. In its decision, the State Duma emphasized the necessity to develop a set of measures to minimize the economic damage caused to third States that complied with sanctions, and advised the Council to be cautious in considering the imposition of sanctions against individual States. In the same decision, the State Duma recommended that the President of the Russian Federation should instruct the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Russian Federation to take measures "precluding the possibility of the use by the Security Council of sanctions causing serious damage to the economic interests of the Russian Federation, unless at the same time an effective international mechanism was set up to compensate for economic losses incurred by the Russian side as a result of participation in the sanctions".

Questions relating to the application (and consideration) of Article 50 were also considered in the report of the International Commission of Inquiry established to investigate reports relating to the sale or supply of arms and related materiel to former R3andan government forces in the Great Lakes region (in violation of Council resolutions 918 (1994), 997 (1995) and 5011 (1995)).³¹⁸ The recommendation contained in the report addressed, in addition, to the cases of Rwanda and the Great Lakes region, the imposition of arms embargoes in general. recommended, and inter alia, that when the Security Council imposed an arms embargo under Chapter VII of the Charter, it should consider urging neighbouring States to establish with their respective Governments an office with the necessary legal, political, military, Police, customs and border guard personnel. It further stated that "where the States concerned cannot staff and equip such offices wholly from within their existing resources, consideration could be given to establishing an appropriate trust fund within the context of Article 50 of the Charter".

The following case studies present an overview of the Council's proceedings relevant to Article 50 of the Charter in connection with the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Kosovo.

Items relating to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)

By a letter dated 21 July 1996 addressed to the Secretary-General,³¹⁹ the Government of Ukraine transmitted an aide-memoire on its position on the "proclamation of the economic sanctions imposed by the Council. The Government recalled that it had complied with the sanctions imposed by the Security Council against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in resolution 757 (1992). However, it stated that sanctions had had negative consequences on the socio-economic life of the country. According to the Government, during the period of implementation of the sanctions, Ukraine had suffered around 4.5 billion dollars in direct losses and paid a high price for strict and consistent implementation of the sanctions. It suggested that in order for Security Council sanctions to be implemented (effectively, particular attention should be paid to defining ways and means of compensation for the losses of the neighbouring countries). In its aide-memoire, the Government put forward a number of ideas and proposals for alleviating the negative impact of sanctions on third States.

At its 323rd meeting, on 12 December 1996, held in connection with the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the representative of Ukraine expressed his hope to be involved by means of its industrial potential in the process of the economic restoration and reconstruction of Bosnia's destroyed economy. Such participation would compensate for the losses that Ukraine's economy had suffered as a result of compliance with the sanctions imposed by the Council against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.³²⁰ Article 5p was also explicitly referred to in a note verbale dated 30 August 1996 from the representative of Bulgaria addressed to the Secretary-General.³²¹ The note emphasized that Bulgaria had been extremely vulnerable to the negative side effects of the sanctions imposed on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia by resolution 757 (1992). The note underlined that the support to the affected States largely depends on political will and the capacity to provide assistance, rather than on an established mechanism. The representative stressed the necessity to create a mechanism for the effective application of Article 50 of the Charter. In the note, the representative made other suggestions concerning Article 50, such as arrangement of prior consultations and the establishment of trust funds.

Furthermore, by a letter dated 24 September 1996, addressed to the President of the Security Council,³²² the Chairman of the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 724 (1991) concerning Yugoslavia, transmitted a report of the Copenhagen Round Table on the United Nations Sanctions in the Case of the former Yugoslavia, held at Copenhagen on 24 and 25 June 1996 under the auspices of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe. In taking note of Article 50, the Round Table affirmed the right of States to consult with the Council if they encounter "special economic problems as a result of sanctions. It recommended swift implementation and strict enforcement of sanctions in order to limit the special economic side effects for third countries, in particular the neighbouring countries.

By a letter dated 15 November 1996 addressed to the President of the Council,³²³ the Chairman of the Committee transmitted its final report. The report presented a concise account of the Committee's work from 1993 until termination of sanctions in 1996. In the report, the Council's attention was drawn to the serious economic impact on neighbouring States and other third States as a result of the comprehensive sanctions regime. Eight States — Albania, Bulgaria, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Hungary, Romania, Slovakia, Uganda and Ukraine — exercised their right under Article 50 of the Charter to consult the Council on possible assistance in connection with special economic problems with which they were confronted as a result of the implementation of the mandatory measures. In each of those cases, the Council recognized the urgent need to assist the affected country in coping with its special economic problems resulting from the severance of its economic relations with the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. With regard to applications under Article 50, the Committee recalled that by the end of 1994, the Committee's Working Group on Article 50 had considered and taken note of replies from 19 States and 24 international organizations in response to its appeals for assistance on behalf of the affected countries.

Items relating to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya (in connection with the implementation of resolution 748 (1992))

At its 3864th meeting, on 20 March 1998, held in connection with the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, a number of speakers touched upon the Council's responsibility to address the potential consequences for third States of its decision to apply sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.³²⁴ The representative of Malta joined other delegations that had highlighted the urgency of assessing and analysing the impact to the current and prolonged sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.³²⁵ He noted that as a neighbouring country to a country hit by sanctions, Malta had to ensure that any preventive or enforcement measures undertaken by the Security Council in accordance with Chapter VII of the Charter did not in any way contribute to increased tension and instability in the Mediterranean region. In that regard, he stated that sanctions had had, and continued to have, a negative impact on his country's bilateral business and investment opportunities, on travel arrangements between the two countries and on other economic and social exchanges.³²⁶

The representative of Indonesia referred to the report of the Secretary-General's fact-finding mission to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya,³²⁷ which painted "a sombre picture of the detrimental consequences of sanctions not only for the people of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya but also for its neighbouring countries".³²⁸

Two speakers emphasized that the imposition of sanctions under Security Council resolutions had had serious negative impacts on neighbouring third countries.³²⁹ The representative of Lebanon noted that sanctions should be considered only when all peaceful means for settling a dispute had been exhausted. He further noted that sanctions harmed an entire people, and they had repercussions on many different peoples because of their adverse consequences on third parties.³³⁰

The representative of Guinea-Bissau noted that sanctions imposed on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya as an African country brought suffering on the people of neighbouring countries, which further impeded the socio-economic progress of their people. He expressed the view that sanctions imposed on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya should be reconsidered.³³¹

The representative of India reaffirmed his condemnation of terrorism and recalled that it had abstained from voting on resolution 748 (1992), which called for the imposition of sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. Among the reasons why India had abstained was the fact that the resolution "did not incorporate a clear acknowledgment of the duties of the Security Council towards third countries affected by sanctions, as spelled out in Article 50 of the Charter".³³²

At its 4011th meeting, on 10 June 1999, the Security Council considered the item entitled “Security Council resolutions 1160 (1998), 1199 (1998), 1203 (1998) and 1239 (1999)”. During the debate, the representative of Ukraine stated that there were a number of countries, in particular, those of the Danube region, which were experiencing huge economic losses caused by the interruption of transport communications, reorientation of commodity flows, loss of traditional markets and other factors. He further stated that the right to free and unimpeded use of that important international watercourse had been disrupted. He expected the Council to address in a positive and action-oriented way the problem of the economic losses third countries had suffered from military activities in Kosovo. The representative added that his country intended to get involved in the process of the economic reconstruction of Yugoslavia and the stabilization of the countries in the region.³³³

³³³ S/PV.4011 (Resumption 1), pp. 9-11.

The representative of Croatia emphasized that the challenges ahead should not be underestimated with regard to lessening and eventually overcoming economic hardship, not only in Kosovo and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, but throughout the region. He stated that as a neighbouring State, Croatia had so far suffered 2.5 billion dollars in direct economic losses and an estimated 5 billion dollars in overall economic losses due to the conflict in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.³³⁴

Part IX

Right of self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter

Article 51

Nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence if an armed attack occurs against a Member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken measures necessary to maintain international peace and security. Measures taken by Members in the exercise of this right of self-defence shall be immediately reported to the Security Council and shall not in any way affect the authority and responsibility of the Security Council under the present Charter to take at any time such action as it deems necessary in order to maintain or restore international peace and security.

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council adopted two decisions containing an explicit reference to and reaffirming the principle set out in Article 51: one in relation to the situation concerning the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and the other in relation to the item entitled “Small arms”.³³⁵

The Council debated the application and interpretation of Article 51 in connection with the following questions: the intervention of allied forces in the Democratic Republic of the Congo in accordance with the provisions contained in the Article 51; the use of armed forces by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in Kosovo; question of armed interference in the internal affairs of Lebanon; the inherent right of a sovereign State to resort to self-defence in Afghanistan; the question of small arms; and, under the item entitled “Protection for humanitarian assistance to refugees and others in conflict situations”, the right of United Nations peacekeeping forces to have the ability to defend themselves. In all of the proceeding instances, Article 51 was explicitly invoked, by which Member States emphasized the right of self-defence. The discussion of the Council focused not only on the question whether the actions of States had been justified in resorting to self-defence, but also whether the measures used for self-defence had corresponded to the provisions set out in Article 51.

In some instances, during the course of the deliberations in the Security Council, various issues occasioned remarks pertinent to the interpretation of the principle of self-defence, which, however, did not culminate in a constitutional discussion. Thus, in connection with the situation between Eritrea and Ethiopia,³³⁶ the situation in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, including Kosovo,³³⁷ the item entitled “Promoting peace and security: humanitarian activities relevant to the Security Council”³³⁸ and the situation in Africa,³³⁹ Article 51 was explicitly invoked to remind the members of the Security Council that the right to individual and collective self-defence was recognized in that Article and was therefore fully consistent with principles of the United Nations.

In two communications, Article 51 was explicitly invoked in letters by which States declared an alliance of cooperation. By a letter dated 13 July 1998 addressed to the Secretary-General,³⁴⁰ the representatives of the Russian Federation and Kazakhstan transmitted the Declaration between the Russian Federation and the Republic of Kazakhstan on Eternal Friendship and Alliance Leading into the Twenty-First Century. In the text, they agreed jointly to take all measures available to them to eliminate any threat of aggression or to counter acts of aggression directed against them by any State or group of States, and, in case of necessity, afford each other appropriate assistance, including military assistance, in exercise of the right of collective self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations. Similarly, by a letter dated 15 October 1998 addressed to the Secretary-General,³⁴¹ the representatives of the Russian Federation, Tajikistan and Uzbekistan transmitted a Declaration on cooperation among the three States. In the text, the States agreed that if an act of aggression was committed against one of the parties, the other parties would provide the necessary assistance, including military assistance, and render support with the means available to them on the basis of the right to collective self-defence in accordance with Article 51.³⁴²

In the course of the deliberations in the Council, various issues occasioned discussions relating to the interpretation of the principle of self-defence. They are set out in the case studies in section A.

The case studies will be followed by a brief overview in section B of instances in which the right of self-defence was invoked in official correspondence, but which did not give rise to any constitutional discussion relevant to Article 51. The question of the scope of the right of self-defence under Article 51 falls under the following items: communications concerning right of States to individual or collective self-defence (S/PV.4081 (Resumption 1), p. 10).

³⁴⁰ S/1998/639.

³⁴² Ibid., p. 4.

³³⁶ The representative of Ethiopia informed the Council that his country was a victim of Eritrean military attacks and that its territory had been illegally occupied through the use of force, as a result of which it was now engaged in an exercise of legitimate self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter (S/PV.3975, pp. 2-3).

³³⁷ The representative of Brazil pointed out that according to the Charter, non-universal organizations might resort to force only on the basis either of the right to legitimate self-defence, as stipulated in Article 51, or through the procedures of Chapter VIII, according to which they were to seek prior Security Council authorization and abide by the Council’s decisions (S/PV.3937, pp. 10-11).

³³⁸ The representative of Brazil emphasized that there might be cases in which force might be truly indispensable as a last resort, but it was clear that in any case the approval of the Security Council was essential. He underscored that Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations set forth a single exception for the use of force without prior authorization of the Council: legitimate self-defence (S/PV.3968, p. 23).

³³⁹ The representative of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, while noting that the Council was the United Nations organ responsible for collective security and the maintenance of international peace and security, stated that Article 51 of the Charter recognized the inherent relations between the Republic of Cameroon and the Federal Republic of Nigeria; the situation in the Republic of Congo; the situation in Burundi; the situation between Eritrea and Ethiopia; the situation concerning the Democratic Republic of the Congo; the situation in Cyprus; the situation between Iran and Iraq; the situation between Iraq and Kuwait; and the responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security. In some instances, Article 51 was invoked in correspondence that did not relate to an item of which the Council is seized.³⁴³

A. Constitutional discussion relating to Article 51

In the instances that follow, the invocation of the right of self-defence by Member States gave rise to discussions relevant to the application and interpretation of Article 51.

Case 32

The situation concerning the Democratic Republic of the Congo

In connection with the situation concerning the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the Council discussed the right of self-defence by a regional organization in the exercise of the provisions contained in Article 51.

By a letter dated 4 March 1999 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁴⁴ the representative of the Democratic Republic of the Congo requested an open debate on the question, "Peaceful settlement of the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo". The Council considered the matter at its 3987th meeting, on 19 March 1999, under the relevant item on its agenda.

During the debate, the representative of Uganda stated that the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo had an internal and external dimension. He further stated that the external dimension in the cases of Uganda and Rwanda had been prompted by activities hostile to those two countries emanating from the Democratic Republic of the Congo. He explained that, originally, Uganda had a small number of forces in the Democratic Republic of Congo, invited by President Laurent Kabila, to flush out opposition forces. Then, when hostilities erupted, as a result of internal political problems, military assistance was provided by the Governments of Angola, Namibia and Zimbabwe, which intervened under the pretext that the Democratic Republic of the Congo had been invaded by Rwanda and Uganda. Uganda had subsequently acted in self-defence and deployed additional forces.³⁴⁵

In contrast, the representative of Zimbabwe responded by stating that the "security thesis" was an excuse for Rwanda and Uganda to dismember the polity of the Democratic Republic of the Congo in an endeavour to establish a "greater Rwanda". He noted that Angola, Chad, Namibia and Zimbabwe had responded to a distress call by the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and were now assisting that country to uphold its territorial integrity and national sovereignty. He emphasized that the intervention of the allied forces of the Southern African Development Community was upheld by the inherent right to individual or collective self-defence, in accordance with Article 51 of the United Nations Charter.³⁴⁶

Similarly, the representative of the Democratic Republic of the Congo stated that contrary to the excuses offered by the aggressors, their aggression predated the intervention of the allied forces, implemented at the formal request of a legitimate Government in the context of the legitimate right to self-defence recognized in the Charter of the United Nations.³⁴⁷

At its 3993rd meeting on 9 April 1999, the Council adopted resolution 1234 (1999), by which it reaffirmed that States possessed the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations and reaffirmed the obligation of all States to respect the territorial integrity, political independence and national sovereignty of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and other States in the region, including the obligation

*Letter dated 24 March 1999 from the Permanent Representative of the Russian Federation to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council*³⁴⁸

The right of self-defence was invoked as forces of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) began military air strikes against Serbian forces in Kosovo. At the 3988th and 3989th meetings, the Council considered a letter dated 24 March 1999 from the representative of the Russian Federation addressed to the President,³⁴⁹ calling for a meeting to consider “an extremely dangerous situation caused by the unilateral military action of NATO members against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia”.

At its 3988th meeting, on 24 March 1999, Mr. Jovanovic requested the Security Council to take immediate action to condemn and stop the aggression against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, maintaining that his country reserved its right to act in self-defence in accordance with Article 51.³⁵⁰ This request was supported by a number of members of the Council,³⁵¹ including the representative of the Russian Federation, who expressed his country’s “profound outrage” at the North Atlantic Treaty Organization’s use of military force against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, since it had been carried out in violation of the Charter and without the authorization of the Council.³⁵²

However, several speakers defended the use of force by NATO,³⁵³ justifying the relevant actions and arguing for the continuation of NATO operations. The representative of the United States maintained that such operations were necessary to respond to Belgrade’s actions with regard to Kosovar Albanians, its violations of international law, excessive and indiscriminate use of force, refusal to negotiate to resolve the issue peacefully and the recent military build-up in Kosovo.³⁵⁴

At its 3989th meeting, on 26 March 1999, the Security Council continued its deliberations regarding the situation in Kosovo, and considered a draft resolution sponsored by Belarus, India and the Russian Federation, which was not adopted. The draft resolution sought an explicit condemnation of NATO’s use of force, an immediate cessation of the use of force against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, and an urgent resumption of negotiations.³⁵⁵

During the deliberations of the Council, the sponsors of the resolution argued that the actions taken by NATO violated the sovereignty of a Member State of the United Nations and thus in themselves frustrated the fundamental interests of the overwhelming majority of States.³⁵⁶ Mr. Jovanovic reiterated his request to the Security Council to take immediate action to stop the aggression in Yugoslavia, maintaining that if the aggression went on, his country would continue to protect its sovereignty and territorial integrity on the basis of Article 51.³⁵⁷

The request was opposed by several speakers on the grounds that there was a continuous need to resolve the crisis in Kosovo and to fulfil the legal norms of human rights in the region.³⁵⁸ Other speakers spoke against the adoption of the resolution,³⁵⁹ arguing for the protection of civilians in affected areas and the cessation of violence perpetrated by the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia against its own people.

By a letter dated 30 March 1999 addressed to the Secretary-General,³⁶⁰ the representative of the Russian Federation transmitted the text of a statement by the State Duma of the Federal Assembly of the Russian Federation in connection with “the aggression by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia”. In the text, the State Duma of the Russian Federation Assembly condemned the aggression by NATO and expressed its solidarity with the peoples of Yugoslavia. It pointed out that in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had the right of individual or collective self-defence. Accordingly, it was entitled to defend itself against aggression by all available means.

Case 34

The situation in the Middle East

In connection with the complaint by Lebanon, attention was focused on the question of whether the use of force by Israel was legitimate in accordance with the provisions enshrined in Article 51 of the Charter.

At its 3653rd meeting on 15 April 1996, the Council met to consider a request contained in a letter dated 13 April 1996 from the representative of Lebanon addressed to the President of the Security Council.³⁶¹ The letter requested an urgent meeting of the Council to consider “the grave situation in Lebanon resulting from the large-scale Israeli bombardment of many towns”, including the southern suburbs of Beirut.

During the debate, the delegation of Lebanon requested the Council, inter alia, to order Israel to stop its aggression against Lebanon and to withdraw all of its reinforcements, and to condemn the Israeli aggression against Lebanon.³⁶² The representative of Israel stated that after a long period of restraint and the exhaustion of all political and diplomatic means, the Israel Defense Forces were exercising the right of self-defence by hitting back at Hizbullah strongholds. He further stated that if Lebanon did not have the ability or the will to control Hizbullah activities, Israel had to defend its security by all necessary measures.³⁶³

While calling on all parties to exercise restraint and to cease military activities, the representatives of Germany and the Russian Federation felt that the Israeli actions had not been proportionate to those committed against Israel.³⁶⁴ The representative of Germany emphasized that while self-defence was clearly legitimate, measures of self-defence could become illegal if they did not abide by the basic rule of law prescribing proportionality. He stated that measures of self-defence should not be directed against innocent civilians, and that any measure of self-defence had to be proportionate not only in size but also in direction.³⁶⁵

The representative of the United States pointed out that the Hizbullah attacks into northern Israel had compelled the Government of Israel to take steps it deemed necessary to protect its people from direct threats emanating from Lebanese territory. She noted that those who allowed Hizbullah’s militia to act with impunity in Lebanon must bear responsibility for the consequences. Those consequences included not only abuses to the State of Lebanon from within, but actions of self-defence by Israel in response to Hizbullah violence.³⁶⁶

Nevertheless, a number of speakers condemned the Israeli attacks as an act of aggression against Lebanon’s sovereignty and territorial integrity.³⁶⁷ They insisted that Israel could not justify its actions by claiming that it had acted in self-defence and they called on Israel immediately to cease its military operations and withdraw its troops from Lebanon. In that regard, the representative of Egypt stated that any armed aggression against a neighbouring State, whatever the motive, constituted prohibited aggression. He stated that under Article 51 of the Charter, self-defence must be employed only in response to a direct military attack. He further stated that self-defence by States was not a “blank cheque to be used to wage aggression on others”. He referred back to more than 150 years ago to specific terms for the use of self-defence in which Daniel Webster, a former Secretary of State of the United States of America, declared that the right of self-defence implied the instant and overwhelming necessity for self-defence, leaving no choice of means and no time for deliberation. Lacking those conditions, the use of military force was considered an act of reprisal prohibited by international law.³⁶⁸ The representative of Afghanistan stated that Israel had spoken to the Council of self-defence, but its military actions had been extremely violent.³⁶⁹

At its 3654th meeting, on 18 April 1996, the Council adopted resolution 1052 (1996), by which it called for an immediate cessation of hostilities by all parties and declared its support for ongoing diplomatic efforts to that end. The Council, however, failed to adopt a draft resolution sponsored by 19 Arab States that strongly condemned the Israeli attack and called upon Israel to withdraw its forces from all Lebanese territory.³⁷⁰ During the meeting, the representative of Botswana emphasized that the Israeli military actions had definitely gone beyond the limits of Israel’s legitimate right to self-defence.³⁷¹ The representative of Israel countered that the “tragedy” that had occurred in southern Lebanon had been caused by Hizbullah, which had launched Katyusha rockets at Israel. He hoped that the mission of United States Secretary of State Christopher to the region would “bear fruit immediately” and that a ceasefire would be achieved without delay, as it would put an end to the situation, which had “forced Israel to retaliate and to use its right of self-defence” against those who had attacked innocent civilians in northern Israel.³⁷²

By a letter dated 17 April 1996 addressed to the Secretary-General,³⁷³ the representative of the United Arab Emirates transmitted the text of resolution 5573, which was adopted by the Council of the League of Arab States on 17 April following a special meeting devoted to the consideration of the question of the Israeli aggression against Lebanon. In the text, the League of Arab States Council reaffirmed the right of the Lebanese people to resist Israeli occupation in Lebanese territory in accordance with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations, particularly their right to self-defence against the “occupier”, and supported the right of the Lebanese people to demand that Israel provide compensation for the loss of human life and material damage caused by Israeli occupation and aggression.

By several subsequent letters addressed to the Secretary-General,³⁷⁴ the representative of Israel asserted that right of self-defence by engaging in operations against Hizbullah operating from Lebanon.

In response, the representative of Lebanon, by a letter dated 23 January 1997 addressed to the Secretary-General,³⁷⁵ stated that the actions that the representative of Israel referred to as acts of terrorism were acts of resistance to occupation that took place inside Lebanese territory and were directed against military elements of the occupation forces. He claimed that those acts were a legitimate expression of the right to self-defence enshrined in the Charter, and that they had the goal of liberating national territory from foreign occupation.

In two subsequent letters addressed to the Secretary-General,³⁷⁶ the representative of Lebanon repeated that the actions, which the representative of Israel referred to as acts of terrorism, were acts of resistance to occupation and were directed against military elements of the occupation forces. They were actions that had the purpose of liberating national territory from foreign occupation, and they arose as a reaction to the occupation and in self-defence, it being an intrinsic right of peoples to defend themselves pursuant to the relevant international covenants and in accordance with international law and the Charter of the United Nations.

Arab Republic referred to a letter dated 24 March 1999 from the representative of Israel addressed to the Secretary-General, regarding measures to eliminate international terrorism.³⁷⁸ In that regard, he stated that Israel sought to portray the Israeli State's acts of piracy, aggression, expansionism and terrorism as acts of legitimate self-defence and this at a time when the peoples of the world had come to regard occupation and settlement as the most horrendous forms of terrorism.³⁷⁹

In five communications addressed to the Secretary-General,³⁸⁰ the representative of Israel reported that Lebanon refused to negotiate with Israel on implementing resolution 425 (1978) despite Israel's invitations. Therefore, Israel was left with no choice but to exercise its right to self-defence in accordance with international law.

The situation in Afghanistan

In connection with the situation in Afghanistan and the strengthening of its national defense system, a discussion arose relating to the application and interpretation of Article 51. By a letter dated 22 August 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁸¹ the representative of Afghanistan transmitted the text of the statement of its Ministry of Foreign Affairs in relation to the peace process in Afghanistan. The text underlined that Afghanistan was an independent, indivisible, unitary State that enjoyed national sovereignty. It noted that no article of the Charter provided for an arms embargo to be carried out against the Government of a Member State which itself was a victim of foreign interventions and conspiracies and which was defending its sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity. It further noted that the Government of Afghanistan had the duty to take necessary measures to defend its territorial integrity and national unity. In accordance with Article 51 of the Charter, the Islamic State of Afghanistan had the inherent right of self-defence. Any attempt to prevent Afghanistan from strengthening its national defence as a sovereign State would therefore be against the Charter and practically against the interests of peace, stability and security in the region.

At the 3705th meeting, the Council considered a letter dated 8 October 1996 from the representatives of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, the Russian Federation, Tajikistan and Uzbekistan addressed to the Secretary-General,³⁸² transmitting the text of a joint statement made by the leaders of their countries concerning developments in Afghanistan. The leaders proposed that a special meeting of the Council be held without delay to adopt urgent measures to halt the fighting and achieve a comprehensive settlement of the Afghan conflict, and to arrange for international humanitarian assistance to the civilian population and refugees. In their joint declaration, the leaders expressed concern at the expansion of the armed confrontation and stated that any actions that undermined the stability on the borders between Afghanistan and the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) would be deemed a threat to the common interest of those States.

During the debate, the representative of Afghanistan reiterated that his country was an independent, indivisible, unitary State, which enjoyed national sovereignty and thus had the duty to take necessary measures to defend its territorial integrity and national unity. He emphasized that in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter, Afghanistan had the inherent right to self-defence. He further noted that any attempt to prevent Afghanistan from strengthening its national defences as a sovereign State would therefore be against the Charter and particularly against the interests of peace, stability and security in the region.³⁸³ Moreover, he stated that such defences were particularly necessary in order to defend the State from Pakistan, which had been acting as "an obstacle to the return of peace and normalcy" in Afghanistan.

³⁸² In the joint declaration made on 4 October 1996 by the leaders of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, the Russian Federation, Tajikistan and Uzbekistan concerning developments in Afghanistan, the leaders expressed a strong desire for a comprehensive political settlement of the Afghan conflict, especially as the conflict was not only destabilizing the situation in the region and in the world, but also posing a direct threat to the national security and interests of the bordering countries, including the Commonwealth of Independent States (S/1996/838).

³⁸³ S/PV.3705, p. 2.

The Central Asian members of the Commonwealth of Independent States stated that events in Afghanistan threatened the political stability of the subregion. They appealed to all the parties to the conflict, first of all the Taliban, to call an immediate halt to hostilities and to begin to seek ways of achieving national accord. They emphasized that there was one major political objective to this process, which was the non-interference by foreign elements in the internal affairs of sovereign Afghanistan and therewith the preservation of the country's territorial integrity. They stated that the involvement of the international community was considered particularly necessary and crucial in prohibiting any external intervention in Afghanistan and in helping the Afghan people find an acceptable formula for agreement.³⁸⁴ The representative of Pakistan joined the statement of the CIS countries, agreeing with the non-interference policy for Afghanistan, urging the United Nations to promote durable peace in the region, and calling for the international community to help provide humanitarian relief to the victims of the conflict.³⁸⁵

Protection for humanitarian assistance to refugees and others in conflict situations

At its 3778th meeting on 21 May 1997, the Council held a discussion on the item entitled "Protection for humanitarian assistance to refugees and others in conflict situations". The representative of Egypt raised a point regarding self-defence and suggested looking at a report that Secretary-General Dag Hammarskjöld had presented in August 1958, two years after the establishment of the United Nations Emergency Force (UNEF). He indicated that the report defined the limits of actions of self-defence by United Nations forces in the following manner: "A reasonable definition seems to have been established in the case of UNEF, where the rule is applied that men engaged in the operation may never take the initiative in the use of armed force, but are entitled to respond with force to an attack with arms, including attempts to use force to make them withdraw from positions, which they occupy under orders from the Commander, acting under the authority of the Assembly and within the scope of its resolutions". Referring to the citation, he pointed out that the United Nations needed to avoid situations like the one that had occurred in Bosnia where the Council had been unable to take any action to assert the peacekeepers' right of self-defence or their right to protect their mission and mandate.³⁸⁶ Several representatives joined him in stressing the need for the United Nations peacekeeping forces to have that right, ability and competence,³⁸⁷ including the representative of China who stated that the invocation of Chapter VII of the Charter or the authorization of the use of force would more often complicate problems in peacekeeping operations and humanitarian relief activities. In that regard, he stated that the use of force should be strictly confined to self-defence. It should not be used indiscriminately, still less for retaliation, or in any way hurt innocent civilians.³⁸⁸

At its 4048th meeting, on 24 September 1999, the Council held a ministerial meeting on the question of small arms in the context of the challenges facing the international community in that regard.

During the debate, several Council members were of the view that the legitimate defence and security needs of States under Article 51 of the Charter had to be borne in mind when proposing measures to deal with the highly complex issue of small arms.³⁸⁹ The representative of the Russian Federation noted that he agreed with the approach taken by many members of the United Nations, whose positions were based on the provisions of Article 51 of the Charter and the legitimate right of States to self-defence, which entailed the legal acquisition of the necessary weapons.³⁹⁰ The representative of Argentina noted that the negative impact of the proliferation of small arms on human security, without affecting the right to self-defence recognized in the Charter, should be curbed.³⁹¹

³⁹¹ Ibid., pp. 12-13.

The representative of Brazil stated that due to the multiple dimensions of the issue of small arms — humanitarian, criminal, disarmament and security — the matter called for an overarching and integrated approach.³⁹² Endorsing the efforts of the international community to solve the problems caused by small arms, the representative of China noted that while efforts were being intensified to eliminate the adverse impact of small arms, due consideration should be given to the legitimate self-defence and security needs of countries and to guaranteeing their right legally to possess, manufacture and transfer small arms.³⁹³

The representative of Gabon stated that Governments in most African regions had taken measures to combat illicit transfers of weapons of all sorts. Following the United Nations example, they had created a subregional register to ensure transparency in terms of the weapons they had available for legitimate defence purposes in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter.³⁹⁴

Following the meeting, by a statement of the President dated 24 September 1999,³⁹⁵ the Council noted with grave concern that the destabilizing accumulation of small arms had contributed to the intensity and duration of armed conflicts. Moreover, the Council emphasized that the “right of individual and collective self-defence recognized in Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations” and the legitimate security demands of all countries should be fully taken into account.

B. Invocation of the right of self-defence in other instances

In the following instances, Member States invoked the right of self-defence in official correspondence, which did not give rise to any significant constitutional discussion with direct relevance to Article 51.

Communications concerning relations between the Republic of Cameroon and the Federal Republic of Nigeria

By a letter dated 27 February 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁹⁶ the representative of Nigeria transmitted a letter from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Nigeria responding to claims made in a communication from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Cameroon concerning the Bakassi Peninsula.³⁹⁷ In his letter, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Cameroon alleged, inter alia, that Nigerian troops had been launching artillery attacks on Cameroonian positions and advancing further into Cameroonian territory since 3 February 1996. The representative of Nigeria informed the Council that the allegations of the Cameroonian authorities were unfounded. He claimed that the Cameroonians had instigated attacks on the Nigerian population in the Bakassi region, which led to Nigerian soldiers responding in self-defence.

In response, the representative of Cameroon, by a letter dated 2 May 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁹⁸ stated that if Nigeria persisted in its aggression and continued to seize Cameroonian territory, Cameroon reserved the right to exercise, at any time and using any means it deemed necessary, its right of self-defence in order to safeguard its sovereignty and territorial integrity.

By a letter dated 16 October 1997 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁹⁹ the representative of Angola reported that on 13 October 1997, in exercising its right of self-defence, one unit of the Angolan Armed Forces attacked armed groups of the Frente de Libertação do Estado de Cabinda (FLEC) and UNITA, following attacks against bordering localities in Cabinda province, from the Republic of the Congo.

He reported that the Burundian army had attacked the Kiteule detachment of the Tanzanian People's Defence Forces situated at Kagunga on 27 October 1997. Being provoked, the forces of the United Republic of Tanzania had to exercise their right of self-defence in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations.

Letter dated 26 January 1998 from the Permanent Representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council

By a letter dated 26 January 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴⁰¹ the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya transmitted a letter dated 22 January 1998 from the Secretary of the General People's Committee for Foreign Liaison and International Cooperation of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, claiming that Israel had received from the United States the first two of the 25 F-15 fighters planned for delivery. He stated that the aforementioned delivery of combat aircraft was part of the unlimited military support that the United States provided to Israel in order to enable it to maintain its military superiority in the region. In that regard, he noted that the delivery of the F-15 fighters confirmed the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya's right of self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter.

The situation between Eritrea and Ethiopia

By a letter dated 3 June 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴⁰² the representative of Eritrea asserted its right of self-defence, in response to a military attack in Asmara by Ethiopian troops.

In response, the representative of Ethiopia, by a letter dated 4 June 1998 addressed to the President,⁴⁰³ noted that in response to Eritrea's aggression, Ethiopia had in self-defence taken limited measures against Asmara.

In response, the representative of Eritrea also sent out several communications addressed to the President of the Security Council stating that Eritrea's actions against military targets in Ethiopia were simply in retaliation and exercise of its legitimate right of self-defence in the face of aggression.⁴⁰⁵

By a letter dated 31 August 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴⁰⁶ the representative of the Democratic Republic of the Congo transmitted a copy of the memorandum on the armed aggression by the Rwandan-Ugandan coalition against his country. The memorandum noted that the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo did not practice a policy of warmongering, nor did it wish to make war on any State. It was merely exercising its natural right of individual or collective self-defence, in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter, in order to regain its sovereignty and territorial integrity. In addition, it stated that the sole purpose of the military operations being carried out was to repel the Ugandan-Rwandan aggression.

By a letter dated 28 June 1999 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴⁰⁷ the representative of the Democratic Republic of the Congo transmitted a copy of the document entitled "White paper on massive violations of human rights, the basic rules of international humanitarian law and environmental protection standards by the aggressor countries (Uganda, Rwanda and Burundi) and their Congolese accomplices in the eastern part of the Democratic Republic of the Congo: volume II", covering the period from 6 November 1998 to 15 April 1999. The situation in Cyprus

By a letter dated 19 September 1997 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁴¹⁰ the representative of Turkey noted that the purchase of the S-300 missile system by the “Greek Cypriot administration” constituted a direct threat to the security of Turkey itself. In response, the representative of Cyprus, by a letter dated 1 October 1997,⁴¹¹ claimed that such a decision by his Government was made in the exercise of its inalienable rights as a sovereign State to self-defence and to decide on its armaments.

By a letter dated 28 January 1998 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁴¹² the representative of Turkey expressed his concern over the construction of the military airbase in Paphos by the Government of Cyprus. In two consecutive responses, the representative of Cyprus, by letters dated 4 February and 23 June 1998 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁴¹³ emphasized that the enhancement of the defensive capabilities of the National Guard was an expression of the exercise of the right to self-defence recognized in the Charter.

Middle East

The situation between Iran and Iraq

By a letter dated 29 July 1996 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁴¹⁴ the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran reported that terrorist groups from the territory of Iraq were operating along the Iranian border. He noted that, in response to those activities, and in accordance with its inherent right of self-defence enshrined in Article 51 of the Charter, his country took immediate and proportional measures, which were necessary for curbing and suppressing such aggressive activities. He further reported that the Iranian defence forces pursued the retreating armed groups that had attacked civilian targets in the border towns of Piranshahr, Mahabad and Oroumiyeh, and targeted their training camps in Iraq. He emphasized that while reserving its inherent right to self-defence in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter, Iran respected the territorial integrity of Iraq.

By a letter dated 2 October 1997 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁴¹⁵ the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran again reported that two heavily armed groups belonging to an Iranian terrorist organization based in Iraq had crossed international borders and infiltrated the territory of Iran from Iraq. He reiterated that in exercise of the inherent right of self-defence recognized in Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, his Government responded to these attacks by taking “a limited and proportionate measure against the invading terrorists”.

By a letter dated 10 May 1999 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁴¹⁶ the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran reiterated his Government’s willingness to cooperate with the international community to combat terrorism wholeheartedly. In that context, he reaffirmed that the Islamic Republic of Iran reserved its right to self-defence, in accordance with international law and the Charter of the United Nations, with a view to safeguarding its security and territorial integrity against terrorist acts.⁴¹⁷

By a letter dated 12 July 1999 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁴¹⁸ the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran asserted that it needed to be clarified that the proportionate actions by the Islamic Republic of Iran against terrorist bases and targets in Iraq, which had been used to train terrorists and generate terrorism against the Islamic Republic of Iran, had been taken in discriminate manner and in exercise of the inherent right of self-defence as set out in Article 51 of the Charter. Accordingly, such actions, taken in response to numerous terrorist attacks against Iranian people and officials, were in line with the pronounced policy of the Islamic Republic of Iran which had been previously brought to the attention of the Secretary-General and the Council. In pursuance of this policy and in the exercise of its right of self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter, the concerned authorities of the Islamic Republic of Iran targeted a well-known active terrorist camp, located in the territory of Iraq, on 10 June 1999.

The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

Throughout 1999, the representative of Iraq, in a number of letters addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴¹⁹ reported that the United States and British aircraft based in Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and Turkey continued to violate Iraq's airspace. In response to those violations, he declared that his country had exercised its inherent right of self-defence by engaging its air defence units.

The responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security

By a letter dated 22 May 1998 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁴²⁰ the representative of Pakistan reported that his Government had exercised restraint in its response to India's nuclear tests conducted on 11 and 13 May 1998. However, his Government could not ignore the threat to its national security and the requirements of self-defence.

In response, the representative of India, by a letter dated 4 June 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴²¹ claimed that tests were carried out by India as a defensive measure to protect India, and the right to take measures in self-defence was an inherent right of Member States under the Charter.

Introductory note

Chapter XII covers the consideration by the Security Council of Articles of the Charter not dealt with in the preceding chapters. It consists of four parts: part I covers material pertaining to the purposes and principles of the United Nations, namely Articles 1 (2), 2 (4), 2 (5), 2 (6) and 2 (7). In part II, Articles 24 and 25 are considered in relation to the functions and powers of the Security Council. Part III deals with the practice of the Security Council in connection with the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter, Articles 52-54, concerning regional arrangements. Part IV considers miscellaneous provisions of the Charter, including material relating to Articles 102 and 103.

Since Chapter VIII of the Repertoire sets out the entire chain of Council proceedings on all the agenda items that the Council has taken up under its responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, the present chapter will focus on selected material which may best serve to highlight how the provisions of relevant Articles featured in the chapter were interpreted and applied in deliberations and decisions of the Council.

Part I

Consideration of the purposes and principles of the United Nations (Articles 1 and 2 of the Charter)

A. Article 1, paragraph 2

Article 1, paragraph 2

[The Purposes of the United Nations are:]

To develop friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, and to take appropriate measures to strengthen universal peace.

Note

During the period under review, none of the decisions adopted by the Security Council contained an explicit reference to Article 1 (2) of the Charter. The Security Council, however, adopted 11 resolutions in connection with the situation concerning Western Sahara in which the principle of self-determination was referred to without giving rise to a constitutional discussion.¹ The principle of equal rights of peoples was invoked in a statement by the President issued on 7 March 1997 on the situation in Croatia.² The Council also called for, welcomed or otherwise expressed support for the holding of elections in a number of cases, including Bosnia and Herzegovina,³ Cambodia,⁴ the Central African Republic,⁵ Croatia,⁶ the

Democratic Republic of the Congo,⁷ Guinea-Bissau,⁸ Haiti,⁹ Liberia,¹⁰ Sierra Leone¹¹ and Tajikistan.¹²

During the deliberations of the Council in connection with the situation concerning Western Sahara,¹³ the situation in the Middle East,¹⁴ the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina¹⁵ and others, the principle of self-determination was invoked without giving rise to a constitutional discussion.¹⁶

In communications, there was one explicit reference to Article 1 (2). In a letter dated 25 September 1996 addressed to the Secretary-General, the representative of Iraq stated that the hostile actions of the United States constituted a flagrant violation of the provisions of Article 1 (2).¹⁷

The case below reflects the Council's consideration of questions relating to the principle enshrined in Article 1 (2), in connection with the situation in East Timor¹⁸ (case 1).

The situation in East Timor

On 5 May 1999, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the question of East Timor.¹⁹ The Secretary-General recalled that since 1983 the Governments of Indonesia and Portugal had undertaken, through his good offices, to find a just, comprehensive and internationally acceptable solution to the question of East Timor. Those efforts had culminated in the signature, on 5 May 1999, of an overall Agreement between the Republic of Indonesia and the Portuguese Republic,²⁰ which had entrusted him with the task of organizing and conducting a popular consultation to ascertain whether the East Timorese people accepted or rejected a proposed constitutional framework providing for a special autonomy for East Timor within Indonesia. The Agreement provided that if the popular consultation resulted in a majority of the East Timorese people rejecting the proposed autonomy, the Government of Indonesia would take the constitutional steps necessary to terminate Indonesia's links with East Timor and that the Governments of Indonesia and Portugal would agree with the Secretary-General on arrangements for a peaceful and orderly transfer of authority in East Timor to the United Nations, which would then initiate a process enabling East Timor to begin a transition towards independence. The Governments of Indonesia and Portugal had also signed two supplementary agreements with the United Nations, on the modalities for the popular consultation of the East Timorese through a direct ballot²¹ and on security arrangements,²² which stated that a secure environment devoid of violence or other forms of intimidation was a prerequisite for the holding of a free and fair popular consultation, while the authorities of Indonesia had the responsibility to ensure such an environment and the United Nations would ascertain the existence of such an environment.

By resolution 1236 (1999) of 7 May 1999, the Council welcomed the intention of the Secretary-General to establish as soon as practicable a United Nations presence in East Timor, with a view to assisting in the implementation of the above Agreements, in particular by conducting a popular consultation of the East Timorese people on the acceptance or rejection of a constitutional framework for autonomy for East Timor, scheduled for 8 August 1999, in accordance with the Agreement.²³

By a presidential statement dated 29 June 1999, the Council emphasized that a popular consultation of the East Timorese people through a direct, secret and universal ballot represented a historic opportunity to resolve the question of East Timor peacefully.²⁴

By a letter dated 3 September 1999 to the President, the Secretary-General informed the Council that the United Nations Mission in East Timor (UNAMET), established by resolution 1246 (1999) of 11 June 1999, had completed the popular consultation in East Timor on the proposed autonomy, in which the people had rejected the proposed special autonomy and expressed their wish to begin a process of transition towards independence.²⁵

By a presidential statement dated 3 September 1999, the Council welcomed the successful popular consultation of the East Timorese people on 30 August 1999 and expressed its support for the courage of those who had turned out in record numbers to express their views. It regarded the popular consultation as an accurate reflection of the views of the East Timorese people.²⁶

At the 4043rd meeting, on 11 September 1999, which was held in response to the request for a meeting from the representatives of Brazil and Portugal to discuss "the grave and alarming" situation and "the reports of mass killings and wanton destruction" in East Timor following the ballot,²⁷ most speakers underlined the responsibility of the Government of Indonesia for security in East Timor, as stipulated in the Agreement, and called on the Indonesian authorities to act immediately to re-establish law and order, and allow the results of the popular consultation to be implemented peacefully. They also urged the Government to accept the offer of international assistance and to agree to the deployment of a multinational force to assist in restoring order and in securing a peaceful transition to independence for East Timor. Several speakers stressed that the results of the popular consultation reflected the will of the people for self-determination and had to be respected.²⁸

At the same meeting, the representative of Brazil expressed the view that the international community must not remain passive in the face of the atrocities committed against the East Timorese, who were also being denied the most fundamental right the Organization stood for — the right to self-determination — and be prepared to use all available means at its disposal, under the Charter, to guarantee the restoration of peace and the full implementation of the General Agreement.²⁹ The representative of Ireland stated that there had been a widespread systematic campaign to negate the clear result of this transparent exercise in self-determination, through organized intimidation and violence.³⁰ The representative of South Africa noted that it had seemed as if the people of East Timor would finally realize their long-held dream of self-determination and stressed that the Council needed to ensure that the so-called militias and other undemocratic forces were not allowed to reverse the democratic process in East Timor.³¹ The representative of Indonesia maintained that his Government would continue to support United Nations efforts in East Timor and would not renege on its commitments under the Agreement. He reiterated that the Government had never condoned any form of violence or intimidation. It had accepted the results of the popular consultation and would honour them.³²

By resolution 1264 (1999) of 15 September 1999, the Council reiterated its welcome for the successful conduct of the popular consultation of the East Timorese people of 30 August 1999, and took note of its outcome, which it regarded as an accurate reflection of the views of the East Timorese people, and authorized the establishment of a multinational force to restore peace and security in East Timor.³³

At the 4057th meeting, on 25 October 1999, the Council adopted resolution 1272 (1999) establishing the United Nations Transitional Administration in East Timor (UNTAET), which would be endowed with overall responsibility for the administration of East Timor with a mandate to, inter alia, support capacity-building for self-government. In that resolution, the Council also stressed the need for UNTAET to consult and cooperate closely with the East Timorese people in order to carry out its mandate effectively with a view to the development of local democratic institutions, including an independent East Timorese human rights institution, and the transfer to those institutions of its administrative and public service functions.³⁴

At the same meeting, the representative of Portugal stressed that East Timor was a Non-Self-Governing Territory whose privileges and rights accorded to it by Article 73 of the Charter had been denied, a situation which needed to be addressed. He maintained that the establishment of UNTAET was the culmination of a process of self-determination for which the people of East Timor and Portugal had fought very hard. He welcomed the fact the people of East Timor had been able to express their will freely, albeit under extremely difficult circumstances, and could start the challenging task of building their own country.³⁵ The representative of Indonesia informed the Council that on 19 October 1999, the 1978 decree that had integrated East Timor with Indonesia was formally rescinded, thus closing a chapter of history during which East Timor was Indonesia's twenty-seventh province.³⁶ The representative of Australia noted that

By its resolutions and decisions, the Council, on a number of occasions, touched upon the principle enshrined in Article 2 (4). The Council affirmed the principle of non-threat or non-use of force in international relations, expressed its commitment to inviolability of international borders, called for respect for the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of States, reiterated its position against interference by States in internal affairs of others and condemned hostile action across the border of a Member State, as elaborated below.

Affirmation of the principle of non-threat or non-use of force

By a number of its decisions, the Council reaffirmed the principle of non-threat or non-use of force in international relations embodied in Article 2 (4). For instance, in connection with the situation in the Middle East, by a series of presidential statements, the Council asserted that all States should refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.⁴⁰

Commitment to inviolability of international borders

In dealing with a few situations under consideration, the Council reaffirmed its commitment to the inviolability of the borders of States. For example, in connection with the situation in Tajikistan and along the Tajik-Afghan border, the Council reaffirmed its commitment to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Tajikistan and to inviolability of its borders.⁴¹ With regard to the situation in the Great

Call for respect for the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of States

In dealing with various situations, the Council often reaffirmed the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of States.⁴⁴ On a few occasions during the period under review, the Council also explicitly called upon States to respect those principles.

Concerning the situation in the Middle East, the Council reaffirmed its commitment to the territorial integrity, sovereignty and political independence of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries and to the security of all States in the region, and called upon all concerned fully to respect those principles.⁴⁵

In connection with the situation in the Great Lakes region, the Council called upon all States to respect the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the States in the region in accordance with their obligations under the Charter of the United Nations and stressed the need of such respect.⁴⁶

In connection with the situation concerning the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the Council reaffirmed the obligation to respect the territorial integrity, political independence and national sovereignty of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and other States in the region, including the obligation to refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any

State or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.⁴⁷

In addition, with regard to the situation in Cyprus, the Council, calling upon all States to respect the sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity of the Republic of Cyprus, and requesting them, along with the parties concerned, to refrain from any action which might prejudice that sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity, as well as from any attempt at partition of the island or its unification with any other country, called upon both sides to refrain from the threat or use of force or violence as a means to resolve the Cyprus problem.⁴⁸

Reiteration of the position against interference by States in the internal affairs of others

In some cases, the Council reiterated its position against interference by States in the internal affairs of other States. For example, in connection with the situation in Afghanistan, by a series of decisions, the Council called upon all States to refrain from interference in the internal affairs of Afghanistan, and in some cases, called on all States to prevent both the flow of arms to all parties to the conflict and the involvement of foreign military personnel.⁴⁹ With regard to the situation concerning the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the Council reaffirmed the need for all States to refrain from any interference in each other's internal affairs⁵⁰ and called for the withdrawal of all external forces.⁵¹ Concerning the situation in the Great Lakes region, the Council reaffirmed the need for the States in the region to refrain from any interference in each other's internal affairs.⁵² In connection with the situation in the Republic of the Congo, the Council condemned all external interference in the Republic of the Congo, including the intervention of foreign forces, in violation of the Charter, and called for the immediate withdrawal of all foreign forces, including mercenaries.⁵³

Condemnation of hostile action across the border of a State

On a few occasions, the Council condemned the hostile action against another State. In connection with the situation between Eritrea and Ethiopia, the Council condemned the use of force by Eritrea and Ethiopia and demanded that both parties immediately cease hostilities.⁵⁴ Furthermore, the Council, expressing grave concern over the risk of armed conflict between Ethiopia and Eritrea and the escalating arms build-up along the common border between the two countries, called upon them in the strongest terms to exercise maximum restraint and to refrain from taking any military action.⁵⁵

The Council also called upon States not to allow the use of their territory to attack or plan an attack against other States. In connection with the situation in Rwanda, by resolutions 1053 (1996) and 1161 (1998), the Council called upon States in the Great Lakes region to ensure that their territory was not used as a base for armed groups to launch incursions or attacks against any other State in violation of principles of international law and the Charter.⁵⁶

Furthermore, a few decisions dealing with counter-terrorism touched upon the responsibility of States not to be involved in terrorist acts in another State. By resolution 1044 (1996) of 31 January 1996, in connection with the letter dated 9 January 1996 from the Permanent Representative of Ethiopia to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council concerning the extradition of the suspects wanted in the assassination attempt on the life of the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, on 26 June 1995,⁵⁷ the Council condemned the terrorist assassination attempt and strongly deplored the flagrant violation of the sovereignty and integrity of Ethiopia and the attempt to disturb the peace and security of Ethiopia and the region as a whole. The Council called upon the Government of the Sudan to desist from engaging in activities of assisting, supporting and facilitating terrorist activities and from giving shelter and sanctuary to terrorist elements, and urged it to act in its relations with its neighbours and with others in full conformity with the Charter.⁵⁸ In another instance, following the terrorist bomb attacks on 7 August 1998 in Nairobi and Dar-es-Salaam, the Council stressed that every Member State had the duty to refrain from organizing, instigating, assisting or participating in terrorist acts in another State or acquiescing in organized activities within its territory directed towards the commission of such acts.⁵⁹

2. Deliberations relating to Article 2 (4)

During the period under review, there were instances in the deliberations of the Council in which explicit and implicit references were made to Article 2 (4).

In connection with the item entitled "Maintenance of peace and security and post-conflict peacebuilding", at the 3954th meeting, on 23 December 1998, the representative of Argentina noted that with regard to peacebuilding, the concept of international peace and security rested on more qualitative and complex aspects than those which emerged from the traditional interpretation of Article 2 (4). This was, in his opinion, logical because a strict interpretation of concepts established in 1945 no longer met current needs since the end of the Cold War.⁶⁰

During an open debate on 12 February 1999, in connection with the item entitled "Protection of civilians in armed conflict", the representative of China maintained that, in a humanitarian crisis, the wilful invocation of Chapter VII of the Charter to use force, or even the unilateral use or threat of use of force, against a sovereign State without the authorization of the Security Council, with no consideration given to the specific causes of the crisis, would only complicate matters and further intensify the conflict. connection, he expressed hope that the countries and organizations concerned would strictly abide by the principles of international law and the Charter and respect the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of all countries.⁶¹

In connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, at the 3858th meeting, on 2 March 1998, the representative of Egypt stated that the use of force was not only prohibited internationally under the rules of international law but also in accordance with Article 2 (4) of the Charter. He added that there were controls in Article 42 on when force could be resorted to, and also in Article 51, which was related to legitimate self-defence. In all cases, those controls needed to be subjected to the discretion of the Security Council.⁶²

The cases below depict the debates and decisions relevant to the principle enshrined in Article 2 (4), in connection with (a) the situation in Angola (case 2); (b) the letter dated 24 March 1999 from the Permanent Representative of the Russian Federation to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council⁶³ (case 3); (c) Security Council resolutions 1160 (1998), 1199 (1998), 1203 (1998) and 1239 (1999) (case 4); (d) the situation concerning the Democratic Republic of the Congo (case 5); (e) the situation between Iraq and Kuwait (case 6); (f) the situation in the Middle East (case 7); and (g) the situation in Afghanistan (case 8).

The situation in Angola

In his report on the United Nations Angola Verification Mission (UNAVEM III) dated 14 April 1997, the Secretary-General expressed his concern at recent reports of involvement by the Angolan parties in the Zairian conflict. Reporting that the Angolan authorities had denied that they were providing support to the warring parties in Zaire, he held that such interference would have serious consequences not only for the peace process in Angola, but also for the ongoing efforts to bring the crisis in Zaire to an end, in accordance with the peace plan endorsed by the Security Council.⁶⁴

At the 3769th meeting, on 16 April 1997, a few speakers shared their worries about the alleged involvement of the Government of Angola in the Zaire conflict. Citing the above-mentioned reference in the report, the representative of Costa Rica expressed the view that if the information should prove to be accurate, it would represent a grave risk of instability, not only in Angola but in other parts of Africa and hence, the parties should abstain from any intervention in Zaire.⁶⁵ The representative of Uruguay argued that at an important moment of the peace process in Angola, the latent threat that the Angolan parties might intervene in Zaire was one of the most worrying aspects.⁶⁶

In response, the representative of Angola stated that from the beginning of the civil unrest in Zaire, his Government had pleaded for its rapid resolution and appealed very strongly to the parties involved to choose the negotiating table as a means to settle their differences. He emphasized that it was an internal matter and up to the Zairians to find the appropriate solution without any external interference. The representative underscored, in addition, that the Government of Angola had never been involved in any way in other countries' internal affairs and therefore, strongly rejected the reports suggesting interference by his country in the internal affairs of Zaire.⁶⁷

Treaty Organization (NATO) against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.

At the 3988th meeting, on 24 March 1999, the representative of the Russian Federation expressed outrage at the use of military force by NATO. Stressing that the countries involved in the unilateral use of force against the sovereign Federal Republic of Yugoslavia — carried out in violation of the Charter and without the authorization of the Council — needed to realize the heavy responsibility they bore for subverting the Charter and other norms of international law, and for attempting to establish in the world, de facto, the primacy of force and unilateral diktat. He further argued that the members of NATO were not entitled to decide the fate of other sovereign and independent States and were not only members of their alliance but also Members of the United Nations. The representative demanded the immediate cessation of the illegal military action against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and reserved the right to raise the question of the adoption by the Council, under the Charter, of appropriate measures with respect to that situation, which had arisen as a result of the illegal actions by NATO and which posed a clear threat to international peace and security.⁷⁰

Similarly, the representative of China held that the military strikes against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia by NATO amounted to a blatant violation of the Charter and the accepted norms of international law. He argued that the question of Kosovo,⁷¹ which was an internal matter of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, should be resolved among the parties concerned in that country and on the basis of respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. He expressed opposition to the use or threat of use of force in international affairs and to power politics whereby the strong bullied the weak; and to interference in the internal affairs of other States, under whatever pretext or in whatever form.⁷² The representative of Belarus stressed that the use of military force against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia “without a proper decision” of the only competent international body, the Security Council, as well as any introduction of foreign military contingents against the wish of the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia qualified as an act of aggression. He stated that under those circumstances, no rationale or, and reasoning presented by NATO could justify the “unlawful use of military force”. He further stressed that such unilateral military action meant an international disregard for the role and responsibility of the Council in the maintenance of international peace and security.⁷³ The representative of India reiterated that the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the international borders of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia were inviolable, which was to be fully respected by all States.⁷⁴

Mr. Vladislav Jovanovic⁷⁵ maintained that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had not threatened any country or the peace and security of the region and had been attacked because it had sought to solve an internal problem and use its sovereign right to fight terrorism and prevent the secession of a part of its territory. He held that the decision to attack an independent country had been taken outside the Security Council and that such a blatant aggression was a flagrant violation of the basic principles of the Charter. He insisted that the United States and NATO must assume full responsibility for all consequences of their “act of open aggression” and appealed to all States to categorically oppose “the aggression” of NATO and the United States against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.⁷⁶

In contrast, the representative of the United States, referring to Belgrade’s brutal persecution of Kosovar Albanians, violations of international law, excessive and indiscriminate use of force, refusal to negotiate and resolve the issue peacefully, and recent military build-up in Kosovo, reminded the Council that resolutions 1199 (1998) and 1203 (1998) had

⁷⁵ From 1992 onwards, representatives of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia participated in Council meetings under a special arrangement that invited the representatives by name, without mentioning the State they represented and without referring to rules 37 or 39 of the provisional rules of procedure. recognized that the situation in Kosovo constituted a threat to peace and security in the region and had invoked Chapter VII of the Charter. Recounting the actions of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, including refusal to comply with the demands of the Security Council, and violation of its commitments and obligations under the Helsinki Final Act and the international law of human rights, he held that the action by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in Kosovo could not be dismissed as an internal matter. He further stressed that Belgrade's systematic policy of undermining previous agreements and thwarting diplomatic efforts, which had prevented a peaceful solution, had led his country and its allies to the action that day and in that context, justified the action by NATO as necessary to stop the violence and prevent a greater humanitarian disaster.⁷⁷

The representative of Malaysia asserted that as a matter of principle, his delegation did not favour the use or threat of force to resolve any conflict situation, regardless of where it occurred. He held that the use of force, in the event that it was at all necessary, should be a recourse of last resort, to be sanctioned by the Council, which had been vested with the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security. He stated that the ongoing conflict in Kosovo would have international repercussions and thus the international community could not afford to stand idly by, given the dimension of the violence and the worsening of humanitarian conditions in Kosovo in the wake of the repressive military actions by the Serbian and Yugoslav authorities. His delegation would have wished that the crisis in Kosovo could have been dealt with directly by the Council and regretted that the absence of a consensus in the Council had necessitated that action be taken outside of the Council.⁷⁸

Other speakers also asserted that the conflict in Kosovo threatened to precipitate a larger humanitarian disaster and destabilize the entire region and that the NATO action was the only way to avert it.⁷⁹

At the 3989th meeting, on 26 March 1999, the Council had before it a draft resolution, by which, affirming that the unilateral use of force by NATO

against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia constituted a flagrant violation of the Charter, in particular Articles 2 (4), 24 and 53, and a threat to international peace and security, the Council, acting under Chapters VII and VIII of the Charter, would have demanded an immediate cessation of the use of force against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and urgent resumption of negotiations.⁸⁰ The draft resolution was not adopted because it did not obtain the required majority.⁸¹

Pointing out that the draft resolution appeared to have made a "fundamentally flawed factual assessment" of the situation, the representative of Slovenia further criticized that while the draft tried to invoke some of the basic norms of the Charter, it failed to address the relevant circumstances and ignored the situation which had led to the ongoing international military action. In his opinion, the political jargon of "flagrant violation" of the Charter described that action could not disguise the lack of a convincing argument.⁸²

The representative of the Netherlands, recalled that resolution 1203 (1998) clearly stated that the Council was acting under Chapter VII of the Charter and demanded the full and prompt implementation by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, of the agreements signed between that country and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) and NATO respectively. He noted that the NATO action emanated directly from that resolution, in conjunction with the non-compliance on the part of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. Hence, he maintained that his delegation could not allow the NATO action to be described as unilateral use of force and emphasized that if the Council should demand an immediate cessation of the NATO action, it would send the wrong signal to the President of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, leading to further bloodshed in Kosovo.⁸³

The representative of Ukraine stated that adhering to the norms and principles enshrined in the Charter, his country considered as inadmissible the use of military force against a sovereign State without the authorization of the Council. At the same time, he held that Belgrade's refusal to sign agreements elaborated through the mediation of the Contact Group had resulted in the breakdown of the negotiating process and that therefore the provisions of resolutions 1160 (1998) and 1199 (1999) had not been fully implemented, which had led to the use of force.⁸⁴

On the other hand, the representative of the Russian Federation argued that the aggressive military action unleashed by NATO against a sovereign State without the authorization, and in circumvention, of the Council was a real threat to international peace and security and a gross violation of the Charter, in particular, Article 2 (4) which required all Members of the United Nations to refrain from the threat or use of force in their international relations, including against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State. He continued to argue that the draft resolution proposed a solution that should be urgently sought by the international community if it was indeed interested in "preventing unilateral approaches and the prevalence of force in world affairs".⁸⁵

The representative of Belarus stressed that it was scarcely possible to accept the arguments put forward by NATO about the alliance resolving the humanitarian crisis in Kosovo through the use of force. He underscored that the decision to use force, an extreme measure, might be made only by the Council taking into account the views of Member States. He condemned the violation of basic principles of international law that made no provision for military intervention for humanitarian purposes and observed that the consequences of those actions could not be predicted, and that they threatened to undermine the United Nations system and international relations as a whole. He reaffirmed the position that the settlement of the Kosovo conflict should be based on, inter alia, unconditional respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the non-use of force.⁸⁶

At the 4011th meeting, on 10 June 1999, the Council adopted resolution 1244 (1999), by which reaffirming the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the other States of the region, and acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, inter alia, authorized Member States and relevant international organizations to establish an international security presence in Kosovo,⁸⁷ with substantial NATO participation. By the same resolution, the Council also authorized the Secretary-General to establish an international civil presence in Kosovo, to be known as the United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK).⁸⁸

Speaking before the vote, Mr. Vladislav Jovanovic reiterated the position of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia concerning the "unilateral, unauthorized military action by NATO" against his country, which violated all the basic principles of the Charter, including the principle of non-intervention and non-interference in internal affairs. He further held that the draft resolution⁸⁹ was another attempt to "marginalize the world Organization aimed at legalizing post festum" the aggression against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. In doing so, the Council and the international community would become "accomplices" in the most drastic violation of the basic principles of the Charter and in legalizing the rule of force rather than the rule of international law. He underscored that by adopting the draft resolution, the Council would support a "nefarious theory of limited sovereignty and open floodgates to the unimpeded intervention and interference of the mighty and powerful in the internal affairs of other States".⁹⁰

The representative of China emphasized that ethnic problems within a State must not be used as an excuse for external intervention, much less used by foreign States as an excuse for the use of force. He reminded that respect for sovereignty and non-interference in each other's internal affairs were basic principles of the Charter.⁹¹

The representative of Costa Rica reiterated that with the limited exception of the right to legitimate defence, any option involving the use of force required the clear authorization of the Council in each specific case. He reminded the Council that all States and in particular the members of the Council, were obliged to ensure full respect for the machinery established by the Charter and the balance of principles included therein, which included non-intervention and respect for the territorial integrity of States.⁹²

The representative of Cuba considered that the adoption of resolution 1244 (1999) did not change the fact that it had been an "invasion" by the United States and NATO. He further argued that the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, while being "solemnly and hypocritically proclaimed", were violated and held that such a proclamation could not "conceal the disintegration by force of a sovereign State". Regretting that the United States was the only country benefiting from unipolarism and the weakening of the United Nations, he opined that the only alternative was, among others, to restore respect for and implementation of the Charter, preserve the principles of non-intervention, non-aggression, non-use of force or threats of force and respect for sovereignty.⁹³

The situation concerning the Democratic Republic of the Congo

At the 3987th meeting, on 19 March 1999, the representative of the Democratic Republic of the Congo repeatedly appealed to the Security Council to act concerning the situation in his country that was "under occupation of the regular armed forces" of the neighbouring countries, Uganda and Rwanda.⁹⁴ A number of speakers referred to not only internal but also external factors involved in the situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo.⁹⁵ Many advocated the withdrawal of foreign troops from the Democratic Republic of the Congo as a critical element for the settlement of the dispute.⁹⁶ The representative of the Sudan held that the Council was expected to fulfil its obligations and responsibilities for the maintenance of peace and security by putting an end to the aggression committed against the Democratic Republic of the Congo and ensuring the withdrawal of invading forces that had violated the sovereignty of that State.⁹⁷

The representative of Rwanda argued that the presence in the Democratic Republic of the Congo of large numbers of armed elements of Rwandan nationality, including former Government forces and militia responsible for the genocide of 1994, and their ability to reorganize and rearm on the territory of the Congo with the support of the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, was a destabilizing factor for Rwanda. The Democratic Republic of the Congo, in accepting such presence, violated its own sovereignty as well as that of Rwanda. He stressed that the concerns of his country stemmed from acts of aggression against Rwanda by the Democratic Republic of the Congo. At the same time, he held that his Government was committed to respect for the territorial integrity and sovereignty of all countries, as enshrined in the Charters of the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity (OAU) and called on the Democratic Republic of the Congo to use its sovereign rights and take steps to dismantle the dozen non-State armies being used in aggression against the territorial integrity of its neighbours.⁹⁸

Similarly arguing the linkage between the genocide in Rwanda in 1994 and the crisis in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the representative of Uganda stated that attacks had been launched against Uganda from what was then Zaire, often by genocidaires who had reorganized and rearmed with the support of the Government of Zaire. He stated that his Government had decided to act in self-defence by first recapturing the territory those criminals had captured, following them into Zairian territory in hot pursuit. He further stated that it was that act of self-defence against the then Government of Zaire that had resulted in the fall of President Mobutu and the rise to power of President Kabila. He also added that President Kabila had invited the Government of Uganda to deploy its Defence Forces inside the Congo to flush out the Allied Democratic Forces, a rebel group that had been infiltrated into Zaire by the Sudan and which had attacked Uganda. A protocol to that effect was signed between the two Governments in April 1998. Following the deployment of the two battalions from Uganda, a rebellion had broken out in August 1998 and President Kabila had looked for foreign military assistance from Zimbabwe, Angola and Namibia, which had decided on a unilateral military intervention, instead of waiting for a regional, concerted approach. In his opinion, while Uganda had been primarily concerned about the activities of the Ugandan rebel groups in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the intervention by Zimbabwe, Angola, Namibia, and later, Chad and the Sudan, had introduced a new dimension to the conflict. He stressed that Uganda and Rwanda had acted in self-defence, as the external dimension in the Congolese conflict had been prompted by activities hostile to those countries emanating from the Congo.⁹⁹

The representative of Namibia explained that the South African Development Community (SADC) had a stated obligation to ensure that the legitimate Government of a fellow SADC member should not be removed by invasion. By adhering to that principle and respecting the inviolability of the territorial integrity and sovereignty of States, he held that Namibia, along with Angola and Zimbabwe, was compelled to intervene in the Democratic Republic of the Congo at the expressed invitation of that Government, with the sole purpose of preventing the collapse of the State machinery and the violation of the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Democratic Republic of the Congo. He further argued that there needed to be a clear distinction between invited and uninvited foreign troops in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, which was echoed by the representative of Brazil.¹⁰⁰ He also underscored that while the security concerns of any State were legitimate, a State should refrain from defining such security needs beyond its own borders without working within the framework of the United Nations and OAU. The unprovoked invasion of the Congo and the violation of its sovereignty and territorial integrity constituted “an act of interference in the internal affairs” of that country.¹⁰¹

The representative of Zimbabwe dismissed the security thesis in the argument put forward by Uganda and Rwanda and maintained that his country, together with Angola, Namibia and Chad, responding to a distress call by the legitimate Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, was assisting that country to uphold its territorial integrity and national sovereignty. He expressed the view that the intervention of the allied forces of SADC was upheld by the inherent right to individual or collective self-defence, in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter. He made it clear that the allied forces had no ulterior motives at all and that they were ready to pull out their forces when conditions were met, including when a ceasefire had taken effect and the invading States had withdrawn their forces from the Democratic Republic of the Congo. The representative further argued that all countries had a right to have their boundaries respected. Therefore, he called for the unconditional withdrawal of the invading forces from the Democratic Republic of the Congo and appealed to the Council to assist in the preservation of the national sovereignty and territorial integrity of that State.¹⁰²

In response, the representative of the Democratic Republic of the Congo contended that the origins of the conflict in his country were the export of external conflicts from “aggressor countries” and that “contrarily” to the excuses offered by them, their aggression pre-dated the intervention of the allied forces, implemented at the formal request of his Government, in the context of the legitimate right of self-defence. He further appealed to the Council, given that border insecurity was cited by those aggressors as a pretext, to take the steps necessary to re-establish the territorial integrity of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and security in that region.¹⁰³

Many speakers reiterated the importance of adhering to the principles enshrined in the Charter, in particular non-interference in the domestic affairs of other States and respect for the territorial integrity of the Democratic Republic of the Congo,¹⁰⁴ with some speakers citing the presidential statement of 11 December 1998.¹⁰⁵ The representative of Argentina underlined that use of force did not bring territorial rights or legitimize changes in established border.¹⁰⁶ The representative of Gabon underlined that in the Great Lakes region, where cross-border populations played an important role and could be used as a pretext by one State or another to interfere inappropriately in the affairs of its neighbours, strict respect by all sides of the principle of non-interference would enable the creation of a climate of mutual confidence and promote sounder and more friendly relations.¹⁰⁷

The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

By identical letters dated 2 July 1998 addressed to the Secretary-General and the President, the representative of Iraq stated that the armed forces of the United States and the United Kingdom continued to carry out acts of aggression against the integrity of the territory and airspace of Iraq, in flagrant violation of the provisions of the Charter and the principles of international law. He stressed that the imposition of the “no-fly zones” over northern and southern Iraq, which was the result of a unilateral decision taken by the United States and which was not authorized by the Security Council, constituted a violation of the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Iraq. He further asserted that the reliance of the United States and the United Kingdom on resolution 688 (1991) to justify imposition of the “no-fly zones” contradicted the provisions of that resolution, including its reaffirmation of the commitment of all Member States to respect the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Iraq. Therefore, the Government of Iraq demanded that the Council take resolute action to put a stop to those acts of military aggression, which constituted a threat to the sovereignty, national security and territorial integrity of Iraq and which threatened international peace and security in the area. Arguing that the United States bore full responsibility for that aggression, the representative further stated that his Government, in accordance with international law, reserved the legitimate right to define an appropriate response to those acts of military aggression and violations of the territory and airspace of Iraq.¹⁰⁸

At the 4008th meeting, on 21 May 1999, the representative of the Russian Federation condemned the continuing aerial bombing of civilian and military facilities in Iraq by the United States and the United Kingdom, carried out “under the illegal pretext of the no-fly zones”, which were created “unilaterally, in circumvention of the Security Council”,¹⁰⁹ Similarly, strongly opposing the bombing of civilian targets in the so-called “no-fly zones”, the representative of China demanded that the United States and the United Kingdom immediately halt their bombing missions.¹¹⁰

In response, concerning the activity in the “no-fly zones”, the representative of the United Kingdom held that a simple way to reduce the tension was for Iraq to cease targeting coalition aircraft. He maintained that the operations of his country were purely reactive and targeted relevant military facilities only. He added that the “no-fly zones” were necessary in order to limit the capacity of Iraq to oppress its own people and to monitor its compliance with its obligations under resolution 688 (1991).¹¹¹ The representative of the United States associated his country with the statement by the representative of the United Kingdom regarding the rationale for the military action in the “no-fly zones”.¹¹²

At the 4084th meeting, on 17 December 1997, the representative of the Russian Federation maintained that the Council had never authorized the “no-fly zones”, nor had it authorized subversive acts against the Government of Iraq. He opined that such illegal unilateral actions needed to end if new approaches

The representative of China maintained that the use of force or any other means could not substitute for the role of the Council in the maintenance of international peace and security and reiterated that the “no-fly zone” in Iraq had never been authorized or approved by the Council, and that members concerned needed to immediately cease such actions.¹¹⁴

The situation in the Middle East

By a letter dated 13 April 1996 to the President, the representative of Lebanon requested the convening of an urgent meeting of the Council to consider the grave situation in Lebanon resulting from the large-scale Israeli bombardment in his country, including the southern suburb of Beirut. The representative held that the bombardment constituted a flagrant violation of the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Lebanon and the Charter, and posed a threat to international peace and security.¹¹⁵

At the 3653rd meeting, held on 15 April 1996, the representative of Lebanon reiterated the appeal of his Government to the Council to take action to stop the military aggression by Israel against Lebanon and its territorial integrity, independence and sovereignty. He stressed that while Lebanon condemned all forms of terrorism, it supported the legitimate right of peoples to resist foreign occupation, which was the situation in south Lebanon. Hence, he maintained that the Lebanese were within their legitimate rights in defending themselves against occupation. Recalling the provisions of resolution 425 (1978) by which the Council called for strict respect for the territorial integrity, sovereignty and political independence of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries and called upon Israel immediately to cease military action and withdraw forthwith its forces from all Lebanese territory, he held that no peace could be achieved between Lebanon and Israel until, among others, Israel withdrew from south Lebanon, in implementation of resolution 425 (1978). He appealed to the Council to condemn Israeli aggression and to force Israel to withdraw to the internationally recognized boundaries of Lebanon.¹¹⁶

The representative of Israel, for his part, maintained that his country had the primary obligation to protect the security of its citizens from Hizbullah activities which the Government of Lebanon did not have the ability or the will to control. Therefore, he stated that Israel must defend the security of its north by all necessary means. At the same time, he held that his country had no territorial claim on Lebanon and no intention of entering into battles with either the Syrian or the Lebanese armies. He argued that no country would allow its citizens to be attacked and killed by terrorists and would refrain from exercising the right of self-defence.¹¹⁷

The representative of the United States asserted that Hizbullah attacks into northern Israel had compelled the Government of Israel to take steps it deemed necessary to protect its people from direct threats emanating from Lebanese territory, which, in her opinion, were “actions of self-defence” in response to Hizbullah violence. She emphasized that her country was committed to using its influence to help ensure the right of nations to live within secure, internationally recognized borders and to the sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Lebanon.¹¹⁸

Many speakers at the meeting reiterated that the infringement of the principles of sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Lebanon was inadmissible¹¹⁹ and considered the attacks on Lebanon by Israel as a violation of the Charter.¹²⁰ Some demanded that Israel cease its military action and withdraw all reinforcements and asked the Council to take action in that regard.¹²¹ In that context, some also referred to resolution 425 (1978), highlighting the relevant provisions.¹²²

Several speakers argued that Israel had invaded Lebanon and attacked its sovereignty and territorial integrity and continued occupying part of southern Lebanon on the pretext of ensuring the security of northern Israel.¹²³ The representative of Egypt added that any armed aggression against a neighbouring State, whatever the motive, constituted prohibited aggression. He further pointed out that self-defence could be invoked under Article 51 of the Charter, when an actual armed attack had occurred, and that in the case of Katyusha rockets fired across the border, which was a proscribed act and should be ceased forthwith, the mechanisms provided for in the armistice agreement between Lebanon and Israel should have been invoked to deal with the issue.¹²⁴

Other speakers underscored that while self-defence itself was legitimate, measures of self-defence should abide by the basic rule of law prescribing proportionality.¹²⁵

Some appealed to all parties involved to exercise restraint so as to safeguard peace and stability in the region.¹²⁶ In that connection, the representative of China urged all sides to eschew force or the threat of force.¹²⁷

At the 3654th meeting, on 18 April 1996, the Council voted on two draft resolutions.¹²⁸ The draft resolution submitted by the Arab Group was not adopted because it did not obtain the required majority. By that draft resolution, the Council would have, inter alia, called upon Israel immediately to cease its military action against the Lebanese territorial integrity and withdraw forthwith its forces from all Lebanese territory and called for strict respect for the territorial integrity, sovereignty and political independence of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries.¹²⁹

By resolution 1052 (1996), adopted at the meeting, the Council, inter alia, called for an immediate cessation of hostilities by all parties and reaffirmed its commitment to the territorial integrity, sovereignty and political independence of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries and to the security of all States in the region, and called upon all concerned fully to respect those principles.¹³⁰

A number of speakers regretted that the draft resolution submitted by the Arab Group had not been adopted.¹³¹ In that connection, the representative of Egypt wished that resolution 1052 (1996) included a clear condemnation of Israel and covered the entire scope of the Israeli aggression against Lebanon.¹³²

On the other hand, several speakers stated their support for the provisions of resolution 1052 (1996). In this statement, the representative of Israel noted that the Prime Minister of his country had accepted a United States initiative to reach a ceasefire and hoped that a ceasefire would be achieved without delay. He further stated that such a move would put an end to the situation which had forced Israel to retaliate and to use its right of self-defence against those who had attacked innocent civilians in northern Israel.¹³³

The situation in Afghanistan

At the 4039th meeting, on 27 August 1999, the Under-Secretary-General for Political Affairs, in his briefing, stated that the unabated involvement of neighbouring and other countries in the Afghan conflict not only continued to fuel the fighting inside the country but also appeared to call into question the practical significance of the various declarations agreed upon by the members of the “six plus two” group, which included all of the neighbouring States of Afghanistan.¹³⁴

The representative of Afghanistan referred to the “long-standing bitter reality of Pakistani intervention in Afghanistan” and drew attention of the Council to the need to address the Pakistani aggression in Afghanistan and the implications of the Pakistani-Taliban agenda. In that context, explicitly citing Article 2 (4) of the Charter, the representative held that all Member States should refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State and stated that the “Pakistani intervention in Afghanistan” ran counter to “this transparent and unambiguous disposition of the United Nations Charter”. He argued that Pakistan had continuously committed acts against the sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity of Afghanistan, naming Pakistan as a State-sponsored terrorist country, and held that the Inter-Services Intelligence of Pakistan had been recruiting and training mercenaries from abroad and internally to achieve its hegemonic purposes in South and Central Asia, all of which were, in his opinion, in defiance of relevant resolutions of the Security Council.¹³⁵

Several speakers expressed concern about external interference in the internal affairs of Afghanistan.¹³⁶ In that regard, the representative of the Russian Federation pointed out the direct participation in combat, on the Taliban side, of fighters from Pakistan and other countries and called on Pakistan to take immediate measures to prevent its territory from being used to provide military support to the Taliban. He added that it would be in line with the commitment made by Pakistan as a member of the “six plus two” group, in accordance with the Tashkent Declaration on Fundamental Principles for a Peaceful Settlement of the Conflict in Afghanistan.¹³⁷ A number of speakers appealed to States, especially those bordering on Afghanistan, immediately to cease the provision of military assistance to the various factions in Afghanistan.¹³⁸ Similarly, the representative of Canada held that all countries should refrain from providing financial or material support to the warring factions in Afghanistan.¹³⁹ The representative of Malaysia observed that by pursuing a policy of non-interference, there would be prospects of a durable peace in Afghanistan and regretted that despite the pronouncements in the Tashkent Declaration of the “six plus two” group not to provide military support to any Afghan party and to prevent the use of their territories for such purpose, the reality was the infusion of massive war material to fuel the Afghan conflict, with the involvement of external actors.¹⁴⁰

The representative of Pakistan, for his part, expressed the view that a peaceful and stable Afghanistan with its unity, territorial integrity and sovereignty fully intact was in the highest national interest of his country. He noted that Afghan history was witness to the fact that external solutions could not be imposed on Afghanistan and that his country had no desire to interfere in the internal affairs of Afghanistan. He further held that Pakistan did not lend any support to any side in Afghanistan and that in order to promote an intra-Afghan dialogue, it was imperative that all outside interference in Afghanistan cease, adding that the most glaring aspect of such interference was the supply of military equipment. As to the allegation of the involvement of Pakistani nationals in the fighting in Afghanistan, the representative rejected such an allegation as “false and malicious” and contended that because of a porous border between Pakistan and Afghanistan, it was possible and likely that young Afghan refugees might have returned to Afghanistan and participated in the fighting.¹⁴¹

C. Article 2, paragraph 5

Article 2, paragraph 5

All Members shall give the United Nations every assistance in any action it takes in accordance with the present Charter, and shall refrain from giving assistance to any state against which the United Nations is taking preventive or enforcement actions.

Note

During the period under review, there were no explicit references to Article 2 (5) in the decisions or deliberations of the Security Council. However, the Council did adopt several resolutions and issued a number of presidential statements which might have an implicit bearing on the principle enshrined in Article 2 (5). The examples of calls for assistance relating to peacekeeping operations, other subsidiary bodies, mandatory measures within the framework of Article 41 of the Charter, multinational forces and other calls for assistance, as provided below, can be considered representative of the practice of the Council during the period under review concerning the principle enshrined in Article 2 (5).

Assistance relating to peacekeeping missions

In a number of decisions of the Council, Member States were called upon to provide assistance to peacekeeping missions, including provision of troops and material support.¹⁴²

For example, on a number of occasions in connection with the situation in Haiti, the Council requested all States or Member States to provide appropriate support for the actions undertaken by the United Nations and by Member States in order to carry out the provisions of the mandate of the United Nations Support Mission in Haiti (UNSMIH),¹⁴³ the United Nations Transition Mission in Haiti (UNTMIH),¹⁴⁴ and the United Nations Civilian Police Mission in Haiti (MIPONUH).¹⁴⁵ In connection with the situation in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, the Council called upon Member States to consider favourably requests by the Secretary-General for necessary assistance to the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force (UNPREDEP) in the performance of its mandate.¹⁴⁶ In connection with the situation in the Central African Republic, the Council urged Member States to respond positively to the request made by the Secretary-General to contribute personnel, equipment and other resources to the United Nations Mission in the Central African Republic (MINURCA) in order to facilitate its early deployment.¹⁴⁷ In connection with the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Council, by resolution 1103 (1997),¹⁴⁸ urged Member States to provide qualified police monitors and other forms of assistance and support to the International Police Task Force (IPTF) and in support of the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia-Herzegovina.¹⁴⁹

Assistance relating to investigative bodies

In some cases, the Council called on Member States to provide support to investigative bodies, including commissions of inquiry, investigation commissions and others. For example, by resolution 1053 (1996) concerning the situation in Rwanda, the Council called upon States to make available to the International Commission of Inquiry established pursuant to resolution 1013 (1995)¹⁵⁰ the results of their investigations, and to cooperate with the Commission by providing, inter alia, access to airfields and witnesses.¹⁵¹

Assistance relating to measures imposed within the framework of Article 41 of the Charter

During the period under review, implicit references were frequently made in decisions of the Council in connection with the measures imposed by the Council under Article 41 of the Charter.¹⁵² In a number of instances, the Council called on States to take action, or otherwise strengthen their efforts in support of sanctions or other measures that had been imposed by the Council.¹⁵³

For example, by resolution 1053 (1996) of 23 April 1996, in connection with the situation in Rwanda, the Council urged all States, in particular those in the region, to intensify their efforts to prevent military training and the sale or supply of weapons to militia groups or former Rwandan government forces, and to take the steps necessary to ensure the effective implementation of the arms embargo imposed under resolutions 918 (1994), 997 (1995) and 1011 (1995), including by creation of all necessary national mechanisms for implementation.¹⁵⁴ The same resolution called upon States to investigate alleged violations by their officials or private citizens of the arms embargo.¹⁵⁵

During the period under review, the Council also called for Member States to give assistance to its subsidiary bodies, particularly sanctions committees, and other international organizations in conjunction with measures imposed under Article 41. For example, in connection with the situation in Angola, the Council, by resolution 1127 (1997) of 28 August 1997, requested Member States having information on flights prohibited in paragraph 4 (d) of the same resolution to provide that information to the Committee created pursuant to resolution 864 (1993).¹⁵⁶ In the same resolution, the Council requested Member States to provide information to the Committee on the measures that they had adopted in order to implement the prohibitions in paragraph 4 of the resolution.¹⁵⁷ In another instance, with regard to the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, the Council, by resolution 1051 (1996) of 27 March 1996, called upon all States and international organizations to cooperate fully with the Committee established under resolution 661 (1990), the Special Commission and the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency in the fulfilment of their tasks in connection with the export/import monitoring mechanism, including supplying such information as may be sought by them in implementation of the mechanism,¹⁵⁸ and by resolution 1284 (1999) of 17 December 1999, the Council requested Member States to give full cooperation to the United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency in the discharge of their mandates.¹⁵⁹

Assistance relating to multinational forces authorized by the Security Council

In a number of cases, the Council called on States to provide assistance to multinational forces that had been authorized by the Council. For example, in connection with the situation in the Great Lakes region, by resolution 1080 (1996) of 15 November 1996, which authorized the establishment of a temporary multinational force in eastern Zaire, the Council called upon all concerned in the region to cooperate fully with the multinational force and humanitarian agencies and to ensure the security and freedom of movement of their personnel.¹⁶⁰ Similarly, in connection with the situation in East Timor, the Council called upon Member States to make further contributions of personnel, equipment and other resources to the multinational force in East Timor authorized by resolution 1264 (1999).¹⁶¹

Other calls for assistance

The Council also called on Member States during this period to provide assistance to the efforts of the United Nations, humanitarian or otherwise, often within a broader context of post-conflict development in countries.

D. Article 2, paragraph 6

Article 2, paragraph 6

The Organization shall ensure that states which are not Members of the United Nations act in accordance with these Principles so far as may be necessary for the maintenance of international peace and security.

During the period under review, there were no explicit references to Article 2 (6) in the decisions or deliberations of the Security Council, nor did any constitutional discussions arise in connection with Article 2 (6). In one instance, the Council explicitly called upon States that were not members of the United Nations. In connection with the item entitled “Letter dated 9 January 1996 from the Permanent Representative of Ethiopia to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council concerning the extradition of the suspects wanted in the assassination attempt on the life of the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, on 26 June 1995”,¹⁶³ the Council, by resolution 1054 (1996), called upon “all States, including States not members of the United Nations”, to act strictly in conformity with the resolution, notwithstanding the existence of any rights granted or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or of any contract entered into or any licence or permit granted prior to the entry into force of the provisions of the resolution.¹⁶⁴ In general, the Security Council in its decisions tended to refer to “all States” or simply to “States” when it made calls for States to take specific actions.¹⁶⁵

Nothing contained in the present Charter shall authorize the United Nations to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state or shall require the Members to submit such matters to settlement under the present Charter; but this principle shall not prejudice the application of enforcement measures under Chapter VII.

Note

During the period under review, there were no explicit references to Article 2 (7) contained in the decisions adopted by the Security Council.

In communications sent to the Council, there were two explicit references made to Article 2 (7), both in the context of the situation between Iraq and Kuwait. By identical letters dated 2 July 1998 addressed to the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council,¹⁶⁶ the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq stressed that the imposition of the no-fly zones represented a “flagrant act of aggression” against Iraq for a number of reasons. He argued that the reliance of the Government of the United States on resolution 688 (1991) as justification for the no-fly zones contradicted the provisions of that resolution, particularly the second preambular paragraph of the resolution that referred to Article 2 (7), which declared that the United Nations was not authorized to intervene in matters within the domestic jurisdiction of any State. He continued to state that the seventh preambular paragraph of resolution 688 (1991) also reaffirmed the commitment of all Member States to respect the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Iraq. By a letter dated 13 February 1999 addressed to the Secretary-General, the representative of Iraq maintained that silence on the part of the United Nations in the face of stepped-up violations of the airspace of Iraq by the United States and the United Kingdom for the purpose of enforcing the no-fly zones would constitute a dangerous precedent in international relations and would violate which include calls for action addressed to States, see also chapter XI, part VI entitled “Obligations of Member States under Article 48 of the Charter”.

the norms and covenants that governed such relations. In particular, it would violate the peremptory norm of international law requiring non-interference in the internal affairs of States, which was affirmed in Article 2 (7) and which did not allow even the United Nations itself to interfere in affairs that pertained to the core of the internal authority of States.¹⁶⁷

During the deliberations of the Council, there were several explicit references to Article 2 (7), while on other occasions the principle of the Charter provision regarding non-interference in domestic affairs was referred to. These are examined in the six case studies included below. Case 9 deals with the situation in Burundi, and cases 10 and 11 examine the response of the Council to the situation in Kosovo, Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, in connection with the letter dated 11 March 1998 from the Deputy Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council; the letter dated 27 March 1998 from the Permanent Representative of the United States of America to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council; and the letter dated 24 March 1999 from the Permanent Representative of the Russian Federation to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council, respectively.¹⁶⁸ Case 12 deals with the situation in Albania. The last two cases deal with the thematic debates on the protection of civilians in armed conflict (case 13) and the role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflicts (case 14).

The situation in Burundi

At the 3616th meeting, on 5 January 1996, the Security Council considered the letter dated 29 December 1995 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President on the developments in Burundi.¹⁶⁹ By that letter, the Secretary-General shared his deep concern about the persistence of violence and the further escalation of human rights violations in Burundi. As there was a real danger of the situation degenerating to the point where it might explode into ethnic violence on a massive scale, he suggested the maintenance in Zaire, subject to the agreement of the Government of Zaire, of a military presence capable of intervening rapidly in the event of a sudden deterioration of the situation in Burundi, a preventive measure that could help to avoid a repetition of the tragic events in Rwanda.¹⁷⁰

By a statement by the President issued at the same meeting, the Council noted the proposals referred to in the above-mentioned letter from the Secretary-General and stated that it would consider those and other proposals he might submit.¹⁷¹

By a letter dated 18 January 1996, the representative of Burundi responded to the Secretary-General's proposal for a rapid response force and stated that not only was the plan for an inter-position force inappropriate, even the "spectre" of a military deployment in Burundi was exacerbating the crisis.¹⁷²

At the 3623rd meeting, on 29 January 1996, the representative of Burundi, drawing attention to the reference in the letter of the Secretary-General of 16 January 1996¹⁷³ to a difference in opinion among Burundian officials on how best to approach the crisis, underlined that the official position of his Government was clear and that it unanimously rejected military intervention in Burundi. He stressed that to defuse the crisis in Burundi, it was important to stress the pre-eminence of judicious diplomacy over military intervention.¹⁷⁴

By resolution 1040 (1996) adopted at the same meeting, the Council requested the Secretary-General to consider what further steps of a preventive nature might be necessary in order to avoid the situation deteriorating further, to develop contingency plans as appropriate and to submit a report to the Council on the situation, including contingency planning.¹⁷⁵

On 15 February 1996, the Secretary-General submitted a report on Burundi,¹⁷⁶ in which he reiterated his conviction that an assertive approach involving contingency planning to avoid a catastrophe

if preventive diplomacy failed, including establishment of a multinational force for humanitarian intervention under Chapter VII of the Charter, would improve the chances of convincing the parties in Burundi to show more flexibility.

At the 3639th meeting, on 5 March 1996, the representative of Burundi noted that in his report, the Secretary-General had strongly advocated a multinational military force “designed to descend upon Burundi on the smallest pretext, like a vulture upon its prey”. Stressing that the army of Burundi was completely prepared to confront any expeditionary corps, regardless of its humanitarian or military label, he emphasized that there were reasons impelling his Government to militate not only against foreign troops but also against any reference to such a possibility. Among those, he highlighted that the Charter would be flagrantly violated, as Article 2 (7) prohibited the United Nations from interfering with the national sovereignty of its Member States. He argued that the multinational military force, which had been “given a humanitarian cloak to wear”, would be tantamount to an affront to the State of Burundi and that in the event that the catastrophe occurred, it would be up to the Government of Burundi and its army to decide when and if to ask for humanitarian assistance.¹⁷⁷

At the same meeting, several Council members expressed support for continued contingency planning for a robust response or humanitarian intervention in the event that the humanitarian situation deteriorated further and violence became widespread and uncontrollable.¹⁷⁸ In that regard, the representative of the United States stated that it was critical that the leaders of the various factions in Burundi not misunderstand the intentions and motives of the international community as it was not interested in any action that would undermine Burundi’s sovereignty. The goal was simply to encourage outcomes within Burundi that were consistent with internationally recognized principles of human rights, and with Burundi’s own legal and constitutional processes. Noting the concerns raised over even planning for the contingency that widespread violence might resume, she stressed that the Government of the United States nonetheless believed that such a step was essential. She also maintained that the contingency planning called for in the draft resolution¹⁷⁹ was precisely the type of exercise that had been envisioned when the United Nations had established its standby arrangement system.¹⁸⁰ The representative of Nigeria also expressed support for the Security Council maintaining a hands-on policy in Burundi, including contingency planning for possible humanitarian intervention. However, he stressed that any such efforts or preparations must respect the sovereignty of Burundi and the expressed wish of its Government. Any initiative that attempted to sidestep that condition would carry with it serious difficulties and could be counterproductive.¹⁸¹ The representative of China reaffirmed that the internal affairs of a country should be settled by the people of that country themselves. The international community could provide assistance, but it could not engage in interference in the name of assistance. He further stated that it was his Government’s understanding, with regard to the draft resolution, that no matter what kind of action the Security Council took in the future, including a humanitarian response, it needed to consult with the country concerned, obtain its consent and broadly canvass the view of all parties.¹⁸²

At that meeting, the Council adopted the draft resolution as resolution 1049 (1996), by which the Council, inter alia, recognizing the urgent need for preparations aimed at anticipating and preventing the escalation of the present crisis in Burundi, encouraged the Secretary-General to continue his consultations with the Member States concerned and the Organization of African Unity on contingency planning for a rapid humanitarian response in the event of widespread violence or a serious deterioration of the humanitarian situation in Burundi.¹⁸³

In his report of 15 August 1996, the Secretary-General informed the Council that regarding the proposed contingency force, few countries had offered troops and none had offered to lead a multinational force.¹⁸⁴

Case 10

*Letter dated 11 March 1998 from the Deputy Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council*¹⁸⁵

*Letter dated 27 March 1998 from the Permanent Representative of the United States of America to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council*¹⁸⁶

At its 3868th meeting, on 31 March 1998, the Council adopted resolution 1160 (1998),¹⁸⁷ by which it condemned the use of excessive force by Serbian police forces against civilians and peaceful demonstrators in Kosovo, as well as all acts of terrorism by the Kosovo Liberation Army or any other group or individual and all external support for terrorist activity in Kosovo, including finance, arms and training. Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Council decided that all States should, for the purposes of fostering peace and stability in Kosovo, prevent the sale or supply to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, including Kosovo, of arms and related materiel of all types.¹⁸⁸

At that meeting, the representative of Costa Rica stated that safeguarding human rights was not solely and exclusively a matter of the internal jurisdiction of States. In that connection, he believed that there were certain circumstances in which a violation of such fundamental rights was so serious that it constituted, in and of itself, a threat to international peace and security and therefore fully justified the Security Council invoking the powers granted to it under Chapter VII of the Charter.¹⁸⁹ The representative of Slovenia agreed that the situation in Kosovo had been giving rise to legitimate international concern for quite some time, and, thus, could no longer be described as an internal affair since it had already developed into a threat to international peace and security in the region.¹⁹⁰ The representative of the United Kingdom held that Belgrade could not pass off the repressive acts of recent weeks as purely internal matters, pointing out that human rights abuses were a matter for all and stressed that the tension in the region should be reduced before it caused instability in neighbouring countries.¹⁹¹ Similarly, the representative of the United States reiterated the position of the Contact Group¹⁹² that the situation in Kosovo was not simply an internal matter but also had a direct impact on regional stability.¹⁹³ Several other speakers stressed that the situation in Kosovo did constitute a threat to international peace and security and that the involvement of the Council was necessary.¹⁹⁴

The representative of Brazil stated that although the Charter enshrined the principle of non-intervention in matters which were essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any State, members of the Council were all aware that the principle did not prejudice the application of enforcement measures under Chapter VII, in accordance with Article 2 (7). He noted that in recent years, some observers had gone so far as to suggest that there might have been a tendency to frame emergencies under Chapter VII of the Charter so as to circumvent the principle of non-intervention, which would be a distortion of the waiver provided by Article 2 (7), incompatible with its original purpose.¹⁹⁵

Mr. Vladislav Jovanovic maintained, however, that Kosovo and Metohija was a Serbian province that had always been, and was, an integral part of the Republic of Serbia. He underscored that the meeting of the Security Council and the adoption of a resolution were not acceptable to the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, since questions that represented an internal matter for Serbia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia were at stake. His Government considered that the internal question could not be the subject of deliberation in any international forum without its consent and that such consent had not been granted. He noted that the pretext for the action by the Security Council had been found in two anti-terrorist police actions in Kosovo and Metohija, the autonomous province of Serbia and that there was not, nor had there been any armed conflict in Kosovo and Metohija. There was, therefore, no danger of a spillover, no threat to peace and security, and no basis for invoking Chapter VII of the Charter.¹⁹⁶ The representative of the Russian Federation reiterated that from the outset, his Government had viewed the recent events in Kosovo as the internal affair of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. Moreover, while the events in Kosovo had an adverse regional impact, the situation in Kosovo, despite its complexity, did not constitute a threat to regional, much less international, peace and security.¹⁹⁷ Similarly, the representative of China stressed that Kosovo was an integral part of the territory of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and therefore, the question of Kosovo was an internal matter of the Federal Republic. He emphasized that if the Council was to get involved in a dispute without a request from the country concerned, it might set a bad precedent and have wider negative implications.¹⁹⁸

*Letter dated 24 March 1999 from the Permanent Representative of the Russian Federation to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council*¹⁹⁹

By a letter dated 24 March 1999 to the President of the Security Council, the representative of the Russian Federation requested that an urgent meeting of the Security Council be convened to consider “an extremely dangerous situation” caused by the unilateral military action of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.²⁰⁰

At the 3988th meeting held on 24 March 1999 in response to the above-mentioned letter, Mr. Jovanovic maintained that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had not threatened any country or the peace and security of the region. It had been attacked because it sought to solve an internal problem and used its sovereign right to fight terrorism and prevent the secession of a part of its territory that had always belonged to Serbia and Yugoslavia.²⁰¹ The representative of India, agreeing that Kosovo was recognized as part of the sovereign territory of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, stressed that under the application of Article 2 (7), the United Nations had no role in the settlement of the domestic political problems. He stated that the only exception laid down by Article 2 (7) would be the “application of enforcement measures under Chapter VII”, and argued that the attacks had not been authorized by the Council, acting under Chapter VII, and were therefore illegal. Commenting on the suggestion that the attack would be called off if the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia accepted “NATO peacekeeping forces” on its territory, he stressed that this was also a violation of Article 2 (7) as a peacekeeping operation could be deployed only with the consent of the Government concerned.²⁰² The representative of China agreed that the question of Kosovo was an internal matter of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and emphasized that China opposed interference in the internal affairs of other States, under whatever pretext or in whatever form.²⁰³

The representative of the United States maintained that resolutions 1199 (1998) and 1203 (1998) had recognized that the situation in Kosovo constituted a threat to peace and security in the region and invoked Chapter VII of the Charter. Moreover, Belgrade had failed to comply with agreements and understandings with NATO and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe to verify its compliance with Security Council demands. The actions of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia also violated its commitments under the Helsinki Final Act, as well as its obligations under the international law of human rights. Therefore, Belgrade’s actions in Kosovo could not be dismissed as an internal matter.²⁰⁴ The representative of France added that the actions of NATO were a response to the violation by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia of its international obligations, which stemmed in particular from the Security Council resolutions adopted under Chapter VII.²⁰⁵ The representative of Slovenia expressed his delegation's expectation that the actions of NATO would be carried out strictly within the substantive parameters established by the relevant Council resolutions. He also agreed that, since the situation in Kosovo had been defined by the Council as a threat to international peace and security in the region, and thus not a matter which was essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of a State, Article 2 (7) of the Charter did not apply.²⁰⁶ The representative of the Netherlands, while agreeing that the Council should be involved in any decision to resort to the use of force, stressed that if "due to one or two permanent members' rigid interpretation of the concept of domestic jurisdiction", such a resolution was not attainable, they could not simply let a humanitarian catastrophe occur. He held that, in such a situation, they would act on the legal basis they had available and what was available in the case of Kosovo was "more than adequate".²⁰⁷

The situation in Albania

By a letter dated 28 March 1997 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁰⁸ the representative of Albania informed the Council that following the collapse of the pyramid investment schemes, massive unrest had swept entire regions of the country. The complete disorder and lack of security was bound to bring about another wave of tens of thousands of refugees, sailing and landing in neighbouring Italy and forcing the Government to also proclaim an emergency. As a result, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe had agreed to support the willingness of some Member States to participate with a military or a police force in the protection of humanitarian activities in Albania. The Government of Albania felt that such a force also had to have the necessary support and authorizations of the Security Council.

At the 3758th meeting, on 28 March 1997, speaking in regard to the proposed multinational protection force in Albania, the representative of China stressed that while his delegation was concerned by developments in Albania and supported the political and diplomatic efforts made by the international community, the situation was essentially an internal affair of Albania. He stated that for the Security Council to authorize action in a country because of strife resulting from the internal affairs of a country was inconsistent with the provisions of the Charter and therefore needed to be handled with extreme caution.²⁰⁹

At the same meeting, the Council adopted resolution 1101 (1997),²¹⁰ by which it welcomed the offer made by certain Member States to establish a temporary and limited multinational protection force to facilitate the safe and prompt delivery of humanitarian assistance. It authorized the Member States participating in the multinational protection force to conduct the operation in a neutral and impartial way and to help to create a secure environment for the missions of international organizations in Albania, including those providing humanitarian assistance, and, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, further authorized those Member States to ensure the security and freedom of movement of the personnel of the multinational protection force.²¹¹

The protection of civilians in armed conflict

At the 3977th meeting, on 12 February 1999, the representative of the Netherlands expressed the view that in the modern age, when most wars were internal conflicts, there was a need to find a solution to the problem of maintaining contact with both warring parties. He argued that it would not be possible to promote respect for humanitarian law, if establishing contact with the non-State party was not allowed in the case of an internal conflict between the State and a rebel movement or insurgency. The problem became even more intractable when the sovereign State was itself the terrorizing party. The representative disagreed with those who believed that even then Article 2 (7) of the Charter provided “the ultimate answer” and stressed that the Article should never be read in isolation. He maintained that the opening words of the Charter did not refer to sovereign States but to the peoples of the United Nations, and it was the peoples who were entitled to the protection being discussed. Therefore, nothing contained in the Charter authorized a State to terrorize its own citizens.²¹² The representative of Canada agreed that it was the obligation of States to ensure the protection of all citizens. In cases of weakened State structures or failed States, Council action to defend civilians in armed conflict would also diminish the threat to the States themselves. The responsibility of the Council to protect civilians was therefore compelling both in terms of fulfilling the Council’s own mandate and in the interest of enhancing State sovereignty. The reluctance to involve the Council, justified by some by the need to uphold State sovereignty, served only to undermine this very principle itself.²¹³

The representative of China countered that while the international community could not afford to turn away from humanitarian crises, the current tendency in international relations to politicize humanitarian issues and interfere in a country’s internal affairs under the guise of humanitarianism was a cause for concern.²¹⁴

At the 3980th meeting, on 22 February 1999, the representative of Egypt noted that as many current conflicts were taking place within rather than between States, it was necessary to determine the extent to which the United Nations could actually intervene to settle such conflicts. He held that the international community needed to preserve the fundamental characteristic of States’ sovereignty, which was the very foundation of contemporary international law. Sovereignty was also a key principle addressed in Article 2 (7) of the Charter, which defined the relationship between matters which were essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any State and the enforcement measures the Council might take when international peace and security were threatened.²¹⁵ The representative of Iraq maintained that any action taken in the context of the protection of civilians in armed conflict had to strictly observe Article 2 (7), as breaching that Article would “throw the door wide open” to intervention in the internal affairs of States.²¹⁶ The representative of Indonesia further noted that, as international law did not take precedence over national law, in the context of the rights of refugees and civilians in situations of armed conflict, a balance needed to be sought so as not to violate national sovereignty or the purposes and principles of the Charter.²¹⁷ The representative of India emphasized that, according to the Fourth Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, there was no automatic right of access to civilian populations affected by conflict, and to press for it would violate both international humanitarian law and the sovereignty of States.²¹⁸

In contrast, the representative of New Zealand welcomed the growing acceptance of the fact that the protection of individuals transcended the domestic affairs of States. He stressed that national sovereignty was not an absolute in the context of the protection of civilians in armed conflict.²¹⁹

At its 4046th meeting, on 17 September 1999, at which the Council considered the report of the Secretary-General dated 8 September 1999 on the protection of civilians in armed conflict,²²⁰ the representative of Egypt noted that the logic of the report was to give the Security Council a role beyond that currently mandated by the Charter. He observed that the legal framework for Council action was defined by respect for the purposes and principles of the Charter, including the non-use of force except in the implementation of Council resolutions adopted pursuant to Chapter VII. That meant that a conflict had to threaten or violate international peace or be deemed aggressive and that the Council should not intervene in the internal affairs of States pursuant to Article 2 (7). Regarding the report of the Secretary-General, he noted that it disregarded the principle of obtaining the agreement of States to preventive measures that might violate their sovereignty or reduce or affect their political unity or territorial integrity, and thus flouted the sacrosanct Charter principle of the sovereignty of

States.²²¹ The representative of India also expressed concerns that some of the recommendations in the report of the Secretary-General, including the recommendations that the Council urge neighbouring States to ensure access for humanitarian assistance and that it deploy international military observers to monitor the situation in camps for internally displaced persons and refugees when the presence of armed combatants and armed elements was suspected, would violate the principle of State sovereignty.²²²

Role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflicts

At the 4072nd meeting, on 30 November 1999, the representative of the Netherlands stated that positions were sometimes taken which stood in the way of effective Security Council action in the prevention of conflicts. He pointed out that everything the Charter said with regard to the prevention of armed conflict in Chapters VI and VII and in Article 99 appeared to have been drafted with conflicts between States in mind, while the overwhelming majority of conflicts on the Council's agenda were of an internal, domestic nature. Against that background, while all Council members subscribed to the purposes and principles in Chapter I of the Charter, including Article 2 (7), he argued that a rigid interpretation of Article 2 (7) would preclude adaptation to that reality and, in effect, make all the Charter provisions on the prevention of armed conflict ineffectual. He stressed that Article 2 (7) could not possibly be the alpha and omega of the Charter in the present day. He maintained that in the context of conflict prevention, the Council could not avoid addressing the internal situation of States wherever negative developments were apt to degenerate into large-scale atrocities and massive dislocation of civilians. That could not be rejected on grounds of domestic jurisdiction.²²³

Speaking in regard to the concept of "humanitarian intervention", the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya noted that it was not difficult to cite the problems in a given country in order to justify and provide cover for an intervention that had implicit and predetermined purposes that affected the interests of those who would intervene, and not the humanitarian situation of those affected. Giving an example that his country had lost half its population to gain independence, the representative held that Libyan Arab Jamahiriya was therefore not prepared to accept any resolution that would contravene Article 2 (7), conveying the right to intervene in the domestic affairs of any State, "even under the lofty pretext of humanitarian considerations".²²⁴

Several other speakers stressed the importance of the Council only acting with full respect for the sovereignty of States, their territorial integrity and political unity and in accordance with the principle of non-interference in the internal affairs of States.²²⁵

Consideration of the functions and powers of the Security Council (Articles 24 and 25 of the Charter)

A. Article 24

1. In order to ensure prompt and effective action by the United Nations, its Members confer on the Security Council primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, and agree that in carrying out its duties under this responsibility the Security Council acts on their behalf.

2. In discharging these duties the Security Council shall act in accordance with the Purposes and Principles of the United Nations. The specific powers granted to the Security Council for the discharge of these duties are laid down in Chapters VI, VII, VIII and XII.

3. *The Security Council shall submit annual and, when necessary, special reports to the General Assembly for its consideration.*¹

Note

During the period under review, none of the resolutions and presidential statements adopted by the Security Council contained an explicit reference to Article 24 of the Charter. A draft resolution contained an explicit reference to that Article,² but was not adopted as it did not obtain the required majority.³

Nevertheless, the Charter provision by which Members conferred on the Security Council the primary responsibility for the maintenance of peace and security was implicitly referred to in a number of resolutions and presidential statements. The majority of such decisions concerned thematic and cross-cutting issues. For instance, in connection with the role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflicts, a presidential statement of 30 November 1999 began with the provision that the Security Council had considered, “within its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security”, its role in the prevention of armed conflicts.⁴ In connection with the situation in Africa, by a presidential statement dated 16 September 1998, the Council, noting that it had the primary responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations for international peace and security, expressed its commitment to exercising that responsibility in relation to Africa.⁵ In other cases, the Council stressed, reaffirmed, recalled or bore in mind its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security.⁶

Furthermore, implicit references to the principle enshrined in Article 24 were also made in decisions of the Council dealing with such regional situations as Kosovo, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Iraq and Kuwait. In addition, Article 24 was explicitly referred to in connection with the list of matters of which the Council was seized.¹¹ In a note by the President dated 29 August 1996, which laid out the simplified procedure concerning the list of matters of which the Council was seized, the members of the Council recalled the Council's primary responsibility under Article 24 of the Charter for the maintenance of international peace and security as well as its own responsibility with regard to the implementation of its resolutions.¹²

The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

At the 3939th meeting, on 5 November 1998, the Council adopted resolution 1205 (1998), by which, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Council, inter alia, condemned the decision by Iraq of 31 October 1998 to cease its cooperation with the United Nations Special Commission as a flagrant violation of resolution 687 (1991) and other relevant resolutions, and demanded that Iraq rescind immediately and unconditionally that decision. Furthermore, in the final paragraph of resolution 1205 (1998), the Council decided, "in accordance with its primary responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security”, to remain actively seized of the matter.¹⁴

At the same meeting, several Council members stressed the importance of the last paragraph of the draft resolution¹⁵ subsequently adopted as resolution 1205 (1998). The representative of France held that the paragraph affirmed unambiguously the responsibilities and the prerogatives of the Council in the maintenance of international peace and security, responsibilities that included evaluating situations as and when necessary and making the appropriate conclusions.¹⁶ The representative of the Russian Federation pointed out that the draft resolution made it clear that the Council, in accordance with its primary responsibility under the Charter for the maintenance of peace and security, would remain actively seized of the situation.¹⁷ The representative of Sweden noted that a very important principle was reflected in the last paragraph. He further maintained that the Council’s primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security must not be circumvented and that the paragraph was an expression of the desire of members to safeguard such a responsibility.¹⁸ The representative of Brazil similarly expressed the view that the principle envisaged in the last paragraph should continue to guide the consideration of the matter.¹⁹

Case 16

Letter dated 24 March 1999 from the Permanent Representative of the Russian Federation to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council (S/1998/320)

At the 3989th meeting, on 26 March 1999, the Security Council had before it a draft resolution submitted by Belarus, India and the Russian Federation.²⁰ By that draft resolution, the Council would have recalled its primary responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security, and affirmed that unilateral use of force by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia without the authorization by the Council constituted a flagrant violation of the Charter, in particular Article 24, along with Articles 2 (4) and 53.

At the meeting, the representative of Slovenia, in opposing the draft resolution, touched upon the authority of the Council under the Charter. He held that the use of force by the Belgrade Government against the civilian population had created a situation that had made the current military action inevitable. While he would have preferred such military action to be fully authorized by the Council, it was not possible. Hence, he considered it critical in the current circumstances to be aware that the Council, according to the Charter, had the primary but not exclusive responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security. At such time, all the Council members had to think hard about what needed to be done to ensure the Council’s authority and to make its primary responsibility as real as the Charter required, he concluded.²¹

As a co-sponsor of the draft resolution, the representative of the Russian Federation expressed the view that the aggressive military action by NATO against a sovereign State without the authorization and in circumvention of the Security Council was, inter alia, a gross violation of the Charter, including Article 24, which entrusted the Council with the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security. He reminded the members of the Council that they bore a special responsibility not only to their peoples but also to all Members of the United Nations, upon which decisions of the Council were binding under the Charter. He continued to argue that the voting on the draft resolution was not just on the problem of Kosovo, but went directly to the authority of the Council in the eyes of the world.²² The representative of China also maintained that the military strikes against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia by NATO constituted a blatant violation of the principles of the Charter and of international law, as well as “a challenge to the authority of the Security Council”.²³

Mr. Vladislav Jovanović criticized the “aggression” by NATO countries and held that the “aggressor” displayed “arrogant contempt for the United Nations and its Charter” and arrogated the prerogatives of the Security Council as the only organ in charge of maintaining international peace and security. He stated that it was up to the Council to decide whether it would retain the responsibility that it bore under the Charter for the maintenance of international peace and security, or whether it would cede the responsibility to NATO.²⁴

The draft resolution was not adopted because it did not obtain the required majority.²⁵

Role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflicts

At the 4072nd meeting, on 29 November 1999, the representative of China, citing the report of the Secretary-General on the work of the Organization²⁶ submitted to the fifty-fourth session of the General Assembly, concurred with the Secretary-General’s view that if the primacy of the Security Council with respect to the maintenance of international peace and security was rejected, then the very foundations of international law as represented by the Charter would be brought into question and that conflict prevention, peacekeeping and peacemaking must not become an area of competition between the United Nations and regional organizations. The representative expressed the belief that any attempt to replace the Council in its leading role in conflict prevention was tantamount to replacing the Council in its primary role in maintaining peace and security. He further suggested that such an attempt would not only weaken the authority of the Council but also would end up severely damaging the effectiveness of conflict prevention measures, or might even lead to the outbreak or escalation of conflicts.²⁷

A few speakers explicitly cited Article 24 in their statements.²⁸ Among them, the representative of South Africa held that the Council’s considerable array of powers were conferred upon it by the Members of the United Nations, under Article 24 of the Charter. In conferring those powers, the Members expected that the Council’s approach in dealing with conflicts should at all times be informed by the universally applicable norms espoused by the Charter. He further held that in order to be truly empowered by the membership to act consistently in defence of the ideals expressed within the Charter, and in order to be able to pursue its mandate of preventing armed conflict effectively and consistently, the Council must be perceived to be legitimate in both form and function, and therefore the powers, composition and functioning of the Security Council must be made more representative.²⁹ The representative of Iraq also called for a comprehensive reform of the Security Council, including the Council’s decision-making process which should, in his opinion, fully respect the purposes and principles of the Charter in accordance with Article 24 (2).³⁰

At the same meeting, other speakers shared their views on the role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflict with respect to other principal organs of the Council. The representative of Namibia observed that while the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security rested with the Council, the prevention of conflict and its recurrence required a multifaceted approach by the Security Council and other principal organs. Given that the causes of armed conflict in Africa remained poverty and underdevelopment, he argued that as the Council considered its role in the prevention of armed conflict to be within its primary responsibility, the principles and provisions of the Charter must be adhered to.³¹

The representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya noted that the Charter entrusted the maintenance of international peace and security to both the General Assembly and the Security Council. He cited Article 11 (1) according to which the General Assembly might consider the general principles of cooperation in the maintenance of international peace and security and might make recommendations with regard to such principles to its Members, the Security Council or to both. He further explained that under Article 24 of the Charter, Members of the United Nations had entrusted the Council with the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security and that Member States agreed that the Council, in carrying out its duties under that responsibility, acted on their behalf. He continued that, in discharging those duties, the Council should act in accordance with the purposes and principles of the Organization and the powers vested in the Council. He believed therefore that the mandate for the maintenance of international peace and security was a joint responsibility of the General Assembly and the Council, not an exclusive function of the Council.³²

The representative of Egypt argued that while Article 1 of the Charter charged the United Nations with preventing conflicts, the Charter required the involvement of all principal organs of the United Nations and detailed the role of those organs and conveyed upon each its own competence to combat the causes of armed conflict, be they economic, social, cultural or humanitarian. He stressed that the Council should, therefore, deal with the issue in the context of full respect for the delicate system of checks and balances between the principal organs of the United Nations as established in the Charter, particularly the General Assembly. The representative concluded that the issue of the prevention of armed conflict should be included in the agendas of the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council so that more detailed and comprehensive discussions in those forums could complement the initiative of the Security Council.³³

The representative of Bangladesh, reaffirming the primary responsibility of the Council for the maintenance of international peace and security, noted that the Council's primary responsibility should be seen within the broad framework of the principles and purposes of the United Nations, in which specific roles were assigned to each of the principal organs with their contributions converging towards the progress of mankind in a world of peace.³⁴

³³ S/PV.4072 (Resumption 1), pp. 2-5.

³⁴ Ibid., p. 12-13.

At the 4046th meeting, on 16 September 1999, the Council held a debate on the report of the Secretary-General on the protection of civilians in armed conflict.³⁵ The representative of Slovenia stated that the report was a useful reminder of the basic role of the Council in situations which generated humanitarian problems. He argued that the Council, with the primary responsibility for international peace and security under the Charter, had the task of preventing military conflicts and if they occurred, to make a meaningful contribution towards their resolution. After the end of military conflicts, the Council had a responsibility to enable transition to post-conflict peacebuilding. He pointed out that the Council must avoid the trap of using humanitarian action as a substitute for the necessary political or military action, bearing in mind the primacy of those essential political purposes of the Council.³⁶

The representative of China, reaffirming the primary responsibility of the Council for international peace and security, stated that the Council had an unshirkable duty in the area of the protection of civilians in armed conflict. Strongly opposing military actions in circumvention of the Council that might result in conflict on an even larger scale, he expressed the belief that the Council should continue its active efforts to put an early end to conflicts and defusing crises, for that was the contribution it should make to the protection of civilians in armed conflict. He further cautioned that if the Council were to become overly involved in issues, such as human rights, which fell under the purview of other United Nations bodies, its attention to peace and security issues would be diverted and the work of the other United Nations bodies unduly affected.³⁷

The representative of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia commended the Council for its involvement in the protection of civilians in armed conflict and noted that it was of paramount importance that the permanent members of the Council had agreed with that course of action, which meant that they would be guided by Article 24 (1) of the Charter. He urged the Council to be resolute, inventive and innovative and to act under Article 24 (1) on behalf of the Member States, and cautioned the members of the Council not to act on their own behalf.³⁸

³⁶ S/PV.4046, pp. 9-10.

³⁷ Ibid., p. 21.

The representative of Egypt, expressing his view on the question of the mandate and responsibility of the Council, stated that Article 24 of the Charter defined the role of the Council in the maintenance of peace and security and that, in carrying out that task, the Council was duty-bound to respect the purposes and principles of the Charter. He underscored that the mandate of the Council was to decide whether the continuation of a conflict might threaten international peace and security and to submit a report in that connection containing recommendations on ways to resolve the conflict pursuant to Chapter VI. The Council might also act pursuant to the Charter within the framework of Chapter VII if peace was threatened or violated or incidents constituted aggression pursuant to Article 39. He argued that the Council's role was thus to act to ensure peace in a practical manner, whereas the role of the General Assembly was legislative, to consider all issues pertaining to peace and the general principles of cooperation to alleviate human suffering, including protection of civilians in armed conflict. On that basis, he expressed the hope that the Council was able to address the subject of civil protection of civilians in armed conflict within the framework defined by the Charter, while respecting the purviews of other bodies of the United Nations responsible for the protection of civilians, especially the General Assembly.³⁹

The representative of India recalled that Article 24 set out the functions and powers of the Council and, in particular, paragraph 2 of that Article noted that the specific powers granted to the Council were laid down in Chapters VI, VII, VIII and XII. He observed that in each chapter the Council's powers were narrowly defined by the Charter. On that basis, he considered it odd that the bulk of recommendations in the report of the Secretary-General invited the Council to take actions in areas "not within its competence".⁴⁰

At the same meeting, the representative of Iraq urged the Council to integrate views of non-members of the Council into the Council's programme of work in accordance with its functions, as contained in Article 24 of the Charter, under which it was to act as a representative of the States Members of the United Nations in the fulfilment of its duties, thereby complementing the work of the General Assembly, the Economic and Social Council, United Nations agencies and the international community in general.⁴¹

B. Article 25

Article 25

The Members of the United Nations agree to accept and carry out the decisions of the Security Council in accordance with the present Charter.

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council did not adopt any decisions that explicitly invoked Article 25 of the Charter. However, the principle enshrined in Article 25 was referred to, without being invoked explicitly, in a large number of resolutions and presidential statements. In particular, the binding nature of Council decisions, within the context of Article 25, was reaffirmed in one resolution, in connection with the situation in Afghanistan, by which the Council reminded all parties of "the obligation to abide strictly by the decisions of the Council".⁴² In another instance, in a statement by the President of 12 February 1999, in connection with the protection of civilians in armed conflict, the Council called upon all parties concerned "to comply strictly with their obligations under international law ... as well as with all decisions of the Council".⁴³ In a number of instances, the Council recalled the binding nature of certain types of Council action. For example, in connection with the situation in Africa, the Council reiterated the obligation of all Member States to carry out decisions of the Council on arms embargoes.⁴⁴

During the period under review, there were a few instances in which Article 25 was explicitly cited in communications, relating to the situation in Cambodia⁴⁵ and the situation between Iraq and

Kuwait.⁴⁶ In relation to the situation in Cambodia, by a letter dated 16 March 1999 addressed to the Presidents of the General Assembly and the Security Council, the Security-General transmitted the report of the Group of Experts for Cambodia;⁴⁷ the Group of Experts had been established pursuant to General Assembly resolution 52/135 and had been given the task of exploring legal options for bringing Khmer Rouge leaders to justice before an international or national jurisdiction for the crimes committed from 1975 to 1979. In the report, the Group of Experts argued that the difference between a tribunal created under Chapter VII and one under another part of the Charter might or might not be significant in principle or practice. The key issue, in its opinion, was the legally binding nature of the resolution creating such a tribunal — especially provisions requesting cooperation with it. The Group of Experts also held that while Chapter VII decisions were always legally binding on all States, the Council might make binding decisions under various parts of the Charter and not merely Chapter VII, which meant that the obligation of States to comply with the decisions of the Council under Article 25 of the Charter extended to all decisions of the Council, not merely those under Chapter VII.⁴⁸

In the deliberations of the Council, explicit references to Article 25 of the Charter were made on several occasions. In connection with the situation in East Timor, at the 4057th meeting, on 25 October 1999, calling upon the Security Council to ensure the guarantee by the Government of Indonesia not to allow its militias to use the territory of West Timor as a platform to destabilize East Timor, the representative of Portugal considered that it was useful to recall Article 25 of the Charter, which stated that resolutions of the Council were legally binding on all Member States.⁴⁹

In connection with the item entitled “Role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflicts”, at the 4072nd meeting, on 29 November 1999, the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya stated that the Security Council’s work and resolutions could not be respected or complied with by Member States unless they reflected the will of the majority of Member States. He further held that this was embodied in Article 25 of the Charter, which stated that Members of the United Nations agreed to accept and carry out the decisions of the Security Council in accordance with the Charter.⁵⁰

In connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, at the 4084th meeting, on 17 December 1999, the representative of the Netherlands stated that it did not matter that resolution 1284 (1999) had not been adopted by consensus,⁵¹ as Article 27 of the Charter described how Council decisions were made, and Article 25 stipulated that every Member of the United Nations was obliged to accept and carry out such decisions. Nothing in the Charter allotted a higher degree of legitimacy to a Security Council resolution that was adopted by consensus.⁵²

In this section, two cases are included below, in connection with the items entitled “Letters dated 20 and 23 December 1991 from France, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America (S/23306, S/23307, S/23308, S/23309 and S/23317)” and “Letter dated 9 January 1996 from the Permanent Representative of Ethiopia to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council concerning the extradition of the suspects wanted in the assassination attempt on the life of the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, on 26 June 1995 (S/1996/10)”, in which the Council engaged in a discussion on the interpretation of Article 25, in particular the binding nature of Security Council decisions. These cases include the remaining explicit references to Article 25 found in the deliberations of the Council and in communications during the period under review.

*Letters dated 20 and 23 December 1991 from France, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America*⁵³

At the 3864th meeting, on 20 March 1998,⁵⁴ the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya noted that right from the start, his Government had dealt with its two citizens who were suspected of being involved in the incident of the destruction of Pan Am flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland, in 1988 within the framework of the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Civil Aviation,⁵⁵ of which article 7 accorded his country judicial competence for trying the two suspects. However, the countries concerned had transformed the question from a legal to a political one by submitting it to the Security Council, following which the Council had adopted resolution 731 (1992), by which it urged the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to provide a full and effective response to the demands contained in the letters from the United States and the United Kingdom.⁵⁶ He argued that a new situation had arisen since the issuance of the judgments by the International Court of Justice on 27 February 1998.⁵⁷ The judgments stated that the Court had jurisdiction, on the basis of article 14 (1) of the Convention, and that the requests of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to handle the cases against its two citizens within the framework of its own legal system were admissible notwithstanding resolutions 748 (1992) and 883 (1993). He stated that those judgments should have been binding for all United Nations organs and their members given that, under Article 92 of the Charter, the Court was the principal judicial organ of the United Nations and that each Member of the United Nations needed to comply with the judgments of the Court in any case to which it was a party, pursuant to Article 94 (1). Therefore, the representative argued that the sanctions provided for in resolutions 748 (1992) and 883 (1993) had become irrelevant since the Court had accepted jurisdiction in the matter of where the two accused should be tried, which was what the resolutions were based on. He called on the Council to suspend, as an interim measure, the implementation of the two resolutions insofar as they related to the sanctions imposed against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.⁵⁸

The representative of the League of Arab States (LAS) stated that the conflict essentially was a legal dispute over the interpretation and application of the Convention. Owing to the judgment, which the Court had rendered to the effect that a legal dispute did exist, it was no longer acceptable for the sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to continue without proving the international responsibility of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya or the responsibility of the two suspects. On those bases, LAS called upon the Security Council to suspend resolutions 748 (1992) and 883 (1992), until the Court settled the substance of the dispute.⁵⁹ The representative of the Organization of African Unity also argued that as the Court had stated that it did have jurisdiction in the case, the only action worth taking to stay within the spirit of the judgments of the Court was suspension of the flight ban.⁶⁰

The representative of Mali, speaking on behalf of the Group of African States, stressed that with regard to the judgments of the Court, the African Group believed that there was no longer any reason for the Council to maintain sanctions against the Libyan people, for the following reasons: first, the International Court of Justice had rejected claims that the Convention did not apply to the Lockerbie conflict; second, the Court had decided that there was a dispute between the United States and the United Kingdom, on the one hand, and the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, on the other, and that it was up to the Court itself to decide on the case; third, the Court had rejected the claim that the rights of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya under the Convention were suspended following the adoption of resolutions 748 (1992) and 883 (1993), which had imposed sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya on the basis of Articles 25 and 103; fourth, the Court explicitly rejected the claims that resolutions 731

(1992), 748 (1992) and 883 (1993) obliged the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to extradite its nationals to the United States or the United Kingdom so that they could be brought to trial notwithstanding the rights of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya under the Convention; and fifth, the Court had rejected claims that the relevant legal proceedings needed to be immediately halted on the presumption that the resolutions of the Security Council could not be challenged in the Court. Therefore, according to the judgments rendered by the International Court of Justice on 27 February 1998, it seemed, inter alia, that the sanctions provided for in resolutions 748 (1992) and 883 (1993) “no longer had any raison d’être”. Accordingly, the Group of African States believed that there needed to be a suspension of the application of the resolutions relative to sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, including the flight ban, reduced diplomatic representation and the freeze on assets, until the Court ruled on the substance of the matter.⁶¹ A number of other representatives also maintained that following the judgments, the measures imposed against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya no longer had any justification and needed to be suspended until a final decision had been taken by the Court.⁶²

The representative of Jordan called on the Council to respect the judgments rendered by the Court and stressed the importance of respecting and implementing all Security Council resolutions fully and precisely.⁶³ Similarly, the representative of Kuwait underlined that the implementation by all States of all relevant Security Council resolutions was essential to ensure respect for the Charter, but also that the decisions of the International Court of Justice should be seriously considered by the Council in order to achieve progress.⁶⁴

The representative of the United States stressed that the rulings of the International Court of Justice in no way questioned the legality of the actions of the Security Council affecting the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya or the merits of the criminal cases against the two accused suspects. He held that the rulings of the Court involved technical, procedural issues. Contrary to the assertions of the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the Court was not calling for the review or suspension of Security Council resolutions. The Court had simply stated that the parties needed to argue the legal merits of the case, and while the case was proceeding, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya needed to comply with its obligation pursuant to Security Council decisions and turn over the two accused suspects for a fair trial.⁶⁵

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the decisions delivered by the Court were rulings on preliminary objections lodged by the United Kingdom and the United States to the claim by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya that, under the Convention, it had the exclusive right to try the two Libyans accused of the Lockerbie bombing. The Court had decided that it did have jurisdiction to decide on the merits of the case of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya about the Convention, but it had not decided that the claims of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya were justified. He noted that the United Kingdom was arguing before the Court that the matter was governed by resolutions 731 (1992), 748 (1992) and 883 (1993), which obliged the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to surrender the two accused for trial in Scotland or the United States. He underscored that obligations under the Charter, including compliance with binding Security Council resolutions, took precedence over any other alleged international obligations. Moreover, the resolutions had been unaffected by the ruling of the Court, which had been just one stage in the judicial proceedings, with the main argument on merits still to come, and therefore remained in force.⁶⁶

A few speakers maintained that the judgments merely addressed preliminary procedural questions and did not decide on the merits of the case, and did not question the validity of the relevant resolutions of the Security Council, which remained in full force and which the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya needed to comply with as required by the Charter of the United Nations.⁶⁷ The representative of Portugal also noted that any compromise solution could not depart from the

By a letter dated 10 June 1998 from the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and a letter dated 29 June 1998 from the representatives of Burkina Faso, Cuba, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Malaysia, South Africa and Zimbabwe, both addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁶⁹ the Council was informed that the Ministerial Conference of the Non-Aligned Movement (NAM), held in Cartagena, Colombia, from 18 to 20 May 1998, in its final communiqué, had welcomed the judgments of the International Court of Justice dated 27 February 2008 and called for the immediate suspension of the sanctions until the Court decided on the issue. It had also recommended that the twelfth summit of the Non-Aligned Movement take a decision not to continue compliance with the resolutions imposing sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya on the basis of Article 25 of the Charter because they were in violation of Articles 27 (3), 32, 33, 36 and 94 of the Charter.

By resolution 1192 (1998) of 27 August 1998, the Council demanded once again that the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya immediately comply with resolutions 731 (1992), 748 (1992) and 883 (1993) and reaffirmed that the measures set forth in its resolutions 748 (1992) and 883 (1993) remained in effect and binding on all Member States, and in that context reaffirmed the provisions of paragraph 16 of resolution 883 (1993).⁷⁰

*Letter dated 9 January 1996 from the Permanent Representative of Ethiopia to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council concerning the extradition of the suspects wanted in the assassination attempt on the life of the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, on 26 June 1995*⁷¹

At the 3627th meeting, on 31 January 1996, the Council adopted resolution 1044 (1996), by which it called upon the Government of the Sudan to comply without further delay with the requests of the Organization of African Unity to take immediate action to extradite to Ethiopia for prosecution the three suspects sheltering in the Sudan and wanted in connection with the assassination attempt on the basis of the 1964 Extradition Treaty between Ethiopia and the Sudan; and to desist from engaging in activities of assisting, supporting and facilitating terrorist activities and from giving shelter and sanctuary to terrorist elements, and to act in its relations with its neighbours and with others in full conformity with the Charter of the United Nations and with the charter of the Organization of African Unity.⁷²

At the meeting, the representative of Ethiopia stated that the Sudan should "accept and carry out the decision of the Security Council, as stipulated in Article 25 of the Charter of the United Nations".⁷³ This was also reiterated by the representative of Egypt, who expressed hope that the Sudan would take the Council's resolution "with all necessary seriousness, given that, under the Charter, all the Council's resolutions are binding on all States".⁷⁴

The representative of Sudan, for his part, reiterated the efforts made by the Sudan towards solving the issue and reaffirmed that his country had always abided by resolutions adopted by the United Nations. He further underlined that his Government wished "to put on record that it abides by the Charter of the United Nations and that it accepts that all Security Council resolutions are binding and must be complied with".⁷⁵

Consideration of the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter

Article 52

1. Nothing in the present Charter precludes the existence of regional arrangements or agencies for dealing with such matters relating to the maintenance of international peace and security as are appropriate for regional action, provided that such arrangements or agencies and their activities are consistent with the Purposes and Principles of the United Nations.

2. The Members of the United Nations entering into such arrangements or constituting such agencies shall make every effort to achieve pacific settlement of local disputes through such regional arrangements or by such regional agencies before referring them to the Security Council.

3. The Security Council shall encourage the development of pacific settlement of local disputes through such regional arrangements or by such regional agencies either on the initiative of the states concerned or by reference from the Security Council.

4. This Article in no way impairs the application of Articles 34 and 35.

Article 53

1. The Security Council shall, where appropriate, utilize such regional arrangements or agencies for enforcement action under its authority. But no enforcement action shall be taken under regional arrangements or by regional agencies without the authorization of the Security Council, with the exception of measures against any enemy state, as defined in paragraph 2 of this Article, provided for pursuant to Article 107 or in regional arrangements directed against renewal of aggressive policy on the part of any such state, until such time as the Organization may, on request of the Governments concerned, be charged with the responsibility for preventing further aggression by such a state.

2. The term enemy state as used in paragraph 1 of this Article applies to any state which during the Second World War has been an enemy of any signatory of the present Charter.

Article 54

The Security Council shall at all times be kept fully informed of activities undertaken or in contemplation under regional arrangements or by regional agencies for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council broadened its cooperation and coordination with regional arrangements or agencies in the maintenance of international peace and security, as provided for in Chapter VIII of the Charter.¹ The expanded scope and modalities of cooperation with regional organizations varied in terms of their mandate, structure, capacity and experience.

As chapter VIII of this volume sets out a full account of Council proceedings with regard to its responsibility for maintenance of international peace and security, Chapter XII will not discuss the practice of the Security Council in connection with regional organizations in a comprehensive manner. Instead, the present chapter will focus on selected material which may best serve to highlight how the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter were interpreted in deliberations and applied in the relevant decisions of the Council.

The decisions adopted by the Council during the period under consideration revealed an increased recognition of regional organizations and of their growing or potential role in the maintenance of international peace and security. Most of the activities of regional organizations praised, endorsed or supported by the Council concerned efforts at the peaceful settlement of disputes. In other instances, regional organizations were called upon to assist in the monitoring and implementation of mandatory measures imposed by the Council under Chapter VII of the Charter. Moreover, on two occasions, the Council authorized the use of force by regional organizations, to support the respective peacekeeping operations in the performance of their mandates.

While all instances of cooperation with regional arrangements could be considered to fall within the framework of Chapter VIII of the Charter, the Council only occasionally invoked Chapter VIII, or the relevant Articles therein, in its decisions.² In particular, one decision defined the provisions of Chapter VIII as those which “set out the basic principles governing the activities of regional arrangements and agencies and establish the legal framework for cooperation in the United Nations, in the area of the maintenance of international peace and security”.³ One draft resolution, which was not adopted because it did not obtain the required majority, contained explicit references to Article 53 and Chapter VIII of the Charter.⁴ In addition, explicit references to Chapter VIII,⁵ as well as to Articles 52, 53 and 54 of the Charter were made in the course of deliberations.⁶

captures the relevant debates and decisions of the Council on general and thematic issues touching upon the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter. Section B illustrates the ways in which the Council, in dealing with specific situations under its consideration, encouraged and supported the efforts of regional organizations towards the pacific settlement of disputes. Section C lays out cases where regional arrangements were involved in the implementation of Chapter VII measures. Section D describes two cases in which the Council authorized the use of force by regional organizations. The final part of the chapter, section E, presents two cases in which Member States discussed the appropriateness of Council action in situations where regional organizations were involved.

A. General consideration of the provisions of Chapter VIII

On a few occasions, as captured below, the Security Council discussed the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter in the context of its deliberations on thematic and cross-cutting issues.

The situation in Africa

During the period under review, speakers at the meetings on the situation in Africa acknowledged the important role of regional and subregional organizations in Africa in preventing and resolving conflicts on the continent, called for technical, logistical and financial assistance to their efforts, and supported the strengthening of contacts, cooperation and coordination between the United Nations and those organizations, in particular the Organization of African Unity. In that context, some argued that such cooperation with regional arrangements did not relieve the Security Council from its responsibility in the maintenance of international peace and security under the Charter and that the role of regional arrangements was, rather, complementary. Furthermore, it was generally stressed that African peacekeeping capacities should be strengthened.¹⁰

At the 3819th meeting, on 25 September 1997, the President of Zimbabwe and current Chairman of OAU stated that given that the Council was endowed with the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, it could never be an exclusively African agenda for peace. Rather, it would be the United Nations agenda, to which the entire international community subscribed and lent support. That was the understanding of OAU of the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter, which was devoted entirely to cooperation between the United Nations and regional organizations.¹¹ The Secretary-General of OAU called for a new partnership between the United Nations and OAU, in keeping with the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter and the “Agenda for Peace”, on the role of the regional organizations in the maintenance of peace and international security.¹² As to the use of sanctions or force by regional arrangements, the representative of the Russian Federation emphasized that no coercive actions should be taken by regional structures unless authorized by the Council.¹³

By a presidential statement dated 25 September 1997,¹⁴ the Council welcomed the important contributions of OAU, including through its Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution, as well as those of subregional arrangements, in preventing and resolving conflicts in Africa, and looked forward to a stronger partnership between the United Nations and OAU, as well as subregional arrangements, in conformity with Chapter VIII of the Charter. The Council expressed its support for enhancement of the capacity of African States to contribute to peacekeeping operations, including in Africa, in accordance with the Charter. Furthermore, the Council expressed its full support for the engagement of the United Nations in Africa through its diplomatic, peacekeeping and other activities, which were often undertaken in cooperation with regional and subregional organizations.

In his report dated 13 April 1998 entitled “The causes of conflict and the promotion of durable peace and sustainable development in Africa”,¹⁵ the Secretary-General noted that where a peace process was needed, it was the role of the United Nations, with OAU, to help create one. The Secretary-General pointed out that cooperation between the United Nations and subregional organizations, which were working to address issues of peace and security in their subregions, was being strengthened. Addressing the issue of supporting regional and subregional initiatives, the Secretary-General reported that within the context of the primary responsibility of the United Nations for matters of international peace and security, providing support for regional and subregional initiatives in Africa was both necessary and desirable because the United Nations lacked the capacity, resources and expertise to address all problems that might arise in Africa. As to the authorization of the use of forceful action, the Secretary-General held that the obligation to obtain Council authorization prior to the use of force was clear. He added that while authorizing forceful action by Member States or coalitions of States could sometimes be an effective response to situations where significant force was likely to be required, it also raised many questions for the future, particularly on the need to enhance the ability of the Council to monitor activities that had been authorized.¹⁶

Discussing the co-deployment with regional, subregional or multinational forces, the Secretary-General referred to the collaboration with the Monitoring Group of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOMOG) in Liberia as a successful example of cooperation between the United Nations and a subregional organization, and maintained that such cooperation might be applicable to other situations. However, he cautioned that the conclusion should not be drawn that the responsibilities could henceforth be delegated solely to regional organizations, either in Africa or elsewhere. The Secretary-General, in his report, also stressed the need to strengthen the capacity of Africa for peacekeeping, whether those operations took place in the framework of a United Nations peacekeeping mission or one authorized by the Security Council but conducted by a regional organization or group of States. He maintained, however, that those efforts were not in any way intended to relieve the broader international community of its collective obligations under the Charter of the United Nations, but rather within the framework of those responsibilities to make Africa's own contribution more effective.¹⁷

At its 3875th meeting, on 24 April 1998, the Council discussed the above-mentioned report. The representative of Slovenia supported the cooperation between the United Nations and OAU and other regional and subregional arrangements and believed that such cooperation should be based on the framework established by Chapter VIII of the Charter.¹⁸ The representative of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the States members of the Southern African Development Community (SADC), stated that Chapter VIII of the Charter made provision for regional arrangements to ensure the maintenance of international peace and security and stipulated that such arrangements should be consistent with the purposes and principles of the Charter. That provision provided the framework for developing closer cooperation between Africa and the United Nations in peace missions. He, therefore, held that there was a need to reinforce and implement the existing measures in a manner that promoted meaningful interaction between the United Nations and OAU.¹⁹

The representative of Canada underscored that regional and subregional bodies should respond not to vacuums created as a result of inaction on the part of the Security Council, but to collaborative programmes developed in close consultation with the Council. Such collaboration should be based on Articles 53 and 54 of the Charter and ought to fully reflect the exclusive mandate of the Council for authorizing the use of force.²⁰ The representative of Egypt, while praising the work of the United Nations in Liberia and Sierra Leone in cooperation with the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) as successful experiences, maintained that it needed to remain clear that the proper framework was to enable such regional arrangements to play an effective role which complemented the efforts of the United Nations, as provided for in Chapter VIII of the Charter. The efforts of such arrangements, he stressed, should not be used as a pretext for the Council to shirk its primary responsibilities or as a justification for the Council not to adopt the appropriate decisions at the appropriate times.²¹ The representative of Indonesia stated that OAU and the United Nations should work in concert to remove obstacles endangering the peace and thereby facilitate the peace process. He noted that such a partnership of cooperation could be built within the framework of Chapter VIII of the Charter.²² The representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya welcomed the consolidation of cooperation between the United Nations and OAU in the area of the peaceful settlement of disputes and saw it as a natural matter lying within the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter that afforded regional arrangements an important role in the maintenance of international peace and security.²³ Noting the fundamental role of the Council in peacekeeping operations in Africa, the representative of the Russian Federation emphasized the need to strengthen the capacity of the Council to monitor the authorized activities of regional and subregional organizations in the field of peacekeeping.²⁴

By resolution 1170 (1998) of 28 May 1998, the Council recalled the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter on regional arrangements. In addition, the Council welcomed the important contributions of OAU to conflict prevention and resolution in Africa, including its Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution, as well as those of subregional arrangements. It also welcomed the efforts made by Member States, regional organizations and the United Nations to enhance the capacity of African States to contribute to peacekeeping operations in accordance with the Charter.²⁵

By a presidential statement dated 16 September 1998,²⁶ the Council affirmed that strengthening the capacity of Africa to participate in all aspects of peacekeeping operations was a key priority. The Council also encouraged increased bilateral and multilateral cooperation in the field of peacekeeping, especially capacity-building, between Member States, the United Nations and OAU, as well as subregional organizations in Africa. The Council expressed its support for the efforts of the United Nations as well as those of regional and subregional organizations in the field of training for peacekeeping. The Council stressed the need for it to be fully informed of peacekeeping activities carried out or planned by regional or subregional organizations and underlined the fact that the improved flow of information and the holding of regular briefing meetings between members of the Council as well as African regional and subregional organizations involved in peacekeeping operations had an important role to play in helping to enhance African peacekeeping capacity. In that context, the Council encouraged the Secretary-General to establish appropriate United Nations liaison with regional and subregional organizations and invited those organizations and Member States to provide the Council and the Secretary-General with information on their activities in the field of peacekeeping.

By resolution 1197 (1998) of 18 September 1998, the Council recalled the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter on regional arrangements or agencies, which set out the basic principles governing their activities and established the legal framework for cooperation with the United Nations in the area of the maintenance of international peace and security. The Council was mindful of the need for continued cooperation between the United Nations and its relevant bodies and specialized agencies on the one hand, and OAU and subregional organizations in Africa on the other. It noted that subregional arrangements in Africa, as well as OAU through its Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution, were developing their capacities in preventive diplomacy, and encouraged African States to make use of those arrangements and mechanisms in the prevention of conflict and maintenance of peace in Africa. Furthermore, the Council encouraged the enhancement of consultation and coordination between the United Nations and OAU and between the United Nations and subregional organizations in Africa, both at the field and headquarters levels, and recognized that the nomination of joint special representatives might be useful to further those aims. It also welcomed the fact that both the United Nations and OAU had agreed to strengthen and broaden their cooperation on measures to prevent and resolve conflicts in Africa.²⁷

²⁷ Resolution 1197 (1998), third, sixth and eighth

At the 3931st meeting, on 24 September 1998, at which the report of the Secretary-General²⁸ was again included in the agenda, the representative of Bahrain emphasized the role of the Council in the prevention of conflicts and the elimination of tensions. He supported the efforts of the Secretary-General to enhance the capabilities of the United Nations in that respect through the development of contacts between the Organization and regional organizations. He expressed his support for all steps taken with a view to containing or preventing conflicts, as provided for in Chapter VIII of the Charter. He also welcomed the Secretary-General's recommendations to improve African peacekeeping capabilities, to enhance the role of OAU in the management and settlement of disputes and to strengthen cooperation between OAU and the United Nations so that the African contribution in the field of peacekeeping might be more effective. Furthermore, he stressed the importance of the enhancement of the capability of African States in the peacekeeping missions in Africa, whether those missions were United Nations missions or were within the framework of a regional organization with a mandate from the Security Council.²⁹

The representative of the Gambia called for collaboration between the United Nations and regional and subregional organizations in Africa and for the creation of a partnership more suitable for dealing with conflicts in Africa. He emphasized, however, that it was imperative to avoid relegating responsibility for peacekeeping from a global level to regional or subregional levels on a selective basis. The Security Council could not subcontract its responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security — not even by default. He maintained that cooperation between the United Nations and subregional and regional organizations needed to be in accordance with Articles 53 and 54 of the Charter.³⁰

With regard to the use of force, supporting the recommendations of the Secretary-General for closer coordination between the United Nations, OAU and African subregional organizations in conflict prevention and resolution, the representative of Portugal stressed that the final responsibility to authorize the use of force to restore peace always belonged to the Council.³¹ The representative of the Russian Federation considered it important actively to use the provisions of the Charter that encouraged regional organizations to show greater initiative in the field of preventive diplomacy and the peaceful settlement of disputes, which presupposed that the expansion of the practice of regional peacebuilding operations was backed by the Security Council. At the same time, he stressed that the principles stipulated in the Charter regarding the role of the Security Council in launching peacekeeping operations needed to be complied with, and reiterated that military operations conducted by regional structures, especially those involving the use of force, were permissible only if they were explicitly authorized by the Council.³²

The representative of Slovenia supported the efforts to strengthen cooperation between the United Nations and OAU, as well as with other regional and subregional arrangements, focusing on conflict prevention, management and resolution. He reiterated that such cooperation should be based on the framework established by Chapter VIII of the Charter.³³

By a presidential statement dated 24 September 1998,³⁴ the Council commended the efforts by African States and regional and subregional organizations, in particular OAU, to resolve conflicts by peaceful means. The Council called for an enhanced partnership between the United Nations and African regional and subregional organizations in support of their efforts in conflict prevention, the maintenance of peace and security and dispute settlement. The Council noted that it had taken action to help strengthen support for regional and subregional initiatives as well as to enhance coordination between the United Nations and regional and subregional organizations in the areas of conflict prevention and the maintenance of peace. It also recalled that it had addressed the need to support the strengthening of African peacekeeping capacity.

By a presidential statement dated 30 November 1998,³⁵ the Council, while reaffirming its primary responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security, underlined the increasingly important role of regional arrangements and agencies in the conduct of activity in that field. The Council reaffirmed that all such activity undertaken under regional arrangements or by regional agencies, including enforcement action, would be carried out in accordance with Articles 52, 53 and 54 of Chapter VIII of the Charter. In addition, the Council welcomed the views expressed by the Secretary-General in paragraphs 42 to 44 of his report,³⁶ in particular as they related to Africa. By the same presidential statement³⁷ The Council recognized that the authorization by the Council of action by regional or subregional organizations could be one type of effective response to conflict situations, and commended Member States and regional and subregional organizations which had undertaken efforts and initiatives towards the maintenance of peace and security. To enhance its ability to monitor any activities that it had authorized, the Council expressed its readiness to examine appropriate measures whenever such an authorization was being considered. In that regard, the Council noted that there was a wide variety of arrangements and relationships which had developed in different instances of cooperation between the United Nations, Member States and regional and subregional organizations in the maintenance of peace and security, and that monitoring requirements would vary and should be tailored according to the specifics of the operations in question, including in relation to ongoing peace efforts. Nevertheless, in general, operations should have a clear mandate, including, among others, arrangements for regular reporting to the Council. In addition, the Council underlined the fact that the monitoring of such operations could be enhanced by the improved flow and exchange of information, inter alia, through regular submission of reports and through the holding of regular briefing meetings between its members and regional and subregional organizations and Member States conducting such operations. The Council shared the view of the Secretary-General that one possible means of monitoring activities of forces authorized by it, while also contributing to the broader aspects of a peace process, was through co-deployment of United Nations observers and other personnel together with an operation carried out by a regional or subregional organization. It agreed with the Secretary-General that, while such collaboration was not applicable in all cases, co-deployment could make an important contribution to peacekeeping efforts, as in the cases of Liberia and Sierra Leone, where United Nations observer missions had been deployed alongside the Monitoring Group of ECOWAS. The Council underlined the importance, whenever the United Nations deployed forces alongside forces of regional or subregional organizations or Member States, of establishing a clear framework for cooperation and coordination between the United Nations and the regional or subregional organization. Such a framework should include specifying objectives, the careful delineation of the respective roles and responsibilities of the United Nations and the regional or subregional organization concerned and of the areas of interaction of forces, and clear provisions regarding the safety and security of personnel. The Council also stressed the importance of ensuring that United Nations missions maintain their identity and autonomy with regard to operational command and control and logistics. Furthermore, the Council urged Member States and regional and subregional organizations to ensure that the Council was kept fully informed of their activities for the maintenance of peace and security. The Council also undertook to consult regularly with Member States and regional and subregional organizations involved in such activities to facilitate that.

At the 4049th meeting, on 29 September 1999, the representative of the Russian Federation stressed that the provisions of the Charter needed to be actively implemented in encouraging regional organizations to take a more active initiative in preventive diplomacy and the peaceful settlement of disputes. That would mean strengthening regional peacekeeping operations, with the support of the Security Council; the implementation by regional structures of peacekeeping operations through the use of force was admissible only with the clear sanction of the Security Council, pursuant to Chapter VIII of the Charter. He maintained that African efforts should be backed and assisted — though not replaced — by the authority and capabilities of the United Nations.³⁸

At the 4081st meeting, on 15 December 1999, the representative of Argentina stressed the importance of close cooperation and dialogue between the United Nations, OAU and subregional organizations and maintained that all possible mechanisms available under Chapter VIII of the Charter should be explored.³⁹ The representative of Gabon noted that Chapter VIII of the Charter established the legal framework for cooperation involving the United Nations and its agencies.⁴⁰ The representative of Burundi stressed that the Security Council, which alone had such a mandate, needed to endorse all major interventions such as sending a regional peacekeeping force.⁴¹

The representative of Cameroon referred to the indispensable partnership between the United Nations and Africa developed via the activities of African regional and subregional mechanisms in conflict prevention and settlement. He noted that those developments shared the goal of demonstrating that Africa was a partner with the institutional capacity to respond to the provisions of Articles 52 and 53 of the Charter, which encouraged the regional settlement of conflicts and were intended to stimulate joint action by those bodies and by the United Nations. He also maintained that the Security Council might consider the appointment of a coordinator for Africa to work with the Secretary-General and to implement the provisions of Article 54 of the Charter.⁴²

The representative of Ireland stressed the central role of OAU and other subregional organizations in conflict prevention and resolution and noted that it had opened the possibility of the application of Articles 52 and 53 of the Charter, a highly positive development which deserved the strongest possible support.⁴³

Maintenance of international peace and security and post-conflict peacebuilding

At the 3954th meeting, on 16 December 1998, discussions involving the interpretation and application of Chapter VIII of the Charter were held, in the context of peacekeeping and post-conflict peacebuilding.

The representative of the Russian Federation expressed the view that enforcement peacekeeping operations, whether carried out by the United Nations or by regional organizations or multinational coalitions, could be implemented only through a decision of the Security Council and “under the tight political and appropriate operational control” of the Council. In that context, he maintained that regional peacekeeping operations could not be deployed without the authorization of the Council and needed to be transparent and accountable to the Council. While praising the recent practice of constructive interaction between regional organizations or multinational coalitions and the United Nations in the conduct of peacekeeping operations, the representative expressed concern about attempts to make it possible for individual States or coalitions to use force or take enforcement measures without the approval of the Council. He noted that the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) was going in such a direction by considering transforming itself into a leading international peacekeeping organization whose actions would be taken solely on the basis of its own assessments and decisions, thereby sidestepping the Council. He cautioned that such a move by NATO would attempt to replace the Charter-based functions and the prerogative of the Security Council with unilateral actions taken by regional mechanisms, directly contravening the Charter.⁴⁴

The representative of Brazil, explicitly citing Chapter VIII of the Charter, stated that regional global burden-sharing would in principle make as much sense for enforcement as it could make for peacekeeping. Moreover, he held that regional initiatives could be particularly effective in the post-conflict phases of stabilization efforts. However, he regretted that there were overt violations of sanctions regimes or armed interventions and manifestations of readiness to use armed force by regional actors “without the specific authority” of the Council, which raised serious legal and political questions. In his view, enforcement interventions with no clear legal foundation would lack moral authority and would not be able to meet with the approval of world opinion in the long run. He also argued that the Security Council should focus on the question of enforcement, underlining the importance of preserving the indispensable degree of harmony between regional initiatives and the universal collective security regime in line with the Charter.⁴⁵

At the same meeting, other explicit references to Chapter VIII of the Charter were made on several occasions.⁴⁶ For instance, the representative of Portugal welcomed an important and appropriate division of labour with regional organizations in the realm of the maintenance of international peace and security, “as foreseen in Chapter VIII of the Charter”. In that context, he considered it important to identify the peacebuilding activities within peacekeeping that could benefit from an effective cooperation with regional organizations. He pointed to the case of Guinea-Bissau and cooperation there between the United Nations, ECOWAS and as the Community of Portuguese Speaking Countries.⁴⁷

The representative of Indonesia held that maintaining peace and security, whether in a conflict or a potential conflict area, required concerted and coordinated efforts by international and regional organizations. If those activities were conducted within the framework of Chapter VIII of the Charter, regional organizations could make a distinct contribution to the efforts by the Security Council to seek peaceful solutions. He further stated that close cooperation and coordination between the regional organizations and the Council could substantially enhance the prospects for the political settlement of disputes without intervening in the internal affairs of States.⁴⁸

A few representatives cited ECOMOG in Sierra Leone, Liberia and Guinea-Bissau as concrete examples of cooperation in the area of peacekeeping between the United Nations and regional arrangements, and called for support for such regional efforts.⁴⁹

At the 4072nd meeting, on 29 November 1999, a number of speakers, some explicitly citing Chapter VIII of the Charter, recognized the role played by regional organizations in conflict prevention, such as OAU and ECOWAS and called for further cooperation between the Security Council and regional arrangements.⁵⁰

At the same meeting, the representative of China held that the Security Council should recognize the important roles that could be played by the various regional organizations and cooperate more closely with them. Such cooperation should be based on the adherence by regional organizations to the purposes and principles of the Charter and the stipulations of Chapter VIII and be performed under the guidance and monitoring of the United Nations.⁵¹ Similarly the representative of the Russian Federation emphasized that activities of regional and subregional organizations in early warning and conflict prevention needed to comply strictly with the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter.⁵² The representative of Namibia maintained that the tendency by regional arrangements to undertake peace enforcement without a specific mandate from the Council and without acting in accordance with the Charter should be discouraged as it undermined the credibility of the Council and diminished its role in the maintenance of international peace and security.⁵³

Furthermore, some speakers, in recognizing the central role of the Council in the maintenance of international peace and security, stressed that the cooperation between the Council and regional organizations should not be seen as competition.⁵⁴ The representative of Zambia argued that efforts by regional and subregional organizations in the resolution of disputes were complementary and were not meant to absolve the Council of its responsibility for the maintenance of peace and security in the world.⁵⁵

The representative of Bangladesh was of the view that the role of regional organizations was recognized in the Charter and that those organizations had played a critically important role in preventing or containing armed conflicts in recent years. However, the Council then had been criticized for “subcontracting” its peace and security mission. Therefore, he proposed that appropriate mechanisms and elaborate policy guidelines for involvement and intervention of the regional organizations should be formulated, while being specific to a given situation.⁵⁶

By a presidential statement dated 30 November 1999,⁵⁷ the Council recognized the important role that regional organizations and arrangements were playing in the prevention of armed conflicts, including through the deployment of confidence- and security-building measures. The Council also emphasized the importance of supporting and improving regional capacities for early warning. It emphasized the importance of cooperation between the United Nations and regional organizations in preventive activities in accordance with Chapter VIII of the Charter.

B. Encouragement by the Security Council of efforts undertaken by regional arrangements in the pacific settlement of disputes

During the period under review, the Security Council, on various occasions, expressed encouragement and support for the efforts undertaken by regional organizations in the pacific settlement of disputes, including the signing of peace agreements under the auspices of regional organizations. The practice of the Council in this regard is set out below, by region and by chronological order.

Africa

The situation in Liberia

During the period under review, the Security Council, by its decisions, commended the positive role of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) in its continuing efforts to restore peace, security and stability in Liberia and commended the States that had contributed to the Monitoring Group of the Economic Community of West African States.⁵⁸

At the 3621st meeting, on 25 January 1996, the representative of the United States, sharing some observations from her trip to Liberia, commended the neutral and constructive role being played at that time by ECOMOG troops, as opposed to the past, and asserted that ECOMOG deserved the support of the Council as it represented an important precedent in regional peacekeeping.⁵⁹ The representative of the Republic of Korea added that the peacekeeping operation in Liberia was unique in that, for the first time in Africa, a subregional organization, ECOWAS, had taken a primary role, while the United Nations assisted and monitored ECOMOG.⁶⁰ The representative of China observed that ECOWAS had made tremendous efforts to end the fighting in Liberia and had sent peacekeeping forces to Liberia, “in accordance with Chapter VIII”, despite their economic difficulties.⁶¹

By resolution 1041 (1996) of 29 January 1996, and subsequent decisions, the Council called upon the Monitoring Group, in accordance with the agreement regarding the respective roles and responsibilities of the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia (UNOMIL) and ECOMOG in the implementation of the Cotonou Agreement⁶² and with the concept of operations of the Mission, to intensify the action necessary to provide security for UNOMIL observers and civilian staff. The Council also stressed the need for close contact and enhanced coordination between UNOMIL and ECOMOG in their operational activities at all levels.⁶³

Furthermore, by a presidential statement dated 9 April 1996, the Council reaffirmed its support for the crucial role of ECOWAS in bringing the conflict to an end.⁶⁴ Similar support was reiterated in a presidential statement dated 6 May 1996.⁶⁵

At the 3667th meeting, on 28 May 1996, the representative of Liberia repeated his appeal for continued assistance to ECOMOG in order to allow it to carry out its mandate under the Abuja Agreement. While being aware of some reservations about the viability of ECOMOG as a peacekeeping force, he reminded the Council that ECOMOG had taken on a responsibility that should have been shouldered by the United Nations. As the United Nations had relied on ECOMOG to provide security to UNOMIL, their respective functions were complementary. The collaboration could only bear fruit when the requisite support was given to ECOMOG. He reiterated that if the pioneering effort by ECOWAS was to be brought to fruition, the Charter provision encouraging subregional initiatives in the pacific settlement of disputes needed to be amended to ensure a mechanism whereby any subregional peacekeeping operation sanctioned by the Council would be financed by the United Nations.⁶⁶ The representative of Zimbabwe expressed surprise at suggestions that the continued involvement of UNOMIL might be contingent upon the presence of ECOMOG in Liberia. In a direct reference to Chapter VIII, he maintained that active support from the United Nations needed to be given to regional organizations seeking to arrest threats to peace and security. He further argued that, rather than playing the role of a substitute for the uniquely mandated role of the United Nations, those regional efforts needed to be viewed as facilitators in the efforts of the United Nations in pursuit of its Charter-enshrined responsibility to maintain international peace and security.⁶⁷ The representative of China expressed appreciation for the efforts of ECOWAS by the dispatch of its peacekeeping forces to Liberia, “in accordance with Chapter VIII” and also by its offer of good offices and mediation for the pacific settlement of the dispute.⁶⁸

By resolution 1059 (1996) of 31 May 1996 and subsequent resolutions, the Council stressed that the presence of UNOMIL in Liberia was predicated on the presence of ECOMOG and its commitment to ensure the safety of military observers and civilian staff of UNOMIL.⁶⁹

By the same resolution, the Council encouraged the members of ECOWAS to consider ways and means to strengthen the Monitoring Group and to persuade the faction leaders to resume the peace process, and expressed support for the resolve of the ministers of the countries members of ECOWAS not to recognize any Government in Liberia that came to office through the use of force. Furthermore, noting especially the recent broader deployment of ECOMOG in the city of Monrovia, the Council also called upon the Liberian parties to, among other things, allow the deployment of ECOMOG and restore Monrovia as a safe haven.⁷⁰

At the 3694th meeting, on 30 August 1996, the representative of Liberia stated that while the ECOWAS peace initiative had faced some financial and administrative difficulties, it represented a “pioneering effort to bring to fruition Chapter VIII of the Charter”, and thus deserved greater support from the United Nations.⁷¹

By resolution 1071 (1996), adopted at that meeting, the Council welcomed the agreement of ECOWAS in Abuja, on 17 August 1996,⁷² which extended until 15 June 1997, the Abuja Agreement of 1995,⁷³ established a timetable for implementation of the Agreement, adopted a mechanism to verify compliance by the faction leaders with the Agreement and proposed possible measures against the factions in the event of non-compliance.⁷⁴

Following the agreement between the Liberian Council of State and ECOWAS on a basic framework for the holding of elections in Liberia scheduled for 30 May 1997, by resolution 1100 (1997) of 27 March 1997, the Council again stressed the importance of close contacts and enhanced coordination between UNOMIL and ECOMOG at all levels and, in particular, the importance of ECOMOG continuing to provide effective security for international personnel during the election process.⁷⁵

Subsequent to the decision of ECOWAS to postpone the election date to 19 July 1997, by resolution 1116 (1997) of 27 June 1997, while reiterating its position on the importance of close coordination among various actors and of the provision of security by ECOMOG during the election process, the Council emphasized the need for constructive collaboration between the United Nations, ECOWAS, the Liberian Independent Elections Commission and the international community in coordinating assistance for the elections.⁷⁶

Following the successful holding of presidential and legislative elections on 19 July 1997, by a presidential statement of 30 July 1997,⁷⁷ the Council commended all international personnel, especially those of UNOMIL and ECOMOG, who had contributed to the successful holding of elections.

The situation in Sierra Leone

In Sierra Leone, the Security Council supported the efforts of ECOWAS, including its mediation and continued deployment of a regional peacekeeping force, ECOMOG, which was responsible for providing security to the United Nations Observer Mission in Sierra Leone (UNOMSIL) and the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone (UNAMSIL), established during the period under review.

By a presidential statement dated 11 July 1997,⁷⁸ the Council strongly supported the decision of the Organization of African Unity appealing to the leaders of ECOWAS and the international community to help restore the constitutional order in Sierra Leone. The Council also welcomed the mediation efforts initiated by ECOWAS and expressed its full support for the objectives of those efforts as set out in the final communiqué,⁷⁹ issued at the meeting of the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of ECOWAS, held in Conakry on 26 June 1997.

By a presidential statement dated 6 August 1997,⁸⁰ the Council expressed its appreciation to the Committee of Four Foreign Ministers of the Economic Community of West African States for its efforts to negotiate with representatives of the military junta on 17 and 18 and 29 and 30 July 1997 in Abidjan on a peaceful resolution of the crisis, and reiterated its full support for the objectives of that mediation.

By resolution 1132 (1997) of 8 October 1997, and by subsequent decisions, the Council expressed its strong support for the efforts of the Committee of ECOWAS to resolve the crisis in Sierra Leone, and encouraged it to continue to work for the peaceful restoration of the constitutional order, including through the resumption of negotiations.⁸¹

By a presidential statement of 26 February 1998,⁸² the Council encouraged the Monitoring Group of ECOWAS to proceed in its efforts to foster peace and stability in Sierra Leone, in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Charter. It underlined the need for close cooperation between the legitimate Government of Sierra Leone, ECOWAS, the commanders of the Monitoring Group, the Special Envoy of the Secretary-General and his staff, United Nations agencies and relevant international organizations in their work.

Following the return to Sierra Leone of its democratically elected President on 10 March 1998, by resolution 1162 (1998) of 17 April 1998, the Council commended ECOWAS and its Monitoring Group, deployed in Sierra Leone, on the important role they were playing in support of the objectives related to the restoration of peace and security.⁸³ By a presidential statement dated 20 May 1998,⁸⁴ the Council reiterated its appreciation of ECOWAS and encouraged ECOWAS to renew its political efforts to foster peace and stability.

By resolution 1181 (1998) of 13 July 1998, the Council recognized the important contribution of ECOWAS in support of the objectives to restore peaceful and secure conditions in the country, to re-establish effective administration and the democratic process and to embark on the task of national reconciliation, reconstruction and rehabilitation. It commended the positive role of ECOWAS and its Monitoring Group in their efforts to restore peace and stability throughout the country at the request of the Government of Sierra Leone.⁸⁵

By the same resolution, the Council noted the role of the ECOWAS Monitoring Group in assisting the implementation of the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration plan adopted by the Government, including the provision of security and responsibility for arms collection and destruction. The Council also welcomed the commitment of that Group to ensure the security of United Nations personnel and stressed the need for full cooperation and close coordination between UNOMSIL, established by the same resolution, and the Monitoring Group in their respective operational activities.⁸⁶

By a presidential statement of 7 January 1999,⁸⁷ the Council welcomed the offers made by leaders in the region aimed at resolving the conflict and, in that context, urged them, including the Committee of Six on Sierra Leone of ECOWAS, to facilitate the peace process.

By resolution 1231 (1999) of 11 March 1999, the Council expressed its support for all efforts, in particular by States members of ECOWAS, aimed at peacefully resolving the conflict and restoring lasting peace and stability in Sierra Leone.⁸⁸ In addition, the

Council commended the efforts of the Monitoring Group towards the restoration of peace and security and stability in Sierra Leone, and called upon all Member States to provide ECOMOG with technical, financial and logistical support.⁸⁹

By resolution 1245 (1999) of 11 June 1999, the Council acknowledged the cooperation provided by ECOWAS and its Monitoring Group and underlined its strong support for the key role being played by the President of Togo as the current Chairman of ECOWAS in the Lomé process.⁹⁰ By resolution 1260 (1999) of 20 August 1999, the Council, in welcoming the signing of the Lomé Peace Agreement between the Government of Sierra Leone and the Revolutionary United Front of Sierra Leone on 7 July 1999,⁹¹ commended, among others, the President of Togo and ECOWAS in facilitating the negotiations in Lomé on their contribution to that achievement.⁹² By the same resolution, the Council, while authorizing the expansion of UNOMSIL, decided that the additional military observers should operate for the time being under security provided by the Monitoring Group.⁹³

At the 4054th meeting, on 22 October 1999, the Council adopted resolution 1270 (1999), by which the Council welcomed the steps taken by the Monitoring Group, among others, towards the implementation of the Lomé Peace Agreement.⁹⁴ The Council also reiterated its appreciation for the indispensable role ECOMOG forces continued to play in the maintenance of security and stability and the protection of the people in Sierra Leone and approved the new mandate of ECOMOG,⁹⁵ adopted by ECOWAS on 25 August 1999.⁹⁶ By the same resolution, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, established UNAMSIL and commended the readiness of ECOMOG to continue to provide security for the areas where it was located, in particular around Freetown and Lungi, to provide protection for the Government of Sierra

Leone, to conduct other operations in accordance with their mandate to ensure the implementation of the Peace Agreement, and to initiate and proceed with disarmament and demobilization in conjunction and full coordination with UNAMSIL. The Council also stressed the need for close cooperation and coordination between ECOMOG and UNAMSIL in carrying out their respective tasks, and welcomed the intended establishment of joint operation centres at headquarters and, if necessary, at subordinate levels in the field as well.⁹⁷

At that same meeting, the representative of Nigeria praised UNAMSIL as representing a rare, but desirable form of cooperation between the United Nations and a subregional organization in fulfilment of Chapter VIII of the Charter. He expressed the hope that the United Nations would continue to employ a similar approach with other regional and subregional organizations in the pursuit of international peace and security.⁹⁸ The representative of the United Kingdom maintained that the success of UNAMSIL would depend significantly on joint deployment and close cooperation with ECOMOG. He noted that the readiness of ECOWAS to work in tandem with the United Nations in Sierra Leone was an important example of cooperation with regional peacekeeping efforts around the world.⁹⁹

The situation in Burundi

By a presidential statement dated 5 January 1996, the Security Council commended the role played by the Organization of African Unity (OAU) in Burundi and welcomed the decision of OAU in Addis Ababa on 19 December 1995 to extend the mandate of its mission in Burundi for another three months and to strengthen the civilian component of the mission.¹⁰⁰ By resolution 1040 (1996) of 29 January 1996, the Council noted with appreciation the ongoing efforts of OAU, its military observers in Burundi and the European Union.¹⁰¹

At the 3639th meeting, on 5 March 1996, the representative of Egypt stated that OAU had played an important role in Burundi since 1993, and even though that role had not received political or material support from other international organizations, it had become one of the major axes of development, reaffirming the importance of the support of regional organizations for containing crises and conflicts “under Chapter VIII of the Charter”.¹⁰² The representative of the Russian Federation considered it important to make optimum use of the peacekeeping potential of OAU and other regional organizations.¹⁰³ By resolution 1049 (1996), adopted at that meeting, the Council expressed strong support for the efforts of OAU, the European Union and others seeking to facilitate political dialogue in Burundi. In addition, the Council encouraged OAU to increase the size of its observer mission in Burundi, as formally requested by the Government of Burundi.¹⁰⁴

By a presidential statement dated 15 May 1996, the Council underscored the importance of the continued cooperation of the United Nations with OAU and the European Union, among others, aimed at achieving the objective of a comprehensive political dialogue between the parties in Burundi. In that regard, the Council expressed its support for the efforts of OAU and its observer mission and called upon all States to contribute generously to the Peace Fund of OAU in order to enable the organization to increase the size of its mission and extend its mandate.¹⁰⁵ By a subsequent presidential statement of 24 July 1996, the Council also welcomed the extension of the mandate of the observer mission of OAU.¹⁰⁶

By a presidential statement of 29 July 1996, the Council expressed its full support for regional mediation efforts, including those of former President Nyerere and OAU.¹⁰⁷

By a note dated 5 August 1996, the Secretary-General transmitted a copy of the communiqué issued on 5 August 1996 by the Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution of the Organization of African Unity, which relayed that the Central Organ, having considered the role of the OAU Mission in Burundi and in the light of the new situation in that country, decided to terminate the deployment of the military component of the Mission as soon as possible. The communiqué also noted that, depending on the evolution of the situation in Burundi, the Secretary-General of OAU could consider the possibility of strengthening the civilian and political component of the Mission.¹⁰⁸

By resolution 1072 (1996) of 30 September 1996, the Council took note of the above-mentioned note by the Secretary-General and underlined the importance it attached to the continuation of the efforts of OAU and its observer mission. The Council further expressed its strong support for the efforts of regional leaders of OAU and of former President Nyerere, to assist Burundi to overcome peacefully the grave crisis which it was undergoing, and encouraged them to continue to facilitate the search for a political solution.¹⁰⁹ By the same resolution, the Council also welcomed the efforts made by the European Union to contribute to a peaceful solution of the political crisis in Burundi.¹¹⁰

By a presidential statement dated 30 May 1997,¹¹¹ the Council reiterated its support and appreciation to OAU in its efforts to find a peaceful solution to the crisis in Burundi.

The situation in the Great Lakes region

In the Great Lakes region, the Security Council supported the mediation efforts of OAU in coordination with those of the United Nations, including the appointment of the joint United Nations/OAU Special Representative and the resultant five-point peace plan for eastern Zaire.

By a presidential statement of 1 November 1996,¹¹² the Security Council, concerned at the deteriorating situation in the Great Lakes region, in particular eastern Zaire, expressed the hope that the mediation efforts of OAU and the European Union would complement those of the Special Envoy of the Secretary-General.

By resolution 1078 (1996) of 9 November 1996, the Council welcomed the efforts of the mediators and representatives of OAU and the European Union, among others, and encouraged them to coordinate closely their efforts with those of the Special Envoy. In addition, the Council requested the Secretary-General to draw up a concept of operations and framework for a humanitarian task force, in consultation with OAU and the Special Envoy of the European Union, among other actors. Furthermore, the Council called upon OAU, the States of the region and other international organizations to examine ways in which to contribute and to complement the efforts undertaken by the United Nations to defuse tension in the region, in particular in eastern Zaire.¹¹³ By subsequent decisions, the Council reiterated its encouragement of the efforts of OAU and the European Union.¹¹⁴

By a letter dated 22 January 1997,¹¹⁵ the Secretary-General informed the Council that, given the gravity and complexity of the situation in the Great Lakes region, he intended to propose the appointment of a joint United Nations/OAU Special Representative, who would be reporting to both the United Nations and OAU and take guidance from those Secretaries-General. He noted that such an appointment would be in conformity with the request of the Council that the Secretary-General cooperate closely with OAU in addressing the problems of the Great Lakes region.

By a presidential statement dated 7 February 1997,¹¹⁶ the Council expressed its full support for the joint United Nations/OAU Special Representative for the Great Lakes region, in the fulfilment of his mandate. In subsequent decisions, the Council reiterated this position.¹¹⁷

In his letter dated 18 February 1997,¹¹⁸ the Secretary-General reported on the mission of the joint United Nations/OAU Special Representative for the Great Lakes region who was working on a five-point peace plan, on the basis of the presidential statement of 7 February 1997.¹¹⁹ The Secretary-General noted that it would greatly assist the efforts of the joint United Nations/OAU Special Representative if consideration were to be given by the Council, on an urgent basis, to an appropriate acknowledgement and support of his initiative.

By a presidential statement dated 7 March 1997,¹²⁰ the Council underlined the urgent need for a comprehensive and coordinated response by the international community in support of the efforts of the joint United Nations/OAU Special Representative for the Great Lakes region to prevent any further escalation of the crisis there and, in that respect, reiterated its full support for the five-point peace plan for eastern Zaire contained in resolution 1097 (1997). The Council welcomed the endorsement of that plan by OAU at its sixty-fifth ordinary session of the Council of Ministers held in Tripoli from 24 to 28 February 1997. The Council also welcomed all efforts, including those of the organizations and States of the region, aimed at resolving the crisis.

The situation in the Republic of the Congo

With regard to the situation in the Republic of the Congo, the Security Council, by a presidential statement dated 13 August 1997,¹²¹ affirmed its support for the role of the joint United Nations/Organization of African Unity Special Representative for the Great Lakes region in the negotiations to reach agreement on a ceasefire and a peaceful settlement of the crisis.

The situation concerning the Democratic Republic of the Congo

In connection with the situation concerning the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the Security Council supported the mediation efforts of OAU and the Southern African Development Community (SADC) towards the restoration of peace and stability in the region, which culminated in the signing of the Ceasefire Agreement in Lusaka on 10 July 1999.¹²²

By a presidential statement dated 29 May 1997,¹²³ the Council expressed its appreciation to the Secretaries-General of the United Nations and OAU and their Special Representative, among others, for their efforts to facilitate a peaceful solution to the crisis in the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

Furthermore, by a presidential statement dated 11 December 1998,¹²⁴ the Council expressed its support for the regional mediation process begun by OAU and SADC, led by the President of Zambia, took note of the steps which had been taken towards the peaceful settlement of the conflict and encouraged the President of Zambia to continue his efforts.

At the 3987th meeting, on 19 March 1999, the representative of the Democratic Republic of the Congo stated that Article 52 of the Charter encouraged the Council to support the peaceful settlement of local disputes through regional agreements. While expressing his gratitude for the efforts of the Council to ensure the proper implementation of that provision, in particular, through the two presidential statements the Council had adopted on the topic, he recalled that the last paragraph of Article 52 allowed the Council to simultaneously apply the provisions of Articles 34 and 35 of the Charter.¹²⁵

By resolution 1234 (1999) of 9 April 1999, the Council expressed its support for the regional mediation process by OAU and SADC to find a peaceful settlement to the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and called upon the international community to support those efforts. The Council also requested the Secretary-General to work closely with the Secretary-General of OAU in promoting a peaceful solution of the conflict.¹²⁶

By a presidential statement of 24 June 1999,¹²⁷ the Council reaffirmed its support for the regional mediation process facilitated by the President of Zambia on behalf of SADC, in cooperation with OAU and with support from the United Nations, to find a peaceful settlement to the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and took note of the constructive efforts being made to promote a peaceful settlement of the conflict in the context of the above-mentioned regional mediation process.

By resolution 1258 (1999) of 6 August 1999, which welcomed the signing of the Ceasefire Agreement in Lusaka on 10 July 1999,¹²⁸ the Council commended OAU and SADC for their efforts to find a peaceful settlement to the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo.¹²⁹

By resolution 1279 (1999) of 30 November 1999, the Council stressed the need for a continuing process of genuine national reconciliation and encouraged all Congolese to participate in the national dialogue to be organized in coordination with OAU. The Council further called upon all Congolese parties and OAU to finalize agreement on the facilitator for the national dialogue.¹³⁰

The situation in Angola

In Angola, OAU and SADC supported the efforts of the United Nations in furthering the Angolan peace process.

By a series of resolutions, the Security Council welcomed the efforts of OAU, among other actors, to promote peace and security in Angola.¹³¹

By resolution 1075 (1996) of 11 October 1996, the Council welcomed the efforts of OAU and SADC, among other actors, and encouraged them to continue their efforts to promote peace and security in Angola. While welcoming the Summit of the SADC Organ on Politics, Defence and Security which had taken place in Luanda on 2 October 1996,¹³² the Council regretted the failure of the leader of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola (UNITA) to attend the Summit and seize the opportunity for a more rapid advancement of the process. It expressed support for the continuing efforts of the heads of States and Government of SADC to accelerate the peace process in Angola.¹³³ In a subsequent decision, the Council

Letter dated 9 January 1996 from the Permanent Representative of Ethiopia to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council concerning the extradition of the suspects wanted in the assassination attempt on the life of the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, on 26 June 1995

In connection with the extradition of the three suspects wanted in the assassination attempt on the life of the President of Egypt in Addis Ababa on 26 June 1995, by a letter dated 9 January 1996 from the representative of Ethiopia, the Council was informed that the Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution of the Organization of African Unity issued two statements, on 11 September 1995 and 19 December 1995, respectively, on the matter. By the former statement, the Central Organ, inter alia, called upon the Government of the Sudan to hand over to Ethiopia the three terrorists who were sheltering in the Sudan, on the basis of the 1964 Extradition Treaty between Ethiopia and the Sudan.¹³⁵ The latter statement included provisions that requested the Government of the Sudan to implement the earlier statement in all its aspects and cooperate with OAU, the Secretary-General and the Central Organ, and urged the Government of the Sudan to take the necessary measures to extradite the three suspects.¹³⁶

By resolution 1044 (1996) of 31 January 1996, the Security Council supported the implementation of the requests contained in the above-mentioned statements of the Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution of the Organization of African Unity and regretted the fact that the Government of the Sudan had not yet complied with the requests. The Council urged the Government of the Sudan to comply with the requests of the Organization of African Unity without further delay and welcomed the efforts of the Secretary-General of OAU aimed at the implementation of the relevant provisions of the statements of the Central Organ of the Mechanism of 11 September 1995 and of 19 December 1995, and supported OAU in its continued efforts to implement its decisions.¹³⁷

By subsequent resolutions, the Council took note of the continued efforts of the Secretary-General of OAU to ensure the compliance of the Sudan with the requests of the Central Organ of the Mechanism.¹³⁸

The situation in Guinea-Bissau

Following the Abuja Agreement of 1 November 1998 brokered by the Economic Community of West African States, the Council supported the deployment of the Monitoring Group of ECOWAS in Guinea-Bissau, as specified in the Abuja Agreement.

By a presidential statement dated 6 November 1998,¹³⁹ the Council welcomed the agreement reached on 1 November 1998, in Abuja, between the Government of Guinea-Bissau and the Self-Proclaimed Military Junta during the Twenty-first Summit of the Authority of the Heads of State and Government of ECOWAS,¹⁴⁰ commended the mediation efforts of ECOWAS and of the Community of Portuguese-speaking Countries, and their respective Chairmen; and took note of the agreement regarding the withdrawal from Guinea-Bissau of all foreign troops and of the simultaneous deployment of the interposition force from the Monitoring Group of ECOWAS, which would take over from the withdrawn forces.

By resolution 1216 (1998) of 21 December 1998, the Council commended the States Members of the Community of Portuguese-speaking Countries and ECOWAS on the key role they were playing to restore peace and security throughout Guinea-Bissau and on their intention to participate with others in the observation of the forthcoming general and presidential elections. The Council welcomed the role of ECOMOG in the implementation of the Abuja Agreement, aimed at guaranteeing security along the Guinea-Bissau/Senegal border, keeping apart the parties in conflict and guaranteeing free access to humanitarian organizations and agencies to reach the affected civilian populations. The Council approved the implementation by the interposition force of ECOMOG of its mandate in a neutral and impartial way and in conformity with United Nations peacekeeping standards in order to achieve its objective to facilitate the return to peace and security. The Council further affirmed that the interposition force might be required to take action to ensure the security and freedom of movement of its personnel in the discharge of its mandate. By the same resolution, the Council requested ECOMOG to provide periodic reports at least every month through the Secretary-General, the first report to be made one month after the deployment of its troops.¹⁴¹ By a letter dated 16 April 1999, the Secretary-General transmitted the report prepared by the Executive Secretary of ECOWAS, including information regarding the deployment of ECOMOG.¹⁴²

By resolution 1233 (1999) of 6 April 1999, the Council welcomed the report of the Secretary-General of 17 March 1999, which included a report on the implementation of the mandate by ECOMOG,¹⁴³ and welcomed the deployment of troops constituting the Interposition Force of ECOMOG by States in the region to implement their peacekeeping mandate. The Council again commended, among others, the Community of Portuguese-speaking Countries and States members of ECOWAS for the key role they were playing to bring about national reconciliation and consolidating peace and security throughout Guinea-Bissau.¹⁴⁴ By the same resolution, the Council supported the decision of the Secretary-General to establish the United Nations Peacebuilding Support Office in Guinea-Bissau (UNOGBIS)¹⁴⁵ for which the mandate included the facilitation of the implementation of the Abuja Agreement, “in close cooperation with” ECOWAS and the Monitoring Group, among other actors.¹⁴⁶

The situation in Somalia

In a statement by the President dated 24 January 1996,¹⁴⁷ the Security Council welcomed the efforts of OAU, the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC), the League of Arab States, the European Union and the neighbouring States in promoting national dialogue in the search for a solution to the Somali crisis. Welcoming and supporting the intention of the Secretary-General to maintain the United Nations Political Office for Somalia, the Council stressed the importance of maintaining close cooperation with regional organizations.

By a presidential statement dated 20 December 1996,¹⁴⁸ the Council fully supported the efforts of the countries of the region as well as of international and regional organizations, in particular OAU and LAS, to facilitate a political settlement of the crisis in Somalia.

In his report dated 17 February 1997,¹⁴⁹ the Secretary-General, at the request of the Security Council, reported on his consultations with countries in the region in the hope of assisting those regional efforts. In that context, he attached a joint letter dated 31 January 1997 from the representative of Ethiopia, which had been given a mandate for Somalia on behalf of OAU and the Intergovernmental Authority on Development (IGAD), and from the representative of Kenya, as Chairman of IGAD. In that letter, they shared the view that coordination and cooperation between the IGAD countries and OAU, on the one hand, and the United Nations, on the other, from 1993 to 1995, on the question of Somalia had been inadequate. They had detected some changes for the better and hoped that such a recent trend would be strengthened in the future. They further stated that the most critical support that the United Nations could provide for the regional efforts was through exerting the necessary pressure on Somali factions to show greater commitment to national reconciliation, and asserted that the declaration of national pledges and commitments of 3 January 1997 achieved at Sodere, circumstances, the mandate of UNOGBIS was also revised. For more details, see the letter dated 28 June 1999 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Council (S/1999/737) and the report of the Secretary-General dated 1 July 1999 (S/1999/741, paras. 8 and 21).

Ethiopia, under the auspices of the IGAD countries was sufficiently inclusive to merit the full support of the United Nations.¹⁵⁰

By subsequent presidential statements dated 27 February and 23 December 1997,¹⁵¹ the Council similarly expressed its support for the efforts of various international and regional organizations in facilitating a political settlement of the crisis in Somalia.

By a presidential statement dated 12 November 1999,¹⁵² the Council expressed its full support for the efforts of IGAD to find a political solution to the crisis in Somalia; welcomed the initiative of the President of Djibouti aimed at restoring peace and stability in Somalia, outlined in his letter of 23 September 1999 to the President of the Council;¹⁵³ and looked forward to the finalization of the proposals of the President of Djibouti at the forthcoming IGAD Summit and stood ready to work with IGAD to help bring about national unity and the restoration of a national government in Somalia.

The situation between Eritrea and Ethiopia

In connection with the situation between Eritrea and Ethiopia, the Security Council supported the efforts of OAU to achieve a peaceful settlement of the conflict.

By resolution 1177 (1998) of 26 June 1998, the Council commended the efforts of OAU and of others, in cooperation with that organization, to achieve a peaceful settlement of the conflict, and expressed its strong support for the decision of the Assembly of the Heads of State and Government of OAU of 10 June 1998 to send to Eritrea and Ethiopia a delegation of its Central Organ.¹⁵⁴ The Council urged OAU to follow up on its initiative as quickly as possible.¹⁵⁵

By resolution 1226 (1999) of 29 January 1999, the Council, commending the efforts of concerned countries and regional bodies aimed at facilitating a peaceful solution to the border dispute between Ethiopia and Eritrea, expressed its strong support for the mediation efforts of OAU and for the Framework Agreement as approved on 17 December 1998 by the Summit of the Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution of the Organization of African Unity,¹⁵⁶ and affirmed that the Framework Agreement provided the best opportunity for peace between the two parties.¹⁵⁷

By resolution 1227 (1999) of 10 February 1999, the Council again expressed its full support for the efforts of OAU and stressed that the Framework Agreement remained a viable and sound basis for a peaceful resolution of the conflict.¹⁵⁸ In a presidential statement dated 27 February 1999, the Council reiterated that position.¹⁵⁹

The question concerning Haiti

In Haiti, the Security Council continued to encourage and support the efforts of the Organization of American States (OAS), particularly within the framework of the International Civilian Mission in Haiti (MICIVIH), a joint mission carried out by the United Nations and OAS, in accordance with the General Assembly resolution 47/20 B.

By resolution 1048 (1996) of 29 February 1996, the Security Council welcomed and supported the efforts of OAS to promote, in cooperation with the United Nations, consolidation of peace and democracy in Haiti. The Council also commended the contribution of, among others, MICIVIH.¹⁶⁰

By resolution 1063 (1996) of 28 June 1996, taking note of the resolution adopted at the seventh plenary session of the twenty-sixth regular session of OAS, which encouraged the international community to sustain the same level of commitment it had demonstrated during the years of crisis, and at the request of the Government of Haiti, the Council decided to establish the United Nations Support

Mission in Haiti (UNSMIH). By the same resolution, the Council invited the “further participation” of OAS.¹⁶¹ Prior to the vote, at the 3676th meeting, held on 28 June 1996, the representative of the Russian Federation stated that his Government had “misgivings” about the need for a new operation. However, taking into consideration the appeal made by the President of Haiti and the position of OAS and the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General for Haiti,¹⁶² his delegation had joined other members of the Council in consenting to the establishment of UNSMIH. He underlined that it was important that the draft resolution sought to continue and further step up the efforts of OAS to provide assistance in resolving problems in Haiti.¹⁶³

By a presidential statement dated 25 March 1998,¹⁶⁴ the Council reaffirmed that further assistance to the Haitian National Police, should it be needed, should be provided with the full support of the international community through international and regional organizations, among other actors.

Asia

The situation in Tajikistan and along the Tajik-Afghan border

In Tajikistan, the Council encouraged close cooperation between the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan (UNMOT), the collective peacekeeping forces of the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) and the mission in Tajikistan of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe in support of the efforts of the international community towards resolving the inter-Tajik conflict.

In the context of the inter-Tajik talks, which had been conducted under the auspices of the United Nations since 1994, the Council, by a presidential statement dated 21 May 1996,¹⁶⁵ called upon the countries and regional organizations acting as observers at those talks to render all possible support to the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative aimed at the earliest possible resumption of the talks. By a series of decisions during the review period, the Council continued to express its satisfaction at the regular contacts between, among others, UNMOT, the collective peacekeeping forces of CIS, the border forces of the Russian Federation and the mission of OSCE in Tajikistan.¹⁶⁶

Following the successful conclusion of the inter-Tajik talks with the signing of the General Agreement on the Establishment of Peace and National Accord in Tajikistan,¹⁶⁷ in his report of 4 September 1997,¹⁶⁸ the Secretary-General stated that UNMOT would continue to cooperate closely with OSCE, which had been requested to facilitate the implementation of the General Agreement in the areas related to the observance of human rights and the establishment of democratic political and legal institutions and processes. The report noted that it was envisaged that UNMOT and the OSCE mission in Tajikistan would complement and support each other in those activities.

In a subsequent report dated 5 November 1997,¹⁶⁹ the Secretary-General informed the Council that the military component of UNMOT had maintained close working relations with the CIS peacekeeping forces. The report further noted the decision of CIS to authorize its peacekeeping forces in Tajikistan to provide security to the personnel of UNMOT, OSCE and other international organizations.

By resolution 1138 (1997) of 14 November 1997, the Council welcomed the decision of CIS to authorize its collective peacekeeping forces to assist in providing security for United Nations personnel, at the request of UNMOT and with the agreement of the parties. By the same resolution, the Council authorized the Secretary-General to expand UNMOT and mandated the Mission to, among other tasks, maintain close contact with the parties, as well as cooperative liaison with the CIS peacekeeping forces, the border forces of the Russian Federation and the OSCE mission in Tajikistan. In addition, the Council welcomed the

By a presidential statement dated 24 February 1998¹⁷², the Council welcomed the readiness of the CIS peacekeeping forces to arrange for the guarding of United Nations premises in Dushanbe, as mentioned in the Secretary-General's report of 10 February 1998, and encouraged UNMOT and CIS collective peacekeeping forces to make the relevant arrangements.

By resolution 1167 (1998) of 14 May 1998, the Council encouraged the Mission and CIS collective peacekeeping forces to continue discussion of options for improving security cooperation, as set out in the Secretary-General's report of 6 May 1998.¹⁷³

Following the report by the Secretary-General on the launching of preparations for elections by the United Nations and OSCE,¹⁷⁴ by resolution 1240 (1999) of 15 May 1999, the Council encouraged OSCE to continue its close cooperation with the United Nations on matters relating to constitutional reform, democratization and elections, as requested under the General Agreement.¹⁷⁵

By a presidential statement dated 15 February 1996,¹⁷⁶ the Council reaffirmed its readiness to assist the Afghan people in their efforts to return peace and normalcy to their country, and encouraged all States, as well as the Organization of the Islamic Conference, the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries and others, to support the efforts of the United Nations Special Mission to Afghanistan (UNSMA) to the same end.

By resolution 1160 (1998) of 31 March 1998, the Security Council expressed its support for the efforts of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe for a peaceful resolution of the crisis in Kosovo, including through the Personal Representative of the Chairman-in-Office for the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, who was also the Special Representative of the European Union. The Council also welcomed the return of the OSCE long-term missions.¹⁷⁹

The situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina

In Bosnia and Herzegovina, the United Nations cooperated with regional organizations in the implementation of the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the annexes thereto (collectively the "Peace Agreement").¹⁸⁰

By a presidential statement dated 8 August 1996,¹⁸¹ the Security Council welcomed the efforts of the European Union Administration of Mostar to facilitate the agreement reached by the Bosniac and Bosnian Croat leaderships in Mostar.

By resolution 1074 (1996) of 1 October 1996, the Council expressed its appreciation to the Commander of the multinational Implementation Force (IFOR) and to OSCE, among others, for their contributions to the implementation of the Peace Agreement.¹⁸²

The situation in Georgia

In Georgia, the Security Council continued to encourage the efforts of the collective peacekeeping force of the Commonwealth of Independent States, operating side by side with the United Nations Mission in Georgia (UNOMIG). The Council also encouraged the efforts of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, aimed at achieving a comprehensive political settlement of the conflict.

By resolution 1036 (1996) of 12 January 1996, the Council, noting that the Agreement on a Ceasefire and Separation of Forces signed in Moscow on 14 May 1994¹⁸³ had generally been respected by the parties with the assistance of the collective peacekeeping force of CIS and UNOMIG, reaffirmed its support for the efforts of, among others, OSCE, aimed at achieving a comprehensive political settlement of the conflict.¹⁸⁴

In his report of 1 July 1996, the Secretary-General recommended the creation of an office for the protection and promotion of human rights in Abkhazia, to be carried out by the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, in cooperation with OSCE.¹⁸⁵ By resolution 1077 (1996) of 22 October 1996,¹⁸⁶ the Council welcomed the report of the Secretary-General of 1 July 1996, and in particular its paragraph 18, and decided that the Office referred to in that report should form part of UNOMIG, under the authority of the Head of UNOMIG, consistent with the arrangements described in paragraph 7 of the report of the Secretary-General of 9 August 1996.¹⁸⁷

By a series of decisions, the Council commended the important contribution made by UNOMIG and the collective peacekeeping force of CIS to the stabilization of the situation.¹⁸⁸ Noting that the cooperation between the Mission and CIS had been good and had developed considerably, the Council also stressed the importance of continued close cooperation and coordination between the two in the performance of their respective mandates.¹⁸⁹

At the 4029th meeting, on 30 July 1999, the representative of Georgia recalled that his country had always supported the idea of introducing a self-protection unit in the conflict zone to protect UNOMIG. He regretted that the cooperation between the United Nations and OSCE on resolving the conflict was still lagging in view of the decision adopted at the December 1998 Oslo ministerial OSCE meeting towards the promotion of cooperation.¹⁹⁰ The representative of the Russian Federation noted, however, that the continuing close interaction between the United Nations and the CIS peacekeeping force was taking place strictly on the basis of Chapter VIII of the Charter, adding that the activities of the CIS peacekeeping force were backed by the relevant resolutions of the Council. Steps had also been taken to enhance the effectiveness of the CIS peacekeeping force in order to ensure the security of the international personnel of the United Nations.¹⁹¹

C. Calls by the Security Council for involvement of regional arrangements in the implementation of Chapter VII measures

During the period under review, regional arrangements were called upon to assist in the implementation of measures imposed by the Security Council under Chapter VII of the Charter, as in the cases of Angola, the Sudan and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia described below. In this context, the Council often called upon “all international and regional organizations” to act in accordance with the relevant provisions of resolutions imposing such mandatory measures.¹⁹²

The situation in Angola

By resolution 1127 (1997) of 28 August 1997, the Council, in imposing the travel ban on senior officials of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, urged all States and “international and regional organizations” to stop travel by their officials and official delegations to the central headquarters of UNITA, except for the purposes of travel to promote the peace process and humanitarian assistance.¹⁹³

Following the downing over territory controlled by UNITA of two aircraft chartered by the United Nations, by resolution 1221 (1999) of 12 January 1999, the Council, acting under Chapter VII, expressed its readiness to pursue reports of violations of the measures imposed against UNITA by resolutions 864 (1993), 1127 (1997) and 1173 (1998), to take steps to reinforce the implementation of those measures and to consider the imposition of additional measures on the basis of a report to be prepared by the Committee established pursuant to resolution 864 (1993). In that context, the Council encouraged the Chairman of the Committee to consult with the Organization of African Unity and the Southern African Development Community on ways to strengthen the implementation of the mandatory measures.¹⁹⁴

D. Authorization by the Security Council of the use of force by regional arrangements

During the period under review, the Security Council gave its authorization to regional arrangements to take necessary actions in the implementation of mandatory measures against Sierra Leone and regarding peacekeeping activities in Bosnia and Herzegovina and Kosovo.

The situation in Sierra Leone

In connection with the situation in Sierra Leone, the Security Council cooperated with the Economic Community of West African States in the implementation of the mandatory measures against Sierra Leone, by authorizing them explicitly under Chapter VIII of the Charter.

By resolution 1132 (1997), adopted at the 3822nd meeting, on 8 October 1997, the Council, “acting under Chapter VIII of the Charter”, authorized ECOWAS to ensure strict implementation of the provisions of the resolution concerning the petroleum and arms embargoes, including, where necessary and in conformity with applicable international standards, by halting inward maritime shipping in order to inspect and verify their cargoes and destinations, and called upon all States to cooperate with ECOWAS in that regard. The Council also requested ECOWAS to report every 30 days to the Committee established by the resolution on activities undertaken in that regard.²⁰⁴

At the meeting, before the adoption of resolution 1132 (1997), in welcoming the above-mentioned provisions, a few speakers explicitly referred to Chapter VIII of the Charter. The representative of the Republic of Korea welcomed the commitment of the ECOWAS countries to assume responsibilities for “enforcement action under Chapter VIII of the Charter” and expected ECOWAS to discharge its responsibility in a way that would contribute to the peaceful resolution of the crisis in Sierra Leone.²⁰⁵ The representative of Portugal noted that ECOWAS was authorized to ensure the strict implementation of the mandatory measures “under Chapter VIII of the Charter”, which foresaw the utilization of regional arrangements for the enforcement of Council decisions.²⁰⁶ The representative of the United States stated that with resolution 1132 (1997), “in accordance with Chapter VIII of the Charter”, the Council joined the efforts of ECOWAS in resolving the crisis, as ECOWAS had done successfully for neighbouring Liberia.²⁰⁷

The representative of France expressed the view that the authorization of ECOWAS was “exceptional in nature”, legitimized by the past experience of cooperation between the United Nations and ECOWAS. He further stressed that the members of ECOWAS should properly discharge the mission entrusted to them.²⁰⁸ The representative of the Russian Federation reiterated that enforcement action should not be undertaken by regional organizations without the authorization of the Security Council. He expected ECOWAS to regularly inform the Council of the impact of the sanctions on the humanitarian situation.²⁰⁹

In Bosnia and Herzegovina, during the period under review, the Security Council authorized the legal transition from a multinational Implementation Force (IFOR) to a multinational Stabilization Force (SFOR), repeatedly extended its mandate, and expressed appreciation for its efforts towards the implementation of the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the annexes thereto (collectively the “Peace Agreement”).²¹⁰

By resolution 1088 (1996) of 12 December 1996, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, authorized the Member States acting through or in cooperation with the organization referred to in annex 1-A of the Peace Agreement to establish, for a planned period of 18 months, SFOR as the legal successor to IFOR, under unified command and control, in order to fulfil the role specified in annexes 1-A and 2 of the Peace Agreement.²¹¹ The Council also authorized Member States acting under the above provision to “take all necessary measures” to effect the implementation of and to ensure compliance with annex 1-A of the Peace Agreement, stressing that the parties should continue to be held equally responsible for compliance with that annex and should be equally subject to such enforcement action by SFOR as might be necessary to ensure implementation of that annex and the protection of the Force. The Council authorized Member States to “take all necessary measures”, at the request of SFOR, either in defence of the Force or to assist the Force in carrying out its mission, and recognized the right of the Force to take all necessary measures to defend itself from attack or threat of attack.²¹²

By resolutions 1174 (1998) of 15 June 1998 and 1247 (1999) of 18 June 1999, the Council, acting under Chapter VII, extended the mandate of SFOR for a further planned period of 12 months and emphasized its appreciation to SFOR, among others, for its contributions to the implementation of the Peace Agreement.²¹³

By resolution 1244 (1999) of 10 June 1999, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, authorized Member States and relevant international organizations to establish an international security presence in Kosovo, with substantial North Atlantic Treaty Organization participation, with all necessary means to fulfil its responsibilities.²¹⁴

E. Deliberations on the appropriateness of Security Council action

The enumeration of the peaceful means by which the parties to a dispute, in accordance with Article 33 (1) of the Charter, shall first seek to settle their dispute, includes “resort to regional agencies or arrangements”. This is further emphasized in Article 52, which states that Member States “shall make every effort to achieve pacific settlement of local disputes through such regional arrangements or by such regional agencies before referring them to the Security Council” and that the Council “shall encourage the development of pacific settlement of local disputes through such regional arrangements or by such regional agencies”.

During the period under review, Member States challenged the competence of the Council to consider a dispute on the basis of these provisions in one instance, as demonstrated in the first case study in this section (case 21), in connection with the agenda item entitled “Letter dated 9 January 1996 from the Permanent Representative of Ethiopia to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council concerning the extradition of the suspects wanted in the assassination attempt on the life of the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, on 26 June 1995”.²¹⁵

Furthermore, while Article 53 stipulates that the Council utilize, where appropriate, regional arrangements, it also states that “no enforcement action shall be taken under regional arrangements or by regional agencies without the authorization of the Council”. During the period under review, Member States discussed the necessity of Council action, arguing that Article 53 had been violated, as demonstrated in the two case studies concerning Kosovo (cases 22 and 23).

²¹¹ In accordance with the general obligations listed under annex 1-A of the Peace Agreement, it was understood and agreed that NATO might establish a multinational military implementation force, which would operate under the authority and be subject to the direction and political control of the North Atlantic Council through the NATO chain of command. Case 21

*Letter dated 9 January 1996 from the Permanent Representative of Ethiopia to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council concerning the extradition of the suspects wanted in the assassination attempt on the life of the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, on 26 June 1995*²¹⁶

At the 3627th meeting, on 31 January 1996, the representative of Ethiopia urged the Council to adopt a resolution calling upon the Sudan to comply with the request made by the Organization of African Unity for the extradition of the three suspects wanted in the assassination attempt on the life of the President of Egypt in Addis Ababa, on 26 June 1995. He added that such action by the Council in support of the decisions of OAU would further strengthen cooperation and complementarity between the United Nations and regional organizations in the maintenance of peace and security.²¹⁷

The representative of the Sudan, however, maintained that, although his Government was disappointed at the outcome of the meeting of the Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and resolution of OAU, which adopted its resolution of 11 September 1995²¹⁸ without formally inviting his country, the Sudan had accepted it and continued its cooperation by responding to the OAU mission to the Sudan. He further noted that at its subsequent meeting on 19 December 1995, the Central Organ had issued a statement which urged the Government of the Sudan to “take the necessary measures to look for, locate and extradite” the three suspects and decided to remain seized with the issue.²¹⁹ Nonetheless, he argued, the Government of Ethiopia had brought the matter to the Security Council on the same day of the statement. He questioned the refusal by “some members of the Council” to await the outcome of OAU efforts on the question and the reason for exerting pressure on the Council to consider the question while OAU was considering the matter.²²⁰

The representative of Egypt stated that when Ethiopia resorted to the Council, it had done so by using its right under Article 35 of the Charter. In his view, Article 54 made it clear that the Council should be kept fully informed of activities undertaken by regional organizations for the maintenance of international peace and security.²²¹

The representative of the Russian Federation maintained that, given the adoption of a series of decisions on the question of extradition, the greatest possible involvement by the regional machinery — OAU in the present case — was the best way to go. His delegation welcomed the constructive cooperation between the United Nations and regional organizations, and also the Council’s involvement, where necessary, in support of those organizations. However, he remarked that there was no justification for the Council to take the place of regional organizations on the issue of the Sudan and held that the ongoing form of cooperation between the Council and OAU was capable of yielding positive results in settling the question.²²²

By resolution 1044 (1996), adopted at that meeting, the Council, inter alia, called upon the Government of the Sudan to comply with the requests of OAU without further delay.²²³

At the 3660th meeting, on 26 April 1996, the representative of the Sudan emphasized that the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter established the legal framework for cooperation between the United Nations and regional organizations, including OAU. Nevertheless, the States parties to the dispute had resorted directly to the United Nations for adoption of measures to condemn and punish the Sudan. He was of the view that the OAU Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution should have been given the opportunity to prove its ability in conflict prevention and resolution and should have been enabled to intervene appropriately in the initial stages, given the familiarity of OAU with regional conditions. He affirmed that it had spared no effort towards a solution to the dispute, and was continuing its activities in that regard. Pointing out the imminent adoption of coercive measures by the Council, the representative of the Sudan questioned the value of resolution 1044 (1996), which was primarily aimed at giving OAU the opportunity it needed to do its work. The representative wondered whether the conflict-settlement Mechanism of OAU had reached a dead

At the 3937th meeting, on 24 October 1998, at which the Council adopted resolution 1203 (1998), the representative of Brazil cautioned against the decision by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization of 13 October 1998 on the possible use of force against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. He asserted that, setting aside the question of how regional groups defined themselves, according to the Charter, non-universal organizations could resort to force only on the basis of either the right to legitimate self-defence, as stipulated in Article 51, or through the procedures of Chapter VIII, in particular Article 53, which imposed on regional organizations the obligation to seek the authorization of the Council and to abide by Council decisions. Stressing that there was no third way, he further observed that it would be regrettable if a two-tiered international system developed, in which the Council bore responsibility for the peace and security of most of the world, while bearing only secondary responsibility in regions that were covered by special defence agreements.²²⁷

The representative of the Russian Federation pointed out that the resolution did not contain any provision which would sanction directly or indirectly the automatic use of force or would be to the detriment of the prerogatives of the Council under the Charter. He expected the immediate cancellation by NATO of its decision on the possible use of force, the so-called “activation order”, which remained in force.²²⁸ The representative of China stated that as the agreements on the question of Kosovo were being concluded between the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the parties concerned, a regional organization had made the decision to take military actions against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and interfere in its internal affairs, a decision that had been made unilaterally, without consulting the Council or seeking its authorization, in blatant violation of the Charter.²²⁹

*Letter dated 24 March 1999 from the Permanent Representative of the Russian Federation to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council*²³⁰

At the 3988th meeting,²³¹ on 24 March 1999, Mr. Vladislav Jovanović remarked that the decision to attack an independent country had been taken outside the Council, the sole body responsible, under the Charter of the United Nations, for the maintenance of international peace and security. He expressed the view that such a blatant aggression was “in direct contravention of Article 53, paragraph 1 of the Charter”.²³² In addition, the representative of India reaffirmed the commitment to the Charter, which clearly stipulated that no enforcement actions should be taken under regional arrangements without the authorization of the Security Council. He concurred that the attacks against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia were in clear violation of Article 53 of the Charter and that no country, group of countries or regional arrangement could arrogate to themselves the right to take arbitrary and unilateral action against others.²³³

At the 3989th meeting, on 26 March 1999, the Council had before it a draft resolution, by which, affirming that the unilateral use of force by NATO against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia constituted a flagrant violation of the Charter, in particular Articles 2 (4), 24 and 53, the Council, acting under Chapters VII and VIII of the Charter, would have demanded an immediate cessation of the use of force against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and urgent resumption of negotiations.²³⁴

The representative of the Russian Federation argued that the continuing military action, undertaken under the pretext of preventing a humanitarian catastrophe, had already caused severe humanitarian consequences in Kosovo. He maintained that the aggressive military action unleashed by NATO against a sovereign State without the authorization, and in circumvention, of the Council, was a real threat to international peace and security. Quoting Article 53 of the Charter, he reaffirmed the inadmissibility of any enforcement action under regional arrangements or by regional agencies without the authorization of the Council.²³⁵

The draft resolution was not adopted because it did not obtain the required majority.²³⁶

Part IV

Consideration of the miscellaneous provisions of the Charter (Articles 102 and 103)

Article 102

1. Every treaty and every international agreement entered into by any Member of the United Nations after the present Charter comes into force shall as soon as possible be registered with the Secretariat and published by it.

2. No party to any such treaty or international agreement which has not been registered in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 1 of this Article may invoke that treaty or agreement before any organ of the United Nations.

Article 103

In the event of a conflict between the obligations of the Members of the United Nations under the present Charter and their obligations under any other international agreement, their obligations under the present Charter shall prevail.

Note

During the period under review, Article 102 was not explicitly invoked in any resolution. However, an express reference was made in a communication from the representative of the Russian Federation to the Secretary-General, transmitting the General Agreement on the

Establishment of Peace and National Accord in Tajikistan, signed in Moscow on 27 June 1997.¹

During the period under review, Article 103 was not explicitly invoked in any resolution or presidential statement. However, the Security Council adopted a number of resolutions imposing measures within the framework of Article 41, in which it implicitly invoked the principle enshrined in Article 103, by emphasizing the primacy of the Charter obligations over obligations contracted by Member States under any other international agreement. The resolutions by which the Council imposed mandatory measures against the Sudan, the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, Sierra Leone, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the Taliban included such provisions, as set out below.

In connection with the item entitled "Letter dated 9 January 1996 from the Permanent Representative of Ethiopia to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council concerning the extradition of the suspects wanted in the assassination attempt on the life of the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, on 26 June 1995",² the Council, by resolution 1054 (1996) of 26 April 1996, imposed sanctions against the Sudan involving restrictions on diplomatic representation and travel by government officials, and called upon all States, including States not Members of the United Nations, and specialized agencies of the United Nations to act strictly in conformity with the resolution “notwithstanding the existence of any rights granted or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or of any contract entered into or any licence or permit granted prior to the entry into force of the provisions” set out in the resolution.³ Similar language was employed in resolution 1267 (1999) of 15 October 1999, in connection with the situation in Afghanistan, by which, effective 14 November 1999, the Council imposed mandatory measures against individuals or entities belonging to or associated with the Taliban, if the Taliban failed to turn over Osama bin Laden to the appropriate authorities.⁴

With regard to the situation in Angola, by resolutions 1127 (1997) of 28 August 1997 and 1173 (1998) of 12 June 1998, the Council, in imposing sanctions against UNITA, called upon all States and all international and regional organizations to act strictly in accordance with the provisions of the respective resolutions, “notwithstanding the existence of any rights or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or any contract entered into or any licence or permit granted prior to the date of their adoption”.⁵ Such provisions were also contained in resolutions 1132 (1997) of 8 October 1997 and 1160 (1998) of 31 March 1998, by which the Council imposed the petroleum and arms embargo and selective travel ban against Sierra Leone and the arms embargo against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, including Kosovo, respectively.⁶

In addition, during the deliberations of the Council, Article 103 was explicitly referred to on several occasions. One such reference was made at the 3988th meeting, on 23 March 1999, in connection with the item entitled “Letter dated 24 March 1999 from the Permanent Representative of the Russian Federation to the President of the Security Council”,⁷ during which the representative of the Russian Federation condemned the “unilateral” use of force by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization against “the sovereign Federal Republic of Yugoslavia”, which was, in his opinion, carried out without the authorization of the Council. In that context, he reminded members of NATO of the obligations of States Members of the United Nations under the Charter, in particular, Article 103, which established the supremacy of the Charter over any other international obligations.⁸ Two other explicit references to Article 103 were made during the 3864th meeting, on 20 March 1998, in connection with the item entitled “Letters dated 20 and 23 December 1991 from France, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America”,⁹ which will be treated in the case below.¹⁰

Case 24, in the context of the destruction of Pan Am flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland, in 1988, concerns the application filed by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to the International Court of Justice on 3 March 1992, on the interpretation and application of the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Civil Aviation of 23 September 1971.¹¹ The case covers the relevant deliberations of the Council at the meeting convened following the two judgments delivered by the Court on 27 February 1998.¹²

*Letters dated 20 and 23 December 1991, from France, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America*¹³

By a letter dated 2 March 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya informed the Council of the two judgments delivered on 27 February 1998 by the International Court of Justice.¹⁴

At the 3864th meeting, on 20 March 1998, at which no action was taken, the Council held a discussion on the question of compliance by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya with its international obligations in the context of the destruction of Pan Am flight 103 as well as the measures imposed against that country by resolutions 731 (1992), 748 (1992) and 883 (1993). The representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya recalled the demands of the United States and the United Kingdom upon the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya for the extradition of its two citizens suspected of being involved in the incident of the destruction of Pan Am flight

103 over Lockerbie, Scotland, in 1988.¹⁵ He noted that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had dealt with the “suspicion” of its two citizens within the framework of the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Civil Aviation, article 7 of which accorded the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya judicial competence for trying the two suspects.¹⁶ The representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya further argued that by its judgments, rendered on 27 February 1998, the Court had confirmed that the dispute was a legal one and that the Court had jurisdiction over it.¹⁷ He noted that on the basis of article 14 (1) of the Montreal Convention,¹⁸ the requests of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya were admissible, notwithstanding resolutions 748 (1992) and 883 (1993). He underscored that the sanctions provided for in resolutions 748 (1992) and 883 (1993) had become irrelevant and moot since the Court had accepted jurisdiction in the matter on which the resolutions were based. He further stated that although the Charter and the Statute of the International Court of Justice confirmed that each party to the dispute must comply with the judgments pursuant to Article 94 (2) of the Charter, the Council had the power to adopt measures to give effect to a judgment and to ensure that a judgment was binding on all Members of the United Nations. He added that under Article 92 of the Charter, the Court was the principal judicial organ of the United Nations and that each Member of the United Nations needed to comply with the judgments of the Court in any case to which it was a party, pursuant to Article 94 (1). He also stressed that the Council should call on the parties involved not to take any unilateral or multilateral measures until the Court rendered its final judgment.¹⁹

The representative of Mali, speaking on behalf of the Group of African States, stressed that with regard to the judgments of the Court, the Group believed that there was no longer any reason for the Council to maintain sanctions against the people of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. The Court had rejected the claims that the Convention did not apply to the Lockerbie conflict and stated that it was up to the Court to decide the matter. He attested that the Court had also rejected the claim that the rights of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya under the Convention were suspended following the adoption of resolutions 748 (1992) and 883 (1993), which had imposed sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya on the basis of Articles 25 and 103 of the Charter. He reminded the Council that the Court explicitly rejected the claims that resolutions 731 (1992), 748 (1992) and 883 (1993) obliged the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to extradite its nationals to the United States or the United Kingdom so that they could be brought to trial, notwithstanding the rights of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya under the Convention. Recalling also that the Court had rejected the claims that the relevant legal proceedings needed to be halted immediately on the presumption that the resolutions of the Council could not be challenged in the Court, the representative of Mali argued that the sanctions provided for in resolutions 748 (1992) and 883 (1993) no longer had any raison d’être. Accordingly, the Group of African States believed that there needed to be a suspension of the application of the resolutions relative to sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, including the air embargo, reduced diplomatic representation and the freeze on assets, until the Court ruled on the substance of the matter.²⁰

The representative of the United Kingdom, however, stated that the International Court of Justice had decided that it did have jurisdiction to decide on the merits of the case of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya in respect of the Convention, but it had not decided that the claims of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya were justified. He noted that the United Kingdom was arguing before the Court that the matter was governed by resolutions 731 (1992), 748 (1992) and 883 (1993), which obliged the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to surrender the two accused of the destruction of Pan Am flight 103 for trial in Scotland or the United States. He underscored that obligations under the Charter of the United Nations, including compliance with binding

¹⁶ Article 7 of the Convention states the following: “The Contracting State in the territory of which the alleged offender is found shall, if it does not extradite him, be obliged, without exception whatsoever and whether or not the offence was committed in its territory, to submit the case to its competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution. Those authorities shall take their decision in the same manner as in the case of any ordinary offence of a serious nature under the law of that State.”

¹⁷ S/PV.3864 and Corr.1, pp. 9-10.

¹⁸ Article 14 (1) of the Convention states: “Any dispute between two or more Contracting States concerning the interpretation or application of this Convention which cannot be settled through negotiation, shall, at the request of one of them, be submitted to arbitration. If within six months from the date of the request for arbitration the Parties are unable to agree on the organization of the arbitration, any one of those Parties may refer the dispute to the International Court of Justice by request in conformity with the Statute of the Court”.

Security Council resolutions, took precedence over any other alleged international obligations. The representative argued that the Court had decided that the above-mentioned point of the United Kingdom was a substantive one and that it could not be ruled on in a preliminary way but should be considered at a full hearing. The decision was just one stage in the judicial proceedings, with the main argument on the merits still to come. He stressed that the Government of the United Kingdom would contest the next phase of the case vigorously as the argument on the binding nature of the resolutions and their overriding authority was one that had implications beyond the facts of the case. He underscored that the resolutions were unaffected by the ruling of the Court and therefore remained in force.²¹

The representative of Brazil argued that the Governments of the United Kingdom, the United States and France, by bringing the issue to the Council, had demonstrated their faith in the multilateral system.²² He noted, however, that the ruling of the Court on the matter of the applicability of the Convention would have a bearing on how the Council assessed the conditions for the compliance of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya with the relevant resolutions. He recalled the opinion of Judge Kooijmans of the Court, who stated:

²² Ibid., pp. 26-27.

Resolutions taken under Chapter VII may have far-reaching legal effects, but they are not irrevocable or unalterable ... [T]he Security Council is free to confirm, revoke or amend them and consequently they cannot be called “final” even if during their lifetime they may be dispositive of the rights and obligations of Member States, overriding rights and obligations these States may have under other treaties.²³

In an express reference to Article 103, the representative of Brazil also cited the position held by Judge Rezek of the Court in his individual opinion. Commenting on the necessity to resolve the “conflict between treaties”, Mr. Rezek stated:

Article 103 of the Charter is a rule for resolving conflict between treaties ... It resolves the conflict in favour of the Charter ... It is indeed the United Nations Charter (not a Security Council resolution, a General Assembly recommendation or a ruling of the International Court of Justice) which benefits from the pre-eminence established in this standard; it is the Charter, with all the weight of its principles, its system and its distribution of authority.²⁴
