Introduction

The present publication (volumes I and II) constitutes the thirteenth supplement to the Repertoire of the Practice of the Security Council, 1946-1951, which was issued in 1954. It covers the proceedings of the Security Council from the 3616th meeting, on 5 January 1996, to the 4086th meeting, on 30 December 1999.

The Repertoire was mandated by the General Assembly in its resolution 686 (VII) of 5 December 1952, entitled “Ways and means for making the evidence of customary international law more readily available”. It is a guide to the proceedings of the Council and sets forth in a readily accessible form the practices and procedures to which the Council has had recourse. The Repertoire is not intended as a substitute for the records of the Council, which constitute the only comprehensive and authoritative account of its deliberations.

The categories employed to arrange the material are not intended to suggest the existence of procedures or practices that have not been clearly or demonstrably established by the Council itself. The Council is at all times, within the framework of the Charter of the United Nations, its own provisional rules of procedure, and practice established through notes by the President of the Security Council, master of its own procedure.

In recording the Council’s practice, the headings under which the practices and procedures of the Council were presented in the original publication have been largely retained. Where necessary, however, adjustments have been made to better reflect the Council’s practice. For ease of reference, the studies contained in chapter VIII are organized according to region or thematic issues. This introduction contains a table indicating the membership of the Security Council during the period under review.

The agenda items considered by the Council during 1996-1999, and the meetings at which they were considered, are presented in a table hereunder in the order in which the items were initially taken up during the period.

Symbols of United Nations documents are composed of letters combined with figures. Security Council documents are indicated by a symbol such as S/1996/380. References to the verbatim records of meetings of the Council are given in the form S/PV.3677, meetings being numbered consecutively, starting with the first meeting in 1946. As in previous recent supplements, reference is made in this Supplement only to the provisional verbatim records of Security Council meetings, as the practice of publishing the meeting records in the Official Records has been discontinued.

The resolutions adopted by the Security Council and most of the statements by the President are published in the yearly volumes of Resolutions and Decisions of the Security Council. Resolutions are identified by a number followed by the year of adoption in parentheses, for example, resolution 1273 (1999). Statements by the President not included in the yearly volumes are recorded in the relevant verbatim records.

Readers who wish to consult the full record of a meeting or the text of a Security Council document referred to in the Repertoire may do so on the official United Nations Documentation Centre website, www.un.org/en/documents/. Security Council documents can be accessed on the website by selecting “Official Document System (ODS)” or one of the direct links to specific categories of documents. The volumes of resolutions and decisions may be accessed by symbol (S/INF/52, for 1996; S/INF/53, for 1997; S/INF/54, for 1998; and S/INF/55, for 1999). The original Repertoire and the other supplements may be consulted at www.un.org/en/sc/repertoire.

Introductory note

The present chapter contains material bearing upon the practice of the Security Council in relation to its provisional rules of procedure, arranged as follows: part I, Meetings (rules 1-5); part II, Representation and credentials (rules 13-17); part III, Presidency (rules 18-20); part IV, Secretariat (rules 21-26); part V, Conduct of business (rules 27-36); part VI, Languages (rules 41-47); part VII, Publicity of meetings, records (rules 48-57).

As in previous Supplements, the major subheadings contained in this chapter follow the order of the relevant chapters of the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council. The case histories and other information presented here do not constitute cumulative evidence of the practice of the Council, but are indicative of issues and practices that have arisen in the proceedings of the Council.

The practice of the Council in relation to some of the provisional rules of procedure is more appropriately dealt with in other chapters of this Supplement, as follows: rules 6 to 12, in chapter II (Agenda); rule 28, in chapter V (Subsidiary organs of the Security Council); rules 37 and 39, in chapter III (Participation in the proceedings of the Security Council); rule 40, in chapter IV (Voting); rules 58 to 60, in chapter VII (Practice relative to recommendations to the General Assembly regarding membership in the United Nations); and rule 61, in chapter VI (Relations with other United Nations organs).

During the period under review, the Council did not formally consider the adoption or amendment of its provisional rules of procedure, although during discussions on working methods of the Council in informal consultations of the whole held on 23 December 1997, some members stressed the need to adopt definitive rules of procedure for the Council.¹ However, by several notes of the President, the Council clarified its working methods and procedure. They will be covered in the relevant sections of the present chapter.

Part I Meetings (rules 1-5)

Note

The material in section A reflects the practice of the Council in relation to provisions of Article 28 of the Charter, and indicates special instances of the interpretation or application of rules 1 to 5 on the convening and place of Security Council meetings. Relevant material falling under rules 1 and 4 is included below. A new section, B, details a number of procedural developments relating to meetings that occurred during the period under review.

A. Special cases concerning the application of rules 1-5

Meetings of the Security Council shall, with the exception of the periodic meetings referred to in rule 4, be held at the call of the President at any time he deems necessary, but the interval between meetings shall not exceed fourteen days.

Case 1

From 1996 to 1999, there were two instances when Council meetings were not convened within the interval of 14 days: 20 days between the 3846th meeting on 23 December 1997 and the 3847th meeting on 13 January 1998; and 20 days between the 3993rd meeting on 9 April 1999 and the 3994th meeting on 30 April 1999. However, no questions arose in the proceedings of the Council on this matter.

Rule 4

Periodic meetings of the Security Council called for in Article 28 (2) of the Charter shall be held twice a year, at such times as the Security Council may decide.

Article 28 (2) provides that the Security Council shall hold periodic meetings at which each of its members may, if it so desires, be represented by a member of the Government or by some other specially designated representative. During the period under review, the Council held three ministerial-level meetings, all on the agenda item entitled “The situation in Africa”.²

In resolution 1170 (1998), adopted at the 3886th meeting on 28 May 1998, the Council expressed its intention to convene at the ministerial level on a biennial basis, beginning in September 1998 and subsequently as needed in order to assess progress in promoting peace and security in Africa. The 3931st and 4049th ministerial meetings were held one year apart.

B. Procedural developments relating to meetings

Formal meetings

In a note by the President dated 30 December 1999,³ the members of the Council restated their view that there should be an increased recourse to public meetings, and that the Secretary-General should be encouraged to make statements, when he deemed it appropriate, in public meetings of the Council.

The note also offered options for structuring formal meetings of the Council, as follows:

In an effort further to advance the resolution of a matter under consideration, the members of the Security Council have agreed to use a range of meeting options from which they can select the one best suited to facilitate specific discussions. Recognizing that the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council and their own practice provide them with considerable flexibility in choosing how best to structure their meetings, members of the Council have agreed that meetings of the Council could be structured according to, but not limited to, the following formats:

- (a) Public meetings:
- (i) To adopt Council action, at which Member States that are not members of the Security Council participate pursuant to the Charter of the United Nations;
- (ii) To hold, inter alia, briefings, thematic debates and orientation debates, at which Member States that are

² The 3819th, 3931st and S/PV.4049th meetings, held on 25 September 1997, 24 September 1998 and 29 September 1999, respectively. A fourth meeting on the item was presided over by the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs of the United Kingdom, but other representation at the meeting was not at the ministerial level (4081st meeting, on 15 December 1999).

not members of the Security Council participate pursuant to the Charter;

- (b) Private meetings:
 - (i) To hold briefings or other debates, which any interested Member State may attend;
 - (ii) To allow certain Member States whose interests the Security Council considers are specially affected by the matter under consideration to attend, such as parties to a conflict;
 - (iii) To permit the transaction of Security Council business which only members of the Security Council attend, e.g., appointment of the Secretary-General.⁴

The members of the Council also welcomed recent steps which had been taken by the Council to hold briefings by members of the Secretariat in Council meetings.⁵

Consultations and exchange of information with troop-contributing countries

At the 3645th meeting of the Security Council, held on 28 March 1996 in connection with the item entitled "An agenda for peace: peacekeeping", the Council reviewed its arrangements for consultations and exchange of information with troop-contributing countries which had been established by the statement of the President of 4 November 1994.⁶ By the statement of the President of 28 March 1996,⁷ the Council decided to follow in future the procedures set out below:

(a) Meetings will be held as a matter of course between members of the Council, troop-contributing countries and the Secretariat for the purpose of consultations and the exchange of information and views; the meetings will be chaired by the presidency of the Council supported by a representative of the Secretariat;

(b) The meetings will be held as soon as practicable and in good time before the Council takes decisions on the extension or termination of, or significant changes in, the mandate of a particular peacekeeping operation;

(c) When the Council considers establishing a new peacekeeping operation, meetings will be held, unless it proves to be impracticable, with any prospective troop contributors who have already been approached by the Secretariat and who have indicated that they may be willing to contribute to the operation;

(d) The President of the Council will, in the course of informal consultations with members of the Council, report the views expressed by participants at each meeting with troop-contributing or prospective troop-contributing countries;

(e) The existing practice of inviting to these meetings Member States which make special contributions to peacekeeping operations other than troops, that is, contributions to trust funds, logistics and equipment, will continue;

(f) The monthly tentative forecast of work of the Council made available to Member States will include an indication of the expected schedule of such meetings for the month;

(g) Ad hoc meetings may be convened in the event of unforeseen developments in a particular peacekeeping operation which could require action by the Council;

(h) These meetings will be in addition to those convened and chaired by the Secretariat for troop contributors to meet with special representatives of the Secretary-General or force commanders, or to discuss operational matters concerning particular peacekeeping operations, to which members of the Council will also be invited;

(i) Background information and an agenda will be circulated by the Secretariat to the participants well in advance of each of the various meetings referred to above; members of the Council may also circulate information as appropriate;

(j) Interpretation services in all the official languages of the Organization will continue to be available; translation of written documents will continue to be available, if possible in advance of the meetings;

(k) The time and venue of each meeting should, where possible, appear in advance in the Journal of the United Nations;

(l) The Council will append to its annual report to the General Assembly information about these meetings.

The Council recalls that the arrangements described above are not exhaustive. They do not preclude consultations in a variety of forms, including informal communication between the President of the Council or the members of the Council and troop-contributing countries and, as appropriate, other countries especially affected, for example, countries from the region concerned.

The Council will continue to keep arrangements for consultations and the exchange of information and views with troop contributors and prospective contributors under review and stands ready to consider further measures and new mechanisms to enhance further the arrangements in the light of experience.

In a note by the President dated 30 November 1998,⁸ the members of the Council agreed that relevant bodies and agencies of the United Nations might be invited to troop contributors meetings when they had a specific contribution to make to the issue under discussion; that other Member States contributing to peacekeeping operations, as appropriate, should also be invited to troop contributors meetings; and that the President would inform troop contributors about forthcoming Council deliberations and expected decisions.

Consultations and exchanges of information with individuals, organizations or institutions in informal meetings (Arria formula meetings)

During the period under review, members of the Council continued to hold consultations in the format of Arria formula meetings. In a letter dated 17 March 1999 from the representative of Venezuela addressed to the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council,⁹ the representative noted that the Arria formula was associated with the name of the representative of Venezuela on the Security Council during his country's most recent term as a non-permanent member of the Council.¹⁰ He recalled that during the presidency of Venezuela in 1992, the Council had deemed it appropriate and necessary to obtain direct assessments from individuals, organizations or institutions that could, because of their responsibilities or personal or institutional influence, contribute to a better understanding of the situation under consideration. The representative of Venezuela wished to caution, however, that the informal mechanism should be used in accordance with its original concept and should not be invoked in order to receive representatives of countries which were full Members of the United Nations, as that would be contrary to the principle of sovereign equality of States.

Part II

Representation and credentials (rules 13-17)

Rule 13 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council requires each member of the Council to communicate the credentials of its accredited representative to the Secretary-General not less than twenty-four hours before that representative takes his seat on the Council. In addition, any Member of the United Nations not a member of the Council and any State not a Member of the United Nations, if invited to participate in a meeting or meetings of the Council, must also communicate the credentials of its representative in a like manner to the Secretary-General, in accordance with rule 14. The Secretary-General is required by rule 15 to examine the credentials of the above categories of representatives and to submit a report thereon, certifying that the credentials are in order, to the Security Council for approval. The practice of the Council regarding those rules has been that the credentials of representatives have been communicated to the Secretary-General who submits his report to the Council pursuant to rule 15 when changes in the representation of members of the Council have been made and when, at the beginning of each year, the representatives of the newly elected non-permanent members of the Council are designated. This practice was followed during the period under review.

¹⁰ Venezuela was most recently a member of the Security Council in 1992-1993.

No special cases concerning the application of rules 13-17 occurred during the period under review.¹¹

Part III Presidency (rules 18-20)

Note

Part III of the present chapter deals with the proceedings of the Security Council directly related to the Office of the President of the Council.

The material in section A indicates special instances of the interpretation or application of rules 18 to 20. There were no special instances of the application of rule 18, which provides for the monthly rotation of the presidency in the English alphabetical order of the names of the members of the Council.

A new section, B, details procedural developments relating to the presidency. Included in this section is information on the new practice of monthly assessments made by former Presidents of the Council concerning the work of the Council during their term as President.

Material pertaining to the exercise by the President of his/her functions in the conduct of meetings is included in part V (Conduct of business) of the present chapter. Material related to efforts of the presidency to inform non-member States and others about Council decisions and deliberations is contained in part VII (Publicity of meetings, records).

Material relevant to the exercise by the President of his/her functions in connection with the agenda is dealt with in chapter II.

A. Special cases concerning the application of rules 18-20

The President shall preside over the meetings of the Security Council and, under the authority of the Security Council, shall represent it in its capacity as an organ of the United Nations.

During the period under review, Presidents regularly briefed non-members of the Council, made statements and remarks to the press and held bilateral and multilateral meetings with concerned parties such as Member States, chairmen of the regional groups and others. Some Presidents held bilateral meetings with the President of the General Assembly, the President of the Economic and Social Council or the Secretary-General.¹²

On 28 October 1998, the President represented the Council at the first meeting of the heads of the principal organs of the United Nations. This informal meeting was initiated by the Secretary-General to improve

¹² Presidents of the Council noted the following in their monthly assessments: (a) the President for the month of November 1997 briefed the President of the General Assembly and chairmen of the regional groups on the programme of work of the Council (Official Records of the General Assembly, Fifty-third Session, Supplement No. 2 (A/53/2), p. 327); (b) the President for the month of January 1999 met with the Secretary-General and with the Acting President of the General Assembly. A meeting with the President of the Economic and Social Council focused on ways to implement Article 65 of the Charter and enhance cooperation between the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council, particularly in dealing with post-conflict situations (Official Records of the General Assembly, Fifty-fourth Session, Supplement

No. 2 (A/54/2), p. 428); (c) the President for the month of February 1999 met with the President and the Acting President of the General Assembly regarding the Council's programme of work and with the President of the Economic and Social Council regarding closer cooperation between the Council and the Economic and Social Council as envisaged in Article 65 (ibid., p. 442); (d) the President for the month of June 1999 met with the Secretary-General and the Presidents of the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council (ibid., p. 461); and (e) the President for the month of July 1999 met with the President of the Economic and Social Council (Official Records of the General Assembly, Fifty-fifth Session, Supplement No. 2 (A/55/2), p. 442).

coordination among the principal organs and efficiency in the workings of the Organization. During the review period, the same type of meeting was held again on 26 October 1999.

On 6 October 1998, the President represented the Council at the presentation of the first Dag Hammarskjöld medals for United Nations peacekeeping and paid tribute to the courage and dedication of those who had given their lives while serving United Nations peacekeeping.¹³

Whenever the President of the Security Council deems that for the proper fulfilment of the responsibilities of the presidency he should not preside over the Council during the consideration of a particular question with which the member he represents is directly connected, he shall indicate his decision to the Council. The presidential chair shall then devolve, for the purpose of the consideration of that question, on the representative of the member next in English alphabetical order, it being understood that the provisions of this rule shall apply to the representatives on the Security Council called upon successively to preside. This rule shall not affect the representative capacity of the President as stated in rule 19, or his duties under rule 7.

The 3634th meeting was held on 27 February 1996 in response to a letter from the representative of the United States to discuss the item entitled “Shooting down of two civil aircraft on 24 February 1996”.¹⁴ The President of the Council for the month of February was the representative of the United States. The representative of Cuba, invited to participate in the discussion under rule 37, expressed the following view:

On many occasions — and when serving on the Council my country was no exception — Presidents of the Security Council have invoked rule 20 of the Council’s provisional rules of procedure to demonstrate clearly to the international community that, in line with basic ethical behaviour, they would not attempt to benefit from the prerogatives of their office. Such behaviour has been lacking in this instance, and it is abundantly clear that the fact that the United States is presiding over the Council at this time has engendered a very particular dynamic and very particular features in the Council’s work.¹⁵

The President thanked the representative of Cuba for his statement.

B. Procedural developments relating to the presidency

Monthly assessments by former Presidents of the Council

In a note by the President of 12 June 1997,¹⁶ concerning the annual report of the Council to the General Assembly, the Council decided that as an addendum to the report, Presidents would provide brief assessments of the work of the Council during their term(s) as President. Specifically, the note provides the following:

There will also be attached, as an addendum to the report, brief assessments on the work of the Security Council, which representatives who have completed their functions as President of the Security Council may wish to prepare, under their own responsibility and following consultations with members of the Council for the month during which they presided and which should not be considered as representing the views of the Council.

The following disclaimer will appear at the beginning of the addendum containing the above-mentioned assessments:

The attachment of the assessments of former Presidents on the work of the Security Council as an addendum to the report is intended to have an informative purpose and should not necessarily be considered as representing the views of the Security Council.

Presidential texts

The members of the Council continued to use informal consultations of the whole as a procedure for briefings, discussions and reaching agreements. On many occasions, the President presented “consensus texts”, or the results of such consultations, to the Council in the form of a presidential statement made on behalf of its members, or as a draft resolution, which the Council then adopted in a formal meeting without further debate. On other occasions, the President announced the agreement or consensus in a note or letter circulated as a Council document.¹⁷

The President was also at times authorized by members of the Council to make statements to the press, although these are not considered decisions of the Council. Beginning in August 1998 and continuing through the end of the period under review, statements to the press by the President of the Security Council were reproduced in almost all monthly assessments by former Presidents.¹⁸

Part IV Secretariat (rules 21-26)

Part IV relates to rules 21 to 26 of the provisional rules of procedure, which set out the functions and powers of the Secretary-General in connection with the meetings of the Security Council. Those rules reflect the provisions of Article 98 of the Charter insofar as they concern the requirements of the Security Council.¹⁹ While no discussion concerning rules 21 to 26 took place during the period under review, two relevant procedural developments are described below.

Rule 22 states that the Secretary-General, or his deputy acting on his behalf, may make either oral or written statements to the Security Council concerning any question under consideration by it. In a note by the President dated 30 October 1998, the members of the Council agreed that, as part of the continuing efforts towards transparency of the methods of work of the Council, the Secretary-General should be encouraged to make statements, when he deemed it appropriate, in public meetings of the Council.²⁰ The Council reiterated this view in its note of 30 December 1999.²¹

Under rule 25, the Secretary-General shall give to representatives on the Council notice of meetings of the Council and its commissions and committees. During the period under review, members of the Council also requested the Secretariat to establish an appropriate mechanism for alerting non-members of the Council about unscheduled or emergency meetings of the Council during nights, weekends or holidays.²²

Part V Conduct of business (rules 27-36)

Note

Part V sets out the material bearing on rules 27 and 29 to 36, which concerns conduct of business at meetings of the Council. Material relating to rule 28 can be found in chapter V (Subsidiary organs of the Security Council), while material relating to rules 37 and 39 is included in chapter III (Participation in the proceedings of the Security Council).

¹⁹ For specific instances in which the Secretary-General was requested or authorized by the Security Council to carry out other functions in accordance with Article 98 of the Charter, see chapter VI (Relations with other United Nations organs).

²² S/1998/1016.

¹⁸ The monthly assessment for October 1999 did not contain texts of statements to the press.

During the period under review, the Council continued to search for efficient, effective and transparent ways to conduct meetings. These included holding more open briefings, as recommended in a note by the President,²³ but also at times limiting interventions to members of the Council in the interest of time.²⁴ A note by the President on the preparation of resolutions and statements will be covered under rule 31, which concerns the presentation of proposed resolutions, amendments and substantive motions. There were no special instances of the application of rules 27, 29, 30, 32, 33, 34, 35 and 36.

Special cases concerning the application of rules 27-36

Proposed resolutions, amendments and substantive motions shall normally be placed before the representatives in writing.

In a note by the President dated 17 February 1999,²⁵ it was deemed important that all members of the Council be allowed to participate fully in the preparation of resolutions and statements. The drafting of resolutions and statements by the President should be carried out in a manner that would allow adequate participation of all members of the Council. While the need was recognized for the Council, in many instances, to adopt its decisions expeditiously, it was also noted that sufficient time needed to be allowed for consultations of all members of the Council and for their own consideration of the drafts, prior to action by the Council on specific items.²⁶

Part VI Languages (rules 41-47)

Note

Rules 41 to 47 concern the official and working languages of the Council, interpretation, the provision for representatives to make speeches in languages other than the languages of the Council, and the languages of meeting records and published resolutions and decisions. During the period under review, the Council made recommendations relevant to rule 42.

Special cases concerning the application of rules 41-47

Rule 42

Speeches made in any of the six languages of the Security Council shall be interpreted into the other five languages.

The Council recommended that interpretation should be provided, whenever possible, for briefings made by the presidency to States that were not members of the Council.²⁷ The briefings in question were those made to the States shortly after informal consultations of the whole.

²⁷ S/1999/1291, para. 3.

Part VII Publicity of meetings, records (rules 48-57)

Note

Efforts were made, during the period under review, to increase the transparency of the Council through greater publicity of meetings and briefings, including to non-members, the press, non-governmental organizations and others.²⁸ An effort to provide improved publicity of meetings resulted in a revised annual report of the Security Council to the General Assembly, which is detailed below.

There was no direct discussion of rule 48, which concerns the holding of public meetings. However, the members of the Council, in a note by the President dated 30 December 1999,²⁹ agreed that they should make every effort to determine which matters, including situations involving specific countries, could usefully be considered in public meetings of the Council, in particular at an early stage in its consideration of a subject.

In the same note by the President, the members agreed that, in the absence of agreement to the contrary, the President of the Council should make draft resolutions and draft presidential statements available to States that were not members of the Council as soon as they were introduced within informal consultations of the whole. The availability of draft resolutions in blue scheduled such briefings immediately after each session of informal consultations. As noted in the assessment by the President, this proved to be useful, since the number of delegations attending increased significantly. In addition, the presidency organized early in the month a lunch with representatives of the non-governmental organizations that followed most closely the work of the Council and, at the end of the month, provided them with a detailed and comprehensive briefing on the Council's discussions and deliberations throughout June (ibid., p. 360); (c) a number of Presidents (August 1998, September 1998, September 1999, November 1999 and December 1999) noted on the websites of their Missions their efforts to provide timely information (Official Records of the General Assembly, Fifty-fourth Session, Supplement No. 2 (A/54/2), pp. 391 and 402); and Official Records of the General Assembly, Fifty-fifth Session, Supplement No. 2 (A/55/2), pp. 481 and 495).

in accordance with the note by the President of 28 February 1994 would remain unaffected.³⁰

In the same note, the members of the Security Council noted the importance of the practice of the presidency briefing States that were not members of the Council. They agreed that such briefings should be substantive and detailed and should cover elements presented by the President to the press. They also agreed that such briefings should take place shortly after informal consultations of the whole. The members encouraged the President of the Council, at those briefings or as soon thereafter as practicable, to continue to make available to States that were not members of the Council copies of statements that he made to the media following informal consultations.³¹

The members of the Council also encouraged the Secretary-General to make the briefing notes on field operations that were distributed to the members of the Council available, in a timely manner, to States that were not members of the Council.³²

Revised annual report of the Security Council to the General Assembly

Article 24 (3) states:

The Security Council shall submit annual and, when necessary, special reports to the General Assembly for its consideration.

In a note by the President dated 12 June 1997,³³ the Council decided that the report of the Security Council to the General Assembly would include the following sections:

(a) In relation to each subject dealt with by the Council:

Introductory note

The present chapter concerns the interpretation and application of rules 6 to 12 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council, relating to the agenda. The chapter is divided into three parts. Unlike previous volumes of the Repertoire, the part concerning the adoption or amendment of rules 6 to 12 has been omitted in the present Supplement since, during the period under review, the Council did not consider any change in those rules.

Part I, The provisional agenda (rules 6-8 and rule 12), provides information on the circulation of communications by the Secretary-General and on the preparation and communication of the provisional agenda.

Part II, Adoption of the agenda (rule 9), contains material dealing with questions that were discussed in connection with the adoption of the agenda. Unlike in previous volumes of the Repertoire, no material was found for treatment concerning the procedure of the Council in voting on the adoption of the agenda, nor was there discussion in the Council of the requirements for the inclusion of an item in the agenda and the effect of such inclusion, or of other questions of procedure.

Part III, The agenda and matters of which the Security Council is seized (rules 10 and 11), relates to the list of matters under the Council's consideration. It includes an overview of Security Council decisions with regard to the retention and deletion of items on matters of which the Council was seized. The tables in part III supplement the tables in previous volumes of the Repertoire and indicate the changes that have since occurred in the list of matters of which the Security Council was seized.

Part I

The provisional agenda (rules 6-8 and 12)

Note

The provisional agenda, prepared by the Secretary-General and approved by the President of the Security Council in accordance with rule 7, includes those items that have been brought to the attention of the Council under rule 6. Under that rule, “the Secretary-General shall immediately bring to the attention of all representatives on the Security Council all communications from States, organs of the United Nations, or the Secretary-General concerning any matter for the consideration of the Security Council in accordance with the provisions of the Charter”. Effect is normally given to this rule by the distribution of communications as documents in the S/-series. Communications from regional arrangements or agencies received pursuant to Article 54 of the Charter are also circulated in the S/-series of documents.

Rule 7 entrusts the drawing up of the provisional agenda for each meeting to the Secretary-General, subject to the approval of the President of the Security Council. The Secretary-General’s discretion with respect to the inclusion of new items is restricted to those items that have been brought to the attention of the Council under rule 6. In addition to the express provisions of rule 7, the Secretary-General also has to take into account whether a specific request to include the item has been made.

Rule 8 concerns communication of the provisional agenda to the representatives on the Security Council, and rule 12, paragraph 1, concerns such communication for periodic meetings. Since, during the period under review, no periodic meetings were convened, no material relating to the latter rule was found.

Circulation of communications by the Secretary-General (rule 6). In accordance with rule 6, the Secretary-General continued the practice of distributing communications as documents in the S/-series. During the period under review, there were no instances in which the question of circulation of communications arose.

Preparation of the provisional agenda (rule 7). In accordance with rule 7, the Secretary-General continued the practice of drawing up the provisional agenda for each meeting, subject to the approval of the President of the Security Council. During the period under review, there was no instance in which the subject of the preparation of the provisional agenda gave rise to a discussion in the Council.

Communication of the provisional agenda (rule 8). In accordance with rule 8, the Secretary-General continued to communicate the provisional agenda to the representatives on the Security Council. Pursuant to prior decisions¹ of the Council, the provisional agenda for meetings of the Council were listed in the Journal of the United Nations, as were the topics to be discussed in informal consultations of the members of the Council.

¹ Note by the President dated 30 June 1993 (S/26015); and statement by the President of 4 November 1994

Part II

Adoption of the agenda (rule 9)

Note

Under rule 9, the first item on the provisional agenda for each meeting of the Security Council is the adoption of the agenda.² In practice, the Council usually discusses and approves the provisional agenda in prior informal consultations and then adopts it at the formal meeting without a vote. Discussions or objections, raised on grounds related to the procedure of the Council in voting on the adoption of the agenda or the substance of the item(s) inscribed on the provisional agenda, are extremely rare. Objections on the adoption of the agenda are also precluded by the practice of the Council of inscribing a single substantive item on its provisional agenda for each meeting.

As in previous volumes of the Repertoire, part II is devoted to the proceedings of the Council on those occasions when objection was raised to the adoption of the agenda or other discussion took place in connection with the adoption of the agenda.

The following sections concern two case histories of discussions in the Council that relate to objection that had been raised to the adoption of the agenda in connection with the requirements for the inclusion of an item in the agenda (case 1) and the phrasing of agenda items (case 2). The case histories are not concerned with the grounds of objection, which are, however, briefly indicated. For the other subheadings dealing with the order of discussion of items on the agenda and precedence of the decision on adoption of the agenda, which were included in previous volumes of the Repertoire, no material was found for treatment during the period under review.

Consideration of requirements for the inclusion of an item in the agenda

² There were several instances in which, in accordance with past practice, the President of the Council made preliminary remarks before the adoption of the agenda, including expressions of thanks, congratulations, tributes and expressions of sympathy. The latter categories also included the observation of a minute of silence. For

At the 3868th meeting, the Council considered the agenda item entitled “Letter dated 11 March 1998 from the Deputy Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom addressed to the President of the Security Council; letter dated 27 March 1998 from the Permanent Representative of the United States addressed to the President of the Security Council”.³ At the start of the meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council members to a letter addressed to him from the representative of Yugoslavia,⁴ indicating the firm objection of the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to the inclusion of Kosovo and Metohija on the agenda of the Council on the grounds that it was “an internal matter of the Republic of Serbia”.

During the course of the meeting, Mr. Jovanovic reiterated the objection of the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to the consideration of the question of Kosovo and Metohija at the Council meeting on the grounds that it was an internal question that could not be the subject of deliberation of any international forum without the consent of the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. He further asserted that there was not and had never been any armed conflict in Kosovo and Metohija and thus there was no danger of a spillover or threat to peace and security.⁵

Other discussion on the adoption of the agenda: phrasing of the agenda item

The significance to Member States of how agenda items are constructed was evidenced in the interventions of several delegations at the 3954th meeting on 16 December 1998 and its resumption on 23 December 1998, at which the Council considered the agenda item entitled “Maintenance of peace and security and post-conflict peacebuilding”. The delegations of Sweden and Tunisia noted that the wording of the agenda item example, at the 3617th meeting on 8 January 1996, the President spoke briefly to pay tribute to the memory of François Mitterand, former President of France.

reflected the close link between peacekeeping and post-conflict peacebuilding, and that the implications of that link were some of the most important challenges facing the Security Council and the United Nations as a whole.⁶ In the same meeting a different perspective on the agenda wording was expressed by the delegation of Brazil.⁷ The representative of Brazil queried the absence of the word "international" in the agenda item, suggesting that it blurred any distinction between international and internal conflicts. He expressed concern that if peacebuilding was thought of as also being a result of efforts to contain or solve internal conflicts, the Security Council might be tempted to become a kind of "resurrected Trusteeship Council", which he cautioned against.

Part III

The agenda and matters of which the Security Council is seized (rules 10 and 11)

Note

Rule 10 of the provisional rules of procedure was designed to enable the Security Council to continue, at its next meeting, the consideration of an item of unfinished business without subjecting that item to renewed debate in connection with the adoption of the agenda. No discussion concerning the application of that rule occurred during the period under review.

On many occasions, separate consecutive meetings were held on the same agenda item.⁸ In other instances, the meeting was suspended and resumed until the Council had completed that stage of its consideration of the item.⁹

Rule 11 provides for the Secretary-General to communicate each week to the representatives on the Security Council a summary statement of matters of which the Security Council is seized and of the stage reached in their consideration. In previous volumes of the Repertoire, it was noted that items on the agenda of the Council had remained on the Secretary-General's summary statement when the tenor of the Council's discussion or its specific decisions revealed a continuing concern with the matter. Additional evidence supporting such retention was provided when the President of the Council announced, upon conclusion of the debate, that the Council remained seized of a question.

In accordance with two decisions of the Council (see rule 11 below) taken during the period under consideration, items were deleted from the list of matters of which the Security Council was seized when (a) the item had not been considered in the preceding five years and no request for its retention had been made; or (b) the Council had formally concluded its consideration of the item.

The reformatted and streamlined tables appearing in the last section supplement the tables contained in the previous volumes of the Repertoire and indicate the changes that have since occurred in the list of matters of which the Council was seized.

Practice of the Security Council regarding the retention and deletion of items from the list of matters of which the Security Council is seized (rule 11)

During the period under review the Security Council decided to amend its previous practice with regard to the retention and deletion of items from its agenda. By its notes dated 22 and 29 August 1996,¹⁰ the occupied Arab territories, held on 27 September and resumed on 28 September; the 3842nd meeting, on the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, held on 18 December 1997 and resumed on 19 December 1997; and the 3954th meeting, on post-conflict peacebuilding, held on 16 December 1998 and resumed on 23 December 1998.

⁹ For example, the 3698th meeting, on the situation in the

Council decided that as of 15 September 1996, matters which had not been considered by the Council in the preceding five years would, subject to the consent of Member States concerned, be deleted from the list of matters of which the Council was seized. The procedure established by the Council to implement its decision requires the Secretary-General to identify in his annual summary statement on matters of which the Security Council was seized those items to be deleted from the list, in the absence of any notification by a Member State by a fixed date. That notification is to remain in effect for one year with the possibility of renewal. Although the note did not explicitly preclude the Council from taking separate decisions to delete items outside the above procedure, no such action was taken following the decision to amend its practice in this regard.¹¹

Items are also deleted following a request addressed to the Secretary-General by the Member State concerned and in the absence of any objection on the part of the members of the Council. No such request was made. In addition, items may be deleted by a decision of the Council taken at the close of a Council meeting. This did not occur during the period under consideration.

Addition, retention and deletion of items during the period under review

Section A indicates items added to the list of matters of which the Council was seized during the period under review; section B indicates items appearing on previous lists for which new action by the Security Council was reported in the summary statements during the period 1996-1999; and section C indicates items deleted from the list during that period.¹² The tables show that, during the period under review, the Council included 35 new items in the list of matters of which it was seized and deleted over 50 items.

¹¹ The last instance of a separate decision to delete items from the Security Council agenda in the period under consideration was contained in a note by the President dated 24 January 1996 (S/1996/55).

Introductory note

This chapter deals with the Security Council's practice in extending invitations to participate in its proceedings. Part I concerns the basis on which invitations were extended. Part II concerns procedures relating to participation after an invitation was extended.

Articles 31 and 32 of the Charter and rules 37 and 39 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council provide for invitations to be extended to non-members of the Security Council in the following circumstances: (a) when a Member of the United Nations brings a dispute or situation to the attention of the Council in accordance with Article 35 (1) of the Charter (rule 37); (b) when a Member of the United Nations or a State that is not a member of the United Nations is "a party to a dispute" (Article 32); (c) when the interests of a Member of the United Nations are "specially affected" (Article 31 and rule 37); and (d) when "members of the Secretariat or other persons" are invited to supply information or give other assistance (rule 39). Only in the second instance ((b) above) does the Security Council have an obligation to extend an invitation.

In practice, in extending invitations, the Council has continued to refrain from referring explicitly to the relevant articles of the Charter. It has continued to make no distinction between a complaint involving a "dispute" within the meaning of Article 32, a "situation" or a matter of another nature. Some discussion in the Council did take place, however, concerning the rights of Member States to participate in meetings (case 6).

During the period under review, invitations to participate in meetings of the Security Council were usually extended "under the relevant provisions of the Charter" and explicitly under rule 37 or rule 39 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure. The classification of invitations in part I and annexes I and II to chapter III reflects that practice. The instances in which the Council decided to extend invitations to participate in its proceedings without pronouncing itself on the basis for such invitations are treated separately (cases 3-5).

Part II, which deals with procedures relating to the participation of invited representatives, includes a case (case 7) concerning the stage at which a representative was invited to address the Council.

Part I

Basis of invitations to participate

Note

The Security Council's practice in connection with the extension of invitations is dealt with in this part in four sections. Section A deals with invitations extended under rule 37 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure, which was the basis on which Member States not members of the Council were invited to participate in the Council's proceedings. The section describes the Council's general practice in this regard. It is supplemented by annex I, which contains relevant information on the invitations extended to those invitees.

Section B considers the Council's practice in extending invitations under rule 39, the basis on which "members of the Secretariat or other persons" were invited to supply the Council with information or other assistance. This brief overview is supplemented by annex II, which contains relevant information on the invitations extended to those invitees. They included the following: (a) representatives of United Nations organs (Secretariat); (b) representatives of other United Nations organs, subsidiary bodies or agencies; (c) representatives of regional and other intergovernmental organizations; and (d) other invitees.

Section C concerns invitations that were not expressly extended under either rule 37 or rule 39.

Section D considers requests for invitations denied or not acted upon.

A. Invitations extended under rule 37 (States Members of the United Nations)

During the period under consideration, States Members of the United Nations not members of the Security Council who were invited to participate in the Council's proceedings were usually invited "under the relevant provisions of the Charter and rule 37 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure", without explicit reference being made to the relevant Charter articles. Rule 37 provides:

Any Member of the United Nations which is not a member of the Security Council may be invited, as the result of a decision of the Security Council, to participate, without vote, in the discussion of any question brought before the Security Council when the Security Council considers that the interests of that Member are specially affected, or when a Member brings a matter to the attention of the Security Council in accordance with Article 35 (1) of the Charter.

In practice, such invitations were usually extended as a matter of course and without discussion. They were requested in letters from the State concerned addressed to the President of the Council. The President informed the Council at the beginning or during the course of its meetings of the receipt of such letters and proposed that, with the consent of the Council, the invitations be extended. Usually, there being no objection, it was so decided. In one instance, (see case 1) a Member State requested to be invited and then subsequently withdrew that request.

Renewals of invitations were not usually mentioned if the meeting was resumed. Moreover, unless otherwise mentioned, invitations extended at the first meeting of consecutive meetings held concerning an agenda item were automatically renewed at each of the meetings.

As in previous years, Member States invited under rule 37 sometimes spoke in other capacities, such as representatives of regional organizations.¹ In such cases, the President of the Council, when asking Member States to take the floor, would do so with reference to their representative capacities. Member States would themselves, at the beginning of their interventions, state on behalf of whom or in what capacity they were speaking. Case 2 highlights one instance where this practice was not followed.

The practice regarding invitations to representatives of Member States who spoke in their capacity as representatives of United Nations subsidiary bodies or other organizations was varied. Some were invited under rule 37, some under rule 39 and some were invited under no explicit basis. The extension of an invitation was most often guided by the Member State's request for that invitation, which often explicitly mentioned the basis upon which it wished to be invited.

A list of invitations issued under rule 37 is contained in annex I at the end of this chapter. For ease of reference only, the invitations have been grouped according to agenda item.

At the 3973rd meeting, held on 29 January 1999, the President informed the Council that he had received letters from the representatives of Eritrea and Ethiopia, in which they requested to be invited to participate in the discussion of the item on the agenda. The President noted that in the light of the understanding reached in the course of the Council's prior consultations that there would be no statements made during the meeting, the representative of Eritrea had withdrawn his request for participation. As a result, it was only the representative of Ethiopia who was invited to participate in the meeting.

At the 3698th meeting, held on 27 September 1996, the representative of Algeria (Minister for Foreign ¹ See, for example, the following instances in which a representative of a Member State invited under rule 37 spoke on behalf of another entity: 3698th meeting, at which the representative of Algeria spoke in his capacity as Chairman of the Council of Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the League of Arab States (S/PV. 3698 (resumption 1), p. 7; 3639th meeting, at which the representative of Tunisia spoke on behalf of the African Group (S/PV.3639, p. 22); 3641st meeting, at which the representative of Jordan spoke on behalf of the Group of Arab States (S/PV.3641, p. 30); 3689th meeting, at which the representative of Ireland spoke on behalf of the European Union (S/PV.3689, p. 27) and the representative of Nicaragua spoke in his capacity as the Secretary pro tempore for Central America (ibid., p. 29); 3769th meeting, at which the representative of Qatar spoke on behalf of the Asian Group (S/PV.3769, p. 13); 3797th meeting, at which the representative of Nigeria spoke on behalf of the Economic Community of West African States Ministerial Committee of Four (S/PV.3797, p. 2) and the representative of Zimbabwe spoke on behalf of the President of Zimbabwe and the current Chairman of the Organization of African Unity (ibid., p. 5); 3811th meeting, at which the representative of Denmark spoke on behalf of the Chairman-in-Office of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (S/PV.3811, p. 20); 4003rd meeting, at which the representative of Qatar spoke in his capacity as Chairman of the Islamic Group (S/PV.4003, p. 13) and the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran spoke in his capacity as Chairman of the Organization of Islamic Conference Contact Group on Bosnia and Herzegovina (ibid., p. 14).

Affairs Ahmed Attaf) was invited by the President to make a statement “in his capacity as Chairman of the Council of Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the League of Arab States”.² However, the invitation to participate, extended to the representatives of Algeria at the beginning of that meeting, did not refer to Mr. Attaf’s representative capacity.³

B. Invitations extended under rule 39 (members of the Secretariat or other persons)

In the period under review there were a total of 50 invitations issued under Rule 39. The practice concerning those invitations remained generally consistent with previous periods. One noteworthy development was the threefold increase in the number of briefings by the Secretariat in 1999 as compared with the previous three years.⁴ Rule 39 provides:

The Security Council may invite members of the Secretariat or other persons, whom it considers competent for the purpose, to supply it with information or to give other assistance in examining matters within its competence.

A list of invitations issued under rule 39 is contained in annex II at the end of the chapter. For ease of reference only, invitations have been grouped into the following four categories:

(a) Representatives of the United Nations Secretariat, Security Council missions and Security Council subsidiary bodies;

(b) Representatives of United Nations organs, subsidiary bodies or agencies;

(c) Representatives of regional and other intergovernmental organizations;

(d) Invitations to other persons.

Some general aspects of the Council’s practice under rule 39 may be noted. Invitations to representatives of United Nations organs and subsidiary bodies were extended as a matter of course and without any formal discussion. Letters of request from the body concerned were read into the record of the meeting by the President of the Council and were not issued as official documents of the Security Council. Invitations to representatives of United Nations funds, programmes and agencies were, at the beginning of the period under review, extended on the same basis. This practice changed from the 3932nd meeting, held on 29 September 1998, at which the representatives of the United Nations Children’s Fund (UNICEF) and the Office of the High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) were, respectively, invited to participate “in accordance with the understanding reached in the Council’s prior consultations”.⁵ This formula was also used when extending invitations to delegations to the United Nations of international organizations.⁶

In the case of invitations to representatives of regional organizations, the requests were made by a Member State on behalf of the proposed invitee, and invariably granted without any formal discussion. Letters of request were read into the record of the meeting by the President of the Council and were also issued as documents of the Security Council. The only departure from this practice occurred when the level of representation of the regional organization dictated the use of a different form of participation.⁷

C. Invitations not expressly extended under rule 37 or rule 39

While rules 37 or 39 were most often cited as the basis of invitations, some invitations were extended on the basis of prior consultations, past practice or, in some cases, the representative of the Republic of Korea into the record, requesting that an invitation under rule 39 of the Council’s provisional rules of procedure be extended to the head of the delegation of the International Committee of the Red Cross to the United Nations. That letter was also issued as a document of the Security Council (see S/1997/386).

⁴ This development was welcomed by the Council in a note by the President dated 30 December 1999 (S/1999/1291).

⁵ Representatives of United Nations organs, subsidiary bodies or agencies were subsequently invited to participate in the proceedings of the Security Council according to the same formula at the 3942nd (10 November 1998) and 3977th (12 February 1999) meetings. For more information, see annex II.

⁶ One exception occurred at the 3778th meeting, held on 21 May 1997, at which the President read a letter from without mention of a basis. These included invitations to Heads of State; to the Secretary-General and Deputy Secretary-General; to members of the Security Council speaking in their capacities as chairpersons of subsidiary organs of the Council;⁸ to representatives of observer missions; and to others. In those instances, the basis under which individuals were invited did not raise any comment or discussion. Cases 4 through 6 are included to illustrate the Council's varied practice of issuing invitations that fall under neither 37 nor 39.

The Council continued to use a special form of invitation when granting requests for participation from the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro). The President of the Council, in response to a written request from the representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, invited that representative by name, in each case Minister for Foreign Affairs Vladislav Jovanovic. At the 4061st meeting (private) held on 5 November 1999, Mr. Branislav Srdanovic was invited to participate at Mr. Jovanovic's request.⁹

Invitations to the Secretary-General and Deputy Secretary-General

During the period under review, the Secretary-General and Deputy Secretary-General increasingly participated in the proceedings of the Council.¹⁰ Invitations were extended to them without citing a basis.

Case 4

Invitations to Heads of State

At four of the five instances in which Heads of State participated in the proceedings of the Council during the period under review, they were invited without citing a basis.¹¹ For instance, at the 4047th meeting, held on 21 September 1999 in connection with the situation in Africa, the President of Zambia was invited by the President with the following formula:¹²

In accordance with the understanding reached in the Council's prior consultations, I request the Chief of Protocol to escort His Excellency Mr. Frederick J. T. Chiluba, President of the Republic of Zambia to a seat at the Council table.

Invitations to Permanent Observers

Permanent Observer of Switzerland. The Permanent Observer of Switzerland was always invited to participate in the discussions of Council without the right to vote, in accordance with the understanding reached in the Council's prior consultations.¹³

Permanent Observer of the Holy See. The Permanent Observer of the Holy See was invited to participate "in accordance with the understanding reached in prior consultations".¹⁴

Permanent Observer of Palestine: The President, with the consent of the Council, usually invited the Permanent Observer of Palestine "to participate in the current debate in accordance with the provisional rules of procedure and the previous practice in this regard".¹⁵ Letters of request from the Permanent Observer were read into the record of the meeting by the President of the Council and were issued as documents of the Security Council.

D. Requests for invitations denied or not acted upon

Note

⁸ For example, at the 3957th meeting, held on 18 December 1998, the representative of Sweden briefed the Council in his capacity as Chairman of the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 1132 (1997) concerning Sierra Leone.

⁹ See S/PV.4061, issued as a communiqué.

¹⁰ See, for example, S/PV.4020, S/PV.4041 and S/PV.4046.

¹¹ At the 4069th meeting, held on 15 November 1999, invitations were extended to Mr. Ante Jelavic, Chair of the Presidency of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Mr. Alija Izetbegovic, Member of the Presidency of Bosnia and Herzegovina and Mr. Zivko Radisic, Member of the Presidency of Bosnia and Herzegovina (S/PV. 4069 and Corr.1, p. 2).

¹³ See, for example, S/PV.3980; S/PV.4046; S/PV.4061; and S/PV.4062.

¹⁴ See, for example, S/PV.3875 and S/PV.4086.

¹⁵ See, for example, S/PV.3652; S/PV.3698; and S/PV.4046.

During the period under review, there were no cases in which a request for an invitation to participate in a meeting of the Security Council was expressly denied. While there were several instances in which the Council did not respond to requests from Member States to convene a meeting,¹⁶ none of those communications contained specific requests to participate. Case 6 contains two separate meetings at which the right of Member States to address the Council in accordance with Articles 31 and 32, especially in situations that involved the application of sanctions, was discussed.

At the 3831st meeting, held on 12 November 1997 to consider the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, the representative of Egypt stressed the necessity to comply fully with constitutional provisions and legal standards by not depriving any State Member of the United Nations of the right to express its view before the Council, in accordance with Articles 31 and 32. He further emphasized that this was especially the case when the question related to sanctions imposed on that State.¹⁷

At the 3864th meeting, held on 20 March 1998 to consider letters dated 20 and 23 December 1991, from France, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America, the representative of Costa Rica contended that the Libyan

Arab Jamahiriya and any other State subject to a sanctions regime, as well as the other parties that are legitimately concerned or affected by any international dispute, had the right to present their own arguments concerning the facts, their own legal reasoning and their own defence. Moreover, he contended, the Security Council and the sanctions committees, within their own purview, had the legal, ethical and political obligation to hear concerned States and to reflect upon and analyse objectively their arguments and reasoning in order to take a decision fully consistent with their lofty and very serious responsibilities established in Chapter VII of the Charter. He noted that the meeting constituted a step forward in what was a demand of all Member States regarding the transparency in the working methods and in the rules, both written and unwritten, of the Security Council.¹⁸

Part II Procedures relating to participation

Note

Part II is concerned with procedures relating to the participation of invited States or individuals after an invitation has been extended. During the period under review some discussion occurred in the Council on the stage at which invited States are heard (see case 7). No discussion arose, however, regarding the question of duration of participation of those invited to participate.¹⁹ The practice was generally maintained whereby the President, when consideration of a question was extended over several meetings, renewed the invitation at each consecutive meeting immediately after the adoption of the agenda.

The Council continued to follow its general practice of not permitting invited representatives to discuss procedural matters such as the adoption of the agenda, the extension of invitations and the postponement of consideration of a question.

¹⁶ See, for example, the letter dated 24 May 1996 from the Permanent Representative of Rwanda addressed to the President of the Security Council (S/1996/374) and the letter dated 21 August 1998 from the Permanent Representative of the Sudan addressed to the President of the Security Council (S/1998/786).

¹⁷ S/PV.3831, p. 7.

¹⁸ S/PV. 3864 and Corr.1, p. 14.

Case 7

At the 3890th meeting, held on 6 June 1998, concerning the responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security, the representative of Pakistan expressed deep regret that the Council had disregarded the provisions of Article 31 of the Charter by not giving his delegation the opportunity to participate in the discussions on the resolution on which the Council had just voted.²⁰ While Member States, including Pakistan, were invited to participate in the discussion, the adoption of resolution 1172 (1998) occurred at the beginning of the meeting, giving non-members of the Council an opportunity to make statements following the vote.

¹⁹ At the 4081st meeting, held on 15 December 1999, the President of the Council did, however, urge all speakers to confine their initial contributions to a maximum of five minutes.

Introductory note

The present chapter contains material relating to the practice of the Security Council on decision-making and voting under Article 27 of the Charter.¹ The arrangement of the material basically follows that of the corresponding chapter in earlier volumes of the Repertoire.

Part I relates to the distinction between procedural and non-procedural matters. It lists those instances in which the vote indicated the non-procedural nature of the decision. There were no instances of voting on a procedural matter during the period under review. Part II contains no entries, as during the period under review there was no material relating to the practice of the Council in voting upon the question whether a matter was procedural within the meaning of Article 27, paragraph 2. Part III is concerned with the abstention, non-participation or absence of a Council member in relation to the requirements of Article 27, paragraph 3. Part IV addresses decisions adopted by consensus or without a vote.

Article 27

1. Each member of the Security Council shall have one vote.
2. Decisions of the Security Council on procedural matters shall be made by an affirmative vote of nine members.
3. Decisions of the Security Council on all other matters shall be made by an affirmative vote of nine members including the concurring votes of the permanent members; provided that, in decisions under Chapter VI, and under paragraph 3 of Article 52, a party to a dispute shall abstain from voting.

¹ Material relating to voting in connection with the election of judges under Article 10 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice is included in chapter VI. Material on the voting procedure employed by the Council in connection with the applications for admission to membership in the United Nations is contained in chapter VII.

Part I Procedural and non-procedural matters

Note

Most votes in the Council do not, of themselves, indicate whether the Council considers the matter voted upon as being of a procedural or non-procedural character: this is the case, for instance, when a proposal is adopted by a unanimous vote; when all permanent members vote in favour of a proposal; or when a proposal fails to obtain the necessary nine votes in its favour. Part I comprises instances in which the vote by the Council indicated the non-procedural character of the matter under consideration. There was no discussion of whether the question under consideration was of a procedural or non-procedural nature.

Whether a matter is deemed procedural or non-procedural is clearly established in those instances in which a proposal obtained nine or more votes, with one or more permanent members casting a negative vote. Adoption by the Council in such circumstances indicates the procedural character of the matter, while rejection by the Council in such circumstances indicates the non-procedural character of the matter. During the period under review, the Security Council did not vote on matters that were procedural in nature.

Part II

Proceedings of the Security Council regarding voting upon the question whether the matter was procedural within the meaning of Article 27, paragraph 2, of the Charter

On certain occasions, the Security Council has found it necessary to decide, by vote, the question whether or not the matter under consideration was procedural within the meaning of Article 27 (2). This question has come to be termed, after the language used in the San Francisco Statement on Voting Procedure, “the preliminary question”.

There were no instances of voting on the preliminary question during the period under review.

Part III

Abstention, non-participation or absence in relation to Article 27, paragraph 3, of the Charter

Note

According to Article 27 (3) of the Charter, the affirmative vote of nine members for decisions on non-procedural (substantive) matters must include “the concurring votes of the permanent members”. Part III concerns the application of this requirement: (a) in the light of the proviso to Article 27 (3) (obligatory abstention); and (b) in circumstances when a permanent and/or elected member voluntarily abstains, does not participate in the vote, or is absent at the time of the vote.

A. Obligatory abstention

The proviso to Article 27 (3) states:

provided that, in decisions under Chapter VI, and under paragraph 3 of Article 52, a party to a dispute shall abstain from voting.

During the period under review, there was no instance in which a member abstained in accordance with the proviso to Article 27 (3), nor was there any discussion of the issue of obligatory abstention.²

representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya reiterated his delegation’s position that resolution 731 (1992) had been adopted in violation of Article 27 (3), the parties to the dispute in that case having taken part in the voting and not abstaining, as provided in the Article. See S/PV.4128; see also case 1, chap. IV of the eleventh Supplement to the Repertoire).

At the 4077th meeting on 3 December 1999, held in connection with the item “The situation between Iraq and Kuwait”, the representative of France decided not to participate in the vote on draft resolution S/1999/1215, which was adopted as resolution 1280 (1999). Speaking before the vote, that Council member believed that the draft resolution had been drafted in such a way as to deliberately render incapable of realization the measure that it proposed. Moreover, he understood that the vote was not about the adoption of the text before Council members, but was instead being used to bring pressure to bear on the members of the Security Council with regard to another exercise and another resolution. It was in the context of “this exceptional and extremely Following the vote, the representative of France pointed out that, in certain very rare cases, texts that “we know will not be implemented and therefore do not enhance the Council’s authority should not be put to the vote”. He expressed the view that it was necessary to know how to take a stand so as not to participate in an exercise that was materially unworkable.³

unusual process” that his delegation saw non-participation in the vote as the only reasonable position to take.

The representative of the Netherlands pointed out that non-participation in the voting was extremely rare, and that few non-permanent members had ever resorted to this extraordinary measure. He stated that his Minister for Foreign Affairs, in the General Assembly, had suggested the usefulness of looking for a way in which permanent members might express their absolutely negative attitude without being obliged to cast a veto. He had simply hoped that in the current vote he was seeing an example of that procedure, in which a permanent member said no without casting a veto.⁴

Part IV

Adoption of resolutions and decisions without a vote

Note

All procedural motions during this period were approved without a vote.

Certain decisions of substance were also taken without a vote, as shown in the case of four resolutions in section A below. In those instances, the President of the Council, in accordance with the understanding reached in prior consultations, proposed “that the Council adopt without a vote” the draft resolution. No votes were taken by consensus during the period under review.

Votes were not taken on decisions that took the form of statements by the President on behalf of the Council or on behalf of the members of the Council. These “presidential statements” were issued after having been agreed upon by members of the Council during consultations. With two exceptions, all presidential statements were announced during formal meetings of the Council (see section B.1); the practice of issuing a statement only in written form without formal announcement at a meeting was not observed during this period. In two instances, after consultations, the President of the Security Council issued a statement to the media which was issued as an official “presidential statement” (see section B.2).

In other instances, Security Council decisions were recorded in notes by or letters from the President of the Council, with no reference to a vote having been taken (see section C). While generally such notes and letters were simply issued in written form, notes reflecting the Council’s decision to adopt its draft annual report were announced at formal meetings annually during the period under review.⁵ The content of two letters was also agreed upon and announced at formal meetings.⁶

Chapter V covers procedures of the Security Council relating to the establishment and control of subsidiary organs deemed necessary for the performance of its functions under the Charter of the United Nations. The Council's power to establish subsidiary organs is set out in Article 29 of the Charter and reflected in rule 28 of its provisional rules of procedure, as follows:

Article 29

The Security Council may establish such subsidiary organs as it deems necessary for the performance of its functions.

Rule 28

The Security Council may appoint a commission or committee or a rapporteur for a specified question.

During the period 1996 to 1999, the Council mandated the establishment of 15 new peacekeeping operations¹ and four new political missions,² and established three new committees to oversee the implementation of measures adopted pursuant to Article 41.³ The Council also established the United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission (UNMOVIC) as a subsidiary body that replaced the United Nations Special Commission (UNSCOM) established pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of resolution 687 (1991). In addition, the Council set up two new informal and ad hoc working groups to make recommendations regarding substantive matters before it.⁴

Part I of this chapter considers these new organs as well as those established prior to 1996 and continuing during part or all of the period under review. The organs are divided into six main categories, reflecting their main character or functions: (a) standing and ad hoc committees; (b) committees to oversee the implementation of measures adopted pursuant to Article 41 and other committees; (c) informal and ad hoc working groups; (d) fact-finding missions and investigative bodies; (e) peacekeeping operations and political missions; and (f) ad hoc commissions and tribunals. A. Standing committees and ad hoc committees

During the period under review, the Committee of Experts on Rules of Procedure, the Committee of Experts established at the 1506th meeting to study the question of associate membership and the Committee on Council Meetings away from Headquarters continued to exist but did not meet.

The Committee on the Admission of New Members was asked to examine and report on the application for admission to membership in the United Nations of two States⁷ referred to it by the Council under rule 59 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure.

B. Security Council committees

Note

Between 1996 and 1999, in accordance with rule 28 of its provisional rules of procedure, the Security Council established three new committees to supervise the implementation of measures adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter in respect of Sierra Leone,⁸ the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, including Kosovo,⁹ and Al-Qaida and the Taliban and associated individuals and entities.¹⁰ During the same period, the Council oversaw 10 such committees, including the committees that had been established in prior periods, and terminated the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 724 (1991) concerning Yugoslavia. In addition, on several occasions, the Council requested the Secretary-General to establish monitoring bodies, in the form of panels or groups of experts, to assist the work of the committees.¹¹

The Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, established all committees to undertake tasks related to sanctions measures. The tasks included (a) seeking information regarding the implementation of measures imposed under Article 41; (b) considering information concerning the violations of the measures and to recommend appropriate measures in response thereto; (c) reporting to the Council on the information regarding alleged violations; (d) giving consideration to and deciding upon requests for exemptions from the measures; (e) examining reports submitted to them, including those from monitoring bodies; (f) identifying individuals and entities subject to the measures; and (g) making recommendations to the Council on how to improve the effectiveness of the measures. In one case, the Committee established pursuant to resolution 661 (1990), concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, was, inter alia, mandated to supervise the implementation of the oil-for-food programme established by resolution 986 (1995).

The committees consisted of all 15 members of the Council, held their meetings in private sessions, unless the committee itself decided otherwise, and reached their decisions by consensus. The bureaux of the committees were elected by the Council annually and announced through notes by the President of the Security Council or press releases.¹² In a note by the President dated 30 October 1998,¹³ the Council decided that, with effect from 1999, the bureau of each sanctions committee should be appointed by that committee, following consultations between Council members, either at its first meeting if that meeting took place in January, or in writing at the instance of the Presidency of the Council under a no-objection procedure.

In accordance with the transparency measures outlined by the President of the Council in his note dated 29 March 1995,¹⁴ the committees continued to submit their annual reports to the Council.

In addition, during the period under consideration, a number of innovations related to the work of the Security Council's subsidiary bodies were introduced by the Council through the adoption of notes by the President or resolutions.¹⁵

In a note by the President dated 24 January 1996,¹⁶ the Council requested the Chairman of each committee to give an oral briefing to interested Members of the United Nations after each meeting, in the same way as oral briefings were given by the President of the Security Council following informal consultations of the whole. The Council further requested the Chairman of each committee to bring to the attention of its members and of the members of the United Nations the improvements in procedures of the committees which were agreed to by the members of the Council on 29 March and 31 May 1995.¹⁷

By resolution 1196 (1998) of 16 September 1998, the Council requested the Security Council committees established by resolutions imposing an arms embargo to apply, as appropriate, the following measures: (a) to include in their annual reports of a substantive section on the implementation of the arms embargoes, on possible violations of the measures reported to the committee and with recommendations, as appropriate, for strengthening the effectiveness of the arms embargoes; (b) to establish channels of communication with regional and subregional organizations and bodies, in addition to other sources of information already mentioned in the guidelines of the committees, in order to improve the monitoring of arms embargoes through wider and regular exchanges of information with relevant parties in the region concerned; and (c) to make relevant information publicly available through appropriate media, including through the improved use of information technology.¹⁸

Subsequently, in a note by the President dated 30 October 1998,¹⁹ the Council decided that its annual report to the General Assembly should also include the annual reports of sanctions committees.

On 29 January 1999, the Council issued a note by the President on the work of the sanctions committees which, in accordance with concerned resolutions, outlined practical proposals that would be used to improve the work of the sanctions committees.²⁰ The measures agreed upon by Council members included, for instance, an increase in the transparency of the sanctions committees' work through, inter alia, substantive and detailed briefings by the Chairpersons, visits by the Chairpersons to the regions concerned, harmonization of guidelines and routines of work, and availability of public information on the sanctions committees' work on the Internet and through other means of communication. Other measures adopted by Council members related to the consideration by the committees of the humanitarian impact of sanctions. More specifically, the note by the President outlined the following measures:

1. The sanctions committees should establish appropriate arrangements and channels of communication with organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system, as well as other intergovernmental and regional organizations, neighbouring countries and other countries and parties concerned, in order to improve the monitoring of the implementation of sanctions regimes and the assessment of their humanitarian consequences on the population of the target State and their economic consequences on neighbouring and other States.

2. The Chairpersons of the sanctions committees should make visits to the regions concerned, as appropriate, in order to obtain first-hand accounts of the impact of sanctions regimes and the results and difficulties in their implementation.

3. Member States should provide the sanctions committees with all information available on alleged violations of arms embargoes, and other sanctions regimes. Sanctions committees should seek to clarify all cases of alleged violations.

4. The Secretariat should be requested to provide the sanctions committees with information from published sources, radio, television or other media concerning alleged violations of the sanctions regimes or other issues relevant to the activities of the committees.

5. The guidelines of the sanctions committees should include clear provisions for strict action to be taken by the committees on alleged violations of the sanctions regimes.

6. The sanctions committees should, as far as possible, harmonize their guidelines and routines of work.

7. The technical effectiveness of the mandatory measures should be periodically assessed by the sanctions committees on the basis of inputs from Member States, reports prepared by the Secretariat and other available sources of information.

8. The practice of hearing technical presentations of information by organizations assisting in the enforcement of Security Council sanctions during closed meetings of the sanctions committees should be continued. The target or affected countries, as well as concerned organizations, should be better able to exercise the right of explaining or presenting their points of view to the sanctions committees, while taking fully into consideration current committee practices. The presentations should be expert and comprehensive.

9. The Secretariat should be requested to provide, whenever necessary, its assessment of the humanitarian and economic impact of sanctions to the sanctions committees.

10. Periodic meetings of the sanctions committees should be held for discussions on the humanitarian and economic impact of sanctions.

11. The sanctions committees should monitor, throughout the sanctions regime, the humanitarian impact of sanctions on vulnerable groups, including children, and make required adjustments of the exemption mechanisms to facilitate the delivery of humanitarian assistance. The indicators for assessment developed by the Secretariat could be used by the committees.

12. The sanctions committees should consider and monitor the possible impact of sanctions on the diplomatic efforts towards implementing Security Council resolutions and make required adjustments on the exemption mechanisms as appropriate.

13. In discharging their mandates, the sanctions committees should as much as possible seek to utilize the expertise and practical assistance of Member States, United Nations agencies, regional organizations and all humanitarian and other relevant organizations.

14. United Nations agencies as well as humanitarian organizations and other relevant organizations should benefit from special, simplified procedures in requesting humanitarian exemptions, in order to facilitate the implementation of their humanitarian programmes.

15. Consideration should be given to how humanitarian organizations could have the possibility to apply for humanitarian exemptions directly to the sanctions committees.

16. Foodstuffs, pharmaceuticals and medical supplies should be exempted from United Nations sanctions regimes. Basic or standard medical and agricultural equipment and basic or standard educational items should also be exempted. Consideration should be given to the drawing up of lists for that purpose. Other essential humanitarian goods should be considered for exemption. In this regard, it is recognized that efforts should be made to allow the population of the targeted countries to have access to appropriate resources and procedures for financing humanitarian imports.

17. Sanctions committees should consider ways to ensure that exemptions to sanctions regimes on religious grounds be made more effective.

18. The transparency of the sanctions committees' work should be increased, inter alia, through substantive and detailed briefings by the Chairpersons.

19. Summary records of the sanctions committees' formal meetings should be made available promptly.

20. Public information on the sanctions committees' work should be made available on the Internet and other means of communication.

The present section deals with all 10 Security Council committees in the order of their establishment. Monitoring bodies whose work is closely linked with that of the committees are featured with the relevant committees under the subheading of monitoring. It should be noted that for clarification purposes only and when required, summarized descriptions of the mandatory measures, which are based on their nature and not intended to serve as legal definitions of those measures, are added (for example: arms embargo, travel restrictions, petroleum embargo, restriction of air traffic, restrictions on diplomatic representation). The measures imposed by the Council pursuant to Article 41 are described in chapter XI of this volume.

1. Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait

The Committee established pursuant to resolution 661 (1990), concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, continued to exercise its responsibility for monitoring the measures imposed by resolution 687 (1991) and for supervising the implementation of the oil-for-food programme established by resolution 986 (1995).²¹

Mandate implementation

By resolution 1051 (1996) of 27 March 1996, the Security Council approved the general principles to be followed in implementing the monitoring mechanism which was presented in the letter of 17 July 1995 from the Chairman of the Special Commission to the Chairman of the Committee established under resolution 661 (1990).²² The mechanism concerned the monitoring of future sales or supplies to Iraq of dual-use items that could assist Iraq in the production or acquisition of proscribed weapons. The Council also confirmed that, until it decided otherwise under its relevant resolutions, requests by other States for sales to Iraq or requests by Iraq for import of any item or technology to which the mechanism applied would continue to be addressed to the Committee for decision in accordance with paragraph 4 of the mechanism. The Council also decided that the Committee established under resolution 661

(1990) and the Special Commission would carry out the functions assigned to them under the monitoring mechanism, until the Council decided otherwise.

During the period under review, the Committee worked in close cooperation with the Office of the Iraq Programme to ensure the effective implementation of all relevant arrangements under the oil-for-food programme established by Security Council resolution 986 (1995).²³ Pursuant to paragraph 25 of resolution 1284 (1999), the Committee adopted a number of measures with the aim of expediting the approval process for humanitarian supplies to Iraq.

Pursuant to resolutions 687 (1991) and 700 (1991), the Security Council conducted periodic reviews of the sanctions regime. The reviews were then suspended by resolution 1194 (1998) of 9 September 1998.

Monitoring and reporting

During the period under review, the Committee submitted three annual reports.²⁴ The Committee also submitted a number of other reports on the implementation of the arms embargo and related sanctions.²⁵

By resolution 1175 (1998) of 19 June 1998, the Security Council authorized States to permit, notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 3 (c) of resolution 661 (1990), the export to Iraq of the necessary parts and equipment to enable Iraq to increase the export of petroleum and petroleum products. The Council also requested the Committee, or a panel of experts appointed by the Committee for that purpose, to approve contracts for the aforementioned parts and equipment, according to lists of parts and equipment approved by the Committee for each individual project.²⁶

By resolution 1284 (1999) of 17 December 1999, the Council requested the Committee to appoint, in accordance with resolutions 1175 (1998) and 1210 (1998), a group of experts, including independent inspection agents appointed by the Secretary-General in accordance with paragraph 6 of resolution 986 (1995); decided that that group would be mandated to approve quickly contracts for the parts and the equipment necessary to enable Iraq to increase its exports of petroleum and petroleum products, according to lists of parts and equipment approved by that Committee for each individual project; and requested the Secretary-General to continue to provide for the monitoring of those parts and equipments inside Iraq.²⁷

2. Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 724 (1991) concerning Yugoslavia

During the period under review, the Committee established pursuant to resolution 724 (1991) to monitor the implementation of the arms embargo imposed on Yugoslavia by resolution 713 (1991), continued its activities until its termination in October 1996.

Mandate implementation Monitoring and reporting

During the period under review, the Committee submitted its third and final report to the Council. The report contained a concise account of the work of the Committee from 1993 until the termination of the sanctions regime and a number of recommendations regarding the refining of the instrument of sanctions with a view to increasing its effectiveness.²⁸

Termination of mandate

By resolution 1074 (1996) of 1 October 1996, expressing gratitude for the Committee's work, the Security Council decided to dissolve the Committee established by resolution 724 (1991).²⁹

3. Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 748 (1992) concerning the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya

During the period under review, the Committee established pursuant to resolution 748 (1992) continued its supervision of the sanctions regime imposed against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya relating to various aspects of aviation and arms related measures, reductions and restriction of the activities of the diplomatic and consular missions, and restrictions on nationals of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya whose involvement in terrorist activities was known or suspected.

By a statement of the President dated 18 April 1996,³⁰ the Council members requested the Committee to draw to the attention of Member States their obligations under resolution 748 (1992) in the event that Libyan-registered aircraft landed in their territory.

By a statement of the President dated 29 January 1997,³¹ the Council members indicated that the announcement by the Libyan authorities that Libyan Arab Airways would immediately resume international flights out of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya was incompatible with resolution 748 (1992), which prohibited all international flights to and from that country.³² The Council also took note of reports that a Libyan-registered aircraft had flown from Tripoli to Accra on 21 January 1997, in apparent violation of resolution 748 (1992), and asked the Committee to follow up on the matter.³³

By a statement of the President dated 4 April 1997,³⁴ Council members cited the flight of a Libyan-registered aircraft from Tripoli to Jeddah, on 29 March 1997, as a clear violation of the sanctions regime and called on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to refrain from any further violations. The Council also requested the Committee to draw to the attention of States their obligations under resolution 748 (1992) in the event that Libyan registered aircraft landed in their territory.³⁵

By a statement of the President dated 20 May 1997,³⁶ Council members took note with concern of reports that Libyan-registered aircraft flew from Libya to Niger on 8 May 1997 and returned to Libya from Nigeria on 10 May in violation of resolution 748 (1992). The Council thus requested the Committee to follow up the matter directly with the representatives of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Niger and Nigeria, and called upon all States to fulfil their obligations under resolution 748 (1992).³⁷

By resolution 1192 (1998) of 27 August 1998, the Council reaffirmed that the measures set forth in its resolutions 748 (1992) and 883 (1993) remained in effect and binding on all Member States, and in that context reaffirmed the provisions of paragraph 16 of resolution 883 (1993), and decided that the aforementioned measures would be suspended if the Secretary-General reported to the Council that the two persons charged with the bombing of Pan Am flight 103 had arrived in the Netherlands for the purpose of trial before the relevant Scottish court, and that the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had satisfied the French judicial authorities with regard to the bombing of UTA 772.

Following a letter addressed to the President of the Council from the Secretary-General reporting that the conditions set forth in resolution 1192 (1998) had been met,³⁸ by a statement of the President dated 8 April 1999,³⁹ the Council members noted that the conditions for suspending the wide range of aerial, arms related and diplomatic measures against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had been fulfilled as of 5 April 1999. In a subsequent statement dated 9 July 1999,⁴⁰ Council members recalled that the measures set forth in resolutions 748 (1992) and 883 (1993) had been suspended, and reaffirmed their intention to lift those measures, in conformity with the relevant resolutions.

Monitoring and reporting

In accordance with the note by the President of the Security Council dated 29 March 1995,⁴¹ during the period under review the Committee submitted five annual reports.⁴²

4. Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 751 (1992) concerning Somalia

During the period under review, the Committee established pursuant to resolution 751 (1992) continued to oversee the implementation of the arms embargo imposed by resolution 733 (1992) against Somalia.

Mandate implementation Monitoring and reporting

In accordance with the note by the President of the Security Council of 29 March 1995,⁴³ during the period under review the Committee submitted five annual reports.⁴⁴

5. Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 864 (1993) concerning the situation in Angola

During the period under review, the Committee established pursuant to resolution 864 (1993) continued to fulfil its mandate of monitoring the measures imposed against the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola (UNITA) by resolution 864 (1993), and modified by subsequent resolutions 1127 (1997) and 1173 (1998).

Mandate implementation

Following the failure by UNITA to comply with its obligations under the “Acordos de Paz” and the Lusaka Protocol and with relevant Security Council resolutions, in particular resolution 1118 (1997), on 28 August 1997, the Council adopted resolution 1127 (1997), by which it decided to impose additional measures against UNITA, such as restrictions on the travel of senior members of UNITA and adult members of their immediate families, the closing of UNITA offices, the prohibition of flights of aircraft by or for UNITA, the supply of any aircraft or aircraft components to UNITA and the insurance, engineering and servicing of UNITA aircraft.⁴⁵ By the same resolution, the Council requested the Committee established pursuant to resolution 864 (1993) to monitor the implementation of the measures and to report by 15 November 1997 regarding the actions taken by States to implement them.⁴⁶ The Council also requested the Committee to draw up guidelines “expeditiously” for the implementation of the new restrictions imposed against UNITA.⁴⁷

By resolution 1157 (1998) of 20 March 1998, the Security Council endorsed the planned visit by the Chairman of the Committee to Angola and other interested countries to discuss the full and effective implementation of the measures specified in paragraph 4 of resolution 1127 (1997) with a view to urging compliance by UNITA with its obligations under the Lusaka Protocol and relevant Security Council resolutions.⁴⁸

By resolution 1164 (1998) of 29 April 1998, the Security Council expressed its appreciation to the Chairman of the Committee after his visit to Angola and other interested countries and reinforced the need for full and effective implementation of the measures specified in paragraph 4 of resolution 1127 (1997) in order to achieve compliance by UNITA with its obligations under the Lusaka Protocol and relevant Security Council resolutions.⁴⁹

By resolution 1173 (1998) of 12 June 1998, the Council decided to establish additional measures against UNITA by imposing financial sanctions against UNITA, prohibiting the direct or indirect export from Angola of all diamonds originating from territories not controlled by the Government of Angola and banning any form of travel to territory controlled by UNITA.⁵⁰ In connection with the above-mentioned measures, the Council requested all States to provide the Committee with information on actions taken to implement those measures and with any information about violations of the provisions of resolution 1173 (1998), for distribution to Member States.⁵¹ By the same resolution, the Council also decided that the Committee might authorize, on a case-by-case basis, under a no-objection procedure, exemptions to the measures specified above for verified medical and humanitarian purposes.⁵² Finally, the Council requested the Committee to (a) draw up guidelines expeditiously for the implementation of the above measures and consider ways and means for further strengthening the effectiveness of the measures adopted by the Council in its previous resolutions; and (b) report to the Council by 31 July 1998 regarding the actions taken by States to implement the aforementioned measures.⁵³

By resolution 1237 (1999) of 7 May 1999, the Security Council endorsed the recommendation contained in the Chairman’s letter dated 4 May 1999 and

On 30 July 1999, the Chairman of the Committee transmitted to the Security Council a list of 10 experts appointed to the expert panels, as approved by the Committee under the no-objection procedure.⁵⁷ The interim report of the panel of experts established pursuant to resolution 1237 (1999) was submitted by the Chairman of the Committee to the President of the Security Council on 30 September 1999.⁵⁸

Monitoring

By resolution 1196 (1998) of 16 September 1998, in connection with the situation in Africa, the Security Council requested the committees established by resolutions imposing arms embargoes in Africa to submit recommendations, as appropriate, for strengthening the effectiveness of those embargoes.⁵⁹ The Council also welcomed the initiative of the Chairman of the Committee established pursuant to resolution 864 (1993) to visit countries in the region and invited other Committees to consider this approach, where and when appropriate, to enhance the full and effective implementation of the measures specified in their respective mandates with a view to urging the parties to comply with relevant Council resolutions.⁶⁰

By resolution 1202 (1998) of 15 October 1998, the Security Council requested the Chairman of the Committee to investigate reports that the leader of UNITA had travelled outside Angola in violation of resolution 1127 (1997) and that forces of UNITA had received military training and assistance as well as arms from outside Angola in violation of resolution 864 (1993).⁶¹ In a note by the President of the Security Council dated 18 February 1999,⁶² and subsequently by resolution 1229 (1999) of 26 February 1999,⁶³ the Council, inter alia, endorsed those recommendations.⁶⁴

By resolution 1237 (1999) of 7 May 1999, the Security Council welcomed and endorsed the planned visit to Angola and other concerned countries by the Chairman of the Committee concerning the situation in Angola.⁶⁵ On 4 June 1999, the Chairman submitted a report to the Security Council on his visits to Angola, Botswana, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Namibia, South Africa, Zambia and Zimbabwe from 10 to 27 May 1999, with recommendations for enhancing the implementation of the measures imposed against UNITA.⁶⁶ In July 1999, the Chairman visited Algeria, Belgium, France, Ukraine and the United Kingdom. A report on those visits, containing further recommendations for better implementation of the measures imposed against UNITA, was submitted to the Council on 28 July.⁶⁷

By resolution 1135 (1997) of 29 October 1997, the Security Council requested the Committee to report to the Council by 15 December 1997 regarding the actions taken by States to implement the measures specified in paragraph 4 of resolution 1127 (1997).⁶⁸ In accordance with this resolution, the Committee submitted two reports regarding the action taken by Member States to implement the provisions of resolution 1127 (1997).⁶⁹

By resolution 1176 (1998) of 24 June 1998, the Security Council requested the Committee to report to the Council, by 7 August 1998, regarding the actions taken by States to implement the measures specified in paragraphs 11 and 12 of resolution 1173 (1998).⁷⁰ In accordance with this resolution, the Committee submitted two reports, dated 7 August and 8 October 1998, respectively.⁷¹

By resolution 1221 (1999) of 12 January 1999, the Security Council, condemning the downing of two aircraft chartered by the United Nations, stressed the obligation of Member States to comply with the measures imposed against UNITA contained in resolutions 864 (1993), 1127 (1997) and 1173 (1998).⁷² It also expressed its readiness to pursue reports of violations of those measures, to take steps to reinforce their implementation and to consider the imposition of additional measures, including in the area of telecommunications, on the basis of a report to be prepared by the Committee.⁷³ In response to this request, on 12 February 1999, the Committee submitted a report containing recommendations by the Secretary-General and proposals by the Committee for improving the implementation of the measures imposed against UNITA.⁷⁴

During the period under review, the Committee submitted four annual reports,⁷⁵ in accordance with the note by the President of the Security Council of 29 March 1995.⁷⁶

6. Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 918 (1994) concerning Rwanda

During the period under consideration, the Committee established pursuant to resolution 918

(1994), continued to fulfil its mandate of monitoring the arms embargo imposed by that resolution and modified by resolution 1011 (1995).

Mandate implementation Monitoring and reporting

During the period under review, the Committee submitted five annual reports.⁷⁷ On 1 September 1996, the restrictions imposed by paragraph 13 of resolution 918 (1994) relating to the sale or supply of arms and related materiel to the Government of Rwanda were terminated, in accordance with paragraph 8 of resolution 1011 (1995). However, in its reports, the Committee observed that all States were required to continue to implement those restrictions. In this respect, the Committee reported to the Council four notifications received from States on the export of arms or related materiel to Rwanda, as well as on imports of arms and related materiel made by the Government of Rwanda.⁷⁸ Furthermore, in its reports, the Committee noted that, in the absence of a specific monitoring mechanism to ensure the effective implementation of the arms embargo, the Committee relied solely on the cooperation of States and organizations in a position to provide it with pertinent information on violations of the arms embargo.⁷⁹

In its annual report covering the period from 1 January to 31 December 1998, the Committee took note of resolution 1196 (1998), by which, inter alia, the Council reiterated the obligation of all States to carry out the decisions of the Council on arms embargoes and its request that all States report information on possible violations of arms embargoes established by the Council to the relevant Security Council committees. The Committee also endorsed paragraph 2 of that resolution, in which the Council encouraged each Member State, as appropriate, to consider as a means of implementing these obligations the adoption of legislation or other

The Committee specified that it had already received information from some Member States and anticipated additional responses from other Member States and expert sources.

7. Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 985 (1995) concerning Liberia

During the period under review, the Committee established pursuant to resolution 985 (1995) continued to fulfil its mandate to oversee the implementation of the arms embargo imposed by resolution 788 (1992).

Mandate implementation Monitoring and reporting

By a statement of the President dated 7 January 1999 in connection with the situation in Sierra Leone,⁸¹ Council members condemned all those who had afforded support, including through the supply of arms and mercenaries, to the rebels in Sierra Leone, and expressed its grave concern at reports that such support was being afforded in particular from the territory of Liberia. The Council therefore urged the Committee created pursuant to resolution 985 (1995) to pursue active measures to investigate violations of the embargoes and to report to the Council with recommendations, as appropriate.⁸²

During the period under review, the Committee submitted five annual reports.⁸³ In those reports, the Committee noted that, in the absence of a specific monitoring mechanism to ensure the effective implementation of the arms embargo, the Committee relied solely on the cooperation of States and organizations in a position to provide it with pertinent information on violations of the arms embargo. In its report covering the period from 1 January to 31 December 1998, the Committee endorsed paragraph 2 of resolution 1196 (1998), in which the Council encouraged each Member State to consider as a means of implementing its obligations the adoption of legislation or other legal measures making the violation of arms embargoes established by the Council a criminal offence.⁸⁴

During the period under review, the Committee considered three communications regarding alleged violations of the arms embargo imposed against Liberia and, in that regard, sent letters of enquiry to Burkina Faso, Liberia and Ukraine on 26 May 1999.⁸⁵

8. Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 1132 (1997) concerning Sierra Leone

Establishment and mandate

Following the military coup d'état staged by the Revolutionary United Front (RUF) on 25 May 1997, the Council adopted resolution 1132 (1997) of 8 October 1997, by which it imposed arms and petroleum embargoes and restrictions on the travel of members of the military junta and their families.⁸⁶ By the same resolution, the Security Council established a Committee to investigate violations of the regime of mandatory sanctions imposed against Sierra Leone and report to the Council in this respect. The Committee was specifically given the following tasks: (a) to seek from all States further information regarding their action to implement effectively the embargoes and the restrictions on travel abroad for members of the military junta of Sierra Leone and adult members of their families; (b) to consider information brought to its attention by States concerning violations of the measures imposed by that resolution, and to recommend appropriate measures in response thereto; (c) to make periodic reports to the Council on information submitted to it regarding alleged violations of the measures imposed by that resolution, identifying where possible persons or entities, including vessels, were reported to be engaged in such violations; (d) to promulgate guidelines to facilitate the implementation of the measures imposed by that resolution; (e) to consider and decide expeditiously requests for the approval of imports of petroleum and petroleum products, on a case-by-case basis under a no-objection procedure; (f) to designate and compile a list of members of the military junta of Sierra Leone and adults belonging to their families, whose entry or transit was to be prevented by all States; (g) to examine the reports submitted by States and by the Observer Group of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOMOG); and (h) to establish liaison with the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) committee on the implementation of the embargoes and restrictions on travel.⁸⁷

By resolution 1156 (1998) of 18 March 1998, welcoming the return to Sierra Leone of its democratically elected President on 10 March 1998, the Council decided to lift the petroleum embargo, as imposed by paragraph 6 of resolution 1132 (1997).

By resolution 1171 (1998) of 5 June 1998, the Council lifted the restrictions on travel and embargoes imposed by paragraphs 5 and 6 of resolution 1132 (1997) and, at the same time, reinforced the arms embargo and selective travel ban on non-governmental forces.⁸⁸ By the same resolution, the Council further decided that the Committee established by resolution 1132 (1997) should continue to undertake the tasks referred to in paragraph 10 (a), (b), (c), (d), (f) and (h) of resolution 1132 (1997) in relation to paragraphs 2 and 5 of resolution 1171 (1998).⁸⁹

By resolution 1196 (1998) of 16 September 1998, in connection with the situation in Africa, the Security Council requested the committees established by resolutions imposing arms embargoes in Africa to submit recommendations, as appropriate, for strengthening the effectiveness of these embargoes.⁹⁰ The Council also welcomed the initiative of the Chairman of the Committee established pursuant to resolution 1132 (1997) to visit countries in the region and invited other Committees to consider this approach, where and when appropriate, in order to enhance the full and effective implementation of the measures specified in their respective mandates with a view to urging the parties to comply with relevant Council resolutions.⁹¹

During the period under review, the Committee submitted two annual reports to the Council.⁹² Furthermore, pursuant to paragraph 9 of resolution 1132 (1997), ECOWAS was requested to report to the Committee on all activities undertaken to ensure the strict implementation of the provisions of paragraphs 5 and 6 of that resolution relating to the arms embargo, the restrictions on travel abroad for members of the military junta of Sierra Leone and adult members of their families, and the supply of petroleum and petroleum products. In its report covering the period from 1 January to 31 December 1998, the Committee reported that ECOWAS had submitted to it four reports.⁹³

In its report covering the period from 1 January to 31 December 1999, the Committee observed that since it played a central role in the monitoring of the implementation of the sanctions regime on Sierra Leone, it should consider ways to improve the monitoring and implementation of the sanctions against Sierra Leone. The Committee added that reports through ECOWAS, from ECOMOG and/or UNOMSIL, could strengthen the effectiveness of the arms embargo, by assisting the Committee in its efforts to guard against the influx of arms and related materiel of all types into the territory of Sierra Leone, as recommended in paragraphs 3 and 4 of Security Council resolution 1196 (1998).⁹⁴

9. Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 1160 (1998)

Establishment and mandate

By resolution 1160 (1998) of 31 March 1998, the Council decided that all States should, for the purposes of fostering peace and stability in Kosovo, prevent the sale or supply to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, including Kosovo, by their nationals or from their territories or using their flag vessels and aircraft, of arms and related materiel of all types, such as weapons and ammunition, military vehicles and equipment and spare parts for the aforementioned, and should prevent arming and training for terrorist activities there.⁹⁵ By the same resolution, the Council decided to establish a Committee of the Security Council to monitor the implementation of the newly imposed measures. Specifically, the Committee was mandated (a) to seek from all States information regarding the action taken by them concerning the effective implementation of the prohibitions imposed by that resolution; (b) to consider any information brought to its attention by any State concerning violations of the imposed prohibitions and to recommend appropriate measures in response thereto;

(c) to make periodic reports to the Security Council on information submitted to it regarding alleged violations of the imposed prohibitions; (d) to promulgate such guidelines as may be necessary to facilitate the implementation of the imposed prohibitions; and (e) to examine the reports submitted by States, indicating the steps they had taken to give effect to the imposed prohibitions.⁹⁶

During the period under review, the Committee submitted one annual report to the Security Council covering its activities from its establishment in April 1998 to December 1998.⁹⁷ The second report of the Committee, covering activities carried out during 1999, was submitted by the Chairperson of the Committee to the President of the Security Council on 27 June 2000.⁹⁸

10. Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 1267 (1999) concerning Al-Qaida and the Taliban and associated individuals and entities

Establishment and mandate

By resolution 1267 (1999) of 15 October 1999, the Security Council imposed a flight ban on any aircraft owned, leased or operated by or on behalf of the Taliban, and mandated the freezing of funds directly or indirectly owned or controlled by the Taliban.⁹⁹ By the same resolution, the Council established a Committee to ensure the effective implementation of the sanctions regime imposed against the Taliban. Specifically, the Committee was mandated (a) to seek from all States further information regarding the action taken by them with a view to effectively implementing the aircraft restrictions and the freezing of funds of the Taliban; (b) to consider information brought to its attention by States concerning violations of the measures imposed against the Taliban and to recommend appropriate measures in response thereto; (c) to make periodic reports to the Council on the impact of the imposed measures, including their humanitarian implications; (d) to make periodic reports to the Council on information submitted to it regarding alleged violations of the imposed measures, identifying where possible persons or entities reported to be engaged in such violations; (e) to designate the aircraft and funds or other financial resources to which the sanctions applied, in order to facilitate the implementation of the sanctions; (f) to consider requests for exemptions from the sanctions and to decide on a possible granting of an exemption; and (g) to examine the reports submitted by States, in complying with their duty to cooperate fully with the Committee.¹⁰⁰ By paragraph 10 of the same resolution, all States were requested to report to the Committee, within 30 days of the coming into force of the measures imposed, on the steps they had taken with a view to effectively implementing them.¹⁰¹

C. Informal and ad hoc working groups

During the period under review, the Council's Informal Working Group on Documentation and Other Procedural Questions continued to exist. D. Fact-finding missions and investigative bodies

During the period under review, the International Commission of Inquiry established under resolution 1012 (1995) concerning Burundi and the Commission of Inquiry established pursuant to resolution 1013 (1995) concerning Rwanda continued to exist and fulfil their respective mandates.

1. International Commission of Inquiry established under resolution 1012 (1995) concerning Burundi

During the period under consideration, the International Commission of Inquiry established under resolution 1012 (1995) concerning Burundi continued to carry out its mandate, as follows: (a) to establish the facts relating to the assassination of the President of Burundi on 21 October 1993, the massacres and other related serious acts of violence which had followed; and (b) to recommend measures of a legal, political or administrative nature, as appropriate, after consultation with the Government of Burundi, and measures with regard to the bringing to justice of persons responsible for those acts, to prevent any repetition of deeds similar to those investigated by the Commission and, in general, to eradicate impunity and promote national reconciliation in Burundi.¹⁰²

In a statement by the President dated 5 January 1996,¹⁰³ the members of the Council, expressing their concern about the deterioration of the situation in Burundi, stressed the importance they attached to the work of the International Commission of Inquiry, and undertook to study carefully the letter from the Secretary-General dated 3 January 1996 containing an interim report on that work.¹⁰⁴

By a letter dated 25 July 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁰⁵ the Secretary-General transmitted the final report of the International Commission of Inquiry. In that report, the Commission explained that it was not in a position to identify by name the persons who should be brought to justice for being responsible for the assassinations, the massacres and other acts of serious violence which occurred in and after October 1993.

By a letter dated 24 September 1996,¹⁰⁶ the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General that the members of the Council were gravely concerned at the conclusions of the Commission set out in its report. The members of the Council expressed the view that, once conditions permitted, the recommendations of the Commission be given further consideration. Since the members of the Council noted that the Commission was not able to function freely, they decided to remain seized of the matter and to consider further action with regard to the report of the Commission in the light of developments in the country.

2. International Commission of Inquiry established pursuant to resolution 1013 (1995) concerning Rwanda

During the period under consideration, the International Commission of Inquiry established pursuant to resolution 1013 (1995) concerning Rwanda continued to carry out its mandate, as follows: (a) to collect information and investigate reports relating to the sale or supply of arms and related materiel to former Rwandan government forces in the Great Lakes region; (b) to investigate allegations that such forces were receiving military training in order to destabilize Rwanda; (c) to identify parties aiding and abetting the illegal acquisition of arms by former Rwandan government forces; and (d) to recommend measures to end the illegal flow of arms in the subregion.¹⁰⁷

By a letter dated 26 January 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁰⁸ the Secretary-General transmitted to the members of the Council the interim report of the International Commission of Inquiry.¹⁰⁹ The final report of the Commission was transmitted to the Council in a letter dated 13 March 1996 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council.¹¹⁰ As requested by the Council, the report contained the conclusions of the Commission of Inquiry, as well as its recommendations regarding possible measures to curb the illegal flow of arms in the Great Lakes region. In the same letter, the Secretary-General underlined the necessity to review the composition and the modus operandi of the Commission, should the Council decide that the Commission must continue its investigations.

By resolution 1053 (1996) of 23 April 1996, having considered the Commission's reports, the Security Council commended the members of the Commission of Inquiry for the excellent investigation conducted, although noting with concern the continuing lack of full cooperation with the Commission by some Governments. The Council further expressed its concern with regard to the finding of the Commission that certain Rwandan elements were receiving military training to conduct destabilizing raids into Rwanda, and also with regard to the strong evidence presented by the Commission leading to the conclusion that it was highly probable that a violation of the arms embargo had occurred. Noting also that the Commission had not yet been able to investigate thoroughly the allegations of continuing violations of the arms embargo, the Council, by the same resolution, requested the Secretary-General to maintain the Commission on the basis set out in paragraph 91 (c) of the Commission's report.¹¹¹ The Commission was therefore requested to follow up on its earlier investigations and to stand ready to pursue any further allegations of violations.

By a letter dated 1 November 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹¹² the Secretary-General transmitted the third report of the Commission of Inquiry. In his letter, the Secretary-General referred to paragraph 119 of the report in which the Commission had indicated that, pursuant to paragraph 2 of resolution 1053 (1996) and subject to the concurrence of the Security Council, it intended to continue its work with a view to following up its investigations, pursuing any further allegations of violations and making periodic reports on the evolution of the situation with regard to compliance with the relevant Council resolutions. The Secretary-General added that, by the same paragraph, the Commission also expressed the view that its mandate would need to be reviewed in the light of any decision that the Council might take concerning the deployment of United Nations observers or in the light of any other decisions that the Council might adopt to address the deteriorating situation in the Great Lakes region. By a letter dated 22 January 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the Secretary-General transmitted to the Council an addendum to the third report of the Commission of Inquiry.¹¹³

By resolution 1161 (1998) of 9 April 1998, the Security Council, while commending the members of the Commission of Inquiry on the investigation conducted and, in particular on the final report, recognized the need for a renewed investigation of the illegal flow of arms in Rwanda and requested the Secretary-General to reactivate the Commission of Inquiry with the following mandate: (a) to collect information and investigate reports relating to the sale, supply and shipment of arms and related materiel to former Rwandan government forces and militias in the Great Lakes region of Central Africa; (b) to identify parties aiding and abetting the illegal sale to or acquisition by former Rwandan government forces and militias; and (c) to make recommendations relating to the illegal flow of arms in the Great Lakes region.¹¹⁴ The Council further recommended that the Commission resume its work as soon as possible, and requested the Secretary-General to report to the Council on the reactivation of the Commission, and to submit an interim report to the Council on the initial conclusions of the Commission within three months of its reactivation, to be followed by a final report containing its recommendations three months later.¹¹⁵

By a letter dated 27 May 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹¹⁶ the Secretary-General informed the President of the Security Council that the Commission of Inquiry had been reactivated, and he also reported on its composition.

Pursuant to resolution 1161 (1998), the Commission of Inquiry submitted, via the Secretary-General, an interim report on 18 August 1998,¹¹⁷ and a final report on 18 November 1998,¹¹⁸ confirming that the ex-Forces armées rwandaises and Interahamwe militias had continued to receive arms and ammunition mainly from other armed groups in Angola, Burundi, Uganda and from the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo. In its report, the Commission also underlined the lack of effectiveness of the two embargoes imposed by the Security Council owing to the close relationship existing between the ex-Forces armées rwandaises, Interahamwe, the Democratic Republic of the Congo and its allies, the Governments of Angola, Chad, Namibia and Zimbabwe.

E. Peacekeeping operations and political missions

The period under review witnessed a dramatic increase in the total number of peacekeeping missions deployed and in the greatly expanded range of tasks assigned to them. Beyond interposition between forces and multidisciplinary operations to assist the parties to implement agreements, peacekeepers also assumed responsibility for interim administrations as in the cases of Kosovo¹¹⁹ and East Timor. The period also saw an increase in United Nations political missions, including peacebuilding offices.¹²⁰

Between 1996 and 1999, the Council mandated, often acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, the establishment of 15 new peacekeeping operations,¹²¹

Thirty-one peacekeeping operations and six political missions are considered below, by geographic region. Studies of missions in each region are generally in the order of their establishment, while interlinked operations are dealt with jointly. As a full account of Council proceedings, including the details of deliberations by the Council on the question and the content of the reports of the Secretary-General on the situations on the ground, is set out in chapter VIII of this volume, this section focuses on procedures of the Council concerning the establishment, mandate, composition, implementation of mandate, and termination or transition of peacekeeping operations during the period under review. It is noted that, in accordance with the general principles set out in General Assembly resolutions 874 (S-IV) of 27 June 1963 and 3101 (XXVIII) of 11 December 1973, peacekeeping operations during the period under consideration were financed through assessed contributions by Member States, except where mentioned otherwise.

1. United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara established pursuant to resolution 690 (1991)

During the period under review, the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara (MINURSO) continued its efforts in support of the implementation of the settlement plan and agreements reached by the Government of Morocco and Frente Polisario to hold a free, fair and impartial referendum that would allow the people of Western Sahara to decide the future status of the territory.

Mandate implementation

By a series of resolutions,¹²⁴ adopted on the basis of the Secretary-General's reports,¹²⁵ the Security Council successively extended the mandate of MINURSO for additional periods of one to six months. The last such extension was until 29 February 2000, with the expectation that the parties would meet in direct talks under the auspices of the Personal Envoy of the Secretary-General to try to resolve the multiple problems relating to the implementation of the settlement plan and to try to agree upon a mutually acceptable political solution to their dispute over Western Sahara.

2. United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia established pursuant to resolution 866 (1993)

During the period under review, the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia (UNOMIL) continued to exercise good offices in support of the efforts of ECOWAS to implement the peace agreement; investigate alleged ceasefire violations; assist in demobilization of combatants; support humanitarian assistance and investigate human rights violations.

Mandate implementation

Prior to its termination on 30 September 1997, the Council extended the mandate of UNOMIL six times for periods of varying lengths,¹²⁹ in accordance with the recommendations of the Secretary-General.¹³⁰

In a report dated 22 August 1996,¹³¹ the Secretary-General informed the Council of his intention to deploy to Liberia an additional 24 military observers, as well as essential civilian personnel to assist UNOMIL in responding to developments on the ground. Pursuant to resolution 1071 (1996), the Secretary-General, in a report dated 17 October 1996,¹³² made recommendations on additional ways in which UNOMIL could provide assistance in support of the peace process in Liberia, which the Council concurred with in a letter dated 8 November 1996.¹³³ The assistance included, inter alia, disarmament, demobilization and human rights aspects. In an addendum to his report, dated 22 October 1996, the Secretary-General informed the Council of an increase in the strength of the Mission by 58 military observers, 54 international staff, 613 local staff and 28 United Nations Volunteers.¹³⁴

Termination of mandate

By a statement of the President dated 30 July 1997,¹³⁵ the Council members noted that the successful conclusion of the electoral process marked the fulfilment of a key element of the mandate of UNOMIL. By resolution 1116 (1997), the Council decided to extend the mandate of UNOMIL until 30 September 1997, with the expectation that it would terminate on that date.¹³⁶ In his final reports on UNOMIL,¹³⁷ the Secretary-General stated that, pending further consultations with the Government of Liberia, it was his intention to recommend the establishment of a peacebuilding support office to succeed UNOMIL after 30 September 1997. In accordance with resolution 1116 (1997), the Mission was closed on 30 September 1997.

3. United Nations Peacebuilding Support Office in Liberia

Establishment, mandate and composition

In his reports dated 13 August and 12 September 1997 respectively,¹³⁸ the Secretary-General recommended the establishment of a peacebuilding support office in Liberia, which would succeed UNOMIL upon the expiration of its mandate. By a letter dated 22 October 1997 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹³⁹ the Secretary-General noted that the participants in the fourth Ministerial meeting of the ad hoc Special Conference on Liberia, held on 3 October 1997, had expressed strong support for the establishment of a United Nations Peacebuilding Support Office in the country. Following the elections and the withdrawal of UNOMIL, the United Nations Peacebuilding Support Office in Liberia (UNOL) was established on 1 November 1997, with the Council's approval.¹⁴⁰

The Office initially consisted of 12 international staff and 3 local staff.

Mandate implementation

During the period under review, the mandate of UNOL was extended on two occasions through exchanges of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council for further periods of 12 months, the last of which was until December 2000.¹⁴²

4. United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda established pursuant to resolution 872 (1993)

Until its termination in 1996, the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda (UNAMIR) continued to fulfil its mandate to help the Rwandan parties implement the Arusha Peace Agreement signed on 4 August 1993.

Mandate implementation: termination of mandate

The Security Council, by resolution 1050 (1996) dated 8 March 1996, took note of the arrangements made by the Secretary-General for the withdrawal, starting on 9 March 1996, of UNAMIR pursuant to Council resolution 1029 (1995) of 12 December 1995.¹⁴³ The Security Council also authorized elements of UNAMIR remaining in Rwanda to contribute to the protection of the personnel and premises of the International Tribunal for Rwanda until the final withdrawal of the Mission.¹⁴⁴ The mandate of UNAMIR officially came to an end on 8 March 1996, and the withdrawal of the Mission was completed in April 1996.

5. United Nations Office in Burundi

Establishment, mandate and composition

Following the military coup d'état in Burundi on 21 October 1993, the Council members requested, in a statement by the President dated 25 October 1993,¹⁴⁵ that the Secretary-General monitor and follow the situation, in close association with the Organization of African Unity (OAU). Subsequently, in a statement by the President dated 16 November 1993,¹⁴⁶ the Council encouraged the Secretary-General to continue using his good offices through his Special Representative and to consider dispatching as soon as possible a small United Nations team to Burundi for fact-finding and advice with a view to facilitating the efforts of the Government of Burundi and OAU. In response to that request of the Security Council, the United Nations Office in Burundi (UNOB) was established in November 1993 to support the initiatives aimed at promoting peace and reconciliation between the parties to the conflict.¹⁴⁷

During the period under consideration, UNOB was composed of 12 international and 17 local staff.

Mandate implementation

By a letter dated 12 April 1999 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁴⁸ the Secretary-General informed the Security Council that the peace process in Burundi had entered a critical phase and that he had therefore decided to upgrade the level of UNOB by appointing the head of the Office as his representative in the country. The Council concurred with the decision of the Secretary-General.¹⁴⁹

By a letter dated 2 November 1999 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁵⁰ the Secretary-General indicated that, although the peace process had been expected to culminate in the conclusion of a general peace agreement by the end of 1999, it appeared likely that peace efforts would continue into 2000. Even once a peace agreement had been reached, there would still be a need for UNOB to undertake additional responsibilities in the post-conflict peacebuilding phase to help in the consolidation of peace and security. That would entail assisting in the implementation of the peace agreement and the establishment of new institutions, as well as providing support for the various reforms envisaged in the agreement. The Secretary-General therefore expressed his intention to extend the United Nations political presence in Burundi until the end of December 2000. By a letter dated 5 November 1999,¹⁵¹ the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General that the members of the Council had taken note of the intention of the Secretary-General.

6. The United Nations Angola Verification Mission established pursuant to resolution 976 (1995)

During the period under review, the United Nations Angola Verification Mission established pursuant to resolution 976 (1995) (UNAVEM III) continued to assist the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola (UNITA) in restoring peace and achieving national reconciliation on the basis of the Peace Accords for Angola, the Lusaka Protocol and relevant Security Council resolutions.

Mandate implementation

During the period under consideration, the mandate of UNAVEM III was initially extended on two occasions for periods of three and two months respectively, until 11 July 1996.¹⁵² Subsequently, on the basis of the recommendations of the Secretary-General,¹⁵³ the mandate was continuously extended on six occasions for periods of various lengths, the last of which ended on 30 June 1997.¹⁵⁴

Termination of mandate/transition to a new mission

By resolution 1106 (1997) of 16 April 1997, which extended the mandate of UNAVEM III for a final time, the Security Council requested the Secretary-General to complete the withdrawal of UNAVEM III military units, and expressed its intention to consider the establishment of a follow-on United Nations presence which would succeed UNAVEM III, as recommended by the Secretary-General.¹⁵⁵ On 30 June 1997, the mandate of UNAVEM III was terminated.

7. The United Nations Observer Mission in Angola established pursuant to resolution 1118 (1997)

Establishment, mandate and composition

Following the termination of UNAVEM III, the Secretary-General submitted a report recommending the establishment of a new integrated operation to be known as the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola (MONUA) for a period of seven months.¹⁵⁶ By resolution 1118 (1997) of 30 June 1997, the Security Council established MONUA for an initial period of four months and expected a full completion of the Mission by February 1998.¹⁵⁷ The Security Council also decided that MONUA had to assume responsibility for all components and assets of UNAVEM III remaining in Angola, including former military units, to deploy as appropriate until they were withdrawn.¹⁵⁸

The mandate of MONUA was defined by the Secretary-General in section VII of his report of 5 June 1997.¹⁵⁹ The overall mandate was to assist the Angolan parties in consolidating peace and national reconciliation, enhancing confidence-building and creating an environment conducive to long term stability, democratic development and rehabilitation of the country.

The Observer Mission was composed of political, civilian police, military, human rights and humanitarian elements. In terms of the political aspects, the Mission was mandated, inter alia, to monitor the normalization of State administration throughout the country, provide good offices and mediation at the provincial and local levels and participate in the official organs established for that purpose. It was also given the tasks of monitoring and verifying the integration of UNITA elements into State structures, and assisting in the resolution and management of conflicts which might arise. In terms of police matters, the civilian police component was mandated to continue to verify the neutrality of the Angolan National Police, the incorporation of UNITA personnel into the national police, the quartering and occasional deployment of the rapid reaction police, and the free circulation of people and goods. The Civilian Police Unit was also given the tasks of continuing to monitor and verify the collection of weapons recovered from the civilian population, supervising proper storage or destruction of weapons and overseeing security arrangements for UNITA leaders. In terms of human rights issues, the activities were aimed at developing the capacity of national institutions and other non-governmental organizations in the field of human rights to investigate violations and to initiate appropriate action, including through mechanisms already established for that purpose. In terms of military aspects, a reduced number of military observers was deemed necessary to verify compliance with various aspects of the ceasefire regime. The Humanitarian Assistance Coordination Unit was mandated to continue to support the demobilization of UNITA ex-combatants and, at the same time, to focus on the original coordination mandate from UNAVEM III, including monitoring the emergency situation and maintaining a capacity to respond to humanitarian needs as they emerged.¹⁶⁰

During the period under review, based on the recommendations of the Secretary-General,¹⁶¹ the mandate of MONUA was continuously extended on eight occasions for periods of varying lengths, the last of which was until 26 February 1999.¹⁶²

Based on the recommendations of the Secretary-General,¹⁶³ by resolution 1135 (1997) of 29 October 1997, the Council postponed the withdrawal of United Nations military formed units until the end of November 1997.¹⁶⁴

Pursuant to resolution 1157 (1998) of 20 March 1998, the Security Council endorsed the recommendation of the Secretary-General in his report dated 13 March 1998,¹⁶⁵ to resume the gradual downsizing of the military component of MONUA before 30 April 1998, with the understanding that the withdrawal of almost all formed military units would be completed as soon as conditions on the ground permitted, but no later than 1 July 1998.¹⁶⁶ The Council also decided to gradually increase the number of civilian police observers by up to 83.¹⁶⁷

Following the attacks by members of UNITA on the personnel of MONUA and Angolan national authorities, the Security Council, by resolution 1164 (1998) of 29 April 1998, urged MONUA to investigate promptly the recent attack in N'gove.¹⁶⁸ The Council also took note of the recommendation made by the Secretary-General in his report dated 16 April 1998,¹⁶⁹ regarding the beginning of the drawdown of the military observers and civilian personnel of MONUA, and expressed its intention to take a final decision by 30 June 1998 on the mandate, size and organizational structure of MONUA.¹⁷⁰

Taking note of the statement of 2 June 1998 issued by MONUA regarding the continued existence of non-demobilized UNITA forces in the country,¹⁷¹ the Security Council, by resolution 1173 (1998) of 12 June 1998, requested the Secretary-General to redeploy MONUA personnel immediately to support and facilitate the extension of State administration throughout the national territory, including in particular in Andulo, Bailundo, Mungo and Nharea.¹⁷²

In his report of 26 February 1999, the Secretary-General informed the Security Council that the Government of Angola had informed his Special Representative that a continued multidisciplinary presence of the United Nations in Angola was not necessary and that conditions for maintaining a MONUA presence had ceased to exist.¹⁷³ By resolution 1229 (1999) of 26 February 1999, the Council took note that the mandate of MONUA would expire on 26 February 1999, and endorsed the recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-General dated 24 February 1999¹⁷⁴ regarding the technical liquidation of MONUA.¹⁷⁵ The Council also affirmed that, notwithstanding the expiration of the mandate of MONUA, the status-of-forces agreement applicable to MONUA remained in force until the departure of the final elements of MONUA from Angola.¹⁷⁶ Finally, the Security Council decided that the human rights component of MONUA would continue its current activities during the liquidation period.¹⁷⁷

8. United Nations Office in Angola established pursuant to resolution 1268 (1999)

Establishment, mandate and composition

In a statement by the President dated 21 January 1999,¹⁷⁸ Council members underlined the great importance they attached to a continued multidisciplinary presence of the United Nations in Angola, and welcomed the intention of the Secretary-General to consult urgently with the Government of Angola on such a United Nations presence. By a letter dated 11 August 1999 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁷⁹ the Secretary-General indicated that, following consultations with the Government of Angola, he intended to proceed with the establishment of a new multidisciplinary United Nations Office in Angola, the mandate of which would be based on the relevant Security Council decisions on Angola. By resolution 1268 (1999) of 15 October 1999, the Security Council authorized the establishment of the United Nations Office in Angola (UNOA) for an initial period of six months, until 15 April 2000.¹⁸⁰

The mandate of UNOA was to liaise with the political, military, police and other civilian authorities, with a view to exploring effective measures for restoring peace, assisting the Angolan people in the area of capacity-building, humanitarian assistance and the promotion of human rights, and coordinating other activities.¹⁸¹

The Council decided that UNOA would consist of up to 30 substantive professional staff, as well as the necessary administrative and other support personnel.¹⁸²

9. The United Nations Political Office for Somalia

Establishment, mandate and composition

By its resolution 954 (1994) of 4 November 1994, which extended the mandate of the United Nations Operation in Somalia (UNOSOM II) for a final period, the Security Council requested the Secretary-General to continue to monitor the situation in Somalia and to submit a report including suggestions concerning the role that the United Nations could play in Somalia after the end of UNOSOM II.¹⁸³ The Secretary-General submitted a report on 28 March 1995 in which he indicated his intention to maintain a small political office in Mogadishu consisting of a representative with a small support staff.¹⁸⁴ The Council members welcomed the intention of the Secretary-General in a statement by the President dated 6 April 1995.¹⁸⁵ As conditions did not permit the establishment of the Office in Mogadishu, the United Nations Political Office for Somalia (UNPOS) started operations in Nairobi on 14 April 1995.

The Office was established in response to the Council's request to the Secretary-General, contained in resolution 954 (1994), as follows: (a) to help the Somali parties to achieve peace and national reconciliation and monitor the situation in the country; and (b) to keep the Council informed in particular about developments affecting the humanitarian situation, the security

The Office consisted of a Director, one professional staff member and one secretary.

By his report of 16 September 1997,¹⁸⁶ the Secretary-General indicated that he had reviewed the role of UNPOS and had concluded that its continuation and strengthening were essential in order to extend assistance to those engaged in peacemaking efforts for Somalia. He also indicated that the personnel of UNPOS should undertake more visits to Somalia on a regular basis, security conditions permitting. Another professional staff member was therefore added to the Office. By a letter dated 30 September 1997, the President of the Security Council indicated the Council's support for a more active role of the United Nations in coordinating international mediation efforts in Somalia and for a strengthened presence of UNPOS staff in line with the recommendations of the Secretary-General.¹⁸⁷

Through an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council, it was decided to continue the activities of the Office for the biennium 2000-2001.¹⁸⁸

10. United Nations Mission in the Central African Republic

Establishment, mandate and composition

Following the recommendations of the Secretary-General in his report dated 23 February 1998,¹⁸⁹ the Security Council established, by resolution 1159 (1998) of 27 March 1998, the United Nations Mission in the Central African Republic (MINURCA) for an initial period of three months with effect from 15 April 1998.¹⁹⁰

The mandate of MINURCA, as set out in resolution 1159 (1998), was as follows: (a) to assist in maintaining and enhancing security and stability, including freedom of movement, in Bangui and the immediate vicinity of the city; (b) to assist the national security forces in maintaining law and order and in protecting key installations in Bangui; (c) to supervise, control storage, and monitor the final disposition of all weapons retrieved in the course of the disarmament exercise; (d) to ensure security and freedom of movement of United Nations personnel and the safety and security of United Nations property; (e) to assist in coordination with other international efforts in a short-term, police trainer programme and in other capacity-building efforts of the national police, and to provide advice on the restructuring of the national police and special police forces; and (f) to provide advice and technical support to the national electoral bodies regarding the electoral code and plans for the conduct of the legislative elections scheduled for August/September 1998.¹⁹¹

MINURCA was authorized with a maximum military strength of 1,350 personnel.¹⁹² In paragraph 14 of resolution 1159 (1998), the Security Council welcomed the appointment of a Special Representative of the Secretary-General in the Central African Republic as the head of MINURCA. Through exchanges of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council, the Special Representative and the Force Commander of MINURCA were appointed.¹⁹³

By its resolution 1182 (1998) of 14 July 1998, the Security Council decided to extend the mandate of MINURCA until 25 October 1998.¹⁹⁴ It also recognized the role of the Mission in providing advice and technical assistance for the initial steps in restructuring security forces and in coordinating and channelling international support to that end.¹⁹⁵ It further required that the Mission, in implementing its mandate, conduct reconnaissance missions of limited duration outside Bangui, and other tasks involving the security of United Nations personnel in accordance with paragraph 10 of resolution 1159 (1998).¹⁹⁶

By its resolution 1201 (1998) of 15 October 1998, the Security Council decided, inter alia, that the mandate of MINURCA should include support for the conduct of legislative elections as described in the report of the Secretary-General dated 21 August 1998,¹⁹⁷ and in particular: (a) the transport of electoral materials and equipment to selected sites and to the sous-préfectures, as well as the transport of United Nations electoral observers to and from electoral sites; (b) the conduct of a limited but reliable international observation of the first and second rounds of the legislative elections; and (c) ensuring the security of electoral materials and equipment during their transport to and at the selected sites, as well as the security of the international electoral observers.¹⁹⁸

Following the recommendations made by the Secretary-General in his report dated 18 December 1998,¹⁹⁹ the Security Council decided, by resolution 1230 (1999) of 26 February 1999, to extend the mandate of MINURCA until 15 November 1999.²⁰⁰ The Security Council also expressed its intention to commence the reduction of MINURCA personnel 15 days after the conclusion of the presidential elections in the Central African Republic.²⁰¹ The Council authorized the Mission to play a supportive role in the conduct of the presidential elections, in conformity with the tasks previously performed during the legislative elections of November/December 1998. It also authorized MINURCA to supervise the destruction of confiscated weapons and ammunition under the Mission's control.²⁰²

By resolution 1271 (1999) of 22 October 1999, the Security Council decided to extend the mandate of MINURCA until 15 February 2000, with a view to ensuring a short and gradual transition from United Nations peacekeeping to a post-conflict peacebuilding presence.²⁰³ Furthermore, the Council approved the proposal made by the Secretary-General in his report dated 7 October 1999²⁰⁴ that the reduction of the military and civilian strength of MINURCA should happen in three stages.²⁰⁵

The United Nations Peacebuilding Office in the Central African Republic (BONUCA) was subsequently established to take over from MINURCA in providing assistance in the peacebuilding effort.²⁰⁶

11. The United Nations Observer Mission in Sierra Leone

Following the recommendations of the Secretary-General in his report dated 9 June 1998,²⁰⁷ by resolution 1181 (1998) of 13 July 1998, the Security Council established the United Nations Observer Mission in Sierra Leone (UNOMSIL) for an initial period of six months until 13 January 1999, to monitor and advise efforts to disarm combatants and restructure the country's security forces.²⁰⁸

The mandate of UNOMSIL, as set out in resolution 1181 (1998), was as follows: (a) to monitor the military and security situation in the country as a whole, as security conditions permitted, and to provide the Special Representative of the Secretary-General with regular information thereon, in particular with a view to determining when conditions were sufficiently secure to allow subsequent deployments of military observers; (b) to monitor the disarmament and demobilization of former combatants concentrated in secure areas of the country, including monitoring of the role of the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group in the provision of security and in the collection and destruction of arms in those secure areas; (c) to assist in monitoring respect for international humanitarian law, including at disarmament and demobilization sites, where security conditions permitted; and (d) to monitor the voluntary disarmament and demobilization of members of the Civil Defence Forces, as security conditions permitted.²⁰⁹

By the same resolution, the Council also stressed the need for full cooperation and close coordination

By resolution 1181 (1998), the Security Council decided that UNOMSIL should include up to 70 military observers as well as a medical support unit, with the necessary equipment and civilian support staff.²¹¹ It also decided that the elements of UNOMSIL should be deployed as outlined in the Secretary-General's report. The Security Council also appointed the Special Representative of the Secretary-General in Sierra Leone to lead UNOMSIL.²¹² The countries contributing military personnel to the Mission and the appointment of the Chief Military Observer were confirmed through an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council.²¹³

On the basis of the reports submitted by the Secretary-General,²¹⁴ the mandate of UNOMSIL was extended on three occasions for various periods of up to six months, the last of which ended on 13 December 1999.²¹⁵

On the basis of the Secretary-General's recommendations contained in his report dated 30 July 1999,²¹⁶ the Security Council authorized, by resolution 1260 (1999) of 20 August 1999, the following tasks for the provisional UNOMSIL military observer component: (a) to strengthen and expand the contacts already established by UNOMSIL with the Revolutionary United Front (RUF) troops in the countryside since the ceasefire agreement came into effect; (b) to extend ceasefire monitoring activities to a wider geographical area; (c) to strengthen and assist the Ceasefire Monitoring Committee and the Central Joint Monitoring Committee established pursuant to the peace agreement to help maintain the ceasefire; (d) to monitor the military and security situation in the country and report thereon to the Special Representative of the Secretary-General; (e) to assist and monitor the disarmament and demobilization of combatants in areas where adequate security was provided; (f) to work closely with humanitarian organizations to exchange information on security conditions with a view to ensuring the widest possible access for humanitarian assistance to populations in need; (g) to work closely with human rights officers in their visits throughout the country; (h) to maintain liaison and coordinate closely with ECOMOG; (i) to assist in the preparation of plans for the deployment of neutral peacekeeping troops, as envisaged in the agreement.²¹⁷ The Security Council also authorized the provisional expansion of UNOMSIL to up to 210 military observers along with the necessary equipment, administrative and medical support.²¹⁸

Termination/Transition to a new mission

Pursuant to resolution 1245 (1999) of 11 June 1999, the mandate of UNOMSIL officially came to an end on 13 December 1999.²¹⁹

By resolution 1270 (1999) of 22 October 1999, the Security Council decided to establish the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone (UNAMSIL). In this connection, it also decided that UNAMSIL should take over the substantive civilian and military components and functions of UNOMSIL as well as its assets, and to that end decided that the mandate of UNOMSIL should terminate immediately upon the establishment of UNAMSIL.²²⁰

12. United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone established pursuant to resolution 1270 (1999)

By resolution 1260 (1999) of 20 August 1999, the Council requested the Secretary-General to submit a report with recommendations for the mandate and structure of the enhanced United Nations peacekeeping presence that might be required in Sierra Leone.²²¹ In his report dated 28 September 1999,²²² the Secretary-General informed the Council that the Lomé Peace Agreement²²³ provided for the creation of a neutral peacekeeping force. The Secretary-General therefore recommended the creation of a robust United Nations force, which would work in close cooperation with ECOMOG.²²⁴ On the basis of the recommendations of the Secretary-General, the Security Council decided, by resolution 1270 (1999) of 22 October 1999, to establish the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone (UNAMSIL) for an initial period of six months.²²⁵

The mandate of UNAMSIL, as set out in resolution 1270 (1999), was as follows: (a) to cooperate with the Government of Sierra Leone and the other parties to the Peace Agreement in the implementation of the Agreement; (b) to assist the Government of Sierra Leone in the implementation of the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration plan; (c) to that end, to establish a presence at key locations throughout the territory of Sierra Leone, including at disarmament/reception centres and demobilization centres; (d) to ensure the security and freedom of movement of United Nations personnel; (e) to monitor adherence to the ceasefire in accordance with the ceasefire agreement of 18 May 1999 through the structures provided for therein;²²⁶ (f) to encourage the parties to create confidence-building mechanisms and support their functioning; (g) to facilitate the delivery of humanitarian assistance; (h) to support the operations of United Nations civilian officials, including the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and his staff, human rights officers and civil affairs officers; and (i) to provide support to the elections, which were to be held in accordance with the constitution of Sierra Leone. The Security Council also stressed the need for close cooperation and coordination between ECOMOG and UNAMSIL in carrying out their respective tasks.²²⁷

Furthermore, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Council decided that, in the discharge of its mandate, UNAMSIL might take “the necessary action” to ensure the security and freedom of movement of its personnel and, within its capabilities and areas of deployment, to afford protection to civilians under imminent threat of physical violence, taking into account the responsibilities of the Government of Sierra Leone and the Monitoring Group.²²⁸

UNAMSIL was initially authorized to comprise a maximum of 6,000 military personnel, including 260 military observers, subject to periodic review in the light of conditions on the ground and the progress made in the peace process.²²⁹ The Force Commander of UNAMSIL was appointed through an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council.²³⁰

13. United Nations Peacebuilding Support Office in Guinea-Bissau established pursuant to resolution 1233 (1999)

Establishment, mandate and composition

Following the formation of the Government of National Unity in Guinea-Bissau, the Council adopted resolution 1216 (1998) of 21 December 1998, by which it requested the Secretary-General to make recommendations to the Council on a possible role of the United Nations in the process of peace and reconciliation in Guinea-Bissau, including the early establishment of arrangements for liaison between the United Nations and the Monitoring Group.²³¹ In a letter dated 26 February 1999 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²³² the Secretary-General, on the basis of the recommendations of a United Nations multidisciplinary mission dispatched in early December to Guinea-Bissau, proposed that a United Nations Peacebuilding Support Office be established in Guinea-Bissau. The establishment of the Peacebuilding Support Office was welcomed by members of the Council in a letter dated 3 March 1999 addressed to the Secretary-General.²³³ Subsequently, by its resolution 1233 (1999) of 6 April 1999, the Council supported the decision of the Secretary-General to establish the post-conflict United Nations Peacebuilding Support Office in Guinea-Bissau (UNOGBIS) under the leadership of a Representative of the Secretary-General.²³⁴ UNOGBIS became operational on 25 June 1999.²³⁵

The mandate of UNOGBIS, as initially proposed, was the following: (a) to help to create an enabling environment for restoring and consolidating peace, democracy and the rule of law and for the organization of free and transparent elections; (b) to work with the Government of National Unity, ECOWAS and ECOMOG, as well as with other national and international partners, to facilitate the implementation of the Abuja Agreement; (c) to seek the commitment of the Government and other parties to adopt a programme of voluntary arms collection, disposal and destruction; and (d) to provide the political framework and leadership for harmonizing and integrating the activities of the United Nations system in the country, particularly during the transitional period leading up to general and presidential elections.²³⁶

Following the ouster of the President of Guinea-Bissau on 7 May 1999 and the report of the assessment mission dispatched to Guinea-Bissau from 10 to 12 June 1999, the mandate of UNOGBIS was adjusted to accommodate changed circumstances on the ground through an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council.²³⁷ The revised mandate of UNOGBIS was as follows: (a) to help to create an enabling environment for restoring, maintaining and consolidating peace, democracy and the rule of law and for the organization of free and transparent elections; (b) to actively support national efforts, including those of civil society, towards national reconciliation, tolerance and peaceful management of differences, particularly during the transitional period; (c) to encourage initiatives aimed at building confidence and maintaining friendly relations between Guinea-Bissau, its neighbours and its international partners; (d) to seek the commitment of the Government and other parties to adopt a programme of voluntary arms collection, disposal, and destruction; and (e) to provide the political framework and leadership for harmonizing and integrating the activities of the United Nations system in the country, particularly during the transitional period leading up to general and presidential elections.²³⁸

The Office was headed by a Representative of the Secretary-General assisted by several political affairs and human rights officers, an electoral officer, a military adviser and support staff.²³⁹

Mandate implementation

In his report of 29 September 1999,²⁴⁰ the Secretary-General noted that the transitional Government had requested that the mandate of UNOGBIS be extended for one year after its expiry on 31 December 1999, and stated that he would revert to the Council on that issue after consultations with the new Government that would emerge from the elections of 28 November 1999. By a subsequent letter dated 15 December 1999,²⁴¹ the Secretary-General informed the President of the Security Council that, as none of the contending presidential candidates had received the required majority of the vote, a second round was expected to be held in the second half of January 2000. The mandate of UNOGBIS was therefore extended for three months until 31 March 2000 by an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council.²⁴² The Secretary-General stated that he would again revert to the Security Council after the second round of voting.

14. United Nations Observer Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo established pursuant to resolution 1279 (1999)

Establishment, mandate and composition

In his reports dated 15 July 1999 and 1 November 1999 respectively,²⁴³ the Secretary-General recommended the establishment of a United Nations Observer Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (MONUC) and informed the Council of his decision to appoint in due course a Special Representative, assisted by an appropriate staff, including a Chief Military Observer, to lead the observer mission.²⁴⁴ By resolution 1279 (1999) of 30 November 1999, the Council welcomed the Secretary-General's recommendations and authorized the establishment of MONUC, for an initial period of three months.²⁴⁵ By the same resolution, the Council also requested the

Secretary-General to accelerate the development of a concept of operations based on assessed conditions of security, access to freedom of movement and cooperation on the part of the signatories to the ceasefire agreement, as well as to keep it regularly informed on the situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC).²⁴⁶

By resolution 1279 (1999), the Council decided that MONUC, led by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, should carry out the following tasks: (a) to establish contacts with the signatories of the Ceasefire Agreement at their headquarters levels, as well as in the capitals of the signatory States; (b) to liaise with the Joint Military Commission and provide technical assistance in the implementation of its functions under the ceasefire agreement; (c) to provide information on security conditions in all areas of its operation; (d) to plan for the observation of the ceasefire and disengagement of forces; and (e) to maintain liaison with all parties to the ceasefire agreement to facilitate the delivery of humanitarian assistance to displaced persons, refugees, children and other affected persons, as well as assist in the protection of human rights, including the rights of children.²⁴⁷

By resolution 1279 (1999), the Council decided that the Special Representative of the Secretary-General would serve as the head of the United Nations presence in the subregion relating to the peace process in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and to provide assistance in the implementation of the ceasefire agreement. It further decided that the personnel authorized under its resolutions 1258 (1999) and 1273 (1999), including a multidisciplinary staff of personnel in the fields of human rights, humanitarian affairs, public information, medical support, child protection, political affairs and administrative support, would assist the Special Representative and constitute MONUC until 1 March 2000.²⁴⁸ The Council further requested the Secretary-General to submit recommendations on further deployment of United Nations personnel in the country and on their protection, as well as to take administrative steps necessary for the equipping of up to

500 military observers to facilitate future rapid United Nations deployments as authorized by the Council.²⁴⁹

15. United Nations Mission in Haiti established pursuant to resolution 867 (1993)

During the period under review, the United Nations Mission in Haiti continued to help implement provisions of the Governor's Island Agreement of 3 July 1993, and to assist the democratic Government to sustain a stable environment, professionalize the armed forces and create a separate police force.²⁵⁰

Mandate implementation: termination/transition to a new mission

Based on the request of the President of Haiti and the recommendations of the Secretary-General,²⁵¹ the Security Council adopted resolution 1048 (1996) of 29 February 1996, which extended the mandate of the United Nations Mission in Haiti (UNMIH) for a final period of four months.²⁵² By the same resolution, the Council decided to decrease the level of the military component to no more than 1200 and the civilian police component to 300 personnel, in the light of the gradual transfer of some of the earlier functions of UNMIH to the Haitian authority.²⁵³ The Council requested the Secretary-General to consider steps for further reduction of the strength of UNMIH consistent with the implementation of its current mandate and to initiate planning for the complete withdrawal of UNMIH no later than 1 June 1996.²⁵⁴ In his report dated 5 June 1996,²⁵⁵ the Secretary-General expressed the view that complete withdrawal of the United Nations military and police presence could jeopardize the success achieved so far by the Haitian people with the support of the international community. He therefore recommended the establishment, for a period of six months, of a new mission to be known as the United Nations Support Mission in Haiti (UNSMIH). In accordance with resolution 1048 (1996), the mandate of UNMIH was terminated on 30 June 1996.

16. United Nations Support Mission in Haiti established pursuant to resolution 1063 (1996)

Establishment, mandate and composition

Following the termination of UNMIH, the Security Council decided, by resolution 1063 (1996) of 28 June 1996, to establish the United Nations Support Mission in Haiti (UNSMIH) until 30 November 1996,²⁵⁶ based on the recommendations of the Secretary-General,²⁵⁷ and a request from the Government of Haiti.²⁵⁸

The mandate of UNSMIH, pursuant to resolution 1063 (1996), was to assist the Government of Haiti in the professionalization of the police and in the maintenance of a secure and stable environment conducive to the success of current efforts to establish and train an effective national police force.²⁵⁹

The initial composition of UNSMIH, as authorized by the Council, was 600 military and 300 civilian police, supported by international and local civilian staff.²⁶⁰ In addition, approximately 800 voluntarily funded military personnel were provided by Member States to serve with UNSMIH. The Force Commander of the Mission was appointed by an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council.²⁶¹ By a letter dated 2 August 1996,²⁶² the Council concurred with the Secretary-General's proposal for the composition of Member States constituting the military and civilian components of UNSMIH.²⁶³

Prior to its termination on 31 July 1997, the Council extended the mandate of UNSMIH two times,²⁶⁴ in accordance with the recommendations of the Secretary-General,²⁶⁵ and a request from the President of the Republic of Haiti.²⁶⁶

Termination/transition to a new mission

Reporting to the Council on 19 July 1997,²⁶⁷ the Secretary-General stated that he was preparing to withdraw UNSMIH by the end of July and recommended the establishment of a new mission to be known as the United Nations Transition Mission in Haiti (UNTMIH). By resolution 1123 (1997) of 30 July 1997, the Council noted the termination of the mandate of UNSMIH as of 31 July 1997, concurred with the Secretary-General's recommendations and decided to establish UNTMIH.²⁶⁸

17. United Nations Transition Mission in Haiti established pursuant to resolution 1123 (1997)

Establishment, mandate and composition

Following the withdrawal of UNSMIH, the United Nations Transition Mission in Haiti (UNTMIH) was established by the Security Council pursuant to resolution 1123 (1997) of 30 July 1997 for a period of four months,²⁶⁹ based on the recommendations of the Secretary-General,²⁷⁰ and communications received from the Government of Haiti.²⁷¹

Pursuant to resolution 1123 (1997), the mandate of UNTMIH was to assist the Government of Haiti by supporting and contributing to the professionalization of the Haitian national police, as set out in the Secretary-General's report of 19 July 1997.²⁷²

Pursuant to resolution 1123 (1997), the Council decided that UNTMIH would be composed of up to 250 civilian police and 50 military personnel to form the headquarters of a security element.²⁷³ UNTMIH also

transition to a new mission

In his report dated 31 October 1997,²⁷⁸ the Secretary-General informed the Council that, in view of the request from the Government of Haiti for continued United Nations assistance to the Haitian national police,²⁷⁹ he had approached Governments of several Member States to establish whether they might be willing to place the necessary personnel at the disposal of the United Nations, should the Council decide to establish a follow-on mission in Haiti. By resolution 1141 (1997) of 28 November 1997, the Council commended the role of UNTMIH in assisting the Government of Haiti, noted the termination of its mandate as of 30 November 1997 and decided to establish the United Nations Civilian Police Mission in Haiti (MIPONUH).²⁸⁰

18. United Nations Civilian Police Mission in Haiti established pursuant to resolution 1141 (1997)

Establishment, mandate and composition

By resolution 1141 (1997) of 28 November 1997, the Council established the United Nations Civilian Police Mission in Haiti (MIPONUH) for a period of one year,²⁸¹ based on the request of the Government of Haiti²⁸² and the recommendations of the Secretary-General.²⁸³ MIPONUH succeeded UNTMIH and was the fourth United Nations mission in Haiti during the period under review.

By resolution 1141 (1997), the Council decided that MIPONUH would continue to assist the Government of Haiti by supporting and contributing to the professionalization of the Haitian national police, including mentoring Haitian national police field performance as set out in the report of the Secretary-General.²⁸⁴

In an addendum to his report of 31 October 1997,²⁸⁵ the Secretary-General proposed an initial composition of up to 290 police officers, including a 90-strong special police unit, supported by a civilian establishment of some 72 international and 133 local personnel, as well as 17 United Nations Volunteers. The Council decided, pursuant to resolution 1141 (1997), that MIPONUH would be composed of up to 300 civilian police and would assume responsibility for those UNTMIH personnel and United Nations-owned assets required for its use in fulfilment of its mandate.²⁸⁶ By a letter dated 30 December 1997,²⁸⁷ the Council concurred with the Secretary-General's proposed composition of Member States contributing police personnel to serve in MIPONUH.²⁸⁸ The appointment of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General as Head of MIPONUH was confirmed through an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council.²⁸⁹

Based on the recommendations of the Secretary-General and a request from the Government of Haiti,²⁹⁰ the mandate of MIPONUH was extended by the Council, by resolution 1212 (1998), for a period of one year, until 30 November 1999.²⁹¹

Transition to a new mission

In his report dated 18 November 1999,²⁹² the Secretary-General stated that plans for a possible transition to other forms of international assistance to the Haitian national police had evolved further and informed the Council of the request from the Government of Haiti to establish a new mission upon completion of the mandate of MIPONUH. Pursuant to resolution 1212 (1998), the Secretary-General informed the Council of preparations to withdraw MIPONUH following the expiration of its mandate, and noted that it was critical that the transition between MIPONUH and the successor mission be as smooth and orderly as possible. He also noted that the termination of the mandate of MIPONUH would mark the end of United Nations peacekeeping in Haiti.

By resolution 1277 (1999) of 30 November 1999, the Council took note of the request of the Government of Haiti and the recommendations of the Secretary-General and decided to continue MIPONUH in order to ensure a phased transition to the International Civilian Support Mission in Haiti (MICAHA) by 15 March 2000.²⁹³ The Council also requested the Secretary-General to coordinate and expedite the transition from MIPONUH to MICAHA.²⁹⁴

The mandate of MINUGUA, as set out in resolution 1094 (1997), was to verify the agreement on the definitive ceasefire between the Government of Guatemala and the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca (URNG), signed in Oslo on 4 December 1996.²⁹⁸ The verification functions included observation of a formal cessation of hostilities, the separation of forces and the disarming and demobilization of URNG combatants.²⁹⁹

The Council authorized the attachment to MINUGUA a group of 155 military observers and requisite medical personnel.³⁰⁰ The appointment of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and Head of MINUGUA was confirmed through an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council.³⁰¹

Mandate implementation: termination of mission

By a statement of the President dated 22 May 1997,³⁰² the Council members welcomed the successful conclusion of MINUGUA in accordance with resolution 1094 (1997). In his report dated 4 June 1997,³⁰³ the Secretary-General stated that the handover of weapons, munitions, explosives and equipment to the Ministry of the Interior of Guatemala signalled the completion of the mandate of the military observer group. The repatriation of the members of the United Nations military observer group began on 17 May 1997, and a rear party remained at headquarters in the capital until 27 May 1997, when the last group departed Guatemala.

Termination of mandate

By resolution 1274 (1999), on the basis of the report of the Secretary-General,³⁰⁹ the mandate of UNMOT was extended for the final time until 15 May 2000.³¹⁰ The Council also supported the intention of the Secretary-General to outline a future political role for the United Nations in assisting Tajikistan to continue on the path of peace and national reconciliation and contributing to the democratic development of Tajik society after the mandate of UNMOT was concluded.³¹¹

Establishment, mandate and composition

Following the signing of the Agreement between Indonesia and Portugal on the question of East Timor (known as the “General Agreement”) and of the Agreements between the United Nations and the Governments of Indonesia and Portugal, and on the basis of the recommendations of the Secretary-General,³¹⁹ the Security Council, by resolution 1246 (1999) of 11 June 1999, decided to establish, until 31 August 1999, the United Nations Mission in East Timor (UNAMET) to organize and conduct a popular consultation.³²⁰ The popular consultation, scheduled for 8 August 1999, was to be held on the basis of a direct, secret and universal ballot, in order to ascertain whether the East Timorese people accepted the proposed constitutional framework providing for a special autonomy for East Timor within the unitary Republic of Indonesia or rejected the proposed special autonomy for East Timor, leading to East Timor’s separation from Indonesia, in accordance with the General Agreement.³²¹

The Council endorsed the proposal by the Secretary-General that the mandate of UNAMET should incorporate the following components: (a) a political component responsible for monitoring the fairness of the political environment, for ensuring the freedom of all political and other non-governmental organizations to carry out their activities freely and for monitoring and advising the Special Representative on all matters with political implications; (b) an electoral component responsible for all activities related to registration and voting; and (c) an information component responsible for explaining to the East Timorese people, in an objective and impartial manner without prejudice to any position or outcome, the terms of the General Agreement and the proposed autonomy framework, for providing information on the process and procedure of

The Council authorized the deployment of up to 280 civilian police officers to act as advisers to the Indonesian police in the discharge of their duties and, at the time of the consultation, to supervise the escorting of ballot papers and boxes to and from the polling sites. The Council also authorized, until 31 August 1999, the deployment with the Mission of 50 military liaison officers to maintain contact with the Indonesian Armed Forces in order to allow the Secretary-General to discharge his responsibilities under the General Agreement and the Security Agreement.³²³ The appointments of the Special Representative for the East Timor Popular Consultation, the Civilian Police Commissioner, and the Chief Military Liaison Officer, as well as the list of countries contributing civilian police personnel and military liaison officers were confirmed through exchanges of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council.³²⁴

By resolution 1262 (1999) of 27 August 1999, the Council endorsed the proposal of the Secretary-General that, in the interim phase, the Mission incorporate the following components: (a) an electoral unit; (b) a civilian police component of up to 460 personnel to continue to advise the Indonesian police and to prepare for the recruitment and training of the new East Timorese police force; (c) a military liaison component of up to 300 personnel to undertake the necessary military liaison functions, to continue to be involved in the work of the East Timorese bodies established to promote peace, stability and reconciliation, and to provide advice to the Special Representative for the East Timor Popular Consultation on security matters as required, pursuant to the implementation of the

Agreements of 5 May 1999; (d) a civil affairs component to advise the Special Representative for the East Timor Popular Consultation in monitoring the implementation of the Agreements of 5 May 1999; and (e) a public information component to provide information on progress made towards implementation of the outcome of the ballot, and to disseminate a message promoting reconciliation, confidence, peace and stability.³²⁷

By resolution 1264 (1999) of 15 September 1999, the Council authorized the establishment of a multinational force under a unified command structure, pursuant to the request of the Government of Indonesia conveyed to the Secretary-General on 12 September 1999, with the following tasks: (a) to restore peace and security in East Timor; (b) to protect and support the United Nations Mission in East Timor in carrying out its tasks; and (c) within force capabilities, to facilitate humanitarian assistance operations.³²⁸ The Council also agreed that the multinational force should collectively be deployed in East Timor until replaced by a United Nations peacekeeping operation, and invited the Secretary-General to make prompt recommendations on a peacekeeping operation to the Security Council.³²⁹ Finally, the Council invited the Secretary-General to plan and prepare for a United Nations transitional administration in East Timor, incorporating a United Nations peacekeeping operation, to be deployed in the implementation phase of the popular consultation and to make recommendations as soon as possible to the Security Council.³³⁰ The establishment of the United Nations Transitional Administration in East Timor (UNTAET) on 22 October 1999 marked the termination of UNAMET.

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, by resolution 1272 (1999) of 22 October 1999, the Security Council decided to establish the United Nations Transitional Administration in East Timor (UNTAET) for an initial period until 31 January 2001 on the basis of the report of the Secretary-General.³³¹ UNTAET had the overall responsibility to administer the territory of East Timor, exercising legislative and executive authority during the transition period, including the administration of justice, and to support capacity-building for the self-government of East Timor.³³²

The mandate of UNTAET consisted of: (a) providing security and maintaining law and order throughout the territory of East Timor; (b) establishing an effective administration; (c) assisting in the development of civil and social services; (d) ensuring the coordination and delivery of humanitarian assistance, as well as rehabilitation and development assistance; (e) supporting capacity-building for self-government; and (f) assisting in the establishment of conditions for sustainable development.³³³

The Transitional Administration included (a) a governance and public administration component, including an international police element with a strength of up to 1,640 officers; (b) a humanitarian assistance and emergency rehabilitation component; and (c) a military component, with a strength of up to 8,950 troops and up to 200 military observers.³³⁴ A Special Representative was appointed by the Secretary-General to head the Mission, as the Transitional Administrator.³³⁵ The appointments of the Special Representative and the Force Commander were confirmed through exchanges of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council.³³⁶ The Council also requested the Transitional Administration and the multinational force deployed pursuant to resolution 1264 (1999) to cooperate closely with each other, with a view also to replacing, as soon as possible, the multinational force by the military component of the Transitional Administration.³³⁷

During the period under review, the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus (UNFICYP) continued to perform its mandate to supervise ceasefire lines and to prevent a recurrence of fighting. Mandate implementation

During the period under review, in accordance with the recommendations of the Secretary-General,³⁴⁰ the mandate of UNOMIG was extended eight times for periods of six months, the last of which ended on 31 January 2000.³⁴¹

By resolution 1077 (1996) of 22 October 1996, the Council established a United Nations office for the protection and promotion of human rights in Abkhazia, Georgia, and decided that it should form part of UNOMIG, under the authority of the Head of Mission

By a statement of the President dated 25 November 1998,³⁴³ the Council members welcomed the efforts of the Secretary-General in improving the security of UNOMIG and approved his proposal to increase the number of internationally recruited lightly armed security personnel and additional local security personnel to provide internal security to the Mission's installations.³⁴⁴

27. United Nations Preventive Deployment Force in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia established pursuant to resolution 983 (1995)

During the period under review, the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia (UNPREDEP) continued to monitor and report on any developments in the border areas which could undermine confidence and stability in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and threaten its territory.

Mandate implementation

Although UNPREDEP was established as a distinct operating entity in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia pursuant to Security Council resolution 983 (1995) of 31 March 1995, overall command and control of the United Nations presence in the former Yugoslavia was placed with United Nations Peace Forces Headquarters and was exercised by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General. Based on the recommendation of the Secretary-General,³⁴⁵ the Security Council made UNPREDEP an independent mission reporting directly to the United Nations Headquarters in New York as of 1 February 1996.³⁴⁶

Based on the recommendations of the Secretary-General,³⁴⁷ by resolution 1046 (1996) of 13 February 1996, the Council authorized an increase in the strength of UNPREDEP by 50 military personnel in order to provide for a continued engineering capability in support of its operations and also approved the establishment of the position of Force Commander.³⁴⁸

Until its termination on 28 February 1999, the Security Council successively extended the mandate of UNPREDEP six times for periods of varying lengths,³⁴⁹ based on the recommendations of the Secretary-General.³⁵⁰

Based on the recommendations of the Secretary-General,³⁵¹ the Council decided, by resolution 1082 (1996) of 27 November 1996, to reduce the military component of UNPREDEP by 300 all ranks by 30 April 1997 with a view to concluding the mandate as and when circumstances permitted.³⁵² Owing to volatility in the region caused by the situation in Albania,³⁵³ the Council, by resolution 1105 (1997) of 9 April 1997, subsequently decided to suspend the reduction of the military component of UNPREDEP referred to in its resolution 1082 (1996) until the end of the mandate on 31 May 1997.³⁵⁴ At the end of that period, the Council extended the mandate of UNPREDEP until 30 November 1997 and decided to start, as of 1 October 1997, a two-month phased reduction of the military component by 300 all ranks,³⁵⁵ based on the recommendations of the Secretary-General.³⁵⁶

On 14 July 1998, the Secretary-General submitted a report recommending that the Council consider increasing the troop level of UNPREDEP by 350 all ranks and increasing the military observer and the civilian police elements by 12 and 24 personnel respectively.³⁵⁷ By resolution 1186 (1998) of 21 July 1998, the Council decided to authorize an increase in the troop strength of UNPREDEP up to 1,050 and to extend the mandate of the Force for a period of six months, during which the Force would continue by its presence to deter threats and prevent clashes, to monitor the border areas, and to report to the Secretary-General on any developments which could pose a threat to the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, including the tasks of monitoring and reporting on illicit arms flows

In his report dated 12 February 1999, the Secretary-General recommended that the Security Council extend the presence of UNPREDEP, with its existing mandate and composition, for a further period of six months until 31 August 1999.³⁵⁹ At the 3982nd meeting of the Council, on 25 February 1999, the draft resolution, which would have extended the mandate of UNPREDEP for a period of six months until 31 August 1999,³⁶⁰ was not adopted owing to the negative vote of a permanent member of the Security Council.³⁶¹ The Force was therefore terminated on 28 February 1999.

28. United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina established pursuant to resolution 1035 (1995)

During the period under review, the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina (UNMIBH), established pursuant to resolution 1035 (1995) and consisting of the United Nations International Police Task Force and the United Nations civilian office in Bosnia and Herzegovina, continued to monitor law enforcement activities and facilities, advise and train law enforcement personnel, respond to requests for assistance and mobilize and coordinate all civilian activities.

Mandate implementation

During the period under review, on the basis of the recommendations of the Secretary-General,³⁶² the Council continuously extended for four times the mandate of UNMIBH for periods of six and twelve months, the last of which ended on 21 June 2000.³⁶³

By resolution 1088 (1996) of 12 December 1996, the Security Council decided that UNMIBH should continue to be entrusted with the tasks set out in annex 11 of the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina, including the tasks referred to in the conclusions of the Peace Implementation Conference held in London on 4 and 5 December 1996 and agreed by the authorities in Bosnia and Herzegovina.³⁶⁴ Those tasks included improving the effectiveness of the Task Force by allowing it to investigate or assist with investigations of allegations of misconduct, including human rights abuses, by police or an official of any other law enforcement or judicial agency, and to propose the sanctioning of offenders.³⁶⁵

The Council, by resolution 1103 (1997) of 31 March 1997, decided to authorize an increase in the strength of UNMIBH by 186 police and 11 civilian personnel, in the light of the recommendation of the Secretary-General concerning the role of the Task Force in Brcko,³⁶⁶ and in order to enable it to carry out its mandate as set out in annex 11 of the Peace Agreement and resolution 1088 (1996) of 12 December 1996.

Based on the recommendations of the Secretary-General,³⁶⁷ the Council, by resolution 1107 (1997) of 16 May 1997, decided to authorize a further increase in the strength of UNMIBH by 120 police personnel.³⁶⁸

Based on the recommendations of the Secretary-General,³⁶⁹ the Council decided, by resolution 1144 (1997) of 19 December 1997, that the Task Force should continue to be entrusted with the tasks set out in annex 11 of the Peace Agreement, including the tasks referred to in the conclusions of the Peace Implementation Conference held in London on 4 and 5 December 1996 and of the Ministerial Meeting of the Steering Board of the Peace Implementation Council held in Sintra, Portugal, on 30 May 1997, as well as the Peace Implementation Conference held in Bonn on 9 and 10 December 1997, and agreed upon by the authorities in Bosnia and Herzegovina.³⁷⁰ The Council expressed its support for the conclusions of the Bonn

Based on the recommendations of the Secretary-General,³⁷³ the Council, by resolution 1168 (1998) of 21 May 1998, decided to authorize an increase in the strength of the Task Force by 30 posts, to a total authorized strength of 2,057.³⁷⁴

By resolution 1174 (1998) of 15 June 1998, the Council decided that the Task Force should continue to be entrusted with the tasks already set out, including those referred to in the conclusions of the Peace Implementation Conference in Luxembourg on 9 June 1998 and agreed upon by the authorities in Bosnia and Herzegovina.³⁷⁵

Based on the recommendations of the Secretary-General,³⁷⁶ the Security Council, by resolution 1184 (1998) of 16 July 1998, approved the establishment by UNMIBH of a programme to monitor and assess the court system in Bosnia and Herzegovina, as part of an overall programme of legal reform as outlined by the Office of the High Representative, in the light of the Peace Agreement, the recommendations of the Peace Implementation Conference in Bonn and the Steering Board of the Peace Implementation Council in

Luxembourg, and the recommendations of the High Representative.³⁷⁷

By resolution 1247 (1999) of 18 June 1999, the Council decided that the Task Force should continue to be entrusted with the tasks already set out, including those referred to in the conclusions of the Peace Implementation Conference held in Madrid on 15 and 16 December 1998 and agreed by the authorities in Bosnia and Herzegovina.³⁷⁸

Establishment, mandate and composition

By resolution 1037 (1996) of 15 January 1996, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Council established the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium (UNTAES) for an initial period of 12 months based on the recommendations of the Secretary-General,³⁷⁹ and the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium signed between the Government of the Republic of Croatia and the local Serbian community.³⁸⁰

The Transitional Administration was established with a military and civilian component, each with their specific mandate. As set out in resolution 1037 (1996), the mandate of the military component was (a) to supervise and facilitate demilitarization; (b) to monitor the voluntary and safe return of refugees and displaced persons to their home of origin in cooperation with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR); (c) to contribute, by its presence, to the maintenance of peace and security in the region; and (d) to assist in the implementation of the Basic Agreement. The mandate of the civilian component was (a) to establish a temporary police force, define its structure and size, and develop a training programme and oversee

In an addendum to his report dated 13 December 1995,³⁸³ the Secretary-General provided an estimate of 5,000 contingent personnel, 600 civilian police, 469 international civilian staff and 681 locally recruited staff. Pursuant to resolution 1037 (1996), the Council authorized an initial deployment of 5,000 troops constituting the military component.³⁸⁴ The appointment of the Transitional Administrator was confirmed through an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council.³⁸⁵

In accordance with the Secretary-General's letter dated 26 January 1996,³⁸⁶ by resolution 1043 (1996) of 31 January 1996, the Council authorized the deployment of 100 military observers for an initial period of six months.³⁸⁷

On the basis of the recommendations of the Secretary-General,³⁸⁸ the deployment of the military observers was extended for a period of six months by resolution 1069 (1996) of 30 July 1996. Subsequently, prior to its termination on 15 January 1997, the Council extended the mandate of UNTAES two times,³⁸⁹ in accordance with the recommendations of the Secretary-General.³⁹⁰

Termination of mandate/transition to a new mission

By resolution 1120 (1997) of 14 July 1997, the Council endorsed the plans recommended by the Secretary-General for the gradual devolution by the Transitional Administrator of executive responsibility for civil administration in the region and for restructuring the Transitional Administration, in particular, the proposal for achieving the drawdown of the military component of the Transitional Administration by 15 October 1997.³⁹¹ It also stressed that the pace of the gradual devolution of executive responsibility would be commensurate with the demonstrated ability of Croatia to reassure the Serb population and successfully complete peaceful reintegration.³⁹²

By a report dated 4 December 1997,³⁹³ the Secretary-General recommended the termination of UNTAES on 15 January 1998 as well as the establishment of a support group to continue to monitor the performance of the Croatian police. By resolution 1145 (1997), the Council noted the termination of UNTAES and welcomed the recommendations of the Secretary-General,³⁹⁴ as well as the request from the Government of Croatia for a continued presence of the United Nations civilian police monitors after the termination of the mandate of UNTAES.³⁹⁵ Furthermore, the Council decided to establish a post-UNTAES support group of civilian police monitors as recommended by the Secretary-General.³⁹⁶

(1997) of 19 December 1997 for a period of nine months,³⁹⁷ as recommended by the Secretary-General.³⁹⁸

In accordance with the report of the Secretary-General,³⁹⁹ the Council decided, by resolution 1145 (1997), that UNPSG would continue to monitor the performance of the Croatian police in the Danube region, particularly in connection with the return of displaced persons, and would assume responsibility for those former UNTAES personnel and United Nations-owned assets needed for its use in fulfilment of its mandate.⁴⁰⁰

The United Nations Civilian Police Support Group was composed of 180 civilian police, supported by a civilian establishment of 53 international and 165 local personnel.⁴⁰¹

Mandate implementation: termination of mandate/transition to a new mission

Reporting to the Council on 11 June 1998,⁴⁰² the Secretary-General stated that he had instructed that a timetable be established for the handover of the functions of the Support Group to OSCE. By a statement of the President dated 2 July 1998,⁴⁰³ the Council members welcomed the planned transfer of the police monitoring function in the region to the OSCE and agreed with the intention of the Secretary-General to reduce gradually the number of civilian police monitors. In his final report dated 27 October 1998,⁴⁰⁴ the Secretary-General informed the Council that the mandate of UNPSG ended on 15 October 1998 and that OSCE had taken over the police monitoring responsibilities.

Establishment, mandate and composition

Following the termination of the United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation in Croatia, the Council, by resolution 1038 (1996) of 15 January 1996, authorized the United Nations Mission of Observers in Prevlaka (UNMOP) to continue monitoring the demilitarization of the Prevlaka peninsula, in accordance with resolutions 779 (1992) and 981 (1995) and paragraphs 19 and 20 of the report of the Secretary-General of 13 December 1995.⁴⁰⁵ The Mission was established on 1 February 1996 for a period of three months, to be extended for an additional period of three months upon a report by the Secretary-General that such extension would continue to contribute to the decrease of tension in the area.⁴⁰⁶

UNMOP consisted of 28 military observers under the command and direction of a chief military observer.⁴⁰⁷ The appointment of the Chief Military Observer was approved through an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council.⁴⁰⁸

The mandate of UNMOP was extended initially for three months on the basis of the initial report of the Secretary-General pursuant to resolution 1038 (1996).⁴⁰⁹ During the period under review, on the basis

33. United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo established pursuant to resolution 1244 (1999)

Establishment, mandate and composition

Following the adoption, on 6 May 1999, of the general principles for a political solution to the Kosovo crisis by the Group of Eight Ministers for Foreign Affairs and the acceptance by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia of the principles set forth in the paper presented in Belgrade on 2 June 1999,⁴¹² the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, authorized the Secretary-General to establish an international civil presence in Kosovo by resolution 1244 (1999) of 10 June 1999.⁴¹³ The international civil presence, known as the United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK), was established shortly thereafter, for an initial period of 12 months, and was to continue thereafter unless the Security Council decided otherwise. Resolution 1244 (1999) also established an international security presence, known as the International Security Force in Kosovo (KFOR) and headed by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO).⁴¹⁴

The mandate of the international civil presence consisted of the following: (a) promoting the establishment of substantial autonomy and self-government in Kosovo, taking full account of the Rambouillet Accords; (b) performing basic civilian administrative functions; (c) organizing and overseeing the development of provisional institutions for democratic and autonomous self-government pending a political settlement, including the holding of elections; (d) transferring, as these institutions were established, its administrative responsibilities while overseeing and supporting the consolidation of Kosovo's local provisional institutions and other peacebuilding activities; (e) facilitating a political process designed to determine Kosovo's future status, taking into account the Rambouillet Accords; (f) overseeing the transfer of authority from Kosovo's provisional institutions to institutions established under a political settlement; (g) supporting the reconstruction of key infrastructure and other economic reconstruction; (h) supporting, in coordination with international humanitarian organizations, humanitarian and disaster relief aid; (i) maintaining civil law and order, including establishing local police forces and in the meantime through the deployment of international police personnel to serve in Kosovo; (j) protecting and promoting human rights; and (k) assuring the safe and unimpeded return of all refugees and displaced persons to their homes in Kosovo.⁴¹⁵

The Special Representative of the Secretary-General in Kosovo was appointed to head UNMIK through an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council.⁴¹⁶ The Mission was composed of four major components, and each component was assigned to an agency which took the lead role in a particular area. The first component dealt with humanitarian assistance and was led by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. The second one dealt with civil administration and was under the direct leadership of the United Nations. The third one concerned democratization and institution-building issues and was led by OSCE. The last component dealt with reconstruction and economic development and was led by the European Union. The interim civil administration component of the Mission, under the United Nations, was comprised of three offices: a police commissioner, an office for civil affairs, and an office for judicial affairs. The Special Representative's staff also included a military liaison unit to facilitate day-to-day relations with the international security presence (KFOR).⁴¹⁷

34. United Nations Truce Supervision Organization established pursuant to resolution 50 (1948)

During the period under review, the United Nations Truce Supervision Organization (UNTSO) continued to assist and cooperate with the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force (UNDOF) in the Golan Heights and the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL), in accordance with its terms of reference.⁴²⁰

35. United Nations Disengagement Observer Force established pursuant to resolution 350 (1974)

The United Nations Disengagement Observer Force established pursuant to resolution 350 (1974) (UNDOF) continued, during the period under consideration, to monitor the ceasefire between Israel and the Syrian Arab Republic, to supervise the disengagement of Israeli and Syrian Arab Republic forces and to supervise the areas of separation and limitation, as provided in the agreement on disengagement. On the basis of the reports by the Secretary-General,⁴²¹ the Council decided, on eight occasions,⁴²² to extend the Force's mandate for further periods of six months, the last of which ended on 31 May 2000.

36. United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon established pursuant to resolutions 425 (1978) and 426 (1978)

During the period under review, the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) continued to fulfil its mandate to confirm the withdrawal of Israeli forces, to restore international peace and security and to assist the Government of Lebanon in restoring its authority in the area. On the basis of the reports and interim reports by the Secretary-General,⁴²³ and at the request of the Government of Lebanon,⁴²⁴ the Council adopted, during the period under review, eight resolutions successively extending the Force's mandate for additional periods of six months, the last of which ended on 31 January 2000.⁴²⁵

37. United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission established pursuant to resolution 687 (1991)

During the period under review, the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission (UNIKOM) continued to monitor the Khawr 'Abd Allah and the demilitarized zone between Iraq and Kuwait, to deter violations of the boundary, and to observe any hostile or potentially hostile action mounted from the territory of one State against the other. During the period under consideration, in accordance with resolution 689 (1991),⁴²⁶ the Council held periodic reviews of the question of termination or continuation of UNIKOM and its modalities of operation, on the basis of the reports submitted by the Secretary-General.⁴²⁷ By letters from the President of the Council addressed to the Secretary-General,⁴²⁸ Council members continued to concur with the Secretary-General's recommendation that UNIKOM be

F. Ad hoc commissions and ad hoc tribunals

Ad hoc commissions

During the period under review, the Security Council created one ad hoc commission, namely the United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission established pursuant to resolution 1284 (1999), and continued to oversee two ad hoc commissions: the United Nations Compensation Commission established pursuant to resolutions 687 (1991) and 692 (1991), and the United Nations Special Commission established pursuant to resolution 687 (1991). The latter was terminated during the period under consideration.

1. United Nations Compensation Commission established pursuant to resolutions 687 (1991) and 692 (1991)

Mandated to verify and value the claims of loss, damage and injury to foreign Governments, nationals and corporations resulting from Iraq's unlawful invasion and occupation of Kuwait, and to administer the payment of compensation, the United Nations Compensation Commission established pursuant to resolution 687 (1991) continued to exist during the period under review.

Mandate implementation

The funding for payments came from a 30 per cent share of the revenue derived from the sale of Iraqi petroleum under the oil-for-food programme, established by resolution 986 (1995) and the memorandum of understanding of 20 May 1996 between Iraq and the United Nations, and subsequently extended by resolutions 1111 (1997), 1143 (1997), 1153 (1998), 1210 (1998), 1242 (1999), 1275 (1999), 1280 (1999) and 1281 (1999).

By letters addressed to the President of the Security Council, the President of the Commission's Governing Council reported on the Commission's activities at its regular⁴³⁰ and special sessions.⁴³¹

By a letter dated 2 December 1996, addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴³² the President of the Governing Council of the Commission noted that the combination of the delay in the implementation of resolution 986 (1995) and the exhaustion of the "matching funds" that the Government of the United States had transferred to the United Nations escrow account pursuant to resolution 778 (1992) had frustrated the ability of the Commission to present a totally funded draft budget for 1997. Although hoping that resolution 986 (1995) could be entirely implemented, allowing the Commission to fulfil integrally its mission, the President of the Governing Council highlighted the need to find "bridging contributions" to fully finance the 1997 budget. He stated that the Governing Council looked to the Council's efforts to spur the temporary bridging contributions, which would then be reimbursed in full once the funds resulting from implementation of resolution 986 (1995) had been made available to the Compensation Fund.

2. United Nations Special Commission established pursuant to resolution 687 (1991)

During the period under review, the United Nations Special Commission established pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of resolution 687 (1991) continued to carry out on-site inspection of Iraq's biological, chemical, and missile capabilities, based on Iraq's declarations and the designation of any additional locations by the Special Commission itself.

Mandate implementation

By resolution 1051 (1996) of 27 March 1996, the Council approved the export/import monitoring mechanism for Iraq and demanded that Iraq meet unconditionally all of its obligations under the mechanism and cooperate fully with the Special Commission and the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA). Council decided that the Committee established under resolution 661 (1990) and the Special Commission should carry out the functions assigned to them under the mechanism, until the Council decided otherwise, and requested the Director General of the IAEA to carry out, with the assistance and cooperation of the Special Commission, the functions assigned to him under the mechanism.⁴³³ The Council also called for a change in the Commission's reporting requirements. Prior to the adoption of that resolution, the Commission was required to submit reports every six months under the terms of both resolutions 699 (1991) and 715 (1991). The reports focused on Iraq's proscribed weapons programmes and the implementation of the Commission's monitoring and verification plans, respectively. The new system of reporting required the Commission to produce a consolidated report covering all aspects of its work under resolutions 687 (1991), 707 (1991), 715 (1991) and 1051 (1996).

Pursuant to that request, through notes by the Secretary-General, the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission submitted eight semi-annual reports during the period under review.⁴³⁴

Furthermore, by a note dated 18 April 1996,⁴³⁵ the Secretary-General transmitted the compendium of terms relating to items described in the annexes to the plans of the Special Commission and IAEA for ongoing monitoring and verification,⁴³⁶ which constituted an integral part of the mechanism for export/import monitoring for Iraq called for under paragraph 7 of Security Council resolution 715 (1991) and adopted by the Council by its resolution 1051 (1996).⁴³⁷

During the period under consideration, the Council repeatedly expressed its support for the Special Commission in its efforts to ensure implementation of its mandate under the relevant resolutions of the Council and demanded that the Government of Iraq fully cooperate with the Special Commission by allowing the inspection teams immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to all sites that they wished to inspect.⁴³⁸ On several occasions, the Council took note of incidents or delays described in letters from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission to the President of the Security Council.⁴³⁹

By a statement of the President dated 14 June 1996,⁴⁴⁰ the Council members condemned the failure of Iraq to comply with resolution 1060 (1996) by refusing access to sites designated by the Special Commission and asked the Executive Chairman to visit Baghdad, with a view to securing access to all sites which the Commission designated for inspection and engaging in a forward-looking dialogue on other issues under the Commission's mandate. The Council further requested the Chairman to report immediately afterwards on the results of his visit and on the impact of Iraqi policies on the mandate and work of the Special Commission.

Pursuant to the latter request, by a letter dated 24 June addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴⁴¹ the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission reported on his mission to Baghdad.⁴⁴²

By resolution 1115 (1997) of 21 June 1997, the Security Council, inter alia, condemned the repeated refusal of the Iraqi authorities to allow access to sites designated by the Special Commission. It demanded that the Government of Iraq allow the Special Commission inspection teams immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to any and all areas, facilities, equipment, records and means of transportation which they wished to inspect in accordance with the mandate of the Special Commission and that the Government of Iraq give immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to officials and other persons under the authority of the Government of Iraq whom the Special Commission wished to interview.⁴⁴³ By the same resolution, the Council requested the Chairman of the Special Commission to include in his consolidated progress reports under resolution 1051 (1996) an annex evaluating Iraq's compliance with the above demands. In his fourth report to the Council pursuant to resolution 1051 (1996), the Executive Chairman of the Commission responded to the latter request, including in his consolidated progress reports an annex evaluating Iraq's compliance with paragraphs 2 and 3 of resolution 1115 (1997).⁴⁴⁴

By resolution 1134 (1997) of 23 October 1997, the Council reiterated its request to the Chairman of the Special Commission to include in all future consolidated progress reports, prepared pursuant to resolution 1051 (1996), an annex evaluating Iraq's compliance with resolution 1115 (1997).

By a statement of the President dated 3 December 1997,⁴⁴⁵ the Council members endorsed the conclusions and recommendations of the emergency session of the Special Commission.⁴⁴⁶ The Council encouraged the intensified efforts of the Commission, in order to implement fully its mandate and acknowledged that, as Iraq complied with its obligations under the relevant resolutions, the Commission would make the transition from investigation to monitoring, expanding the use of the ongoing monitoring system functioning in Iraq.

Following the report of the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission on his discussions with officials of the Government of Iraq, which took place in Baghdad from 12 to 16 December 1997,⁴⁴⁷ by a statement of the President dated 22 December 1997,⁴⁴⁸ the Council members expressed their full support for the Special Commission and its Executive Chairman, including for his ongoing discussions with officials of the Government of Iraq.

By a statement of the President dated 14 January 1998,⁴⁴⁹ the Council members expressed their full support for the Special Commission and its Executive Chairman, including his forthcoming travel to Iraq aimed at continuing discussions with officials of the Government of Iraq to ensure the full implementation of the relevant Security Council resolutions. In this connection, the Council requested a full briefing by the Executive Chairman on these discussions as soon as possible. Further to the Council's request, the Chairman of UNSCOM submitted his report on 22 January 1998.⁴⁵⁰

By a statement of the President dated 14 May 1998,⁴⁵¹ after reviewing the report dated 16 April 1998 of the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission,⁴⁵² the Council members encouraged the Special Commission to continue its efforts to improve its effectiveness and efficiency and looked forward to a technical meeting of the members of the Council with the Executive Chairman of the Commission as a follow-up to the review of sanctions held by the Council on 27 April 1998.

By a letter dated 31 October 1998,⁴⁵³ the Deputy Executive Chairman of the Special Commission reported to the Council that the Government of Iraq had decided to suspend, stop or cease all activities of the Commission, including monitoring activities, and that the monitoring teams would not be allowed to conduct any activity. By resolution 1205 (1998) of 5 November 1998, the Security Council condemned, inter alia, Iraq's decision of 31 October 1998.

By a letter dated 11 November 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴⁵⁴ the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission explained the circumstances surrounding the decision to remove all of the Commission's personnel from Iraq.

On 15 December 1998, through a note by the Secretary-General, the Executive Chairman reported to the Council on the level of cooperation offered by Iraq in the period since 17 November 1998.⁴⁵⁵ The Executive Chairman stated that, the experience over the period since that date did not provide a sufficient basis for a comprehensive review, and that Iraq had not provided the full cooperation it had promised on 14 November 1998. In that light, the Commission was not able to conduct the substantive disarmament work mandated to it by the Security Council and thus, to give the Council

By a letter dated 25 January 1999,⁴⁵⁶ the Executive Chairman submitted to the President of the Council two reports, one on the current state of affairs with respect to the disarmament of Iraq's proscribed weapons, and the second on ongoing monitoring and verification in Iraq.

On 30 January 1999, the President of the Security Council issued a note stating that the Council had decided that it would be useful to establish three separate panels (on disarmament and monitoring; on humanitarian issues; and on prisoners of war and Kuwaiti property) and to receive recommendations from them no later than 15 April 1999.⁴⁵⁷ The panel on disarmament and current and future ongoing monitoring and verification issues was mandated to assess all the existing and relevant information available, including data from ongoing monitoring and verification, relating to the state of disarmament in Iraq, and to make recommendations on how to re-establish, taking into account relevant Security Council resolutions, an effective disarmament/ongoing monitoring and verification regime in Iraq. Participants in the panel included members and experts from the Special Commission. On 27 March 1999, the Chairman of the panel on disarmament and monitoring submitted his final report to the President of the Security Council.⁴⁵⁸

On 9 April and 8 October 1999 respectively, the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission submitted the last two semi-annual reports to the Security Council.⁴⁵⁹

By resolution 1126 (1997) of 27 August 1997, the Security Council endorsed the recommendation of the Secretary-General that Judges Karibi-Whyte, Odio Benito and Jan, once replaced as members of the Tribunal, finish the Celibici case which they had begun before expiry of their terms of office, and took note of the intention of the Tribunal to finish the case before November 1998.⁴⁶³

By resolution 1166 (1998) of 13 May 1998, the Security Council, inter alia, decided that three additional judges should be elected, as soon as possible, to serve in the additional Trial Chamber. It also decided, without prejudice to article 13 (4) of the Statute of the Tribunal, that once elected, the additional judges should serve until the date of the expiry of the terms of office of the existing judges, and that, for the purpose of that election the Security Council should, notwithstanding article 13.2 (c) of the Statute, establish a list from the nominations received of not less than six and not more than nine candidates.⁴⁶⁴

Subsidiary organs of the Security Council proposed but not established

During the period under review, there was one instance in which a subsidiary organ was formally proposed but not created. The proposal was submitted in the form of a draft resolution and was related to the agenda item entitled “Central America: efforts towards peace”. This is set out in the case study below.¹

Proposal submitted at the 3730th meeting of the Council on 10 January 1997 with respect to “Central America: efforts towards peace”

At the 3730th meeting of the Council, on 10 January 1997, during consideration of the agenda item “Central America: efforts towards peace”, the President of the Security Council drew the attention of the members to a draft resolution submitted by Argentina, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Mexico, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, the United Kingdom, the United States and Venezuela.² By that draft resolution, the Council would have expressed its determination, in accordance with the recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-General of 17 December 1996, to authorize for a three-month period the attachment to the United Nations Verification Mission in Guatemala of a group of 155 military observers and requisite medical personnel for the purposes of verification of the agreement on the definitive ceasefire between the Government of Guatemala and the Unidad Revolucionaria Guatemalteca, signed at Guatemala City on 29 December 1996. Further, it would have requested the Secretary-General to keep the Council fully informed on the implementation of the resolution and to report on the conclusion of the military observer mission. The draft resolution was put to the vote but failed to be adopted owing to the negative vote of a permanent member of the Security Council.³

³ See S/PV.3730. By its subsequent resolution 1094 (1997) of 20 January 1997, the Council adopted similar provisions by establishing the United Nations Verification Mission in Guatemala (MINUGUA). See part I, section E (19) of the present chapter.

Introductory note

Chapter VI, as in previous volumes, deals with the relations of the Security Council with the other principal organs of the United Nations: the General Assembly (part I); the Economic and Social Council (part II); the International Court of Justice (part IV); and the Secretariat (part V). During the period under review, no material relating to the Trusteeship Council (part III) or Military Staff Committee (part VI) required treatment.

Part I Relations with the General Assembly

Note

Part I concerns various aspects of the relationship between the Security Council and the General Assembly.

Section A deals with the election by the General Assembly of non-permanent members of the Council. Section B considers the practice of the General Assembly in making recommendations to the Council under Articles 10 and 11 of the Charter, and calling its attention under Article 11 (3) to situations which are likely to endanger international peace and security. Section C concerns the limitation imposed by Article 12 (1) on the authority of the General Assembly to make recommendations with respect to any dispute or situation while the Council is exercising the functions assigned to it by the Charter in respect of that dispute or situation. It also describes the procedure under Article 12 (2) by which the Secretary-General notifies the Assembly of matters relating to the maintenance of international peace and security which are being dealt with by the Council, and when the Council ceases to deal with them. Section D considers those instances in which a decision by the Council must be taken prior to that of the General Assembly, for example, the admission, suspension or expulsion of members, the appointment of the Secretary-General, and the election of the judges of the International Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda, respectively. Section E describes the annual and special reports submitted by the Council to the General Assembly. Section F concerns relations between the Security Council and certain subsidiary organs established by the General Assembly which have reported to or otherwise played a part in the work of the Council. Lastly, section G deals with communications from subsidiary organs established by the General Assembly.

A. Election by the General Assembly of non-permanent members of the Security Council

Article 23

1. The Security Council shall consist of fifteen Members of the United Nations. The Republic of China, France, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics,¹ the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and the United States of America shall be permanent members of the Security Council. The General Assembly shall elect ten other Members of the United Nations to be non-permanent members of the Security Council, due regard being specially paid, in the first instance to the contribution of Members of the United Nations to the maintenance of international peace and security and to the other purposes of the Organization, and also to equitable geographical distribution.

2. The non-permanent members of the Security Council shall be elected for a term of two years. In the first election of the non-permanent members after the increase of the membership of the Security Council from eleven to fifteen, two of the four additional members

¹ By a letter dated 24 December 1991, the Secretary-General requested the President of the Security Council to bring to the attention of the members of the Council a letter of the same date from the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, transmitting a letter, also of the same date, from the President of the Russian Federation, in which he informed the Secretary-General that the membership of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in the United Nations was being continued by the Russian Federation.

shall be chosen for a term of one year. A retiring member shall not be eligible for immediate re-election.

3. Each member of the Security Council shall have one representative.

Note

During the period under review, in accordance with Article 23 of the Charter, the General Assembly, at each regular session, elected five non-permanent members of the Security Council to replace those members whose terms of office were to expire on 31 December of the respective year. In each instance, the General Assembly elected the five non-permanent members in the course of one plenary meeting. A table of the elections is set out below.

B. Recommendations by the General Assembly to the Security Council in the form of resolutions under Articles 10 and 11 of the Charter

Article 10

The General Assembly may discuss any questions or any matters within the scope of the present Charter or relating to the powers and functions of any organs provided for in the present Charter, and except as provided in Article 12, may make recommendations to the Members of the United Nations or to the Security Council or to both on any such questions or matters.

Article 11

1. The General Assembly may consider the general principles of cooperation in the maintenance of international peace and security, including the principles governing disarmament and the regulation of armaments, and may make recommendations with regard to such principles to the Members or to the Security Council or to both.

2. The General Assembly may discuss any questions relating to the maintenance of international peace and security brought before it by any Member of the United Nations, or by the Security Council or by a state which is not a Member of the United Nations in accordance with Article 35, paragraph 2, and, except as provided in Article 12, may make recommendations with regard to any such questions to the state or states concerned or to the Security Council or to both. Any such question on which action is necessary shall be referred to the Security Council by the General Assembly either before or after discussion.

3. The General Assembly may call the attention of the Security Council to situations which are likely to endanger international peace and security.

4. The powers of the General Assembly set forth in this Article shall not limit the general scope of Article 10.

Note

During the period under review, the General Assembly made a number of recommendations — in the form of resolutions — to the Security Council regarding the maintenance of international peace and security. Several of these recommendations were of a general nature, touching upon the “powers and functions” of the Council under the Charter, and/or upon “the general principles of cooperation in the maintenance of international peace and security”. As such, they may be seen to be illustrative of the recommendation-making powers of the General Assembly under Articles 10 and 11 (1) of the Charter, respectively. A table of those recommendations is set out in section 1 below.

In other instances, the General Assembly did not make recommendations to the Security Council with regard to specific questions relating to the maintenance of international peace and security, nor request action from the Council with regard to such questions, in accordance with Article 11 (2) of the Charter.

The General Assembly did not draw the attention of the Security Council to any situations under Article 11 (3).

C. Practice in relation to Article 12 of the Charter

Article 12

1. While the Security Council is exercising in respect of any dispute or situation the functions assigned to it in the present Charter, the General Assembly shall not make any recommendation with regard to that dispute or situation unless the Security Council so requests.

2. The Secretary-General, with the consent of the Security Council, shall notify the General Assembly at each session of any matters relative to the maintenance of international peace and security which are being dealt with by the Security Council and shall similarly notify the General Assembly, or the Members of the United Nations if the General Assembly is not in session, immediately the Security Council ceases to deal with such matters.

During the period under review, there was no discussion in the Security Council of the nature of the limitation placed by Article 12 (1) upon the authority of the General Assembly to make recommendations, nor did the Council request that the General Assembly make a recommendation in respect of a dispute or situation in accordance with the exception provided for in Article 12 (1). The General Assembly did, however, adopt a resolution at its tenth emergency special session under the agenda item “Illegal Israeli actions in occupied East Jerusalem and the rest of the Occupied Palestinian Territory”, which followed the earlier rejection by the Security Council of two draft resolutions on a parallel agenda item. Thus, in effect, the Security Council and the General Assembly considered and would have made decisions on the same agenda item (case 1).

In accordance with Article 12 (2), the Secretary-General continued to notify the General Assembly of matters relative to the maintenance of international peace and security which were being dealt with by the Security Council and of matters with which the Council had ceased to deal.² The notifications were based upon the summary statement of matters of which the Security

Article 12, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Council is seized and of the stage reached in their consideration, circulated each week to the members of the Security Council, in accordance with rule 11 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Council.³ The items in the notifications were the same as those in the summary statements for the relevant period, apart from those items not considered to be related to the maintenance of international peace and security.

The matters being dealt with by the Security Council were divided in the notifications into two categories: (a) matters discussed during the period since the last notification; and (b) other matters of which the Council remained seized, but which it had not discussed at a formal meeting since the last notification. As a matter of practice, when the Council subsequently ceased to deal with a matter listed in a notification, the Secretary-General so informed the General Assembly through the circulation of an addendum to the relevant notification. However, no such addendum was issued during the period under review.

The consent of the Council, required by Article 12 (2), was obtained through the circulation by the Secretary-General to the members of the Council of copies of the draft notifications. The General Assembly formally took note of the various notifications.

By a note dated 22 April 1997 the Secretary-General transmitted a letter dated 31 March 1997 from the Permanent Representative of Qatar addressed to the Secretary-General,⁴ in which the representative, of Qatar, on behalf of the League of Arab States (LAS), requested that an emergency special session of the General Assembly be convened pursuant to resolution 377 A (V), entitled "Uniting for peace",⁵ to consider the situation resulting from "illegal Israeli actions in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including Jerusalem". The request emanated from "the failure of the Security Council to exercise its role in maintaining international peace and security owing to the use of the veto by a permanent member of the Council on two successive occasions in less than two weeks".⁶ During the first plenary meeting of the emergency special session of the Assembly, a few speakers reaffirmed the explanation given in the letter of the representative of Qatar as to the necessity of meeting within the framework of the resolution on uniting for peace, singling out the repeated use of the veto by a permanent member for particular criticism.⁷ At the end of the session, the General Assembly adopted resolution ES-10/2, which reflected some of the elements contained in the drafts not adopted by the Council.

D. Practice involving recommendations by the Security Council to the General Assembly

Note

On a number of matters, the Charter of the United Nations provides for joint decision-making by the Security Council and the General Assembly, but requires the decision by the Council to be taken first. This is the case, for instance, with respect to the admission, suspension, or expulsion of members (Articles 4, 5 and 6), the appointment of the Secretary-General (Article 97), and the conditions under which a State that is not a United Nations member may become a party to the Statute of the International Court of Justice (Article 93 Nations": A/51/521, A/52/392 and Corr.1, A/53/357 and A/54/354.

⁵ Under resolution 377 A (V), on uniting for peace, adopted by the General Assembly in 1950, an emergency special session shall be convened within 24 hours at the request of the Security Council or a majority of the members of the United Nations. In recent practice, requests have tended to originate from, and be supported by, regional blocs.

⁶ At the 3747th meeting, on 7 March 1997, draft resolution S/1997/199 was not adopted; at the 3756th meeting, on 21 March 1997, draft resolution S/1997/241 was not adopted.

(2)).⁸ In addition, the Statutes of the Tribunals⁹ established for Rwanda and the former Yugoslavia provide for the Security Council to submit a list of candidates to the General Assembly, from which the Assembly would elect the judges of the Tribunals (Article 12 of the Statute of the International Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia; Article 13 of the Statute of the International Tribunal for Rwanda).

This section considers briefly the Council's practice during the period under review in relation to the admission of members, the appointment of the Secretary-General, and the election of the judges of the International Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia and of the International Tribunal for Rwanda. No question arose concerning the conditions of accession to the Statute of the International Court of Justice.

1. Membership in the United Nations

The admission of a State to membership in the United Nations, and the suspension or expulsion of a Member State from the Organization, is effected by the General Assembly upon the recommendation of the Security Council (Articles 4 (2), 5 and 6 of the Charter). In accordance with rule 60 of its provisional rules of procedure, the Council submits to the General Assembly, within specified time limits, its recommendations concerning each application for membership together with a record of its discussions of the application.

During the period under review, the Council recommended the admission of three States to membership in the United Nations.¹⁰ It made no negative recommendations, requiring it to submit a special report to the General Assembly. The Council did not discuss or recommend the suspension or expulsion of any Member.

⁹ The official titles of the two Tribunals are as follows: (1) International Criminal Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Genocide and Other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan

2. Appointment of the Secretary-General

Article 97

The Secretariat shall comprise a Secretary-General and such staff as the Organization may require. The Secretary-General shall be appointed by the General Assembly upon the recommendation of the Security Council. He shall be the chief administrative officer of the Organization.

Rule 48

... Any recommendation to the General Assembly regarding the appointment of the Secretary-General shall be discussed and decided at a private meeting.

In accordance with rule 48 of the provisional rules of procedure, the meetings of the Security Council to consider the question of a recommendation to the General Assembly regarding the appointment of the Secretary-General were held in private, and the Council voted by secret ballot. A communiqué circulated at the end of each meeting, in accordance with rule 55, indicated the stage reached in the consideration of the recommendation. During the period under review, the Council considered and unanimously adopted one recommendation of this nature (case 2).

At its 3714th meeting, held in private on 19 November 1996, the Security Council considered the question of the recommendation regarding the appointment of the Secretary-General of the United Nations. The draft resolution recommended to the General Assembly that Mr. Boutros Boutros-Ghali be appointed Secretary-General of the United Nations for a second term of office from 1 January 1997 to 31 December 2001.¹¹

Following a vote by secret ballot, the Council did not adopt the draft resolution, which received 14 votes in favour, one vote against and no abstentions. Since the negative vote was cast by a permanent member, the draft resolution was not adopted.

At its 3725th meeting, held in private on 13 December 1996, the Security Council considered the question of the recommendation regarding the appointment of the Secretary-General of the United Nations. Following a vote by secret ballot, the Council unanimously adopted resolution 1090 (1996) recommending to the General Assembly that Mr. Kofi Annan be appointed Secretary-General of the United Nations for a term of office from 1 January 1997 to 31 December 2001. By a letter dated 13 December 1996,¹² the President of the Council transmitted the recommendation to the President of the General Assembly. Acting in accordance with this recommendation, the General Assembly formally appointed Mr. Annan as Secretary-General of the United Nations on 16 December 1996.¹³

3. Election of the judges of the International Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia and of the International Tribunal for Rwanda

Note

The procedure for the election of judges of the two Tribunals is set out in Articles 13 (2), (3) and (4) of the Statute of the International Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia and Articles 12 (2), (3), (4) and (5) of the Statute of the International Tribunal for Rwanda.¹⁴

In each case, in accordance with the Statute, the Secretary-General forwarded to the President of the Security Council the nominations received. The Security Council then convened a meeting, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, and adopted a resolution establishing the list of candidates for judges. Subsequently, the President of the Security Council formally transmitted, via letter, the text of the resolution to the President of the General Assembly. The Assembly then proceeded to elect the judges from the list contained in that resolution.

At its 3763rd meeting, on 8 April 1997, the Security Council adopted resolution 1104 (1997) whereby, in accordance with Article 13 (2) (c) of the Statute of the International Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, it established a list of 19 candidates from which the General Assembly could elect the 11 judges of the Tribunal. By a letter of the same date,¹⁵ the President of the Security Council transmitted to the President of the General Assembly the text of resolution 1104 (1997). During the fifty-first session, at the 98th plenary meeting on 20 May 1997, in accordance with Article 13 (2) (d) of the Statute, the General Assembly elected 11 judges for the Tribunal, that is, those candidates who received the absolute majority of the votes of States Members of the United Nations and of the non-member States maintaining permanent missions at United Nations Headquarters. In accordance with Article 13 (4) of the Statute, the judges were elected for a term of four years, beginning on 17 November 1997.

At its 3934th meeting, on 30 September 1998, the Security Council adopted resolution 1200 (1998) whereby, in accordance with Article 12 (3) (c) of the Statute of the International Tribunal for Rwanda, it established a list of 18 candidates from which the General Assembly could elect the six judges of the Tribunal. In accordance with Article 12 (2) of the Statute, the members of the Appeals Chamber of the International Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia would also serve as members of the Appeals Chamber of the International Tribunal for Rwanda. By a letter of the same date,¹⁶ the President of the Security Council transmitted to the President of the General Assembly the text of resolution 1200 (1998) with the nominations. During the fifty-third session, at the 52nd plenary meeting on 3 November 1998, in accordance with Article 12 (3) (d) of the Statute, the General Assembly elected nine judges for the Tribunal, that is, those candidates who received the absolute majority of the votes of States Members of the United Nations and of the non-member States maintaining permanent observer missions at United Nations Headquarters. E. Reports of the Security Council to the General Assembly

Article 24, paragraph 3

The Security Council shall submit annual and, when necessary, special reports to the General Assembly for its consideration.

Article 15, paragraph 1

The General Assembly shall receive and consider annual and special reports from the Security Council; these reports shall include an account of the measures that the Security Council has decided upon or taken to maintain international peace and security.

In accordance with Article 24 (3) of the Charter, the Security Council continued to submit annual reports to the General Assembly.¹⁷ Following an explanatory statement by the Secretariat, each report was adopted, without a vote, at a meeting of the Council.

Pursuant to a note by the President of the Security Council¹⁸ dated 12 June 1999, a significant number of changes to the content of the annual report were agreed upon by Council members. In addition to prescribing the type of information to be included in the report in relation to each subject dealt with by the Council, the revised format also included additional substantive material, such as information regarding the work of the subsidiary organs of the Council, including the sanctions committees; information regarding the documentation and working methods and procedures of the Council; and matters brought to the attention of the Council but not discussed by it during the period covered. Two new appendices were also added, the first containing the full text of all resolutions, decisions and presidential statements adopted or voted upon by the Council during the year in question, and the latter providing information about meetings with troop-contributing countries. The final change outlined in the note was the inclusion of an attachment, as an addendum to the report, of brief assessments of the work of the Council prepared by members following their terms as President.¹⁹

During the period covered by this Supplement, the Council did not submit any special reports to the General Assembly — under, for example, rule 60 (3) of the Council's provisional rules of procedure.²⁰

F. Relations with subsidiary organs established by the General Assembly

Note

Certain subsidiary organs established by the General Assembly have played a part in the work of the Security Council, either because they have been placed in a special relationship to the Council by resolution of the General Assembly, or because the Council has made use of their services or invited their officers to participate in its meetings.

During the period under review, there was no constitutional discussion bearing on the relations

²⁰ The rule provides that if the Security Council does not recommend an applicant State for membership or postpones the consideration of the application, it "shall submit a special report to the General Assembly with a complete record of the discussion".

between such subsidiary organs and the Security Council. Those subsidiary organs still active included the following: the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations; the United Nations Special Mission in Afghanistan (UNSMIA); the International Civilian Mission in Haiti (MICIVIH); the United Nations Mission for the Verification of Human Rights and of Compliance with the Commitments of the Comprehensive Agreement on Human Rights in Guatemala (MINUGUA); the Open-Ended Working Group on the Question of Equitable Representation on and Increase in the Membership of the Security Council; and the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People. Those organs submitted reports and recommendations to the Security Council, and/or to the General Assembly, as appropriate, pursuant to a request by the General Assembly.

During the period under consideration, one decision adopted by the Security Council contained a reference to MINUGUA (see case 8).²¹ The Council also mentioned four other subsidiary organs (see cases 5-7) established by the General Assembly in its decisions. In several instances, the Council made references to the Working Group (see case 9).

The table below gives an account of the communications from the Committee on the exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People; their participation in Council meetings is recorded in chapter III of the present supplement.

By a statement of the President dated 30 August 1996,²² in connection with the agenda item entitled "Demining in the context of United Nations peacekeeping", the Council members noted that the early deployment of mine clearance units would often be important to the effectiveness of a peacekeeping operation, and encouraged the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations to examine options for achieving such early deployment. It also encouraged Member States to examine whether and in what form they might be able to help in that respect. Furthermore, the Council members encouraged the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations, given its responsibility for a comprehensive review of the whole question of peacekeeping operations, to continue and intensify its considerations of the operational demining aspects of peacekeeping operations. Those considerations could include an analysis of mine clearance experience in previous peacekeeping operations.²³

By a statement of the President dated 14 July 1997,²⁴ the Council members noted the efforts by the General Assembly and its Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations in carrying out their task to review all aspects of peacekeeping operations, including enhancing the capacity of the United Nations system to accommodate the growing demand for civilian police in peacekeeping operations.

At its 4046th meeting, on 16 September 1999, the Council met to consider the agenda item entitled "Protection of civilians in armed conflict". During the course of the deliberations, while speaking on recommendations in integrating human rights and humanitarian concerns with peacekeeping activities, the representative of Gabon agreed with the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations that operations should be multidisciplinary so as to include activities related to civilian police, humanitarian assistance, disarmament and demobilization, combating illicit trafficking in small arms and light weapons and human rights.²⁵

During the period under review, by a statement of the President dated 15 February 1996,²⁶ the Council members reaffirmed their full support for the efforts of the United Nations Special Mission in Afghanistan to bring about a peaceful solution to the conflict through the establishment of a fully representative, broad-based, authoritative council acceptable to all Afghans. It also called upon all Afghans to cooperate fully with the Special Mission as it worked towards this goal.

At its 3650th meeting, on 9 April 1996, the Council met to consider the situation in Afghanistan. During the deliberation, Council members unanimously commended and fully supported the initiatives carried out by the Special Mission. The representative of Germany recalled General Assembly resolution 50/88 which provided for the Special Mission to facilitate national reconciliation through “the creation of a transitory mechanism, transfer of power and an immediate and durable cease-fire”. He stated that the Head of the Special Mission had invested enormous efforts to work with the parties towards achieving these goals and thanked them for their work. He further stated that his delegation agreed with others that the Special Mission should be encouraged to somewhat broaden its approach by also seeking solutions to other questions that had to be addressed within the framework of the mandate of the Commission. They were convinced that such a broader approach could open up new opportunities for success in the work of the Special Mission.²⁷

By resolution 1076 (1996) of 22 October 1996, the Security Council reaffirmed its full support for the efforts of the United Nations, in particular the activities of the Special Mission in facilitating the political process towards the goals of national reconciliation and a lasting political settlement with the participation of all parties to the conflict and all segments of Afghan society. Furthermore, it called upon all Afghan parties to cooperate with the Special Mission, and requested the Secretary-General to continue to keep the Security Council regularly informed, on the basis of information received from the Special Mission, on the political, military and humanitarian situation.

In six subsequent presidential statements,²⁸ the Council members supported the activities of the Special Mission and called upon all Afghan parties to cooperate fully with the Special Mission. By a letter dated 13 May 1997 addressed to the Secretary-General,²⁹ the President of the Council reaffirmed support for the continuing efforts of the Special Mission to facilitate national reconciliation in Afghanistan on the basis of General Assembly resolution 51/195 and resolution 1076 (1996).

By resolutions 1193 (1998) of 28 August 1998 and 1214 (1998) of 8 December 1998, the Council reaffirmed its full support for the efforts of the United Nations, in particular the activities of the Special Mission.

In several decisions taken during the period under review, in connection with the agenda item entitled “The question concerning Haiti”,³⁰ the Council commended and supported the contribution of the International Civilian Mission in Haiti. United Nations participation in the Mission had been authorized by General Assembly resolution 47/20 B in connection with the agenda item entitled “The situation of democracy and human rights in Haiti”.

By resolution 1141 (1997) of 28 November 1997, the Council noted the key role played by MICIVIH in helping to establish a fully functioning Haitian National Police of adequate size and structure as an integral element of the consolidation of democracy and the revitalization of the system of justice in Haiti.

By resolution 1277 (1999) of 30 November 1999, the Council commended the valuable contributions of MICIVIH in assisting the Government of Haiti by supporting and contributing to the professionalization of the Haitian National Police Force as an integral element of the consolidation of the system of justice in Haiti, as well as by their efforts in developing national institutions.

By resolution 1094 (1997) of 20 January 1997, the Council decided, in accordance with the recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-General of 17 December 1996, to authorize for a three-month period the attachment to the United Nations Mission for the Verification of Human Rights and of Compliance with the Commitments of the Comprehensive Agreement on Human Rights in Guatemala of a group of 155 military observers and requisite medical personnel for the purposes of verification of the agreement on the definitive ceasefire, and requested the Secretary-General to notify the Council no later than two weeks before the operation was to begin.

By a statement of the President dated 5 March 1997,³¹ the Council members welcomed the deployment on 3 March 1997 of a group of United Nations military observers attached to MINUGUA. In a subsequent statement by the President,³² the Council members welcomed the successful conclusion of the military observer mission attached to MINUGUA, in accordance with resolution 1094 (1997).

By a letter dated 15 March 1999 addressed to the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council,³³ the representative of Venezuela made several remarks regarding the discussion that had taken place, both in the Open-ended Working Group on the Question of Equitable Representation on and Increase in the Membership of the Security Council. In this regard, he stated that the Arria Formula constituted a treasury of Security Council procedures, which was the product of experience and of “a pragmatic vision of its responsibilities”. He further stated that the informal mechanism should be used at the discretion of the President of the Security Council and with the authorization of its members. Nevertheless, the Arria Formula should be used in accordance with its original concept and should not be invoked in order to receive representatives of countries which were full Members of the United Nations, as that would be contrary to the principle of sovereign equality of States as set out in Article 2 of the Charter of the United Nations.

At its 4072nd meeting, on 29 November 1999, the Council considered the agenda item entitled the “Role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflicts”. During the course of the debate, the representative of Belarus noted that his delegation supported the proposal made by many States during the general debate at the session of the General Assembly regarding the need to discuss, within the General Assembly, questions of humanitarian intervention. He believed in the need for a just, fair and collective discussion, which was the fundamental basis for the work of the United Nations. In his view, the General Assembly should set up a special open-ended working group, which could institutionalize discussion and possibly work out general conclusions and recommendations on that matter.³⁴

Subsequently, the Council met at its 4081st meeting, on 15 December 1999, to discuss the agenda item entitled “The situation in Africa”. During the course of the debate, the representative of Colombia noted that in order to make better use of the scarce resources available within the Organization to achieve peace in Africa, it was necessary to improve the coordination between and harmonize the management of the various organs of the United Nations, particularly of the Security Council, the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council. In this regard, his delegation agreed with the decision of the General Assembly to establish an Open-Ended Working Group to monitor the implementation of the recommendations made by the Secretary-General in his report, taking advantage, moreover, of the conclusions arrived at by the Economic and Social Council at its last session.³⁵

The representative of Italy referred to a statement that was made by the President of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) in the General Assembly, during which the latter had emphasized that the General Assembly had not yet defined the role of the Open-Ended Working Group that it had decided to set up at its fifty-third session. In that regard, he proposed that the Working Group should make sure that Africa remained at the top of the priorities of the United Nations. He further stated that, as the Secretary-General himself had pointed out in his address of 8 December 1999, the Working Group should consolidate and ensure the consistency of efforts to implement such a high priority. Otherwise, the proliferation of initiatives would threaten to create more problems than solutions.³⁶

Relations with the Economic and Social Council: practice in relation to Article 65 of the Charter

Article 65

The Economic and Social Council may furnish information to the Security Council and shall assist the Security Council upon its request.

Note

This part concerns the relationship between the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council. Section A considers decisions of the Council which contain reference either to Article 65 of the Charter of the United Nations or to the Economic and Social Council. Section B considers deliberations (cases 10-13) of the Council during the course of which the importance of closer ties between the two organs was stressed, particularly in the context of post-conflict peacebuilding.

A. Requests or references to the Economic and Social Council in decisions of the Security Council

During the period under consideration, the Security Council did not formally address a request for information or assistance to the Economic and Social Council. The Council did, however, make an explicit reference to Article 65 of the Charter in its decision.³⁷ In several other decisions, in the context of a variety of agenda items, the Council made a reference to the Economic and Social Council (see tables in subsections 1 and 2 below).

1. Resolutions containing references to the Economic and Social Council

Resolution	Item	Relevant provisions
1170 (1998)	The situation in Africa	The Security Council stressed that the challenges in Africa demanded a comprehensive response, and in this context, expressed the hope that the General Assembly, the Economic and Social Council, other relevant bodies of the United Nations, regional and subregional organizations, international financial institutions and other relevant organizations, as well as Member States would consider the report and its recommendations and take action as they deemed appropriate within their respective areas of competence (para. 2).

Resolution	Item	Relevant provisions
1212 (1998)	The question concerning Haiti	The Security Council stressed the commitment of the international community to a long-term programme of support for Haiti and invited United Nations bodies and agencies, especially the Economic and Social Council, to contribute to the designing of such a programme (para. 8).
1230 (1999)	The situation in the Central African Republic	The Security Council stressed the commitment of the international community to a long-term programme of support for the Central African Republic and further urged the Economic and Social Council, the United Nations Development Programme, the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank and the appropriate regional financial institutions to contribute to the designing of such a programme (para. 16).

2. Presidential statements containing references to the Economic and Social Council

Statement	Item	Relevant provisions
S/PRST/1998/29	The situation in Africa	The Security Council stressed the urgent need for Member States, the United Nations system, including the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council, the international financial institutions and other relevant organizations to consider appropriate action in response to the comprehensive recommendations set out by the Secretary-General in his report (para. 3).
S/PRST/1998/38	Maintenance of peace and security and post-conflict peacebuilding	The Security Council underlined the fact that economic rehabilitation and reconstruction often constituted the major tasks facing societies emerging from conflict and that significant international assistance should be indispensable to promote sustainable development in such cases. In that context, it recalled that Article 65 of the Charter of the United Nations provided that the Economic and Social Council may furnish information to the Security Council and shall assist the Council upon its request (para. 4).

Statement	Item	Relevant provisions
S/PRST/1999/34	Role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflicts	The Security Council would consider the possibility of holding further orientation debates and strengthening its cooperation with the Economic and Social Council (para. 12).

B. Constitutional discussion arising in connection with the Economic and Social Council

The issue of relations between the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council arose frequently in Security Council debates, particularly in the context of post-conflict peacebuilding in Africa and Haiti. During the debates of the Council, emphasis was placed on the interrelation between peace and development and on the need for the coordination of efforts by the Security Council, the Economic and Social Council and other United Nations organs involved in conflict management.

The section below will highlight several case studies, each addressing a different issue before the Security Council, with a view to outlining the evolving relationship between the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council. The case studies analysed include the following: the maintenance of peace and security and post-conflict peacebuilding (case 10); the situation in Haiti (case 11); the situation in Africa (case 12); and the role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflicts (case 13).

In his report to the General Assembly on the work of the Organization,³⁸ the Secretary-General touched upon the role of the Security Council and cooperation between the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council in the context of conflict prevention. He stated that under the Charter, there was “a dormant provision” that the Economic and Social Council might furnish information and assistance to the Security Council upon a request from the latter (Article 65). In that regard, he recommended that as the Security Council was increasingly required to address economic, social and humanitarian crises that were threatening global security, it might wish to invoke this mechanism. He believed that this would help to achieve better communication and coordination between the organs of the United Nations whose primary focus was on economic, social and humanitarian affairs.³⁹

During the period under consideration, there were two instances during which Article 65 was explicitly mentioned: the report of the Secretary-General on the protection for humanitarian assistance to refugees and others in conflict situations,⁴⁰ and in connection with the agenda item entitled “Report of the Secretary-General on the protection for humanitarian assistance to refugees and others in conflict situations”.⁴¹

⁴⁰ At the 3968th meeting of the Council, on 21 January 1999, the President pointed out, in connection with the report of the Secretary-General on the protection for humanitarian assistance to refugees and others in conflict situations (S/1998/883), that it was important to reach some understanding on the limits of the Council’s action in humanitarian affairs, with the Council reserving its attention for cases that truly threatened international peace and security, while other organs, such as the Economic and Social Council, dealt with other cases. He informed the Council that he had received a visit from the President of the Economic and Social Council who intended to have that body deal with such matters as post-conflict reconstruction and rebuilding, including the implementation of Article 65 of the Charter (S/PV.3968, p. 22).

⁴¹ At the 3932nd meeting of the Council, on 29 September 1998, the representative of Brazil, while referring to the Secretary-General’s report on the work of the Organization (A/53/1), noted that the report defended the promotion of new forms of cooperation between the Security Council, the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council in tackling the economic, social and humanitarian prerequisites of human security (S/PV.3932, pp. 6-8); the representative of China was in favour of the Secretary-General’s recommendation regarding strengthening coordination between the Security Council and other institutions like the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council (Ibid., p. 5).

Maintenance of peace and security and post-conflict peacebuilding

At its 3954th meeting, on 16 December 1998, the Council held an open debate on the item entitled “Maintenance of peace and security and post-conflict peacebuilding”. During the debate, the representative of China noted that the role and capacity of the organs of the United Nations in the socio-economic field should be strengthened. He expressed concern at the marginalization of relevant United Nations functions, including those of the Economic and Social Council, on major international economic development and assistance issues. His delegation was strongly opposed to the weakening of the role of United Nations organs in the socio-economic fields that placed a large number of social issues on the Security Council agenda. He expressed the view that not all problems of conflict areas should be placed in the hands of the Security Council, because this was not good for the normal functioning of other United Nations bodies, including the General Assembly. At the same time, such practices might affect priorities in the work of the Security Council and impair its efficiency.⁴² The representative of the Russian Federation stated that in concentrating primarily on a solution to the social, economic and humanitarian tasks of recovery, peacebuilding fell within the sphere of competence of the Economic and Social Council, which should work in close contact with other international financial, economic and humanitarian organizations, in particular in providing material and financial resources for peacebuilding activities. In that context, his delegation attached great significance to the reactivation of Article 65 of the Charter. He further stated that this chapter of the Charter was fully applicable on the preventive level, insofar as the Security Council could and would draw the attention of the Economic and Social Council to the relevant problems of various regions, since the Security Council, within the framework of its competence, closely followed destabilizing trends in the social, economic and humanitarian fields which could lead to the emergence or escalation of conflicts.⁴³

The representative of Brazil noted that the Secretary-General had recognized the importance of promoting new forms of cooperation between the Security Council, the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council in his latest report on the work of the Organization.⁴⁴ He recalled the statement given by the representative of the Russian Federation who acknowledged that Article 65 of the Charter had been quoted by the Secretary-General as providing a basis for achieving better communication and coordination between the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council. He noted that resolution 1212 (1998) set the stage, in an innovative way, for placing the situation in Haiti within a different context by inviting United Nations bodies and agencies, especially the Economic and Social Council.⁴⁵ The representative of Slovenia noted that the experience of past years had also confirmed the need for all the relevant United Nations organs and agencies to take part in a cooperative manner.⁴⁶

In the ensuing debate, the representative of Indonesia supported the plan proposed by the Secretary-General to broaden the role of the Security Council by invoking Article 65 of the Charter because of the increasing need for the Council to be provided with accurate and relevant information on economic, social and humanitarian crises that threatened international peace and security.⁴⁷

At its 3961st meeting, on 29 December 1998, the Council again considered the item entitled “Maintenance of peace and security and post-conflict peacebuilding”. By a statement of the President,⁴⁸ the Council members underlined that economic rehabilitation and reconstruction often constituted the major tasks facing societies emerging from conflict and that significant international assistance had become indispensable to promote sustainable development in such cases, and in that context recalled Article 65 of the Charter.

Question concerning Haiti

At its 3949th meeting, on 25 November 1998, the Council met to consider the question concerning Haiti. During the deliberations of the Council, speaking prior to the vote, the representative of Brazil highlighted paragraph 8 of the draft resolution,⁴⁹ which invited United Nations bodies and agencies, especially the Economic and Social Council, to contribute to the design of a long-term programme of support for the economic rehabilitation and reconstruction of Haiti. He noted that this was a small step by the Council to revive Article 65 of the Charter, a provision that the Secretary-General had described as dormant and to which he had referred in his report on the work of the Organization in the part concerning the prevention of conflicts. He further stated that Haiti could benefit from the role of the Economic and Social Council, especially in the area of post-conflict peacebuilding. In that regard, his delegation was sure that the Economic and Social Council would be up to the challenge contained in the resolution for the benefit of Haiti and other countries in the future.⁵⁰

At the same meeting, the Council adopted resolution 1212 (1998) in which it emphasized that economic rehabilitation and reconstruction constituted important tasks facing the Government and people of Haiti and that significant international assistance was indispensable for sustainable development in Haiti. The Council specifically invited “United Nations bodies and agencies, especially the Economic and Social Council” to contribute to the designing of a long-term assistance programme to Haiti.

By a letter dated 16 February 1999 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵¹ the President of the Economic and Social Council noted that Article 65 had been cited by several delegations at an Economic and Social Council organizational session as well as by the Secretary-General. In that regard, he referred to a statement by the President that was adopted at the meeting on maintenance of peace and security and post-conflict peacebuilding, during which Article 65 was cited in the context of economic assistance to societies emerging from conflict. He noted that two subjects had been raised as possible areas for concrete implementation of Article 65: one concerned the problems of Africa, the other was the situation in Haiti. With regard to Haiti, the President of the Economic and Social Council referred to paragraph 8 of resolution 1212 and sought the advice of the President of the Security Council as to whether such an invitation for the design of a long-term programme for Haiti should be interpreted as a formal request in accordance with the second part of Article 65 of the Charter and, if this was the case, what concrete contribution the Security Council expected from the Economic and Social Council.⁵²

In response, by a letter dated 7 April 1999 addressed to the President of the Economic and Social Council,⁵³ the President of the Security Council confirmed that in paragraph 8 of its resolution 1212 (1998), the Council had invited the Economic and Social Council to contribute to the designing of a long-term programme of support for Haiti. He stated that the members of the Security Council would continue to follow that matter and might have specific suggestions to make as to how the two Councils could cooperate in this regard.

Thereafter, on 7 May 1999, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1999/4 which created an Ad Hoc Advisory Group on Haiti that would submit to it, at its substantive session of 1999, its recommendations on how to ensure that international community assistance to the efforts to support the Government of Haiti in achieving sustainable development was adequate, coherent, well coordinated and effective. The Advisory Group visited Haiti from 27 to 29 June 1999 and issued a report on 2 July 1999, in which it made specific recommendations regarding the development of a long-term strategy and programme of support for Haiti, addressing in particular the issue of capacity-building of both governmental and civil society institutions.

By a letter dated 31 July 1999 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵⁴ the President of the Economic and Social Council referred to resolution 1212 (1998) inviting the Economic and Social Council to contribute to the designing of a long-term strategy and development programme of support for Haiti. He stated that given the previous action of the Security Council with respect to Haiti, of particular interest might be the recommendations made to the General Assembly, in paragraph 8 of Economic and Social Council resolution 1999/11, to review all aspects of the mandate and operations of the International Civilian Mission in Haiti and to consider renewing the mandate of the United Nations component of the Mission and, in paragraph 10, to consider devising a United Nations special training and technical assistance programme for the Haitian National Police. He noted that this contribution by the Economic and Social Council would strengthen the continued resolve of the United Nations to support Haiti, complementing the efforts of the Security Council in that regard, and enhance the cooperation between the two organs, as contemplated in Article 65 of the Charter.

In response, in a letter dated 20 August 1999 from the President of the Security Council addressed to the President of the Economic and Social Council,⁵⁵ the President of the Security Council acknowledged the letter dated 31 July 1999 from the President of the Economic and Social Council⁵⁶ concerning the adoption by the Economic and Social Council of resolution 1999/11, relating to the long-term strategy and development programme of support for Haiti, in line with Security Council resolution 1212 (1998). He noted that in the view of the members of the Security Council, it was essential that, in order to ensure sustainable development in Haiti, the efforts of the international community be geared towards supporting the Government of Haiti in addressing the important issue of capacity-building of its governmental institutions. He further noted that the Council had expressed the hope that this important contribution of the Economic and Social Council would serve to strengthen the cooperation between the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council, as the United Nations attempted to assist the people of Haiti in rebuilding their country.

The situation in Africa

At its 3875th meeting, on 24 April 1998, the Council considered the agenda item entitled “The situation in Africa”. During the debate, the representative of Brazil⁵⁷ expressed his appreciation for the report of the Secretary-General on the situation in Africa.⁵⁸ He noted that the objective analysis and the practical action-oriented recommendations contained in that report called for careful examination not only by the Security Council, but also by the General Assembly, the Economic and Social Council and other components of the United Nations system. He further noted that in the search for adequate intergovernmental bodies to deal with the transition from peacekeeping to reconstruction, the Charter could provide some guidance. His delegation was particularly interested in looking at ways to activate Article 65, which dealt with assistance from the Economic and Social Council to the Security Council.⁵⁹

At its 3886th meeting, on 28 May 1998, the Council adopted resolution 1170 (1998), stressing that the challenges in Africa demanded a comprehensive response, and in that context expressed the hope that the General Assembly, the Economic and Social Council, other relevant bodies of the United Nations, regional and subregional organizations, international financial institutions and other relevant organizations, as well as Member States would consider the report and its recommendations, and take action as they deemed appropriate within their respective areas of competence.

By a statement of the President dated 24 September 1998,⁶⁰ the Council stressed that the quest for peace in Africa required a comprehensive, concerted and determined approach, encompassing the eradication of poverty, the promotion of democracy, sustainable development and respect for human rights, conflict prevention and resolution, including peacekeeping and humanitarian assistance. The Council underlined the need for genuine political will, in Africa and beyond, to achieve durable results towards those ends, and stressed the urgent need for Member States, the United Nations system, including the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council, the international financial institutions and other relevant organizations to continue to consider appropriate action in response to the comprehensive recommendations set out by the Secretary-General in his report.⁶¹

By a letter dated 16 February 1999 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁶² the President of the Economic and Social Council referred to resolution 1170 (1998) on the causes of conflict and the promotion of durable peace and sustainable development in Africa, as well as to the statement by the President⁶³ issued at the end of the Council's meeting on the situation in Africa. In both meetings, the Council had stressed that the United Nations system, including the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council, needed to consider appropriate action in response to the comprehensive recommendations set out by the Secretary-General in his report. In that regard, the President stated that the Economic and Social Council would devote the coordination segment of its substantive session in 2000 to the theme "Development of Africa: implementation and coordinated follow-up by the United Nations system of initiatives on African development". Furthermore, both the high-level segment (entitled "The role of employment and work in poverty eradication: the empowerment and advancement of women") and the humanitarian segment (entitled "International cooperation and coordinated responses to the humanitarian emergencies, in particular in the transition from relief to rehabilitation, reconstruction and development") would provide useful elements for the Security Council's emphasis on a "comprehensive, concerted and determined approach" to the problems of Africa.⁶⁴

At its 4081st meeting, on 15 December 1999, the Council met to consider approaches to address the situation in Africa. With regard to the identification of additional instruments that the Council could offer to help solve conflicts in Africa, a wide variety of important proposals were raised. Several representatives proposed better cooperation between the Council and the Economic and Social Council, especially in post-conflict peacebuilding.⁶⁵ The representative of the Russian Federation noted that one of the key components of the strategy for strengthening peace in Africa had to be the promotion by the United Nations of the establishment of an effective pan-African system, which was geared to both prevent and settle conflicts and also to a comprehensive solution to the task of post-conflict rehabilitation. In that regard, he stated that there was the need for coordinated action on the part of various bodies and agencies of the United Nations system. One of the real opportunities for establishing such work was the application of Article 65 of the Charter.⁶⁶

The representative of New Zealand noted that the root causes of much of the conflict in the region included the high level of poverty and underdevelopment and the inequalities in opportunity among different groups. In this regard, he suggested that the Security Council make far greater use of its relationship with the Economic and Social Council, as provided for in Article 65 of the Charter.⁶⁷ Referring explicitly to Article 65, the representative of Italy stated that better use should be made of the Article's existing mechanisms and instruments.⁶⁸

Role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflicts

At its 4072nd meeting, on 29 November 1999, the Council considered the item entitled "Role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflicts". During the course of the debate, the representative of Bahrain noted that the Security Council worked apart from other bodies and institutions of the United Nations system, whereas the subjects and issues discussed in the Council were complementary and could not be separated from each other. He pointed out that the Council had been examining the issue of the maintenance of peace, but "peacebuilding institutions" such as the Economic and Social Council had then intervened, without any real coordination between the two bodies and without a discernible line between the beginning of the role of one and the end of the role of the other. He further noted that the lack of cooperation between the two bodies might lead to a dangerous renewal of conflict, if the Security Council did not urge the Economic and Social Council to fill the gap left by armed conflicts by rebuilding peacekeeping institutions through the implementation of economic and social development programmes. Furthermore, he noted that areas of tension would continue to exist as long as there was a lack of coordination between the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council. He noted, however, that the Security Council had coordinated its activities with the Economic and Social Council by delegating to that body the task of building peace institutions in Haiti after a lengthy conflict. In concluding, he observed that the Council had a duty to play a role as coordinator to establish complementarity with other United Nations bodies, including between the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council so as to prevent conflicts before they erupted.⁶⁹ Other speakers also supported proposals aimed at further coordination and cooperation between the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council.⁷⁰

By a statement of the President dated 30 November 1999,⁷¹ the Council members stated that they would continue to review their activities and strategies for the prevention of armed conflicts. In addition, they would consider the possibility of holding further orientation debates and strengthening their cooperation with the Economic and Social Council.⁷²

Relations with the Trusteeship Council

Part III concerns the relationship between the Security Council and the Trusteeship Council in relation to those trust territories designated as “a strategic area or areas”, under Articles 77 and 82 of the Charter. Article 83 (1), provides that “all functions of the United Nations” relating to strategic areas — “including the approval of the terms of the trusteeship agreements and of their alteration or amendment” — shall be exercised by the Security Council. Article 83 (2) further provides that the Security Council shall avail itself of the assistance of the Trusteeship Council “to perform those functions of the United Nations under the trusteeship system relating to political, economic, social and educational matters in the strategic areas”. Those supervisory functions are specified in Articles 87 and 88 of the Charter.

During the period under review, although remaining in existence, the Trusteeship Council did not carry on any activity.⁷³

⁷³ By its resolution 956 (1994), the Security Council determined, in the light of the entry into force on 1 October 1994 of the new status agreement for Palau, that the objectives of the Trusteeship Agreement for the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands had been fully attained, and that the Trusteeship Council had successfully completed the task entrusted to it under the Charter.

Part IV

Relations with the International Court of Justice

Note

Part IV concerns the relationship between the Security Council and the International Court of Justice. Section A deals with the election of the members of the Court, which requires that action be taken by the Security Council in conjunction with the General Assembly, but with both organs proceeding independently. During the period under review, three rounds of elections took place to elect 11 members to fill casual and regular vacancies (see cases 14-16), and one election was set for the year 2000 (see case 17 and the fourteenth Supplement).

Section B deals with the discussion that arose in the Security Council regarding the respective roles of the Security Council and the Court. It discusses the alleged involvement of nationals of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya in the destruction of two civilian airliners (see case 18). It also deals with the border dispute between Cameroon and Nigeria (see case 19). Furthermore, it deals with a territorial dispute between the United Arab Emirates and the Islamic Republic of Iran, which was referred to the Court, but not taken up (see case 20).

A. Practice in relation to the election of members of the International Court of Justice

The procedure for the election of members of the Court is set out in Articles 4, 8 and 10 to 14 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice; rules 150 and 151 of the rules of procedure of the General Assembly; and rules 40 and 61 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council.

For each of the three elections that took place during the period under review, the Security Council began the election procedure to fill one or several vacancies by fixing the date of election, in accordance with Article 14 of the Statute of the Court. The Security Council and the General Assembly then proceeded independently with the elections.⁷⁴ During the meeting of the Security Council, the President drew attention to a memorandum by the Secretary-General describing the composition of the Court and setting out the procedure to be followed in the conduct of the election.⁷⁵ He reminded the Council that Article 10 (1) of the Statute of the Court provides that, “those candidates who obtain an absolute majority of votes in the General Assembly and in the Security Council shall be considered as elected”, adding that the required majority in the Security Council was, therefore, eight votes. He explained further that the voting would proceed by secret ballot.

At its 3636th meeting, on 28 February 1996, the Council met to elect a member of the Court, to fill a vacancy caused by the death of one of its members. On the first ballot, one candidate obtained the required majority of votes in the Council. The President of the Council stated that he would communicate the result of the vote to the President of the General Assembly and requested the Council to remain in session until the result of the voting in the General Assembly had been received. Subsequently, he informed members of the Council that he had received a letter from the President of the General Assembly informing him that the same candidate had received an absolute majority in the General Assembly at its 101st plenary meeting. The candidate in question was therefore elected a member of the Court. As the new member was elected to replace a member whose term of office had not yet expired, he was elected for the remainder of his predecessor’s term of office, expiring on 5 February 2000.

At its 3709th meeting, on 6 November 1996, the Council proceeded with the election of five members of the Court, to fill the seats which would become vacant on 5 February 1997. The election required three ballots. On the first ballot, four candidates received the required majority of votes in the Security Council. On the second ballot, no additional candidate received the required majority. On the third ballot, one more candidate obtained the required majority. The President of the Council stated that he would communicate the result of the vote to the President of the General Assembly, and requested the Council to remain in session until the result of the voting in the General Assembly had been received. Subsequently, he informed members of the Council that he had received a letter from the President of the General Assembly informing him that the same candidates had received an absolute majority in the General Assembly at its 54th plenary meeting. The candidates in question were therefore elected as members of the Court for a term of office of nine years, beginning on 6 February 1997.

At its 4059th meeting, on 3 November 1999, the Council met to elect five members of the Court, to fill the seats which would become vacant on 5 February 2000. On the first ballot, all five candidates obtained the required majority of votes in the Council. The President of the Council stated that he would communicate the result of the vote to the President of the General Assembly, and requested the Council to remain in session until the result of the voting in the General Assembly had been received. Subsequently, he informed members of the Council that he had received a letter from the President of the General Assembly informing him that the same candidates had received an absolute majority in the General Assembly at its 45th plenary meeting. The candidates in question were therefore elected members of the Court for a term of office of nine years, beginning on 6 February 2000.

Case 17

At its 4075th meeting, on 30 November 1999, the Council met to set the date of an election of a member of the Court, to fill a vacancy in the Court caused by the resignation of one of its members. By resolution 1278 (1999) of 30 November 1999, the Council decided that the election should take place on 2 March 2000 at a meeting of the Security Council and at a meeting of the General Assembly in its fifty-fourth session.

B. Consideration of the relationship between the Security Council and the Court

Article 94 of the Charter of the United Nations

1. Each Member of the United Nations undertakes to comply with the decision of the International Court of Justice in any case to which it is a party.
2. If any party to a case fails to perform the obligations incumbent upon it under a judgment rendered by the Court, the other party may have recourse to the Security Council, which may, if it deems necessary, make recommendations or decide upon measures to be taken to give effect to the judgment.

Article 96

1. The General Assembly or the Security Council may request the International Court of Justice to give an advisory opinion on any legal question.
2. Other organs of the United Nations and specialized agencies, which may at any time be so authorized by the General Assembly, may also request advisory opinions of the Court on legal questions arising within the scope of their activities.

Article 41 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice

1. The Court shall have the power to indicate, if it considers that circumstances so require, any provisional measures which ought to be taken to preserve the respective rights of either party.
2. Pending the final decision, notice of the measures suggested shall forthwith be given to the parties and to the Security Council.

Case 18

At its 3819th meeting, on 25 September 1997, the Security Council met to discuss the situation in Africa. With particular reference to the alleged involvement of the nationals of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya in the destruction of two civilian aircraft, the representative of Zimbabwe called for the consideration of trying the two accused Libyans under Scottish law, by Scottish judges but in a third country or at the International Court of Justice.⁷⁶

Speaking in the same vein, the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity expressed the view that the Council might wish to give serious consideration to the proposal jointly presented by OAU and the League of Arab States (LAS) aimed at seeking a just and equitable solution to the dispute.⁷⁷ Similarly, the representative of Egypt urged the Council to consider how to facilitate bringing the suspects to trial as soon as possible, so as to preserve and respect the legitimacy of the Council.⁷⁸

On the contrary, the representative of the United Kingdom stressed that the only place the suspects could face trial under Scottish law was Scotland, as there was no legal authority for a Scottish court to meet outside Scotland and no legal authority in the law of the Netherlands for a court of another jurisdiction to sit at The Hague.⁷⁹ The representative of the United States underlined that there could be no compromise with the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya when it came to terrorism and stressed that the responsibility for the effect of the actions of the Security Council rested squarely with the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.⁸⁰

At its 3864th meeting, on 20 March 1998, the Council met to discuss the situation involving the alleged involvement of the nationals of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya in the destruction of two civilian aircraft (Pan Am flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland, in 1988, and UTA flight 772 over Niger in 1989), after having received letters dated 20 and 23 December 1991⁸¹ from the representatives of France, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and the United States of America concerning the matter.

During the deliberations, the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya stated that his country had been suffering from collective sanctions for the past six years, without a court judgment or a legal basis for them. Like the families of the bombing victims, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya was anxious to have the two suspects brought to trial in a just and fair court in a neutral country and to uncover the truth. He stated that his Government had urged the suspects to appear before a Scottish court, but they had refused on their lawyers' advice, stating they had already been condemned in the United Kingdom and the United States as a result of biased media coverage and official statements. Moreover, the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya specifically referred to Article 94 (1) of the Charter, stating that "each Member of the United Nations undertakes to comply with the decision of the International Court of Justice in any case to which it is a party" in reference to the obligation of the United Kingdom and the United States to accept the Council's decisions and jurisdiction. The representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya also specifically referred to Article 94 (2) of the Charter stating that the Security Council could decide on a resolution adopting certain measures, as the Council could "make recommendations or decide upon measures to be taken to give effect to a judgment".⁸²

The representative of the United States, however, expressed the view that the Court's preliminary rulings in no way questioned the legality of the Security Council actions affecting the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya or the merits of the case against the two accused suspects. He claimed that contrary to the assertions of the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the Court was not calling for the review or suspension of Security Council resolutions. The Court had made clear that it was not dealing with the substance or the merits of the case.⁸³ The representative of the United Kingdom expressed the hope that OAU and LAS would not be used to undermine the Council's resolutions, and that their influence would eventually be used to bring about acceptance of international law and justice for the victims. He stated that an expert mission sent by the Secretary-General had concluded that the Scottish legal system was fair and independent, that the accused would receive a fair trial under the Scottish judicial system, and that their rights would be fully protected during all phases of the trial proceedings in accordance with international standards.⁸⁴

noted that the decision of the Court was a good basis for an agreement as to the conduct of a fair trial and for the suspension and early lifting of sanctions.⁸⁶ The representative of Pakistan specifically referred to Article 96 of the Charter, stating that when the United Nations itself was faced with a legal problem, either the General Assembly or the Security Council might also request an advisory opinion of the Court. This showed the significance that the authors of the Charter had attached to the Court in the arbitration of legal issues.⁸⁷

The representative of LAS stated that his organization, in cooperation with OAU and the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC), had submitted three options to the Security Council as a basis on which to solve the problem. Those proposals consisted of either a trial of the suspects in a neutral country or at the headquarters of the Court, or by a special penal court. It was his opinion that the Security Council should take into account the judgment of the highest judiciary authority of the United Nations because it gave a new legal dimension to the very nature of the dispute and indicated a way by which the Security Council could deal with it. He stated that the judgment of the Court had determined that the Lockerbie incident was indeed a legal dispute between the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and the United Kingdom and the United States that fell within the jurisdiction of the Court and that all the parties to the dispute should respect it and abide by it.⁸⁸ Speaking along the same line, other speakers called for the consideration of the proposals by OAU and LAS, according to which a trial could be held in a third and neutral country, or with the suspects tried by Scottish judges at the Court, or by a special tribunal at the headquarters of the Court.⁸⁹

At its 3875th meeting, on 24 April 1998, the Security Council met to discuss the situation in Africa, in connection with the report of the Secretary-General.⁹⁰ During the debate, the representative of Egypt noted that while affirming the need to respect the norms of international law and the resolutions of the Security Council, his Government expected the Council to give serious consideration to the options proposed by OAU and LAS for resolving this crisis in a way that would ensure justice.⁹¹ The representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya referred to the International Court of Justice as the seat of a possible tribunal and as a possible venue to resolve the dispute.⁹² The representative of the United Arab Emirates urged the Council to lift the sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya in light of the two decisions taken by the Court.⁹³

At its 3920th meeting, on 27 August 1998, the Council again considered the situation involving the alleged involvement of Libyan nationals in the destruction of two civilian aircraft. The representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya recalled that on 27 February 1998 the Court had issued a judgment against the United States and the United Kingdom, reasserting the jurisdiction of the Court over the case on the basis of the 1971 Montreal Convention arising from the aerial incident at Lockerbie, and rejecting the appeal put forward by the two other States contesting that jurisdiction.⁹⁴

Following the deliberations, the Council adopted resolution 1192 (1998) of 27 August 1998, by which it welcomed the initiative for the trial of the two persons charged with the bombing of Pan Am flight 103 before a Scottish court sitting in the Netherlands, as contained in the letter dated 24 August 1998 from the representatives of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and of the United States of America addressed to the Secretary-General⁹⁵ and the willingness of the Government of the Netherlands to cooperate in the implementation of the initiative. By the same resolution, the Council decided that all States should cooperate to that end, and in particular that the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya should ensure the appearance in the Netherlands of the two accused for the purpose of trial by the court, and that it should ensure that any evidence or witnesses in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya were, upon the request of the court, promptly made available at the court in the Netherlands for the purpose of the trial.

During the period under review, the Security Council was seized with the dispute between Cameroon and Nigeria concerning the peninsula of Bakassi. While no meeting of the Council itself addressed this issue, and no resolutions regarding this issue were adopted, the Security Council received several letters on the matter.

By a letter dated 22 February 1996 addressed to the President of the Council,⁹⁶ the representative of Cameroon recalled that in March 1994, his Government had referred this matter to the International Court of Justice. Annexed to his letter was a letter dated 28 January 1996 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Cameroon addressed to the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Nigeria, calling on the latter to heed “the voice of wisdom”, which counselled the withdrawal of troops from the Bakassi peninsula and the return of the civilian population displaced from the area, pending completion of the process of judicial settlement set in motion at the Court. Furthermore, the representative of Cameroon reaffirmed the willingness of his Government to work for the maintenance of peace in the Bakassi peninsula, while awaiting the judgment of the Court.

A statement by the Presidency on behalf of the European Union was also annexed to the letter, which expressed the hope that a peaceful solution would be found through the Court. The European Union called on the parties to the dispute to refrain from any military intervention, in conformity with international law and, in particular, with the Charter of the United Nations, and expressed the hope that a peaceful solution would be found to this conflict through its referral to the ICJ.

In response, by a letter dated 27 February 1996 addressed to the President of the Council,⁹⁷ the representative of Nigeria stated that the allegations of the Cameroonian authorities were unfounded. He claimed that they had embarked on a course of propaganda against Nigeria in order to bring “undue pressure” on its Government. He further stated that it would appear also that their tactics were aimed at forcing a decision on the peninsula question in their favour, regardless of ongoing peaceful negotiations and processes at the Court.

Subsequently, by identical letters dated 29 February 1996 addressed to the Presidents of Nigeria and Cameroon,⁹⁸ the President of the Council requested both parties to take the necessary measures to withdraw their forces to the positions they had occupied before the Court was informed of the dispute. In his letter, the President noted that the dispute had already been referred to the Court and the case was pending before it. He urged both nations to reach a peaceful settlement through the Court.

By a letter dated 11 March 1996 addressed to the President,⁹⁹ the representative of Cameroon reaffirmed the determination of his Government to make every effort to settle the dispute by peaceful means, specifically by recourse to the Court.

In a letter dated 15 April 1996 addressed to the President,¹⁰⁰ the representative of Cameroon expressed full support for the protective measures decided on by the Court, which included the return of the forces to the positions held prior to the submission of the case to the Court.

By a letter dated 24 May 1996 addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁰¹ the Secretary-General referred to a previous letter dated 29 February 1996¹⁰² by which the members of the Council had welcomed his proposal to send a fact-finding mission to the Bakassi peninsula. In that regard, the Secretary-General had dispatched his Special Envoy, Mr. Lakhdar Brahimi, to the region in order to consult with the Heads of State of the two countries concerned. He informed the Council of Mr. Brahimi having reported to him that according to the President of Cameroon, his country would abide by any decision reached by the Court and would welcome any action by the United Nations, including the dispatch of a fact-finding mission to the disputed area and to the region. The President of Cameroon also suggested that some United Nations military observers be stationed in the area to help prevent any renewed confrontation. On the part of Nigeria, Mr. Brahimi reported that the President, while indicating his preference for a bilateral solution to the dispute, recognized that a mission of the United Nations could help in this regard. The Secretary-General further stated that in a letter dated 12 May 1996 addressed to him, the President of Nigeria had indicated his awareness that the Court had urged the two countries to lend assistance to a United Nations mission to Bakassi and said that, in deference to that order, the Government of Nigeria accepted in principle the idea of such a mission.

By a letter dated 31 October 1996 addressed to the Secretary-General,¹⁰³ the President of the Council noted that its members were encouraged by the progress reported by the fact-finding mission, and fully supported the efforts of the Secretary-General to find ways to reduce the tension in the disputed area and to improve relations between Nigeria and Cameroon while the dispute was before the Court.

By a letter dated 16 December 1996 addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁰⁴ the representative of Cameroon transmitted a copy of a note verbale that was sent to the representative of Nigeria, which mentioned the pending dispute before the Court and the alleged violation of the Court's protective measures by Nigeria through electrification and water-supply projects.

In the same vein, by a letter dated 13 March 1998 addressed to the President,¹⁰⁵ the representative of Cameroon transmitted the text of the communiqué issued on 8 March 1998 by the Government of Cameroon in response to a statement made by the Nigerian authorities concerning the situation in the Bakassi peninsula. In the text, the representative of Cameroon emphasized that his Government had referred the case to the Court and had made its protests at the alleged manipulation of international public opinion by Nigeria.

In a letter dated 11 December 1998 addressed to the President,¹⁰⁶ the representative of Cameroon informed the Council that the Nigerian authorities had held municipal elections on 5 and 6 December 1998 in the occupied part of Cameroonian territory in the Bakassi peninsula. The representative asserted that Nigeria's action was in flagrant violation of international law, and, in particular, of the interim measures of protection ordered by the Court in The Hague on 16 March 1996.

Case 20

During the period under review, the Security Council was seized with the dispute between the Islamic Republic of Iran and the United Arab Emirates

By a letter dated 26 August 1996 addressed to the Secretary-General,¹⁰⁸ the representative of the United Arab Emirates reaffirmed its willingness to settle the question of the three islands through peaceful means, including recourse to the Court.

By a letter dated 19 September 1996 addressed to the Secretary-General,¹⁰⁹ the representative of Saudi Arabia transmitted a copy of resolution 5595 adopted by the Council of the League of Arab States at its 106th ordinary session. In the text, the Council called on the Islamic Republic of Iran to accept that the matter be referred to the Court.

By identical letters dated 2 January 1997 addressed to the Secretary-General and the President,¹¹⁰ the representative of the United Arab Emirates transmitted a note verbale dated 22 April 1996 addressed to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Islamic Republic of Iran reaffirming its commitment to pursuing all peaceful means, including recourse to the Court, with a view to resolving the dispute concerning the three islands.

concerning the three islands of Greater Tunb, Lesser Tunb and Abu Musa. While no meeting of the Council addressed this issue, and no resolutions regarding this issue were adopted, several letters were circulated as documents of the Security Council.

By letters dated 3 April 1996 and 4 June 1996 addressed to the Secretary-General,¹⁰⁷ the representative of Oman transmitted a press communiqué issued by the Ministerial Council of the Gulf Cooperation Council at its fifty-eighth session. In the text, the Ministerial Council reaffirmed its support and assistance to the United Arab Emirates, and called upon the Islamic Republic of Iran to agree to submit the dispute to the International Court of Justice.

By a letter dated 16 April 1997 addressed to the President of the Council,¹¹¹ the representative of Kuwait in his capacity as Chairman of the Group of Arab States transmitted resolution 5637 adopted at the 107th regular session of the Council of LAS calling on the Islamic Republic of Iran to agree to refer the case to the Court. This was reiterated in a letter dated 6 April 1999 from the Permanent Observer of the League of Arab States addressed to the President,¹¹² in which he called on the Government of the Islamic Republic of Iran to put an end to the occupation of the three islands and to refrain from building any infrastructure on the three islands with a view to changing their demographic structure, to dismantle the facilities installed unilaterally on the three islands and to resort to peaceful means in order to settle the dispute in accordance with the principles and rules of international law, inter alia, by bringing the matter before the Court.

particularly in relation to the peaceful settlement of disputes and peacekeeping. His functions in that regard continued to expand, as the activities of the Security Council continued to expand and diversify. (g) In relation to the situation in the Central African Republic, the Council welcomed, in resolution 1271 (1999), the proposal of the Secretary-General to dispatch a small multidisciplinary mission to Bangui in order to examine, in accordance with the wishes expressed by the Government of the Central African Republic, the conditions for the maintenance of the United Nations presence beyond 15 February 2000, and requested the Secretary-General to inform the Council as soon as possible with detailed proposals in that regard.

Good offices

The Secretary-General was often requested to exercise or continue to exercise his “good offices” function, that is, his independent political role in preventing or mediating conflicts between or within States, or his role in that regard was endorsed:

(a) In relation to the situation in Cyprus, the Council welcomed the report of the Secretary-General¹²⁵ on his mission of good offices in Cyprus, and stressed its support for the Secretary-General’s mission of good offices and the importance of the concerted efforts to work with the Secretary-General towards an overall comprehensive settlement;¹²⁶

Peacekeeping and implementation of peace agreements

The Secretary-General was also entrusted with a leading role in dispatching and directing a number of peacekeeping missions authorized by the Council. Concerning peacekeeping, in addition to carrying out responsibilities with regard to ongoing missions,¹⁴⁵ the Secretary-General took on additional functions in relation to fifteen new peacekeeping operations established during 1996-1999.¹⁴⁶ Most of the new missions were multifunctional, with political, humanitarian, social and human rights components. They were given the task of helping to regroup and demobilize combatants, destroy weapons, coordinate humanitarian assistance, monitor human rights and organize elections. The Secretary-General had the responsibility for the executive direction and command of these peacekeeping operations, for example, their establishment, deployment, withdrawal, the implementation of their mandates and the establishment of trust funds. Some of these missions, such as those in Haiti and Croatia, involved the interposition of civilian police for the restoration of order. Other peacekeeping operations with administrative responsibilities were UNMIK in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and UNTAET in East Timor.

Political and peacebuilding missions

During the period under review, the Secretary-General was given a leading role in dispatching and directing political and peacebuilding missions. Those missions were multifaceted peacebuilding and political operations, which assisted the parties in the implementation of complex peace agreements. They focused on the consolidation of peace; promoting reconciliation and the strengthening of democratic institutions; and support for local human rights initiatives. This was the case, for example, for the operations in Liberia (UNOL)¹⁴⁷ and Guinea-Bissau (UNOGBIS).¹⁴⁸

In other instances, the Secretary-General was entrusted the leading the role in the composition of a political office. In this regard, the Council authorized the establishment of the United Nations Office in

Support to international tribunals

During the period under review, the Secretary-General was mainly requested to make practical arrangements for the election of the judges to enhance the effective functioning of the International Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia and the International Tribunal for Rwanda, respectively.

By resolutions 1165 (1998) and 1166 (1998), the Council requested the Secretary-General to make practical arrangements for the elections of the judges to enhance the effective functioning of the Tribunals, including the timely provision of personnel and facilities, in particular for the third Trial Chamber and related offices of the Prosecutor, and further requested him to keep the Security Council closely informed of progress.¹⁵¹

Implementation of sanctions regimes

During the period under review, the Security Council established three sanctions regimes.¹⁵² In addition to providing all necessary assistance to the sanctions committees established to monitor implementation of the sanctions, the Secretary-General was also requested to reactivate the International Commission of Inquiry, in the case of Rwanda;¹⁵³ and to establish a group of experts, in the case of Iraq.¹⁵⁴

1132 (1997) concerning Sierra Leone; Committee established pursuant to resolution 1160 (1998) concerning Kosovo, Federal Republic of Yugoslavia; and Committee established pursuant to resolution 1267 (1999) concerning Al-Qaida and the Taliban. For further details, see chap. V.

Council to consider taking appropriate action.¹⁵⁵ In addition, the Secretary-General exercised the implicit rights conferred upon him under Article 99¹⁵⁶ by, for example, sending a mission to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia,¹⁵⁷ and by sending a good offices mission to the Great Lakes region to assist the Government of Zaire in addressing the political and security aspects of the problems in the eastern part of the country.¹⁵⁸

¹⁵⁵ Thus, for example, in connection with the situation in Burundi, by a letter dated 29 December 1999 addressed to the President of the Security Council (S/1999/1296), the Secretary-General stated that the designation of former President Nelson Mandela as the new facilitator was expected to reinvigorate the peace process. In view of this, it was desirable to raise the profile of the United Nations within the overall efforts of the international community to address the deteriorating political and humanitarian situation in Burundi. He had, accordingly, decided to appoint Mr. Berhanu Dinka as his Special Representative for the Great Lakes region, at the Assistant Secretary-General level.

¹⁵⁶ The Repertory of Practice of United Nations Organs states in its Supplement No. 8 (1989-1994), volume VI, under Article 99, that “the implicit powers of the Secretary-General in the spirit of Article 99 have been more liberally construed to include the right to initiate fact-finding missions, investigative commissions and the offer of good-offices or mediation”. See also report of the Secretary-General dated 17 June 1992 entitled “An Agenda for Peace” (S/24111, paras. 23-27) and the statement by the President of the Security Council of 30 November 1992 (S/24872).

¹⁵⁷ In the preambular part of resolution 1203 (1998), the Security Council welcomed the decision of the Secretary-General to send a mission to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to establish a first-hand capacity to assess developments on the ground in Kosovo.

Part VI

Relations with the Military Staff Committee

The Military Staff Committee, established pursuant to Article 47 of the Charter, is composed of the Chiefs of Staff of the permanent members or their representatives. Its function is “to advise and assist the Security Council on all questions relating to the Security Council’s military requirements for the maintenance of international peace and security, the employment and command of forces at its disposal, the regulation of armaments, and possible disarmament”.¹⁵⁹

During the period under review, no reference was made to the Military Staff Committee in any of the discussions or decisions of the Council.

Introductory note

The present chapter considers the practice of the Security Council in its recommendations to the General Assembly concerning applications for membership in the United Nations.

Part I sets forth the applications for admission considered and the decisions taken thereon by the Security Council and the General Assembly during the period under review. A comprehensive table, contained in section C, shows the chain of proceedings from the submission of the applications to the decisions taken thereon by the General Assembly.

Parts II to IV concern the procedures employed by the Council in the consideration of the applications. The parts entitled “Consideration of the adoption or amendment of rules 58 to 60 of the provisional rules of procedure” and “Roles of the General Assembly and the Security Council” have been deleted in the present Supplement as no material was found for inclusion therein. The part entitled “Practices relating to the applicability of Articles 4, 5 and 6 of the Charter” has been replaced by part V, “Practices relating to the applicability of Article 4 of the Charter”.

During the period under review, the Council recommended the admission of three States to membership in the United Nations.

In the case of the application¹ of Nauru, a statement made by one Council member touched on the interpretation of Article 4 (1) of the Charter which sets out the criteria for membership in the United Nations (see case study in part V).

Section A (Applications recommended by the Security Council), Section B (Discussion of the question in the Security Council), section C (Applications submitted and action taken thereon by the Security Council and the General Assembly from 1 January 1996 to 31 December 1999) and section D (Applications pending at the end of the period under review) have been maintained from previous Supplements. However, the sections entitled “Applications that failed to obtain a recommendation” and “Applications pending on 1 January 1996” have been deleted in the present Supplement as no material was found for inclusion therein.

A. Applications recommended by the Security Council

During the period from 1 January 1996 to 31 December 1999, the Council recommended the following States for admission to membership in the United Nations:

Kiribati

Nauru

Tonga

B. Discussion of the question in the Security Council

The Council held six meetings² to consider applications for admission during the four-year period from 1996 to 1999. At one of those meetings³ a statement was made concerning the admission of Nauru to membership in the United Nations (see case study in part V).

Part II Presentation of applications

Material concerning the presentation of applications — that is, the submission of applications to the Secretary-General, their immediate communication to representatives on the Security Council pursuant to rule 59 and their subsequent inclusion in the provisional agenda of the Council — may be found in the table of applications in section C of part I.

Part III Referral of applications to the Committee on the Admission of New Members

During the period under review, all applications were referred by the President of the Security Council to the Committee on the Admission of New Members. There were no proposals to waive the application of rule 59 of the provisional rules of procedure.⁴ In each instance, upon the recommendation of the Committee on the Admission of New Members, the Council waived the time limits set forth in paragraph 4 of rule 60, in accordance with paragraph 5 of that same rule⁵ in order to present its recommendations to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session. All the applications were, however, considered by the General Assembly at its fifty-fourth session.

Part IV Procedures in the consideration of applications within the Security Council

During the period under review, the Council observed the practice of deciding upon applications in the chronological order of their receipt. The Council decided upon all applications separately. In all but one instance, the Council adopted the draft

⁴ Rule 59 provides, inter alia, that “unless the Security Council decides otherwise, the application shall be referred by the President to a committee of the Security Council upon which each member of the Security Council shall be represented”.

⁵ The fourth and fifth paragraphs of rule 60 read as follows:

“In order to ensure the consideration of its recommendation at the next session of the General Assembly following the receipt of an application, the Security Council shall make its recommendation not less than twenty-five days in advance of a regular session of the General Assembly, nor less than four days in advance of a special session.

“In special circumstances, the Security Council may decide to make a recommendation to the General Assembly concerning an application for membership subsequent to the expiration of the time limits set forth in the preceding paragraph.”

resolutions submitted by the Committee on the Admission of New Members without debate and without a vote, “in accordance with the understanding reached in prior consultations among members of the Council”. Following the adoption of the resolution, the President of the Council made a statement on behalf of the members of the Council. In the case of Nauru, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted by 14 votes to none, with one abstention (China). Prior to the vote, the representative of China made a statement.⁶

Part V

Practices relating to the applicability of Article 4 of the Charter

Note

During the consideration of the admission of Nauru to membership, a statement of position was made by one Council member which touched on the interpretation of Article 4 (1) of the Charter.⁷

Case

Admission of Nauru

By a letter dated 16 April 1999 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁸ Nauru submitted an application for admission to membership in the United Nations. The Secretary-General circulated that request in a note dated 26 April 1999.⁹

The Security Council considered the application at its 3996th meeting, held on 4 May 1999, and referred the application, in accordance with rule 59, to the Committee on the Admission of New Members. The Committee, in paragraph 4 of its report, dated 25 June 1999,¹⁰ recommended to the Council the adoption of a draft resolution on the application of Nauru for admission to membership in the United Nations. Paragraph 5 of the same report stated that China was unable to associate itself with the recommendation of the Committee and that it would expound its position at the formal meeting of the Security Council.

At its 4017th meeting, held on 25 June 1999,¹¹ the Security Council considered the report of the Committee concerning the admission of Nauru and decided to proceed to the vote¹² on the draft resolution contained in paragraph 4 of the report. Speaking before the vote, the representative of China stated that his delegation attached importance to the desire of Nauru to be admitted to membership in the United Nations and had carried out serious study with regard to its application. In considering Nauru’s admission, he believed it most essential that the purposes and principles of the Charter should be fully complied with, that General Assembly resolution 2758

(XXVI) of 1971¹³ should be implemented and that the new Member should fulfil its Charter obligations and comply with General Assembly resolutions. It was on that basis that China was unable to support the recommendation by the Council to the General Assembly concerning the admission of Nauru to the membership of the United Nations. At the same time, considering the long-term interests of the peoples of China and Nauru, and given the request of the South Pacific countries, China would not block the recommendation. The representative of China expressed the hope that following its admission to membership of the United Nations, Nauru would strictly comply with resolutions of the General Assembly, including Assembly resolution 2758 (XXVI). China abstained from the ensuing vote.

Nauru was admitted to membership in the United Nations on 14 September 1999 pursuant to the recommendation of the Security Council¹⁴ and the decision of the General Assembly.¹⁵

¹³ By resolution 2758 (XXVI) of 25 October 1971, the General Assembly decided “to restore its rights to the People’s Republic of China and to recognize the representatives of its Government as the only legitimate representatives of China to the United Nations, and to expel forthwith the representatives of Chiang Kai-shek from the place which they unlawfully occup[ied] at the United Nations and in all the organizations related to it”.

Introductory note

Chapter VIII focuses on the substance of each of the questions included in the agenda of the Security Council that relate to its responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security. By examining the entire sequence of proceedings, it provides an overall sense of their political context.¹ The range of questions covers broadly those that may be deemed to fall under Chapters VI and VII of the Charter, constituting a framework within which to consider the ancillary legal and constitutional discussion recorded in chapters X to XII of the Repertoire.

The questions are dealt with by region, for ease of reference. There is also a category of thematic issues.

Each section is organized around the decisions taken by the Council on each agenda item. Procedural decisions related to the subject matter of chapters I to VII of the Repertoire are, with certain exceptions, omitted as not relevant to the purpose of this chapter. For instance, information on invitations to participate in the discussion and on rules 37 and 39 of the provisional rules of procedure is provided in chapter III.

Summaries of the statements made in the Council and of the documents considered by the Council during its deliberations have been included to provide a better understanding of the basis of decisions. Affirmative decisions have been reproduced in full, while negative decisions are indicated in summarized form.

¹ The Repertoire of the Practice of the Security Council covers formal meetings and documents of the Security Council. Some of the questions considered in this chapter may also have been discussed in informal consultations among the members of the Council.

Africa

1. The situation concerning Western Sahara

Decision of 31 January 1996 (3625th meeting): resolution 1042 (1996)

At its 3625th meeting, on 31 January 1996, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General dated 19 January 1996 on the situation concerning Western Sahara, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1033 (1995), setting out the findings and conclusion of the Special Envoy, the work of the Identification Commission and other activities relevant to the settlement plan.¹

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that his Special Envoy's mission had resulted in the agreement of the Frente Polisario to participate in the identification of a significant number of applicants about whom they had previously expressed reservations, but that they continued to refuse to cooperate with the identification of another large group of applicants. Morocco continued to maintain that all applicants be processed without discrimination as to the format or treatment by the Identification Commission, a position with which the Special Envoy concurred. If both parties were to cooperate fully with the Commission, a period from six months to one year would be required to complete the identification process. He noted the strong support by the two observer countries during the Special Envoy's visit to their capitals, and he stated that the Security Council might want to consider ways of assisting the parties if they agreed to hold talks to facilitate a settlement of their conflict. He informed the Council that there were other aspects of the settlement plan that needed to be addressed, including a vision of the post-referendum period, code of conduct, confinement of troops and the exchange of prisoners of war. He gave two options for extending the mandate of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara (MINURSO). The first was a simple extension until 31 May 1996, which would give enough time for resumption of the identification process and to test the political will of the parties. The second option would be plans for a phased withdrawal, in order to impose conditions in terms of solutions to outstanding problems by specified dates. The Secretary-General, however, shared the concern of the Special Envoy that the phasing down of MINURSO could have destabilizing consequences for the region.

At the same meeting the President (United Kingdom) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.² The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1042 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming all its previous resolutions on the question of Western Sahara,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 19 January 1996,

Welcoming in this context the visit to the region by the Special Envoy of the Secretary-General from 2 to 9 January 1996,

Noting the views expressed by the Government of Morocco as set out in the report of the Secretary-General,

Noting also the views expressed by the Frente Popular para la Liberación de Saguía el-Hamra y de Río de Oro as set out in the report of the Secretary-General,

Reconfirming its commitment to assist the parties in achieving a just and lasting solution to the question of Western Sahara,

Decision of 29 May 1996 (3668th meeting):
resolution 1056 (1996)

At its 3625th meeting, held on 31 January 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General dated 8 May 1996 on the situation concerning Western Sahara pursuant to Security Council resolution 1042 (1996), setting out the efforts made to implement the settlement plan and the difficulties encountered.³

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that as a result of the positions of the parties, all efforts to continue the identification of voters had been frustrated. Despite the professed commitment of the Government of Morocco and the Frente Polisario to the settlement plan, the impasse continued. As a result, he had concluded that the required willingness to give MINURSO the cooperation it needed to complete the identification process within a reasonable time did not exist, and he recommended suspending it until such time as both parties provided convincing evidence that they were committed to completing it without further obstacles. The suspension of identification entailed the withdrawal of the Commission's members and the civilian police component, except for a small number of officers. Although the cease-fire had been a major achievement of MINURSO and the countries in the region felt that its withdrawal could result in instability, he proposed a reduction in the military component of MINURSO by 20 per cent. This would not reduce the number of team sites in the field, curtail patrolling activity, or interrupt the daily contacts with the military forces of each side. He maintained that those changes did not imply any lessening of resolve to discharge the mandate to see peace maintained and for the people of Western Sahara to decide on their future status in a way that would bring lasting stability. He then proposed maintaining a political office, headed by his Acting Special Representative and staffed by a small number of political officers. He expressed his hope that through a continuing political presence some humanitarian issues, such as the release of Saharan political prisoners, could be resolved without waiting for other aspects of the plan. He concluded by noting that while current conditions did not exist for the ultimate objective of the settlement plan he was conscious of the necessity to keep searching for solutions and to build upon the existing achievements. He urged Member States that were in a position to help to continue to exert their influence to facilitate the process and recommended the extension of the mandate of MINURSO, at a reduced strength, for a period of six months.

At the same meeting the President (China) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁴

The President further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 10 May 1996 from the representative of Morocco transmitting a memorandum on the delays caused by the Frente Polisario in the identification process;⁵ a letter dated 22 May 1996 from the representatives of Namibia and the United Republic of Tanzania, transmitting a memorandum by the Frente Polisario on Moroccan obstruction of the identification process;⁶ and a letter dated 24 May 1996 from the representative of Ethiopia, transmitting a joint statement with the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity (OAU), urging the United Nations to continue efforts to implement the settlement plan with renewed commitment.⁷

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1056 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming all its previous resolutions on the question of Western Sahara,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 8 May 1996,

Noting the views expressed by the Government of Morocco as set out in the report of the Secretary-General and in the memorandum transmitted by the letter addressed to the Secretary-General dated 10 May 1996,

Noting also the views expressed by the Frente Popular para la Liberación de Saguía el-Hamra y de Río de Oro as set out in the report of the Secretary-General and in the memorandum transmitted by the letter addressed to the Secretary-General dated 22 May 1996,

Taking note of the letter dated 23 May 1996 from the current Chairman and the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity and the President of the Security Council,

Reaffirming its commitment to assist the parties in achieving a just and lasting solution to the question of Western Sahara,

Stressing the importance it attaches to the maintenance of the ceasefire, as an integral part of the settlement plan,

Recognizing that, despite all the difficulties, the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara has to date identified more than 60,000 persons,

Reiterating that, for progress to be achieved, the two parties must have a vision of the post-referendum period,

1. Reiterates its commitment to the holding, as soon as possible, of a free, fair and impartial referendum for the self-determination of the people of Western Sahara in accordance with the settlement plan which has been accepted by the two parties referred to above;

2. Deeply regrets the fact that the required willingness does not exist to give the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara the cooperation needed for it to resume and complete the identification process, and that there has therefore been no significant progress towards implementation of the settlement plan;

3. Agrees with the recommendation of the Secretary-General that the identification process should be suspended until such time as both parties provide concrete and convincing evidence that they are committed to resuming and completing it without further obstacles, in accordance with the settlement plan;

4. Supports the proposal of the Secretary-General to reduce the strength of the military component of the Mission by 20 per cent, on the understanding that this will not impair its operational effectiveness in monitoring the ceasefire;

5. Endorses the view of the Secretary-General that the decision to suspend temporarily the work of the Identification Commission and to reduce the number of civilian police and military personnel does not imply any lessening of resolve to secure the implementation of the settlement plan;

6. Supports the proposal of the Secretary-General, in the context of the settlement plan, to maintain a political office to continue the dialogue with the parties and the two neighbouring countries and to facilitate any other effort that could help set the parties on a course towards an agreed formula for the resolution of their differences, and encourages the Secretary-General to consider ways of strengthening the role of this office;

7. Urges the two parties to demonstrate without further delay the political will, cooperation and flexibility necessary to permit the resumption and early completion of the identification process and the implementation of the settlement plan, notes with satisfaction that the parties have respected the ceasefire, which is an integral part of the settlement plan, and calls upon them to continue to do so;

8. Calls upon the parties, as a demonstration of goodwill, to cooperate with the United Nations in the implementation of certain aspects of the settlement plan, such as the release of Saharan political prisoners and the exchange of prisoners of war on humanitarian grounds, as soon as possible, to accelerate implementation of the settlement plan in its entirety;

9. Encourages the parties to consider additional ways to create confidence between themselves in order to remove obstacles to the implementation of the settlement plan;

10. Decides to extend the mandate of the Mission, on the basis proposed by the Secretary-General in his report of 8 May 1996, until 30 November 1996;

11. Reminds the parties that if significant progress is not achieved during this period, the Council will have to consider other measures, including possible further reductions in the strength of the Mission, but stresses its readiness to support the resumption of the identification process as soon as the parties have demonstrated the necessary political will, cooperation and flexibility, as called for in paragraph 7 above;

12. Requests the Secretary-General to continue his efforts with the parties to break the impasse blocking the implementation of the settlement plan and to submit to the Council by 31 August 1996 a report on the outcome of his efforts;

13. Also requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council closely informed of all significant developments, including their humanitarian aspects, and to submit a comprehensive report on the implementation of the present resolution by 10 November 1996;

14. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 27 November 1996 (3718th meeting): resolution 1084 (1996)

At its 3718th meeting, on 27 November 1996, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General dated 5 November 1996 on the situation concerning Western Sahara, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1056 (1996).⁸

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the reductions in the civilian and military staff had been effected. He stated that those measures had brought the cost of the mission down by approximately 40 per cent and that he would continue to keep the size of the mission under active review to ensure maximum efficiency. He welcomed the release of prisoners of war by the Government of Morocco and noted that cooperation with the Independent Jurist would also be a confidence building step. He urged the parties to contribute to further positive measures towards a lasting settlement and to continue cooperating with the Acting Special Representative on the implementation of the settlement plan. Finally, he recommended that the Security Council extend the mandate of MINURSO for a further period of six months, until 31 May 1997, while noting that the international community could not be expected to support the extension of the mandate indefinitely in the absence of tangible process towards the settlement of the question of Western Sahara.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 25 November 1996 from the representative of Morocco calling the attention of the Security Council to the serious discrepancies noted from a reading of the draft resolution currently being prepared on Western Sahara in connection with the settlement plan.⁹

At the same meeting the President (Indonesia) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,¹⁰ which was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1084 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Stressing the importance it attaches to the maintenance of the ceasefire, as an integral part of the settlement plan,

Stressing also the importance and usefulness of the resumption of exploratory talks between the parties, without prejudice to their respective positions, in order to create an atmosphere of mutual confidence conducive to a speedy and effective implementation of the settlement plan,

Reiterating that, for progress to be achieved, the parties must have a vision of the post-referendum period,

Noting the completion by the Secretary-General of reductions in the various components of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara,

2. Supports the activities of the Acting Special Representative of the Secretary-General in continuing the dialogue with the parties and the two neighbouring countries and in facilitating, in the context of the settlement plan, other efforts to set the parties on a course towards an agreed formula for the resolution of their differences, and requests that those activities be accelerated and that the parties continue to cooperate with the Acting Special Representative;

3. Notes the beneficial effect of demonstrations of goodwill and of all contacts aimed at achieving the implementation of the settlement plan;

4. Welcomes the steps taken by the parties to demonstrate goodwill, including the release of prisoners, and the recent indications that the parties are moving forward in their efforts to resolve outstanding questions concerning the implementation of the settlement plan, and encourages them to pursue these efforts so as to build confidence between themselves and to facilitate the implementation of the settlement plan;

5. Welcomes also the ongoing activities of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and the cooperation afforded to it by the parties, and encourages the Office of the High Commissioner to pursue its humanitarian work and assistance in accordance with its mandate and the settlement plan;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to continue his efforts with the parties to break the impasse blocking the implementation of the settlement plan and to submit to the Council by 28 February 1997 an interim report on the outcome of his efforts;

8. Also requests that in his next report the Secretary-General propose alternative steps, in the framework of the settlement plan, should there be no meaningful progress towards removing the obstacles to the implementation of the plan;

9. Further requests the Secretary-General to continue to keep the staffing size and configuration of the various components of the Mission under active review in order to ensure maximum efficiency and effectiveness, and to include in his next report ways to achieve this aim;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council closely informed of all significant developments, including their humanitarian aspects, and to submit a comprehensive report on the implementation of the present resolution by 9 May 1997;

11. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 19 March 1997 (3754th meeting): statement by the President

At its 3754th meeting, held on 19 March 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General dated 27 February 1997 on the situation concerning Western Sahara, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1084 (1996).¹¹

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that MINURSO could take credit for the fact that the ceasefire in Western Sahara had held since 1991, that work had been initiated on the identification process and that they had contributed to facilitating contact between the parties. However, unless the parties both committed themselves fully to the settlement plan, the continuing presence of MINURSO would be questioned. He had therefore been reviewing the following questions: could the settlement plan be implemented in its present form, if not were there adjustments to the settlement plan which would make it acceptable; and if not, were there other ways by which the international community could help the parties resolve the conflict? He hoped to examine those questions before the mandate of MINURSO ran out. He informed the Council that he was considering further reductions in the staffing of MINURSO and would keep the situation under active review. He concluded by noting that the international community could not compel the parties to cooperate in implementing the settlement plan and that without such cooperation it would be increasingly hard to justify the expenditures beyond the expiry of the present mandate.

At the same meeting the President (Poland) drew the attention of the Council to letters from the representative of Morocco addressed to the President of the Security Council, the first dated 10 March 1997, conveying the comments and concerns of Morocco with regard to the report of the Secretary-General,¹² and the second dated 19 March 1997 transmitting a letter dated 11 March 1997 from the Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs and Cooperation of Morocco, welcoming the appointment of James Baker as the Secretary-General's personal envoy.¹³

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁴

The Security Council welcomes the interim report of the Secretary-General of 27 February 1997 on the situation concerning Western Sahara. It is disappointed at the lack of progress on the implementation of the plan for the settlement of the question of Western Sahara, noted in the report. It concurs with the Secretary-General's assessment that it is essential to maintain the ceasefire, a breach of which could seriously threaten regional stability, and that it is also essential to move the process forward. It believes that the presence of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara has been essential in helping the parties to maintain their commitment to the ceasefire. It looks forward to receiving the Secretary-General's assessment of the future tasks and configuration of MINURSO.

The Security Council expresses its strong support for the efforts of the Secretary-General to overcome the current stalemate in implementing the settlement plan. In this context, it welcomes the appointment by the Secretary-General of a Personal Envoy to the region and urges the parties to cooperate fully with him.

At the 3779th meeting of the Security Council, held on 22 May 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Republic of Korea), drew the attention of the Council to the report of the Secretary-General dated 15 January 1998 on the situation concerning Western Sahara pursuant to Security Council resolution 1084 (1996).¹⁵

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that his personal envoy, during his exploratory consultations with the parties, had stressed that he had come to discuss with all concerned a way of breaking the current stalemate. His personal envoy would return to the region in June and would then report on his findings and recommendations. The Secretary-General stated that at that time he would be in a position to submit a comprehensive report on all aspects of the Western Sahara issue. The Secretary-General thus recommended that the mandate of MINURSO be extended by four months, until 30 September 1997. Noting that the international community would not support MINURSO indefinitely without tangible signs of progress, he urged the parties to cooperate fully with his personal envoy to bring about a fair and lasting solution to the situation.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,¹⁶ which was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1108 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming all its previous resolutions on the question of Western Sahara,

Recalling the statement by the President of the Security Council of 19 March 1997 on the situation concerning Western Sahara and the designation of a Personal Envoy of the Secretary-General to the region,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 5 May 1997, and welcoming in particular the intention of the Secretary-General to evaluate the situation in the light of the findings and recommendations to be provided by his Personal Envoy,

1. Reiterates its commitment to the: holding, without further delay, of a free, fair and impartial referendum for the self-determination of the people of Western Sahara in accordance with the settlement plan which has been accepted by the parties;

2. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara until 30 September 1997;

3. Urges the parties to continue to cooperate with the Personal Envoy of the Secretary-General in his mission as outlined by the Secretary-General, and to demonstrate the political will to overcome the persisting stalemate and find an acceptable solution;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Security Council informed of progress in the situation and to submit to the Council, by 15 September 1997, a comprehensive report on the results of his evaluation of all aspects of the Western Sahara issue;

5. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 29 September 1997 (3821st meeting): resolution 1131 (1997)

At its 3821st meeting held on 29 September 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General dated 24 September 1997 on the situation concerning Western Sahara pursuant to Security Council resolution 1108 (1997).¹⁷

The Secretary-General observed that his Personal Envoy had concluded that neither party wished to pursue any option other than the current settlement plan and stated that he had implemented direct talks under the auspices of the United Nations towards that end. During those talks, the parties agreed to bridging proposals on outstanding issues related to the identification of prospective voters in the referendum, to the preparatory work of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) for the repatriation of Saharan refugees, and to the code governing the conduct of the parties during the referendum campaign. A compromise agreement with the two observer countries, Mauritius and Algeria, on the outstanding question of Frente Polisario troop confinement was also reached. The parties also agreed to a set of practical measures for the resumption of the identification process and to a declaration related to the authority of the United Nations during the transitional period. The Secretary-General recommended that the identification process and implementation of the settlement plan be resumed and that MINURSO be provided with the resources to do so on an urgent basis. The mandate of MINURSO needed to be extended for three weeks and thereafter for 6 months until 20 April 1998. If the recommendations were accepted, he stated that he intended to dispatch a technical team to the Mission area during the first half of October 1997, to reassess the resource requirements for the deployment of MINURSO at full strength, and that he expected to revert to the Council in November with a comprehensive report, including a detailed plan, timetable and financial implication for the holding of the referendum of self-determination.

At the same meeting the President (United States) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁸ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1131 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous resolutions on the question of Western Sahara,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 24 September 1997, and the agreements reached between the parties recorded in that report,

Expressing its satisfaction at the extent to which the parties cooperated with the Personal Envoy of the Secretary-General, and urging the parties to continue this cooperation by fully implementing the said agreements and the settlement plan,

Reiterating its commitment to the holding, without further delay, of a free, fair and impartial referendum for the self-determination of the people of Western Sahara in accordance with the settlement plan,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara until 20 October 1997, in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary-General contained in his report;

2. Welcomes the other recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-General, and expresses its readiness to consider further action in accordance with those recommendations;

3. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 20 October 1997 (3825th meeting):
resolution 1133 (1997)

At the 3825th meeting of the Security Council, held on 20 October 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Chile) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁹ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1133 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous resolutions on the question of Western Sahara and, in particular, its resolution 1131 (1997) of 29 September 1997,

Reaffirming its welcome for the report of the Secretary-General of 24 September 1997 and the agreements reached between the parties for the implementation of the settlement plan, recorded in that report,

Reaffirming its commitment to assist the parties in achieving a just and lasting solution to the question of Western Sahara,

Reiterating its commitment to the holding without further delay of a free, fair and impartial referendum for the self-determination of the people of Western Sahara in accordance with the settlement plan, which has been accepted by the two parties,

Reiterating its satisfaction at the extent to which the parties cooperated with the Personal Envoy of the Secretary-General,

1. Calls upon the parties to continue their constructive cooperation with the United Nations by fully implementing the settlement plan and the agreements which they have reached for its implementation;

2. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara until 20 April 1998, in order that the Mission may proceed with its identification tasks, and to increase its size in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary-General contained in his report;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to begin the identification of eligible voters in accordance with the settlement plan and the agreements reached between the parties with the aim of finishing the process by 31 May 1998;

4. Also requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Council, no later than 15 November 1997, a comprehensive report, including a detailed plan, a timetable and financial implications, for the holding of the referendum for the self-determination of the people of Western Sahara in accordance with the settlement plan and the agreements reached between the parties for its implementation;

5. Further requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council every 60 days from the date of extension of the mandate of the Mission on the progress of the implementation of the settlement plan and the agreements reached between the parties, and to keep the Council regularly informed of all significant developments in the interim period;

6. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 26 January 1998 (3849th meeting):
resolution 1148 (1998)

At its 3849th meeting, held on 26 January 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General dated 15 January 1998 on the situation concerning Western Sahara, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1133 (1997).²⁰

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that despite the promising progress made since the resumption of the identification process, its completion by 31 May 1998 would be a daunting task. Until the number of non-convoked people presenting themselves was known it would not be possible to confirm that the process could be concluded by that date to allow the start of the transitional period on 7 June 1998 as planned. However, he maintained that every effort would be made to adhere as strictly as possible to the timetable. Beyond the continued cooperation of the parties, this required the provision of necessary resources in full and on time, including the early deployment of engineering and other resources to undertake the required operational demining and to prepare for the deployment of the military component of the Mission. He appealed to the Council and the General Assembly to extend all necessary support in that regard, so that the overall objective of holding the referendum by the end of 1998 might still be maintained.

At the same meeting the President (France) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.²¹ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1148 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous resolutions on the question of Western Sahara, in particular resolution 1133 (1997) of 20 October 1997 in which it decided to extend the mandate of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara until 20 April 1998 and to increase its size in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary-General contained in his report of 24 September 1997,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 13 November 1997, which contains a detailed plan, a timetable and financial implications for the increase in the strength of the Mission,

Welcoming the letter dated 12 December 1997 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council, which, inter alia, records the resumption of the identification of eligible voters in accordance with the settlement plan and the agreements reached between the parties for its implementation, and the report of the Secretary-General of 15 January 1998 which, inter alia, records progress made since the resumption of the identification process,

Welcoming also the appointment of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Western Sahara,

1. Approves the deployment of the engineering unit required for demining activities and of the additional administrative staff required to support the deployment of military personnel as proposed in annex II to the report of the Secretary-General;

2. Expresses its intention to consider positively the request for the remaining additional military and civilian police assets for the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara as proposed in annex II to the report of the Secretary-General, as soon as the Secretary-General reports that the identification process has reached a stage which makes the deployment of these assets essential;

3. Calls upon both parties to cooperate with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and to cooperate further with the Identification Commission established pursuant to the settlement plan in order that the identification process can be completed in a timely fashion in accordance with the settlement plan and the agreements reached between the parties for its implementation;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council fully informed of further developments in the implementation of the settlement plan;

5. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 17 April 1998 (3873rd meeting):
resolution 1163 (1998)

At its 3873rd meeting, held on 17 April 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General dated 13 April 1998 on the situation concerning Western Sahara pursuant to Security Council resolution 1133 (1997) requesting him to submit a report every 60 days on the progress made in the implementation plan.²²

²⁰ S/1998/35.

²² S/1998/316.

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that considering the slowdown in identification activities, the lack of progress in resolving issues linked to the identification of applicants from the “contested” tribal groups and the climate of mutual mistrust among the parties, the target date of 31 May 1998 was unlikely to be achieved. He expressed his concern that tensions could increase as completion of the identification process approached. He also expressed his concern over the continuing propaganda against MINURSO in the Moroccan press and called for its halt. He stated that, providing both parties cooperate fully, it should be possible to complete the identification of the “non-contested” tribes by the end of July 1998, but the time required for the entire process could not be specified. He stated that, notwithstanding delays in the transition period and the repatriation of Saharan refugees, it was important that the United Nations mine clearance activities start as soon as possible, as decided by the Security Council in resolution 1148 (1998). He urged both Morocco and the Frente Polisario to cooperate fully with his Special Representative and the Identification Commission so that the process could move forward, and with UNHCR and its preparatory work for the repatriation of refugees. The cooperation of Morocco, as well as that of Algeria and Mauritania, was also required so that the draft status of forces agreements could be approved in good time. In conclusion, he stated that if sufficient progress had been made by the end of June he would submit recommendations for a revised timetable for the full implementation of the settlement plan, including preparatory measures for the establishment of the Referendum Commission. If, on the other hand, no solutions had been found, it was his intention to recommend that the Security Council reconsider the viability of the mandate of MINURSO. In the meantime, he recommended that the mandate of MINURSO be extended for a period of three months, until 20 July 1998.

At the same meeting the President (Japan) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council’s prior consultations.²³ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1163 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous resolutions on the question of Western Sahara,

Reaffirming its full support for the Secretary-General, his Personal Envoy, his Special Representative and the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara in the implementation of the settlement plan and the agreements reached by the two parties for its implementation, and recalling that under these agreements the responsibility for implementing the identification process lies with the Identification Commission,

Decision of 20 July 1998 (3910th meeting):

At its 3910th meeting, held on 20 July 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General dated 10 July 1998 on the situation concerning Western Sahara, submitted pursuant to Security Council resolution 1163 (1998).²⁴

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that MINURSO was on track to finish the identification of all applicants from non-disputed tribes and both sides were cooperating in moving the process forward. He informed the Council that the Moroccan authorities had expressed their readiness to cooperate with UNHCR and that status-of-forces agreements had been received from Algeria and Mauritania and he hoped that they would be signed shortly. He expected that the Moroccan authorities would provide an early positive response. He noted that the restrictions imposed by Morocco limiting the use of MINURSO aircraft exclusively to MINURSO personnel were not in line with the practice of United Nations peacekeeping operations, and could have a negative public relations impact on the peace process in Western Sahara and could reduce the availability to Security Council members and troop- and police-contributing nations of useful information related to the Mission. He noted that differences between the parties on how to proceed with the identification of members of “contested” tribal groupings (H41, H61 and J51/52) remained substantial and neither party had provided practical suggestions for reconciliation. In the light of the progress made in identifying applicants from the other groupings he recommended that the mandate of MINURSO be extended for two months until 21 September 1998 and he would submit his report by 15 September 1998. At that time, if it appeared that there was still a possibility that the settlement plan could be implemented he would submit a revised timetable along with the report. If it appeared that the settlement plan was no longer viable, he would include recommendations on the continuing viability of the mandate of MINURSO.

At the same meeting the President (Russian Federation) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council’s prior consultations.²⁵ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted as resolution 1185 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reiterating also its commitment to the holding without further delay of a free, fair and impartial referendum for the self-determination of the people of Western Sahara in accordance with the settlement plan, which has been accepted by the two parties,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 10 July 1998, and supporting the observations and recommendations contained therein,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara until 21 September 1998, in order that the Mission may proceed with its identification tasks, with the aim of completing the process;

2. Welcomes, in line with the report of the Secretary-General, engagement by his Personal Envoy with the parties to seek a solution to those issues bearing upon implementation of the settlement plan;

3. Calls upon the parties to cooperate constructively with the United Nations, the Personal Envoy of the Secretary-General, the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and the Identification Commission established pursuant to the settlement plan in order to complete the identification-of-voters phase of the settlement plan and the agreements reached for its implementation;

formalize the presence of the Office of the High Commissioner in Western Sahara, according to the settlement plan;

5. Notes the continuing deployment of the engineering unit required for demining activities and of the administrative staff required to support the deployment of military personnel as proposed in annex II to the report of the Secretary-General of 13 November 1997, as further described in the recommendations of the report of the Secretary-General of 13 April 1998;

7. Calls for a prompt conclusion of status-of-forces agreements with the Secretary-General which would greatly facilitate the full and timely deployment of the Mission-formed military units, in particular the deployment of the military engineering support and demining units, and in this context notes progress that has been made, and recalls that pending the conclusion of such agreements, the model status-of-forces agreement dated 9 October 1990, as provided for in General Assembly resolution 52/12 B of 19 December 1997, should apply provisionally;

8. Calls for the lifting of any restrictions imposed on the Mission aircraft, or on passengers whose travel the Mission determines to be of assistance to the fulfilment of the mandate, in line with the practice of United Nations peacekeeping operations, and notes that discussions are being held to this end;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council every thirty days from the date of extension of the mandate of the Mission on the progress of the implementation of the settlement plan and the agreements reached between the parties, and to keep the Council regularly informed of all significant developments in the interim period, and, as appropriate, on the continuing viability of the mandate of the Mission;

10. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 18 September 1998 (3929th meeting): resolution 1198 (1998)

At its 3939th meeting, held on 18 September 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General dated 11 September 1998 on the situation concerning Western Sahara, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1185 (1998).²⁶

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the identification of over 147,000 applicants had been completed with the cooperation of the two parties but he was concerned that the identification of applicants from the three disputed tribal groupings remained outstanding. While welcoming the decision of Algeria and Mauritania to sign the status-of-forces agreements, he noted that the signatures were long overdue, and he hoped that the agreement with Morocco might be concluded soon after the Secretariat had completed its review of their reply. While welcoming the agreement of Morocco to formalize the presence of UNHCR, he stated his concern that they had not yet taken concrete action to enable UNHCR to carry out the necessary preparatory work for the repatriation of Saharan refugees eligible to vote and their immediate families. He maintained that it was imperative for UNHCR to begin activities in the Territory, including confidence-building, infrastructure development and road reconnaissance, in order to complete its preparatory tasks and logistics planning. He noted that his Personal Envoy was assessing whether the settlement plan could be carried out in its current form or whether there needed to be adjustments to it, acceptable to the parties, which would improve the chances of implementing it or whether it could not be carried out. To allow the Envoy to carry out consultations with the parties, the Secretary-General recommended extending the mandate of MINURSO until 31 October 1998.

At the same meeting the President (Sweden) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.²⁷ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1198 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

²⁷ S/1998/863.

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 11 September 1998, and supporting the observations and recommendations contained therein,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara until 31 October 1998;

2. Welcomes, in line with paragraph 23 of the report of the Secretary-General, engagement of his Personal Envoy with the parties to seek a solution to those issues bearing upon implementation of the settlement plan;

3. Welcomes also the agreement of the Moroccan authorities to formalize the presence of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in Western Sahara, and requests both parties to take concrete action to enable the Office of the High Commissioner to carry out the necessary preparatory work for the repatriation of Saharan refugees eligible to vote, and their immediate families, according to the settlement plan;

4. Calls for a prompt conclusion of status-of-forces agreements with the Secretary-General which would greatly facilitate the full and timely deployment of the Mission-formed military units, and in this context notes new progress that has been made, and recalls that pending the conclusion of such agreements, the model status-of-forces agreement dated 9 October 1990, as provided for in General Assembly resolution 52/12 B of 19 December 1997, should apply provisionally;

Decision of 30 October 1998 (3938th meeting):
resolution 1204 (1998)

At its 3983rd meeting, held on 30 October 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General dated 26 October 1998 on the situation concerning Western Sahara pursuant to Security Council resolution 1198 (1998).²⁸

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the situation concerning Western Sahara remained deadlocked primarily due to the inability of the Moroccan Government and the Frente Polisario to reach a compromise on the much-debated issue of the “contested” tribal groupings H41, H61 and J51/52, and he had decided to present his own arbitration in order to move ahead on that issue. He stated that he was asking the Identification Commission to proceed in considering requests from any applicants from the tribal groupings in question who wished to present themselves individually, in order to verify whether they have the right to vote, having regard to the five eligibility criteria accepted by the parties. This would prolong the Identification Commission’s programme of work, and he therefore advised launching the appeals process simultaneously, which would require the publishing of the provisional list of voters. In order to implement this programme and keep to the proposed timetable, he recommended that the number of the Commission’s members and support personnel be gradually increased. Holding the referendum was also dependent on measures taken to prepare for the return of refugees who were eligible to vote, and he urged Morocco, the Frente Polisario, Algeria and Mauritania to grant the United Nations and UNHCR all the necessary facilities and guarantees to enable them to prepare for the refugees’ return and to formalize the presence of UNHCR in the Territory as soon as possible. He noted that adjustments to the timetable presented in annex II of his report of 13 November 1997 were dependent on the cooperation of the parties and the timely provision of the necessary resources by the Security Council. He informed the Council that neither the Government of Morocco nor the Frente Polisario had voiced objections and that they had stated their intention to cooperate with MINURSO in implementing his proposals. Consequently he recommended the extension of the mandate of MINURSO to 30 April 1999 and stated that he intended to submit recommendations on a full deployment of MINURSO in December 1998. He concluded by stating his expectation that all documents, including the outstanding status-of-forces agreement and the protocols on the identification of applicants from the “contested” tribal groupings, would be initialed by the time he returned to the region.

At the same meeting the President (United Kingdom) drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 30 October 1998 from the representative of Morocco addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁹ expressing his concern that paragraph 6 of draft resolution S/1998/1011, which stated the Security Council’s support for the intention of MINURSO to publish the provisional list of voters, was in contradiction with paragraph 21 of the settlement plan,³⁰ which stipulates that the voter list would be published only when the identification process was complete. The President maintained that the Council would not consider the resolution as modifying the relevant provisions of the settlement plan.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.³¹ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1204 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous resolutions on the question of Western Sahara,

Reiterating its commitment to assist the parties to achieve a just and lasting solution to the question of Western Sahara,

Reiterating its commitment also to the holding without further delay of a free, fair and impartial referendum for the self-determination of the people of Western Sahara in accordance with the settlement plan, which has been accepted by the two parties,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 26 October 1998 and the observations and recommendations contained therein,

Welcoming also the stated intentions of the Government of Morocco and the Frente Popular para la Liberación de Saguia el-Hamra y de Río de Oro to cooperate actively with the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara in implementing the proposals contained in the report,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara until 17 December 1998;

2. Welcomes paragraph 4 of the report of the Secretary-General, regarding the protocol relating to the identification of those presenting themselves individually from tribes H41, H61 and J51/52, the protocol relating to the appeals process, the memorandum pertaining to the activities of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in the region, and an outline of the next stages of the settlement plan, and calls on the parties to agree to this package of measures by mid-November 1998 in order to allow positive consideration of further stages in the settlement process;

3. Notes the intention of the Office of the High Commissioner to forward to the parties soon a protocol relating to the repatriation of refugees, and supports efforts in this regard;

4. Welcomes also the agreement of the Moroccan authorities to formalize the presence of the Office of the High Commissioner in Western Sahara, and the agreement of the Frente Popular para la Liberación de Saguia el-Hamra y de Río de Oro to resume pre-registration activities in the refugee camps, and requests both parties to take concrete action to enable the Office of the High Commissioner to carry out the necessary preparatory work for the repatriation of Saharan refugees eligible to vote, and their immediate families, according to the settlement plan;

5. Notes with regret the constraints on the operational capability of engineering support unit of the Mission, calls for a prompt conclusion of status-of-forces agreements with the Secretary-General which is an indispensable prerequisite for the full and timely deployment of the Mission-formed military units, and recalls that pending the conclusion of such agreements, the model status-of-forces agreement dated 9 October 1990, as provided for in General Assembly resolution 52/12 B of 19 December 1997, should apply provisionally;

6. Supports the intention of the Mission to start publishing the provisional list of voters by 1 December 1998, as proposed by the Secretary-General, and supports also the proposed increase in staff of the Identification Commission from eighteen to twenty-five members, and the increase also in the necessary support personnel, in order to strengthen the Commission and enable it to continue working with utmost rigour and impartiality with a view to keeping to the proposed timetable;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council by 11 December 1998 on the implementation of the present resolution and on the progress of the implementation of the settlement plan and the agreements reached between the parties, and to keep the Council regularly informed of all significant developments and, as appropriate, on the continuing viability of the mandate of the Mission;

8. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 17 December 1998 (3956th meeting): resolution 1215 (1998)

At its 3956th meeting, held on 17 December 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General dated 11 December 1998 on the situation concerning Western Sahara, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1204 (1998).³²

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that although his arbitration package had been formally accepted by the Frente Polisario, Algeria and Mauritania, Morocco had expressed several concerns and was seeking clarifications on the draft protocols. He maintained that in view of the concerns expressed by Morocco, the proposed measures to launch simultaneously the identification and appeals process would still entitle all applicants to both an initial hearing and a process of appeal and that the final list of voters would be published only after the end of the appeals for all applicants. In conclusion, he expressed his hope that the draft protocol would be agreed on and signed by Morocco, the Frente Polisario, Algeria and Mauritania on the occasion of the visit by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in early 1999 and that Morocco would promptly sign the status-of-forces agreement. To allow consultations to lead to an agreement, he recommended that the mandate of MINURSO be extended until 31 January 1999. If the prospects for completing the identification process remained uncertain, it was his intention to revert to the Council and ask his Personal Envoy to reassess the situation and the viability of the mandate of MINURSO.

At the same meeting the President (Bahrain) drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 3 November 1998 from the representative of Algeria addressed to the President of the Security Council,³³ and a letter dated 24 November 1998 from the representative of Mauritania addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁴ respectively, informing the Security Council that they had signed the status-of-forces agreement; and to a letter dated 15 December 1998 from the representative of Morocco addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁵ drawing attention to the need to draw a distinction between the Secretary-General's arbitration concerning the 65,000 applicants and all the other proposals contained in the protocols submitted to it by the Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations.

At the same meeting the President also drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.³⁶ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1215 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous resolutions on the question of Western Sahara, and reaffirming in particular resolution 1204 (1998) of 30 October 1998,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 11 December 1998 and the observations and recommendations contained therein,

Noting the stated position of the Government of Morocco, and welcoming the formal acceptance by the Frente Popular para la Liberación de Saguia el-Hamra y de Río de Oro to implement the package of measures contained in paragraph 2 of the report of the Secretary-General, in order to move forward with the implementation of the settlement plan,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara until 31 January 1999 to allow for further consultations in the hope that those consultations will lead to agreement on the various protocols without undermining the integrity of the Secretary-General's proposed package or calling into question its main elements;

2. Notes, in this regard, that the implementation of the proposal of Secretary-General to launch simultaneously the identification and appeals processes could clearly demonstrate the willingness of the parties to accelerate the referendum process, in accordance with the wishes they have publicly expressed in recent months;

3. Calls upon the parties and the interested States to sign as soon as possible the proposed refugee repatriation protocol with the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, urges the Government of Morocco to formalize the presence of the Office of the High Commissioner in the Territory, and requests both parties to take concrete action to enable the Office of the High Commissioner to carry out the necessary preparatory work for the repatriation of Saharan refugees eligible to vote, and their immediate families, according to the settlement plan;

4. Urges the Government of Morocco promptly to sign a status-of-forces agreement with the Secretary-General as an indispensable condition for the full and timely deployment of the Mission-formed military units, and recalls that pending the conclusion of such agreement, the model status-of-forces agreement dated 9 October 1990, as provided for in General Assembly resolution 52/12 B of 19 December 1997, should apply provisionally;

5. Notes that the contracts of the majority of the Identification Commission staff will expire by the end of December 1998, and that future extensions will depend on the prospects for resuming the identification work in the immediate future and on the decisions the Council will take concerning the mandate of the Mission;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council by 22 January 1999 on the implementation of the present resolution and on the progress in the implementation of the settlement plan and the agreements reached between the parties, and further requests him to keep the Council regularly informed of all significant developments including, as appropriate, a reassessment by his Personal Envoy of the continuing viability of the mandate of the Mission;

7. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 28 January 1999 (3971st meeting): resolution 1224 (1999)

At the 3971st meeting of the Security Council, held on 28 January 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Brazil) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.³⁷

At the same meeting the President also drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 30 December 1998 from the representative of Austria, addressed to the Secretary-General, transmitting a statement on Western Sahara issued on 29 December 1998 by the Presidency of the European Union reiterating their support for the United Nations settlement plan for Western Sahara.³⁸

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1224 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous resolutions on the question of Western Sahara,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara until 11 February 1999;
2. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council informed of all significant developments in the implementation of the settlement plan and the agreements reached between the parties, and, as appropriate, on the continuing viability of the mandate of the Mission;
3. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 11 February 1999 (3976th meeting): resolution 1228 (1999)

At its 3976th meeting, held on 11 February 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General dated 28 January 1999 on the situation concerning Western Sahara pursuant to Security Council resolution 1215 (1998).³⁹

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that Morocco had asked for a few days to review the clarifications it had requested from the United Nations before presenting the changes it wanted to the texts of the voter identification and appeals protocols. As long as those changes did not affect the balance and spirit of the package of measures and the timeline, he expressed his hope that this would lead to a prompt resumption of identification and the initiation of the appeals process. He welcomed the decision of Morocco to formalize the status of UNHCR in the Territory and expressed his belief that the pre-registration operation in the Tindouf camps needed to be allowed to resume as soon as possible. He called on Morocco to begin discussions without delay with UNHCR on the refugee repatriation draft protocol and maintained that the United Nations would respond promptly to the comments on the protocol submitted by the Frente Polisario and Algeria. He informed the Council that Morocco had decided to proceed with the signature of the status-of-forces agreement concerning MINURSO and he thus recommended that the mandate be extended for four weeks, until 28 February 1999. If the prospects for putting the package of measures into effect remained uncertain at that time, it was his intention to ask his Personal Envoy to reassess the situation and the viability of the mandate of MINURSO.

At the same meeting the President (Canada) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁴⁰ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1228 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous resolutions on the question of Western Sahara, and reaffirming in particular resolutions 1204 (1998) of 30 October 1998 and 1215 (1998) of 17 December 1998,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 28 January 1999 and the observations and recommendations contained therein,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara until 31 March 1999 to allow for consultations in the hope and expectation of agreement on the protocols on identification, appeals and repatriation planning activities, as well as on the essential issue of the implementation calendar, without undermining the integrity of the Secretary-General's proposed package of measures or calling into question its main elements, for the prompt resumption of voter identification and initiation of the appeals process;

2. Requests both parties to take concrete action to enable the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to carry out the necessary preparatory work for the repatriation of Saharan refugees eligible to vote, and their immediate families, according to the settlement plan;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council by 22 March 1999 on the implementation of the present resolution;

4. Supports the intention of the Secretary-General to ask his Personal Envoy to reassess the viability of the mandate of the Mission should the prospects for putting the package of measures into effect remain elusive at the time of submission of the next report of the Secretary-General;

5. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 30 March 1999 (3990th meeting):
resolution 1232 (1999)

At its 3990th meeting, held on 30 March 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General dated 22 March 1999 on the situation concerning Western Sahara, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1228 (1999).⁴¹

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the United Nations had provided the clarifications requested to the protocol by the Government of Morocco, and had received a communication from Morocco communicating Morocco's agreement in principle. The identification and appeals protocols would be adjusted to take into account necessary revisions and then would need the approval of both parties. He would apprise the Security Council of developments prior to the expiration of the mandate of MINURSO. He welcomed the signature of Morocco and the MINURSO force commander on the agreement on mines and unexploded ordnance and noted that MINURSO was engaged in efforts to reach a similar agreement promptly with the Frente Polisario. He noted that progress had been made by UNHCR in establishing itself in the Territory and in preparing the ground for the start of substantive work that would enable it to complete its preparatory work for the repatriation of Saharan refugees. All parties needed to move ahead to reach an agreement on the refugee repatriation protocol, and he called on the Frente Polisario to allow the resumption of the work of pre-registration of refugees in the Tindouf camps. In the light of the resignation of his Special Representative and pending the Security Council's decision regarding the future status of MINURSO, he had designated the Chairman of the Identification Commission as his Acting Special Representative. He recommended that the mandate of MINURSO be extended until 30 April 1999 to provide time for an understanding to be reached on modalities for the implementation of the identification and appeals protocols.

At the same meeting the President (China) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁴² The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1232 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous resolutions on the question of Western Sahara,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 22 March 1999 and the observations and recommendations contained therein,

Welcoming also the agreement in principle to the Secretary-General's package of measures by the Government of Morocco, and recalling its acceptance by the Frente Popular para la Liberación de Saguia el Hamra y de Río de Oro,

Decision of 30 April 1999 (3994th meeting):
resolution 1235 (1999)

At its 3994th meeting, held on 30 April 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General dated 27 April 1999 on the situation concerning Western Sahara, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1232 (1999).⁴³

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that Morocco and the Frente Polisario would shortly convey their formal positions on the protocols and operational directives, which would provide for the resumption of the identification process on 1 June 1999 and of the appeals process on 1 July 1999. The simultaneous conduct of the identification and appeals processes would shorten the timeline of the referendum but require increased staffing and logistics requirements for which he would submit supplementary budget proposals in due course. He informed the Council that the consultations between UNHCR and Morocco had already led to formal arrangements for the installation of UNHCR in the Territory and they had begun consultations on the protocol governing planning for refugee repatriation and would begin to do so shortly with the Frente Polisario. He welcomed the military agreements reached between MINURSO and the two parties on the demarcation of mines and unexploded ordnance and noted that they had begun to implement those agreements. He maintained that the implementation of the timeline was predicated on many critical assumptions but that if the parties agreed to the proposed protocols and operational directive, the Security Council should extend the mandate of MINURSO for six months, until October 1999. He stated his intention to report to the Council at two-month intervals on progress being made.

At the same meeting the President (France) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁴⁴ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1235 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous resolutions on the question of Western Sahara,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General of 27 April 1999 and the observations and recommendations contained therein,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara until 14 May 1999;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council informed of all significant developments in the implementation of the settlement plan and the agreements reached between the parties, and, as appropriate, on the continuing viability of the mandate of the Mission;

3. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 14 May 1999 (4002nd meeting):
resolution 1238 (1999)

At its 4002nd meeting, held on 14 May 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General dated 27 April 1999 on the situation concerning Western Sahara and an addendum containing the text of the five documents that he had transmitted to Morocco and the Frente Polisario.⁴⁵

At the same meeting the President (Gabon) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁴⁶

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to two letters dated 13 May 1999 from the Secretary-General transmitting the responses of Morocco and of the Frente Polisario respectively to the detailed modalities for the implementation of the Secretary-General's package of measures relating to the identification of voters, the appeals process and the revised implementation timetable.⁴⁷

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1238 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

⁴³ S/1999/483.

⁴⁴ S/1999/489.

⁴⁵ S/1999/483 and Add.1.

⁴⁷ S/1999/554 and S/1999/555.

Recalling all its previous resolutions on the question of Western Sahara,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 27 April 1999 and the observations and recommendations contained therein,

Welcoming also the acceptance by the Government of Morocco and the Frente Popular para la Liberación de Saguia el-Hamra y de Río de Oro of the detailed modalities for the implementation of the Secretary-General's package of measures relating to the identification of voters, the appeals process and the revised implementation timetable as a good foundation for the completion of this phase of the settlement plan and taking note of their respective letters,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara until 14 September 1999 in order to resume the identification process, start the appeals process and conclude all outstanding agreements needed to implement the settlement plan, and reaffirms the rights of the applicants, with the expectation that the appeals process will not be turned into a second round of identification;

2. Supports the proposed increase in staff of the Identification Commission from twenty-five to thirty members, and the proposed increase also in the necessary support activities, in order to strengthen the Commission and enable it to continue working with full authority and independence, in accordance with its mandate as authorized by the Security Council, and to accomplish its tasks expeditiously;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to report every forty-five days on significant developments in the implementation of the settlement plan, in particular on the following issues which will form, inter alia, the basis of its consideration of a further extension of the mandate of the Mission: full and unequivocal cooperation of the parties during the resumption of voter identification and during the start of the appeals process; agreement by the Government of Morocco on the modalities for implementing paragraph 42 of the status-of-forces agreement; agreement of the parties on the protocol relating to refugees; and confirmation that the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees is fully operational in the region;

4. Requests the Office of the High Commissioner to provide the Security Council with recommendations for confidence-building measures and time lines for their implementation;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Council a revised timetable and financial implications for the holding of the referendum for the self-determination of the people of Western Sahara in accordance with the settlement plan and the agreements with the parties for its implementation;

6. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 13 September 1999 (4044th meeting): resolution 1263 (1999)

At the 4044th meeting, held on 13 September 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General dated 8 September 1999 on the situation concerning Western Sahara, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1238 (1999).⁴⁸

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that while some delays had occurred, the continuation of the appeals process and the resumption of the identification operation on 6 September were positive developments. Although shortages of qualified United Nations personnel had been addressed in part, the number of appeals filed was substantial and would require more time and the deployment of a larger staff than originally envisaged. He noted that preparations for the repatriation of refugees had been jointly addressed by UNHCR and MINURSO and relevant consultations were in progress with Morocco and the Frente Polisario. Discussions between MINURSO and Morocco were in progress on modalities for implementing paragraph 42 of the status-of-forces agreement concerning the carriage of weapons by MINURSO troops and were expected to be finalized that month. He concluded by stating that while developments had fallen short of expectations and he was not in a position to submit a revised timetable and financial implications, they could be considered as progress. He recommended that the Security Council extend the mandate of MINURSO for a period of three months, until 14 December 1999, to allow for the completion of identification and of the preparations towards the next stages.

At the same meeting the President (Netherlands) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁴⁹ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1263 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous resolutions on Western Sahara,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 8 September 1999 and the observations and recommendations contained therein,

Welcoming also the resumption of the identification of voters and the commencement of the appeals process, ⁴⁹ S/1999/964.

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara until 14 December 1999 in order to complete the identification of voters as envisaged in paragraph 21 of the report of the Secretary-General, to implement confidence-building measures and conclude all outstanding agreements needed to implement the settlement plan, and to continue with the appeals process, and reaffirms the rights of the applicants, with the expectation that the appeals process will not be turned into a second round of identification;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to report every forty-five days on significant developments in the implementation of the settlement plan;

3. Also requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Security Council before the end of the current mandate a comprehensive assessment of steps taken towards the completion of the appeals process, and of staffing requirements as outlined in the report, as well as preparations for the repatriation of refugees and the start of the transitional period;

4. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 14 December 1999 (4080th meeting):
resolution 1282 (1999)

At its 4080th meeting, held on 14 December 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General dated 6 December 1999 on the situation concerning Western Sahara pursuant to Security Council resolution 1263 (1999).⁵⁰

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that identification of the remaining individual applicants from tribal groupings H41, H61 and J51/51 was on track to be completed by the end of the month, which would permit the publication of the second part of the provisional voter list and the initiation of the appeals process for them. He noted that the current number of appeals and the opposing positions taken by the parties on the issue of admissibility allowed little possibility of holding the referendum before 2002 or even beyond. Tangible progress on the UNHCR draft plan for cross-border confidence-building measures not having been made, he called on both parties to cooperate with UNHCR and MINURSO without delay and to resume consultations with all parties to the UNHCR repatriation protocol. In the light of those developments, he recommended that the Council extend the mandate of MINURSO until 29 February 2000 to allow time for the completion of identification and to allow his Special Representative to continue to seek reconciliation of views regarding the appeals process, the repatriation of refugees and other crucial aspects of the settlement plan. He noted that difficulties might be encountered in this process and thus in the implementation of the settlement plan itself within a reasonable period of time.

At the same meeting the President (United Kingdom) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by France, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States.⁵¹

Before the vote the representative of Namibia stated that his delegation firmly believed in the inalienable right of the people of Western Sahara to self-determination and independence and that the United Nations settlement plan for Western Sahara remained the only credible mechanism to achieve that. He informed the Council that the settlement plan had the full support of the Organization of African Unity. He stated that he would have preferred a technical resolution to extend the mandate of MINURSO to 29 February 2000 as recommended by the Secretary-General, while they were awaiting a more comprehensive report. In his view, the draft resolution did not faithfully represent the content of the last report of the Secretary-General, was selective in its approach and ignored crucial concerns previously expressed by the Council, for example the omission of reference to the concern expressed by the Council in resolutions 1238 (1999) and 1263 (1999) that stated that the appeals process should not be turned into a new round of identification. He continued that it was their view that the draft resolution painted a negative picture, which might negatively affect the implementation of the settlement plan and send a wrong message to the international community. For those reasons he could not support the draft resolution.⁵²

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention (Namibia), as resolution 1282 (1999),⁵³ which reads:

Recalling all its previous resolutions on Western Sahara, in particular resolutions 1238 (1999) of 14 May 1999 and 1263 (1999) of 13 September 1999,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 6 December 1999 and the observations and recommendations contained therein,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara until 29 February 2000 in order to complete the identification of voters, issue a second provisional voters list, and initiate appeals for tribal groupings H41, H61 and J51/52;

2. Welcomes the reiteration by the parties of their agreement in principle to the draft plan of action for cross-border confidence-building measures, including person-to-person contacts, submitted pursuant to resolution 1238 (1999), and calls upon them to cooperate with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and the Mission for the initiation of these measures without further delay;

3. Takes note of the concern that the problems posed by the current number of candidates who have exercised their right of appeal and the opposing positions taken by the parties on the issue of admissibility seem to allow little possibility for holding the referendum before 2002 or even beyond, and supports the intention of the Secretary-General to instruct his Special Representative to continue his consultations with the parties on these issues, seeking a reconciliation of their opposing views regarding the appeals process, the repatriation of refugees and other crucial aspects of the United Nations settlement plan;

4. Takes note also of the assessment by the Secretary-General, however, that difficulties may be encountered in reconciling the opposing views of the parties, and therefore requests the Secretary-General to report before the end of the present mandate on prospects for progress in implementing the settlement plan within a reasonable period of time;

5. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

2. The situation in Liberia

Decision of 29 January 1996 (3624th meeting): resolution 1041 (1996)

On 23 January 1996, in pursuance of Security Council resolution 1014 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his fifteenth progress report on the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia (UNOMIL).¹ The report provided an update on developments in the country, and the implementation of the new mandate of the Observer Mission.

In his report, the Secretary-General expressed concern at the events in Liberia and the continuing delays in the implementation of the Abuja Agreement,² and noted that the full support of those concerned would be required to bring the peace process back on track. Faction leaders needed to ensure that their forces observed the ceasefire, disengaged without further delay and cooperated with the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group (ECOMOG) and UNOMIL to initiate the disarmament and demobilization process. The international community, for its part, needed to provide the necessary resources to enable the Monitoring Group to fulfil its responsibilities. Notwithstanding the setbacks, the Secretary-General recommended a four-month extension of the mandate of UNOMIL, until 31 May 1996. During that period, he hoped that the Liberian National Transitional Government and the faction leaders would extend their full cooperation to ECOMOG and UNOMIL in stabilizing the situation and bringing the peace process back on track.

At its 3621st meeting, held on 25 January 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included on its agenda the item entitled “the situation in Liberia”, as well as the report of the Secretary-General. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (United Kingdom) invited the representatives of Côte d’Ivoire, the Czech Republic, Ethiopia, the Gambia, Ghana, Guinea, Liberia, Nigeria, Senegal, Swaziland, Togo and Tunisia, at their request, to participate in the discussion, without the right to vote.

Opening the debate, the representative of Liberia affirmed that the Liberian civil war was virtually over, and stated that the Council of State considered the “recent skirmishes” in certain areas of the country as “unfortunate incidents”, which would not deprive the people of Liberia of the peace they had longed for. He reiterated the determination of the Liberian Council of State to abide by the Abuja Agreement and to support the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) peace initiative. While acknowledging that Liberians were ultimately responsible for restoring peace and democracy in their country, he noted that they needed the Council’s help to jump start the disarmament and demobilization process, social and economic rehabilitation, and the holding of national elections.³

The representative of the United States believed that the conflict in Liberia was among the élites, not the people; they were not fighting over ideology, but personal power. She stated that in her meetings with the Council of State she had stressed that although her Government and the international community remained committed to helping Liberia, only Liberians could make the peace and the international community was losing patience. The Liberian Council of State had offered many reasons for the setbacks, however, as far as the United States was concerned, the word “delay” could no longer be accepted. Liberians and their leaders needed to find the political will to build a new country. Regarding UNOMIL, she stressed that they expected UNOMIL to follow through urgently on its other responsibilities including investigating and reporting to the Secretary-General on human rights abuses, on any other major violations of international humanitarian law and on humanitarian assistance activities.⁴

The representative of Germany also expressed concern at the lack of progress and at the fighting between soldiers of the United Liberation Movement of Liberia for Democracy (ULIMO-J) and ECOMOG troops, and noted that the cessation of hostilities and the restoration of security were essential to any measures of reconstruction and development that the international community might consider. He further noted that the operation of ECOMOG was an important example of a successful peacekeeping mission, in which African countries had assumed a greater share of responsibility for the re-establishment of peace and stability in one of their countries, and thus for the stabilization of the region as a whole. In addition, its cooperation with UNOMIL had demonstrated that a “division of labour” between the United Nations and regional organizations was a feasible model. While expressing support for the extension of the mandate of UNOMIL, he stressed that, if there were to be no visible progress with regard to maintaining the cease-fire, the disengagement of troops and disarmament during that period, his Government would have difficulties in supporting a further extension.⁵

The representative of China deemed that the situation in Liberia posed a threat to peace and stability in the neighbouring countries and the region as a whole. He urged the parties to cooperate with the United Nations and ECOWAS, strictly implement the peace Agreement and relevant Council resolutions, and complete the disarmament and demobilization process.⁶

During the course of the debate, a number of speakers expressed concern about the incidence of ceasefire violations and attacks against ECOMOG troops, as well as continuing delays in the implementation of the Abuja Agreement, which threatened the peace process and jeopardized the holding of the legislative and presidential elections scheduled for August 1996. While supporting the Secretary-General’s recommendation to extend the mandate of UNOMIL, and calling for increased financial and logistical assistance to the Monitoring Group, they stressed, however, that the continued support of the international community was contingent on the parties’ commitment to the Agreement.⁷

The representative of Botswana noted that the international community should not lose sight of the crucial role that the holding of legislative and presidential elections could play in establishing a legitimate Government in Liberia which could contribute to the sustenance of peace and stability in the country. In that context, he welcomed the Secretary-General’s intention to send a technical mission to Liberia to consult with the Liberian National Transitional Government, the Organization of African Unity (OAU) and ECOWAS on matters related to the electoral process.⁸ His delegation also supported the extension of the mandate of UNOMIL and hoped that, during that period, substantial progress would be made and that the elections would be held as scheduled.⁹

The representative of Egypt noted that the experience of ECOWAS provided a good model for the future role of regional and non-regional organizations in containing and settling regional conflicts. The experience had demonstrated how important it was that the United Nations provide support for those organizations, most of which lacked technical and financial resources, as well as equipment, to make regional endeavours a success.¹⁰

The representative of France deplored the serious fighting incidents in Liberia, in particular the one which had claimed the lives of several members of ECOMOG. He maintained that United Nations involvement in Liberia was conditional upon the good will of the factions to put an end to the war and to restore democracy. He also reiterated his Government would continue to provide assistance to Liberia, but warned that aid could not be provided indefinitely, and that Liberians needed to seize the opportunity to close “one of the most dismal pages of their national history”.¹¹

The representative of the Russian Federation urged the Liberian parties to cooperate fully with ECOMOG and UNOMIL and to fulfil their obligations under the Abuja Agreement. He stressed that the Liberian parties needed to understand that the patience of the international community was not boundless, that the Security Council could not go on endlessly extending the mandate of UNOMIL, and that further active support by the international community for the peace process would depend on whether the Liberian parties were able to demonstrate the political will to normalize the situation and fulfil the provisions of the Abuja Agreement.¹²

The representative of the United Kingdom stressed that it was the responsibility of the Council of State to ensure that the terms of the Abuja Agreement were adhered to. He also underlined that all in Liberia needed to understand that the continued commitment of the international community depended on the willingness of the factions to observe a ceasefire, disengage, disarm and demobilize.¹³

The representative of Ghana stated that the Council had yet to show enough interest in Liberia, which compared to the situation in other zones of conflict, did not demand too much for a successful resolution. Moreover, the international community’s reluctance to provide material assistance was beginning to reflect negatively on the peace process. As a result,

ECOMOG had not been able to deploy its troops throughout the country as quickly as desired; disarmament and demobilization of combatants remained behind schedule; and the skirmishes between some factions and ECOMOG troops had caused casualties on all sides, and among the civilian population.¹⁴

The representative of Nigeria stated that it was only when ECOMOG was able, or enabled, to fulfil its role and carry out its responsibilities that UNOMIL could have any impact in Liberia. In that connection, they drew attention to the failure of the international community to deliver on its commitment to provide a force level of 160 military observers, as against the current level of 82.¹⁵

The representative of Ethiopia, speaking in his capacity as the representative of OAU, stated that despite setbacks, the peace process would succeed if it received the full support and cooperation of all concerned. It would be naïve, however, to expect that free and fair elections could take place without the demobilization of combatants, extensive consultations, and the improvement of the security situation in Liberia. The Organization of African Unity was closely monitoring the situation and had committed itself to provide financial support to assist ECOMOG.¹⁶

The President (United Kingdom), summing up, noted that most speakers had acknowledged that the peace process was at a critical juncture and called on all parties to strive to overcome setbacks. They had also underlined the complementarity between national, regional and international efforts, as well as the need for continued support to ECOMOG. Some also maintained that the conflict was among the élite, and that Liberian party leaders and factions bore the main responsibility to bring the peace process back on track.¹⁷

presidency, to take a seat at the Council table. The President then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of prior consultations.¹⁸

At the outset, Mr. Kromah stated that after six years of war, there was finally hope for lasting peace. Liberian leaders and people had no choice but to obey the call of reality: "live in peace or live no more". He stated that a key factor in paving the way for peace and guaranteed elections in Liberia was disarmament. In that regard he informed that deployment of peacekeepers had started and the completion of that exercise was expected, accompanied by the backing promised by the international community to set the real pace for disarmament. He stressed that it was not only ECOMOG that was underequipped but also the Government of Liberia and UNOMIL, which were required by the peace agreements to implement various relevant provisions of the accord. He also appealed for greater international assistance to the election programme.¹⁹

During the debate, a number of speakers reiterated their concern over the ceasefire violations and the slow pace in the implementation of the Abuja Agreement; emphasized that the people of Liberia and their leaders bore the ultimate responsibility for achieving peace and reconciliation; and urged them to abide by their commitments and to bring the peace process back on track. They also urged the international community to provide ECOMOG with the necessary financial and logistical assistance for carrying out its mandate.²⁰

The representative of Italy, speaking on behalf of the European Union,²¹ stated that the Abuja Agreement had been a turning point towards national reconciliation, after a long war which had claimed the lives of 150,000 people and forced some 800,000 to leave Liberia. However, the Secretary-General's report had presented a very gloomy picture of the situation in the country, with major ceasefire violations and the ensuing deaths of some ECOMOG soldiers. Notwithstanding those tragic developments, the United Nations and the international community needed to remain committed to the peace process. The European Union hoped that the necessary conditions would be in place for the holding of the August elections, as scheduled.²²

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1041 (1996), which reads:

14. Reminds all States of their obligations to comply strictly with the embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Liberia imposed by resolution 788 (1992) of 19 November 1992 and to bring all instances of violations of the embargo before the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 985 (1995) of 13 April 1995;

15. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and all Mission personnel for their tireless efforts to bring peace and reconciliation to Liberia;

Speaking after the vote, the representatives of the United States and Germany, while expressing support for the extension of UNOMIL, warned that they would not tolerate any further delays and would have difficulty supporting a further extension in the absence of visible progress with regard to the ceasefire, disengagement of troops and disarmament.²³

Decision of 9 April 1996 (3649th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3649th meeting, held on 9 April 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council continued consideration of the item on its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Chile) invited the representative of Liberia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁴

The Security Council expresses its grave concern at the outbreak of fighting in Monrovia and the rapidly deteriorating situation throughout Liberia. This new outbreak of factional fighting, and the harassment and abuse of the civilian population and humanitarian and relief workers, threaten the peace process and raises serious doubts about the commitment of the factions to its implementation.

The Council reminds all parties of their responsibility fully to respect international humanitarian law with regard to the civilian population and to ensure the safety of United Nations and other international personnel, and calls upon them to take immediate steps to this end. The Council calls upon all parties to fulfil their obligation to respect the inviolability of diplomatic personnel and property.

The Council expresses its deep concern at the failure of the Council of State and the faction leaders to demonstrate the political will and determination required for implementation of the Abuja Agreement. Unless Liberia's political leaders immediately show by concrete positive actions a reaffirmation of their commitment to the Abuja Agreement and fully honour their obligation to re-establish and maintain the ceasefire, they risk losing the support of the international community. The Council underscores the personal responsibility of Liberia's leaders in this regard.

The Council reaffirms its support for the Abuja Agreement as the only existing framework for resolving Liberia's political crisis and the crucial role of the Economic Community of West African States in bringing the conflict to an end.

The Council calls upon the Liberian National Transitional Government and the Liberian parties to work with the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group immediately to disengage all forces, re-establish peace and law and order in Monrovia and an effective and comprehensive ceasefire throughout the country. The Council calls upon the parties, in particular the wing of the United Liberation Movement of Liberia for Democracy that is known as ULIMO-J, to release all hostages without harm. It further calls upon the parties to return all captured weapons and equipment to the Monitoring Group.

The Council reminds all States of their obligation to comply strictly with the embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Liberia imposed by resolution 788 (1992) and to bring all instances of violations of the arms embargo before the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 985 (1995).

The Council declares its intention, based on the progress made by the Liberian parties in implementing the steps set out above, and after consideration of the report of the Secretary-General on developments in Liberia, to determine what further measures may be appropriate regarding the future United Nations presence in Liberia.

Decision of 6 May 1996 (3661st meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3661st meeting, held on 6 May 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council continued consideration of the item on its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (China) invited the representative of Liberia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁵

The Security Council expresses once again its grave concern at the deteriorating situation in Liberia. The Council strongly deplores the wanton killing and atrocities committed against innocent civilians by the forces of the warring factions. The escalating violence among the factions in violation of the Abuja Agreement puts the peace process at grave risk.

The Council calls upon the parties immediately to cease fighting, to observe the ceasefire and to return Monrovia to a safe haven under the protection of the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group. It expresses its support for the efforts of the Economic Community of West African States, including the role of the Monitoring Group, to bring this conflict to an end.

The Council regrets that the deterioration of the situation in Liberia has forced the evacuation of significant numbers of personnel of the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia. The Council reminds all States of their obligation to comply with the embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Liberia imposed by resolution 788 (1992).

The Council stresses the importance it attaches to the summit meeting of the Economic Community of West African States to be held in Accra on 8 May 1996 and urges the leaders of the Liberian factions to reaffirm by concrete positive actions their commitment to the Abuja Agreement.

Decision of 31 May 1996 (3671st meeting):

By a letter dated 19 April 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁶ the Secretary-General described the widespread looting and complete breakdown of law and order since the eruption of fighting in Monrovia on 6 April 1996. Given the security situation, civilian and military non-essential personnel of UNOMIL, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations had been relocated to neighbouring countries. Thousands of people had been displaced and were living in desperate conditions. He stressed that those developments had clearly demonstrated that the Monitoring Group's chronic lack of manpower and logistics had seriously undermined its operational effectiveness.

On 21 May 1996, pursuant to resolution 1041 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his seventeenth progress report on UNOMIL, describing developments in Liberia, and containing his recommendations on the future role of the Observer Mission.²⁷ The Secretary-General reported that renewed hostilities had continued and were seriously jeopardizing the peace process, and the security situation in Monrovia remained dangerous and unpredictable. Over the previous six weeks, faction leaders had shown wanton disrespect for the United Nations, ECOWAS and the international community, as well as disregard for the Liberian people's desire for peace. ECOWAS had agreed on steps to resume the implementation of the Abuja Agreement, but warned the faction leaders that if they failed to implement the measures agreed upon, it would reconsider its involvement in Liberia. He underscored that the withdrawal of ECOMOG could be catastrophic, not only for the country but for the whole subregion. Moreover, should the Monitoring Group be compelled to withdraw, UNOMIL would be forced to do the same. The Secretary-General stated that UNOMIL continued to play an important role in Liberia and therefore recommended a three-month extension of its mandate, until 31 August 1996. The willingness of the faction leaders to engage in genuine negotiations would be an important factor in determining further involvement of the international community in Liberia.

At its 3667th meeting, held on 28 May 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (China) invited the representatives of Algeria, Djibouti, Ghana, Liberia, Nigeria, Zambia and Zimbabwe, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President also drew the attention of the members of the Council to letters dated 15 and 17 May 1996, respectively, by the representatives of Italy and Ghana, addressed to the Secretary-General.²⁸

At the outset, the representative of Liberia recalled that since the eruption of the civil war, the Liberian people had struggled to seek a settlement through political accommodation and national reconciliation. Regrettably, the country appeared to be no closer to peace than it was when the war started in December 1989. The Abuja Agreement remained largely unimplemented, hostilities were continuing, and the ceasefire and other measures called for by ECOWAS had not been honoured. As a result, there was a breakdown of law and order, and the Council of State was unable to function since some of its members had left the country because their safety could not be guaranteed. He urged the Security Council to demand strict compliance with the embargo and to put in place penalties against all known violators. Reiterating his appeal for continued assistance to ECOMOG, he stated that the Charter needed to be amended to ensure that a mechanism was put in place whereby any subregional peacekeeping operations sanctioned by the Security Council would be financed by the United Nations. He endorsed the Secretary-General's recommendations, particularly on the deployment of a United Nations peacekeeping force in Liberia, and the incorporation of ECOMOG into the larger force.²⁹

The representative of the United States reiterated that the problem in Liberia was "a struggle among a few élites for power". The faction leaders were committed to their own interests rather than the well-being of their people. They had reignited violence; turned Monrovia from a safe haven into a war zone; and looted the equipment of relief agencies. Notwithstanding that situation, the international community needed to remain engaged in the efforts to provide relief and to bring peace to the people of Liberia. He expressed his country's belief that the Security Council needed to support the important initiative by the countries of the region. His delegation would support the extension of the mandate of UNOMIL; however it urged all Liberians, particularly the faction leaders, to use that time to meet the conditions ECOWAS had laid out and to offer their people the chance for peace.³⁰

During the course of the debate, most speakers expressed concern over the resumption of hostilities and the spread of fighting into the previously safe area of Monrovia; and urged faction leaders to observe the ceasefire, withdraw all fighters and arms from Monrovia, and allow unimpeded deployment of the Monitoring Group. While supporting the additional extension of the mandate of UNOMIL, they urged the parties to make use of that period to resume negotiations and bring the peace process back on track, and also reiterated their appeal for continued assistance to ECOMOG.³¹ Some speakers denounced the continued flow of arms to the warring factions and called for strict compliance with the embargo imposed by the Council on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Liberia.³²

The representative of the Republic of Korea noted that as Liberia was the first case in which a regional organization had been leading peacekeeping operations in cooperation with the United Nations, the failure of the Monitoring Group's peacekeeping mission could have adverse consequences for the future role of regional organizations in Africa in dealing with intra-regional conflicts.³³

The representatives of China and Zambia stated that the conflict in Liberia had not only affected the people of that country, but also posed a threat to peace and stability in the entire region.³⁴

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the resumption of hostilities in Liberia threatened the stability of the neighbouring countries of the region. He called upon the leaders of the warring parties to comply with the ceasefire; provide security guarantees to United Nations and other international personnel; to withdraw their fighters from Monrovia; to allow the unimpeded deployment of ECOMOG within the city; and to restore its status as a safe haven.³⁵

The representative of Italy, speaking on behalf of the European Union,³⁶ expressed the hope that the “stubbornness” of the Liberian “warlords” would not force the international community once again to withdraw from an African country, which was in desperate need of help. He underscored that the European Union did not intend to extend recognition to any Government established through the use of force.³⁷

The representative of France stated that the factions bore full responsibility for the events in Liberia. He recalled that ECOWAS had recently stated that the presence of the African force would depend on the progress made to implement the peace process, and that the Secretary-General had indicated that UNOMIL would remain only if ECOMOG were still there. He stressed that the international community’s total withdrawal from Liberia would cause renewed fighting throughout the country and would endanger the stability of the subregion. The Council should evaluate whether the “warlords” truly intended to re-establish peace in Liberia. If not, his delegation would have to reconsider the role of the Mission. He expressed their hope that he would not be obliged to vote for its withdrawal.³⁸

The representative of Ghana stated that the Council needed to secure unconditional logistical and financial support for ECOMOG, together with humanitarian and development assistance for Liberia. He commented that “a solution now will be cheaper, in terms of human lives and material resources, than it will be tomorrow, after ECOMOG is compelled to withdraw as a result of inaction by the international community”.³⁹

The representative of Zimbabwe wondered why the involvement of UNOMIL was contingent on the Monitoring Group’s presence in Liberia. He reiterated that when regions or regional organizations came up with peace initiatives to arrest dangerous threats to peace and security they ought to, of necessity, receive the active, all-round support of the international community through the United Nations. In their view, that was what Chapter VIII of the Charter was about. He stressed that rather than playing the role of substitute for the uniquely mandated role of the United Nations, those regional efforts needed to be viewed and treated as facilitators in the efforts of the United Nations in pursuit of its Charter-enshrined responsibility to maintain international peace and security.⁴⁰

At its 3671st meeting, on 31 May 1996, the Council resumed consideration of the item on its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (China) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of its prior consultations.⁴¹ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1059 (1996), which reads:

Decision of 30 August 1996 (3694th meeting): resolution 1071 (1996)

On 22 August 1996, in pursuance of resolution 1059 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a progress report on UNOMIL, describing developments in Liberia, and containing his recommendations on the future role of the Mission.⁴²

The Secretary-General stated that Liberia had suffered a tremendous ordeal since the outbreak of hostilities in Monrovia in April. Thousands of lives had been lost, hundreds of families displaced and its economy had been largely destroyed. Recent weeks had witnessed a new wave of violence, some of which had been politically motivated. Given the limited means of evacuation from the city and the precarious security situation, the strength of UNOMIL had been reduced during the reporting period. He noted, however, that the successful outcome of the ECOWAS summit meeting on 17 August 1996,⁴³ which had extended the Abuja Agreement and had established a new timetable for its implementation,⁴⁴ offered some hope for the restoration of the peace process. In the light of the above, the Secretary-General recommended the extension of the mandate of UNOMIL for a period of three months. During that time, and should the factions demonstrate their full commitment to the peace process, he would submit further recommendations on any enhanced United Nations role in Liberia. In conclusion, noting the decision of ECOWAS to give the faction leaders one last chance despite their lack of cooperation, the Secretary-General urged them to seize that opportunity to restore peace in their country. If they did not, the international community might have no choice but to disengage from Liberia.

At its 3694th meeting, held on 30 August 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General on its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Germany) invited the representatives of Liberia and Nigeria, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. He also drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of prior consultations⁴⁵ and to a letter dated 21 August 1996 from the representative of Nigeria, addressed to the President of the Security Council.⁴⁶

The representative of Liberia, acknowledging that the outbreak of hostilities had been a serious setback to the peace process, affirmed that the leaders of ECOWAS and other national, regional and international players had worked tirelessly over the past four months to prevent the country's slide into a state of anarchy. He noted, however, that although the leaders of the warring factions had reiterated their commitment to the implementation of the revised Agreement, their repeated failure to honour previous agreements raised doubts about their sincerity and commitment. He further stated that while ECOMOG had experienced some financial and administrative problems, it nevertheless represented a pioneering effort to bring to fruition Chapter VIII, and thus deserved greater support from the United Nations. In that context, he stressed that the Organization should establish a mechanism whereby subregional and regional peacekeeping operations, undertaken with the Council's approval, would receive the requisite support.⁴⁷

During the course of the debate, most of the speakers acknowledged the contribution of ECOWAS to restoring peace and stability in Liberia, and welcomed its decision extending the Abuja Agreement, and establishing a revised timetable for its implementation, providing the means to verify compliance with its provisions, and stipulating measures for non-compliance. They urged the faction leaders to overcome their political differences and to comply with their commitments under the Agreement. They supported the extension of the mandate of UNOMIL, and called for international financial, logistical and other assistance in support of ECOMOG.⁴⁸

Speaking before the vote, the representative of China stated that his country had consistently supported regional organizations in their efforts to resolve problems in their respective regions, pursuant to the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations. His delegation also supported the extension of the mandate of UNOMIL and hoped that the Liberian parties would seize that opportunity to disarm their forces and to make preparations for the general elections.⁴⁹

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the Agreement reached in Abuja and the extension of UNOMIL would test the will of the faction leaders to abide by their commitments, and noted that severe penalties would be imposed on anyone who failed to do so. They also needed to cease the intimidation and attacks against United Nations, ECOMOG and other non-governmental organization personnel, end the looting and return all stolen property. He stressed that this was the last chance for Liberia to resolve its problems with the assistance of the United Nations.⁵⁰

The representative of the Russian Federation noted with satisfaction the positive developments in the country. He recognized, however, the complexity of implementation of the tasks, as in the past the parties had repeatedly violated the agreements they had signed. Noting the substantial objective difficulties to the implementation of the Abuja Agreement, he maintained that it was important that the efforts of the regional peacekeepers be supported by the necessary additional resources. He affirmed that responsibility for restoration of peace lay ultimately with Liberians and their leaders, and hoped that they would make use of that last chance; otherwise, the international community would have no choice but to leave Liberia.⁵¹

The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1071 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous resolutions concerning the situation in Liberia, in particular resolution 1059 (1996) of 31 May 1996,

16. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to keep the Security Council closely informed of the situation in Liberia;

17. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States stated that Liberia's recent history was "littered with broken promises and lost opportunities for peace". Faction leaders needed to realize that the world was more concerned with their deeds than with their words, and that the United States would be closely monitoring their actions. The Secretary-General's call for increased deployments of UNOMIL, which his delegation supported, would be justified only if the peace process remained on track. He stressed that the ECOWAS States and the international community at large needed to do everything in their power to ensure compliance by the parties.⁵²

The representative of France stated that the revised Abuja Agreement gave new hopes for peace. In addition, the sanctions envisaged for non-compliance constituted an important guarantee for its implementation. He cautioned that another failure could lead to the withdrawal of the international community, a widespread renewal of fighting and a major threat to stability in the region.⁵³

On 19 November 1996, pursuant to resolution 1071 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his twentieth progress report on UNOMIL, providing an update on developments in Liberia and containing recommendations on the future role of the Mission.⁵⁴ The Secretary-General reported that, despite an attempt made on the life of Councilman Charles Taylor, the leader of the National Patriotic Front (NPF), on 31 October, there had been some encouraging developments. The ECOWAS countries had reiterated their determination to increase the force level of ECOMOG, subject to the availability of logistic and financial resources, and steps had been taken to address the complicated question of holding free and fair elections in Liberia. In that connection, and at the request of the Liberian National Transitional Government, he intended to send a technical survey team to Liberia to prepare recommendations on the conduct of the electoral process and on the role the United Nations could play. The Secretary-General noted, however, that despite those positive developments, the entrenched hostility and mistrust continued to pose a threat to the peace process. He called upon faction leaders to put aside their differences and to use the political process, instead of military means, so that the peace process could move forward. He also called on them to facilitate the delivery of urgently needed humanitarian assistance. In the meantime, he recommended an extension of the mandate of UNOMIL for a further period of four months, until 31 March 1997. During that period, he would continue to keep the situation under close review and would submit to the Council by 31 January 1997 his recommendations on possible United Nations support for the holding of free and fair elections in the country.

At its 3717th meeting, held on 27 November 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General on its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Indonesia) invited the representative of Liberia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of prior consultations.⁵⁵ The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1083 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous resolutions concerning the situation in Liberia, in particular resolution 1071 (1996) of 30 August 1996,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 19 November 1996,

Noting with grave concern the continued violations by the factions of the ceasefire as agreed to in the Abuja Agreement of 19 August 1995 and in the timetable for implementation established on 17 August 1996 when the Abuja Agreement was extended, which threaten the prospects for peace in Liberia,

Welcoming the beginning of the disarmament process on 22 November 1996 in accordance with the amended implementation schedule of the Abuja Agreement, and urging all factions to participate as they have agreed,

Reiterating that the people of Liberia and their leaders bear the ultimate responsibility for achieving peace and national reconciliation,

1. Calls upon the Liberian factions to cease hostilities immediately and to implement the commitments they have entered into, especially the agreement of the Economic Community of West African States in Abuja of 17 August 1996, which established a timetable for implementation of the Abuja Agreement, adopted a mechanism to verify compliance by the faction leaders with the Agreement and proposed possible measures against the factions in the event of non-compliance; international organizations and agencies delivering humanitarian assistance, as well as the looting of their equipment, supplies and personal property, and calls upon the leaders of the factions to return stolen property;

14. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 27 March 1997 (3757th meeting):
resolution 1100 (1997)

On 19 March 1997, pursuant to resolution 1083 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his twenty-second progress report on UNOMIL, providing an update on developments in Liberia and containing his recommendations on the role of the Mission in the forthcoming elections.⁵⁶ The Secretary-General reported that the period under review had witnessed an improvement in the security situation, the revitalization of Liberian civil society, and reactivation of political parties to prepare for elections, making it possible to begin preparations for the holding of elections. Reporting on the electoral process, the Secretary-General stated that on 26 February 1997 he had dispatched an assessment mission to Liberia to assess electoral requirements and make recommendations on the role of UNOMIL during the electoral process. The Mission had concluded that conditions in Liberia provided a reasonable basis for the organization and conduct of elections on 30 May 1997, as scheduled. The United Nations was expected to play an essential role in the elections, by providing, in conjunction with ECOWAS and other international organizations, technical assistance to the electoral authorities. The Mission, in addition to its current mandate, would work jointly with ECOWAS to ensure adequate coordination, and would also support voter education. The Secretary-General therefore recommended that the Council extend the mandate of UNOMIL for a period of three months, until the end of June 1997, at which time he expected to be in a position to report on the conduct and the results of the elections.

At its 3757th meeting, held on 27 March 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General on its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Poland) invited the representatives of Liberia and the Netherlands, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then called the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of prior consultations.⁵⁷

The representative of Liberia stated that thanks to the proactive role of the United Nations in conflict resolution, the Liberian conflict was receiving the deserved attention of the Organization. In addition, the pioneering efforts by a subregion had made manifest Chapter VIII of the Charter and had demonstrated that, with the requisite political will, countries could act decisively in bringing some of the objectives of the Charter to fruition. He urged the international community to provide the necessary resources to enable ECOMOG's deployment throughout the country; to assist eligible voters who were refugees in neighbouring countries to return home; and to restructure the Liberian armed forces and paramilitary units in view of the intention of ECOWAS to withdraw its Monitoring Group from Liberia six months after the elections. In that context, he pointed out that the Secretary-General's basic framework for the holding of elections in Liberia,⁵⁸ which had been agreed to by the parties and ECOWAS, were the fundamental requirement for sustainable peace in Liberia and would allow Liberians to select their own leaders under conditions which had to be declared by all as being free and fair.⁵⁹

The representative of the Netherlands, speaking on behalf of the European Union,⁶⁰ stated that the European Union fully supported the electoral process as defined by the Liberians and ECOWAS, on the basis of the recommendations of the Monitoring Group's Committee of Nine. His delegation welcomed the increase of the military component of UNOMIL and supported the proposal of the Secretary-General to strengthen its electoral unit. Provided the timetable was respected, the Union would supply financial and technical assistance to the electoral process. It also intended to send a team of electoral observers to Liberia.⁶¹

Speaking before the vote, the representative of the United States expressed concern at the delays in inaugurating the independent Elections Commission and expressed hope that the Elections Commission and the Supreme Court would be installed and would start to function without further delay. He stated that they supported the extension of UNOMIL through June to enable it to assist with preparations for and observation of the elections.⁶²

Speaking before the vote, most speakers expressed their support for the extension of the mandate of UNOMIL to assist with preparations for and observation of the elections in Liberia. They commended the efforts of ECOWAS and its Monitoring Group to restore peace, security and stability in the country, and urged the parties to extend their full cooperation, so that the elections could be held as scheduled. They also urged the international community to provide financial, logistical and other assistance to the electoral process, as well as additional resources to ECOMOG to enable it to maintain a secure environment during the elections.⁶³

The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1100 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous resolutions concerning the situation in Liberia, in particular resolution 1083 (1996) of 27 November 1996,

Decision of 27 June 1997 (3793rd meeting):
resolution 1116 (1997)

On 19 June 1997, pursuant to resolution 1100 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his twenty-third progress report on UNOMIL, providing an update on developments in Liberia and containing an assessment of the status of preparations for the forthcoming elections.⁶⁴

In his report, the Secretary-General stated that the peace process in Liberia was approaching its culminating stage, the holding of free and fair elections for a new, democratically elected Government. He noted, however, that the timetable for the remaining phases of the electoral process was “uncomfortably” tight and that the electoral calendar established by the Liberian Independent Elections Commission was so demanding that it would require close cooperation and coordination among all the actors involved. In addition, the current logistical resources were not sufficient to support all the activities associated with the electoral process. The Secretary-General noted that the possibility of unrest during and after the elections, especially if the results were contested, could not be ruled out. Moreover, should a run-off election for the presidency be necessary, it would take place on 2 August 1997, followed by the installation of the new Government on 16 August. He believed that UNOMIL should remain in Liberia at its current strength until that date and, therefore, recommended that its mandate be extended for a final three-month period until 30 September 1997. In the meantime, he would keep the Council fully informed of all developments, especially during and immediately following the elections, with particular emphasis on their freeness, fairness and credibility, and of any changes in the security situation. The Secretary-General affirmed that the departure of UNOMIL would not mean the end of United Nations involvement in Liberia. In addition to the development work by its agencies, and subject to the agreement of the incoming Government and to the concurrence of the Security Council, the Organization would maintain a small political office in Monrovia for a limited period of time.

At its 3793rd meeting, held on 27 June 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General on its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Russian Federation) invited the representative of Liberia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. He also drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of prior consultations.⁶⁵

4. Emphasizes the need for constructive collaboration between the United Nations, the Economic Community of West African States, the Liberian Independent Elections Commission and the international community in coordinating assistance for the elections;

5. Stresses the importance of close coordination between the Mission, the Monitoring Group, and the joint electoral coordination mechanism at all levels and, in particular, the importance that the Monitoring Group continue to provide effective security for international personnel during the election process and provide the necessary logistical support to the Independent Elections Commission;

Decision of 30 July 1997 (3805th meeting): statement by the President

By a letter dated 24 July 1997, the Secretary-General informed the President of the Security Council that the Liberian electoral process had been successfully completed and the results officially announced, thus concluding the final element of the revised schedule of the implementation of the Abuja Agreement. A joint certification statement, on behalf of ECOWAS and the United Nations, attested to the fact that the entire electoral process had been conducted in an impartial and transparent manner, and that the elections had been certified as having been free and fair.⁶⁶

At its 3805th meeting, held on 30 July 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the letter from the Secretary-General on its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Sweden) invited the representative of Liberia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. He then made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶⁷

The Security Council welcomes the successful holding of presidential and legislative elections in Liberia on 19 July 1997. The Council notes with satisfaction the letter dated 24 July 1997 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council and the declaration in the joint certification statement by the Chairman of the Economic Community of West African States and the Secretary-General that the electoral process was free, fair and credible, and that the outcome of the elections reflects the will of the Liberian voters.

The Council calls upon all parties to abide by the results of the elections and to cooperate in the formation of a new government. The Council also calls upon the new government to protect the democratic system and to promote human rights and fundamental freedoms under the rule of law.

The Council congratulates the people of Liberia on the courage and determination they have shown in proceeding with the elections under difficult circumstances. The Council commends all international personnel, especially those of the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia and the Monitoring Group of the Economic Community of West African States, who contributed to the successful holding of elections.

The Council welcomes the goodwill and cooperation demonstrated by the parties in the electoral process, which provides a strong foundation for the people of Liberia to achieve a durable peace, the re-establishment of constitutional government, and a return to the rule of law. The Council expresses the hope that the successful holding of elections will encourage refugees to exercise their right of return and calls upon the new government to fulfil its obligations under international law regarding returning refugees.

The Council notes that the successful holding of elections represents a critical step towards economic development. The Council urges the international community to continue to provide support and assistance to Liberia through this period of reconstruction.

The Council further notes that the successful conclusion of the electoral process marks the fulfilment of a key element of the mandate of the Mission.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

On 12 September 1997, pursuant to resolution 1116 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a final report on UNOMIL.⁶⁸ The report contained an account of developments in Liberia, including an update on discussions at the summit meeting of States members of ECOWAS, held at Abuja on 28 and 29 August 1997. The Secretary-General stated that the expiry of the current mandate of the Mission would bring to a close an operation whose successful conclusion had been long delayed and often doubted. The lessons learned in UNOMIL and their application to current and future missions of a similar kind were being carefully examined. The repatriation of its staff was progressing satisfactorily. His Special Representative and his immediate staff were expected to leave Liberia on or before 30 September. Thereafter, a small team would remain in the country to complete the usual liquidation and closing process. The Secretary-General noted that the establishment of a United Nations office in Liberia would assist the Government and its people in the long process of reconstruction and national reconciliation. He hoped that the international community would continue to contribute to addressing the problems of post-Mission Liberia, as they had done in the past.

3. The situation in Somalia

Decision of 24 January 1996 (3620th meeting): statement by the President

At its 3620th meeting held on 24 January 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General on the situation in Somalia dated 19 January 1996,¹ submitted in response to the request of the Security Council on 14 December 1995 for a written report on recent developments in Somalia and pursuant to the statement by the President of the Council of 6 April 1995.²

In his report, the Secretary-General noted that in the statement by the President of 6 April 1995, the Council had supported his view that, even after the termination of the mandate of the United Nations Operation in Somalia (UNOSOM II), the United Nations should not abandon Somalia but should continue to assist the Somali people to achieve a political settlement and to provide humanitarian and other services, provided that the Somalis themselves demonstrated a disposition to peaceful resolution of the conflict and cooperated with the international community. The Council had also requested him to continue to monitor the situation in Somalia and to keep it informed about further developments. He observed that the political situation in Somalia had been dominated by a debilitating stalemate for almost two years since the Somali faction leaders had failed to honour their commitments in the Nairobi declaration of 24 March 1994. While there had been no major progress towards national reconciliation, the worst scenario of an all-out civil war had been averted. The widely felt frustration seemed to have engendered some new political trends. It had contributed to the split in the United Somali Congress/Somali National Alliance (USC/SNA), which together with other factors, might have led General Aideed to declare a "Government" without the consent of other key political factions. However, the "Government" had not been recognized by any Member State or regional organization. Another significant trend had been the emergence of regional administrations as a result of initiatives by faction and community leaders. It was unclear whether such regional authorities would be formed in most of the regions in Somalia and, if so, what constitutional character they would assume; the Somalis seemed to be divided in their view as to whether these regional authorities should constitute the basis for a federal system of government or whether they should simply represent a degree of regional autonomy. Given the nature of Somali politics, however, the importance of sustainable peace at the local and inter-clan levels was obvious. The Secretary-General expressed his hope that further progress in establishing regional authorities, begun under UNOSOM II, would have a beneficial impact on efforts to establish a central authority in the near future. He suggested that the Security Council might want to reiterate its call on all Somali parties, especially those who adopted a unilateral approach, to return to an inclusive process of consultation and negotiation. In that process, it was undesirable for any outside party to intervene in favour of one or other of the Somali factions, for such support could tilt the delicate balance with negative consequences. He noted that while many Somali leaders had requested the United Nations, through the United Nations Political Office for Somalia, to support some of their peace initiatives financially and logistically, the Office had no resources for such support. He suggested that their best hope of attracting such support would be to give some first signs of concrete progress towards peace and reconciliation. He informed the Council that the low level of food production, continued political instability and other factors combined to make international assistance to Somalia essential. The United Nations agencies believed that, even in the worst-case scenario, their continued operations could play an important role in preventing another major humanitarian crisis, while the drawing down of their activities could have the opposite effect, particularly in the southern regions. He urged the international community to respond generously to the calls for assistance by the humanitarian agencies and stressed once again the responsibility of all the Somali parties to ensure the security of the courageous and dedicated humanitarian workers, who had suffered a number of casualties.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:³

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 19 January 1996 on the situation in Somalia and is deeply concerned about the absence of any credible progress towards national reconciliation. It calls upon all Somali political leaders and parties to return to an inclusive process of consultation and negotiation aimed at national reconciliation leading to the establishment of a broad-based national government.

The Council welcomes with appreciation the efforts of the Organization of African Unity, the Organization of the Islamic Conference, the League of Arab States, the European Union and neighbouring States in promoting national dialogue in the search for a solution to the Somali crisis. These efforts demonstrate the commitment of the international community not to abandon the people of Somalia. It reaffirms that the people of Somalia bear ultimate responsibility for achieving national reconciliation and restoring peace. In this respect, the Council urges the leaders of Somali factions to reject violence and place the interests of the country and people above their personal differences and political ambitions.

The Council also welcomes and supports the intention of the Secretary-General to maintain the United Nations Political Office for Somalia. It stresses the importance of the Office maintaining close cooperation with the regional organizations, monitoring developments in Somalia and continuing contacts with Somali factions. It looks forward to the return of the Office to Somalia as soon as circumstances permit.

The Council expresses deep concern at the continuing conflict. The resulting insecurity, banditry and general lawlessness increase the suffering of the civilian population. The Council condemns the harassment, beatings, abduction and killings of personnel of international humanitarian organizations, and underlines the responsibility of all parties in Somalia for ensuring the safety and security of humanitarian and other international personnel. This atmosphere of insecurity has regrettably forced the United Nations agencies to relocate international personnel, thus hindering the smooth delivery of much needed humanitarian assistance.

The Council commends the valiant efforts of United Nations and international humanitarian agencies and their Somali personnel for the courage and determination to render assistance to the people of Somalia. The Council encourages Member States to continue to provide humanitarian assistance in order to avoid a further deterioration of the current situation.

The Council considers the uninterrupted delivery of humanitarian assistance to be a crucial factor in the overall security and stability of Somalia. In this respect, the closure of the Mogadishu main seaport and other transportation facilities severely aggravates the present situation and poses a potential major impediment to future emergency deliveries. The Council calls upon the Somali parties and factions to open those facilities unconditionally.

The Council reminds all States of their obligation to implement fully the general and complete embargo imposed by paragraph 5 of resolution 733 (1992) on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Somalia. In this respect, it calls upon all States to refrain from any actions which might exacerbate the situation in Somalia.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to continue to keep it informed about developments in Somalia. The Council remains seized of the matter.

Deliberations of 15 March 1996 (3641st meeting)

⁵ Cyprus, Czech Republic, Hungary, Lithuania, Malta,

At the 3641st meeting of the Security Council, held on 15 March 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Botswana), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Algeria, Djibouti, Ethiopia, Guinea, India, Jordan, Kenya, Morocco, Pakistan, Rwanda, Swaziland, Tunisia, Uganda and Zimbabwe at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The Council also extended an invitation, at the request of Guinea-Bissau, under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure to the Permanent Observer of the Organization of African Unity to the United Nations.⁴

The representative of Italy, speaking on behalf of the European Union and associated countries,⁵ stated with reference to Somalia that this corner of Africa was sunk in a seemingly never-ending political struggle whose main ingredients were individual and clan rivalries, banditry and the use of violence. Somalia, then, was a country without even a semblance of central authority. He noted that UNOSOM II had been terminated almost one year earlier, and he maintained that against the background of continued fighting between the warlords there was a limit to what could be achieved by the international community. He underlined that the United Nations objectives in Somalia were fundamentally undermined by the lack of progress in the peace process and in national reconciliation, and in particular by the lack of sufficient cooperation from the Somali parties. The situation seemed particularly critical in the capital, where the increase in criminal activity was compounded by the continued closure of the port and the airport, leading to a blockade of commercial activity. The European Union was deeply concerned by the spiral of seemingly endless violence gripping Somalia. Reiterating the line of strict neutrality towards the various Somali factions, he expressed their belief that Somalia would not be able to take its proper place in the international community until a government emerged that was truly representative of all the Somali components. He expressed their support for the continuation of the small political office for Somalia in Nairobi and reiterated their conviction that the efforts of the United Nations and of the international agencies to assist the civilian population needed to be pursued within the limits allowed by the unstable situation. The European Union strongly reiterated the appeal made by the Security Council to the

Somali parties and factions to open unconditionally Mogadishu's main seaport and other transportation facilities for delivery of humanitarian assistance. The European Union also supported international and regional organizations such as OAU and encouraged them to continue their efforts to foster the return of peace and stability in Somalia.⁶

The representative of Indonesia stated that while they firmly believed that the people of Somalia bore the ultimate responsibility for achieving national reconciliation and restoring peace, nonetheless, the international community needed to resist, as reflected in Security Council resolution 954 (1994) and as stated in the Presidential statement of 24 January 1996,⁷ the temptation to abandon the crisis in Somalia. His delegation therefore, encouraged OAU, the League of Arab States (LAS) and the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC) to continue their efforts, in cooperation with the United Nations, in the search for a lasting peace in Somalia. The Indonesian delegation believed that there was an urgent need for the international community to pursue new initiatives to break the impasse. To that end, his delegation considered that it was an appropriate time to explore a wide range of options that would allow for both immediate and long-term responses. One of the options available would consist in upgrading the United Nations Political Office for Somalia by relocating it to Somalia as soon as circumstances permitted. The Office needed to be headed by a resident, high-ranking officer who would not only provide the Council with timely and accurate assessments of unfolding developments but would also act as facilitator in assisting the Somali parties towards national reconciliation and a peaceful settlement. Furthermore, the Council might consider, as security conditions permitted, sending a mission to Somalia, similar to the one sent in 1994, so that the Council would be in a better position to respond more effectively.⁸

The representative of the United States emphasized that in 1992 the international intervention led by the United States, the United Task Force (UNITAF), quickly ended the famine, saving thousands of lives. UNOSOM had continued that undertaking. Almost all Somalis, even those who were sharply critical of the subsequent United Nations actions in their country had expressed gratitude for the international community's response to the famine. She maintained that one year after UNOSOM II forces had withdrawn, the United States had not abandoned Somalia and did not intend to. While they did not recognize or support any Somali group or faction, they remained in communication with all the political groups in the country. The United States and the international aid community were closely monitoring the food situation in order to prevent another famine. She called on the factions in Somalia to reopen the port and to ensure that it remained open so that assistance could be delivered. She also urged the Somalis to form a broad-based national government that enjoyed widespread support among all segments of the population.⁹

The representative of Germany underlined that a solution to the present situation could only be found through political dialogue. The Political Office of the United Nations had already established relations with those warring factions that were represented in Nairobi. The United Nations Office had been able to gain a reputation for impartiality, so that it was being accepted by all but one of the warring factions as a partner for dialogue. Therefore, he suggested that it might make sense to increase the number of personnel in the Office. He noted that it had proved particularly difficult for the Political Office of the United Nations to initiate a dialogue with General Aideed. His insistence on being recognized as president of Somalia had so far prevented any negotiations with him about the political future of the country. At the same time, the destabilization of agriculturally fertile provinces constituted a threat to the economic situation of the whole country. He appealed to the warring factions to accept the good offices of the United Nations and to finally agree among themselves on a peaceful solution.¹⁰

The representative of Egypt called upon the international community to shoulder its responsibility for the people of Somalia. The aim of the United Nations intervention in Somalia under Security Council resolution 794 (1992) was the establishment of a favourable climate for humanitarian relief operations, and this intervention had been undertaken under Chapter VII of the Charter, in view of the exceptional conditions prevailing in Somalia. Although the United Nations had achieved great success at a humanitarian level, it had not succeeded in laying down a framework for settlement and national reconciliation to which all parties were committed. He stated that nevertheless, OAU had decided to dispatch a new mission to Somalia to establish contact and to assess the real situation. The League of Arab States had also proposed a joint mission of representatives of regional and international organizations to meet with Somali leaders. For its part, the Organization of the Islamic Conference had called for an international conference for peace and national reconciliation in Somalia with the participation of all the Somali parties and all the relevant regional and international organizations. Turning to the role of the United Nations he maintained that there should be a follow-up to the ongoing commitment to the comprehensive international embargo on the supply of arms and military equipment to Somalis under Security Council resolution 733 (1992), as well as active, comprehensive follow-up with respect to the political and humanitarian situation with a view to building State institutions and to carrying out post-conflict peacebuilding. However, none of that was taking place. His country considered it necessary to energize the role of the United Nations in Somalia, and to that end they wished to propose a number of ideas, any or all of which could be adopted. First, he advocated the convening in a neighbouring State of a pan-Somali conference attended by representatives of all Somali regions. Second, regional and international organizations needed to be encouraged to undertake a joint initiative to convince Somali leaders of the importance of dialogue. Third, the United Nations and regional organizations should offer Somali leaders feasible alternatives, such as the establishment of a country-wide joint presidential council, similar to the current experiment in Liberia or other means of power-sharing such as a federal or confederative system. Fourth, the role of the United Nations office in Nairobi should be enhanced. Fifth, the Security Council should dispatch a mission of Council members or a high-level envoy to assess the situation on the ground and to ascertain whether the time was ripe for making specific proposals. In conclusion, he reiterated that the basic responsibility for stability in Somalia lay with the people of Somalia.¹¹

The representative of France requested that every effort be made to promote national reconciliation and that no possibility of restoring civil peace in Somalia be overlooked. He underlined that if they waited too long, the entire country might collapse. The north-west was already drifting away from the other provinces, and soon it would no longer be possible to preserve the territorial unity of the country, which had been a goal of the Security Council. He suggested that they might encourage mediation by African public figures acceptable to the factions and expressed their belief that the countries of the Horn of Africa in cooperation with OAU and the League of Arab States had a key role to play. If those African countries could give their concrete support to an initiative led by one or several African public figures, mediation would gain strength and credibility. Finally, he noted that thus far the message of the Security Council to the factions had had no impact. Since the factions believed that the Council was expressing the particular interest of only some of its members, he asked whether they could show that the international community as a whole disapproved of the policy pursued by the warlords. To that end he suggested considering organizing a debate in the General Assembly to allow all the Members of the United Nations to inform the parties to the conflict that the path of violence could only be a dead end.¹²

The representative of Tunisia spoke on behalf of the African group. He expressed his belief that the international community needed to mobilize in order to resolutely express its commitment to the Somali people. To that end, he urged that the following actions be taken. First, the Security Council should pursue and reinforce its interest in the question of Somalia, the first step being to send a mission to explore the prospects for national reconciliation. Second, a common strategy should be adopted by the United Nations, OAU, League of Arab States and OIC with a view to facilitating national reconciliation. Third, a joint mission should be dispatched, consisting of high-level representatives of international and regional organizations, to convey to the leaders and factions the desire of the international community to help the Somali people overcome the grave crisis threatening its survival. Fourth, an attempt should be made, using independent political figures of international stature, to narrow the gap between the different positions and attitudes of the factions. Fifth, the United Nations Office in Nairobi should be strengthened in two ways: by appointing to its head either an Assistant Secretary-General or a Special Representative of the Secretary-General and by giving it the financial and human resources to enable it to discharge its task properly. At a later stage it would be advisable to consider transferring the Office to

Mogadishu if progress had been made with regard to security guarantees by the Somali factions.¹³

The representative of Guinea stated that his country had presided over the Islamic Conference of Foreign Ministers of OIC; as Chairman of the group of members of OIC at the United Nations, his delegation was pleased to recall that at the twenty-third session of the Islamic Conference of Foreign Ministers, held in Guinea, States members of OIC reiterated their commitment to the restoration and preservation of the unity, sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Somalia. That conference had noted with appreciation the efforts of OIC to bring national reconciliation to Somalia and to relieve the suffering of the Somali people, in cooperation with the States of the region, the United Nations, the League of Arab States and OAU, in the context of a joint approach. It called for a continuation of those efforts and requested the Secretary-General of OIC to dispatch a contact group to urge the various Somali groups to resume dialogue to achieve national reconciliation. The conference called for the convening of an international conference on peace and national reconciliation in Somalia pursuant to the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly, with the participation of all Somali parties and the international and regional organizations concerned.¹⁴

The representative of Kenya stated that the Security Council must continue to treat the situation in Somalia as a threat to international peace and security and must augment the efforts that were being made by regional organizations such as OAU. It could not run away from the responsibility bestowed upon it by the Charter. He maintained that the United Nations could do much more to make a difference in Somalia.¹⁵

The representative of Ethiopia spoke as the representative of the current Chairman of OAU. He stated that notwithstanding the primary responsibility of the Somali people, the international community needed to monitor closely the situation in Somalia and contribute its share in assisting and encouraging all inclusive national reconciliation. He noted that many Somali leader had requested the United Nations to support their peace initiatives financially and logistically, while the United Nations had no resources for such support. While they understood the frustration and disappointment of the international community over the lack of progress in the process of national reconciliation, he also stressed that every opportunity needed to be seized to encourage and promote dialogue and to maintain contact with all Somali factions to that end. At the regional level, OAU had continued to monitor closely developments in Somalia. In May 1995 OAU had dispatched a tripartite mission to assess the situation and to encourage dialogue and direct contact with the various factions in that country. The sixty-third session of the OAU Council of Ministers, held in Addis Ababa from 26 to 28 February 1996, also considered the report of the OAU Secretary-General on Somalia and adopted a resolution, in which it expressed concern over the situation in Somalia and over the stalemate in the process of national reconciliation and the establishment of a broad-based national authority. It also called upon the Somali leaders to act urgently to promote dialogue aimed at the pursuit of national reconciliation. Furthermore, the OAU Council of Ministers appealed to OAU member States and the international community as a whole to provide humanitarian assistance in view of the worsening situation. He emphasized the important role that the United Nations and OAU and other regional organization could play in the search for a solution.¹⁶

The permanent observer of OAU noted that at its sixty-third session, the OAU Council of Ministers had decided that the tripartite mission should make another visit to Somalia in order to maintain direct contacts with the various Somali factions and assess the situation on the ground. As the humanitarian situation was serious, OAU appealed to Member States and to the international community to provide humanitarian assistance to deal with the worsening humanitarian situation. He stated that it was the time to support the proposals of Tunisia and Ethiopia and to reaffirm their support for establishing permanent United Nations representation in Somalia, which they believed was imperative.¹⁷

The representative of Rwanda stated that they could not forget that Somalia was not an isolated case in Africa; there was also Rwanda, Burundi, Liberia, Sierra Leone and others. His delegation also denounced the “minimalist practice, increasingly adopted by this Organization, of abandoning member countries in difficulty”. He stated that they had seen it in Somalia, Rwanda and, to some extent, in Liberia. It was well known that the withdrawal of the United Nations force from Somalia helped to increase chaos there. “Genocide” in Rwanda was made possible by the withdrawal of the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda. Yet the same Organization was prepared to intervene elsewhere, in countries where the problems were similar but less severe. He maintained that experience had shown that countries which had been abandoned ultimately experienced disasters from which they had difficulty recovering. As for Somalia, while it was for the Somalis to find a solution to their problems, the parties had said that they needed a facilitator, the necessary resources and a forum. Those same leaders had also appealed to the United Nations to continue to play the role of facilitator and mediator. He asked what the point was of having several United Nations offices for Somalia in Kenya. Their effectiveness was difficult to gauge. His delegation was convinced that the establishment of the United Nations Political Office for Somalia in Nairobi was useful neither for the Somalis nor for United Nations agencies. He noted that the latest report of the Secretary-General mentioned no important initiatives taken by that office throughout 1995. He maintained that depriving Somalia of the presence of the international community and the United Nations in Mogadishu had given a green light to the various factions. However, the Somali leaders had requested reinstatement of the Office in Mogadishu, and his delegation hoped that that legitimate appeal would be heeded and answered. In conclusion, he noted that humanitarian aid should be continued, but it should be borne in mind that the most pressing need was to find a political solution.¹⁸

During the course of the debate, several other speakers spoke, noting the extraordinarily complex problems that existed and deploring the lack of progress and the humanitarian situation. They all expressed their belief that the primary responsibility for the situation lay with the Somalis themselves and called on them to return to negotiations with a view to establishing a broad-based national government. Several speakers underlined the importance of maintaining a neutral position with regard to the Somali factions. A number of speakers urged all States to observe strictly the arms embargo in accordance with Security Council resolution 733 (1992). Several speakers encouraged the Secretary-General to transfer the Office from Kenya to Mogadishu as soon as the circumstances allowed. A few speakers recommended sending a Security Council mission to Somalia to meet with the faction leaders and to urge them to resume negotiations. A number of speakers recommended closer collaboration with the United Nations and regional organizations, including OAU and OIC.¹⁹

Decision of 20 December 1996 (3726th meeting):
statement by the President

At the 3726th meeting of the Security Council, held on 20 December 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Italy) made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁰

The Security Council is gravely concerned at the resumption of fighting in Mogadishu, where the latest clashes are taking an increasingly heavy toll in human lives. It is deeply concerned, in particular, at the plight of the civilian population, whose suffering is increased even further by the fighting.

The Council calls upon all Somali factions to cease immediately all hostilities and to restore an effective ceasefire.

The Council fully supports the efforts of the countries of the region as well as of international and regional organizations, in particular the Organization of African Unity and the League of Arab States, to facilitate a political settlement of the crisis in Somalia. It appeals to all Somali factions to join in such efforts and to start a process of national reconciliation aimed at the establishment of a broad-based national Government.

The Council reaffirms its commitment to a lasting solution to the crisis in Somalia and encourages the Secretary-General to continue to monitor closely the situation and to report to the Council on any further development.

The Council once again reminds all States of their obligations to implement fully the general and complete embargo imposed by resolution 733 (1992) on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Somalia.

The Council reaffirms its appreciation to all the organizations and individuals who carry out humanitarian activities in Somalia and calls upon all Somali factions to ensure the safety of all the personnel involved.

agenda the report of the Secretary-General on the situation in Somalia dated 17 February 1997.²¹

In his report, the Secretary-General noted that the Security Council had requested him to consult with countries in the region and to submit recommendations on the role that, within its mandate, the United Nations, including the Council, could play in support of regional efforts for peace, particularly those of Ethiopia and Kenya. He informed the Council that the President of Kenya had succeeded in bringing together Hussein Aided, Osman Atto and Ali Mahdi Mohamed in Nairobi, which marked the first participation of the Aided faction with the other two since 1994 and 1995, respectively. Those leaders had asked the President to continue his mediation efforts and had agreed to a cessation of hostilities throughout the country. Ethiopia, which had a mandate from both OAU and the Intergovernmental Authority on Development (IGAD), succeeded in bringing together 27 Somali leaders, representing 26 political factions, in Sodere, which had culminated in the adoption of a declaration of national pledges and commitments and a solemn declaration. However, neither Mr. Hussein Aided nor Mr. Mohamed Ibrahim Egal had participated in the meeting.

The Secretary-General observed that United Nations efforts had continued throughout the reporting period in the form of the good offices of the Secretary-General; the United Nations Political Office for Somalia's facilitation of mediation efforts; cooperation with regional organizations and neighbouring States; periodic reviews by the Security Council; humanitarian relief and rehabilitation assistance; and efforts to improve respect for human rights; all of which would continue. The regional actors had called for massive international aid in support of reconciliation, rehabilitation and reconstruction. The Government of Ethiopia and the Government of Kenya, as Chairman of IGAD, had stated that the most critical support that the United Nations could provide for the regional efforts for peace in Somalia was through exerting the necessary pressure on Somali factions and groups to show greater commitment to national reconciliation. The Security Council in particular had an important role to play in making sure that all efforts were pursued not with a further proliferation of initiatives, but by building on the positive achievements made thus far, and stressed that what had been achieved at Sodere under the auspices of the IGAD countries was sufficiently inclusive to merit the full support of the United Nations. The Secretary-General noted that while the United Nations was already undertaking and would continue to undertake efforts in the fields of relief and rehabilitation, if those efforts were to be expanded, it would be necessary for Member States to contribute more generously than they had in the recent past. He also suggested that the Council could call upon all the Somali parties to cooperate with the efforts of OAU and IGAD and serve notice that it recognized the will of the Somalis represented by those who signed the Sodere and Nairobi declarations and that it would not tolerate any faction's non-cooperation with those who were striving to put those declarations into effect. He noted that while his predecessor had discussed sending a joint fact-finding mission with OAU, it was not evident that it could add significantly to the efforts of neighbouring States at this time. He stated that should the regional actors consider it desirable, he would be ready to designate a high-level Special Envoy for Somalia, whose mission would be to liaise with them in order to support their peacemaking efforts. The Security Council might also wish to urge all States to observe fully their obligations related to the arms embargo under resolution 733 (1992). Finally he noted that the efforts that had culminated in the Nairobi and Sodere declarations had entailed significant costs for the host Governments, and should those Governments wish, the Security Council could request the Secretary-General to establish a trust fund and could call upon Member States to contribute to it. In conclusion, the Secretary-General expressed his view, similar to that of the Security Council, that the best hopes for restoring peace to Somalia lay in the negotiation of a political settlement entrusting power to a broad-based Government in which all factions would be represented.

At the same meeting, the President (Kenya) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 8 January 1997 from the representative of Ethiopia,²² transmitting the text of a letter dated 6 January and its appendices concerning the High-level Consultative Meeting of the Somali factions held at Sodere, Ethiopia.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²³

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 17 February 1997 on the situation in Somalia.

The Council reaffirms its commitment to a comprehensive and lasting settlement of the situation in Somalia, bearing in mind respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Somalia, in accordance with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations. It reiterates that full responsibility for achieving national reconciliation and for restoring peace rests with the Somali people.

The Council expresses its full support for the efforts of regional and other interested States, as well as those of international and regional organizations, particularly the Organization of African Unity, the Intergovernmental Authority on Development and the League of Arab States, to promote a direct political dialogue and facilitate a broad-based political settlement in Somalia.

The Council calls upon all Somali factions to cease immediately all hostilities and to cooperate with the regional and other efforts for peace and national reconciliation in Somalia, including the initiatives taken at Sodere, Ethiopia, and at Nairobi, Kenya.

The Council encourages all States to contribute generously to the appeals of the United Nations to ensure continued relief and rehabilitation efforts in Somalia, including those aimed at the strengthening of civil society. It also encourages States to contribute to regional mediation efforts for Somalia.

The Council reiterates its call upon all States to fulfil their obligations to implement the embargo imposed by resolution 733 (1992) on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Somalia. In this context, it calls upon all States to refrain from any actions which might exacerbate the situation in Somalia.

The Council again expresses its appreciation for all United Nations agencies and other organizations and individuals carrying out humanitarian activities in Somalia. It calls upon the Somali factions to ensure the safety and freedom of movement of all humanitarian personnel and to facilitate the delivery of humanitarian relief to the Somali people, including through the opening of the airport and harbour of Mogadishu.

The Council encourages the Secretary-General to continue his consultations with the Somali parties, regional States and organizations on the role the United Nations can play in supporting the peace efforts, including on specific options contained in his report. It requests the Secretary-General to continue monitoring the situation in Somalia and to report to it in an appropriate manner on those consultations and developments in the situation generally.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Deliberations of 23 April 1997 (3770th meeting)

At the 3770th meeting of the Security Council, held on 23 April 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Portugal), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Ethiopia, Italy, Kuwait, the Netherlands and Tunisia, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 16 April 1997 from Kuwait,²⁴ transmitting the text of resolution 5638, of 31 March 1997, adopted at the one hundred and seventh regular session of the Council of the League of Arab States, entitled "The situation in Somalia".

The representative of Egypt stated that the situation in Somalia differed radically from the situation in the past. Numerous regional initiatives had led to many positive developments. The Egyptian delegation hoped that the proposals of the Secretary-General would be given serious consideration. Egypt supported the Secretary-General sending a Special Envoy to Somalia on a mission similar to that of the Special Envoy to the Great Lakes region. The new Special Envoy should be sent with a view to establishing contacts with the war lords and the representatives of the Somali people, and perhaps also in order to visit neighbouring States and other interested States and to consult with competent regional organizations with a view to presenting a comprehensive report to the Secretary-General on measures to be taken, at which time the Security Council could consider them and adopt an appropriate resolution. He maintained that it was now necessary to reach an agreement on the nature of the United Nations role in Somalia. The delegation of Egypt called for a substantial modification of that role, and it called upon the international community, to assume its responsibilities vis-à-vis the Somali people. He maintained that the efforts of the United Nations and of regional and international organizations to support national reconciliation depended on a number of considerations; the most important of which was that the international community must not recognize any authority in Somalia that did not represent all factions of the Somali people. Second, the embargo on arms shipments needed to be respected and strictly monitored.

The international community needed to continue all necessary humanitarian and development assistance to all regions of Somalia without exception. The territorial integrity of Somalia and the principle of non-intervention in its internal affairs needed to be respected. In conclusion, he reaffirmed that the main responsibility for stability in Somalia rested with the Somali people themselves.²⁵

The representative of France stated that the international community needed to try to convince Somali leaders that there was no alternative to negotiations to achieve national reconciliation. That effort had to involve in particular those who might be tempted by the idea of secession, since, as was the case throughout Africa, the maintenance of the territorial integrity and national unity of Somalia was essential to any settlement. He stated that at the time the best chances for progress lay with the continued efforts of the States of the region, of other interested States and of regional organizations, including the Organization of African Unity, the League of Arab States and the Intergovernmental Authority on Development. He maintained that strengthening the United Nations role did not seem possible unless it was very gradual and was accepted by the Somali leaders, who needed to demonstrate that they sincerely wanted to participate in negotiations to achieve national reconciliation.²⁶

The representative of China stated that China welcomed and supported the regional efforts and called on the factions in Somalia to cooperate closely with them and maintained that they should receive firm and effective support and cooperation from the international community, including the United Nations. The United Nations, particularly the Security Council, had the responsibility, and ought to take measures, to contribute constructively to the settlement of the Somali question. In that connection, they were of the view that the role of the United Nations Political Office for Somalia needed to be strengthened and that the Council should consider positively the Secretary-General's recommendations, made in his report of 17 February 1997 to designate a Special Envoy on the question of Somalia, to send a United Nations/OAU joint fact-finding mission and to establish a Secretary-General's trust fund.²⁷

The representative of the United Kingdom, while maintaining that the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the Security Council had shown their concern about the continuing conflict in Somalia and their support for regional and other efforts to initiate a political dialogue, in the light of the efforts being made in Kenya, Ethiopia and others, they themselves, however, saw no need for a new initiative on Somalia at that point. However, it was vital to ensure that the ongoing efforts were properly coordinated and fully complementary with each other. This was also the moment to recall that none of the efforts could succeed unless the leaders of the various parties in Somalia showed the necessary political will. He noted that the recent drought highlighted the continuing need for humanitarian assistance, but successful relief operations required the cooperation of the parties on the ground. He expressed his concern to hear of the problems that humanitarian agencies had encountered in Mogadishu and elsewhere and reiterated that the leaders of all parties needed to "stop jockeying for power and concentrate on the needs of the people they were supposed to represent".²⁸

The representative of Kenya stated that as a member of the Intergovernmental Authority on Development, which had continuously been involved in the search for peace in Somalia, he wanted to stress the following points: first, the prospects for peace in Somalia had never been greater, and the international community needed to seize the opportunity to facilitate negotiations and dialogue. Second, all efforts aimed at securing peace in Somali needed to be complementary and coordinated with the IGAD initiative that was already in place. Third, the planned Bossaso conference needed to be provided with material and financial support to ensure its success. He reiterated that a regional initiative was in place, and he called on the international community to support it and to help the people of Somalia to help themselves.²⁹

The representative of Ethiopia reiterated that the primary responsibility for the solution of the problem lay in the hands of the Somalis themselves, and that the role of OAU, IGAD, the United Nations and others was to assist and facilitate the efforts of the Somalis. He informed the Council that in pursuing the mandate of the Sodere meeting, the Somali political movements had also agreed to convene a national reconciliation conference at Bossaso, Somalia, to be followed by a concluding national conference to announce the formation of a transitional central authority. They were pleased and encouraged that preparations were currently under way in that direction and that the Somali political movements had agreed at their recent meeting held in Mogadishu to convene the National Reconciliation Conference on 10 June 1997 in Bossaso, Somalia. He noted that the Sodere initiative clearly recognized the need for inclusiveness and set procedures for the eventual inclusion of all those who might not have joined the process initially, and it was his hope that those who had not joined would do so. He expressed his belief that the United Nations, and in particular the Security Council, needed to take the following measures. First, as indicated in the report of the Secretary-General, the Security Council needed to call upon all the Somali parties to cooperate with the efforts of OAU and IGAD, and make it clear that the Council would not tolerate any faction's non-cooperation with those who had shown concrete commitment to peace and national reconciliation. Second, the United Nations needed to expand its relief and rehabilitation assistance to Somalia with the clear aim of maintaining and advancing the present momentum for peace and of strengthening the constituencies for peace in the country. Third, to ensure the success of the National Reconciliation Conference and to support the regional peace process, the Security Council should request the Secretary-General to establish a trust fund and call upon Member States to contribute. Fourth, the United Nations and its Security Council should emphasize the importance of closer coordination and consultation among those working for peace in Somalia. The new spirit of cooperation and commitment to consultation on the part of the United Nations and others should be welcomed and further enhanced. To that end, the proliferation of initiatives needed to be resisted by the United Nations.³⁰

During the course of the debate several other speakers spoke, underlining the need to support the continued efforts of States of the region, of other interested States and of regional organizations; expressing concern for the humanitarian situation and reiterating the fact that responsibility for the situation was primarily on the Somali people themselves. Most speakers also called for strict enforcement of the arms embargo established by resolution 733 (1992). Most speakers also called on the Somali factions to ensure appropriate security conditions for the operations of international humanitarian organizations. A number of speakers expressed support for the idea of a possible designation of a Special Envoy of the Secretary-General to support the peacemaking efforts. A number of speakers also reiterated the importance of any peace settlement being inclusive of all factions.³¹

Decision of 23 December 1997 (3845th meeting): statement by the President

At the 3845th meeting of the Security Council, held on 23 December 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Costa Rica) drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 22 December 1997 from the representative of Egypt addressed to the President of the Security Council,³² transmitting the text of the Cairo Declaration on Somalia signed by the Somali leaders on that date in concluding their meetings in Cairo, Egypt.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:³³

The Security Council has considered the situation in Somalia, including the recent developments in the political, military and humanitarian fields.

The Council reaffirms its commitment to a comprehensive and lasting settlement of the crisis in Somalia, bearing in mind respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Somalia, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations. In this context, it stresses that the responsibility for achieving genuine national reconciliation and peace rests with the Somali people themselves.

The Council expresses its full support for the efforts of regional and other interested States as well as those of international and regional organizations, particularly the Organization of African Unity, the Intergovernmental Authority on Development, the League of Arab States, the European Union and the Organization of the Islamic Conference, to promote a direct political dialogue and facilitate the emergence of a broad-based central Government in Somalia.

The Council welcomes the outcome of meetings between the Somali leaders held in Cairo concluded on 22 December 1997, in particular their decision to adopt a federal system with regional autonomy and their agreement to form a transitional government of national unity and to hold an inclusive conference of national reconciliation in Baidoa through which a presidential council and a Prime Minister will be elected. It also welcomes the signing of the Cairo Declaration on Somalia and other important agreements attached thereto, particularly on the creation of an elected Constituent Assembly, the establishment of an independent judicial system and the preparation of a transitional charter. The Council calls upon all Somali leaders to contribute positively to the current momentum for peace and reconciliation created by the significant progress achieved in Cairo, and by the other previous initiatives of Sodere, Nairobi and Sanaa, through the widest possible participation in the planned conference and to cease immediately all acts of violence and to observe the ceasefire.

The Council urges all States to contribute generously to the appeals of the United Nations to ensure continued relief and rehabilitation efforts in all regions of Somalia, including those aimed at the strengthening of civil society. It also stresses the urgent need to address the humanitarian situation in those areas affected by the recent floods.

The Council reiterates its call upon all States to fulfil their obligations to implement the embargo imposed by resolution 733 (1992) of 23 January 1992 on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Somalia. In this context, it calls upon all States to refrain from any actions which might exacerbate the situation in Somalia.

The Council also expresses its support for the efforts exerted by the Secretary-General aimed at exploring means for the United Nations to assist in restoring peace and stability in Somalia. It notes with appreciation the decision of the Secretary-General to strengthen the United Nations Political Office for Somalia in Nairobi. In this regard, it stresses the need for closer coordination of all efforts for peace in Somalia.

The Council expresses again its appreciation to all United Nations agencies, other organizations and individuals carrying out humanitarian activities in all regions of Somalia. It calls upon the Somali factions to ensure the safety and freedom of movement of all humanitarian personnel and to facilitate the delivery of humanitarian relief, including through the immediate reopening of the airport and seaport of Mogadishu.

The Council encourages the Secretary-General to continue his consultations with the Somali parties, interested and regional States and organizations concerned on means for the United Nations to support peace and reconciliation efforts, including through specific options contained in his report of 17 February 1997. It requests the Secretary-General to keep it regularly informed and submit a report about these consultations and developments in the situation in due course.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 27 May 1999 (4010th meeting): statement by the President

By a letter dated 17 May 1999 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁴ the representative of Ethiopia drew the attention of the Security Council to a very dangerous development in Somalia caused by Eritrea's involvement in the conflict in that country. They stated that recent eyewitness accounts had revealed that Eritrea had embarked on a large-scale military activity of destabilization in Somalia in support of one of the warring factions in that war-torn country through shipments by air and sea of arms, including heavy weapons, in flagrant violation of Security Council resolution 733 (1992). As Ethiopia was the ultimate target of Eritrea's lawlessness and its manifest promotion and sponsorship of terrorism, Ethiopia reserved the right to take the appropriate measures in defence of its national security.

By a letter dated 24 May 1999 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁵ the representative of Djibouti shared his country's apprehension about a menacing development in the Horn of Africa that could have the potential of igniting widespread regional conflict. He referred to the widely reported and corroborated accounts of Eritrean weapons and personnel involvement in the anarchic and clearly explosive situation in Somalia. This was also a clear violation of Security Council resolution 733 (1992) and subsequent resolutions. The Government of Djibouti, therefore, called upon the Council to take urgent necessary measures designed to thwart Eritrea's undisguised provocative and destabilizing activities in the region, whose implications were "far beyond measurement of comprehension".

By a letter dated 26 May 1999 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁶ the representative of Eritrea forwarded a statement issued on 26 May 1999 by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the State of Eritrea concerning Ethiopia's accusations regarding Eritrean involvement in Somalia, which were only intended to serve as a smokescreen for Ethiopia's longstanding and escalating armed intervention in Somalia to forward its "own expansionist and hegemonist goals".

At the 4010th meeting of the Security Council, held on 27 May 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Gabon) drew the attention of the Council to the above-mentioned letters.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:³⁷

The Security Council expresses its alarm at the serious deterioration in the political, military and humanitarian situation in Somalia and concern at the reports of increasing external interference in Somalia.

The Council reaffirms its commitment to a comprehensive and lasting settlement of the situation in Somalia, bearing in mind respect for the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence and unity of Somalia, in accordance with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations. It reiterates that full responsibility for achieving national reconciliation and for restoring peace rests with the Somali people.

The Council expresses its support for the activities of the Standing Committee on Somalia and calls upon all Somali factions to cease all hostilities immediately and to cooperate with the regional and other efforts to achieve peace and reconciliation.

The Council is deeply concerned at recent reports of the illicit delivery of weapons and military equipment to Somalia, in violation of the arms embargo imposed by resolution 733 (1992) of 23 January 1992, which could exacerbate the crisis in Somalia and endanger the peace and security of the region as a whole.

The Council reiterates its call upon States to observe the arms embargo and to refrain from any actions which might exacerbate the situation in Somalia. It further requests Member States having information about violations of the provisions of resolution 733 (1992) to provide this information to the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 751 (1992) of 24 April 1992.

The Council expresses its deep concern at the humanitarian impact of the long-lasting crisis and, in particular, condemns attacks or acts of violence against civilians, especially women, children and other vulnerable groups, including internally displaced persons. It also condemns attacks on humanitarian workers, in violation of the rules of international law.

The Council calls upon the Somali factions to cooperate on the basis of the principles of neutrality and non-discrimination with the United Nations agencies and other organizations carrying out humanitarian activities. The Council urges all parties to guarantee the security and the freedom of movement of humanitarian personnel and to ensure unhindered access to those in need of assistance. In this regard, it also commends the existing coordination of all efforts of the international community to meet the humanitarian needs of the Somali people, undertaken by the Somalia Aid Coordination Body, comprising donors, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations.

The Council urges all States to contribute generously to the appeal of the United Nations to ensure continued relief and rehabilitation efforts in all regions of Somalia, including those aimed at the strengthening of civil society.

The Council welcomes the continuing efforts of the Secretary-General and the United Nations Political Office for Somalia in Nairobi.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to submit periodic reports on the situation in Somalia.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 12 November 1999 (4066th meeting): statement by the President

At its 4066th meeting held on 12 November 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General on the situation in Somalia dated 16 August 1999,³⁸ submitted pursuant to the request in the statement of the President of 27 May 1999.³⁹

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that despite persistent security threats and rising distribution costs caused by clan conflict, mines and other problems, the United Nations agencies and their humanitarian partners continued to deliver food aid to a high proportion of the most affected areas and to most settlements known to have incorporated displaced families. However, in areas threatened by sporadic armed conflict, aid delivery had not been maintained at requisite levels. He stated that greater investment was needed to strengthen local community capacities and resilience to meet the demands of man-made and natural emergencies. While “loud” emergencies in Somalia had been met by substantial short-term responses from the donor community, the operational capacity of humanitarian agencies had gradually been eroded, primarily owing to inadequate donor support for medium-term rehabilitation measures. Such longer-term support was a prerequisite for any agency to be able to maintain its staff and its presence. He noted that little or no development had taken place in Somalia for 10 years and the country’s development process had even gone into reverse. In addition, in both informal and formal discussions of the Security Council, Member States had expressed concern about the increasingly evident effects of the lack of a functioning central government in Somalia. Somalia was different from other African societies in crisis, given its fundamentally homogeneous character. There was no major religious divide, ethnic division or dispute over the allocation of wealth derived from natural resources. Rather, Somalia was a polity in crisis. He stated that while a negotiated settlement of Somalia’s crisis had continued to be elusive, some important steps forward had been made. Within Somalia itself, there was increasing evidence that ordinary Somalis were tired of violence and were pressuring their leaders to opt for peace. However, several Somali leaders had said that they believed that no progress was possible while Eritrea and Ethiopia continued to be at war and to involve Somali faction leaders in that war. The conflict between Eritrea and Ethiopia was clearly having a highly adverse effect on the situation in Somalia. He noted that while reports of arms flows into Somalia, in contravention of the embargo established by Security Council resolutions 773 (1992), were deeply worrying, the United Nations Political Office for Somalia lacked the requisite mandate and capacity to verify those reports.

He expressed his belief that the stage had been reached at which it might be appropriate for the United Nations to play an enhanced role in Somalia. He proposed that consideration be given to action on two fronts. First, the United Nations, working impartially and objectively with interested Member States, especially with the IGAD process, needed to do more to bring about national unity and the restoration of a national government in Somalia. In addition, consideration might be given as to whether, in advance of political agreements on the formation of a national government, actions could be taken by the international community to assist Somalia to recover its sovereignty in certain limited fields, for example the protection of offshore natural resources. Efforts could also be made to limit the introduction of illegal arms and weapons. Other possibilities might exist in the area of developmental assistance.

At the same meeting, the President (Slovenia) made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴⁰

The Security Council recalls the report of the Secretary-General of 16 August 1999 on the situation in Somalia.

The Council reaffirms its commitment to a comprehensive and lasting settlement of the situation in Somalia, bearing in mind respect for the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence and unity of Somalia, in accordance with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations.

The Council expresses its grave concern at the increasingly evident effects of the lack of a functioning central government in Somalia. It regrets the fact that most children receive no health care and that two generations have had no access to formal education. It is concerned that some Somali natural resources are being exploited, mainly by foreigners, without regulation and monitoring. It expresses its deep distress over reports that the absence of law and order in the country risks creating a haven for criminals of all kinds.

The Council welcomes the progress that has been made in the development of a greater uniformity of approach on the part of the international community in addressing the crisis in Somalia. It recognizes that the Standing Committee on Somalia, created a year ago, has been instrumental in monitoring the evolution of the Somali situation and working for a greater coordination of efforts by the various external actors, in order to avoid contrasting influences and to give weight to common actions. It calls for the strengthening of the coordination of these efforts aimed at securing peace and stability in Somalia.

The Council expresses its full support for the efforts exerted by the Intergovernmental Authority on Development to find a political solution to the crisis in Somalia. In this context, it welcomes the initiative of the President of Djibouti aimed at restoring peace and stability in Somalia, which was outlined in his letter dated 23 September 1999 to the President of the Security Council. It endorses the call made by the President of Djibouti to the warlords to recognize fully and accept the principle that the Somali people are free to exercise their democratic right to choose their own regional and national leaders. The Council looks forward to the finalization of the proposals of the President of Djibouti at the forthcoming summit of the Intergovernmental Authority on Development and stands ready to work with the Intergovernmental Authority and the Standing Committee to help to bring about national unity and the restoration of a national government in Somalia. It calls upon the leaders of the Somali factions and all others concerned to cooperate constructively and in good faith in the efforts to resolve the crisis.

The Council strongly calls upon all States to observe and improve the effectiveness of the arms embargo imposed by resolution 733 (1992) of 23 January 1992 and to refrain from any actions which might exacerbate the situation in Somalia. It urges Member States having information about violations of the provisions of resolution 733 (1992) to provide this information to the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 751 (1992) of 24 April 1992, with a view to supporting the work of the Committee.

The Council expresses its grave concern at the continuing deterioration of the humanitarian situation in Somalia. It urges all States to contribute generously to the appeals of the United Nations to ensure continued relief and rehabilitation efforts in all regions of Somalia, including those aimed at the strengthening of civil society. In this context, it encourages enhancement of the operational capacity of humanitarian agencies in Somalia through donor support.

The Council expresses its appreciation to all United Nations agencies, other organizations and individuals carrying out humanitarian activities in all regions of Somalia. It calls upon the Somali factions to ensure the safety and freedom of movement of all humanitarian personnel and to facilitate the delivery of humanitarian relief. In this context, it strongly condemns attacks and acts of violence against, and the murder of, humanitarian workers in Somalia, and reiterates its position that those responsible for these acts should be brought to justice.

The Council expresses its satisfaction that despite all the difficulties, approximately half of Somali territory continues to enjoy relative peace. In this context, it notes that local administrations in some parts of the country are beginning to provide some basic services to the people of Somalia.

The Council welcomes the efforts of civil society in Somalia. It is encouraged by the political initiatives of Somalis, through regional conferences, often organized by traditional leaders and informal cross-clan contacts, to find a peaceful solution to the crisis. In this context, it underlines the active role of Somali women's groups.

The Council welcomes the continuing efforts of the Secretary-General and the United Nations Political Office for Somalia in Nairobi.

The Council encourages the Secretary-General to review the role of the United Nations in Somalia, as a prelude to the United Nations playing an enhanced role, aimed at achieving a comprehensive and lasting settlement of the situation in Somalia. This review would include the possible relocation of some United Nations programmes and agencies, as well as the United Nations Political Office, to Somalia. The review should also consider the security situation carefully, as well as the resources that would be necessary to provide a secure environment for United Nations operations in Somalia.

The Council takes note of the recommendation in the report of the Secretary-General of 16 August 1999 that the international community should consider establishing mechanisms which would allow financial assistance to flow into secure and stable areas of Somalia even before a formal central government and other institutions are re-established, with a view to promoting the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence and unity of Somalia.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

4. The situation in Angola

Decision of 8 February 1996 (3629th meeting):
resolution 1045 (1996)

At the 3628th meeting of the Security Council, held on 6 February 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (United States), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Angola, Brazil, Lesotho, Malawi, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal, South Africa, Tunisia, Zambia, and Zimbabwe, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting the Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General dated 31 January 1996 on the United Nations Angola Verification Mission (UNAVEM III) pursuant to Security Council resolution 1008 (1995).¹ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the peace process in Angola had been proceeding at a disappointingly slow pace and the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol was still woefully behind schedule. A deep-seated mistrust and a lack of political will to take decisive measures had prevented the parties from honouring their commitments. However, both the Government and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola (UNITA) had agreed on a new timetable to move the peace process forward. He noted that the promising steps taken by the Government of Angola in the previous weeks were encouraging and he urged UNITA to respond positively by a large-scale and fully verifiable movement of its troops to quartering areas; by releasing all prisoners; and by provision to the United Nations of the information required by the Lusaka Protocol. He stated that the talks on military matters needed to be concluded as a matter of urgency, with workable and fair agreements concerning the incorporation of UNITA troops in the Angolan Armed Forces (FAA) and the gradual demobilization of its other forces. He also urged the President of Angola and the head of UNITA to meet as soon as possible in order to promote mutual confidence and resolve outstanding issues. Although the success of the peace process lay in the hands of the Angolan parties, the failure of past attempts to bring peace to Angola underscored the need for active international involvement and encouragement. He recommended that the mandate of UNAVEM III be extended for a further six months, and stated that he would continue to submit comprehensive reports to the Council every two months. He also noted that large segments of the population still required massive emergency assistance and that the Department of Humanitarian Affairs would issue a revised version of the current inter-agency appeal, extending the existing humanitarian programme through 1996.

The representative of Angola stated that the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol had entered its most decisive and defining stage, but not without difficulties, some of which were caused by non-compliance and violations on the part of UNITA, others obviously resulting from the very nature and complexity of the conflict and from the process of the practical implementation of the Agreement. Major, substantial progress had been made, the most significant aspect being the maintenance of the ceasefire one year after its signing. The main issue was the question of the quartering of the UNITA military forces, their disarmament and demobilization, which was affecting the conclusion of the formation of a single national army and the integration of UNITA cadres into the national unity government. He underlined that they wanted the process to be as transparent as possible and entirely verified by UNAVEM III, in order to avoid any military forces or war materiel escaping the control of the United Nations, as was the case at the time of the Bicesse Accords. He expressed their concern about the continued UNITA military activity in some regions of the country, in a pattern of military movement without prior notification to UNAVEM III and of isolated attacks and ambushes against civilian and military targets alike. He noted that the difficulties posed by UNITA regarding the free movement of people and goods in the areas that were still under its control were one of the other serious obstacles that the implementation of the Protocol was facing since they hampered the free movement not only of Angolan citizens but also of UNAVEM III personnel. He stated that as the new mandate of UNAVEM III began, it was imperative that non-compliance and unjustified delays be prevented and that those responsible be held accountable. The question of humanitarian assistance also needed to be the object of special attention during the new mandate. He also reiterated that there continued to be violations by the Republic of Zaire of the clause contained in resolution 863 (1993) that prohibited the supply of military or any other assistance to UNITA. Zaire, in a clear challenge to the authority of the Council, continued to serve as a base for the UNITA planes that violated Angolan airspace and land clandestinely in areas under its control to obtain supplies of lethal materiel. He hoped that the Council and the Sanction Committee, in particular, would adopt urgent and effective measures to discourage Zaire from engaging in such behaviour, which could only contribute to increasing the obstacles to the implementation of the Accords and which constituted gross interference in the internal affairs of his country. As to the draft resolution, his Government endorsed all positive steps consistent with the present situation concerning the peace process in his country.²

The representative of Italy spoke on behalf of the European Union and associated countries.³ He stated that the European Union welcomed the commitment recently undertaken both by the Government and by UNITA on a new timetable to move the peace process forward. He underlined that it was essential that UNITA confirm its recent pledge to accelerate the quartering of its troops, which had not yet reached significant levels. He noted with satisfaction the steps that had been taken by the Government of Angola in the implementation of the peace process, and encouraged it to speed up compliance. He expressed concern over the delays in demining activities and reports that efforts of the Angolan parties in that area continue to be minimal. The European Union was equally concerned over the further deterioration of the Angolan economy, which was partly a result of complex post-war problems, but which also reflected the Government's difficulty in implementing effective stabilization measures and necessary reforms. The European Union stressed the importance of international support for the peace process in Angola, and underlined the stabilizing role of UNAVEM III in the current fragile situation. He stated that the European Union remained committed to the Angolan peace process and was undertaking demarches with both the Government and UNITA to urge them to make further and rapid progress in the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol.⁴

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that it, as a member of the troika of observer States to the Angolan settlement, was deeply concerned at obstruction of the peace process by UNITA, which was continuing to evade implementation of the priority provisions of the Lusaka Protocol, particularly the quartering and disarmament of troops, thus hindering the normal activity of UNAVEM III, against which it had even launched a propaganda campaign. He expressed belief that it was time for the international community to stop accepting the inconsistency of UNITA and endless manoeuvring vis-à-vis the resolution of a set of military issues. That was particularly important in the light of the fact that the present policy of the leadership of UNITA recalled to a great extent its actions at the end of 1992, when it provoked the breakdown of the Bicesse agreements and the resumption of the civil war. It was also extremely important that at the UNITA quartering points there were real soldiers, with real weapons, and not unarmed youths, as was the case on several occasions. He expressed his belief that the UNITA leadership could have no justification for further procrastination in the release of all prisoners, in providing the United Nations with information on military questions and in ensuring freedom of movement for people and goods throughout the territory of the country. He noted the constructive steps taken by the Government of Angola to strengthen the peace process.⁵

The representative of the United Kingdom expressed their concern that major elements of the Lusaka Protocol had not yet been implemented and underlined that there would be no excuse if UNITA failed to quarter the promised troops by 8 February. He expected that all mercenaries would be repatriated promptly and that the agreement on integrating UNITA troops in the Angolan armed forces would be implemented. He stated that his delegation was disappointed that UNAVEM III radio was not yet properly established, despite the repeated calls of the Council to the Government of Angola on the subject. He also stated that if peacekeeping operations were to be enabled to fulfil their mandates they had to receive funds in full and on time. The operation which they were discussing then was crucial to the restoration of peace and stability to a war-torn country. Conflict in Angola had posed a threat to peace and security more widely in southern Africa, and United Nations mission could not fail because of lack of money.⁶

The representative of France stated that there were good reasons for concern over the lack of progress in implementing the peace process described by the

Secretary-General, although in their view it was natural that after 20 years of war a certain distrust between the belligerents continued. He noted the new commitments undertaken by the two parties and expected them to be scrupulously respected. He also noted that the authorities in Luanda had since tried to demonstrate good will by implementing certain fundamental points of the peace agreement and the encouraging progress by UNITA on the quartering of its troops. However, it was not acceptable for UNITA to refuse to cooperate with UNAVEM III in concluding the task of quartering, and UNITA had to continue the operation to its end, as rapidly as possible. He stated that the agreement defined the level of the participation of UNITA in the new Angolan Armed Forces, but such an agreement would have no effect if UNITA did not allow itself to be disarmed and quartered and if the government forces did not withdraw far enough from the assembly zones or if they sought to take advantage of the disarmament of UNITA. France felt that extending the mandate of UNAVEM III for six months might not send a sufficiently clear signal from the Council. They would therefore prefer that the mandate of the United Nations operation be renewed for three months, thus allowing the Council to re-examine the situation by 8 May, particularly regarding the progress made in the disarmament and quartering of troops.⁷

The representative of the United States stated that, having personally toured the operations of UNAVEM III, she could confirm that the United Nations peacekeepers were critical to the peace process launched by the Lusaka Protocol. However the future of Angola rested with the Government and with UNITA. She noted that to a large extent the Government of Angola had been moving in the right direction. However, the poor performance of UNITA under the Lusaka Protocol had jeopardized the peace process and undermined the viability of UNAVEM III. She underlined that the Council anticipated that if the Secretary-General reported insufficient progress towards implementing the Lusaka Protocol, by either side, then they would re-evaluate the merit of continuing the mandate of UNAVEM III to February 1997.⁸

The representative of Norway stated that his country had participated in UNAVEM II and III with military observers, and supported the renewal of the mandate and would continue their participation. However the numerous delays in the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol remained a matter of grave concern. He therefore urged the parties to the Protocol, and in particular UNITA, to continue to commit themselves fully and faithfully to implementing its provisions and to respect and maintain the ceasefire throughout the country. The reports of deteriorating security for humanitarian activities, especially in areas controlled by UNITA, were disturbing. He stressed the importance they attached to UNITA and the Government continuing to cooperate fully with the international humanitarian relief effort.⁹

The representative of the United States, in her second intervention, stated that she had spoken to the head of UNITA, Mr. Jonas Savimbi, that afternoon. She had expressed her nation's concern that the quartering process was seriously behind schedule and that UNITA would not be able to honour its commitments. He had acknowledged that the quartering was behind schedule but had stated that he was working around the clock to fulfil his commitments. She had also reminded him that the troops were required to bring their weapons with them and he had stated that they were. He had also confirmed that owing to a lack of communication from UNITA troops there had been instances where UNAVEM had sent transport for UNITA troops but the troops had not been at the appointed location. She had also informed him that the Council meeting was a sign that the international community was following developments very closely.¹⁰

The representative of Portugal stated that Portugal had been deeply committed to the process in Angola, first as a mediator in the negotiations which led to the "Acordos de Paz" and now as a member of the troika of observer countries and they shared the concerns with the delays in the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol. They were particularly concerned with the slow pace at which UNITA troops were being quartered and with reports that the combatants moving towards the quartering area were either very young or very old and many of them unarmed. He underlined that UNAVEM III was not a buffer force between the parties in conflict: its aim was to monitor compliance with the "Acordos de Paz" and the Lusaka Protocol. Therefore, it was essential that it should impose strict controls on the

⁸ Ibid., pp. 20-21.

⁹ Ibid., pp. 21-22.

¹⁰ Ibid., pp. 20-21.

armaments of UNITA, including its heavy weapons. He urged the President of Angola and the head of UNITA to meet as soon as possible. Regarding the mandate of UNAVEM III, Portugal considered that the use of the duration of the mandate of UNAVEM III as a form of pressure towards the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol was probably not the best solution for the Council to act upon at this stage. In his view, in order to apply pressure effectively, the Council resolution needed to be tailored to include an operative paragraph establishing clearly a review of the implementation of the provisions of the Lusaka Protocol, which could take place on a monthly basis. In this way, the Council would send a strong signal that it would be closely monitoring developments in Angola, and that at any moment it could consider new action required in the light of any developments, such as imposing restrictive measures against any offending party.¹¹

The representative of New Zealand while noting that there had been some positive progress of a limited nature, stated that a pro-active Security Council using the various tools at its disposal under Chapter VI of the Charter, was the best response to the current situation. He stated that his Government was pleased at the report of the Secretary-General which noted progress in the area of mine clearance, where New Zealand had made a serious commitment. However, mine clearance had not been without its problems and the key to the future would be the integration of the programme into the work of UNAVEM III. Regarding the draft resolution, he believed that it would be a mistake to try to put pressure on the parties by establishing an artificially short time-period for the mandate. In his view, the best way to signal a determination to keep up the pressure was by insisting on regular review periods within the mandate. He requested that the draft resolution take a firm and even-handed approach to both of the parties in Angola and a firm approach on the question of mine clearance and that it reinforce the importance of the human rights component in the United Nations presence.¹²

Several other speakers spoke calling on both parties to adhere to the Lusaka Protocol and to the timetable for its full implementation, underlining the importance of UNITA implementing all commitments particularly the quartering of its troops, noting positive actions by the Government of Angola, calling on both parties to cooperate with UNAVEM III and humanitarian agencies and agreeing to support the extension of the mandate of UNAVEM III. Some speakers called on UNITA to immediately release all prisoners, for both parties to cooperate in demining activities and for UNAVEM III radio to be given access to the airwaves. Some speakers also noted that international assistance would be forthcoming only if both parties provided proof of their will for peace. Some speakers also expressed concern about the financial situation of UNAVEM and called on Member States to pay their assessed contributions.¹³

At the 3629th meeting of the Security Council, held on 8 February 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President, in accordance with the decision taken at the 3628th meeting, invited the representative of Angola to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting the Council again included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General dated 31 January 1996 on the United Nations Angola Verification Mission, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1008 (1995).¹⁴

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations¹⁵ and to several revisions made to the text. The draft resolution, as orally revised, was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1045 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 31 January 1996,

Reaffirming its commitment to preserve the unity and territorial integrity of Angola,

Reiterating the importance it attaches to the full implementation by the Government of Angola and the União

Decision of 24 April 1996 (3657th meeting): statement by the President

At the 3657th meeting of the Security Council, held on 24 April 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Chile), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General dated 4 April 1996 on the United Nations Angola Verification Mission pursuant to Security Council resolution 1045 (1996).¹⁶

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the progress achieved in the period covered by the report was limited and had not fulfilled the hopes generated by the meeting between the President of Angola and Mr. Savimbi on 1 March. Much remained to be done to fulfil the tasks that the two sides had agreed to undertake in accordance with the then adjusted timetable; implementation was once again behind schedule. He underlined that complete and fully verifiable quartering by UNITA of its troops was the key element, and the results so far were inadequate. He called on the Government and UNITA to implement in good faith, and within the agreed timeframe, the provisions of the Lusaka Protocol, as well as the crucial agreements reached at Libreville concerning the completion of the quartering process, the formation of the new armed forces and the establishment of a government of national unity and reconciliation.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁷

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 4 April 1996 on the United Nations Angola Verification Mission III pursuant to paragraph 21 of Council resolution 1045 (1996) of 8 February 1996.

The Council notes that some progress has been achieved during the past two months in the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol, although it has been limited and has not fulfilled the hopes generated by the meeting between President dos Santos and Mr. Savimbi in Libreville, on 1 March 1996. The Council stresses the importance it attaches to the full implementation of the Protocol. The Council reminds President dos Santos and Mr. Savimbi of their commitments and urges them to take the necessary actions to move the peace process forward.

The Council notes that the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola has quartered more than 20,000 of its troops, but expresses concern over delays in the quartering of troops and urges the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to move expeditiously to achieve full quartering of its troops. The Council expresses concern about the quality of weapons surrendered by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola and urges it to fulfil its commitment to turn over all of its arms, ammunition and military equipment as the quartering process continues. It reiterates that the quartering process is a crucial component of the peace process and stresses the need for quartering to be credible and fully verifiable. The Council expresses its concern at the statements made by Mr. Savimbi on 13 and 27 March 1996. In this context, the Council urges all Angolan leaders to consider carefully the effect of public statements on the climate of confidence necessary to nurture the peace process. It also urges the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to release all remaining prisoners.

The Council recognizes with satisfaction the progress by the Government of Angola in the implementation of its commitments under the Lusaka Protocol and the current timetable, and encourages the Government to continue this progress. The Council emphasizes the importance of completion of the calendar of actions for April, including, the continuation of the pull-back of government forces from areas near the quartering sites of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, the return of the rapid Reaction police to barracks, the resolution of the question of amnesty for officials of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola and the adoption of a plan to disarm the civilian population, as well as the quartering of troops of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola. The Council encourages the two parties to complete the integration of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola into the Angolan Armed Forces.

The Council also encourages the Government to grant the Mission the requisite facilities for the establishment of an independent United Nations radio.

The Council stresses its concern at the extensive presence of landmines throughout Angola and expresses support for the efforts of the United Nations, the Government and non-governmental organizations to address this problem. The Council urges the Government and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to destroy their stockpiles of anti-personnel landmines. It encourages them to make a meaningful public gesture towards destruction of landmines which could have a positive effect on public confidence and the free circulation of people and goods.

The Council notes with concern credible reports of continuing purchases and delivery of weapons to Angola and considers that such actions are contrary to paragraph 12 of resolution 976 (1995) of 8 February 1995 and undermine confidence in the peace process. The Council reaffirms the obligation of all States to implement fully the provisions of paragraph 19 of resolution 864 (1993) of 15 September 1993.

The Council emphasizes that the ultimate responsibility for restoring peace rests with the Angolans themselves. The Council reminds the parties that extension of the mandate of the Mission will be based, to a large part, on progress by the two parties towards meeting the goals set by the Lusaka Protocol.

The Council condemns the incident on 3 April 1996 which resulted in the death of two Mission personnel, the wounding of a third, and the death of a humanitarian assistance official, and reiterates the importance it attaches to the safety and security of Mission and humanitarian assistance personnel. The Council notes the cooperation offered by the Angolan Government and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola with the investigation by the Mission of this deplorable incident.

The Council reiterates its gratitude to the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, the staff of the Mission, and the three observer countries whose unflagging service to the cause of peace has been outstanding. The Council will continue to monitor the situation in Angola closely and requests the Secretary-General to continue to keep it informed of progress in the Angolan peace process.

Decision of 8 May 1996 (3662nd meeting): resolution 1055

At the 3662nd meeting of the Security Council, held on 8 May 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (China), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting the Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General dated 30 April 1996 on the United Nations Angola Verification Mission pursuant to Security Council resolution 1045 (1996).¹⁸

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that progress in implementing the Lusaka Protocol had been disappointingly slow and many of the tasks which the parties had agreed to carry out remained unfulfilled. The quartering of UNITA troops had virtually stalled and paragraph 8 of Security Council resolution 1045 (1996) remained largely unfulfilled. The repeated failure of the UNITA leadership to honour its commitments had reinforced the doubts about its good faith; further procrastination could not be justified and, if continued, could bring about the collapse of the whole peace process, with consequent interruption of the international aid Angola required for reconstruction, rehabilitation and demining. Other areas of acute concern were the delays in reaching agreement on the incorporation of UNITA personnel into the joint armed forces and the formation of the Government of National Unity and Reconciliation by mid-July 1996. In light of the unsatisfactory state of affairs, he recommended that the mandate of UNAVEM III be extended for a period of two months.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁹ The President then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 8 May 1996 from Angola addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting the text of the "Amnesty Law".²⁰

The representative of Angola reiterated his full and unconditional commitment to peace and reconciliation and his Government's support for the UNAVEM III and the Lusaka Protocol. He stated that at the current pace, and if no additional measures were taken to convince UNITA to accelerate the demobilization, quartering would not be completed on schedule. Since the Government wanted to preserve the hope for a positive outcome of the peace process, he requested the Security Council to take diplomatic measures to persuade UNITA to live up to its commitments so that all could jointly move towards peace, progress, democracy and the well-being of all Angolans. He noted that the Government of Angola had completed many essential tasks, with the aim of creating an environment of confidence, including producing a revised text of the law of amnesty. He stated that even though UNITA had not met the deadlines or troop-level goals for demobilization, they were ready to move forward with the immediate integration of UNITA troops into the Angolan Armed Forces. He informed the Council that they had undertaken joint military missions with UNAVEM III and with UNITA personnel to verify that FAA forces had not occupied areas vacated by UNITA, had found solutions to the concerns expressed by UNITA related to its presence in the Lundas, the country's diamond region, and had reiterated their invitation to Mr. Savimbi to join the Government as a Vice-President. He noted that they had announced their full support for the initiative promoted by the United States and 30 additional Governments with a view to banning the use of land mines. All of those steps demonstrated the Government's commitment to peace and national reconciliation. With regard to a time limit, he urged the Security Council to agree that if UNITA had not met the targets for the conclusion of the national armed forces and the demobilization of UNITA, the timing and numbers for which had been established by the draft resolution, the United Nations should move quickly to review the situation, to meet directly with the head of UNITA, to emphasize the urgency of the situation and to implement the measures contained in resolution 864 (1993).²¹

The representative of Italy spoke on behalf of the European Union and the associated countries.²² He expressed the European Union's deep concern over the slow pace of the quartering of UNITA troops. He called on the Government of Angola to fully comply with its own obligations under the Lusaka Protocol by continuing the withdrawal of its forces to the nearest barracks and by completing the quartering of the rapid reaction police under UNAVEM monitoring. The European Union appealed to both parties to undertake without delay the disarmament of the civilian population and to show better cooperation with the civilian police component of UNAVEM III. Noting that the slow progress in demining activities was also of great concern, he stated that the parties needed to cooperate fully in the first place by destroying their stockpiles of landmines, by allowing UNAVEM III and the mine clearance companies to operate unhindered and by transmitting all the information they had available on the location of minefields. Graduates of the mine clearance courses run by the United Nations should be promptly employed in operations in the field. In the light of the various acts of aggression against United Nations personnel and other international officials, he also called on all parties to renew their commitment to guarantee the security of such personnel, who were working on behalf of the entire country. He welcomed the decision of the Secretary-General to instruct his Special Representative to give priority to human rights issues. Noting that two months was an unusually brief mandate for the largest peacekeeping operation of the United Nations, he stated that many uncertainties still existed, particularly in relation to the pledges made by the leadership of UNITA. He expressed the belief that compliance with the commitments undertaken in the Lusaka Protocol would be ensured only by constant international pressure and stated that the European Union fully backed all diplomatic efforts aimed at preserving the spirit of Lusaka, and was directly committed to the objective of a long-lasting peace in Angola.²³

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Honduras stated that there were clear delays in meeting the successive timetables agreed by the parties and that particularly UNITA needed to accelerate the quartering of its troops, in accordance with the provisions of Council resolution 1045 (1996). He stated that it was necessary that an end be put to hostile propaganda and for the Government of Angola to facilitate the establishment of a United Nations radio to help in confidence-building and in national reconciliation. He stated that they would vote in favour of the draft resolution, although, taking into account the fact that many tasks remain pending in the peace process in Angola, they would have preferred a longer period of time to make it possible for UNAVEM to fully accomplish its mission.²⁴

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that his Government, as a member of the troika of observers, had spared no effort to attain the goal of lasting peace and stability. He stated that the obstructionist policy of UNITA in quartering and disarming its troops was of particular concern and that the UNITA leadership had again failed to comply with its obligations and to quarter its troops by 8 May, in accordance with Security Council resolution 1045 (1996). Also, no decision had yet been made in respect of UNITA representation in the integrated command of the Angolan Armed Forces, which had hampered the creation of a unified army and the demobilization of those soldiers who would like to return to a normal life. Given the security guarantees offered to UNITA, they deemed inadmissible any linkage between the quartering and disarming process and other matters that were sometimes pushed artificially to the fore. They expected that the Government of Angola would likewise fulfil the tasks incumbent on it in this plan of action. He maintained that one important component of the peace process requiring complementary efforts from both Angola parties was their speedy completion of negotiations on the entire complex of military questions. He stated that the draft resolution established the appropriate controls for monitoring the compliance of the Angolan parties with the agreed plans and contained a stern warning on the inadmissibility of delay in the peace process, which was already far behind schedule.²⁵

Several other speakers, speaking both before and after the vote, praised the progress that had been made in the peace process, expressed concern over the slow pace at which it was progressing, particularly the fact that the quartering and disarming of UNITA troops was not being completed as scheduled; called on both parties to cooperate with and ensure the safety of UNAVEM III and United Nations and international personnel; called on the parties to complete the remaining steps including the integration of UNITA soldiers into the FAA, disarmament of the civilian population and the establishment of the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation; and urged them to use the two-month extension of the mandate to deal with all outstanding issues. Several speakers underlined the importance of mine clearance, and called for an acceleration of efforts with the active cooperation of the Angolan parties. Several speakers also underlined the importance of economic development and urged the international community to provide the necessary assistance in order to reconstruct the Angolan economy.²⁶

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1055 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General dated 30 April 1996,

Reaffirming its commitment to preserve the unity and territorial integrity of Angola,

Reiterating the importance it attaches to the full and timely implementation by the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola of the "Acordos de Paz", the Lusaka Protocol and relevant Security Council resolutions,

Recognizing that although some progress has been made towards consolidating the peace process, the overall pace has been disappointingly slow,

Noting with concern the repeated delays in the implementation of successive timetables agreed to by the two parties, in particular the quartering of troops of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola and the completion of talks on military issues regarding the integration of the armed forces,

Taking note that five months have elapsed since the first troops of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola arrived in quartering areas, and expressing concern that prolonging the stay of troops in quartering areas puts strains on United Nations resources and on discipline within the ranks of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola,

Noting the agreement reached between the President of Angola and the President of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola in Libreville on 1 March 1996 on the formation of the unified armed forces by June 1996 as well as the establishment of the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation between June and July 1996,

Recalling its resolution 976 (1995) of 8 February 1995 which stated, inter alia, the expectation that the United Nations Angola Verification Mission III would complete its mission by February 1997,

Emphasizing the need for adequate security for all United Nations and other international personnel, and awaiting the results of the investigation of the deaths on 3 April 1996 of two military observers of the Mission and a humanitarian assistance official,

Underlining the need for respect for human rights, and urging the Angolan parties to give greater attention to preventing and investigating incidents of human rights abuse,

Expressing concern at the extensive presence of landmines throughout Angola, and emphasizing the need for the political will to speed up demining efforts to enable the free circulation of people and goods and to restore public confidence,

Stressing the importance of the demilitarization of Angolan society, including the disarmament of the civilian population and the demobilization and social reintegration of ex-combatants,

Reiterating the importance of the reconstruction and rehabilitation of the Angolan national economy and its vital contribution to a durable peace,

28. Reiterates its readiness, in the light of recommendations by the Secretary-General and the state of affairs in Angola, to consider any further measures;

29. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

The representative of Germany stated that by extending the mandate, the international community had underlined its readiness to promote the peace process. However, both parties in Angola had to be reminded that the lack of progress since the last extension of the mandate of UNAVEM had given rise to serious doubts as to the will for peace. Therefore, all means needed to be deployed to make clear to both parties to the conflict what would be the consequences in the event of a further stagnation of the peace process. He stated that there would be no United Nations peacekeeping operation in Angola after February 1997. The Government of Germany had provided shelters and water treatment equipment for the assembly sites. He stated that the Government of Germany attached particular importance to the question of mine clearance, and deplored the fact that the efforts of UNAVEM still encountered obstruction, especially by UNITA. He reiterated a call for a complete end of arms deliveries to Angola, stating that any further purchases of arms could only raise suspicions concerning the respective commitment to the peace process. He stated that finally, the question of good governance and economic reform had to be addressed.²⁷

The representative of Poland stated that despite some positive developments the parties in Angola remained well behind their agreed schedule. He stated that they were particularly anxious about the degree of compliance by UNITA with the obligation to quarter its troops, the lack of final agreement between the parties on the formation of the Angolan Armed Forces and the formation of the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation. He also expected them to respect the UNAVEM III mandate and to guarantee the security and safety of its personnel, as well as of all the international personnel working in their country. Finally, the Polish delegation supported the idea of holding an open debate on the situation in Angola before the current UNAVEM III mandate expired, in order to assess the progress made by the parties and to discuss related issues, including the future of UNAVEM III.²⁸

Decision of 11 July 1996 (3679th meeting):

At the 3679th meeting of the Security Council held on 11 July 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (France), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Algeria, Angola, Brazil, Cape Verde, Malawi, Mozambique, Portugal, Tunisia, South Africa, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zimbabwe, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting the Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Angola Verification Mission pursuant to Security Council resolution 1055 (1996).²⁹

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that though the pace of implementation of the Lusaka Protocol had improved somewhat, the parties had not fulfilled the time frame agreed upon. Continuing delays in the quartering of UNITA troops, the high number of desertions from the quartering areas, the unsatisfactory quality and quantity of weapons and ammunition handed over, the failure to quarter UNITA police personnel and the incomplete withdrawal of FAA from forward positions all required urgent corrective actions if the peace process was to retain credibility. The picture was no more reassuring on the political front, as the parties had yet to take a number of steps towards the formation of the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation. It was also essential that the question of the post of Vice-President to be occupied by UNITA should be expeditiously resolved. He noted that the demobilization and socio-economic reintegration of former combatants was another essential precondition for lasting peace in Angola. He stated that the continued involvement of UNAVEM III, particularly at the stage of the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol, remained essential. Therefore, he recommended that its mandate be extended for three months, until 11 October 1996. He had also initiated contingency planning for the phased downsizing of its military component as soon as the quartering process had been successfully concluded and the incorporation of UNITA troops into FAA and the formation of the unified armed forces had reached an advanced stage.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.³⁰

At the same meeting the President also drew the attention of the Council to the text of a note verbale dated 26 June 1996 from Angola addressed to the Secretary-General,³¹ transmitting a letter from the President of Angola to the Secretary-General asking that he send to Angola a Security Council mission, by the end of the current month, with the aim of evaluating the process and leaving UNITA with recommendations that advise it against taking any actions that might lead to new delays in the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol and that might provoke disturbances for the UNAVEM III peace mission.

The Vice-Minister without Portfolio of Angola underlined some of the achievements of the Government in implementing the Lusaka Protocols, but stated that in spite of those efforts, the process had moved forward slowly and the achievement could have been more significant with greater cooperation from UNITA. The main obstacle was the quality of UNITA forces and of the materiel sent to the quartering areas. It was therefore, incumbent upon the Council and UNAVEM III to take action that would help improve performance in the quartering process. He stated that they were also concerned by the proliferation of armed elements under UNITA command. He stated that by 30 July 1996 the Government should have re-established control over all areas controlled by UNITA, which by then should become a legal political party, with members participating in the Government. He also underlined that it was essential for Angola's neighbours to suspend any negative actions that might reduce the chances of success. The constant violations of Angolan territory by illegal aliens and by foreign enterprises were an issue that needed to be considered by the Sanctions Committee of the Council. Noting that paragraph 19 of resolution 864 (1993) clearly called on Member States to maintain a posture conducive to peace in their country, refraining from actions that might violate the security of any nation, he appealed to the Council to act in accordance with its high responsibilities in that area. He also appealed to the international community for assistance in the social reintegration of soldiers being demobilized and the economic rehabilitation of the hardest-hit areas. As the process neared its conclusion, he called on the Security Council to send a special mission to Angola to assess the peace process and to recommend measures appropriate to the situation, before declaring the Lusaka Protocol fully implemented. He stated that they agreed to the extension of the mandate of UNAVEM III for another three months.³²

The representative of Portugal stated that they were pleased to note some positive developments which had taken place, however the pace of implementation was too slow and he, therefore, appealed to the parties to take the necessary steps to achieve a lasting peace. He stated that despite the progress in quartering UNITA personnel, it was urgent that the process be completed in accordance with the Joint Commission time table and the handing over of heavy military equipment. It was also important to continue the withdrawal of Angolan armed forces to barracks, and intensify efforts at demining. As a member of the troika of observer countries of the peace process he stated that the possibility of a meeting at the earliest opportunity between the President of Angola and the head of UNITA was encouraging. He stated that while Portugal encouraged all efforts aimed at transforming UNITA into a political party, they also looked forward to concrete measures leading to the formation of a Government of Unity and National Reconciliation. He reiterated his belief that national reconciliation could only be achieved through the full implementation of the “Acordos de Paz” and of the Lusaka Protocol.³³

Several other speakers spoke, both before and after the vote, welcoming the progress made in implementing the Protocol, expressing concern over the delayed quartering of UNITA and its reluctance to hand over better-quality and heavy weapons and participation in the Government, appealing to donors for support for demobilization and reintegration, calling on the President of Angola and the leader of UNITA to meet to resolve all outstanding differences and stating their support for the extension of the mandate of UNAVEM III.³⁴

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1064 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Decision of 11 October 1996 (3703rd meeting):

By a letter dated 7 October 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁵ Zimbabwe informed the Council that the summit meeting of the Southern African Development Community (SADC) had selected a five-man team composed of the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of Angola, Botswana, Mozambique, South Africa and Zimbabwe (Chairman) to proceed to New York in order to participate in the debate on the peace process in Angola and, therefore, had requested a meeting of the Security Council to consider the critical situation in Angola on Thursday, 10 October 1996.

At its 3702nd meeting, held on 10 October 1996, the Council included the letter and the progress report of the Secretary-General dated 4 October 1996 on UNAVEM III in its agenda.³⁶ After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Honduras), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Algeria, Angola, Brazil, Burundi, Cape Verde, Costa Rica, Cuba, India, Lesotho, Mali, Portugal, Tunisia, Zambia and Zimbabwe, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that while the ceasefire was holding, the lack of significant progress in the peace process was a source of particular concern and the continuing delays, particularly on the part of UNITA, were no longer acceptable. He stated that the failure of the leader of UNITA to attend the SADC summit held at Luanda was unfortunate as his participation in the summit would have provided a good opportunity for a meeting on Angolan soil with the President of Angola to resolve key outstanding issues. He underlined that if UNITA genuinely felt that their leader, Mr. Savimbi, could not assume a vice-presidential post, it was incumbent on it to make a meaningful counter-proposal as soon as possible. He maintained that unless the donor community provided the indispensable additional resources, the demobilization and reintegration process would come to a halt and he urged that they provide the required support and fulfilled the pledges made at the 1995 Brussels Round Table Conference. Despite the fact that the date envisaged for the completion of the mandate of UNAVEM III was fast approaching, he stated that it would be possible for UNAVEM III to fulfil most of its mandated tasks by February 1997. It was therefore his intention to initiate the downsizing of the Mission, although further troop reductions would be made in accordance with the progress achieved in implementing the remaining provisions of the Lusaka Protocol. He would present a detailed schedule for the drawdown of military units, as well as recommendations regarding the role the United Nations should play in Angola to consolidate the peace process in his next report. He recommended that unless serious progress was made, the Council should consider only a short extension of the mandate, so that it could keep the situation under close review.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to identical letters dated 1 October 1996 from the representative of Angola addressed to the Secretary-General and to the President of the Security Council informing the Council of difficulties in implementing the Lusaka Protocol,³⁷ including the rejection by the leader of UNITA of the post of Vice-President, and calling on the Council to impose sanctions on UNITA; and a letter dated 10 October 1996 from the representative of Zimbabwe addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁸ transmitting the communiqué of the Summit of the SADC Organ on Politics, Defence and Security, held on 2 October 1996.

The Minister for Foreign Affairs of Zimbabwe, speaking as the Chairman of the SADC ministerial delegation to the Security Council, stated that the Heads of State of the members of the SADC Organ on Politics, Defence and Security had met in Luanda with the intention of giving a fresh impetus to the Angola peace process and had invited the UNITA leader, who, however, had decided not to turn up. It was a matter of great disappointment to them that Angola was no nearer peace than the last time the Council met, and instead delays in meeting the targets laid out in Security Council resolution 864 (1993) were not only undermining the peace process, but were threatening to unravel the gains made thus far. While the Government of Angola had taken a number of positive steps, including launching the programme for the disarmament of the civilian population ahead of schedule, UNITA had dismally failed to honour its commitments. Moreover, the Secretary-General's report had clearly revealed that UNITA had been obstructing the deployment of UNAVEM III by hindering the movement of personnel and aircraft. He maintained that the no-peace no-war state in Angola was undermining the stability of the region as a whole and it was time the Security Council exercised its authority in a clear and decisive manner to salvage the Angolan peace process and restore the credibility of the United Nations. He stated that if UNITA did not comply with the commitment it had voluntarily undertaken, then the following additional measures would be taken against it: all UNITA bank accounts would be frozen; its office would be closed and no new ones allowed to open; the non-issuance of visas to UNITA leaders and personnel; and the limitation of trips to Bailundo or Andulo to peace process-related missions. Those measures should come into force within 30 days of the adoption of a resolution, which, inter alia, contained the above provisions, unless UNITA fully complied with the Lusaka Protocol.³⁹

The Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Angola stated that the situation in Angola was characterized by a serious crisis of confidence, which was the result of systematic delays caused by UNITA. Fundamental measures, including the return of UNITA members to the National Assembly, had been postponed due to lack of cooperation. He stated that the Government had already fulfilled all its duties as envisaged in the Lusaka Protocol, except those related to the disarming of the civilian population, and those tasks could not be accomplished unless State administration was restored in those areas under UNITA control. He stated that the refusal of the leader of UNITA to accept the vice-presidency and to take part in the SADC summit was clear evidence that his designs differed from those of the Government and the international community. His Government felt that the time had come to exert greater pressure to compel UNITA to carry out the areas of the Lusaka Protocol still pending. He reminded the Council that one of the pressure mechanisms, adopted in Security Council resolution 864 (1993), provided for the application of sanctions against UNITA but had never been fully applied. He stated that it was the time for the Council to apply the second package of sanctions under paragraph 26 of Council resolution 864 (1993), since only by exerting effective pressure would they succeed in forcing UNITA to abide by Security Council decisions.⁴⁰

The Minister for Foreign Affairs of Mozambique stated that although the ceasefire continued to hold, he was concerned with the slow pace of implementation of major provisions of the Lusaka Protocol by UNITA. Moreover, restrictions imposed by them on mine clearance and road rehabilitation activities would only delay the undertaking of the needed humanitarian relief operations. He noted that the SADC Organ on Politics, Defence and Security had expressed deep regret over the absence of the leader of UNITA from the meeting and had made a strong appeal for UNITA to fulfil its commitments. He maintained that peace in Angola was a regional concern and that continued instability there had prevented the country from contributing to the implementation of projects envisaged by their Community and had hindered regional efforts at creating a favourable environment for investment. He expressed his belief that in order to ensure the expeditious implementation of the “Acordos de Paz” and all relevant Council resolutions, the Council needed to send a strong message to UNITA.⁴¹

The Minister for Foreign Affairs of Botswana stated that persistent obstruction by UNITA of the activities of UNAVEM III, their policies of procrastination and their reluctance to honour their commitments under the Lusaka Protocol had cast a shadow of doubt on UNITA’s will for peace. He encouraged the Government of Angola and UNITA to hold high-level talks aimed at resolving the outstanding issues and putting the peace process back on track and expressed his hope that the leader of UNITA would respond positively to their invitation to attend the next meeting of SADC on the situation in Angola. He maintained that a continuation of the current stalemate could only lead to a new outbreak of hostilities, which would pose a serious threat to peace and stability in southern Africa. The time had come for the Council and the international community to send a firm message that return to hostilities would not be tolerated. He stated that Botswana was convinced that the Council should be prepared to impose on UNITA the measures set out in paragraph 26 of Security Council resolution 864 (1993) and call for the vigorous and strict implementation of the measures outlined in part B of that resolution.⁴²

The representative of the United States stated that they were very troubled to find the peace process nearly at a standstill and he urged UNITA to avail itself of the security of the few remaining months of the mission of UNAVEM III to rapidly complete their commitments, particularly taking their place in the Government, and integrating their senior generals and soldiers in the Angolan army. He stated that the continued commitment of the United States to the success of the peace process was evidenced by the fact that the Secretary of State would visit Luanda next week.⁴³

The representative of China stated that like the SADC countries, they were deeply disturbed by the impasse in the Angola peace process, particularly the delay by UNITA in participating in the formation of Government of National Unity and unified armed forces, and the rejection of the vice-presidency offered to the leader of UNITA. He stated that by doing so UNITA had not only reneged on its own commitments but had harmed the restoration of trust between the two parties. He stated that the Chinese delegation was ready to consider favourably a further extension of the UNAVEM III mandate, and he hoped that the two parties, particularly UNITA, would seize the opportunity by taking concrete measures to redouble their efforts for peace, so that a durable peace would soon reign in Angola and in the whole of southern Africa.⁴⁴ had not yet been fulfilled. The events of the last three months had shown that responsibility for the situation lay primarily with UNITA. The time had come to send UNITA an extremely clear signal on the international community's readiness to take harsh measures to combat attempts to obstruct the peace process. He stated that the draft resolution to be adopted by the Security Council needed to set forth a strict time frame for the compliance of UNITA with a specific list of the most urgent tasks to be carried out to help strengthen trust between the two Angolan parties, and to give a fresh impetus to the peace process. They also needed to issue a clear warning to the leaders of UNITA that if they undermined the implementation of that timetable, the Security Council would very soon consider again imposing additional sanctions against UNITA. He expressed the support of his delegation for the short two-month period of UNAVEM III. He also expressed agreement with the views in the report of the Secretary-General on an orderly and phased downsizing of the United Nations Mission, bearing in mind further progress in the implementation of the provisions of the Lusaka Protocol.⁴⁵

The representative of Portugal stated that they were concerned over the absence of significant progress in the implementation of the peace process and urged UNITA to integrate its Generals and soldiers in the Angolan armed forces and to proceed with the return to the National Assembly. He also noted with concern the increasing number of desertions in the quartering areas and reports that such desertions were organized. He stated that at such a crucial stage of the process, the Security Council should, in the absence of substantial progress on the remaining military and political issues to be resolved, be prepared to consider the imposition of measures. However, the implementation of such measures should be decided upon only after a further evaluation of the situation by the Council following the next report of the Secretary-General.⁴⁶

Several other speakers spoke, expressing concern over the lack of progress in the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol by UNITA, criticizing the refusal of the leader of UNITA to attend the SADC summit and their lack of cooperation with UNAVEM III, and stating their support for the short-term extension of the mandate. Several speakers also endorsed consideration of the proposals made by the SADC summit regarding possible sanctions against UNITA.⁴⁷

The President then adjourned the meeting.⁴⁸

When the Council resumed its consideration of the item at its 3703rd meeting, on 11 October 1996, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution,⁴⁹ prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations. The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1075 (1996), which reads:

Underlining the need for respect for human rights, and stressing the need for the Angolan parties to give greater attention to preventing incidents of human rights abuse and investigating alleged human rights violations,

Emphasizing the importance of a continued and effective United Nations presence in Angola with a view to fostering the peace process and advancing the full implementation of the “Acordos de Paz” and the Lusaka Protocol,

Welcoming the efforts of the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and personnel of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission III, the three observer States to the Angolan peace process, the Organization of African Unity, the Southern African Development Community, and the international community as a whole, and encouraging them to continue their efforts to promote peace and security in Angola,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 4 October 1996;

2. Expresses deep concern at the lack of significant progress in the peace process over the past three months;

3. Expresses concern that the protracted delay in the beginning of the demobilization of personnel of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola from the quartering areas has set the process behind schedule so that progress will be made more difficult by the onset of the rainy season;

4. Stresses that it is imperative that the personnel of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola be moved rapidly from the quartering areas, in the light of the strains which their prolonged presence in quartering areas is placing on the political process, on morale in the camps and on United Nations finances, and in the light of the need to reintegrate expeditiously into the civilian community those not selected for incorporation into the Angolan Armed Forces;

12. Expresses deep disappointment with the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola for delaying the full implementation of the Lusaka Protocol, underlines the importance it attaches to the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola fulfilling its commitments, reaffirmed at its Third Extraordinary Congress held at Bailundo from 20 to 27 August 1996, to complete its transformation from an armed opposition to a political party, and, to this end, calls upon the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola immediately to fulfil the following tasks enumerated in the “Mediation Document” formulated by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General in consultation with the representatives of the observer States and called for by the Lusaka Protocol:

Decision of 11 December 1996 (3722nd meeting): resolution 1087 (1996)

At the 3722nd meeting of the Security Council, held on 11 December 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the progress report of the Secretary-General on UNAVEM III dated 2 December 1996, submitted pursuant to resolution 1075 (1996).⁵⁰ Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Italy), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Angola, Brazil, Lesotho, Malawi, Mauritius, Mozambique, Namibia, Portugal, Sao Tome and Principe, South Africa, the United Republic of Tanzania, Zambia and Zimbabwe, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that while substantial progress had been made in carrying out the major tasks outlined in Security Council resolution 1075 (1996), implementation continued to proceed often only after increased pressure had been applied on the parties. He stated that it was certainly possible and indeed important for the parties to carry out all their obligations in the consolidated mediation timetable before the expiration of the present mandate of UNAVEM III on 11 December 1996. This would enable his Special Representative to concentrate on resolving the key outstanding political issues. He appealed to the Government and UNITA to resolve the issue of the return of UNITA deputies to the National Assembly, to establish the Government of National Unity and Reconciliation, and to reach agreement on the special status of the leader of the largest opposition party before 1 January 1997. He informed the Council that the withdrawal of four military units had been initiated, and as they approached the end of the two-year period foreseen in resolution 976 (1995) for the completion of the operation, he intended to plan for the gradual and progressive withdrawal of the Mission. He recommended that the withdrawal of UNAVEM III military units resume in February 1997, with a view to a complete drawdown within a period of six to seven months. He expressed his belief that a rapid reaction force should be retained, unless the political and security conditions permitted a more expeditious drawdown. In order to conclude the implementation of the tasks contained in the Lusaka protocol, a continued presence of the United Nations would be required after February 1997, and he stated that he would make recommendations on the tasks, mandate and size of a follow-up presence after the withdrawal of the bulk of the Mission's formed military units. He recommended that the present mandate of UNAVEM III be extended until 28 February 1997.

At the same meeting the Council had before it a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,⁵¹ on the basis of the draft resolution submitted by Portugal, the Russian Federation and the United States.

At the same meeting, the President further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 11 December 1996 from the representative of Angola addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵² transmitting a communiqué which refers to the Presidential decrees nominating the nine Generals of UNITA to various posts in the Angolan Armed Forces, in accordance with the declaration issued by the leadership of UNITA.

The representative of Angola stated that substantial progress in the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol had led them to believe that they were now very close to the conclusion of its implementation. He informed the Council that the Vice-Minister without Portfolio had signed the official appointment of the nine UNITA generals. He also noted their concern with the reintegration of the demobilized soldiers into civilian society, and they were making an enormous financial effort to ensure not only the reintegration of the demobilized soldiers but also to finance the costs of transporting them, their weapons and the UNITA soldiers to the quartering areas. He therefore appealed to all donor nations to honour their commitments resulting from the September 1995 Brussels Round Table Conference.⁵³

The representative of Portugal welcomed the fact that UNITA had made a formal declaration on the quartering of its troops and the delivery of its armaments and other materiel and that the Government of Angola had incorporated the nine Generals. Nevertheless, several important provisions of the Lusaka Protocol remained unfulfilled. He stated that they looked forward to firm initiatives from the Government and UNITA towards national reconciliation and hoped to see the establishment of Government of National Unity soon. He stated that they favoured the phased withdrawal of UNAVEM III following the recommendations of the Secretary-General; however, it was crucial that the pace of withdrawal be determined by the progress achieved in the different phases of the process. Finally, he stressed the urgency of making the necessary financial resources available for the demobilization and social reintegration of ex-combatants.⁵⁴

Speaking before the vote, the representative of the Russian Federation noted that a major success had been achieved in the announcements that UNITA had finished the quartering of all its military personnel and the Government of Angola had incorporated the nine UNITA generals into the Armed Forces, thus opening up the opportunity to focus on the outstanding political questions. Regarding the approaching expiry of the mandate of UNAVEM III and its withdrawal, they were in favour of the process being thought through carefully, implemented gradually and sufficiently flexibly, without unjustified delays, but also on the basis of the real status of the peace process. In that context, his delegation felt that it would be useful for the Council, before the end of February 1997, to send its mission to Angola, which would allow them to draft and adjusted strategy and tactics for UNAVEM III in its final phase and to define a position on the basic parameters for a continued United Nations presence in that country.⁵⁵

The representative of the United States stated that they were gratified that the stern warning contained in resolution 1075 (1996) had been heeded and significant progress had been made. Despite those advances, the military tasks remained incomplete and they found themselves once again considering how to urge or compel the parties to act swiftly in meeting their obligations. In particular, they were concerned that the quartering camps remained full of UNITA troops, even though many had been selected for integration in the Angolan Armed Forces or demobilization. He stated that while the success of the quartering process was owed in large measure to the presence of the neutral international military forces of UNAVEM III at the camps, the time had come for the camps to close and UNAVEM to begin withdrawing. He called on the Government and UNITA to deploy integrated units to the former areas occupied by UNITA.⁵⁶

Several other speakers spoke, both before and after the vote, stating their support for the draft resolution, the phased withdrawal of UNAVEM III, depending on the progress made in the peace process, and a follow-up force upon the full implementation of the Lusaka Protocol, and calling on the parties to fulfil their remaining commitment and form the Government of National Unity and Reconciliation as quickly as possible. Several speakers called on the international community to support demobilization and reintegration efforts. Some speakers also supported the idea of sending a Security Council mission to Angola to assess the situation.⁵⁷

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1087 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

4. Approves the recommendation of the Secretary-General to resume withdrawal of formed military units of the Mission during February 1997, as set forth in paragraphs 30 through 32 of his report of 2 December 1996, with the understanding that the pace of withdrawal will be commensurate with progress achieved in the quartering areas, in demobilization and in the extension of State administration, and that the first phase of withdrawal will begin on schedule in February 1997;

6. Stresses that both parties must immediately begin to cooperate on integrating selected officers and troops of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola into the Angolan Armed Forces and on demobilizing those remaining in the quartering areas, and underlines the need for the Government of Angola to make available all necessary funds it has pledged and to speed up the processing of demobilization certificates and other administrative matters;

11. Urges the two parties to reach agreement on the special status of the President of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola as the President of the largest opposition party before 31 December 1996, without linkage of that issue to the formation of a Government of Unity and National Reconciliation;

19. Urges the international community to fulfil expeditiously its pledges to provide assistance to facilitate the rehabilitation and reconstruction of the Angolan national economy and the resettlement of displaced persons, and stresses the importance of such assistance at this time in order to consolidate the gains in the peace process;

21. Expresses its readiness to consider, in that context, the possibility of sending a Security Council mission to Angola before the expiry of the mandate of the Mission;

22. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of Mauritius stated that UNITA was responsible for the protracted process of implementation, since they could only be induced to take significant measures when the situation was due to be renewed by the Council. While his delegation welcomed the adoption of the resolution, it held the view that the Council should seriously consider applying some of the measures against UNITA envisaged in resolution 1075 (1996), notwithstanding unverified declaration of UNITA to the effect that it had quartered all its troops and surrendered all military equipment.⁵⁸

Decision of 30 January 1997 (3736th meeting): statement by the President

At the 3736th meeting of the Security Council, held on 30 January 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Japan), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Angola, at her request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁵⁹

The Security Council expresses its deep concern at the delay in the formation of a Government of National Unity and Reconciliation as a result of the failure of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to meet the timetable established by the Joint Commission in the context of the Lusaka Protocol.

The Council also notes with concern the slow pace of implementation of the remaining military aspects of the peace process, in particular, the demobilization and integration of soldiers of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola into the Angolan Armed Forces.

The Council takes note of the conclusions of the meeting of the Joint Commission on 23 January 1997, according to which the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola agreed to postpone the inauguration of the Government of National Unity and Reconciliation beyond 25 January 1997, the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola agreed to ensure that all of its National Assembly deputies and its designated members of the future Government of National Unity and Reconciliation would be in Luanda on 12 February 1997, and the Government of Angola agreed to set a date for the inauguration of the Government of National Unity and Reconciliation immediately following the arrival of the deputies of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola.

The Council calls upon the parties to implement this agreement strictly and to form the Government of National Unity and Reconciliation without any linkages and without further delay. Failure to implement this agreement could jeopardize the peace process and lead the Council to consider appropriate measures, as indicated in relevant Council resolutions, against those responsible for the delays.

The Council emphasizes that the ultimate responsibility for restoring peace rests with the Angolans themselves. The Council reminds the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola and the Government of Angola that the international community can only provide assistance if progress is achieved in the peace process and that it will consider a United Nations presence in Angola after the expiration of the mandate of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission III in this context.

The Council expresses its appreciation to the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and the three observer countries for their efforts to assist the parties in Angola in advancing the peace process.

The Council will continue to monitor closely the implementation of the agreement of the Joint Commission.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 27 February 1997 (3743rd meeting):
resolution 1098 (1997)

At the 3743rd meeting of the Security Council, held on 27 February 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Kenya), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Algeria, Angola, Brazil, Cape Verde, Lesotho, Malawi, Mali, Mozambique, Namibia, the Netherlands, South Africa and Tunisia, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General on UNAVEM III dated 7 February 1997 pursuant to Security Council resolution 1087 (1997).⁶⁰ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that despite encouraging developments, new delays and difficulties had arisen, especially in connection with the future status of the leader of UNITA, and the pace of implementation of the remaining military and political tasks, owing mainly to the lack of cooperation of UNITA, had been slow and disappointing. If the Government of National Unity and Reconciliation was formed before the expiration of the mandate of UNAVEM III on 28 February 1997, he recommended to the Security Council that the mandate of UNAVEM be extended for a two-month period, with the understanding that it would proceed with the transition towards an observer mission. If the UNITA National Assembly members and officials failed to arrive in Luanda by 12 February and the new Government is not formed, he would recommend that the Council extend the mandate of UNAVEM for one month, until 31 March 1997. After that, the Council might wish to consider appropriate steps to address the situation. He stated that the planned withdrawal of United Nations military units needed to take into account the situation on the ground, and he reiterated his appeal to the international community for contributions to the demobilization and reintegration programmes.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁶¹

The Vice-Minister without Portfolio of Angola stated that advances in the peace process to date would not have been possible without action by the Security Council, which had employed various means of pressure, including, in resolution 864 (1993), enforcement measures against UNITA. However, exerting further pressure on UNITA continued to be necessary because of the excessive delays in the application of the Lusaka accord. He reiterated that the formation of the Government and the swearing in of members of parliament needed to take place unconditionally, without any linkages and within the legal framework defined by the accords, and other agreements that were valid for the peace process. Regarding the end of the mandate of UNAVEM III, he noted that some tasks would continue to require the assistance of the United Nations, such as the extension of State administration, completion of the formation of the Angolan Armed Forces, demobilization and reintegration of former combatants, and demining. In conclusion, he stated his support for the draft resolution.⁶²

Speaking before the vote, the representative of the Russian Federation expressed concern that the peace process was proceeding with difficulty, constantly encountering new obstacles because of the lack of due cooperation on the part of UNITA. The Russian delegation agreed with the conclusion of the report of the Secretary-General that the Council needed to send the Angolan parties, and particularly UNITA, a clear-cut signal on the inadmissibility of further delays in resolving military and other issues and in establishing the Government of National Unity. He expressed his country's support for the option proposed by the Secretary-General to extend the mandate of UNAVEM III until 31 March 1997, with the clear-cut warning that if the Government had not been established by then because of procrastination on the part of UNITA, the Council would have to consider taking appropriate and concrete measures with regard to that organization. He stated that the draft resolution submitted for consideration by the Security Council was adequate to the task.⁶³

The representative of Portugal pointed out that significant tasks in both military and political aspects of the peace process remained unfulfilled and were behind schedule. Since the publication of the report of the Secretary-General, no significant moves had been made in the selection and incorporation of UNITA personnel into the Angolan Armed Forces, in the closure of quartering areas, in the process of demobilization and in the extension of State administration throughout the entire territory of Angola. UNITA bore a special responsibility to demonstrate its commitment to the full implementation of the Lusaka Protocol, without attempting to establish new conditions or linkages. He noted that the complexity of the issues in the Angolan peace process required some flexibility on the part of the international community. At a time when UNAVEM III should be completing its mission, he recognized that the United Nations needed to continue its current mandate in support of the progress. He fully agreed that the pace of the planned withdrawal of former military units needed to take into account the situation on the ground, and not lose sight of the fact that the United Nations was playing a vital role in bringing peace to Angola.⁶⁴

The representative of the United States stated that as they considered the extension of the UNAVEM III mandate, they needed to confront the reality that the time-tables agreed to and the actions promised by the parties in Angola to advance the peace process had not been fulfilled. In addition, the camps established as an interim measure in demobilizing the forces of UNITA were still full, even though the UNAVEM III forces that protect those camps were scheduled to be withdrawn. The draft resolution provided only for a one month extension, during which the remaining personnel of UNAVEM III would continue to perform their missions while the withdrawal continued, and the Security Council would review its involvement in the Angolan peace process. He expressed their deep concern with the primary role of UNITA in the failure of the time-table for the unity Government, and observed that the draft resolution noted the readiness of the Council to consider the imposition of further measures if the Government of National Unity and Reconciliation was not formed by 20 March. Reaffirming the presidential statement of 7 February 1997,⁶⁵ he also warned the parties against any involvement in the conflict in Zaire.⁶⁶

Several other speakers spoke, supporting the one month extension of the mandate of UNAVEM III, expressing concern over the failure to form the Government of National Unity and Reconciliation and calling on UNITA to cooperate in the process without any linkages or further delays, and agreeing that a follow-up mission to UNAVEM II would have an important role in promoting reconciliation and reconstruction. Several speakers stated their support for considering the imposition of measures, including those mentioned in paragraph 26 of resolution 864 (1993), if UNITA failed to cooperate in the peace process.⁶⁷

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1098 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Recalling the statement by its President of 30 January 1997,

Reaffirming its commitment to preserve the unity and territorial integrity of Angola,

Reiterating the importance it attaches to full implementation by the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola of the “Acordos de Paz”, the Lusaka Protocol and the relevant Security Council resolutions,

Deeply concerned at the second delay in the formation of the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation, as a result of the failure of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to meet the timetable established by the Joint Commission, in the context of the Lusaka Protocol,

Decision of 21 March 1997 (3755th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3755th meeting, held on 21 March 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General on UNAVEM III pursuant to Security Council resolution 1098 (1997) by which the Council had requested him to report by 20 March 1997 on the status of the formation of the Government.⁶⁸

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that despite determined and intensive efforts, the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation had not yet been established, owing primarily to the failure of UNITA to send all of its officials to Luanda as previously agreed. The delays were having a negative impact on the implementation of major aspects of the peace process, including the normalization of State administration and the demobilization of excess UNITA personnel. Since the patience of the international community was wearing thin, he had decided to visit Angola from 22 to 25 March 1997 with the intention of making a first-hand assessment of the situation and impressing upon the parties the need to establish the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation without any further delay. During the visit, he would also consult his Special Representative, the representatives of the observer States and other Governments concerned on ways and means of injecting new vigour into the peace process.

At the same meeting, the President (Poland) made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶⁹

The Security Council takes note of the report of the Secretary-General of 19 March 1997 and once again expresses its deep concern that the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation has not yet been established, owing primarily to the failure of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to send all of its officials to Luanda as previously agreed. The Council reminds the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola of its obligations in accordance with the provisions of the Lusaka Protocol and subsequent agreements between the two parties.

The Council expresses its full support for the Secretary-General in his mission to Angola to assess the situation and impress upon the parties the need to establish the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation without any further delay. It calls upon the parties, in particular the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General, his Special Representative, and the Observer States and to use the occasion of the visit of the Secretary-General to install the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation.

The Council remains actively seized of the matter and recalls that, in accordance with resolution 1098 (1997) of 27 February 1997, it will consider the imposition of measures, including those specifically mentioned in paragraph 26 of resolution 864 (1993) of 15 September 1993, against the party responsible for the failure to form the Government of unity and National Reconciliation. The Council, following the next report of the Secretary-General, will also consider the role of the United Nations in Angola after the expiration of the current mandate of United Nations Angola Verification Mission III on 31 March 1997 on the basis of the progress made by the parties to full implementation of their commitments under the "Acordos de Paz" and the Lusaka Protocol, as well as their obligations under the relevant Council resolutions.

Decision of 31 March 1997 (3759th meeting):
resolution 1102 (1997)

At the 3759th meeting of the Security Council, held on 31 March 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Poland), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Angola, at her request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General on UNAVEM III dated 25 March 1997, submitted pursuant to resolution 1098 (1997).⁷⁰

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that while there had been little progress towards the implementation of the remaining aspects of the Lusaka Protocol the meetings held with the President of Angola and the leader of UNITA had given rise to expectations that new vigour could be injected into the peace process. The resolution of the future status of the UNITA leader and his promise to send to Luanda the rest of the UNITA National Assembly deputies and designated officials were encouraging signs. In the meantime, given the uncertainty concerning the exact date for the inauguration of the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation, he recommended that the Security Council consider extending the mandate of UNAVEM III for two weeks only, until 15 April 1997.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,⁷¹ which was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1102 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Recalling the statements by its President of 30 January and 21 March 1997,

Reaffirming its commitment to preserve the unity and territorial integrity of Angola,

Reiterating the importance it attaches to full implementation by the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola of the "Acordos de Paz", the Lusaka Protocol and the relevant Security Council resolutions,

Stressing that it is imperative for the parties to take urgent and decisive steps to fulfil their commitments in order to ensure the continued involvement of the international community in the peace process in Angola,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 25 March 1997,

1. Commends the efforts of the Secretary-General during his recent visit to Angola to move the peace process forward;

2. Welcomes the arrival in Luanda, although after considerable delay in the implementation of the provisions of the Lusaka Protocol, of the deputies of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola and officials of the future Government of Unity and National Reconciliation, in accordance with subsequent agreements between the two parties;

3. Welcomes also the decision by the Government of Angola, as announced by the Joint Commission, to install the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation on 11 April 1997;

4. Calls upon both parties to form the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation on that date;

5. Also calls upon both parties to remove all remaining obstacles to the peace process and to implement without further delay the remaining military and political aspects of the peace process, in particular the incorporation of soldiers of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola into the Angolan Armed Forces, demobilization, and normalization of State administration throughout the national territory;

6. Decides to extend the mandate of United Nations Angola Verification Mission III until 16 April 1997, and requests the Secretary-General to report by 14 April 1997 on the status of the installation of the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation;

7. Also decides that, in accordance with resolution 1098 (1997) of 27 February 1997, it remains ready to consider the imposition of measures, including those specifically mentioned in paragraph 26 of resolution 864 (1993) of 15 September 1993, if the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation is not installed by 11 April 1997;

8. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 16 April 1997 (3769th meeting):
resolution 1106 (1997)

At the 3767th meeting of the Security Council held on 16 April 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Portugal), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Angola, Argentina, Brazil, Cameroon, Lesotho, Malawi, Mozambique, the Netherlands, Peru, Qatar, South Africa, Uruguay, and Zimbabwe, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

UNAVEM III pursuant to Security Council resolution (1997) on the status of the installation of the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation.⁷²

In his report, the Secretary-General informed the Council that on 8 April 1997 the National Assembly had enacted into law the text on the special status of the leader of UNITA and on 11 April, the Government of Unity and National Reconciliations was inaugurated. It was attended by Heads of State and Government, and the leader of UNITA sent a special message which was read out by the UNITA vice-president. He observed that these developments were very encouraging and an essential step forward in the peace process and expressed his hope that the meeting between the President of Angola and the leader of UNITA would soon take place. However, much remained to be done, including the normalization of State administration throughout the whole country, completing the formation of the unified armed forces and police, demobilization of excess UNITA military personnel, determining the status of UNITA radio and the security detachment of the leader of UNITA, the disarmament of the civilian population, and the dismantling of illegal command posts and checkpoints. He stated that he was convinced that the international community needed to remain engaged in Angola until the full implementation of the Lusaka Protocol was achieved. Since the unity Government had been inaugurated, he recommended that the Security Council approve the extension of the mandate of UNAVEM III until 30 June 1997, on the understanding that the operation would proceed with the transition towards an observer mission. He further recommended that the observer mission, to be known as the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola (MONUA), be formally established on 1 July 1997. In addition to the completion of the remaining military tasks, the Observer mission would focus on political, police and human rights aspects, as well as on humanitarian and public information programmes aimed at supporting the national reconciliation process.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁷³

The representative of Angola stated that the inauguration of the Government of National Unity and Reconciliation, and the return of UNITA members to Parliament finally occurred, allowing for the first time the beginnings of the normal operation of the democratic institutions that were put in place after the general elections of 1992. There were however important tasks still to be accomplished. He appealed to the international community to continue to render its valuable support and recalled that it was time to speed up the implementation of the programme of community rehabilitation and national reconciliation adopted during the Brussels Round Table Conference. He stated that the draft resolution contained important requirements for the completion of the Angolan peace process. The pertinent recommendations in paragraph 9 of the Secretary-General's report, regarding the phased and gradual withdrawal of the contingent of UNAVEM III, as well as those in operative paragraph 4 of the draft resolution, were proof of the sincerity and responsibility with which the Angolan peace process had proceeded.⁷⁴

The representative of the Russian Federation noting that the peace process had ascended to a new level, expressed concern about the situation of the political and particularly the military aspects of the Lusaka Protocol. They attached particular importance to the appeal contained in the draft resolution before the Council to fulfil the remaining aspects of the peace process precisely and promptly and promoting their implementation to be the most important part of the mandate of UNAVEM III. As military and political questions were tackled, and as the military contingent of the Verification Mission would be withdrawn, it would be possible to undertake transitional measures for a United Nations presence beyond 30 June 1997. On the whole, his delegation could support the proposals of the Secretary-General in that regard, and would be prepared, in the context of the competencies of the Council, to consider any specific recommendations he might present later.⁷⁵

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the new Government deserved full support. He expressed agreement with the Secretary-General's recommendation that UNAVEM III should continue to provide operational support to the mine clearance programme, on a cost-reimbursable basis from the Department of Humanitarian Affairs, until the end of June. He expressed concern about reports of Angolan involvement in the conflict in Zaire and stated that

Angola needed to refrain from any action that would exacerbate conflict in Zaire. He stated that the international community needed to remain in Angola until the goal of full implementation of the peace agreements was reached and support the recommendation to extend the mandate of UNAVEM III to 30 June 1997 and to deploy a United Nations observer mission thereafter. He attached particular importance to the human rights element of it and to the mission having powers to investigate alleged abuses, as well as to the civilian police and public information programmes.⁷⁶

The representative of the United States congratulated the former Government and UNITA for the formation of the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation and other recent events. However, more needed to be done, and the highest priority was the rapid induction of selected former UNITA personnel into the armed forces and police, and the demobilization of the others, and then the extension of State administration to all parts of the country. He strongly encouraged the president of UNITA, to take advantage of the special position now legally established for him by meeting frequently with the President of Angola, and he hoped that the first meeting would occur at the earliest opportunity. He maintained that the international community still had an important role to play in supporting the process of national reconciliation and reconstruction. By renewing the mandate of UNAVEM III until 30 June 1997, they were signaling their intention to assist the parties to complete the remaining tasks of the peace process and he listed a number of areas where Angola needed international support. Noting the persistent reports of Angolan involvement in the conflict in Zaire, he called upon all Angolans to put an immediate halt to such actions and to give their full support to the international effort left by the United Nations/OAU Representative, to reach a negotiated settlement to the conflict on the basis of the United Nations five-point peace plan.⁷⁷

Several other speakers spoke, welcoming the formation of the Angolan Government of Unity and National Reconciliation; calling on both parties to cooperate in fully implementing the Lusaka Protocol; and expressing support for their extension of the mandate of UNAVEM III and further adjustments in light of the gradual development of the situation in Angola, including a possible follow-on mission.⁷⁸

The Council resumed its consideration of the item at its 3769th meeting, held on 16 April 1997. The President (Portugal), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Botswana, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The representative of Cameroon, speaking as the representative of the Chairman of the OAU, congratulated the parties on the formation of the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation, but noted that there was much that needed to be done. He stated that the international community and all who had played some part in the establishment of the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation had a moral and political obligation to stay engaged in the efforts of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General. The full implementation of the Lusaka Protocol was the objective to be achieved, and they needed to persevere in the task and encourage the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation to resolve all pending issues.⁷⁹

The representative of the Netherlands, speaking on behalf of the European Union and the associated and aligned countries, welcomed the inauguration of the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation, but noted that much remained to be done.⁸⁰ The European Union had provided significant political, financial, material, and personnel support for demining activities in Angola, and hoped that the planned transfer for the responsibility for mine-clearance from UNAVEM III to UNDP would take place soon. He concurred with the Secretary-General's recommendation for the extension of the mandate of UNAVEM III and the transition towards an observer mission. He stated that they attached particular importance to the deployment of human rights officers and of police observers, who would monitor compliance with the peace accords, including freedom of movement throughout the country.⁸¹

The representative of Portugal welcomed the developments in the political situation but noted that being close to peace did not translate into a consolidated peace. He expressed his country's readiness to maintain its assistance programmes, as long as they resulted from the will of the Angolan Government, and he therefore welcomed the United Nations consolidated inter-agency appeal for Angola. The Government of Portugal agreed with the recommendation of the Secretary-General that the Council should approve the extension of the mandate of UNAVEM until 30 June 1997.⁸²

The representative of Angola, replying to the speculation regarding the alleged official involvement of the Government of Angola in the Zaire conflict, stated that from the beginning of the civil unrest in Zaire, the Government of Angola had pleaded for its rapid resolution and appealed very strongly to the parties involved to choose the negotiating table as a means to settle their differences. He strongly rejected the reports suggesting Angolan interference in the internal affairs of Zaire.⁸³

Several other speakers spoke, welcoming the formation of the Angolan Government of Unity and National Reconciliation; calling on both parties to cooperate in fully implementing the Lusaka Protocol; expressing support for their extension of the mandate of the mandate of UNAVEM III and further adjustments in light of the gradual development of the situation in Angola, including a possible follow-on mission.⁸⁴

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1106 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent resolutions,

Reaffirming its commitment to preserve the unity and territorial integrity of Angola,

Reiterating the importance it attaches to fill implementation by the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola of the "Acordos de Paz", the Lusaka Protocol and the relevant Security Council resolutions,

Expressing its satisfaction with the recent progress in the peace process, including the approval by the Angolan National Assembly of the special status for the leader of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola as the Leader of the Largest Opposition Party and the seating of the deputies of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola in the National Assembly on 9 April 1997,

Reiterating that the ultimate responsibility for the completion of the peace process rests with the Angolans themselves,

Having considered the reports of the Secretary-General of 7 February and 14 April 1997,

1. Warmly welcomes the inauguration on 11 April 1997 of the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation;

2. Strongly urges the parties, acting through the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation and with the continued support of the Joint Commission, to complete without delay the remaining military aspects of the peace process, including the incorporation of soldiers the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola into the Angolan Armed Forces, and demobilization, and the selection and incorporation of personnel of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola into the Angolan National Police, as well as to move ahead with the political tasks, in particular the normalization of State administration throughout the national territory; in this context, considers that a meeting between the President of Angola and the leader of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola within the territory of Angola would contribute to this process of national reconciliation, and expresses the hope that such meeting will take place;

3. Welcomes the recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-General of 14 April 1997;

4. Decides to extend the mandate of United Nations Angola Verification Mission III until 30 June 1997 to assist in the implementation of these remaining tasks, with the understanding that the Mission will begin, as appropriate, to proceed with the transition towards an observer mission as described in section W of the report of the Secretary-General of 7 February 1997, using resources already provided or allocated to the Mission for the period ending 30 June 1997;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to complete the withdrawal of military units of the Mission as scheduled, taking into account progress in the remaining relevant aspects of the peace process;

7. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 30 June 1997 (3795th meeting):
resolution 1118 (1997)

At the 3795th meeting of the Security Council held on 30 June 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Russian Federation), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Angola, Argentina, Brazil, Lesotho, Mauritius, Mozambique, the Netherlands, Zambia and Zimbabwe at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The Council included in its agenda the progress report of the Secretary-General dated 5 June 1997 on UNAVEM III pursuant to Security Council resolution 1106 (1997) on his recommendations regarding the structure, specific goals and cost implications of an observer mission in Angola to succeed UNAVEM III.⁸⁵

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that events in Angola since March 1997 had generally been moving in a positive direction. However, the recent tensions in the northern part of the country had underscored the unsettled situation prevailing in some areas of the country. The process of extension of State administration to the areas formerly under UNITA control was proceeding at a slow pace and had given rise to some incidents, including one in which officials were attacked by a local UNITA crowd in an apparently organized protest. Moreover, the psychological and political barriers between the parties were still wide, and, in this connection, the holding of the long-overdue meeting between the President of Angola and the leader of UNITA could accelerate the peace process. He stated that the demobilization of tens of thousands of troops and their reintegration into civil society remained one of the most crucial challenges under the Lusaka Protocol. He once again urged the donor community to provide the urgently needed assistance to IOM for the demobilization programmes. To consolidate the gains made thus far in the peace process, a continued, but scaled-down presence of the United Nations would be required. Therefore, after the expiration of the mandate of UNAVEM III on 30 June 1997, he recommended the establishment, as of 1 July 1997, of a new operation to be known as the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola/Missão de Observação das Nações Unidas em Angola and gave details on its mandate and organizational structure. He stated that the performance of the new mission and its components would be measured against specific indicators, such as the completion of the demobilization process, the incorporation of ex-UNITA combatants into the Angolan Armed Forces and the Angolan National Police, the integration of UNITA personnel in all levels of State administration and other essential tasks. In view of the magnitude of those tasks, he recommended that the new mission be established for a period of seven months until 1 February 1998, after which it would be gradually drawn down in accordance with plans which he would submit by the end of the year.

The representative of the Netherlands spoke on behalf of the European Union and the associated and aligned countries.⁸⁷ He stated that the Council would be adopting a draft resolution creating MONUA, which would take over from UNAVEM III. MONUA was the result of positive developments, including the formation of a Government of National Unity and Reconciliation, the participation of UNITA deputies in the National Assembly and the beginning of the normalization of Government administration. Recent developments in the Democratic Republic of the Congo⁸⁸ had increased tensions in Angola, and he stated that both sides needed to cooperate with the United Nations and grant full access to all areas under their control. The European Union believed that an early meeting within the national territory between the President of Angola and the leader of the largest opposition party would contribute significantly to easing political tension. It would also resolve the precarious military situation in the border area between Angola and the Democratic Republic of the Congo. The transformation of the UNITA radio station into a non-partisan broadcasting facility and the transformation of UNITA into a political party were other remaining political aspects to be completed. He stated that MONUA would have an important role to play in the field of human rights, which was still a reason for concern in Angola. It was also a concern that the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees considered the conditions for the return of refugees and demobilized soldiers unfavourable. It was important that more funds be made available, both for demobilization and for the Office's repatriation programmes.⁸⁹

The representative of Angola stated that the Lusaka Protocol had entered its final stage, although much still remained to be done. He noted that both the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation and Parliament were now working normally, although their impact on the peace process might be affected if all pending military and political matters were not resolved due to the lack of cooperation from UNITA. UNITA continued to hold significant amounts of weapons and forces that were never reported to the UNAVEM III, many of those forces were providing support to the regime in the former Republic of Zaire. Those forces needed to be disarmed, confined to quarters and demobilized. The country's north-eastern areas had in recent times seen a massive influx of people coming from the former Republic of Zaire, including former Zairian soldiers and former Rwandan Hutu militias, and he stated that the Government had felt compelled to take appropriate measures to keep the country's borders from being violated. The Government was working in collaboration with the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to resolve the problem. Taking into account that the military items of the peace process were still pending, his delegation reiterated his country's proposal to defer temporarily the withdrawal of the Blue Helmets, until the fundamental tasks, especially the military one, were completed. He pledged his country's full cooperation and support to MONUA and stated its support for the draft resolution, although it would prefer some improvements in its contents.⁹⁰

The representative of Portugal stated that MONUA was the right response to the current situation in Angola, and would permit the United Nations to remain engaged in the fragile process. On the other hand, the Angolans had to get the message that they needed to seize the opportunity to consolidate peace. He expressed his hope that the long-awaited meeting inside Angola between the President of Angola and the leader of UNITA would take place as soon as possible. He stated that the different components of MONUA would play a crucial role in the important stage of the peace process. In particular, the monitoring of human rights and humanitarian aspects would have a long-term effect on the type of post-war society that would emerge in Angola. In that context, he stated that they fully supported the strengthening of the police component of MONUA as well as its political assistance for promotion of tolerance and national reconciliation. Regarding the military aspects, he agreed with the Secretary-General that the pace of withdrawal needed to be dictated by the situation in Angola and the progress in consolidating peace rather than by external budgetary constraints.⁹¹

The representative of France stated that the formation of a Government of national unity and the participation of UNITA in political life marked a decisive turning point on the path of reconciliation. He noted that the events in the former Zaire had had repercussions in Angola and a shock wave had once again "swept the Angolan parties onto the path of confrontation". Escalation had been avoided due to the completion of important stages. However, tensions had shown that the provisions of the Lusaka Protocol were still being flouted, primarily by UNITA, which still retained significant military strength. UNITA needed to abide by its obligations and understand that only participation in political life could provide it with prospects for the future.⁹²

The representative of the United Kingdom expressed support for withdrawing UNAVEM III and establishing a follow-on United Nations observer mission. He agreed that the operation should retain a military element while demobilization continued and he also welcomed the increased capacity for monitoring and investigating human rights abuses. Despite the important progress in the peace process, he was concerned at the slow pace of extending State administration and at the continuing mood of mistrust between the parties. He noted that in recent weeks military clashes had jeopardized the peace process, and his Government was concerned at the build-up of military forces in northern Angola. He hoped that the remaining United Nations military presence would be given full access to areas which they wished to investigate and underlined that attacks by UNITA against the staff of UNAVEM II were totally unacceptable. He agreed that there was an urgent need to complete the demobilization process without further delay.⁹³

The representative of China expressed concern about the outbreak of military conflicts in some parts of the country and the failure to complete the demobilization of UNITA military personnel. He stressed that practice had proved that only when there was a peaceful and stable environment could efforts be concentrated on economic and social development. He hoped that the Government of Angola and UNITA would seize the historic opportunity to complete the pending tasks in the political and military fields and achieve national reconciliation to pave the way for national reconstruction and development. While the settlement of the Angolan question would ultimately rest with the Angolan people themselves, the international community also had the responsibility to promote the peace process in Angola and facilitate Angola's efforts at national reconciliation. The peace process was at a critical juncture and was in dire need of vigorous support from the international community, including the United Nations. Therefore he supported in principle the Secretary-General's recommendations to establish MONUA. At the same time, he maintained, that, as a principle, the Security Council should not get involved in matters that fell within the terms of reference of other United Nations bodies. China had different views regarding certain of the functions that the Council would be authorizing for MONUA. China therefore had reservations on certain provisions of the draft resolution. However, in order to help bring about peace and development in Angola at an early date, and considering the desires of Angola and other parties concerned, his delegation would vote in favour of the draft resolution.⁹⁴

The representative of the United States stated that they were pleased to join with other members of the Security Council in support of the draft resolution, which inaugurated a new phase in United Nations involvement in Angola's peace process. The United States called on the Government of Angola and on

UNITA to complete the process of peace and national reconciliation. He urged the Government of Angola to exhibit restraint as the peace process entered its final phase, noting that they were concerned by troop movement and ceasefire violations in the north-eastern provinces, and he called on the Government of Angola to desist immediately from unilateral military actions outside the Lusaka framework. Procedures for the normalization of Government control were clearly defined in the Lusaka Protocol and needed to be followed. He also expressed his belief that agreement regarding national symbols would contribute to the national reconciliation process. He urged UNITA fully and immediately to complete the political and military tasks it had agreed to in Lusaka. He stated that his delegation understood the security concerns of UNITA and intended to stay engaged in ensuring that both parties abided by their mutual security guarantees, but it was long overdue for UNITA to disarm and demobilize its armed elements and come into the mainstream of a peaceful political process.⁹⁵

The representative of the Russian Federation stated, as a member of the troika of observers and a troop contributor, that the draft resolution to be adopted by the Security Council on the transition from UNAVEM III to MONUA was of significant importance for achieving the goals of peace process. The draft resolution was specifically targeted, focusing the attention of the Angolan parties on the priority political and military questions of the settlement that they needed to resolve. Of particular concern was the tense situation in the north-eastern region that had arisen as a result of the penetration into the territory of Angola of armed soldiers of UNITA, the former Rwanda Government Forces and the former Zairian army and of attempts by UNITA to achieve significant military potential. He attached particular significance to the provisions of the draft resolution concerning the unimpeded extension throughout the national territory of the country of the State administration and the demand that UNITA immediately provide complete information regarding all armed personnel under its control for the purpose of verification, disarmament and demobilization, in accordance with the Lusaka Protocol. He stated that the draft resolution provided both an opportunity for effective monitoring of the course of the peace process and also for the adjustments necessary for the planned schedule of withdrawal of United Nations troops from Angola.⁹⁶

Several other speakers while stating their support for the draft resolution and the formation of MONUA, also expressed concern over reports of serious clashes. They noted the progress in the peace process and the contributions of UNAVEM III, and underlined the need to promptly complete all outstanding tasks. Some speakers also urged the President of Angola and the leader of UNITA to meet and cooperate on the remaining issues.⁹⁷

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1118 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent resolutions,

Decision of 23 July 1997 (3803rd meeting): statement by the President

At the 3803rd meeting of the Security Council held on 23 July 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Sweden), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁹⁸

The Security Council expresses its deep concern at recent destabilizing actions in Angola, in particular the failure of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to comply with resolution 1118 (1997) of 30 June 1997 and its continued efforts to restore its military capabilities. The Council considers the information submitted by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to the Joint Commission on 21 July 1997 with regard to the strength of its armed forces, the extension of state administration and the activities of its radio station Vorgan to be neither complete nor credible.

The Council condemns the mistreatment of the personnel of the United Nations and international humanitarian organizations in areas under the control of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, as well as the harassment of personnel of the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola in the exercise of their functions. Those actions by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola are unacceptable and contrary to its commitments under the Lusaka Protocol and to Council resolutions. In this regard, the Council fully supports the joint statement by the Observer Mission and the representatives of the three Observer States issued on 14 July 1997.

The Council notes with concern that the increasing tension in the northern part of the country is rapidly spreading to the central and southern provinces, with very dangerous implications for the implementation of the remaining tasks of the peace process, including those referred to in Council resolution 1118 (1997). The Council calls upon both parties to refrain from any use of force, in accordance with their commitments under the Lusaka Protocol.

The Council also calls upon both parties to continue to work closely with the Joint Commission, and in particular the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, to cooperate fully with the Observer Mission and to ensure the freedom of movement and the safety of its personnel, as well as of international humanitarian organizations.

The Council reiterates its belief that the long-awaited meeting within the territory of Angola between the President of Angola and the leader of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola could contribute greatly to the reduction of tension and to the process of national reconciliation.

The Council notes with concern reports from the Observer Mission that unauthorized aircraft have landed in territory under the control of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola. In this context, the Council calls upon all States to comply fully with paragraph 19 of resolution 864 (1993) of 15 September 1993.

The Council reaffirms its readiness to consider the imposition of measures, inter alia, those specifically mentioned in paragraph 26 of resolution 864 (1993), unless the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, takes irreversible and concrete steps immediately to fulfil its obligations under the

Lusaka Protocol. These steps should include demilitarization of all its forces, transformation of its radio station Vorgan into a non-partisan broadcasting facility and full cooperation in the process of the normalization of state administration throughout Angola. The Council requests the Secretary-General to keep it fully informed on the implementation of those tasks and to assess their fulfilment by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola in his report to be submitted by 15 August 1997 in accordance with resolution 1118 (1997).

The Council will continue to monitor closely the situation in Angola and will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 28 August 1997 (3814th meeting):
resolution 1127 (1997)

At the 3814th meeting of the Security Council, held on 28 August 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (United Kingdom), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Angola, Argentina, Brazil, Canada, Guinea, Lesotho, Luxembourg, Malawi, Mozambique, South Africa and Zimbabwe, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the Council included in its agenda the progress report of the Secretary-General dated 13 August 1997 on MONUA pursuant to paragraph 3 of Security Council resolution 1118 (1997).⁹⁹

In his report the Secretary-General observed that the peace process was experiencing some of the most serious difficulties since the signing of the Lusaka Protocol. Both parties bore a heavy responsibility for the future of the peace process and needed to refrain from any action that might lead to renewed fighting. However, he stated that it was obvious that the current state of affairs was mainly the result of delays by UNITA in implementing its obligations under the Lusaka Protocol, including the true transformation of UNITA into a political party. He reiterated that the international community expected a credible and unconditional implementation of those obligations. He hoped that the Council would continue to exercise its authority and take all necessary steps to ensure full compliance with its decisions, including with the provisions of its resolution 1118 (1997) and the presidential statement of 23 July 1997.¹⁰⁰ It was his intention, with the concurrence of the Security Council, to further postpone the withdrawal of the United Nations military units from Angola and to retain in the country up to 2,650 military personnel until the end of October 1997. In taking that step, he had considered the prevailing precarious situation in Angola and the expressed wish of the Government of Angola to maintain a sizeable United Nations presence until the demobilization process was over.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Portugal, the Russian Federation and the United States.¹⁰¹

At the same meeting, the President also drew the attention of the Council to revisions to be made in the text of the draft resolution.¹⁰² He further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 31 July 1997 from the representative of Brazil addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁰³ transmitting the text of a letter dated 28 July 1997 from the Minister for External Relations of Brazil; and a letter dated 20 August 1997 from the representative of Luxembourg addressed to the Secretary-General, transmitting the text of the statement by the Presidency of the European Union concerning the peace process in Angola issued on 13 August 1997.¹⁰⁴

The representative of Angola stated that since the signing of the Lusaka Protocol, the framework envisioned under the peace accords had still not been fully established, and that there were still two armies: the AAF, and that of UNITA. As a result, tensions had mounted and there had been a serious deterioration of the political and military situation throughout the country. The main military units of UNITA, which were never disarmed and never reported to the United Nations, were undergoing training and being re-equipped. The continuing occupation of portions of the country's territory had enabled UNITA to preserve its military structures and to exploit the natural resources extracted from those areas in order to finance its war. He reiterated that the Angola peace accords and the Lusaka Protocol remained the only valid, legal basis for the settlement of the conflict. He underscored that it was incumbent on the Security Council to shoulder some of the responsibility in resolving the Angolan conflict, since it was the body which the Charter of the United Nations endowed with the authority and the mechanisms for the maintenance of peace and security in the world. The time had come to apply the second package of sanctions, which resolution 864 (1993) provided for. He stated that the Government of Angola fully supported the measures set forth in paragraph 4 of the draft resolution to be voted on, because they firmly believed that it was an effective instrument that would help prevent war and speed up the peace process. As crucial tasks for the consolidation of the process had yet to be fully carried out by the United Nations, they welcomed the Secretary-General's recommendation and the Council's decision to postpone the withdrawal of military units of the United Nations. In conclusion, he stated that the draft resolution had the full support of his Government.¹⁰⁵

The representative of Luxembourg spoke on behalf of the European Union and the aligned and associated countries.¹⁰⁶ He stated that despite the efforts the peace process in Angola was continuing to come up against serious difficulties. The European Union was extremely concerned by the persistent tension throughout the country and strongly urged the Government of Angola and UNITA in particular to do their utmost to improve the situation and to refrain from the use of force. He noted that since the adoption of resolution 1118 (1997) and despite frequent reminders, UNITA had not complied with the demands of the international community. In view of the security situation, the European Union had also endorsed the Secretary-General's proposal that the withdrawal of United Nations military units in Angola be further delayed. The European Union shared the Secretary-General's view that a meeting between the President of Angola and the leader of UNITA would help significantly improve the political atmosphere and advance the process of national reconciliation.¹⁰⁷

in Angola had not been realized and there was a real danger that the peace process might be reversed. The deterioration of the situation required very close scrutiny on the part of the Security Council and the Secretary-General, and redoubled efforts on the part of his Special Representative and MONUA, as well as on the part of the troika of observer States, of which the Russian Federation was a part. In the light of the developing situation it was quite justified that there be adjustment to the process of withdrawing the United Nations military contingents from Angola. He stated that the international community was entitled to demand that the Government of Angola, but first UNITA, fully and without further delay carry out the remaining aspects of the peace process and refrain from any further acts that might worsen the situation. This was precisely what guided the Russian Federation in drawing up, together with the other members of the troika, the draft resolution. UNITA bore the main responsibility for the present situation. He stated that UNITA was defying the United Nations and the Security Council, and he expressed his belief that the international community had no choice but to give an appropriate reply. Therefore, the draft resolution contained additional sanctions to be imposed on UNITA. These were precisely targeted and concrete and would not affect those representatives of UNITA who were members of Parliament or the Government or who were cooperating with the Joint Commission. He also noted that provision had been made for deferring the imposition of the sanctions and for the possibility of their being lifted, as well as for the adoption of further sanctions against UNITA if it were to fail to fully and expeditiously fulfil its obligations.¹⁰⁸

The representative of China stated that it was necessary for the Council to take further measures against UNITA in conformity with the will of the Angolan people to ensure smooth progress and the ultimate completion of the Angolan peace process. China had always taken a very prudent approach towards sanctions, however, for the purpose of an early realization of peace in Angola, and as a special case, China did not take exception to the measures contained in the draft resolution before them and would vote in favour of it. Finally, he expressed his hope that UNITA would return to the track of unity and cooperation.¹⁰⁹

The representative of Egypt noted that operative paragraph 4 of the draft resolution would oblige all states to deny the families of the leaders of UNITA entry into or transit through their territories, except those officials necessary for the full functioning of the Government of Unity and National reconciliation, the National Assembly and the Joint Commission. Despite their full support for the general thrust of the draft resolution, he expressed Egypt's reservations on including the families of the leaders of UNITA in such measures, since that constituted a breach of a legal norm: nulla poena sine crimine, or no punishment without a crime.¹¹⁰ It was inadmissible to punish families whose only crime was their relationship to those leaders. In addition, that measure might constitute a form of collective punishment, which Egypt strongly rejected in principle. Despite that general reservation the persistence of UNITA in defying the will of the international community, its refusal to abide by the Lusaka Protocol and the Government's approval of the draft text prompted them reluctantly to accept the draft resolution before the Council, provided that it would not constitute a precedent in the annals of Security Council resolutions.¹¹¹

The representative of Portugal stated that UNITA had to understand that its current behaviour had left the Security Council without other credible options besides the one of imposing additional sanctions, which had been designed to stimulate UNITA to move in the right direction. They still hoped that on 30 September the sanctions would not have to enter into force. Portugal also supported the Secretary-General's proposal to further postpone the withdrawal of the United Nations military units from Angola. In conclusion, he reiterated that the Security Council was giving UNITA another opportunity to abide by the obligations it freely accepted in 1991 and in 1994.¹¹²

The representative of the United States stated that they were gravely concerned that, because UNITA had failed to fulfil some key commitments, the peace process was not moving forward and the possibility of renewed fighting again threatened the people of Angola. He urged UNITA to make use of the period before 30

September to fulfil its obligations under the Lusaka Protocol. If UNITA did not act, the sanctions would take effect and they believed that the sanctions were strong, practical and enforceable. He stated that the United States stood ready to examine further measures by the Council should UNITA fail to respond. He reminded the Government of Angola that it, too, needed to abide by its commitments under the Lusaka Protocol. It needed to exercise restraint and refrain from any action that could lead to a resumption of the hostilities. He underlined that they would view any military offensives against UNITA as a reason to propose that the Council discontinue sanctions against UNITA. The Government needed to make every effort to bring the remainder of UNITA into the mainstream of Angolan society, allowing it to play its legitimate role as a democratic opposition party and giving full participation to those UNITA officials in the Unity Government. They called on the President of Angola and the leader of UNITA to meet as soon as possible within Angola. He expressed agreement with the Secretary-General's recommendations that some MONUA military units remain in the country. However, at their reduced strength, these military units could no longer ensure their own security should hostilities resume and would not be able to separate warring factions. If UNITA did not heed the call for complete demobilization, the withdrawal of the remaining MONUA military units should resume.¹¹³

The representative of France stated that UNITA bore the principal responsibility for the difficulties encountered in the peace process. He stated that the provisions of the draft resolution had been carefully defined. That applied to the modalities for the implementation of possible sanctions. It also applied to the mechanism for the lifting of those sanctions, should they be imposed; they would be lifted on the basis of specific criteria, respect for which the Secretary-General would have to assess. He reiterated the consistent position of France, which wanted the sanctions to be time-bound, with a set duration, and wanted the question of their extension to be decided by the Security Council. It was the hope of France that UNITA would take advantage of the time allowed it to meet its obligations. In fact, their objective was not to impose coercive measures but rather to give every chance to peace and national reconciliation in Angola and to prevent any action that might lead to a resumption of fighting.¹¹⁴

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that UNITA was clearly not doing what it agreed to do in 1994, which was to transform itself from a military organization into a legitimate opposition party. He was very concerned by the military tensions in Angola. Both UNITA and the Government had contributed to those, and his Government was not about to apportion blame. But he did think both parties needed to make every effort not to resort to military measures. In that respect, he expressed his belief that a meeting between the President of Angola and the leader of UNITA could help to lower the political temperature and make a positive contribution to the peace process.¹¹⁵

Several other speakers spoke, expressing concern over recent developments in Angola, condemning the actions of UNITA which threatened the peace process and calling on them to complete all their outstanding obligations, and expressing support for the recommendations of the Secretary-General and the draft resolution. Several speakers called for a meeting between the President of Angola and the leader of UNITA, in the country, to take place as soon as possible. Several other speakers expressed extreme concern at reports of the planting of new mines in certain parts of the country.¹¹⁶

At the same meeting the draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1127 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent resolutions,

Decision of 29 September 1997 (3820th meeting): resolution 1130 (1997)

At the 3820th meeting of the Security Council, held on 29 September 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (United States), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General dated 24 September 1997 on MONUA submitted pursuant to paragraph 7 of Security Council resolution 1127 (1997), in which the Council had requested him to report on whether UNITA had taken concrete and irreversible steps to comply with all its obligations set out in paragraphs 2 and 3 of the resolution before the coming into force of the measures specified in paragraph 4 of the resolution.¹¹⁷ The Secretary-General observed that the military situation in Angola had remained relatively calm and stable and the leader of UNITA had assured his Special Representative that UNITA was determined to take further steps to comply with the provisions of the resolution. However, the demilitarization of UNITA forces was not yet complete. MONUA and the observer States considered that the figure claimed by UNITA to be the total of its residual troops remained unconvincing, and that the quality and quantity of weapons and ammunitions surrendered to MONUA by these residual troops were insignificant. At the same time, it must be recognized that some advances had been made towards the establishment of a non-partisan FM broadcast facility to replace Radio Vorgan, which had recently made tangible efforts to reduce the level of hostile propaganda. With regard to the normalization of State administration, while a significant number of localities had been handed over, no progress had been registered in the extension of government authority to the five strategically important areas and the overall slow pace of the process continued to raise doubts about the intentions of UNITA. In the circumstances, he was not yet in a position to advise the Security Council that UNITA had taken the necessary steps to comply with all the obligations set out in paragraphs 2 and 3 of its resolution 1127 (1997).

the course of the Council's prior consultations¹¹⁸ and to a revision to be made to the text of the draft resolution. The draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1130 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent resolutions, in particular resolution 1127 (1997) of 28 August 1997,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General of 24 September 1997, and subsequent information on steps taken by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Stresses the need for the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to comply fully with all the obligations set out in resolution 1127 (1997);

2. Decides that the coming into force of the measures specified in paragraph 4 of resolution 1127 (1997) shall be postponed until 0001 Eastern Standard Time on 30 October 1997;

3. Affirms its readiness to review the imposition of the measures referred to in paragraph 2 above and to consider the imposition of additional measures in accordance with paragraphs 8 and 9 of resolution 1127 (1997);

4. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 29 October 1997 (3827th meeting):
resolution 1135 (1997)

At the 3827th meeting of the Security Council, held on 29 October 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Chile), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Angola and Brazil, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the Council had before them the report of the Secretary-General dated 17 October 1997 on MONUA, submitted pursuant to paragraph 3 of Security Council resolution 1118 (1997), and to paragraph 8 of Security Council resolution 1127 (1997) in which the Council had requested him to report on the compliance of UNITA with the obligations set out in paragraphs 2 and 3 of that resolution, as well as paragraph 16 requesting him to report on the drawdown of the military personnel of MONUA.¹¹⁹ The Secretary-General observed that since his last report there had been no significant progress in the peace process in Angola. He remained concerned by the very slow pace of the demilitarization of UNITA and the slowdown of the extension of State administration into the areas controlled by UNITA. Unless additional concrete steps were taken to accelerate the implementation of the remaining tasks, including the transformation of Radio Vorgan into a non-partisan broadcasting facility, it would be difficult to say that UNITA had taken all steps necessary to comply with the provisions of Council resolution 1127 (1997). He urged the Government and UNITA to take a number of specific steps that could enhance mutual trust and confidence, including a meeting of the President and the leader of UNITA inside Angola. He also urged the Government to notify MONUA, in accordance with established procedures, of any movements of its troops. In the meantime, reports of the presence of Angolan armed elements in the Republic of the Congo were a source of serious concern. In the circumstances he believed it would be advisable to postpone slightly the withdrawal of United Nations military formed units from Angola and he recommended that the mandate of MONUA be extended for three months, until 31 January 1998.

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹²⁰

The representative of Angola stated that UNITA had yet to fulfil the handover to the Government of all localities under its control, the demilitarization of its remaining troops and the cessation of its hostile anti-Government propaganda. The leadership of UNITA had completely disregarded the urging of the Council and violated its resolutions 1127 (1997) and 1130 (1997). Instead, UNITA, had resorted to manoeuvres aimed at impressing the members of the Council and the international community, with a view to avoiding the entry into force of sanctions as set out in operative paragraph 4 of resolution 1127 (1997). When a new deadline for UNITA to fulfil its obligations had come to an end, what we could conclude was that UNITA had not taken the necessary steps to comply with all the obligations set out in resolution 1127 (1997). Therefore, they could not expect less than immediate application of the measures set forth in paragraph 4 of resolution 1127 (1997), for the good of the people of Angola and to ensure the Council's moral authority.¹²¹

The representative of Brazil stated that while they understood that sanctions needed to be regarded as an instrument of last resort, in the case of Angola, they were convinced that the Security Council was on the correct path in adopting a draft resolution that triggered sanctions, specifically targeted against UNITA.¹²²

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the UNITA leadership had disregarded the requirements of resolutions 1127 (1997) and 1130 (1997) and had not used the two goodwill pauses offered it by the international community. As a result, at midnight that day the sanctions against UNITA provided for in resolution 1127 (1997) would enter into effect. His delegation hoped that UNITA leadership would draw the correct conclusions and would immediately and fully comply with its commitments, thereby sparing the Council the task of further increasing the sanctions. Given the critical situation, the three-month extension of the mandate of MONUA and the postponement of the withdrawal of United Nations military formed units was of great significance. On that basis, they would vote for the draft resolution.¹²³

¹²² Ibid., pp. 3-4.

The representative of the United States stated that although the United States had actively pressed the leader of UNITA to meet their obligations under the Lusaka Protocol, but UNITA had not complied and had even taken some backward steps, such as impeding the work of the administrators in areas recently transferred to Government control. They therefore supported the automatic entry into force of the sanctions specified in resolution 1127 (1997). They would vigorously enforce those new measures as well as those measures imposed by resolution 864 (1993) and called on all Member States to do the same. He expressed hope that UNITA would see the imposition of measures as a sign of the international community's determination that UNITA move rapidly to complete the remaining tasks in the peace process. If it did so, the United States stood ready to reconsider the need for sanctions. However, there was a message in the draft resolution for the Government of Angola as well. The draft resolution called on the Government to demonstrate restraint as it implemented the final steps in the peace process. They believed that the peace process could be served by a meeting between the President of Angola and the leader of UNITA within the territory of Angola. He underlined that the United States and other members of the Council were gravely concerned by the Government of Angola's military intervention in the Republic of the Congo, which resulted in the overthrow of a democratically-elected President. That intervention was a violation of the Charters of the United Nations and the OAU. They understood the legitimate security concerns of Angola in Cabinda and its frustration over assistance provided by the Republic of the Congo to UNITA in contravention of existing United Nations sanctions. But military intervention was not an acceptable response. They condemned that intervention and demanded that the Government of Angola immediately withdraw its forces. The Foreign Minister of Angola had made a public commitment to do so by 15 November and they expected that to be honoured, as well as that mercenaries and other armed groups, including UNITA, also withdraw immediately.¹²⁴

During the course of the debate, several other speakers spoke, regretting that UNITA had not made significant progress in the remaining key tasks of the peace process, noting that it had been given two grace periods to move decisively towards fulfilling its obligations and had not done so thus necessitating the imposition of sanctions. They also stated their support for the recommendations of the Secretary-General on extending the mandate of MONUA and postponing the withdrawal of United Nations military formed units. Most speakers noted that the sanctions were targeted against UNITA to persuade them to fulfil all of its obligations. Several speakers noted that they would consider additional measures if needed and others reaffirmed the importance of holding a meeting between the President of Angola and the leader of UNITA on Angolan territory. Several speakers also stated their grave concern regarding the presence of Angolan armed elements in the Republic of the Congo.¹²⁵

¹²⁴ Ibid., pp. 11-12.

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1135 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Speaking after the vote, the President expressed the Security Council's grave concern regarding the presence of Angolan armed elements in the Republic of the Congo, as reported by the Secretariat. It reaffirmed the statement of its President of 16 October 1997.¹²⁶ It condemned all external interference in the Republic of the Congo, called on all foreign forces, including mercenaries, to withdraw immediately from that country, and stressed the importance of a political settlement, national reconciliation and transitional arrangements leading to the holding of democratic and free and fair elections with the participation of all parties as soon as possible.

Decision of 27 January 1998 (3850th meeting):
resolution 1149 (1998)

At the 3850th meeting of the Security Council, held on 27 January 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (France), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Angola, Cape Verde, Mozambique, Namibia and Zimbabwe, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General on MONUA dated 12 January 1998, submitted pursuant to paragraph 1 of Security Council resolution 1135 (1997), in which the Council had requested him to present recommendations on the United Nations presence in Angola after 30 January 1998.¹²⁷ The Secretary-General observed that while significant progress had no doubt been achieved towards that goal, and the Government and UNITA continued to express their willingness to fulfil their remaining obligations, persistent delays in the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol continued to be a source of serious concern. There was a great need for both parties, but in particular UNITA, to display a greater sense of urgency in carrying out the Lusaka agreements and the relevant Security Council resolutions. While the presence of the United Nations in Angola was much needed to implement the remaining provisions of the Lusaka Protocol and to enhance confidence, he believed that the extension of the MONUA mandate should take into account the real commitment of both parties to respect their obligations and to expedite the peace process. In that connection, he welcomed the agreement reached on 9 January 1998 on the new implementation timetable, which envisaged that major progress should be achieved by the end of February 1998 when the UNITA leadership had promised to install itself in Luanda and transfer its two strongholds to the control of State administration. Considering those developments, he recommended that the mandate of MONUA be extended for three months, until 30 April 1998. He also welcomed the ongoing contacts between the two parties concerning the meeting inside Angola of the President of Angola and the leader of UNITA.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹²⁸

The President further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 21 January 1998 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹²⁹ transmitting the final timetable for the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol, which had been approved by the Joint Commission on 9 January 1998.

The representative of Angola stated that they welcomed the recent positive developments in the peace process, particularly the advance in the normalization of State administration. He stressed that all Security Council resolutions and other decisions must continue to be enforced; restrictive and mandatory measures, particularly those contained in the Council's resolutions 864 (1993), 1127 (1997) and 1135 (1997), needed to be observed by all Member States and strictly monitored by the Committee on sanctions.¹³⁰

The representative of China stated that the peace process in Angola was at a crucial juncture and still needed the firm support of the United Nations, including the Security Council, and considering that the parties concerned in Angola were also requesting the United Nations to continue to play a positive role in the peace process, the Chinese delegation was in favour of extending the mandate of MONUA and would vote in favour of the draft resolution. However, he noted that when the Council adopted resolution 1118 (1997), the Chinese delegation expressed reservations with regard to certain functions of MONUA and that position remained unchanged.¹³¹

The representative of the Gambia stated that the continued presence of MONUA in Angola should not be limited by time bounds, but should rather be measured by the impact made in the implementation of the provisions of the Lusaka peace process. That presence could ensure concentration on the political, economic and social issues and challenges that desperately needed attention in Angola. Not only was that presence essential for the accomplishment of the mandated tasks of MONUA, but it was also necessary for the creation of conditions conducive to the holding of future elections.¹³²

Several other speakers spoke and welcomed the agreement by both parties on a timetable for the completion of the Lusaka Protocol by the end of February; welcomed the progress made in completing the outstanding provisions; supported the recommendations made by the Secretary-General, included for the extension of the mandate of MONUA; and urged the international community to support the peace process. Several speakers stated that despite the progress made, the measures imposed by the Council on UNITA should be maintained in order to ensure the full compliance of UNITA with the commitments it made under the Lusaka Protocol. Several speakers expressed concern over reports that UNITA continued to regroup its military elements in some areas.¹³³

The representative of the United States urged the Government of Angola and UNITA to comply strictly with the timetable for the completion of the remaining tasks of the Lusaka Protocol and, in the spirit of national reconciliation, to exercise restraint and protect the rights of all Angolan citizens as the implementation of the peace process proceeded. As they had stated at the time of the adoption of resolution 1135 (1997), if UNITA moved rapidly to complete the remaining tasks in the peace process, the United States stood ready to reconsider the need for sanctions. He also urged the Government of Angola to withdraw its forces from the Republic of the Congo expeditiously.¹³⁴

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1149 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Decision of 20 March 1998 (3863rd meeting): resolution 1157 (1998)

At the 3863rd meeting of the Security Council, held on 20 March 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Gambia), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General on MONUA dated 13 March 1998 submitted pursuant to Security Council resolution 1149 (1998), requesting him to submit a comprehensive report, which would also incorporate the update requested in paragraph 7 of resolution 1135 (1997) of 29 October 1997, on the implementation of the timetable approved by the Joint Commission on 9 January 1998.¹³⁵ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that while the failure to comply with the 9 January 1998 timetable for the implementation of the remaining tasks of the Lusaka Protocol had resulted in an impasse, largely due to the delaying tactics of UNITA, it was hoped that the adoption of the adjusted timetable would reinvigorate the peace process and urged both parties to abide strictly by the new understanding. He strongly deplored the attacks by UNITA on United Nations personnel in several areas in Angola and underlined that UNITA needed to unconditionally guarantee the safety and security of all international staff that had been assisting the Angolan people in their pursuit of a lasting peace. He reiterated that many of the remaining tasks could be completed swiftly, including the full normalization of State administration throughout Angola and the final resolution of all issues related to the leader of Angola's security detachment. He also underlined that a meeting between the President of Angola and the leader of UNITA might accelerate the peace process. Equally, UNITA leadership needed to move to Luanda, as agreed in the Lusaka Protocol. Regarding MONUA, it would be his intention, subject to security conditions on the ground and to the concurrence of the Security Council, to proceed with its reconfiguration as outlined in the report.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,¹³⁶ which was voted upon and adopted unanimously as resolution 1157 (1998), which reads:

Decision of 29 April 1998 (3876th meeting):

At the 3876th meeting of the Security Council, held on 29 April 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Japan), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General on MONUA dated 16 April 1998 submitted pursuant to Security Council resolution 1157 (1998), reporting on the status of the implementation of the peace process, with recommendations regarding the modalities of the United Nations presence in Angola after 30 April 1998.¹³⁷ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that although the remaining tasks under the Lusaka Protocol were not fully completed by the 31 March 1998 deadline, most of the tasks contained had been carried out, including the promulgation into law of the special status of the leader of UNITA, the appointment of the governors and vice-governors nominated by UNITA, the return of some UNITA senior officials to Luanda, and the termination of Radio Vorgan broadcasts. At the same time, he was concerned at the slow pace of the implementation of the extension of State administration. He regretted that that had not ameliorated the security situation in the country, with the increase in armed attacks and acts of banditry a particular concern. It was also deplorable that the security of MONUA personnel and property was seriously undermined in several areas of Angola and that UNITA continued to impose restrictions on United Nations activities in some regions. He reiterated his recommendations that MONUA continue, with the necessary adjustments, to carry out its activities on the basis of the mandate and structure outlined in previous reports.¹³⁸ Apart from the military component the other substantive components of MONUA should continue their operations until the end of 1998, albeit at a progressively reduced level after September/October 1998. In the meantime, he recommended that the mandate of MONUA be extended for two months, until 30 June 1998.

The Vice-Minister of Territorial Administration of Angola stated that good progress had been made, but there was more to be done, particularly concerning the extension of State administration into all areas of Angola. He was pleased to note that the draft resolution before the Council called on all members of the international community, to implement fully the measures specified in paragraph 4 of resolution 1127 (1997). He reiterated that it remained critical to keep the pressure on UNITA to meet fully and quickly its obligations under the Lusaka Protocol. He reiterated his country's full support for maintaining peace, promoting national reconciliation and rebuilding the country.

Furthermore, he wanted to stress that his Government expected to be consulted by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, in order to ensure the full implementation of paragraphs 8 to 12 of the draft resolution, which concerned specifically the structure and tasks to be assigned to MONUA after 30 June 1998.¹³⁹

The representative of Kenya stated that on the question of the existing sanctions against UNITA, that during his visit to Angola and States of the region, he had found those measures to be working effectively. There was political will on the part of the Member States to ensure compliance with the provisions of the Security Council resolutions. Nevertheless, there were some gaps that needed to be filled by Member States in attempting to fully implement those measures. He maintained that it would be in the interest of the Angolan peace process if those measures were made fully effective.¹⁴⁰

The representative of the United States stated that as the tasks of the Lusaka Protocol were complete, they would reconsider the need for sanctions against UNITA. However, the United States was increasingly concerned that the Government of Angola and UNITA were meeting the letter, but not the spirit, of the Lusaka Protocol.¹⁴¹

In the course of the debate, several speakers spoke and stated that while they were encouraged by the recent progress, they also were concerned with the slow pace of the extension of State administration and at the setbacks in the security situation. They expressed support for the Secretary-General's recommendations to extend the mandate of MONUA and make changes in its structure. Many speakers called for UNITA to cease all attempts to frustrate the work of MONUA and to allow the extension of central administration. Several speakers encouraged the long-delayed meeting between the President of Angola and the leader of UNITA to be held as soon as possible.¹⁴²

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1164 (1998), which reads:

Decision of 22 May 1998 (3884th meeting): statement by the President

At the 3884th meeting of the Security Council, held on 22 May 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Kenya), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁴³

The Security Council strongly condemns the armed attack in Angola on 19 May 1998 against personnel from the United Nations and the Angolan National Police, in which one person was killed and three people were seriously injured. It demands that the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation and in particular the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola guarantee unconditionally the safety and freedom of movement of all United Nations and other international personnel.

The Council strongly deplores the failure by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to complete the implementation of its remaining obligations under the "Acordos de Paz", the Lusaka Protocol and relevant Council resolutions, especially its failure to cooperate in completing the normalization of State administration throughout the national territory, including in particular in Andulo and Bailundo. It also strongly condemns the confirmed attacks by members of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola on the personnel of the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola, international personnel and Angolan national authorities. The Council expresses its deep concern at the serious abuses committed by the Angolan National Police, particularly in areas recently transferred to State administration, as well as at the recent increase in hostile propaganda. The lack of progress in completing the remaining tasks of the peace process has led to a serious deterioration in the military and security situation in the country. The Council calls upon the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola in the strongest terms to refrain from any action which might lead to renewed hostilities or derail the peace process.

The Council endorses the plan for the completion of the remaining tasks of the Lusaka Protocol by 31 May 1998 that was submitted by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General to the Joint Commission on 15 May 1998. The Council demands that the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation and in particular the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola fulfil their obligations in accordance with this plan. In this context, the Council reaffirms its readiness to review the measures specified in paragraph 4 of resolution 1127 (1997) of 28 August 1997 and to consider the imposition of additional measures in accordance with paragraphs 8 and 9 of resolution 1127 (1997).

The Council expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General, his Special Representative, and the personnel of the Mission for their efforts to assist the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to implement their peace process obligations.

The Council will remain actively seized of this matter.

Decision of 12 June 1998 (3891st meeting):
resolution 1173 (1998)

At the 3891st meeting of the Security Council, held on 12 June 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Portugal), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁴⁴

He further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 12 June 1998 from Portugal addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁴⁵ transmitting a press release issued on 2 June 1998 by MONUA, in which the troika of observer States to the Angolan Peace Process deplored continuing delays by UNITA in the conclusion of the extension of State administration.

The representative of Angola stated that his delegation had to once more inform the Council of their concern at the instability in Angola brought about by the destabilizing activities carried out by UNITA, which had significantly damaged the prospects for immediate peace. Those armed activities had to be stopped to prevent another armed confrontation in Angola, which could have catastrophic results. While State administration was already starting to have its effect in areas formerly controlled by UNITA, and the lives of rural population had been slowly returning to normal, all of that was being impeded by obstacles to the free circulation of people and goods and by increasing attacks on villages and towns by UNITA military forces, which did not augur well for the efforts aimed at the full implementation of the Lusaka Protocol.¹⁴⁶

During the course of the debate several other speakers spoke, expressing concern at the deterioration in the situation and the increase in armed incidents, including against the United Nations Mission and urging UNITA to fulfil its remaining obligations by the deadline for the automatic imposition of sanctions. Many speakers praised the constructive attitude of the Government of Angola, while some also urged them to exercise patience and restraint.¹⁴⁷

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1173 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions, in particular resolution 1127 (1997) of 28 August 1997,

Reaffirming its firm commitment to preserve the unity, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Angola,

Expressing its grave concern at the critical situation in the peace process, which is the result of the failure by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to implement its obligations under the "Acordos de Paz", the Lusaka Protocol

By a letter dated 24 June 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁴⁸ the Secretary-General referred to paragraph 14 of Security Council resolution 1173 (1998), in which the Council had decided that additional measures against UNITA would come into force on 25 June 1998, unless UNITA fully cooperated, by 23 June, in the immediate extension of State administration throughout Angola. He stated that while the leader of UNITA had not set specific dates for the implementation of the extension of State administration in the four strategic localities, the leader had expressed his willingness to cooperate in the normalization of those localities by 30 June 1998. As the President of Angola and the Joint Commission had agreed to that proposal, the Secretary-General recommended to the Security Council to postpone the date of the entry into force of the additional measures against UNITA to 30 June 1998.

At its 3894th meeting, held on 24 June 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letter in its agenda. After the agenda was adopted, the President (Portugal), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁴⁹ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1176 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions, in particular resolution 1173 (1998) of 12 June 1998,

Taking note of the letter dated 24 June 1998 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council, Determining that the current situation in Angola constitutes a threat to international peace and security in the region,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Demands that the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola comply fully and unconditionally with the obligations referred to in resolution 1173 (1998);

2. Decides that, notwithstanding paragraph 14 of resolution 1173 (1998), the measures specified in paragraphs 11 and 12 of resolution 1173 (1998) shall come into force without further notice at 0001 hours Eastern Daylight Time on 1 July 1998, unless the Security Council decides, on the basis of a report by the Secretary-General, that the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola has fully complied with all its obligations under paragraph 2 of resolution 1173 (1998);

3. Requests the Committee established pursuant to resolution 864 (1993), notwithstanding paragraph 20 (b) of resolution 1173 (1998), to report to the Council by 7 August 1998 regarding the actions taken by States to implement the measures specified in paragraphs 11 and 12 of resolution 1173 (1998);

4. Requests Member States, notwithstanding paragraph 21 of resolution 1173 (1998), to provide to the Committee established pursuant to resolution 864 (1993), no later than 22 July 1998, information on the measures they have adopted to implement the provisions of paragraphs 11 and 12 of resolution 1173 (1998);

5. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 29 June 1998 (3899th meeting):
resolution 1180 (1998)

At the 3899th meeting of the Security Council, held on 29 June 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Portugal), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Angola and Mali, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting the Deputy Secretary-General, the President of the Security Council, and the representatives of Angola and Mali made expressions of sympathy in connection with the deaths of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Angola and his colleagues in MONUA.¹⁵⁰

The Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General on MONUA dated 17 June submitted pursuant to paragraph 12 of Security Council resolution 1164 (1998).¹⁵¹ The Secretary-General observed that the situation in Angola had continued to deteriorate quickly and had become critical. That deterioration was attributable, for the most part, to the failure of UNITA to fulfil its obligations and to implement the well-balanced plan which his Special Representative had offered to the parties on 15 May. Some of the statements reportedly made by the leader of UNITA could only increase the very serious concern of the international community. In a meeting the UNITA leader reportedly told his supporters that the impositions of additional sanctions would be considered as an attack against UNITA, to which it should be "ready to respond", and as a result he "would not be able" to hand over Bailundo and Andulo to the Government. At the same time, the President of Angola had stated that it was still possible to save the Angola peace process and that his Government would continue, until the end of June, to work with the international community to seek a peaceful solution. The Secretary-General recommended that if the demands contained in Security Council resolution 1173 (1998) were duly implemented, that the mandate of MONUA be extended for two months, and that the strength of MONUA be maintained at the present level. However, should it become clear that there was no political will to complete the peace process expeditiously, he intended to resume the withdrawal of United Nations troops in accordance with resolution 1164 (1998) and to stop the deployment to Angola of the additional police observers whose presence was intended to enhance confidence between the parties and to consolidate the deployment of MONUA throughout the country. It would also become necessary in such a situation to review the United Nations involvement in Angola.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁵² The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1180 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions, in particular resolution 1173 (1998) of 12 June 1998 and resolution 1176 (1998) of 24 June 1998,

Reaffirming its firm commitment to preserve the unity, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Angola,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 17 June 1998,

Expressing concern in the strongest terms at the critical situation in the peace process, which is the result of the failure by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to complete its obligations under the "Acordos de Paz", the Lusaka Protocol, and relevant Security Council resolutions, including in particular its obligation to cooperate fully and without conditions in the immediate extension of State administration throughout the national territory,

Expressing its grave concern at the deterioration of the security situation in Angola as a result of the reoccupation by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola of localities where State administration was recently established, attacks by armed elements of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, new minelaying activity, and banditry,

Noting with deep concern cases of serious abuse by some elements of the Angolan National Police, and stressing the importance of strengthening the rule of law, including the full protection of all Angolan citizens throughout the national territory,

Recognizing the important role of the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola at this critical stage of the peace process,

1. Welcomes the recommendations of the Secretary-General in paragraph 44 of his report of 17 June 1998, and decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola until 15 August 1998;

2. Decides to resume the withdrawal of the military component of the Mission in accordance with paragraph 9 of resolution 1164 (1998) of 29 April 1998 as soon as conditions permit;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to reconsider the deployment of the additional civilian police observers authorized under paragraph 10 of resolution 1164 (1998), taking into account conditions on the ground and progress in the peace process;

4. Also requests the Secretary-General to submit a report, as necessary, but no later than 7 August 1998, with recommendations regarding the involvement of the United Nations in Angola, taking into account the safety and freedom of movement of Mission personnel and the status of the peace process;

5. Reiterates its demand that the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola immediately stop any attacks by its members on Mission personnel, international personnel, the authorities of the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation, including the police, and the civilian population, and calls again upon the Government and in particular the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to guarantee unconditionally the safety and freedom of movement of all United Nations and international personnel;

6. Demands that the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation and in particular the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola cooperate fully with the Mission in providing full access for its verification activities, including the verification of the full demilitarization of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, and reiterates its call upon the Government to notify the Mission in a timely manner of its troop movements, in accordance with the provisions of the Lusaka Protocol and established procedures;

7. Calls upon the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation and in particular the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to refrain from the laying of new mines;

8. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and the personnel of the Mission for assisting the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to implement the peace process;

9. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 13 August 1998 (3916th meeting): resolution 1190 (1998)

At the 3916th meeting of the Security Council, held on 13 August 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Slovenia), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General on MONUA dated 7 August 1998, submitted pursuant to paragraph 4 of Security Council resolution 1180 (1998) giving recommendations regarding United Nations involvement in Angola.¹⁵³ The Secretary-General observed that there had been no improvement in the already deplorable situation and that the country continued to drift towards full-fledged hostilities. He informed the Council that he had decided to send his Special Envoy to Angola, who would assess the various aspects of the situation and advise him on the possible course of action. After his mission was completed, he would be in a better position to make recommendations about the future role of the United Nations in Angola. In the meantime, he recommended that the Security Council extend the mandate of MONUA for one month until 15 September 1998.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Portugal, the Russian Federation and the United States.¹⁵⁴

He further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 7 August 1998 from the Acting Chairman of the Security Council Committee established by resolution 864 (1993) concerning the situation in Angola addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting a report of the Committee.¹⁵⁵

The representative of Angola stated that the peace process was taking a serious and dangerous turn owing to the progressive and rapid deterioration of the security situation. UNITA, instead of fulfilling its commitments and obligations, had chosen to launch armed attacks with a view to occupying additional territory. It had reoccupied 90 localities where State administration had already been normalized. This pattern of violations not only cast serious doubts on its commitment to the full implementation of the Lusaka Protocol but had led them to believe that it was a strategy to provoke chaos, hoping to create an environment for UNITA to assume power in Angola by force. Stronger action was needed to force UNITA to stop such barbaric actions. The Angolan Government, as a member of the United Nations family, was entitled to receive the necessary support from the United Nations in order to prevent a new escalation of the war. Therefore, he believed that in order to be more effective, the existing sanctions needed to be coupled with other measures likely to tighten the isolation of the military wing of UNITA.¹⁵⁶

Several other speakers stated their support for the extension of the mandate of MONUA, and called on UNITA to fulfil all its outstanding obligations and put an end to the violence against MONUA and the Government and people of Angola. Most speakers welcomed the appointment of the new Special Representative of the Secretary-General and the dispatch of the Under-Secretary-General and the Special Envoy.¹⁵⁷

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1190 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions, including resolutions 864 (1993) of 15 September 1993, 1127 (1997) of 28 August 1997 and 1173 (1998) of 12 June 1998,

Reaffirming also its firm commitment to preserve the unity, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Angola,

Strongly deploring the deteriorating political and security situation in Angola, which is primarily the result of the failure by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to complete its obligations under the “Acordos de Paz”, the Lusaka Protocol and relevant Security Council resolutions,

Taking note of recent positive steps to restore confidence in the peace process,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 6 August 1998,

1. Welcomes the decision by the Secretary-General to dispatch a Special Envoy to assess the situation in Angola and advise on a possible course of action, and requests the Secretary-General to submit, no later than 31 August 1998, a report with recommendations regarding the future role of the United Nations in Angola;

2. Expresses its intention to review the recommendations referred to in paragraph 1 above and to consider appropriate actions;

3. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola until 15 September 1998, and takes note of the considerations specified in paragraph 38 of the report

10. Expresses its firm belief that a meeting in Angola between the President of the Republic of Angola and the leader of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola could provide momentum to the peace process;

11. Calls upon Member States to implement fully the relevant provisions of resolutions 864 (1993), 1127 (1997) and 1173 (1998);

12. Welcomes the appointment of a new Special Representative to Angola, and urges the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to cooperate fully with him in promoting peace and national reconciliation;

13. Encourages the Secretary-General to continue his personal engagement in the peace process;

14. Expresses its appreciation to the personnel of the Mission;

Decision of 15 September 1998 (3925th meeting): resolution 1195 (1998)

At the 3925th meeting of the Security Council, held on 15 September 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Sweden), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General on MONUA dated 7 September 1998 submitted pursuant to paragraph 1 of Security Council resolution 1190 (1998).¹⁵⁸ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the situation had continued to deteriorate and both parties seemed to be preparing themselves for a confrontation. The conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo had brought a new dimension to the crisis and complicated the situation further, as evidenced by the involvement of Angolan military units in that country. In addition, the decision to suspend the UNITA members of the Government and the National Assembly raised doubts about the prospects for national reconciliation. He believed that the international community should give the Angolan parties an additional chance to return to the peace process and to allow his new Special Representative to explore with the parties effective ways and means of overcoming the current difficulties. On that basis, he proposed that the mandate of MONUA be extended until 31 January 1999, on the understanding that the Security Council would conduct a comprehensive review of the situation by the end of November 1998. If at that time there had been no substantial progress towards full compliance by the parties with their respective obligations it would be incumbent on the Council to take the necessary action and a reduction of MONUA would be accelerated with a view to closing it down by early February 1999. However, if decisive progress was made by the parties by the end of November, MONUA would be allowed to carry out its mandate.

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to identical letters dated 11 September from the representative of Angola addressed to the President of the Security Council and the Secretary-General,¹⁵⁹ respectively, transmitting a letter dated 10 September 1998. By the letter, the President of Angola informed the Council that the leader of UNITA, Mr. Savimbi, had again launched a military campaign all over the national territory and had hardened his positions against the Angolan Government, the Troika of Observers and the United Nations themselves. This was an unequivocal demonstration that the leader of UNITA no longer considered the Lusaka Protocol a valid instrument for the establishment of peace in Angola and he expressed his belief that diplomatic means would no longer have any effect on Mr. Savimbi's position. Given the facts, the Government of Angola had decided to break its dialogue with Mr. Savimbi. He also informed the Council that the countries of southern Africa had reached the same conclusions as the Angolan Government and believed that Mr. Savimbi and his military forces were a serious and continuous threat to peace in the subregion as well as in Central Africa; therefore, it was necessary to unite means, actions and forces in the region so as to combat and neutralize the war machine of UNITA. However, a large group of UNITA political and military leaders had broken away from their leader, whom they had removed from the leadership of the party, and created a Renovation Committee that had provisionally assumed the mandate position until the party held its Congress. The Renovation Committee had decided to assume the position of interlocutor with the Government, the troika of observers and the Special Representative in the peace process. The Angolan Government had decided to recognize the UNITA Renovation Committee as the only legitimate interlocutor for the conclusion of the Lusaka Protocol and requested that the Security Council support their position.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Kenya, Portugal, the Russian Federation, Slovenia and the United States.¹⁶⁰ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1195 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Reaffirming its firm commitment to preserve the unity, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Angola,

Taking note of the letter dated 10 September 1998 from the President of the Republic of Angola to the Secretary-General,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 7 September 1998,

1. Emphasizes that the primary cause of the crisis in Angola and of the current impasse in the peace process is the failure by the leadership of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to comply with its obligations under the "Acordos de Paz", the Lusaka Protocol and relevant Security Council resolutions, and demands that the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola comply immediately and without conditions with its obligations, in particular the complete demilitarization of its forces and full cooperation in the immediate and unconditional extension of State administration throughout the national territory;

2. Demands that the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola withdraw immediately from territories it has occupied through military action;

3. Reiterates its full support for the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol;

4. Demands that the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola transform itself into a genuine political party through the dismantling of its military structure, and, in the context of the full implementation of the Lusaka Protocol, strongly urges the Angolan authorities to reconsider their decision to suspend the participation of members of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola in the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation and in the National Assembly;

5. Calls upon Member States to implement fully the relevant provisions of resolutions 864 (1993) of 15 September 1993, 1127 (1997) of 28 August 1997 and 1173 (1998) of 12 June 1998;

6. Strongly urges the Government of Angola, the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola and States in the region to reject military action, to pursue dialogue to resolve the crisis and to refrain from any steps which could exacerbate the current situation;

7. Reiterates its support to the Secretary-General for his personal engagement in the peace process, and urges the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a

Independência Total de Angola to cooperate fully with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and with other relevant initiatives by Member States to seek a peaceful resolution of the crisis;

8. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola until 15 October 1998 and to assess the overall situation and take action on the future role of the United Nations in Angola on the basis of a report and recommendations to be submitted by the Secretary-General no later than 8 October 1998;

9. Endorses the decision of the Secretary-General to instruct the Mission to adjust its deployment on the ground, as needed, to ensure the safety and security of Mission personnel, and demands that the Government of Angola and in particular the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola guarantee unconditionally the safety and freedom of movement of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and all United Nations and international humanitarian personnel, including those providing humanitarian assistance;

10. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 15 October 1998 (3936th meeting):
resolution 1202 (1998)

At the 3936th meeting of the Security Council, held on 15 October 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (United Kingdom), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The Council had before it the report of the Secretary-General on MONUA dated 8 October 1998, submitted pursuant to paragraph 8 of Security Council resolution 1195 (1998).¹⁶¹ In his report, the Secretary-General noted that the most significant negative development was the breaking by the Government of all contacts with UNITA and their recognition of the leadership of UNITA Renovation Committee. Although some UNITA members in the National Assembly and the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation had disassociated themselves from the leader of UNITA, the UNITA leadership in Andulo had insisted that it remained the legitimate partner in the peace process, thus creating a conflicting situation over the representation of UNITA in the Joint Commission and preventing that important body from effectively carrying out its duties. He observed that while the international community had agreed that UNITA bore the primary responsibility for the crisis, a political settlement remained the most viable means to restore normalcy. To that end, it was important to keep the door to dialogue open. Accordingly, he had instructed his Special Representative to maintain contacts with all concerned, old parties and new. In view of those considerations, he recommended that the Security Council extend MONUA for another short period of up to six weeks, in order to give his Special Representative an additional opportunity to revive the stalled peace process. If after the expiration of the proposed extension the pattern of UNITA non-compliance with those obligations continued, he would have no alternative for the Council but to propose an immediate readjustment of the United Nations presence. On the humanitarian side, special urgent measures would need to be taken to enable the humanitarian operations to perform their tasks in accordance with internationally accepted principles.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁶²

At the same meeting, the President further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 5 October 1998 from South Africa addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁶³ transmitting the final communiqué and the statement on Angola of the Summit of Heads of State or Government of the Southern African Development Community on 13 and 14 September 1998. He also drew the attention to a letter dated October 1998 from Portugal, the Russian Federation and the United States addressed to the Secretary-General,¹⁶⁴ transmitting a statement issued on 24 September 1998 by the Troika Foreign Ministers of the Observer States to the Lusaka Protocol and another letter dated 24 September 1998 to Jonas Savimbi, leader of UNITA. He further drew the attention to a letter dated 1 October 1998 from Austria addressed to Secretary-General,¹⁶⁵ transmitting a statement on Angola by the Presidency of the European Union; and a letter dated 12 October 1998 from Angola addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁶⁶ giving a brief chronology of the events since 1992 showing that responsibility for the consecutive failures of the Angolan peace process fell uniquely and exclusively on Mr. Jonas Savimbi, leader of UNITA.

At the same meeting, the representative of Angola stated that the suspension of the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol was attributable to the non-compliance of the leader of UNITA, Jonas Savimbi, with the commitments of UNITA to fulfilling its side of the bargain. The forces of Mr. Savimbi had struck police detachments, attacked civilians, and occupied townships and other communities in areas where State administration had been restored. Armed actions had occurred in diamond-producing areas in the northern and central part of the country, with the support of Banyamulenge rebels and Rwandan and Ugandan contingents concentrated there after having fled the Democratic Republic of the Congo. The representatives informed the Council that on 2 September 1998, a core team made up of UNITA officers and personnel had issued a manifesto and ousted Mr. Savimbi from the UNITA leadership and had ratified their commitment to the Lusaka Protocol. The Government of Angola had encouraged and supported this provisional leadership of UNITA in its efforts for peace. That public position taken by his Government represented the end of the dialogue with Jonas Savimbi, and consequently, he was no longer the UNITA interlocutor in exchanges with the Angolan Government and the various Government agencies. The decision made by the UNITA Renovation Committee, which had changed its name to the UNITA Provisional Political Committee, was supported not only by the Government but also by the Heads of State or Government of the Southern African Development Community at their summit meeting held on 13-14 September in Mauritius. They considered Mr. Savimbi a war criminal and a threat to the peace of all member countries and the region in general, and a similar position had been adopted at the Central African summit in September. The Angolan Government believed that the Security Council could not afford to remain indifferent to non-compliance with its pertinent resolutions by certain member countries. The Council needed to adopt severe sanctions against States that failed to honour its decisions. It was equally important to move for more expeditious and proactive measures by the Sanctions Committee. It was also important that the Council and the international community support the provisional leadership of UNITA-Renovada by strengthening its leadership role, not only to diminish Jonas Savimbi's influence on his military forces but also to de-escalate the state of war in Angola. With specific reference to the extension of the Mission, the Government of Angola ratified its support for the extension of MONUA to December 1998 and then its gradual phasing out and total withdrawal from Angola.¹⁶⁷

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1202 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Reaffirming its firm commitment to preserve the unity, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Angola,

Reiterating the validity of the "Acordos de Paz", the Lusaka Protocol and relevant Security Council resolutions as the fundamental basis of the peace process,

Reaffirming its resolution 1196 (1998) of 16 September 1998,

Taking note of the statement by the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the three Observer States to the Lusaka Protocol and of their letter dated 24 September 1998 to the leader of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola,

Welcoming regional efforts in support of the peace process in Angola,

Noting the call on the international community, particularly countries and leaders who have an influence on the leader of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, to persuade the rebel movement to rededicate itself to the path of peace and reconstruction in Angola as a matter of urgency, that was contained in the Final Communiqué of the Summit of the Heads of State or Government of the Southern African Development Community adopted on 14 September 1998,

Taking note of the establishment of UNITA-Renovada,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 8 October 1998,

1. Reiterates that the primary cause of the crisis in Angola and of the current impasse in the peace process is the failure by the leadership of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to comply with its obligations under the "Acordos de Paz", the Lusaka Protocol and relevant Security Council resolutions, and demands that the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola comply immediately and without conditions with its obligations, in particular the complete demilitarization of its forces and full cooperation in the immediate and unconditional extension of State administration throughout the national territory;

2. Demands that the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola withdraw immediately from territories it has reoccupied through military action;

3. Stresses that there can be no military solution to the conflict in Angola, and calls upon the Government of Angola and in particular the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to seek a political settlement;

4. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola until 3 December 1998;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to adjust the deployment and force structure of the Mission, as needed, in accordance with security conditions and its ability to implement its mandate in support of the peace process, and to prepare further contingency plans;

6. Emphasizes that the extension of the mandate of the Mission provides the Special Representative of the Secretary-General with an additional opportunity to revive the stalled peace process, and strongly urges the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to take advantage of this period to transform itself into a genuine political party and to secure a legitimate and constructive role in the Angolan political process;

7. Reiterates its full support for the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol and for the reactivation of the Joint Commission;

8. Calls upon the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to cooperate fully with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, including by facilitating his contacts with all those key to the peace process in order to convey, inter alia, the demands reiterated in the present resolution;

9. Encourages the Special Representative of the Secretary-General to coordinate his efforts with regional and subregional organizations in order to bring about a solution within the framework of the Lusaka Protocol;

10. Reiterates its concern over the safety and security of Mission personnel, and demands that the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola guarantee unconditionally the safety and freedom of movement of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and all United Nations and international humanitarian personnel, including those providing humanitarian assistance, throughout the territory of Angola;

11. Stresses the importance of strengthening the rule of law and respect for human rights, including the full protection of all Angolan citizens throughout the national territory, in particular representatives and members of all political parties;

13. Calls upon Member States to implement fully the measures imposed on the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola contained in the relevant provisions of resolutions 864 (1993) of 15 September 1993, 1127 (1997) of 28 August 1997 and 1173 (1998) of 12 June 1998, and expresses its readiness to consider appropriate reinforcing steps;

14. Requests the Chairman of the Committee established pursuant to resolution 864 (1993) to investigate reports that the leader of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola travelled outside Angola in violation of resolution 1127 (1997) and that forces of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola received military training and assistance as well as arms from outside Angola in violation of resolution 864 (1993);

15. Requests the Secretary-General to submit a comprehensive report no later than 23 November 1998 which will enable the Security Council to consider the future role of the United Nations in Angola and to make recommendations regarding ways of improving the implementation of the measures referred to in paragraph 13 above;

16. Expresses its deep concern at the crash of the Russian civilian aircraft in the Malanje region of Angola, which resulted in the loss of human lives, calls upon the Government of Angola to carry out without delay a thorough investigation of the causes of the crash, requests the Mission to assist as appropriate, and insists that the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola cooperate fully with these efforts;

17. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 3 December 1998 (3951st meeting): resolution 1213

At the 3951st meeting of the Security Council, held on 3 December 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Bahrain), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Angola, at her request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The Council had before them the report of the Secretary-General on MONUA dated 23 November 1998, submitted pursuant to paragraph 15 of Security Council resolution 1202 (1998).¹⁶⁸ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the overall political, military and security situation in the country had further deteriorated. The dialogue between the Government and Mr. Savimbi and UNITA had ceased. The joint mechanisms, including the Joint Commission, were not functioning and preparations for a military showdown continued. As a result MONUA was, in fact, unable to carry out most of its mandated tasks and the prospects for reactivating the peace process looked bleak. The Secretary-General informed the Council that his Special Representative was still unable to establish direct contact with Mr. Savimbi and the recent abrogation by the National Assembly of the law granting special status to Mr. Savimbi could prevent all possibility of political accommodation. He noted that while it was clear that Mr. Savimbi and UNITA were mainly responsible for the deadlock, the rejection of all contacts and dialogue with him was not likely to advance the cause of peace and national reconciliation. He maintained that despite the absence of any progress, the international community needed to remain engaged in order to dissuade the parties, as far as possible, from a return to war. Accordingly, he proposed that the mandate of MONUA be extended for another short period of up to three months, on the understanding that if the security situation were to become untenable, he would immediately revert to the Security Council and submit further recommendations, including the withdrawal of MONUA.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Portugal, the Russian Federation and the United States.¹⁶⁹

The representative of Angola stated that Jonas Savimbi, who was primarily responsible for the current state of affairs, had become more brazen in his disdain for the United Nations. In violation of international law and the Lusaka Protocol, the UNITA military wing had taken 15 members of MONUA hostage in Bailundo and Andulo, refusing to allow United Nations planes to land and evacuate those individuals. She urged the Council to join them in condemning such rogue acts against United Nations personnel. To prevent similar situations from occurring, the Government of Angola recommended that all remaining MONUA personnel be consolidated into areas under the Government's authority. The latest actions by UNITA demanded a strong reaction from the international community. Any strides that had been made in the process might be traced directly to the imposition of United Nations sanctions.

¹⁶⁹ S/1998/1135.

The Angolan Government insisted that the United Nations and its Member States redouble their efforts to enforce existing sanctions against Savimbi and his personal army to deny them access to military equipment and financial resources. She called on the Security Council to interdict all UNITA's communication links and to ban the transfer of all communications equipment to UNITA. The assets of UNITA needed to be frozen. Travel sanctions also needed to be more effectively enforced. The Government reaffirmed its decision not to have further contact, at any level, with Savimbi and endorsed the Security Council's recommendation that the mandate of MONUA be extended for three months. However, it also emphasized that MONUA could not remain in Angola indefinitely. The representative expressed the strong belief of her Government that in the near future the Government, working with UNITA-Renovada and the United Nations, could and had to officially and definitely conclude the Lusaka Protocol. At that time, they would look to the Security Council to adopt language acknowledging the conclusion of the Lusaka Protocol and endorsing the withdrawal of MONUA.¹⁷⁰

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1213 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 864 (1993) of 15 September 1993, 1127 (1997) of 28 August 1997 and 1173 (1998) of 12 June 1998,

Reaffirming its firm commitment to preserve the unity, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Angola,

Emphasizing the validity of the "Acordos de Paz", the Lusaka Protocol and relevant Security Council resolutions as the fundamental basis of the peace process,

Strongly condemning the failure of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to implement the remaining tasks of the Lusaka Protocol, in particular the complete demilitarization of its forces and full cooperation in the immediate and unconditional extension of State administration throughout the national territory,

Expressing its deep concern at the failure of the leader of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to respond to the letter dated 6 October 1998 addressed to him by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, which contained proposals for restoring the peace process, and to the letter dated 24 September 1998 addressed to him by the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the three Observer States to the Lusaka Protocol, which called for irreversible steps towards peace,

Expressing its grave concern at the serious humanitarian impact of the impasse in the peace process and the deteriorating security conditions,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 23 November 1998,

1. Emphasizes that the primary cause of the crisis in Angola and of the current impasse in the peace process is the failure by the leadership of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola in Bailundo to comply with its obligations under the “Acordos de Paz”, the Lusaka Protocol and relevant Security Council resolutions, and demands that the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola comply immediately and without conditions with its obligations, in particular the complete demilitarization of its forces and full cooperation in the immediate and unconditional extension of State administration throughout the national territory;

2. Demands that the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola withdraw immediately from territories it has reoccupied through military or other action;

3. Calls upon the leadership of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to cooperate fully and immediately with the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola in the withdrawal of Mission personnel from Andulo and Bailundo, and holds the leadership of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola in Bailundo responsible for their safety and security;

4. Stresses that there can be no military solution to the conflict in Angola, and calls upon the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to cooperate fully with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, including by facilitating his contacts with all those key to the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol, to seek a peaceful resolution of the crisis;

5. Emphasizes the importance of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General maintaining contact with all elements of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola in Luanda in order to revive the stalled peace process and encourage the transformation of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola into a genuine political party;

6. Stresses the importance of strengthening the rule of law and respect for human rights, including the full protection of all Angolan citizens throughout the national territory, in particular representatives and members of all political parties;

7. Reiterates its concern at the continued deterioration of the humanitarian situation, especially the significant increase in the number of internally displaced persons and the increase in minelaying activity, and calls upon the Government of Angola and in particular the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to guarantee unconditionally the safety and freedom of movement of all international humanitarian personnel, to cooperate fully with international humanitarian organizations in the delivery of emergency relief assistance to affected populations, to cease minelaying activity, and to respect international humanitarian, refugee and human rights law;

8. Urges the international community to provide financial and other resources in order to allow the continued delivery of emergency relief assistance to vulnerable groups in Angola;

9. Urges all Member States to support the peace process in Angola through full and immediate implementation of the measures against the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola contained in resolutions 864 (1993), 1127 (1997) and 1173 (1998), and expresses its readiness to consider appropriate reinforcing steps in accordance with the recommendations contained in the report referred to in paragraph 13 below;

10. Decides to extend the mandate of the Mission until 26 February 1999, and endorses the recommendation contained in the report of the Secretary-General to continue to adjust the deployment and force structure of the Mission, as needed, in accordance with security conditions and its ability to implement its mandate;

11. Recognizes that the Secretary-General may revert to the Council before 26 February 1999 with further recommendations regarding the Mission in the light of security conditions on the ground;

12. Expresses its growing concern for the security and freedom of movement throughout Angola of Mission personnel, and calls upon the Government of Angola and in particular the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to ensure their safety;

13. Requests the Secretary-General to submit a report no later than 15 January 1999 regarding the status of the peace process, the future role and mandate of the United Nations in Angola and the force structure of the Mission in the light of its ability to carry out its mandated tasks, and reiterates the request contained in its resolution 1202 (1998) of 15 October 1998 for recommendations regarding technical and other ways for Member States to improve the implementation of the measures referred to in paragraph 9 above;

14. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 23 December 1998 (3960th meeting):
statement by the President

At the 3960th meeting of the Security Council, held on 23 December 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Bahrain), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion, without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁷¹

The Security Council deplores the serious deterioration of the situation in Angola and calls for an immediate cessation of hostilities. It reaffirms its firm commitment to preserve the unity, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Angola.

The Council reiterates that the primary responsibility for the failure to achieve peace in Angola clearly lies with the leadership of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola. The persistent violation by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, under the leadership of Mr. Jonas Savimbi, of its obligations under the “Acordos de Paz”, the Lusaka Protocol and relevant Security Council resolutions, in particular those obligations related to the complete demilitarization of its forces and the extension of State administration throughout the national territory, has seriously undermined the peace process.

The Council demands that the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola comply immediately and without conditions with its obligations and reiterates that only a political settlement, on the basis of the relevant agreements and resolutions, will bring a lasting peace to Angola.

The Council, in this context, urges the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to cooperate fully with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, including by facilitating his contacts with all those key to reviving the stalled peace process and to implementing the Lusaka Protocol. It expresses concern at the public statements blaming the United Nations for the recent aggravation of the security situation in the country. The Council reiterates its full support for the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola, whose mandate has been extended until 26 February 1999, and emphasizes that both the Government, which concurred with the extension of this mandate, and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola have an obligation to guarantee the safety and freedom of movement of Mission personnel.

The Council expresses its deep concern at the worsening humanitarian situation in Angola and emphasizes the responsibility of the Government of Angola and the leadership of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to facilitate humanitarian assistance efforts, guarantee the safety and freedom of movement of humanitarian workers and permit an independent assessment of the needs of the civilian population, to be carried out swiftly in any part of the country as necessary. The Council also expresses concern at the plight of those most vulnerable groups, such as children, women, the elderly and internally displaced persons who are particularly at risk and need special protection.

The Council urges the Government of Angola and the leadership of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to ensure full respect for international humanitarian, refugee and human rights law.

The Council underscores the need for the full and immediate implementation of the measures against the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola contained in resolutions 864 (1993) of 15 September 1993, 1127 (1997) of 28 August 1997 and 1173 (1998) of 12 June 1998. It expresses deep concern at recent reports of violations of those measures, particularly those related to arms and diamonds, and expresses its intention to follow up on those reports.

The Council expresses its grave concern at reports that aircraft were shot down over areas controlled by União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola and demands full cooperation by all concerned, especially the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, in the investigation of those incidents, including of the fate of the crews and passengers.

The Council will remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 31 December 1998 (3962nd meeting): resolution 1219 (1998)

At the 3962nd meeting of the Security Council, held on 31 December 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Bahrain), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council’s prior consultations.¹⁷² The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1219 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 1202 (1998) of 15 October 1998 and 1213 (1998) of 3 December 1998,

Recalling the statement by its President of 23 December 1998,

Expressing concern in the strongest terms at the crash of United Nations flight 806 and at the disappearance of other aircraft reportedly over territory controlled by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola,

1. Expresses its deep concern regarding the fate of the passengers and crew of United Nations flight 806, and deplores the incomprehensible lack of cooperation in clarifying the circumstances of this tragedy and in permitting the prompt dispatch of a United Nations search and rescue mission;

¹⁷² S/1998/1238.

2. Demands that the leader of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, Mr. Jonas Savimbi, immediately respond to the appeals from the United Nations and guarantee the security and access necessary for, and assist in, the search for and rescue of possible survivors of the above-mentioned incidents in territory controlled by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, and calls upon the Government of Angola to cooperate as appropriate in fulfilment of its expressed commitment to do so;

3. Expresses its serious concern at the increase in incidents involving the disappearance of aircraft reportedly over territory controlled by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola;

4. Condemns the lack of effective action to determine the fate of the crews and passengers of the aircraft referred to in paragraph 3 above, calls for an immediate and objective international investigation of those incidents, and calls upon all concerned, especially the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, to facilitate such an investigation;

5. Expresses its intention to assess compliance with the present resolution no later than 11 January 1999 and to take action, as appropriate, in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Charter of the United Nations;

6. Reaffirms the need for compliance with the measures against the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola contained in resolutions 864 (1993) of 15 September 1993, 1127 (1997) of 28 August 1997 and 1173 (1998) of 12 June 1998, which were imposed under Chapter VII of the Charter;

7. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 12 January 1999 (3965th meeting):
resolution 1221 (1999)

At the 3965th meeting of the Security Council, held on 12 January 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Brazil), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Angola and Portugal, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Brazil, Canada, France, Gabon, Malaysia, Namibia, Portugal and the Russian Federation.¹⁷³

Speaking before the vote, the representative of the United States stated that they would vote in favour of the draft resolution because of their deep concern about the fate of the crews and passengers of the two United Nations aircraft that were downed over Angola. They urgently called on the Government of Angola and UNITA to cooperate fully with the search-and-rescue mission and with the investigation of those tragic incidents. He stated that they however did have concerns about two aspects of the draft resolution. He questioned the appropriateness of the reference to Chapter VII, since the draft resolution did not seek to authorize new international enforcement actions, and they were concerned that such a reference might be misunderstood as a step in that direction. He also stated that they doubted the wisdom of considering the imposition of sanctions against communications with UNITA, as the past three weeks had demonstrated the crucial importance of being able to communicate quickly with them on search-and-rescue and other humanitarian concerns. He expressed his belief that the only way to resolve the conflict was through negotiations and a negotiated settlement could not be achieved without the ability to communicate with all parties. In that context, the report requested by the draft resolution needed to address how such communications could be maintained with all parties.¹⁷⁴

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1221 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 1196 (1998) of 16 September 1998 and 1219 (1998) of 31 December 1998,

Recalling the statement by its President of 23 December 1998,

Expressing its outrage at the downing on 2 January 1999 of a second United Nations-chartered aircraft over territory controlled by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, which brings to six the number of aircraft lost in this area in recent months,

Expressing its deep concern regarding the fate of the passengers and crews of the above-mentioned aircraft, and its deep regret at the loss of life in these incidents,

Stressing that attacks against personnel who act on behalf of the United Nations are unacceptable and unjustifiable by whomsoever committed,

Deploing the lack of cooperation by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola in clarifying the circumstances of these tragic incidents, which occurred over territory under its control, and in permitting the prompt dispatch of the United Nations search and rescue mission,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Condemns the downing of the two aircraft chartered by the United Nations, deplores the loss under suspicious circumstances of other commercial aircraft, and demands that all such attacks cease immediately;

2. Reaffirms its resolve to establish the truth about the circumstances of and to determine the responsibility for the downing of the two aircraft chartered by the United Nations and the loss under suspicious circumstances of other commercial aircraft over territory controlled by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola through an immediate and objective international investigation of these tragic incidents, and reiterates its call upon all concerned, especially the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, to cooperate fully with and to facilitate such an investigation;

3. Concludes that the leader of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, Mr. Jonas Savimbi, has not complied with the demands contained in its resolution 1219 (1998);

4. Reiterates its demand that the leader of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, Mr. Jonas Savimbi, cooperate immediately and in good faith in the search for and rescue of possible survivors of the above-mentioned incidents;

5. Welcomes the concrete actions undertaken by the Government of Angola to follow up the commitment made by the President of Angola to the Special Envoy of the Secretary-General on 6 January 1999 regarding the cooperation to be extended to the United Nations search and rescue efforts, and encourages it to continue to extend such cooperation;

6. Requests the International Civil Aviation Organization to provide all possible support to the investigation of those incidents as soon as conditions on the ground permit, and urges Member States with investigative capability and expertise to assist the United Nations, upon request, in the investigation of those incidents;

7. Stresses the obligation of Member States to comply with the measures imposed against the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola contained in resolutions 864 (1993) of 15 September 1993, 1127 (1997) of 28 August 1997 and 1173 (1998) of 12 June 1998;

8. Expresses its readiness to pursue reports of violations of the measures referred to in paragraph 7 above, to take steps to reinforce the implementation of those measures and to consider the imposition of additional measures, including in the area of telecommunications, on the basis of a report to be prepared by the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 864 (1993), by 15 February 1999, drawing on the expertise of relevant bodies and organizations, including the International Telecommunication Union;

9. Encourages the Chairman of the Committee referred to in paragraph 8 above to consult with the Organization of African Unity and the Southern African Development Community on ways to strengthen the implementation of the measures referred to in paragraph 7 above;

10. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 21 January 1999 (3969th meeting): statement by the President

At the 3969th meeting of the Security Council held on 21 January 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Brazil), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The Council had before it the report of the Secretary-General on MONUA dated 17 January 1999, submitted pursuant to resolution 1213 (1998) on the future role and mandate of MONUA.¹⁷⁵ The Secretary-General observed that the events of the last few months had clearly demonstrated that the Angolan peace process had collapsed and the country was in a state of war. In the light of the expressed determination of the parties to test their fortunes on the battlefield, the steadily worsening security situation, and the inability of MONUA to carry out its mandate, it had become increasingly clear that, for the time being, the conditions for a meaningful United Nations peacekeeping role in Angola had ceased to exist. In addition, the Government of Angola had informed the United Nations that it did not intend to support the extension of MONUA beyond its current mandate. Moreover, UNITA had not taken any serious initiative to restore meaningful contacts with the United Nations or to resume the implementation of key provisions of the Lusaka Protocol. Regarding the presumed shooting down of two United Nations aircraft, he condemned those crimes in the strongest terms and was appalled by the parties' insensitivity and their lack of cooperation with the United Nations in the immediate aftermath of the crashes. It was imperative that a full-fledged investigation be conducted into the two incidents and that the perpetrators be identified. Under the circumstances, he expressed his belief that MONUA had no other option but to continue to reduce its presence within Angola and proceed with the orderly repatriation of United Nations personnel and property as requested by the Angolan Government. He underlined that the United Nations stood ready to play a political role, if requested, in order to assist all concerned in Angola in reaching a peaceful solution. Consequently, it was his intention to designate a senior official to serve as his Special Envoy for Angola, who would be based in New York. He stated that the work of the United Nations human rights presence in Angola, subject to the concurrence of the Angolan parties and satisfactory security guarantees, should continue its activities.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁷⁶

The Security Council expresses its alarm at the serious deterioration in the political and military situation in Angola. It reaffirms its belief that lasting peace and national reconciliation cannot be achieved through military means, and urges the Government of Angola and especially the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to resume a constructive dialogue on the basis of the “Acordos de Paz”, the Lusaka Protocol and relevant Council resolutions in order to seek a peaceful resolution of the conflict and spare the Angolan people further war and suffering. In this context, it reaffirms that the primary cause of the crisis in Angola is the refusal by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to comply with the basic provisions of the Lusaka Protocol and reiterates its demand that the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola comply with its obligations to demilitarize and to permit the extension of State administration to territories it controls.

The Council shares the assessment and judgments of the Secretary-General on the political and military situation in Angola contained in his report of 17 January 1999. It underscores the contribution of the United Nations to the past four years of relative peace in Angola. It expresses its deep regret that the present political and security situation in the country and the lack of cooperation with the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola, especially by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, have prevented the Mission from carrying out its mandated role fully.

The Council underlines the great importance it attaches to a continued multidisciplinary presence of the United Nations under the direction of a representative of the Secretary-General in Angola. It recognizes that such a continued presence depends on the safety of United Nations personnel and requires the agreement of the Government of Angola and the cooperation of all concerned. In this context, it appeals to the Government of Angola to provide such agreement and to the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to cooperate fully. It welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to consult urgently with the Government of Angola on such a United Nations presence and to report to the Council in this regard.

The Council again calls upon Member States to support the peace process in Angola through full and immediate implementation of the measures against the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola contained in resolutions 864 (1993) of 15 September 1993, 1127 (1997) of 28 August 1997 and 1173 (1998) of 12 June 1998, and reiterates its readiness to take steps to reinforce the implementation of those measures on the basis of the recommendations contained in section IV of the report of the Secretary-General of 17 January 1999.

The Council expresses its profound concern at the humanitarian impact of the conflict on the Angolan people. It urges the international community to support the Government of Angola in fulfilling its primary responsibility for the humanitarian needs of the Angolan people and, in this regard, urges Member States to fund generously the 1999 United Nations Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for Angola. It calls upon all concerned to concur and cooperate with United Nations humanitarian assistance activities on the basis of the principles of neutrality and non-discrimination, to guarantee the security and freedom of movement of humanitarian personnel, and to ensure necessary, adequate and safe access and logistics by land and air. It urges all concerned to cooperate with the human rights activities of the United Nations, which help to lay a basis for lasting peace and national reconciliation.

The Council will remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 26 February 1999 (3983rd meeting):
resolution 1229 (1999)

At the 3983rd meeting of the Security Council, held on 26 February 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Canada), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Angola and Zambia, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General on MONUA dated 26 February 1999, submitted pursuant to the request of the Security Council in its presidential statement of 21 January 1999,¹⁷⁷ on consultations with the Government of Angola on a continued multidisciplinary presence of the United Nations.¹⁷⁸ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the Government of Angola had informed his Special Representative that a continued multidisciplinary presence of the United Nations in Angola was not necessary and that conditions for maintaining a MONUA presence had ceased to exist. The Government had expressed the view that the United Nations should continue its activities through the specialized agencies, under the coordination of the United Nations Development Programme. They also had emphasized that they were not opposed to the appointment of a representative of the Secretary-General, based in New York, who could maintain contact with the Government in monitoring the evolution of the situation in the country.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁷⁹

At the same meeting, the President further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 12 February 1999 from the Chairman of the Security Council Committee established pursuant to Security Council resolution 864 (1993) concerning the situation in Angola addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁸⁰ transmitting a report dated 12 January 1999 on the implementation of sanctions against UNITA. He also drew their attention to a letter dated 18 February 1999 from the representative of Angola addressed to the Secretary-General,¹⁸¹ and a letter dated 20 February 1999 from the representative of Zambia addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁸² transmitting a press statement denying the Angolan allegations of "involvement of the Zambian authorities in the logistic and military support sent to Dr. Jonas Savimbi inside Angola".

The Vice-Minister for Territorial Administration of Angola stated that the Angolan Government believed that if there were greater commitment on the part of the international community and a more exacting mechanism for monitoring compliance with the United Nations sanctions, Mr. Savimbi and his armed group would soon be neutralized militarily and that conditions would then be conducive to the reestablishment of peace in Angola. He stated that they did not believe in the good intentions of any country that acted in a manner other than that they had described. Such "so-called contributions" were useful only if made in close coordination with the Government of Angola. He appealed to all neighbouring countries to break off all contact with Mr. Savimbi and to suspend all logistical support that enabled him to wage war in Angola. Concerning Zambia, the Angolan Government firmly believed that the current diplomatic demarches would prompt Zambian authorities to become ever more vigilant in preventing Zambian territory from continuing to be used as a point of trans-shipment for the military and logistical materiel that Mr. Savimbi needed for his military campaign. He firmly believed that as a result of a new cooperation framework between the Angolan Government and the United Nations, new and more stringent measures would be taken to isolate and neutralize Mr. Savimbi.¹⁸³

The representative of Zambia stated that the purpose of his address was to put on record the concerns of his Government about allegations that had been made by the Government of Angola that Zambia was providing logistical and military support to UNITA. He noted that Angola had threatened to wage war against Zambia and other alleged supporters of UNITA. His country found it curious that those allegations were being repeated, in spite of the fact that most of them had already been jointly investigated with Angola. In addition, the Security Council had sent the Chairman of the Committee on Sanctions against UNITA and the OAU had sent its Assistant Secretary-General for Political Affairs to investigate the allegations and both had cleared Zambia. However, owing to the persistent allegations they were again extending an invitation to the Secretary-General to once again send a mission to Zambia to investigate the allegations. He reiterated that the conduct of UNITA had been totally unacceptable and had been condemned by Zambia. However, notwithstanding obstacles, the Lusaka Protocol still remained the best framework for a peaceful settlement of the Angolan conflict. Therefore, every effort needed to be made to ensure that a vacuum was not created which could lead to the worsening of the security situation in the southern African subregion. Such a situation would have an adverse impact on the security of his country. They were also concerned that those serious allegations were being made at a time when their mediation efforts in the Democratic Republic of the Congo had reached an advance stage. The allegations, therefore, were likely to undermine Zambia's mediation of the conflict.¹⁸⁴

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1229 (1999), which reads:

Decision of 19 May 1999 (4007th meeting): statement by the President

At the 4007th meeting of the Security Council, held on 19 May 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Gabon) made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁹⁰

The Security Council strongly condemns the criminal act by the União Nacional Para a Independência Total de Angola against commercial aircraft, namely the shooting down of an Antonov-26 aircraft on 12 May 1999 near Luzamba and the taking of its Russian crew hostage, while the fate of its Angolan passengers remains unknown.

The Council expresses its grave concern at the fate of those who were on board the downed aircraft, demands the immediate and unconditional release of the Russian crew members and all other foreign nationals that may be held hostage in Angola by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, and also demands information on the fate of the Angolan passengers. It stresses that the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola and its leader, Mr. Jonas Savimbi, carry full responsibility for their security.

The Council calls upon the Government of Angola and all other concerned parties to cooperate in obtaining the release of the Russian crew members as well as in ascertaining the fate of passengers and crew members of other commercial aircraft lost under suspicious circumstances over territory controlled by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola.

Deliberations of 29 July 1999 (4027th meeting)

At its 4027th meeting, held on 29 July 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the item “Briefing by the Chairman of the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 864 (1993) concerning the situation in Angola” in its agenda. Following the adopting of the agenda, the President (Malaysia), drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 28 July 1999 from the Chairman of the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 864 addressed to the President of the Security Council and the annexed report by the Chairman.¹⁹¹

The representative of Canada and Chairman of the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 864 stated that the premise of the work in the Sanctions Committee was that the war could be ended only through political dialogue and that their intention was to do everything possible to limit the ability of UNITA to pursue the war option. Their objective was to give teeth to hitherto ineffective sanctions and to make very clear that sanctions violations were no longer cost free. He then commented on the steps that the Committee was taken to take to give the sanctions teeth. They had made two visits abroad and were about to announce the creation of two expert panels. The African trip had resulted in a set of 14 preliminary recommendations, included in the report submitted in early June. The recommendations included the prospect of sanctions monitors, and a proposal for close collaboration with Interpol and other international organizations. The trips also included extensive discussion of the effective application of sanctions against the trade in diamonds by UNITA.¹⁹²

During the course of the debate, several speakers spoke, welcoming the Chairman’s approach, supporting his recommendations, and underlining the importance of States cooperating in implementing the sanctions.¹⁹³

At the end of the meeting, the Chairman spoke again and responded to some of the questions raised.¹⁹⁴

Decision of 24 August 1999 (4036th meeting): statement by the President

At the 4036th meeting of the Security Council, held on 24 August 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Namibia), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Angola, at her request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁹⁵

The Security Council expresses its deep concern at the deteriorating political, military and humanitarian situation in Angola, at the suffering of the people and at the dramatic increase in the number of internally displaced persons, which has now reached well over two million, not including the unknown number of internally displaced persons in areas which are currently inaccessible to humanitarian agencies.

The Council reiterates that the primary cause of the current crisis in Angola is the failure by the leadership of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to comply with its obligations under the Lusaka Protocol, and it again demands that the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola comply immediately and without conditions with its obligations to demilitarize and permit the extension of state administration to areas under its control. It reaffirms its belief that lasting peace and national reconciliation can only be achieved through political dialogue.

The Council expresses its concern at the critical condition of the internally displaced persons who suffer from lack of food, medicines, shelter, arable land and other necessities. The Council further expresses its grave concern at the number of malnourished children and at the outbreak of diseases such as polio and meningitis due to the lack of access to clean water and hygiene. In this regard, the Council commends the excellent work by the Government of Angola and the United Nations system in their efforts towards the eradication of diseases in Angola. The Council also expresses its concern at the plight of those vulnerable groups, such as children, women, the elderly and the handicapped, who are particularly at risk and in need of special assistance.

The Council expresses its concern that the continuing conflict in Angola has increased the cost of humanitarian assistance. It notes the insufficient level of contributions to the 1999 United Nations Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for Angola and reiterates its appeal to the donor community to contribute generously, financially and in kind, to the humanitarian appeal to enable the agencies to address effectively the plight of the internally displaced persons. The Council welcomes the announcement by the Government of Angola of an emergency plan for humanitarian assistance.

The Council also expresses its concern that the continuing conflict and lack of access jeopardize the ability of the agencies to continue to deliver assistance to those in need. The Council urges the Government of Angola and particularly the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to provide access to all internally displaced persons in Angola and to facilitate the mechanisms necessary for the delivery of humanitarian assistance to all populations in need throughout the country. The Council urges both parties, particularly the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, to guarantee the safety and security and freedom of movement of humanitarian personnel, including United Nations and associated personnel, providing assistance to internally displaced persons. The Council strongly urges respect for the principle of neutrality and impartiality in the delivery of assistance. The Council commends the determination and courage of those working to relieve human suffering in Angola, including the Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, the World Food Programme and the United Nations Children's Fund and other agencies.

The Council urges both parties to ensure full respect for human rights and international humanitarian law. In this connection, the Council urges the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to cease committing atrocities, including killing civilians and attacking humanitarian aid workers, and demands the release of all foreign citizens, including the Russian aircrews, held by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola. It expresses its concern at reports of re-mining activities as well as the laying of mines in new areas in the country.

The Council will remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 15 October 1999 (4052nd meeting):

By a letter dated 11 August 1999 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁹⁶ the Secretary-General reported on the consultations with the Government of Angola on a continued multidisciplinary presence of the United Nations in the country, as requested in the statement of the President of the Security Council dated 21 January 1999.¹⁹⁷ The Secretary-General stated that the Government of Angola had indicated that conditions were now created for the signing of an agreement with the United Nations which would enable the United Nations office to start operating in Angola. Accordingly he intended to initiate practical arrangements for the earliest establishment of the new office and the conclusion with the Government of Angola of a status-of-mission agreement. He noted that the United Nations Humanitarian Assistance Coordination Unit, the activities of which enjoyed the fullest support of the Government, would continue to operate in its present configuration.

At its 4052nd meeting, held on 15 October 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Russian Federation), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁹⁸ The

5. Items relating to the situation in Rwanda

A. The situation concerning Rwanda

Decision of 8 March 1996 (3640th meeting): resolution 1050 (1996)

At its 3640th meeting held on 8 March 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General dated 29 February 1996 on the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda (UNAMIR),¹ submitted pursuant to Security Council resolution 1029 (1995), in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Botswana), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Rwanda, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that when Rwanda emerged from civil war and genocide with the establishment of the Government of National Unity on 19 July 1994, conditions in the country were nothing short of disastrous. There was no administration, no functioning economy, no judicial or education system, no water or electricity supply and no transport; the population, moreover, was still in a state of profound shock. Nevertheless, conditions in Rwanda had begun to return to normal, though a significant portion of the population was still refugees or displaced persons. Along with the efforts of the Rwandan people themselves, UNAMIR, other United Nations and international agencies and non-governmental organizations had also worked with the Government to restore basic infrastructure and to rehabilitate vital sectors of the economy, clear mines, construct transit camps, and provide humanitarian assistance. The Mission by its presence had provided a sense of security and confidence to the representatives of the United Nations agencies, intergovernmental institutions and non-governmental organizations who, throughout the country and sometimes under very difficult circumstances, had worked for the recovery of Rwanda. The Secretary-General, in recalling his report of 30 January 1996, reiterated his view that the United Nations would still have a useful role to play even after the expiry of the UNAMIR mandate.² He gave three options for a continued United Nations presence: a small political office to support the efforts by the Government of Rwanda to promote national reconciliation, strengthen the judicial system, facilitate the return of refugees and rehabilitate the country's infrastructure; a political office plus a military component consisting of military observers to monitor and support the return of refugees; or the establishment of a regional office with responsibilities for promoting peace, stability and development in the Great Lakes region as a whole. He informed the Council that despite the significant progress towards normalcy in Rwanda the relative peace that prevailed would be under constant threat as long as the 1.5 million refugees, mixed with elements of the former Rwandan army and militias, were camped along the border. The security situation was a major factor discouraging the refugees from returning and, therefore, the deployment of United Nations military personnel in those areas to which large numbers of refugees were expected to return, could speed up the process of return both by building confidence and by providing much needed logistic support. However, the above options required the consent of the Rwandan Government; with that consent not forthcoming, there appeared no alternative to the complete withdrawal of all the civilian and military components of UNAMIR, in accordance with paragraph 5 of resolution 1029 (1995). Notwithstanding the withdrawal of UNAMIR, other United Nations agencies and programmes would remain in the country, carrying out their respective mandates.

At the same meeting the President also drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.³

The President, at the same meeting, further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 23 February 1996 from the representative of Zaire addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴ transmitting Zaire's position on the interim report of the International Commission of Inquiry into the allegations of the supply by Zaire of arms or training to former Rwandan government forces, and a letter dated 6 March 1996 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵ transmitting the text of a letter dated 1 March 1996 from Rwanda accepting the offer of the Secretary-General to maintain the office of the Special Representative for six months and providing a list of areas for the United Nations agencies to concentrate on.

The representative of Rwanda thanked the Secretary-General for his report which showed the positive evolution of the situation in Rwanda. He stated that the setting up of a coalition Government and Parliament representative of all groups was a major sign of the beginning of a process of national reconciliation. He informed the Council that the Government had for the first time established a policy of repatriation of refugees and had translated its commitment into action by a variety of measures. Those had already led to the return of 2.3 million refugees in one year including those who had been outside the country since 1959. In terms of reforms, the rehabilitation of the judicial system also continued to be one of their main priorities; they had also started to reorganize and strengthen the gendarmerie and the police and intended to proceed with the demobilization of part of the army. He stated that they were looking forward to the effective implementation of the International Tribunal for Rwanda as a major step in healing the wounds of genocide. He expressed his hope that the Secretariat would engage in a serious analysis of its most recent experience with UNAMIR in Rwanda both before and after the genocide and would learn the right lessons. As they were handing the UNAMIR troops back to the United Nations in a generally secure environment, they expected the Secretariat to comply with its obligation to Rwanda, as some issues raised by his Government had never received satisfactory attention. He informed the Council that the Government had accepted the Secretary-General's proposal for a small political office to support the efforts to strengthen the judicial system, facilitate the return of refugees and rehabilitate the country's infrastructure as a follow-up to UNAMIR.⁶

The representative of Italy, speaking on behalf of the European Union and associated countries,⁷ stated that despite the relative calm and stability prevailing in the country, serious issues with refugees, the judicial system and prison crowding needed to be addressed as a matter of priority in order to achieve national reconciliation and future stability. He underlined the importance of the International Tribunal for Rwanda, which was fundamental to restoring a climate of trust and confidence, and the need to assure protection for its personnel and premises. He stated his agreement with the assessment of the Secretary-General that Rwanda could have benefited from a further phase of United Nations involvement to consolidate peace and security, but welcomed their agreement to the maintenance of a political office. One of the main priorities of the future United Nations presence in Rwanda would remain supporting the efforts of the Government to promote national reconciliation. He noted with satisfaction the continuation of the United Nations human rights operation in Rwanda, to which the European Union attached a fundamental importance. In conclusion, he stressed the importance of the continuation of efforts for the careful preparation and convening of a Regional Conference for Peace, Security and Development in the Great Lakes Region, which was mentioned in the draft resolution.⁸

Before the vote, the representative of Germany noted that Rwanda's call for "post-genocide peacebuilding" had enabled the Security Council to draft the draft resolution based on Chapter VI of the United Nations Charter. He stressed the importance of the Human Rights Field Operation in Rwanda, which constituted a true confidence-building measure. While welcoming the fact that UNAMIR would contribute to the protection of the International Tribunal, he noted that after their withdrawal new arrangements would be needed. In conclusion, he informed the Council that the Secretary-General would submit a recommendation for the release of non-lethal UNAMIR equipment to Rwanda and he hoped that any decision would take into account the tremendous needs in that respect.⁹

The representative from the United Kingdom stated his support for the draft resolution, which would place the weight of the Security Council behind the Secretary-General's proposal for the continued maintenance of the office of the Special Representative. He also noted the particular importance of the security that UNAMIR would provide to the International Tribunal until the withdrawal. Early clarification from the Secretariat of the precise arrangements for protection of the Tribunal after the withdrawal was also an area of great importance. He expressed his hope that while it was important that United Nations rules be followed in the disposition of UNAMIR equipment, some flexibility could be shown to benefit Rwanda. In conclusion he encouraged all States in the region to cooperate closely with each other, particularly in the return of refugees, to help bring about a real prospect of lasting peace and stability in the Great Lakes region.¹⁰

The representative of the Russian Federation stated their support for the resolution and noted with satisfaction the partial stabilization of the situation. However, he noted that many problems remained to be solved, the most acute of which was the problem of almost 2 million displaced persons and refugees and the resulting potential threat of destabilization. That complex, large-scale problem could not be resolved without the active cooperation of the international community and they therefore attached importance to the establishment of the United Nations political office to support the Government of Rwanda, strengthen confidence and stability, and keep the United Nations abreast of developments. He stated that he trusted that the safety of the personnel of the International Tribunal, specialized agencies and other international organizations would be assured after the withdrawal of UNAMIR.¹¹

Several other speakers also spoke, stating their support for the resolution, noting the positive development in the country, and expressing concern over the unresolved issues, particularly the problem of the 1.7 million refugees. Most speakers expressed support for the work of the International Tribunal and the Field Operation and the continuation of the political office and called on States and agencies to provide humanitarian assistance and support for the other United Nations missions.¹² Several countries also hoped that a way could be found to permit Rwanda to retain non-lethal UNAMIR equipment for productive purposes.¹³

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1050 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous resolutions on the situation in Rwanda,

Stressing the continued importance of the voluntary and safe repatriation of Rwandan refugees and of genuine national reconciliation,

Emphasizing the importance it attaches to the role and responsibility of the Government of Rwanda in the promotion of a climate of confidence, security and trust and the safe return of Rwandan refugees,

Rwanda in promoting the return of refugees, in consolidating a climate of confidence and stability and in promoting the rehabilitation and reconstruction of Rwanda,

Reiterating the responsibility of the Government of Rwanda for the safety and security of all United Nations personnel and other international staff serving in the country,

1. Takes note of the arrangements made by the Secretary-General for the withdrawal, starting on 9 March 1996, of the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda pursuant to Council resolution 1029 (1995) of 12 December 1995;

2. Authorizes elements of the Mission remaining in Rwanda prior to their final withdrawal to contribute, with the agreement of the Government of Rwanda, to the protection of the personnel and premises of the International Tribunal for Rwanda;

3. Welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to submit recommendations to the General Assembly regarding non-lethal equipment of the Mission that may be released for use in Rwanda in accordance with paragraph 7 of its resolution 1029 (1995), and calls upon the Government of Rwanda to take all necessary steps to ensure that Mission personnel, and equipment which is not remaining in Rwanda, can be withdrawn without impediment and in an orderly and safe manner;

4. Encourages the Secretary-General, in agreement with the Government of Rwanda, to maintain in Rwanda a United Nations office, to be headed by his Special Representative and to include the present United Nations communications system and radio station, for the purpose of supporting the efforts of the Government of Rwanda to promote national reconciliation, strengthen the judicial system, facilitate the return of refugees and rehabilitate the country's infrastructure, and of coordinating the United Nations efforts to that end;

9. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Following the vote, the representative of France stated that it was urgent that war criminals be brought before the International Tribunal, a process which would exonerate many of the thousands of men and women currently in prison. He stated that they would have preferred if UNAMIR had been entrusted to continue its many tasks, as the Secretary-General had outlined. However, the political office would allow the United Nations to continue to give assistance to Rwanda in needed areas, particularly national reconciliation. He maintained that national reconciliation in Rwanda implied dialogue with Rwandans outside the country who wished to return, though not with the perpetrators of genocide. He noted that there would be no real security in the region unless all the humanitarian and political problems of the region found an overall solution. He expressed his belief that a Conference on

5. Commends the efforts of States, including neighbouring States, the United Nations and its agencies, the European Union and non-governmental organizations which have provided humanitarian assistance to refugees and displaced persons, and underlines the importance it attaches to continued efforts by the Government of Rwanda, neighbouring States, the international community and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to facilitate the early, safe, voluntary and organized return of Rwandan refugees to their own country in accordance with the recommendations of the Bujumbura Conference;

6. Calls upon States and organizations to continue to give assistance for the reconstruction of Rwanda and the rehabilitation of the infrastructure of the country, including the Rwandan justice system, directly or through the United Nations trust funds for Rwanda, and invites the Secretary-General to consider whether there is a need to adjust the scope and purposes of those funds to bring them into line with current requirements;

7. Also calls upon States to contribute urgently to the costs of the Human Rights Field Operation in Rwanda, and encourages the Secretary-General to consider what steps might be taken to place the Operation on a more secure financial basis;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council by 5 April 1996 on the arrangements that have been agreed upon with the Government of Rwanda for the protection of the personnel and premises of the International Tribunal for Rwanda after the withdrawal of the Mission and on the arrangements he has made pursuant to paragraph 4 above, and to keep the Council closely informed thereafter of developments in the situation;

Peace, Security and Development in the Great Lakes Region, under the auspices of the United Nations, and in cooperation with the Organization of African Unity would be useful and he hoped that that would be the outcome from the negotiations of the group of five at Tunis, where the United Nations was involved as an observer.¹⁴

The representative of the United States stated that there could not be long-lasting peace and stability for Rwanda and the entire region, unless the 1.7 million refugees returned. He urged the Special Representative to encourage repatriation as one of his highest priorities. He praised the work of the human rights monitors and the Rwandan Government for accepting them. He maintained that the international community had to ensure that sufficient resources were available for the International Tribunal, including additional funds for security, and ensure that thousands of prisoners in

Rwanda's jails received a speedy trial. As the Commission of Inquiry to investigate reports of the sale or supply of arms to former Rwandan government forces had not had the benefit of full cooperation from all Rwanda's neighbours, he called on all States to offer the Commission their fullest support. He noted that differences between the Secretariat and the Government of Rwanda remained concerning the disposition of equipment and financing and he urged them to resolve those differences as soon as possible.¹⁵

The representative of Egypt reiterated that the successful repatriation of the refugees was key to stability in Rwanda. He stressed the need to ensure complete implementation of the decisions of the Bujumbura Conference, the Cairo Summit and the Addis Ababa follow-up conference and of convening an international conference on peace, stability and development in the Great Lakes region. He noted that the experience of Rwanda had taught them a critical lesson about the importance of preventive diplomacy and the need to remain committed to preventive measures in averting crises. Despite their concerns about facilitating the return of refugees, Egypt supported the resolution in solidarity with the Government of Rwanda.¹⁶

Finally, he stated their support for the convening of a regional conference.¹⁷

Decision of 23 April 1996 (3656th meeting):
resolution 1053 (1996)

By a letter dated 13 March 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁸ the Secretary-General, transmitted the final report of the International Commission of Inquiry authorized under Security Council resolution 1013 (1995) to investigate, inter alia, reports relating to sale or supply of arms and related materiel to former Rwandan government forces in the Great Lakes region in violation of Council resolutions 918 (1994), 997 (1995) and 1011 (1995). The report contained the Commission's conclusions, as well as its recommendations regarding possible measures to curb the illegal flow of arms in the Great Lakes region. He stated that in the light of those recommendations, the Security Council might wish to decide whether the Commission should continue its investigations or

The representative of Botswana noted that they were one of the delegations that had not favoured a precipitous departure of UNAMIR from Rwanda, and they were delighted that the United Nations would continue to play a significant role. He noted that the refugee problem and the need to strengthen the judicial system were two key elements in the process that needed the support of the international community. He stated that the problems facing Rwanda had a subregional dimension, which needed to be addressed urgently by the countries of the region. The return of the refugees could proceed smoothly only with close consultation and cooperation with the States hosting them. He maintained that it was an established fact that there was intimidation in the refugee camps by elements of the former Government against those intending to return to Rwanda and that those elements harboured intentions of undertaking military incursions into Rwanda. He urged the international community to make it clear to those elements that the withdrawal of UNAMIR did not in any way mean the abrogation of the measures it undertook through the relevant Security Council resolutions to bring an end to intimidation in the refugee camps and to the military activities against Rwanda: the arms embargo under resolutions 918 (1994) and resolution 1011 (1995) remained in force.

whether other measures should be put in place to promote compliance with the relevant resolutions of the Council.

At the 3656th meeting of the Security Council, held on 23 April 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Chile), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Burundi, Rwanda, and Zaire, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to the following documents: a letter dated 14 March 1996 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council;¹⁹ a letter dated 27 March 1996 from Rwanda addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁰ giving their position on the International Commission of Inquiry and calling on the Council to strengthen the Commission to better investigate a situation that fell under Chapter VII of the Charter; and a letter dated 3 April 1996 from Zaire addressed to the President of the Security Council,²¹ denying the allegations against them presented in the final report of the Commission of Inquiry.

At the same meeting the President also drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.²²

The representative of Rwanda noted the important fact that the first report of the International Commission of Inquiry differed remarkably from the second. The latter report brought to light "elements of incontestable information and pieces of evidence". He maintained that control over the implementation of a resolution formulated under Chapter VII could only be exercised with the authority granted under another, stronger resolution and that the draft resolution was too weak to allow the Commission to be effective. He expressed his belief that the Council was aware of the consequences of the failure of the Commission, including the destabilization of the region due to the arms and militia infiltrating Rwanda and Burundi, loss of life, displaced persons and refugees, economic regression, and the possibility of the subregion "going up in flames". He requested that the Council cease taking a "sectoral" approach to Rwanda as the problems of the subregion were interlinked and interdependent. The problem of the rearming of former Rwandan troops was linked to the arms embargo against the people who committed genocide, yet the sectoral approach obliged them to treat the matter as if it were "a simple offence committed by some businessman carrying out some sort of illicit operation". He noted that the word "genocide" appeared nowhere, which contributed to further playing down the offence; nor did the International Tribunal mention it, a fact which had further weakened its role and importance. He asked how they could encourage the refugees to return when "their self-proclaimed leaders" were in the process of rearming themselves and were receiving "various kinds of support from member countries of this Organization". He urged the Council to consider the question holistically, which would then make it clear that the Commission had more importance than the draft resolution attributed to it. He denied the information in the Secretary-General's report suggesting that negotiations with respect to establishing a small political office had become difficult. In fact, he was pleased to inform the Council that the Under-Secretary-General for Political Affairs had arrived in Kigali and that the outstanding questions had been resolved that morning. He reminded the Council that it was customary for the Government of Rwanda to be consulted in every matter of interest to the country. On the subject of the request of the Secretary-General that Rwanda be given non-military materiel from the departing Mission to speed up the reconstruction, he informed the Council that the equipment, inaccurately valued at $15.3 million, was of such a nature, and in such a state of disrepair that the Government could not receive it. He stated that they could only conclude that there had been a deliberate desire not to give the proper equipment to Rwanda to help it reconstruct the country and to keep the Government in a difficult situation. He expressed his hope that the new political office would be able to do what the United Nations had so far been unable to do to help Rwanda.²³

The representative of Burundi stated that the violations of the arms embargo had had serious consequences and that the report of the Commission of Inquiry confirmed that there were people, still embracing genocide, who were preparing to attack Rwanda. He maintained that a major indicator of the danger posed by the former forces of the Rwandan army and the militias was their alliance with factions in Burundi. A large number of these soldiers had infiltrated Burundi and were preying on the most vulnerable sectors of society. He noted that certain Governments and foreign circles were demanding that his Government negotiate with those responsible for those atrocities, and some were even making their assistance contingent on that. He praised France's realistic position and the "official and vigorous" condemnation by the United States of the recent atrocities and contrasted them with the "European Union's inclination to deprive both Rwanda and Burundi of foreign aid" at the time when they needed it most. He maintained that the Charter of the United Nations and the Charter of the Organization of African Unity as well as resolutions 918 (1994), 997 (1995) and 1011 (1995) enjoined all countries of asylum and all States and companies providing weapons to abide strictly by the letter and the spirit of the arms embargo, as did the commitments entered into by the Heads of State of the Great Lakes region at the Cairo and Tunis summits. In that regard, he welcomed the recently adopted policy of Tanzania. He maintained that the primary raison d'être of the Economic Community of the Great Lakes Countries, Rwanda, Burundi and Zaire, was to prohibit acts of subversion in any of the Member countries against any of the others and Burundi would automatically stand in solidarity with the legal Government of Zaire to disarm and neutralize the groups opposing it in the eastern region. In conclusion he underlined that the proliferation of weapons, war materiel and armed terrorist groups could lead to widespread insecurity and instability. He called on the Economic Community of the Great Lakes Countries to convene a special summit dedicated to urgently finding solutions.²⁴

The representative of Zaire stated that the interim and final reports drafted by the Commission of Inquiry could not be considered separately from each other and that he would recall facts he considered essential from both. The Commission noted that new weapons had been found on Iwawa Island in Rwanda, but had no information as to where those weapons had come from. People interrogated by the Commission informed them that they were Rwandans and had been trained in weapons at the Mugunga camp in Zaire under the supervision of former Rwandan government forces and that no foreigners were involved. This was cited in paragraphs 18, 19, and 20 of the interim report. He wondered how his Government could be implicated in an affair that was occurring entirely on the territory of another State with actors who were nationals of that country. He maintained that his Government had been subjected to discriminatory treatment partially due to their refusal to provide suitable housing to the Commission, despite their having the resources to arrange it on its own. He also informed the Council that the report, in paragraph 35, had stated that Zaire seemed to wish to renegotiate the mandate of the Commission and be present at talks with potential witnesses, which was untrue. In fact, his Government had only suggested that the Commission refrain from making any press conferences, that it reserve its conclusions for the Secretary-General and the Security Council and that it reside in Zaire while working in north and south Kivu. Despite those requests, the Commission had held multiple press conferences and had demanded to stay in Rwanda. During the Commission's inspection missions in Rwanda, it was aided by officers of the Rwandese

Patriotic Army (RPA) but this favourable treatment was refused Zaire. These examples were representative of the discriminatory treatment of Zaire by the Commission. He noted that most of the final report dealt with a single case, an arms purchase in Seychelles, while it was content with a single letter denying violation of the embargo from other countries that actually produced weapons. He went on to mention several inaccuracies, inconsistencies and omissions in the report that called its validity into question. He commented that the draft resolution also contained inaccuracies and inconsistencies, specifically mentioning paragraphs 10 and 11, and calling attention to his Government's alternative draft of paragraph 12.²⁵ He denied the claims that 8,000 Zairian refugees had entered Rwanda, stating that these were in fact Rwandan refugees from 1927 and 1959 who had decided to return to their native land. He maintained that the arms traffic in the region was being exaggerated and noted that the worst of the killing in Rwanda was done by machete, not by modern weapons. In conclusion he noted that operative paragraphs 9 and 10 of the draft resolution and operative paragraph 1 (c) of resolution 1013 (1995) called upon States whose nations had been implicated to carry out their own reports and make them available. Since the embargo had been decreed under Chapter VII of the Charter, banking institutions could not hide behind a "screen of financial secrecy" and he called on those countries to help identify and bring down all the people involved. He called on the Council to provide answers to the many questions his Government had asked in its letter of 3 April 1996²⁶ and stated that while they were eagerly awaiting the return of the Commission of Inquiry, which would enjoy the open cooperation of the Government, he hoped that it would leave its prejudices behind.²⁷

The representative of the Russian Federation expressed his belief that the tasks of restoring peace, security and stability to that country and to the region as a whole could be achieved only through a well-thought-out and comprehensive approach. An integral part of that needed to be the establishment of an impregnable barrier against the illegal dissemination of weapons, the continuing inflow of which was undermining mutual trust and preventing national reconciliation, and was also capable of provoking a new spiral of bloody violence with all its devastating implications for the people of the region. They supported the work of the International Commission of Inquiry and would vote in favour of the draft resolution. He underlined that it was particularly important to take specific steps to ensure the effective implementation of the embargo on arms supplies to illegal militia forces, as well as to appeal to all countries of the region not to allow their territories to be used as bases for launching attacks on any other State. He expressed their belief that it was extremely important that the measures proposed should be implemented in coordination with countries neighbouring Rwanda. They regarded that as a means of guaranteeing the efforts of the international community to resolve that complicated problem, which could also become an important precondition for stabilizing the situation in the region, in particular by implementing the provisions of the Tunis Declaration of Heads of State of the Great Lakes Region of 18 March 1996.²⁸

The representative of the United Kingdom stated his support for the draft resolution. He noted that the Commission of Inquiry had done a very professional job but that it had not always met with the cooperation that it needed. He expressed his belief that the draft resolution would ensure that the Commission could remain in being, though in reduced strength, to complete its earlier investigations and to pursue any further allegations of violations, which he believed would be possible within existing resources. The resolution would also send a signal that the Council expected fuller cooperation with the Commission, in particular from Zaire and that it wished to see other mechanisms put in place in the region to ensure that the arms embargo was fully effective. He underlined the great importance his country paid to the implementation of resolution 1050 (1996), the establishment of a United Nations political office in Rwanda, the retention of a United Nations radio station there, the fullest support for former President Nyerere's efforts to further political dialogue in Burundi and for holding a regional conference to address the wider problems of the region.²⁹

The representative of Guinea-Bissau stated their support for the resolution and reiterated the importance of resolutions 918 (1994), 997 (1995) and 1011 (1995), which imposed an embargo on the sale or delivery of weapons and related material to Rwanda, under Chapter VII of the Charter, in putting an end to the conflict. He expressed his concern over the statement of the Commission that certain Rwandan elements were receiving military training for the purpose of conducting destabilizing incursions into Rwanda. He expressed his concern over the radio broadcasts that were disseminating hatred and fear and appealed to all States to cooperate in order to halt those broadcasts without delay, in keeping with the relevant resolutions of the Council and the Declaration of Heads of State of the Great Lakes region, adopted on 29 November 1995.³⁰

The representative of Botswana underlined the importance of the arms embargo, imposed by the Council in resolutions 918 (1994), 997 (1995) and 1011 (1995), being effectively implemented. He expressed their appreciation for the work of the Commission and recognized the efforts of non-governmental organizations, including Human Rights Watch and Amnesty International. He called upon all the States in the region to provide support and cooperation to the Commission, in accordance with operative paragraphs 8, 9 and 10 of the draft resolution. He stated that it would be an important step if the States neighbouring Rwanda would agree to the deployment of United Nations observers, in line with operative paragraph 7 of the draft resolution.³¹

The representative of Egypt stated their appreciation for the work of the International Commission, commended those Governments that had cooperated in a positive fashion with International Commission of Inquiry and appealed to all other parties to lend even greater support and cooperation so that the Commission could fulfil its mandate. He appealed to all States to ensure the effective implementation of the arms embargo on shipments to non-Government forces in Rwanda, as provided for in resolution 1011 (1995). He expressed his hope that no State in the Great Lakes region would allow any group to use its territory as a staging ground for attacks against any neighbouring State, in violation of international treaties and the Charter. He noted that in operative paragraph 7 of the draft resolution before the Council, the Council had requested the Secretary-General of the United Nations to consult with States neighbouring Rwanda on measures for the purpose of better implementation of the embargo. While fully supporting that request, he expressed his confidence that in the context of any accord to be discussed to deploy United Nations observers at airports and border checkpoints, there would be full compliance with the principle of national sovereignty of all States, and that securing the consent of the Government concerned would be a sine qua non condition for dispatching observers.³²

The representative of China stated that they believed that the illegal flow of arms to the Great Lakes region constituted a potential threat to peace and stability in the region and that it would impede the cause of reconstruction and development in the countries concerned, particularly Rwanda. They therefore favoured the adoption by the Council of appropriate measures to reduce or even stem the illegal flow of arms into the region and to work to increase mutual confidence between the countries of the Great Lakes region. They believed that in adopting actions in that area the Council should heed and respect the views of the country concerned and of the other countries concerned in the region. He also noted that those measures had already received wide support among African countries, including Rwanda.³³

Several other speakers spoke, stating their support for the draft resolution, underlining the need to address the illegal flow of arms to the region and the question of refugees; expressing concern over reports that elements were receiving training for destabilizing incursions into Rwanda; supporting the convening of an international conference; and maintaining the importance of cooperation of all interested countries in the region and of sufficient funding for the Commission and other initiatives.³⁴

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1053 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous resolutions on the situation in Rwanda, in particular resolutions 918 (1994) of 17 May 1994, 997 (1995) of 9 June 1995, 1011 (1995) of 16 August 1995 and 1013 (1995) of 7 September 1995,

Having considered the letter dated 13 March 1996 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council and the report of the International Commission of Inquiry established by resolution 1013 (1995), annexed to that letter, as well as the interim report of the Commission of 17 January 1996,

Expressing its support for the Tunis Declaration of Heads of State of the Great Lakes Region of 18 March 1996,

Expressing once again its grave concern at allegations of the sale and supply of arms and related matériel to former Rwandan government forces in violation of the embargo imposed under its resolutions 918 (1994), 997 (1995) and 1011 (1995), and underlining the need for Governments to take action to ensure the effective implementation of the embargo,

Commending the members of the Commission for the excellent investigation they have conducted,

Welcoming the assistance given to the Commission by some Governments,

Noting with concern the continuing lack of full cooperation the Commission has received from other Governments,

Gravely concerned by the finding of the Commission that certain Rwandan elements are receiving military training to conduct destabilizing raids into Rwanda,

Deeply disturbed by the strong evidence presented by the Commission leading to the conclusion that it is highly probable that a violation of the arms embargo occurred, in particular by the sale of arms which took place in Seychelles in June 1994 and the subsequent two shipments of arms from Seychelles to Goma, Zaire, destined for former Rwandan government forces,

Noting that the Commission received strong indications from its sources that aircraft are continuing to land at Goma and Bukavu with arms for former Rwandan government forces and that senior figures among those forces are still actively raising money apparently for the purpose of funding an armed struggle against Rwanda,

Noting also that the Commission has not yet been able to investigate thoroughly these allegations of continuing violations of the arms embargo,

Reaffirming the need for a long-term solution to the refugee and related problems in the Great Lakes States,

Reaffirming also the importance of terminating radio broadcasts which spread hate and fear in the region, and emphasizing the need for States to assist the countries of the region in terminating such broadcasts as stated by the Cairo Declaration adopted by the heads of State of the Great Lakes region on 29 November 1995,

1. Reaffirms the importance it attaches to the work of the International Commission of Inquiry, to the investigations it has conducted to date, and to continued effective implementation of the relevant Council resolutions;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to maintain the Commission, on the basis set out in paragraph 91 (c) of its report, to follow up its earlier investigations and to stand ready to pursue any further allegations of violations, especially of current and expected arms shipments;

³⁴ Ibid., pp. 13-14 (Indonesia); p. 16 (Italy); and pp. 16-17 (Republic of Korea).

3. Expresses its determination that the prohibition on the sale or supply of arms and related materiel to non-governmental forces for use in Rwanda should be implemented fully in accordance with resolution 1011 (1995);

4. Calls upon States in the Great Lakes region to ensure that their territory is not used as a base for armed groups to launch incursions or attacks against any other State in violation of principles of international law and the Charter of the United Nations;

5. Urges all States, in particular those in the region, to intensify their efforts to prevent military training and the sale or supply of weapons to militia groups or former Rwandan government forces and to take the steps necessary to ensure the effective implementation of the arms embargo, including by the creation of all necessary national mechanisms for implementation;

6. Encourages States of the Great Lakes region to ensure the effective implementation of the Tunis Declaration of Heads of State of the Great Lakes Region of 18 March 1996;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to consult with States neighbouring Rwanda, in particular Zaire, on appropriate measures, including the possible deployment of United Nations observers in the airfields and other transportation points in and around border crossing points, for the purpose of better implementation of the arms embargo and deterrence of the shipment of arms to former Rwandan government forces in violation of Council resolutions;

8. Expresses concern at the lack of response by certain States to the Commission's inquiries, and calls upon those States that have not yet done so to cooperate fully with the Commission in its inquiries and to investigate fully reports of their officials and nationals suspected of violating the relevant Council resolutions;

9. Calls upon States, in particular those whose nationals have been implicated by the report of the Commission, to investigate the apparent complicity of their officials or private citizens in the purchase of arms from Seychelles in June 1994, and in other suspected violations of the relevant Council resolutions;

10. Also calls upon States to make available to the Commission the results of their investigations, and to cooperate fully with the Commission, including by providing to the Commission at any time any access they request to airfields and to witnesses, in private and without the presence of officials or representatives of any Government;

11. Encourages States to make voluntary contributions to the United Nations Trust Fund for Rwanda, established by the Secretary-General, to support the work of the Commission, and to contribute equipment and services to the Commission, through the Secretary-General;

12. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Council by 1 October 1996 a report on the implementation of the present resolution;

13. Reiterates its concern that the uncontrolled illegal flows of arms and related matériel in violation of Council resolutions would pose a threat to peace and stability in the Great Lakes region, and declares its willingness to consider further measures in this regard;

14. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Following the vote, the representative from France stated that the resolution would make it possible for the International Commission to shed light on the rumoured arms traffic that was poisoning the political climate in the Great Lakes region. The report of the Commission had emphasized the existence of recent arms trafficking in violation of resolution 918 (1994) and 1011 (1995), a revelation which was a great cause for worry. He stated that the very existence of the Commission had a deterrent effect on illicit trafficking and he hoped that resolution 1053 would prolong the effect. He noted that the idea of creating an International Commission of Inquiry had been in an amendment submitted by France to resolution 1011 (1995) and that they had supported establishing the Commission in resolution 1013 (1995). They had invited the Council to Paris and that the report established the "total absence of substance in the allegations" against France. He called on all countries in the region to cooperate fully with the Commission.³⁵

The representative of Germany stated the importance of the Commission in working to stop the flow of arms to the area and strongly encouraged the countries mentioned in the report to do their utmost to investigate the sources of their nationals who might have been involved in purchasing and supplying arms to the region. He also underlined the importance of the intensification of efforts by the countries in the region to prevent any military activities by members of the former Rwandan regime. He agreed with the Secretary-General that the Commission should be provided with sufficient funds to carry out its mission and expressed his hope that the Tunis Declaration would be implemented.³⁶

The representative of Honduras stated that the report of the Commission had confirmed reports of the sale of embargoed material to former Rwandan government forces, something which threatened the peace and stability of the entire region. Considering this, he called on the Council to strengthen the mandate of the Commission so that it could carry out a thorough investigation of all reports, past and present, on the sale and provision of arms to elements of the former Rwandan government forces. It also needed the effective cooperation of the entire international community, particularly those that were implicated in the alleged violations. He also stated the necessity of all parties to observe the commitments undertaken in the Tunis Declaration of 18 March. He had voted in favour of the resolution bearing in mind the imperative need for all States to effectively implement the embargo and to observe the principles of international law and of the United Nations Charter, while avoiding at all times the use of their territories by armed groups to launch attacks against another State.³⁷

The representative of the United States praised the work of the Commission despite the inadequate cooperation from several key Governments. He expressed his shock at the evidence of violations of the embargo on arms sales to members of the former Rwandan forces in June 1994, when the genocide was ongoing. He called for the thorough investigation of continuing violations and for all Governments to cooperate fully with the Commission's investigations. He noted that the terms of the mandate were clear and robust: the Commission had the authority to interview witnesses in private, without representatives of any Government; it was free to choose its own interpreters; United Nations members were obligated to assist the Commission and to provide the security and access it had requested. He underlined that the embargo on arms to former Rwandan armed forces had been imposed under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, and that such sales were a threats to international peace and security. The armed insurgency needed to be stopped and the leaders of the ex-Rwandan armed forces who committed genocide needed to be prosecuted by the International Tribunal for Rwanda. He maintained that the embargo on arms sales to ex-Rwandan armed forces would be enforced, and the evidence the Commission would uncover would be used by Member States to investigate, arrest and prosecute the arms traffickers.³⁸

Decision of 9 April 1998 (3870th meeting):

At the 3870th meeting of the Security Council, held on 9 April 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Japan), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Belgium and Germany, at their request, to participate in the discussion, without the right to vote.³⁹ The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁴⁰

At the same meeting the representative of the United Kingdom spoke on behalf of the European Union, and the associated and aligned countries.⁴¹ He expressed his great concern at the recurrent violence in Rwanda which was contributing to the persistent instability in the Great Lakes region as a whole and unequivocally condemned the continued armed insurgency and acts of brutality against vulnerable groups by elements with a genocidal motive. He welcomed the action of the Security Council to reactivate the International Commission of Inquiry on illegal arms flows to Rwanda, and informed the Council that the European Union had affirmed its support and full cooperation for the work of the Commission as an important means to help bring an end to the continuing destabilizing conflict. The European Union was committed to working together with the Government of Rwanda to secure an end to conflict and recovery from genocide, promote national reconciliation and the democratic process, protect human rights and foster economic prosperity.⁴²

The representative of Germany stated that the illegal flow of small arms and light weapons was a serious obstacle to the lasting resolution of conflict and was of particular concern to his Government. He noted that they had been active in the General Assembly on this issue, especially in the context of the General Assembly resolution, initiated by Germany, "Consolidation of peace through practical disarmament measures" and that a German expert was a member of the Commission of Inquiry from October 1995 until April 1996.⁴³

The representative of Belgium welcomed the reactivation of the International Commission and noted the destabilizing effect of arms sales to the former Rwandan Government forces and militias in the Great Lakes. He hoped that the International Commission would be able to complete its inquiry and to make specific recommendations to put an end to the illegal flow of arms.⁴⁴

The representative of the United States of America stated that the United States remained extremely concerned about the continuing violence in the Great Lakes region and the renewed threat of genocide, and noted that the fluid traffic in small arms had been a contributing factor. She noted that the final report of the Commission had been released just as fighting had begun in the Rwandan refugee camps in what was then eastern Zaire. The work of the Commission was overtaken by the dramatic events in the region and the Council had taken no action on the Commission's recommendations. At the regional summit in Kampala, the President of the United States and six heads of State from the Great Lakes region had affirmed their commitment to take concrete steps to combat the culture of ethnic violence that pervaded Rwanda and endorsed the reactivation of the International Commission of Inquiry on arms flows as a means to identify and to stop illegal arms trafficking to the former Rwandan army and militia forces. She expressed her hope that the work of the Commission and the subsequent reports by the Secretary-General would place the Commission's findings within a broader regional context and provide both an accurate assessment and specific recommendations for further action.⁴⁵

The representative of Portugal, while supporting the reactivation of the mandate of the Commission, and underlining that the fragile process of reconciliation in Rwanda required the unequivocal support of the international community, expressed his firm belief that a more comprehensive and global framework in regulating the flow of small arms would be a significant contribution to the problem. He welcomed the proposals of the President of Mali and the work of the Oslo Conference, convened by the Norwegian Initiative on Small Arms Transfers and the United Nations Development Programme. He stated that his Government considered that the reactivation of the International Commission also constituted an important signal of the interest and concern on the part of the United Nations towards the region and that it was also designed to impress on those forces intent on undermining peace in the region that their actions would not be tolerated.⁴⁶

The representative of Japan stated that the illegal flow of arms, in violation of the embargo imposed by the Council in resolution 918 (1994), 997 (1995) and 1011 (1995) appeared to be increasing. If this flow of arms into the hands of former government forces, militias and other groups were to be left unchecked there was a real danger of a resurgence of armed conflict and a serious destabilization of the entire Great Lakes region. As Chairman of the Sanctions Committee under Security Council resolution 918 (1994) on Rwanda, he welcomed the decision to reactivate the Commission of Inquiry and stated that the information it gathered would help the Council to determine what concrete measures to take to stem the illegal flow of arms in the region. At the same time, his delegation found it judicious that the draft resolution took a carefully balanced approach, allowing the Commission to present to the Council its recommendations on measures related to the illegal flow of arms without actually expanding the Commission's mandate itself. He also stated Japan's belief that the international community should seriously consider the overall question of how to address the illegal flow of arms, which due to the complex and sensitive nature of the issue might need to be approached within the context of their efforts to build a comprehensive framework for preventive strategy.⁴⁷

In the course of the debate several other speakers stated their support for the resolution and for reactivating the Commission of Inquiry and underlined the importance of all States cooperating with the Commission and not allowing their territory to be used as a base for armed groups. Most speakers also noted their concern over the reports of persistent violence in Rwanda and other parts of the Great Lakes region and the complex dimension that had been added to the situation since the last report of the Commission and expressed their hope that any measures recommended would contribute to the stabilization of the region.⁴⁸

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1161 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous resolutions on the situation in Rwanda, in particular resolutions 918 (1994) of 17 May 1994, 997 (1995) of 9 June 1995, 1011 (1995) of 16 August 1995, 1013 (1995) of 7 September 1995 and 1053 (1996) of 23 April 1996,

Condemning the continuing violence in Rwanda, including the massacre of civilians, including refugees, at Mudende in December 1997, and similar acts of violence observed in the Great Lakes region, including in Burundi,

Expressing grave concern at reports of the sale and supply of arms and related matériel to the former Rwandan government forces and militias, in violation of the embargo imposed under its resolutions 918 (1994), 997 (1995) and 1011 (1995), and underlining the need for Governments to take action to ensure the effective implementation of the embargo,

Commending the members of the International Commission of Inquiry established by resolution 1013 (1995) on the investigation they conducted and, in particular on their final report and the addendum thereto,

Noting that widespread violence in the eastern region of the former Zaire in October 1996 caused the suspension of effective follow-up to the work of the Commission, but recognizing the need for a renewed investigation of the illegal flow of arms to Rwanda, which is fuelling violence and could lead to further acts of genocide, with specific recommendations to the Security Council for action,

Reaffirming the need for a long-term solution to the refugee and related problems in the territories of States of the Great Lakes region,

Reaffirming also the importance of countering radio broadcasts and pamphlets which spread hate and fear in the region, and emphasizing the need for States to assist countries in the region to counter such broadcasts and publications,

1. Requests the Secretary-General to reactivate the International Commission of Inquiry, with the following mandate:

(a) To collect information and investigate reports relating to the sale, supply and shipment of arms and related matériel to former Rwandan government forces and militias in the Great Lakes region of central Africa, in violation of Security Council resolutions 918 (1994), 997 (1995) and 1011 (1995);

(b) To identify parties aiding and abetting the illegal sale to or acquisition of arms by former Rwandan government forces and militias, contrary to the resolutions referred to above;

(c) To make recommendations relating to the illegal flow of arms in the Great Lakes region;

2. Calls upon all States, relevant United Nations bodies, including the Committee established pursuant to resolution 918 (1994) and, as appropriate, other organizations and interested parties, to collate information in their possession relating to the mandate of the Commission, and to make this information available to the Commission as soon as possible;

3. Calls upon the Governments of the States concerned in which the Commission will carry out its mandate to cooperate fully with the Commission in the fulfilment of its mandate, including by responding positively to requests from the Commission for security, assistance and access in pursuing investigations, as specified in paragraph 5 of resolution 1013 (1995);

4. Calls upon all States in the Great Lakes region to ensure that their territory is not used as a base for armed groups to launch incursions or attacks against any other State in violation of the Charter of the United Nations and other provisions of international law;

5. Urges all States and relevant organizations to cooperate in countering radio broadcasts and publications that incite acts of genocide, hatred and violence in the region;

6. Encourages States to make voluntary contributions to the United Nations Trust Fund for Rwanda to provide the financing for the work of the Commission and to contribute equipment and services to the Commission;

7. Recommends that the Commission resume its work as soon as possible, requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council on the reactivation of the Commission, and further requests him to submit an interim report to the Council on the initial conclusions of the Commission within three months of its reactivation, to be followed by a final report containing its recommendations three months later;

8. Reiterates its concern that the uncontrolled illegal flows of arms and related matériel in violation of its above-mentioned resolutions pose a threat to peace and stability in the Great Lakes region, and declares its willingness to consider further other measures in this regard, including the recommendations referred to in paragraph 1 (c) above, and any other related recommendations offered by the Commission;

B. International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for Such Violations Committed in the Territory of Neighbouring States

Decision of 30 April 1998 (3877th meeting): resolution 1165 (1998)

At its 3877th meeting, held on 30 April in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda without objection the item entitled “Establishment of an international tribunal for the prosecution of persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda and Rwandan citizens responsible for such violations committed in the territory of neighbouring States”.

At the same meeting the President (Japan) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Costa Rica, France, the Gambia, Kenya, Portugal, Slovenia, Sweden, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States.⁴⁹ The President also drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 15 October 1997 from the Secretary-General,⁵⁰ transmitting a letter dated 1 August 1997 from the President of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, requesting the creation of a third Trial Chamber of the Tribunal.

The representative of the United Kingdom spoke on behalf of the European Union and the associated and aligned countries.⁵¹ He stated that the International Tribunal for Rwanda had been established by the Security Council in its resolution 955 (1994) with the aim of putting an end to the impunity of persons responsible for genocide and other serious violations of humanitarian law committed in Rwanda in 1994. The European Union had cooperated closely with the Tribunal through the arrest and transfer of suspects to the Tribunal, through voluntary contributions to the Trust Fund in surplus of assessed contributions and through the provision of staff and continued strong support. He noted that in paragraph 7 of resolution 955 (1994), the Council had agreed that it would consider increasing the number of judges and Trial Chambers of the Tribunal if it became necessary. In this context, he emphasized the importance of respecting the human rights of the individual and the need to try those accused of crimes within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal without undue delay. He therefore expressed his concern with the current situation regarding the number of accused persons in pre-trial detention in the Tribunal’s prison quarters in Arusha. Considering the need for a speedy trial of these and other persons who might yet be brought to the Tribunal, he stated that it was important to create a third Trial Chamber for the International Tribunal for Rwanda, consisting of three judges, in order that the administration of justice by the Tribunal could be accelerated. However he reiterated their position that the Tribunal must be able to function efficiently and that while he was pleased to recall that the Office of Internal Oversight Services had recently reported significant improvements, many problems remained, notably in the areas of financial and administrative control, recruitment of personnel and the establishment of an effective witness-protection program. He stressed the importance of continued improvement in these areas.⁵²

The representative of China stated that the International Tribunal had done a lot of work and played a positive role in the stabilization of the situation in the Great Lakes region as well as Rwanda and that he fully understood the need for a third Tribunal to help expedite the trial of the indicted. He stated his support for the draft resolution and expressed his hope that the Tribunal would take measures to improve its efficiency. However, he maintained that his Government’s position regarding the creation of international tribunals remained unchanged and that the reference to Chapter VII of the Charter in the draft resolution was only a technical reaffirmation of the content of resolution 955 (1994) and did not constitute a precedent.⁵³

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the Tribunal was an important element in the process of national reconciliation and welcomed the request to create a third Trial Chamber to accelerate the process. He also stated that if the Tribunal was to function effectively, further measures would have to be taken to improve its procedures and methods of work and to rectify the situation with regard to the lack of administrative and technical personnel and the construction of additional facilities. Finally, he noted that while they supported the draft resolution, they believed that the reference made in it to Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations was a purely technical one and would not set a precedent for the Security Council's consideration of similar situations.⁵⁴

The representative of the United States stated that the International Tribunal for Rwanda had to carry out its mission more effectively, more efficiently and more productively, and the trials and judgments needed to be rendered in a timely manner. She informed the Council that the United Nations Office of Internal Oversight Services had made extensive recommendations for reforms of the Tribunal, some of which had been implemented. She remained deeply concerned that, despite efforts, serious problems remained. She expressed her hope that the third Trial Chamber added by the draft resolution would enable the Tribunal to render prompt justice. However, this needed to be carried out at the same time as ongoing reform efforts. She also noted that bringing to justice those responsible for crimes against humanity was equally urgent in the cases of the former Yugoslavia and Cambodia and stated that her Government was working to expand the tribunal in the former Yugoslavia and establishing one for Cambodia.⁵⁵

The representative of Japan noted the importance of the Tribunal in establishing the primacy of justice based on the principle of the rule of law. Noting his concern over reports that standard judicial procedures had not necessarily been observed in Rwanda, he maintained that the Tribunal needed to provide a model mechanism for bringing criminals to justice. The Tribunal was more than a judicial mechanism: it could show how a judicial system should function under the rule of law, assuring due process even to those accused of committing the most heinous of crimes. Peace could be preserved only if it was accompanied by justice, based on the rule of law and the respect for the human rights of all. He acknowledged that the Tribunal had not always been successful in performing in an exemplary manner and maintained that the letter from the President of the Council to the President of the Tribunal pointing to the need to facilitate the efficient functioning of the Tribunal needed to be part of the decision to authorize expansion of the Tribunal. He expressed his hope that the expansion would allow the Tribunal to meet the expectations of the international community.⁵⁶

Speaking before the vote, several other speakers maintained the importance of the International Tribunal for Rwanda in bringing peace and justice to the region; the need for a third Chamber to allow them to try suspects without undue delay; and the importance of continued efforts to improved the efficiency of its work.⁵⁷

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1165 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 955 (1994) of 8 November 1994,

Recalling its decision in that resolution to consider increasing the number of judges and Trial Chambers of the International Tribunal for Rwanda if it becomes necessary,

Remaining convinced that in the particular circumstances of Rwanda, the prosecution of persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law will contribute to the process of national reconciliation and to the restoration and maintenance of peace in Rwanda and in the region,

Stressing the need for international cooperation to strengthen the courts and judicial system of Rwanda, having regard in particular to the necessity for those courts to deal with a large number of accused awaiting trial,

Having considered the letter from the President of the International Tribunal for Rwanda, transmitted by identical letters dated 15 October 1997 from the Secretary-General to the Presidents of the Security Council and the General Assembly,

Convinced of the need to increase the number of judges and Trial Chambers, in order to enable the International Tribunal for Rwanda to try without delay the large number of accused awaiting trial,

Noting the progress being made in improving the efficient functioning of the International Tribunal for Rwanda, and convinced of the need for its organs to continue their efforts to further such progress,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides to establish a third Trial Chamber of the International Tribunal for Rwanda, and to this end decides to amend articles 10, 11 and 12 of the statute of the Tribunal, replacing those articles with the text set out in the annex to the present resolution;

2. Decides that the elections for the judges of the three Trial Chambers shall be held together, for a term of office to expire on 24 May 2003;

3. Also decides that, as an exceptional measure to enable the third Trial Chamber to begin to function at the earliest possible date and without prejudice to article 12, paragraph 5, of the statute of the International Tribunal for Rwanda, three newly elected judges, designated by the Secretary-General in consultation with the President of the Tribunal, shall commence their term of office as soon as possible following the elections;

4. Urges all States to cooperate fully with the International Tribunal for Rwanda and its organs in accordance with resolution 955 (1994), and welcomes the cooperation already extended to the Tribunal in the fulfilment of its mandate;

5. Urges the organs of the International Tribunal for Rwanda actively to continue their efforts to increase further the efficiency of the work of the Tribunal in their respective areas, and in this connection further calls upon them to consider how their procedures and methods of work can be enhanced, taking into account relevant recommendations in this regard;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to make practical arrangements for the elections mentioned in paragraph 2 above and for enhancing the effective functioning of the International Tribunal for Rwanda, including the timely provision of personnel and facilities, in particular for the third Trial Chamber and related offices of the Prosecutor, and further requests him to keep the Security Council closely informed of progress in this regard;

7. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Deliberations of 15 July 1998 (3908th meeting)

By a letter dated 8 July 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵⁸ the Secretary-General proposed extending the deadline for nominations of judges for the Trial Chambers of the International Tribunal for Rwanda until 4 August 1998.

At its 3908th meeting, held on 15 July 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Russian Federation) drew the attention of the Council to a draft of a letter, endorsing the proposed extension of the deadline for nominating Judges, from the President of the Security Council to the Secretary-General. The Security Council endorsed the proposal and agreed that the letter should be sent to the Secretary-General as drafted.⁵⁹

Deliberations of 18 August 1998 (3917th meeting)

By a letter dated 7 August 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁶⁰ the Secretary-General forwarded to the Security Council the fourteen nominations for judges of the Trial Chambers of the Tribunal which had been received from States Members of the United Nations within the period specified in paragraph 3 (b) of article 12 of that statute, as extended by the Security Council in the decision taken at its 3908th meeting. He also noted that the number of candidates was short of the minimum number of eighteen which is required by paragraph 3 (c) of article 12 of the statute.

At its 3917th meeting, held on 18 August 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft of a letter from the President of the Security Council to the Secretary-General, informing him of the decision by the Council to extend the deadline for nominations of judges of the Tribunal until 14 September 1998. The Security Council agreed that the letter should be sent to the Secretary-General as drafted.⁶¹

Mr. Lloyd George Williams (Jamaica and St. Kitts and Nevis)

Decision of 19 May 1999 (4006th meeting):

By a letter dated 17 May 1999 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the Secretary-General⁶³ requested an extension of the term of office of a non-elected judge of the Tribunal in order to allow him to dispose of two ongoing cases. In view of the very short time which was available before the judge's term of office was due to come to an end, he asked if the letter and its annex could be brought to the immediate attention of the members of the General Assembly and of the Security Council for their speedy approval in the manner that they deemed fit.

At its 4006th meeting, held on 19 May 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letter in its agenda.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁶⁴ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1241 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Taking note of the letter dated 17 May 1999 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council, to which he attached a letter to him dated 14 May 1999 from the President of the International Tribunal for Rwanda, Endorses the recommendation of the Secretary-General that Judge Aspegren, once replaced as a member of the Tribunal, finish the Rutaganda and Musema cases which he has begun before expiry of his term of office, and takes note of the intention of the Tribunal to finish these cases if possible before 31 January 2000.

6. The situation in Burundi

Decision of 5 January 1996 (3616th meeting): statement by the President

By a letter dated 29 December 1995 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹ the Secretary-General shared his deep concern about the persistence of violence and the further escalation of human rights violations. According to his report, Burundi was the scene of a smouldering civil war. The situation had continued to deteriorate since May 1995 and was characterized by daily killings, massacres, torture and arbitrary detention. The deteriorating situation was underscored by recent decisions of international organizations including the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), the World Food Programme (WFP) and most non-governmental organizations to curtail or suspend their activities following a spate of violent attacks against their personnel and assets. Furthermore, Burundi's borders with Zaire and the United Republic of Tanzania had remained closed for several days. In the existing circumstances, he felt that there was a real danger of the situation in Burundi degenerating to the point where it might explode into ethnic violence on a massive scale. He recalled the proposals he had made in his report on 11 October 1994.² He suggested the maintenance in Zaire, subject to the agreement of the Government, of a military presence capable of intervening rapidly in the event of a sudden deterioration of the situation in Burundi, a preventive measure that could help to avoid a repetition of the tragic events in Rwanda. He informed the Council that he had asked the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to travel immediately to Bujumbura as his personal envoy in order to discuss with the government authorities, at the highest level, steps that might be taken on an urgent basis to defuse the situation and enable international organizations to function effectively.

At its 3616th meeting, held on 5 January 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United Kingdom), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Burundi, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 3 January 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council from the Secretary-General pursuant to resolution 1012 (1995), providing an interim report on the work of the International Commission of Inquiry in Burundi.³

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴

The Security Council has considered the letter dated 29 December 1995 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Council on developments in Burundi. The Council shares the deep concern of the Secretary-General about the situation in Burundi, which has been characterized by daily killings, massacres, torture and arbitrary detention. It condemns in the strongest terms those persons responsible for such actions, which must cease immediately. It encourages all States to take the measures deemed necessary to prevent such persons from travelling abroad and receiving any kind of support. It reiterates its profound concern about radio stations which incite hatred and acts of genocide and encourages Member States and others concerned to cooperate in the identification and dismantling of them. The Council calls upon all concerned in Burundi to exercise maximum restraint and to refrain from all acts of violence. It reiterates that all who commit or authorize the commission of serious violations of international humanitarian law are individually responsible for such violations and should be held accountable. In this context, it stresses the importance it attaches to the work of the International Commission of Inquiry established pursuant to its resolution 1012 (1995) of 28 August 1995 and undertakes to study carefully the letter from the Secretary-General dated 3 January 1996 containing an interim report on that work.

The Council is gravely concerned at recent attacks on personnel of international humanitarian organizations, which have led to the suspension of essential assistance to refugees and displaced persons and to the temporary withdrawal of international personnel. The Council welcomes the decision of the Secretary-General to ask the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to visit Burundi to discuss with the Burundian authorities steps that might be taken to defuse the situation. It underlines the fact that the authorities in Burundi are responsible for the security of personnel of international humanitarian organizations and of the refugees and displaced persons there and calls upon the Government of Burundi to provide adequate security to food convoys and humanitarian personnel.

The Council welcomes the assumption of his functions by the new Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Burundi and calls upon all concerned to support his efforts. It commends the work of the Office of the Special Representative in seeking to promote dialogue and national reconciliation in Burundi, as well as the role played there by the Organization of African Unity. It welcomes the decision of the Organization of African Unity in Addis Ababa on 19 December 1995 to extend the mandate of its mission in Burundi for another three months and to strengthen the civilian component of the mission. The Council also welcomes the outcome of the Cairo conference of heads of State of the Great Lakes region held on 28 and 29 November 1995, supports the work of the facilitators appointed by the conference and emphasizes once again the importance it attaches to all States acting in accordance with the recommendations contained in the Cairo Declaration, as well as those adopted at the Regional Conference on Assistance to Refugees, Returnees and Displaced Persons in the Great Lakes Region, held at Bujumbura from 15 to 17 February 1995. It stresses the importance of continued attention by the international community as a whole to the situation in Burundi and encourages Member States to intensify contacts and visits.

The Council notes the proposals referred to in the letter from the Secretary-General dated 29 December 1995. It will consider these and other proposals he may submit in the light of the reports of Mrs. Ogata's mission and of his Special Representative for Burundi. It also requests the Secretary-General to consider what role United Nations personnel in the region and other support personnel might play in Burundi.

The Council reaffirms its support for the Convention on Governance of 10 September 1994, which constitutes the institutional framework for national reconciliation in Burundi and for the institutions of Government established in line with it. It calls once again upon all political parties, military forces and elements of civil society in Burundi fully to respect and implement the Convention on Governance and to give their continued support to the institutions of Government established in line with it.

The Council will remain seized of this matter.

Decision of 29 January 1996 (3623rd meeting):

By a letter dated 16 January 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵ the Secretary-General reported on the trip of his Personal Envoy to Burundi who recommended that a technical security mission to improve existing security arrangements, including United Nations guards, be deployed, and that expanded application of the Convention on the Safety of the United Nations and Associated Personnel to cover United Nations activities in Burundi and closer cooperation between the United Nations and OAU observers be considered. He noted that while these measures might defuse the security situation they would not have any impact on the fundamental problems of the country and he urged the Security Council and the international community to launch a major initiative to prevent another tragedy in the subregion, as well as to promote a dialogue embracing all the elements of the Burundian political spectrum. He stated that he had instructed his Special Representative for Burundi to explore urgently with Burundian leaders how such a dialogue might be established, possibly under United Nations auspices, and would revert to the Council on this matter as soon as possible.

At its 3623rd meeting, held on 29 January 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the above letter and the letter dated 29 December 1995 from the Secretary-General in its agenda.⁶ Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United Kingdom), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Burundi and Zaire, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁷

The President, at the same meeting, further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 18 January 1996 from the representative of Burundi, giving their response to the Secretary-General's proposal for a rapid response force and stating that not only was the plan for an inter-position force inappropriate, even the "spectre" of a military deployment in Burundi was exacerbating the crisis.⁸ They also provided their own recommendations for actions by the United Nations and the international community.

The representative of Burundi began by requesting clarification of operative paragraph 8 (a) of the draft resolution, which had caused some confusion and was open to various interpretations, and asked members to prepare their responses during his statement. He informed the Council that the security situation, while serious, had noticeably improved compared with previous months, and gave several facts supporting this conclusion. Particularly, although the entire Government had been travelling throughout the country to rally the population to the side of the Administration, none of the hundreds of political administrative and military authorities involved had been confronted by any of the armed bands. He noted that international opinion had been polarized regarding the dangers to the security of international humanitarian organizations and a technical mission was going to Burundi to evaluate the risks to United Nations personnel and facilities. However, during the 28 months that the crisis had lasted, no United Nations personnel had been a victim of a lack of security, and no office in the many buildings of the United Nations system in Burundi had been damaged. While noting that the Government had officially acknowledged the seriousness of the crisis, he maintained that it was far from having culminated in "an apocalyptic summit" and criticized the "avalanche of media fantasies" that had descended on Burundi. He maintained that a fundamental distinction needed to be made between the perpetrators of the genocide carried out in Rwanda and the followers or authors of that scourge in Burundi. In Rwanda, the Government and the Rwandan armed forces conceived, planned, organized and carried out the genocide against the Tutsi community. In Burundi, the country's army and the coalition Government, which represented national communities and 12 political parties, banded together against the terrorist groups that were determined to carry out Rwandan-style genocide. Referring to the Secretary-

General's letter's mention of a difference in opinion among Burundian officials on how to best approach the crisis, he underlined that the Government's official position was clear and they unanimously rejected military intervention in Burundi. He went on to inform the Council of the accomplishments in involving different political parties in an ongoing process and stated that he wished to show that the efforts of the Security Council, Secretary-General, OAU and other facilitators had achieved successes. To fulfil the goals stated in paragraph 2 of the draft resolution, they only needed to put these successes to good use, with good intentions. Emphasizing that the paramount role among facilitators fell on the States of the region, he stated that a certain new political approach threatened to deprive Burundi of "the statesman in the best position to make a broad contribution to settling the intra-Burundi conflict" Mr. Mobutu Sese Seko. Attempting to try to ostracize or marginalize the President of Zaire would be both unrealistic and contrary to the norms of international law, since no Government had the right to demand that all countries copy foreign democratic procedures. He maintained that one of the sine qua non conditions for ensuring the success of the United Nations was the ability to give diplomacy pride of place over military action and to devise solutions commensurate with the problems. To defuse the crisis in Burundi it was important to stress the pre-eminence of judicious diplomacy over military intervention. He concluded by stating that he would be obliged to speak on the draft resolution if the way it was interpreted appeared to penalize Burundi or undermine its national sovereignty.⁹

The representative of Zaire stated that his delegation had asked to participate in the Security Council's consideration of the draft resolution because they believed that the work the Council was doing was useful for defusing the tense situation prevailing in the Great Lakes region. The draft resolution was an important step towards applying the concept of preventative diplomacy and his Government endorsed the appeal addressed to all political factions in Burundi to apply, implement and respect in good faith the Convention on Governance, which had been freely devised and agreed to by the people of Burundi to help their country emerge from this persistent crisis. He informed the Council that his Government was at the disposal of the Secretary-General so that they could explore what measures needed to be proposed and he confirmed that they would cooperate fully in the formulation of plans. However, he maintained that Zaire was an important partner in the Great Lakes region, and they were loath to be presented with any fait accompli. Nevertheless, he stated that they would respect any measures which the Security-Council adopted pursuant to Chapter VII in the light of the report of the Secretary-General. He concluded by stating that they were in a situation in which peace could easily give way to war, and it was up to the international community to impose this peace, by force if necessary, upon those who violated it.¹⁰

The representative for Italy spoke on behalf of the European Union with Cyprus, the Czech Republic, Hungary, Lithuania, Poland and Slovakia associating themselves with the statement. He stated that the European Union remained deeply concerned by the continuing violence in Burundi and hoped that the spirit of reconciliation could be renewed in the country. The European Union would continue to support the efforts undertaken by the United Nations and regional efforts, particularly those of OAU. He emphasized that they were willing to assist in the recovery of Burundi, in particular by supporting the specific measures to promote peace and reconciliation between the various groups and maintained that only political solutions would enable a permanent end to the conflict. He reiterated their support for the idea of an increased and active international presence in Burundi that was both political and humanitarian. Moderate forces who were open to dialogue needed to be encouraged and more radical forces needed to be persuaded that dialogue was the only viable option and that the international community stood ready to adopt adequate measures to prevent the country from plunging into chaos. There was a need for a gradual approach to the deepening crisis in Burundi and the mediation and facilitation action of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, of the Organization of African Unity, and of the European Union needed to be supported with every means possible. He maintained that the draft resolution sent a strong signal that the Security Council was ready to examine and eventually impose concrete measures to contain the deterioration of the situation and prevent a further destabilization of the country. Finally, he reiterated their belief in the need to call for a conference on the Great Lakes region, under the aegis of the United Nations and OAU and informed the Council that the EU was in the process of appointing a special envoy for the Great Lakes region in order to increase its presence and contribute even more to the search for a peaceful and long-lasting solution to the many problems affecting the region.¹¹

Speaking for the second time the representative of Burundi stated that he had asked the sponsors of the text what the exact meaning of operative paragraph 8 (a) was since in their view “it might be somewhat confusing and susceptible to various interpretations”. Since the Security Council was supporting all the State institutions established by the Convention on Governance and thus the Government itself, it would be contradictory to threaten an arms embargo while that Government was making superhuman efforts to restore peace and security. However, he noted that the Security Council would be acting consistently not only by threatening but by immediately decreeing a ban on the delivery of all illegal weapons to those who disturb peace and security and all fanatical adherents of violence. However, treating the Government on an equal footing with such persons and penalizing it for its determination to neutralize outlaws “would be to turn the world on its head”. For the sake of its own credibility, he urged the Security Council to avoid adopting measures that would violate Burundi’s national sovereignty and the United Nations Charter. Therefore, he appealed to the Security Council to amend the disputed paragraph and stated that if it did not his Government would oppose it and not feel itself in any way bound by the subparagraph in question. He also observed that in the draft resolution, the Security Council remained silent on the needs, listed in their letter of 18 January 1996 for which his Government requested the assistance of the United Nations.¹² However, he welcomed the focus on reactivating the dialogue between the various political partners, which they felt was a positive approach.¹³

The President repeated that the Council was meeting in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations: consultations which had included the delegation of Burundi. He expressed his belief that at this stage the Council was fully conversant with the view on the matter expressed again by Burundi.¹⁴

Speaking before the vote the representative of Egypt stated that the draft resolution reflected the grave concern of the international community over the very fragile conditions in Burundi and that its adoption would affirm that the international community had learned the value of preventive diplomacy. He informed the Council that in that regard Egypt had hosted a conference in Cairo on ways of underpinning stability in the Great Lakes region. He stated that they would vote in favour of the draft resolution and he urged all parties to exercise restraint and refrain from any act of violence as a necessary condition for allowing a national dialogue to begin. He expressed his hope that the report submitted by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 7 of the draft resolution would contain encouraging elements showing that national dialogue had actually begun, so that the international community could continue its support for Burundi.¹⁵

The representative of Indonesia stated that the draft resolution was both timely and appropriate if Burundi was to escape the tragic and horrible fate suffered by Rwanda, and that there was an urgent need to defuse the situation. He stated their support for the appeal to all the parties and leaders in Burundi to take all necessary steps towards and earnest dialogue to resolve their differences. Nevertheless, in relation to subparagraph (a) of operative paragraph 8 concerning the imposition of travel restrictions, he maintained that it had always been their conviction that selective sanctions were not appropriate measures for resolving conflicts such as the one in Burundi. Although at that moment the behaviour of certain individuals could be construed as exacerbating tensions and conflict, the real possibility existed that they might play an important role in reaching a political solution at some future time. Thus the premature imposition of sanctions would only serve to antagonize the perpetrators even further and lead them to create obstacles to attaining peace and national reconciliation. He maintained that the Convention on Governance constituted a sound basis for promoting a political dialogue and national debate, as a means of fostering national reconciliation and that responsibility for attaining peace and national reconciliation rested with Burundi's peoples and leaders. In the light of these observations he would vote for the draft resolution.¹⁶

Also speaking before the vote, several speakers stated their support for the draft resolution, their concern for the deteriorating situation, the need for international intervention in support of a political solution by the United Nations and regional actors, and the ongoing importance of security for international humanitarian personnel, and called on all parties responsible for the deterioration of the situation to participate in a broad political dialogue.¹⁷

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1040 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling the statement by its President of 5 January 1996,

Having considered the letters from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council dated 29 December 1995 and 16 January 1996,

Deeply concerned at the continued deterioration in the situation in Burundi and at the threat this poses to the stability of the region as a whole,

Condemning in the strongest terms those responsible for the increasing violence, including against refugees and international humanitarian personnel,

Underlining the importance it attaches to the continuation of humanitarian assistance to refugees and displaced persons in Burundi,

Underlining also the responsibility of the authorities in Burundi for the security of international personnel and of refugees and displaced persons there,

Welcoming, in this context, the recent visit of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to Burundi, at the request of the Secretary-General, and plans for the establishment of a standing mechanism of consultation on security issues between the Government of Burundi, the United Nations and non-governmental organizations,

Stressing the paramount importance and imperative need for all concerned in Burundi to pursue dialogue and national reconciliation,

Stressing also the importance it attaches to the continuation and intensification of efforts by the international community to avert a further worsening of the situation in Burundi and to promote dialogue and national reconciliation there,

Noting with appreciation the ongoing efforts of the Secretary-General and his staff, the Organization of African Unity and its military observers in Burundi, the European Union, and the facilitators appointed by the Cairo conference of heads of State of the Great Lakes region held on 28 and 29 November 1995,

Reaffirming its support for the Convention on Governance of 10 September 1994, and for the institutions of Government established in line with it,

1. Demands that all concerned in Burundi exercise restraint and refrain from acts of violence;

2. Expresses its fullest support for the efforts of the Secretary-General and others, in support of the Convention on Governance, to facilitate a comprehensive political dialogue with the objective of promoting national reconciliation, democracy, security and the rule of law in Burundi;

3. Calls upon all concerned in Burundi to participate in a positive spirit and without delay in such dialogue and to support the efforts of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and others seeking to facilitate such dialogue;

4. Invites Member States and others concerned to cooperate in the identification and dismantling of radio stations which incite hatred and acts of violence in Burundi;

5. Requests the Secretary-General, in consultation as appropriate with the Organization of African Unity and with Member States concerned, to consider what further steps may be necessary to prevent the situation from deteriorating further and to develop contingency plans as appropriate;

6. Welcomes the sending by the Secretary-General of a technical security mission to Burundi to examine ways to improve existing security arrangements for United Nations personnel and premises and the protection of humanitarian operations;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council closely informed, including on the technical security mission he has sent to Burundi, and to submit to the Council by 20 February 1996 a full report on the situation, covering the progress of his efforts to facilitate a comprehensive political dialogue and the actions undertaken pursuant to paragraph 5 above, including contingency planning;

8. Declares its readiness, in the light of that report and of developments in the situation:

(a) To consider the imposition of measures under the Charter of the United Nations, including a ban on the supply of all arms and related matériel to Burundi and travel restrictions and other measures against those leaders in Burundi who continue to encourage violence;

(b) To consider what other steps may need to be taken;

9. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States stated that the Security Council had sent a clear message to all the people of Burundi that the violence had to stop. She informed the Council that the United States would not support, recognize, or provide assistance to any government that came to power by force in Burundi and would lead an effort to isolate such a regime. She called on the Government of Burundi to guarantee the safety of aid workers and stated that it was up to the Burundians to ensure that Burundi did not commit “national suicide”.¹⁸

The representative of Germany expressed his Government’s extreme concern about the situation in Burundi and stated that the first step to calm the situation was for all the political actors in Burundi to engage in a comprehensive dialogue, with no important element of the political spectrum left out. He called on all parties to refrain from all acts of violence and stated Germany’s support for the initiatives taken by the Secretary-General, OAU and the European Union and by the facilitators. He maintained that those who encouraged ethnic violence or who refused to enter into a comprehensive dialogue would have to face the sanctions of the international community and he supported the call to cooperate in the identification and dismantling of radio stations which incited hatred and acts of violence in Burundi. His Government stood ready to consider the proposals of the Secretary-General under the Charter of the United Nations.¹⁹

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the tragic situation taking shape in Burundi dictated that the international community urgently draw up a set of agreed measures to stop the further escalation of violence and to get the parties to the conflict in Burundi to resume a broad political dialogue in the interests of stability and national reconciliation and that African countries and OAU needed to play an authoritative role with support from the United Nations. The resolution sent a signal to all parties in Burundi that the international community could not stand by and watch extremist forces push the people onto a path of national suicide and warned extremists that if they continued to block dialogue and the peace process the Security Council would be obliged to enact selective, preventative enforcement measures. He urgently called on all parties to stop the conflict in Burundi and sit down at the negotiating table to speedily achieve a mutually acceptable settlement.²⁰

The representative of France stated that they encouraged dialogue and called upon all Burundians to renounce violence and cooperate with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and anyone else who could serve as a facilitator of dialogue. He stated that France would be happy if African statesmen agreed to play that role and he paid tribute to the efforts of OAU. He stated that they were awaiting with interest the conclusions of the technical mission that the Secretary-General had dispatched and expressed their gratitude to the Secretary-General for giving priority to all possible preventative diplomacy measures. He maintained that the Council's request for consideration of new steps in no way prejudged the decision it would take, nor, a fortiori, the participation of his country in a possible operation. He affirmed that if the Council expressed its readiness to consider the adoption of restrictive measures against those who would continue to resort to violence, it needed to be clear that their role was not to punish Burundi but to help them overcome the crisis. Finally he underlined that the crisis affecting Burundi was part of the greater framework of difficulties confronting the Great Lakes region and expressed his belief in the need to call for a conference on the Great Lakes region, in order to resolve the region's problems as a whole.²¹

The representative of the United Kingdom reaffirmed their support for the Government of Burundi in its efforts to sustain the principles of the Convention on Governance, which set the framework within which the parties in Burundi should work together to promote stability and the rule of law. It was their view that the international community was rightly focusing its efforts on facilitating such dialogue and on preventive action designed to prevent a further worsening of the situation. He also maintained that it was right that those in the region played an active part in addressing the problem and paid tribute to those neighbouring Governments that had offered sanctuary to persons fleeing the violence. The resolution made clear the Council's readiness to take measures against those who sought to determine Burundi's future by violence. He noted that States, particularly those bordering Burundi, could now help by preventing activity in their territory by extremist groups that sought to incite violence in Burundi, particularly in the case of the "hate" radio stations. He maintained that further steps of a preventive nature might become necessary if leaders, both in and outside the country, did not participate in or support the efforts to achieve national reconciliation and lasting stability. He fully supported the request made to the Secretary-General to consider, following consultations with OAU and concerned Member States, further preventive steps and contingency plans as appropriate and he stated that no option was ruled out in principle.²²

Decision of 5 March 1996 (3639th meeting):

At its 3693rd meeting, held on 5 March 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General submitted pursuant to resolution 1040 (1996) in its agenda.²³ Following the adoption of the agenda, the President, with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Burundi, the Congo, Nigeria, Norway, Rwanda and Tunisia, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

In his report, the Secretary-General gave a full report on Burundi and considered, in collaboration with OAU and the Member States, what steps of a preventive nature might be necessary to avoid a further deterioration of the situation. The Secretary-General observed that the situation in Burundi was desperately serious and it was his view that the collective efforts of the international community needed to be deployed to encourage dialogue among all sections of the Burundian political spectrum. However, he stated that it would not be prudent for the international community to assume the success of these efforts and not prepare and plan for contingency measures to avoid a catastrophe. He stated that the time was not yet ripe for the deployment of United Nations guards, but if the political dynamics of confrontation changed in favour of dialogue and if the Government agreed to their deployment, the dispatch of a contingent of guards could be a useful measure. He stated that it was important to note that it was some of the Burundian military and their extremist allies who were most opposed to the concept of international intervention or preventive deployment and the challenge to the international community was whether to take an initiative that was welcomed by those who wanted peace or to allow the extremist to retain a veto over international action. While underlining that preventive diplomacy was always the preferred course of action, he stated that there were some situations when it must be backed by a credible threat to use force, in order to stave off humanitarian disaster. He was convinced that an assertive approach involving contingency planning by some Member States would improve the chances of convincing the parties in Burundi to show more flexibility. Contingency planning could involve the establishment of a standby multinational force for humanitarian intervention under Chapter VII of the Charter. This force would consist of contingents, totalling up to 25,000 troops, ready for deployment on short notice, but remaining in their respective countries. He also recommended that a preventive deployment of a force headquarters and core logistics elements to neighbouring country be considered to enhance the credibility of the multinational force and to underscore the resolve of the international community not to allow another genocide.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.²⁴

The President, at the same meeting, further drew the attention of the Council to letters dated 14 and 19 February 1996, respectively, from the representative of Burundi addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁵ noting improvement in the political situation and recommending specific areas where the international community could help, and a letter dated 23 February 1996 from the representative of Zaire addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁶ transmitting their position on the situation in Burundi.

The representative of Burundi noted that in his report, the Secretary-General had strongly advocated a multinational military force dictated by a wish to protect Burundi from a Rwandan-style genocide. Those who predicted such an event believed that recurrence of genocide in Burundi was a near certainty in the light of the geographic environment Burundi shared with Rwanda and because of the ethnic, cultural and social similarities between the two countries. However, for the people of Burundi, this "mechanical fusion" of the two countries called its intentions into question and was offensive in many respects. He noted that the Rwandan genocide was spread over three decades and had ebbed and flowed depending on the country's leadership. In contrast Burundi had resisted this trend and rejected and repelled even more strongly the Rwandan model. It was therefore shocking to impute to them any intention or inclination whatsoever to model the nation's future on the past of Rwanda. He maintained that in predicting a disaster of genocidal dimensions, many forgot that the Government and the national army had formed a coalition to restore peace and security, and he listed three new phenomena that gave hope that the dynamic of peace would be irreversible. The first of these phenomena was the strengthening of governmental solidarity, the second was the "healthy rallying of the population to work towards peace" and the third was the "burgeoning alliance between the population and the army". He maintained that despite demonization of the Burundi army, it was the most powerful catalyst for democratic institutions. He also stated several reasons against even any reference to the possibility of a military mission. At a moment when the campaign of mobilization for peace was in full swing under the direction of his Government and all the political bodies of the country, nothing could be more harmful than a polarization over military options. Military solutions would expose the Government to very great risk and might seriously jeopardize the Convention on Governance, which the Security Council had repeatedly supported in pronouncements and in resolution 1040 (1996). The Government and the country would be put up for grabs and the armed bands would raise the stakes. The proposed military intervention would also flagrantly violate paragraph 7 of Article 2 of the Charter, which prohibits the United Nations from interfering with the national sovereignty of its Member States. It would also lead to the mediation missions of the Secretary-General, OAU, the European Union and the Nyerere-Carter group being blocked or even blamed. He underlined that in the event of a catastrophe, it would be up to the Government of Burundi and its army to decide when and if to ask for humanitarian assistance. He observed that the Secretary-General's report suggested that the army of Burundi was split into two camps: one under the influence of Tutsi extremists sworn to total hostility against United Nations troops, and another made of moderates who were getting ready to welcome them in. In fact, both the military and civil society were united in their opposition to a foreign military presence on Burundi's soil. In conclusion, he asked whether it was not imperative that the international community's proclivity and ability to resolve all conflicts by peaceful means prevail over the tendency to resolve conflict with weapons.²⁷

The representative of Italy spoke on behalf of the European Union and associated countries.²⁸ He stated that the European Union had expressed its full support for the efforts of the United Nations and the regional organizations, particularly OAU, and maintained that the only way to end the crisis was through a political solution. He observed that a number of developments had taken place that could greatly contribute to the search for renewed peace and stability, including a stronger cohesion within the Government and closer coordination between the United Nations, OAU and the European Union. He expressed his belief that the draft resolution contained all the needed elements to support the progress along the path of dialogue. It was also very clear in warning the parties that the international community might be forced to change its attitude if there were acts of violence and attempts at destabilization. He maintained that it was right to encourage the Secretary-General to continue consultations for further steps towards supporting a comprehensive dialogue and for a possible response, in the unfortunate event of widespread violence and a serious deterioration in the situation. Noting that both political support and the willingness of the international community to concretely assist Burundi in development programmes were important, he stated that the European Union was the largest donor in Burundi but that their willingness to provide this much-needed assistance would nevertheless depend to a great extent on the Government's continuation of its efforts at dialogue and reconciliation.²⁹

The representative of Egypt stated that the draft resolution was a true reflection of the efforts made since the Council adopted resolution 1040 (1996) of 29 January, to achieve national reconciliation and stability by putting the presidency in the hands of the forces of moderation and tolerance rather than those of the advocates of extremism and to begin a national debate that would include all parties and complement the Convention on Governance. He emphasized the responsibility of the people of Burundi for normalizing the situation in their country. He observed that there had been no improvement on the humanitarian level and no substantive progress had been made in implementing the recommendations of the Conference of Heads of State of the Great Lakes Region organized by the Carter Center, held in Cairo, on 29 November 1995. The Secretary-General had given several preventive options in his report and these options were not ruled out by the Council in resolution 1040 (1996), in which the Council had emphasized the need to begin a serious national debate that would include all political forces, including extremist ones, as the only way to solve the present crisis. He stated that Egypt supported the new approach, which combined preventive diplomacy with pre-emptive measures and brought all possible pressure to bear on all parties concerned so that they took more positive positions. He stated that OAU had played an important role in Burundi since 1993 and had sent an observer mission for dual political and military purposes and its military observers were providing protection to the officials of the international Commission of Inquiry. Even though that role was not initially welcomed by certain parties in Burundi and even though it received no political or material support from other international organizations it had become one of the major axes of development reaffirming the importance of the regional organization's support for containing crises and conflicts under Chapter VIII of the Charter. In conclusion he stated that he would vote for the draft resolution.³⁰

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the draft resolution rightly focused on preventive diplomacy to assist efforts at finding a lasting political solution and encouraged the international community to help underpin those efforts in support of continuing political progress. He called upon all parties to refrain from violence and to engage in political dialogue and stated that his Government would support that dialogue from outside and provide international assistance of a political, preventive, and material kind in support of the progress which they achieve. However the initiative and the responsibility lay with the Government of Burundi itself. He observed that there had been some encouraging signs since the adoption of resolution 1040, including a reduction in tension, attributable to the Government's pacification campaign, and the setting of a date for the national debate. The parties in Burundi needed to build on these positive developments and start the process of a genuine political dialogue in support of the Convention on Governance. He also noted that the draft resolution also envisaged more concrete forms of assistance including the possibility of a United Nations radio station to promote reconciliation and dialogue and it requested further contingency planning on other steps to support a comprehensive dialogue, which in his view might include the possibility of an international presence to underpin the political process. Since the situation in Burundi remained volatile, he maintained that his Government and the Council remained prepared to consider further measures against those who rejected political dialogue and chose to pursue violent means to achieve their aims and he stated his full support for continued contingency planning for a humanitarian response against the possibility of widespread violence and a worsening of the humanitarian situation.³¹

The representative of the United States stated that the Security Council had the opportunity to try to prevent, rather than respond to, a breach of international peace and security. The draft resolution reflected the determination of the Council to prevent in Burundi the kind of massive violations of human rights that consumed Rwanda in 1994. Her Government appreciated the work of the representatives of the Non-Aligned Movement in crafting the resolution which called on the leaders of Burundi to settle their differences and relieve their fears through dialogue and asked the Secretary-General to plan, on a contingency basis, for a rapid humanitarian response in the event of a serious deterioration in the situation. She stated that the United States would not support or assist, and would make every effort to isolate, any government that came to power by force. She stated that it was critical that the leaders of the various factions in Burundi not misunderstand the intentions and motives of the international community. She noted that the international community could provide resources, including a neutral place for dialogue, human rights monitors, economic aid and assistance in building effective political dialogue and she urged Burundi to take advantage of those resources. The contingency planning called for in the draft resolution was precisely the type of exercise envisioned when the United Nations established its standby arrangement system over the last two years and was designed to identify in advance the resources that Member States might be willing to make available on short notice to carry out an emergency humanitarian mission. She urged other Governments to cooperate with the United Nations and the United States in this effort. She stated that it was an initiative designed to bolster the confidence of moderates in the Government of Burundi and elsewhere in society and could save thousands of lives. She also urged the Secretary-General to provide additional security and investigatory personnel to the International Commission of Inquiry since Commission needed to complete its investigation into the events of the attempted coup d'état of 1993 and the subsequent ethnic violence.³²

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that they were greatly concerned by the complex situation in Burundi, which had been hovering on the brink of disaster and threatened to destabilize the region as a whole. He observed that the draft resolution gave clear priority to preventive diplomacy and emphasized the need for the immediate resumption of a comprehensive and constructive dialogue and the activation of the process of national reconciliation. He considered it important to make optimum use of the peacekeeping potential of the Organization of African Unity, other regional organizations, neighbouring countries and other interested States. He expressed his belief that preparations should be stepped up for a regional conference for peace, security and development in the Great Lakes region. He maintained that if there were any broad escalation of violence the international community would be prepared to take adequate measures for a humanitarian response, from the range of appropriate options available. In turn, the international community stood ready to render all necessary support and assistance for a political settlement.³³

The representative of China stated that his Government had been concerned about the development of the situation in Burundi and sincerely hoped that peace and stability would be restored as soon as possible. He informed the Council that they had made their own efforts in that regard and were pleased to note the common understanding and determination manifested by the highest authorities in Burundi for the solution of the Burundi question. However, the country

³¹ Ibid., pp. 8-9.

³³ Ibid., pp. 14-15.

still faced many difficulties in the political, security and humanitarian field. He stated that they had all along held the view that the internal affairs of a country needed to be settled by the people of that country themselves and that the international community could provide assistance but could not engage in interference. He stated that he would vote in favour of the draft resolution with the understanding that no matter what kind of action the Council took in the future it needed to consult with the country concerned, obtain its consent and broadly canvass the view of all parties. He urged all parties to carry out a broad-based dialogue as soon as possible.³⁴

The representative of France observed that while the situation in Burundi remained fragile and worrisome, the institutions that had emerged from the Convention on Governance had to be encouraged to pursue their work to promote peace, restore order and foster national reconciliation. That joint effort of the Burundi authorities, supported by the Council, the European Union and OAU had already made progress. He stated that the Council had to ensure that its decisions did not run counter to the efforts of the Government of Burundi. While it was normal for the Council to demonstrate its vigilance by preparing to come to the assistance of the people of Burundi if the situation required, such preparations could not lead extremists of every stripe to push the country into the abyss. Therefore the Council had to be very mindful of how those primarily concerned perceived their actions. He stated that his Government supported the Secretary-General's proposals aimed at preventative diplomacy, as was also recommended by the OAU Foreign Ministers at their meeting in Addis Ababa. It was important to support the work of the various mediators and to implement preventive measures aimed at defusing dangerous situations. He noted that the harmful role of certain radio stations had long been denounced by Burundi itself and measures had to be taken to assist in the task of dismantling them. He welcomed the decision of OAU to increase the number of its observers in the field. Finally, he maintained that the international community needed to be enabled to respond to an emergency humanitarian situation and explore possible options that would allow them to respond in the most appropriate manner to a disaster.³⁵

³⁴ Ibid., pp. 15-16.

The representative of Rwanda stated that he would approach the Burundi question within the context of the Great Lakes countries. He stated that there were several points that affected the whole region including Burundi. The first point was the institutionalization of impunity within the subregion. The result of this ongoing culture of impunity, which culminated in the Rwandan genocide, had been to encourage criminals of all stripes, who had organized, trained and armed themselves and had stirred the beginnings of a genocide in Burundi. Through the inaction and inadequacy of its response, the international community had encouraged the institutionalization of impunity in the subregion. The second problem was "laissez-faire", the typical hands-off attitude which fostered the deterioration of the situation. He observed that Rwanda had lost one eighth of its population as a result of hate propaganda spread throughout radio broadcasts, which everyone recognized as having a powerful impact. However, no adequate action had been taken to shut down the radio stations that were currently sowing hatred among the people of Burundi and the subregion. He stated that there was a similar laissez-faire with respect to arming and training criminals and infiltrating them into Burundi. The culture of impunity had allowed the perpetrators of genocide in Rwanda to forge links with extremists in Burundi and yet no one gave a thought to stopping these criminals. On the contrary, Burundian forces had been harshly criticized and domestic movements attempting to organize to avert a Rwandan-style extermination had been labelled extremist. He continued that the subregion's third problem was the lack of consultation with the countries concerned by the international community, which often devised solutions and confronted countries in the subregion with a fait accompli. An example of this was the idea of a military intervention in Burundi. He asked on whose behalf such an intervention would be carried out and against whom. He stated that if the problems of the radio station and the infiltration of criminals were solved, the people of Burundi could enjoy a respite that would enable them to come together in constructive dialogue. Such a respite was vital and could not be achieved through United Nations-style big conferences, which would not get the people in the hills of Burundi to lay down their weapons and come to an understanding, and would not stop the criminal perpetrators of genocide. The fourth element that was important for the region was the economic situation which was quickly deteriorating because of the political situation and that economic support would contribute to easing tensions. He stated that it was necessary to change the methods and approach to solving African problems in general and the problems of the Great Lakes countries in particular. First, the Great Lakes countries had to participate more actively in the search for solution to their problems. He stated that he wanted to draw the attention of the international community to organizations that took advantage of the poverty of the subregion to create programmes and projects that only benefited their organizers without much impact on the recipients. Programmes needed to be redesigned to become holistic in their conception and in the sense that they needed to cover areas affected by the presence of refugees. He concluded by calling again for greater participation by the Great Lakes countries in decisions affecting their fate and for greater involvement by national, subregional and regional organizations in finding solutions for this part of Africa.³⁶

The representative of the Congo stated that helping the people of Burundi to overcome their existing difficulties was the principal concern of the representatives of the States of their subregion when they met a few months ago in Brazzaville within the framework of the United Nations Standing Advisory Committee on Security Questions in Central Africa, under the chairmanship of the Congo. In the statement, the Brazzaville declaration, the States members of the Committee expressed their deep concern at the ongoing tensions and violence in the central African subregion. The resulting insecurity was undermining the development efforts of the Governments and peoples of the subregion, despite their wealth of resources. He stated that the maintenance of peace and security in the subregion rested with the people and Governments of the countries concerned. Therefore the Convention on Governance remained an essential element in laying the foundations of an effective national reconciliation. However any lasting solution would need close cooperation between the international community, OAU, subregional institutions and the countries concerned.³⁷

Several other speakers stated their support for the draft resolution; noted positive developments in Burundi but recognized the fragility of the situation; emphasized the need for all parties to participate in a political dialogue; praised regional efforts by OAU, former President Nyerere and others; called for international support for the peace process, reform and development projects; emphasized the need for preventive diplomacy; and stated their support for consideration of a contingency plan for a rapid humanitarian response in the event that the situation rapidly deteriorated.³⁸ Some speakers also spoke in support of the need to call for a conference on the Great Lakes region, under the auspices of the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity.³⁹

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1049 (1996), which reads:

Speaking after the vote, the representative of Burundi expressed his gratitude for the resolution in support of the process of the search for peace. He stated that some operative paragraphs deserved more praise than others, particularly paragraph 6, which dealt with the establishment of a United Nations radio station. He stated that this would have an extraordinarily beneficial impact on public opinion and on society. He stated that a resolution of this type was far more realistic than other options, which might have jeopardized all the efforts made in this process towards peace.⁴⁰

Decision of 25 April 1996 (3659th meeting):
statement by the President

By a letter dated 12 April 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴¹ the Secretary-General informed the Council that the security situation in Burundi had taken another turn for the worse during March, with a sharp increase in the number of attacks by Hutu rebels and heavy fighting spreading to areas in the south previously untouched by the conflicts. On the political front, some serious differences had appeared between the President and the Prime Minister, particularly on the issue of negotiations with the armed opposition. The President had publicly favoured negotiations on condition that the rebels give up violence, while the Prime Minister had expressed opposition to any negotiation with certain groups and had invited the Tutsi community to arm itself. He had also disclaimed Burundi's need for foreign aid in response to comments from the European Union and the United States Agency for International Development (USAID) that economic assistance would not be forthcoming as long as the political and security situations remained unstable. While his Special Representative in Burundi had continued to appeal to all concerned for an immediate end to the violence and for a constructive dialogue, the Secretary-General expressed his fear that there was a real danger of the situation in Burundi degenerating to the point where it might erupt into a genocidal conflict.

At its 3659th meeting, held on 25 April 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Chile), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Burundi, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴²

The Security Council has taken note of the letter dated 12 April 1996 from the Secretary-General to the President on the present situation in Burundi, in response to the request to the Secretary-General in resolution 1049 (1996) to keep the Council informed on the situation.

The Council is deeply concerned at the recent degeneration of security conditions and political cooperation in Burundi. The Council condemns all acts of violence. The Council is equally concerned at reported statements calling for the arming of civilians, which could lead to grave consequences. The dramatic increase in violence throughout the country already severely inhibits humanitarian aid and could have a negative effect on the capacity of the donor to implement development assistance in support of the search by the people of Burundi for reconciliation and rehabilitation.

The Council urges the authorities and all parties in Burundi to set aside their differences and demonstrate the necessary cohesion, unity and political will for settlement of the conflict by peaceful means. The Council calls upon all Burundians to renounce the use of violence and to engage in a comprehensive dialogue to ensure a peaceful future for the people of Burundi.

The Council is deeply concerned at the widespread purchase and use of weapons by Burundians, in particular the laying of landmines.

The Council looks forward to the recommendations of the Secretary-General in the report it requested by 1 May 1996 on the progress towards commencement of the National Debate and other initiatives for comprehensive political dialogue and national reconciliation. The Council extends its full support for and confidence in the efforts of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and those of former President Nyerere and other envoys to facilitate negotiations to resolve the present crisis.

The Council requests the Secretary-General, in accordance with paragraph 13 of resolution 1049 (1996), to expedite consultations with Member States concerned and the Organization of African Unity, as appropriate, on contingency planning both for the steps that might be taken to support a comprehensive dialogue and for a rapid humanitarian response in the event of widespread violence or serious deterioration in the humanitarian situation in Burundi.

The Council underlines its commitment to follow events in Burundi closely and resolves to consider further all relevant options for an appropriate response by the international community upon receipt of the impending report of the Secretary-General.

Decision of 15 May 1996 (3664th meeting): statement by the President

At the 3664th meeting of the Security Council, held on 15 May 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General on the situation in Burundi pursuant to Security Council resolution 1049 (1996), by which the Secretary-General had been requested to report on efforts to facilitate a comprehensive political dialogue, intensify preparations for a regional conference for peace, security and development in the Great Lakes region and to report on the possibility of establishing a United Nations radio station in Burundi.⁴³

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that although the United Nations and the OAU observer mission had limited capacity to observe what was happening on the ground, there had been a marked deterioration in the security system in Burundi and persistent reports indicating a downward spiral of violence. Extremist Hutu rebels, apparently infiltrating from Zaire, were undertaking attacks against both government and civilian targets and the armed forces were sometimes exacting reprisals against Hutu civilians in the area where attacks had taken place. He maintained that this vicious circle could be broken only if the moderates on both sides worked together to create a genuine and effective coalition Government. With reference to the establishment of a United Nations radio station, the mission had concluded that while feasible in a technical sense, the difficulties and political risks of doing Kirundi-language broadcasts made it unfeasible in the current political climate. It recommended that instead the Office of the Special Representative be strengthened through the addition of specialists in public information who would be responsible for developing co-productions with existing radio operations serving Burundi and for liaison with public information personnel of United Nations and other agencies. In the light of the disturbing circumstances, he maintained that there was a necessity for the international community to proceed with contingency planning for a possible military intervention to save lives if disaster struck and led to large scale killing of civilians. Although the objectives were exclusively humanitarian, it was sensible to do preliminary planning for a situation where the deployment of a multinational force under Chapter VII of the Charter was necessary. He informed the Council that he had undertaken wide-ranging and intensive consultations pursuant to paragraph 13 of resolution 1049 (1996) and had approached, amongst others, the permanent members of the Security Council, major troop-contributing countries and interested States from both the region and other parts of the world. No states had yet volunteered to take the lead in an operation, and since there remained a need for further consultations, he had decided to use his good offices to facilitate consultations among the Member States concerned. However, at the urging of several States, plans for a possible peace-keeping mission under Chapter VI of the Charter to be deployed in the event of a political agreement were already under way.

At the same meeting, the President also drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 8 May 1996 from the representative of Burundi,⁴⁴ transmitting a press release from the Minister for Foreign Affairs and Cooperation of the Republic of Burundi announcing various terrorist acts by rebel groups and denying the accusations that had been made against the Burundian army.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴⁵

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 3 May 1996 on the situation in Burundi, submitted pursuant to resolution 1049 (1996).

The Council is gravely concerned at the continued deterioration of the security situation in Burundi, in particular at reports of a downward spiral of violence which has resulted in further large-scale killings in Buhoro and Kivyuka, and at the increasing flow of refugees from Burundi. The Council is deeply concerned that relief organizations have been prevented from delivering vital humanitarian and development assistance in Burundi, and at the suffering which this imposes on the people of Burundi. It calls upon the parties and all concerned to refrain from any action that could aggravate the problem of refugees.

The Council strongly condemns any use of violence and emphasizes its conviction that a lasting settlement of the situation in Burundi can be found only through peaceful means. The Council calls upon the parties to engage in a comprehensive political dialogue aimed at achieving national reconciliation in Burundi. The Council once again urges the authorities and all parties concerned in Burundi to set aside their differences, renounce the use of force and demonstrate a firm political will for a prompt settlement of the conflict.

The Council stresses the importance of the commencement of the National Debate provided for in the Convention on Governance, as an appropriate mechanism for a wide-ranging political dialogue in which all parties to the conflict should participate without any preconditions. The Council reaffirms its support for the convening of a regional conference for peace, security and development in the Great Lakes region and calls upon all the States concerned to render their cooperation for the convening of the conference.

The Council reiterates its full support for the ongoing efforts of former President Nyerere to facilitate negotiations and political dialogue to resolve the crisis in Burundi and looks forward to a successful outcome of the upcoming meeting in Mwanza, United Republic of Tanzania, on 22 May 1996. The Council calls upon the parties to make full use of the meeting to achieve progress towards national reconciliation. It also supports the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative to that end.

The Council emphasizes the importance of the continued cooperation of the United Nations with the Organization of African Unity, the European Union and other interested countries and organizations in coordination with former President Nyerere, aimed at achieving the objective of a comprehensive political dialogue between the parties in Burundi. In this regard, the Council expresses its support for the efforts of the Organization of African Unity and its observer mission and calls upon all States to contribute generously to the Peace Fund of the Organization of African Unity in order to enable that organization to increase the size of the mission and to extend its mandate beyond July 1996.

The Council welcomes the endorsement by the Secretary-General of the conclusions of the technical mission providing for United Nations radio broadcasts in Burundi and looks forward to being kept informed by him of progress made in the implementation of their recommendations.

The Council reiterates the importance it attaches to the contingency planning called for in paragraph 13 of resolution 1049 (1996) and notes the consultations which have already taken place. In the light of recent developments, it requests the Secretary-General and Member States concerned to continue to facilitate, as a matter of urgency, contingency planning for a rapid humanitarian response in the event of widespread violence or a serious deterioration in the humanitarian situation in Burundi. It also encourages the Secretary-General further to pursue planning for steps that might be taken to support a possible political agreement.

The Council reminds all parties of their responsibilities for restoring peace and stability in Burundi and recalls its readiness, as set out in resolution 1040 (1996), to consider the adoption of further measures should the parties fail to demonstrate the necessary political will for a peaceful solution to the crisis. The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 24 July 1996 (3682nd meeting): statement by the President

By a letter dated 22 July 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴⁶ the Secretary-General informed the Security-Council of yet another massacre of civilians. While the Burundi authorities claimed that the dead were Tutsis killed by Hutu rebels of the armed wing of the National Council for the Defence of Democracy (CNDD), CNDD had denied any role in the massacre, claiming that the victims were actually Hutus killed by soldiers of the Burundian army. The United Nations had no independent information concerning the perpetrators. Life in Bujumbura had ground to a halt after the former President Bagaza called for a two-day general strike in protest of the killings and the Arusha "security assistance" plan. He had also reportedly called for the overthrow of the Government and for the formation of a patriotic front to defend Burundi's sovereignty. It appeared that the latter reaction reflected a common sentiment among the Burundi security forces as well as CNDD. Both those conflicting groups had rejected the idea of an international peace-keeping force in Burundi and had vowed to fight it with all the means at their disposal. As a result, the International Technical Committee, which was established by the Arusha Summit, had been refused permission to visit Burundi. The Burundi National Security Council itself had been unable to take a decision on the deployment and mandate of possible troop contingents, or on alternative options to the peace plan. He stated that rumours of an impending coup d'état were widespread and demonstrations in Bujumbura had become more militant. Another matter of serious concern was the ongoing security operations to close down the Kibenzi and Ruvumu camps for Rwandan refugees. In conclusion, he stated that those reports only underlined the pressing need for the international community to take concrete and immediate action to halt the cycle of violence and to prevent another catastrophe in the Great Lakes region of Central Africa. It was for that reason that they needed to press forward with the ongoing contingency planning for a multinational force.

At its 3682nd meeting held on 24 July 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (France), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Burundi, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴⁷

The Security Council is gravely concerned at recent information on political developments in Burundi. It strongly condemns any attempt to overthrow the present legitimate Government by force or coup d'état.

The Council takes note of the letter dated 22 July 1996 from the Secretary-General to the President. The Council condemns the massacre of civilians, including that of more than three hundred women, children and elderly men in the Bugendana commune in Gitega Province. The Council calls upon all parties to the conflict in Burundi to cease immediately any acts of violence and to cooperate fully with all those who are seeking to bring an end to the vicious cycle of violence. The Council urges all parties to exercise restraint and requests the Burundi authorities to conduct a proper investigation of the massacre.

The Council once again urges the authorities and all parties concerned in Burundi to set aside their differences, renounce the use of force and demonstrate a firm political will for the prompt settlement of the conflict.

The Council deplores the recent forced repatriation of Rwandan refugees from refugee camps in Kibenzi and Ruvumu and calls upon the Government of Burundi to honour its obligations under the Convention relating to the Status of Refugees of 28 July 1951, and to desist from further refoulement of refugees. The Council is also concerned at reports of Rwandan cooperation in the forced repatriation process.

The Council supports the efforts of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and urges all parties to work with the Office of the High Commissioner to ensure that the rights of refugees are respected. The Council calls upon the international community to respond favourably to the recent appeal to fund the activities of the Office of the High Commissioner in the region.

The Council stresses its full support for the efforts of former President Nyerere, including the agreements of the Arusha Regional Summit of 25 June 1996, and welcomes the full support of the Organization of African Unity for those agreements. The Council supports also the acceptance by the Arusha Regional Summit of the request by the Government of Burundi for security assistance in order to complement and reinforce the Mwanza peace talks as well as for creating conducive security conditions for all parties to participate freely in the Mwanza process. The Council encourages all parties to work in a constructive manner with former President Nyerere. It urges the Government of Burundi to grant permission to the international technical committee, established at the Arusha Regional Summit, to enter the country in order to work out the logistics of the regional peace plan.

The Council emphasizes the importance of the continued cooperation of the United Nations with the Organization of African Unity, the European Union, the United States of America and other interested countries and organizations in coordination with former President Nyerere, aimed at achieving a comprehensive political dialogue between the parties in Burundi. In this regard, the Council expresses its support for the efforts of the Organization of African Unity and its observer mission and welcomes the extension of the mandate of the mission.

The Council reiterates the importance it attaches to the contingency planning called for in paragraph 13 of resolution 1049 (1996) and notes the consultations which have already taken place. In the light of recent developments, it requests the Secretary-General and Member States concerned to continue to facilitate contingency planning for a rapid humanitarian response in the event of widespread violence or a serious deterioration in the humanitarian situation in Burundi.

The Council reminds all Burundian parties of their responsibilities for restoring peace and stability in Burundi, underlines its commitment to follow events in Burundi closely and recalls its readiness, as set out in resolution 1040 (1996), to consider the adoption of further measures should the parties fail to demonstrate the necessary political will for a peaceful solution to the crisis. The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 29 July 1996 (3684th meeting):
statement by the President

At the 3684th meeting of the Security Council, held on 29 July 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President, with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Burundi, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴⁸

The Security Council regrets that both civilian and military leaders of Burundi did not resolve their differences through established constitutional mechanisms and condemns the actions that led to the overthrow of constitutional order in Burundi.

The Council calls upon all Burundian leaders to respect the Burundi constitution and the will of the people of the country. The Council urges the military leaders of Burundi to restore constitutional government and processes, including the continuation of the elected National Assembly and civil institutions and respect for human rights. The Council stresses that the present situation in Burundi requires utmost restraint and calls upon all concerned to refrain from any actions and statements that could provoke further escalation of the crisis.

The Council calls upon all Burundian parties and leaders to halt all violence and engage immediately in concerted efforts to achieve a lasting national settlement and reconciliation. The Council stresses their responsibility to protect the lives of all persons, including President Ntibantunganya, Prime Minister Nduwayo and members of their Government, and expects them to maintain democratic institutions and to enter into negotiations for a peaceful resolution of the crisis.

The Council reiterates its full support for regional mediation efforts, including those of former President Nyerere and the Organization of African Unity.

The Council will remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 30 August 1996 (3695th meeting):

By a letter dated 25 August 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴⁹ the representative of Burundi requested an urgent meeting of the Council to consider the economic blockade imposed by the States of the Great Lakes region and the threat of an imminent arms embargo, and urged the President of the Security Council to organize a public debate before proceeding to the drafting of the draft resolution.

At its 3692nd meeting held on 28 August 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General pursuant to Security Council resolution 1049 (1996).⁵⁰ Following the adoption of the agenda, the President, with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Australia, Belgium, Burundi, Canada, Ireland, Japan, South Africa, Uganda and the United Republic of Tanzania, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that Burundi had been caught in a cycle of attacks by armed Hutu bands against military and economic targets and of reprisals by the Burundi Army and Tutsi militias. Despite regional attempts at mediation, including a summit of Heads of State and Government in Arusha, Burundi's ethnically divided leaders failed to unite, the President and Prime Minister "resigned", the army took power and the Tutsi former Head of State Major Buyoya was declared President. The Secretary-General observed that the conflict in Burundi was exacerbated by a deeply rooted perception among its people that the survival of each community would be imperilled unless it secured the reins of power for itself. Consequently the historically dominant Tutsi minority refused to relinquish effective control, whereas the Hutu majority was determined to recover power which it won in a democratic election in 1993. Still, the conflict was not susceptible to a military solution and a political mechanism had to be found to share power between the majority and the minority in a way that would allay the fears of both. The coup d'état had not made this process easier but would reinforce the fears of one side, strengthen extremists on both and add to the suffering of the Burundian people. He stated that the prompt and forceful reaction of the countries of the region in imposing sanctions underlined their concern at the coup's implication for peace and security in the already troubled Great Lakes region. However, sanctions were not an instrument of punishment, nor could they be allowed to add to the hardship of the suffering people of Burundi. Regarding the proposed contingency force he noted that although few countries had offered troops and none had offered to lead a multinational force, he maintained that the international community had to allow for the possibility that genocide could occur in Burundi and military intervention to save lives might become an inescapable imperative. Because it would be quicker and more effective if it were planned in advance by countries with the necessary capacity, he again appealed to those countries to undertake the contingency planning which the United Nations did not have the capacity to do.

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 5 August 1996 from the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity,⁵¹ transmitting the communiqué of 5 August 1996, by the Central Organ of the OAU Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution, regarding the current situation in Burundi; a letter dated 25 July 1996 from the Secretary-General,⁵² transmitting the final report of the International Commission of Inquiry for Burundi; a letter dated 2 August 1996 from the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania,⁵³ transmitting the full text of the Joint Communiqué of the Second Arusha Regional Summit on Burundi; a letter dated 7 August 1996 from the representative of Kenya,⁵⁴ transmitting a statement issued by the Government of Kenya on 5 August 1996 on the imposition of economic sanctions against Burundi; and a letter dated 19 August 1996 from the representative of Ireland, transmitting a statement on Burundi issued by the Presidency on behalf of the European Union.⁵⁵

At the same meeting, the representative of Burundi informed the Council that after the new regime in his country had come to power, a summit held at Arusha by the countries of the Great Lakes region decreed general economic sanctions against Burundi. He stated that there were four factors against the embargo: the national imperative in favour of a change in government, the haste to use coercive measures, the clear illegality and immorality of the economic embargo and the devastating consequences for the people of Burundi. In relation to the national imperative for a change in government he stated that the former system had completely failed in its primary mission, which was to save the people from extermination. This sad reality had been evoked in a series of reports by the Secretary-General, including that of 15 August 1996.⁵⁶ He maintained that the Government before 25 July 1996 had not resulted from elections. It was merely the outcome of the Convention on Governance concluded by 12 political parties and was called upon to govern Burundi during a transitional period. The abdication of the President and the Prime Minister resulted in a headless State and the emergence of the new regime responded to a paramount national imperative to avoid genocide and provide a powerful springboard to a new democratic process. The second argument against the embargo was the haste of coercive measures. He stated that a minimum of realism and political wisdom required that the new regime be allowed to succeed or fail in its own development towards elective democracy, as had been the case in countries of the region and throughout the world. He noted that the arms embargo being contemplated by certain actors would deprive Burundi of the shield normally provided by the national army, which would place the population in the hands of armed terrorists who would not submit to any prohibition on weapons. He proposed that a more realistic and constructive solution would be to send a diplomatic mission to the States of the Great Lakes region, including Burundi, which would make it possible for the Council better understand the ins and outs of the overall problem. The third argument against the economic blockade against Burundi was its clear illegality and immorality. He maintained that this embargo was a form of intervention in Burundi's internal affairs, a type of intervention that had been prohibited since the 1970s by the United Nations. These sanctions, judging by their nature and their excessive gravity, were identical to those stipulated under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter. Under the terms of Article 39, such sanctions could only be imposed on a Member State of the Organization when such a State had been guilty of a grave threat to the peace, a breach of peace or an act of aggression. He underlined that the breaking of economic relations and the interruption of various forms of communication by virtue of Article 41 of the Charter were in no way justified in the case of his country since it had not attacked any other State or threatened the peace anywhere in the region that had saddled it with sanctions. Even if a country deserved economic sanctions under Article 41 of the Charter, their imposition required prior authorization by the Security Council, under the terms of Article 53 of the Charter. A grave attack on the peace, as specified in Article 39 of the Charter, was in evidence and it was up to the Security Council to fully exercise the responsibility assigned to it under Article 24, paragraph 1, of the Charter, for "the maintenance of international peace and security". By virtue of legal logic and under the terms of international law, the measures contained in Article 41 of the Charter should have been reversed because they were deserved instead by the countries that initiated the blockade against a State that was innocent according to the spirit and the letter of Article 39 of the Charter. He also stated that the Convention on the Law of the Sea had also been violated, since it stipulated to States the right of passage through the territorial waters of coastal States and in part X, articles 124-132, the right of landlocked States to access to and from the sea and to freedom of transit.⁵⁷

The representative of Ireland spoke on behalf of the European Union and the associated and aligned countries.⁵⁸ He stated that the European Union had closely followed the evolving situation in Burundi and he called on all sides to stop the violence and to commit themselves to, and work actively towards, a negotiated and peaceful resolution of the crisis. He maintained that it was essential for a dialogue to be organized bringing together all of Burundi's political forces without exception, including representatives of civil organizations. He underlined that political mechanisms had to be found to share power in a way that would allay the fears of both sides and gradually build up the confidence that would enable them to live in harmony. He noted that the European Union had made significant contributions at both the multilateral and bilateral levels to alleviate the plight of the people of Burundi and reaffirmed their willingness to support Burundi's recovery efforts, once the necessary national reconciliation was embarked on. Finally, he reiterated the utmost importance that the European Union attached to the prompt and satisfactory resolution of the situation of those who had sought protection in the European Union and other foreign missions in Bujumbura.⁵⁹

The representative of United Republic of Tanzania stated that most conflicts like the one in Burundi transcended borders and his country had been adversely affected by this conflict, both socially and economically, for many years. The coup had to be condemned in the strongest terms as it had reversed the democratic process and basically returned Burundi to its state prior to the 1993 elections. He stated that their greatest fear was the further deterioration of the situation into a full-fledged civil war with tragic and disastrous consequences. He stated his Government's satisfaction with and total support for all the decisions taken during the Arusha regional summit, which decided to impose economic sanctions on Burundi and appealed to the international community to support its decisions. He noted that the Bujumbura regime was floating the misguided concept that the Arusha decision, especially the imposition of sanctions, was interference in the sovereignty and internal affairs of Burundi. He stated that they were firmly of the view that these decisions were the only viable means to assist the people of Burundi to settle their differences amicably.⁶⁰

institutions of Burundi. He said Canada had been striving to encourage a peaceful, lasting solution to the disputes rampant in Central Africa's Great Lakes region. Canada fully supported the mediation and facilitation efforts undertaken by former President Nyerere and the firm stance taken by the Heads of State in Arusha. He informed the Council that as part of his country's support for the efforts of Mr. Nyerere, the Canadian Minister for International Cooperation and Minister responsible for La Francophonie chaired a meeting the previous June in Geneva involving interested contributors and the Burundian authorities to help develop the outlines of a transitional economic assistance plan for Burundi, to be implemented once peace was restored.⁶¹

The representative of Australia urged all sectors of Burundi's population to engage in constructive dialogue and all parties to the conflict to recognize that continued violence would not bring peace to Burundi. He underlined that unimpeded provision of and access to humanitarian assistance was imperative if the situation in Burundi was to be stabilized. Further human displacement would have serious ramifications for peace and security throughout the Great Lakes region and its prevention must be regarded as a priority by the international community. He maintained that if intervention by outside parties was left as the only means to prevent a slide into anarchy and genocide, then there was an obligation upon Members of the United Nations to see that the objectives of such an action were clearly defined and that the means of achieving them were sufficient and well prepared. With that in mind, the Secretary-General needed to continue with OAU to plan for the prevention of another humanitarian disaster.⁶²

The representative of Uganda stated that the leaders of the Great Lakes subregion had met on several occasions to work out an acceptable and peaceful resolution to the conflict. At these meetings, they had reiterated their opposition to resorting to unconstitutional means to resolve the problems of Burundi and warned that they would not accept any government that came to power through such means. They unequivocally condemned the "putschists" in Burundi and demanded a speedy return to constitutional governance. He noted that the Council was aware that they had imposed sanctions on Burundi as a result of the coup. Those sanctions were not meant to punish but rather to encourage the leadership in Bujumbura to urgently undertake measures aimed at restoring constitutional order in the country and at encouraging all parties to the conflict to hold unconditional negotiations within the framework of the Mwanza peace process, reinforced by the Arusha peace initiative. In this regard, the leadership in Burundi had to restore and work with the national Parliament and the various political parties. He expressed his strong condemnation of the killing of innocent and unarmed civilians. In conclusion he underlined the importance of closer cooperation and better coordination between the United Nations and the OAU, as well as countries in the region.⁶³

The representative of France noted that the Security Council had set out the principles necessary for a political settlement in Burundi: the cessation of violence, initiation of a comprehensive dialogue without exception, and support for initiatives from outside to facilitate such a dialogue. He stated that his Government would associate itself with the efforts and demands of the Council on these points. He expressed their concern for the humanitarian repercussions of the measures taken by the States in the region and maintained that it was important that international organizations and non-governmental organizations were able to continue their work on behalf of disadvantaged groups. He urged that this question be examined urgently and with the greatest possible attention, and called for a regional conference for peace, security and development in the Great Lakes region, to be convened by the United Nations with support from the OAU as soon as conditions were met.⁶⁴

The representative of the United States noted that there had been no progress towards restoration of constitutional government or the cessation of violence. He stated their support for the efforts of the States of the region and the various people and organizations involved with mediation efforts. He expressed his strong support for the economic sanctions imposed on Burundi and stated that the Security Council was willing to consider further action in support of cessation of hostilities or to compel cessation of hostilities, which could include an arms embargo or targeted sanctions against faction leaders, as the situation warranted. All sanctions needed to be carefully implemented to permit continuing humanitarian relief so that they did not injure the already suffering innocent civilians in this crisis-torn country. He observed that the Secretary-General's report noted that he was continuing to facilitate contingency planning for a rapid humanitarian response to a crisis in Burundi. He stated that his Government welcomed finalization of the emergency operations plan for Burundi. The United States had worked closely with the Secretariat in its two-track approach to military contingency planning and continued to urge that other Governments support this effort. He stated that the Security Council needed to take further actions and that he would be working with other members of the Council to produce a resolution that sent an unmistakable message to leaders of the Burundian factions: stop the killing now and initiate an immediate dialogue.⁶⁵

The representative of the United Kingdom expressed their full support for the initiatives taken at Arusha by the leaders of the States neighbouring Burundi, their principled approach towards the unconstitutional change of Government and the decision with regard to economic sanctions. However, he stated that he shared the Secretary-General's concern about the possible effect of sanctions on humanitarian supplies and personnel. He welcomed the decisions of the regional leaders to establish a regional coordinating committee in Nairobi and the assurance that humanitarian supplies would be allowed access. He maintained that there was a continuing need for the presence of human rights observers in Burundi. He noted that while Major Buyoya had made many public promises and taken some potentially positive actions with regard to control of the armed forces, it was clear that acts of oppression continued and that there was no national consensus as yet behind his proposal for an extended transitional period before a return to constitutional government. He underlined that once a lasting settlement had been achieved, they were willing to contribute to international efforts to restore Burundi's economy in support of such a settlement. He also expressed agreement with the Secretary-General that contingency planning needed to continue in case regional and international efforts were not sufficient to forestall a humanitarian catastrophe in Burundi.⁶⁶

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that they were firmly convinced that the problems of Burundi could not be resolved militarily or by coups and that it was important to ensure the restoration of constitutional forms of governance, both for reasons of principle and in order to provide the necessary conditions to revive an inter-Burundian dialogue. The task of the international community and the mediators was to promote carefully gauged and well-balanced decisions, which would, on one hand, remove the threat of another wave of bloodshed and genocide and, on the other, set the parties to the conflict in Burundi on the road to creating political machinery to provide security for all Burundians. He stated that they had always welcomed and supported the efforts of the countries in the subregion. However, it was necessary to ensure the proper observance of humanitarian standards for sanctions in order to minimize their detrimental effect on the already grievous situation of the population. Sanctions needed to have very clear-cut criteria and time-frames for their introduction and lifting and they needed to be aimed first and foremost at extremist forces both within the country and beyond its borders; those forces that opposed the cessation of violence and were hindering the negotiating process. He expressed his belief that the most effective steps would be the imposition of an arms embargo on all Burundian opposition parties, the freezing of their assets in foreign banks and the introduction of other possible restrictions affecting the personal interests of the extremist leaders, until they put an end to the violence and concluded a lasting peace agreement. He also stated that sending a Security Council mission to Burundi at the appropriate time could prove extremely useful in assessing the situation and influencing the parties to the conflict by stimulating them to make progress in the peace process. He underlined that Russia, as a permanent member of the Security Council, was aware of its responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security. Therefore, in concert with other members of the Council, it would duly participate in efforts made by the international community to normalize the situation and to prevent the spread of violence in Burundi, as well as to ensure the strict observance of generally accepted norms of human rights and humanitarian law.⁶⁷

The representative of Germany stated that he fully supported the statement made on behalf of the European Union. He reiterated the importance they attached to the prompt and satisfactory resolution of the situation of those who had sought protection in their and other foreign missions in Bujumbura. He maintained that the sanctions imposed by the regional leaders should not be seen as an instrument of punishment but as a means to an end, which should not be allowed to add to the hardship of the people. He also reiterated the importance they attached to renewed deployment of human rights observers throughout the country, which had so far been funded by the European Commission. He stated that they would continue to contribute constructively to the drafting of a Security Council resolution on Burundi. It was their hope that the discussion on the imposition of further measures by the Security Council would become obsolete as they saw progress in the development of the situation on the ground.⁶⁸

Several other speakers spoke, condemning the coup d'état; calling on the regime to restore democratic governance and on all parties to cease violence and return to negotiations; stating their support for the actions taken by the Heads of State at Arusha, including sanctions; underlining the need for humanitarian efforts; recommending that the Security Council continue with contingency planning and consider further actions as necessary, including targeted sanctions; and underlining that only an inclusive political dialogue could lead to peace.⁶⁹

The representative of Burundi underlined that the regime was fully prepared to enter into a dialogue with all those groups and factions that were claiming any rights whatsoever. He noted that the Secretary-General's report tended to concentrate on the situation that prevailed before 25 July 1996 and would have been much more useful if it had been updated so as to include mention of the massacres. However, he emphasized that the situation was not as alarming as it had been presented and described by a fair number of speakers. In that regard, he informed the Council that his Government had published a statement in which it invited the entire international community, starting with Amnesty International, to immediately begin investigations of allegations by Amnesty International and had invited the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights and the Secretary-General to increase the number of human rights observers since the Government was resolved to take all appropriate measures to end the cycle of violence as soon as possible and ensure lasting respect for human rights. He also noted that his Government had urged former President Nyerere to reactivate the talks and bring together all the groups and parties involved in the conflict.⁷⁰

At the 3695th meeting of the Security Council, held on 30 August 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President, in accordance with the decision taken by the Council at its 3692nd meeting, invited the representatives of Australia, Belgium, Burundi, Canada, Ethiopia, Ireland, Japan, South Africa, Uganda and the United Republic of Tanzania, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Botswana, Chile, Egypt, Germany, Guinea-Bissau, Honduras, Indonesia, the Republic of Korea, the United Kingdom and the United States and joined by the Russian Federation.⁷¹

At the same meeting, speaking before the vote, the representative of Chile spoke on behalf of the sponsors of the draft resolution. He stated that the draft resolution reflected the position of the Security Council, which was united in support of the goal of helping Burundi reach a comprehensive political settlement with the participation of the entire international community. It also reflected an unequivocal support to regional leaders in their efforts to overcome peacefully the crisis in Burundi. The Security Council had declared its readiness to support Burundi if its leaders set out on the path to peace, political negotiation and reconciliation through international cooperation and other initiatives. He continued that the draft resolution also indicated with unwavering resolve that if within 60 days, the leaders had not initiated the necessary negotiations to bring about a comprehensive political settlement, the Council would then consider the imposition of measures under the Charter, including an arms embargo and other measures targeted against the leaders of the regime and of the factions that continued to promote violence and to stand in the way of a peaceful solution. The draft resolution maintained that the present crisis should not exacerbate the humanitarian suffering of the population of that country and it mentioned the need to ensure that humanitarian corridors were established so that all in Burundi could have access to assistance. It unambiguously condemned the use of force and violence in Burundi, both in the overthrow of the legitimate Government and in the resort to violence by the parties to attain their political objectives. He also called on the regime to bring about a return to constitutional order and legality, to restore the National Assembly and to lift the ban on all political parties. He stated that the Council would meet again on 31 October 1996 to assess the situation and it was their hope that that meeting would serve to support the negotiations that should have by then begun in Burundi.⁷²

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1072 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming all its previous resolutions and statements by its President on the situation in Burundi,

Recalling the statement by its President of 24 July 1996, in which the Council strongly condemned any attempt to overthrow the legitimate Government of Burundi by force or coup d'état, and recalling also the statement by its President of 29 July 1996 in which the Council condemned the actions that led to the overthrow of constitutional order in Burundi,

Deeply concerned at the continued deterioration in the security and humanitarian situation in Burundi that has been characterized in the last years by killings, massacres, torture and arbitrary detention, and at the threat that this poses to the peace and security of the Great Lakes region as a whole,

Reiterating its appeal to all parties in Burundi to defuse the present crisis and to demonstrate the necessary cohesion, unity and political will to restore constitutional order and processes without delay,

Reiterating the urgent need for all parties in Burundi to commit themselves to a dialogue aimed at establishing a comprehensive political settlement and the creation of conditions conducive to national reconciliation,

Recalling that all persons who commit or authorize the commission of serious violations of international humanitarian law are individually responsible for such violations and should be held accountable, and reaffirming the need to put an end to impunity for such acts and the climate that fosters them,

⁷⁰ Ibid., pp. 32-33.

⁷² S/PV.3695, pp. 2-3.

Strongly condemning those responsible for the attacks on personnel of international humanitarian organizations, and underlining the fact that all parties in Burundi are responsible for the security of such personnel,

Emphasizing the urgent need to establish humanitarian corridors to ensure the unimpeded flow of humanitarian goods to all people in Burundi,

Taking note of the letter dated 2 August 1996 from the Permanent Representative of the United Republic of Tanzania to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General,

Taking note also of the note by the Secretary-General transmitting a letter from the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity dated 5 August 1996,

Reiterating its support for the immediate resumption of dialogue and negotiations under the auspices of the Mwanza peace process facilitated by former President Nyerere and the joint communiqué of the Second Arusha Regional Summit on Burundi of 31 July 1996 which seeks to guarantee democracy and security for all people in Burundi,

Determined to support the efforts and initiatives of the countries in the region, which were also supported by the Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution of the Organization of African Unity, aimed at returning Burundi to a democratic path and contributing to stability in the region,

Underlining the importance it attaches to the continuation of the efforts of the Organization of African Unity and its observer mission,

Welcoming the efforts made by interested Member States and by the European Union to contribute to a peaceful solution of the political crisis in Burundi,

Underlining the fact that only a comprehensive political settlement can open the way for international cooperation for the reconstruction, development and stability of Burundi, and expressing its readiness to support the convening, when appropriate, of an international conference involving the United Nations system, regional organizations, international financial institutions, donor countries and non-governmental organizations, aimed at mobilizing international support for the implementation of a comprehensive political settlement,

Recalling its resolution 1040 (1996) of 29 January 1996, in particular paragraph 8 thereof, in which the Council declared its readiness to consider the imposition of measures under the Charter of the United Nations,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General of 15 August 1996,

13. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of France welcomed the steps taken by the authors of the draft. He stated that his Government, in expressing its concerns directly to Major Buyoya, emphasized certain points: that a dialogue needed to be quickly organized that brought together all the political forces to organize an institutional and democratic consensus; that political votes of confidence needed to be given very rapidly to all the political elements in the country; that commitments to respect human rights needed to be made; and that the major State bodies and institutions had to be opened to all ethnic groups. It was also important that a conference be held under the auspices of the United Nations, and in cooperation with the Organization of African Unity, that would deal in a lasting manner with the crises in the Great Lakes region. He stated that his Government had approved of the idea that the Council reconsider the item within 60 days and consider the implementation of binding measures if negotiations with all parties had not begun. In regard to measures taken by the countries at the Arusha meeting on 31 July 1996, he reiterated his delegation's grave concern over the potential humanitarian impact, especially on the most disadvantaged sectors of the population and urged that this question be considered on an urgent basis and that international and non-governmental organizations be allowed to continue their work in favour of these sectors.⁷³

The representative of Italy stated that he had voted in favour of the resolution because in matters such as the Burundi crisis, it was essential that unanimity be shown. He drew the attention of the Council to a letter from the presidency of the European Union on Burundi⁷⁴ that expressed support for the regional leaders, OAU and former President Nyerere in their efforts and called for a dialogue to be organized bringing together all of Burundi's political forces. Noting that this was the second time in one month that the Council had expressed a clear position on the coup d'état in Burundi, he appealed to all the parties to exercise restraint and to show a constructive attitude in order to put the country back on the track of democracy, national reconciliation, economic reconstruction and development.⁷⁵

The representative of Burundi thanked the Council for its fervent attachment to saving Burundi and stated that it was incumbent on his delegation to work closely and at all levels with the members of the Council. He expressed his appreciation for the realistic position of the European Union and 14 other European countries. He stated that not only was his Government receptive to the appeals of the Council but was prepared to initiate a set of measures aimed at implementing the provisions of the resolution which were compatible with the sacred and supreme interests of Burundi as a nation and in keeping with the charter of the Organization of African Unity and the Charter of the United Nations. This was a necessary condition for the new regime to eradicate all the causes of the national tragedy. However, he stated that this task could not be accomplished quickly and that they were counting on the patience and indulgence of the Security Council. Moreover, the arbitrary economic sanctions imposed on Burundi were an enormous stumbling block in the way of the general national stabilization programme of the Government. He underlined that being geographically landlocked, diplomatically encircled and economically strangled, they found it impossible to meet fully and quickly all the conditions imposed by the resolution. He stated that the major defects in the resolution were the absence of the express condemnation of the economic blockade, and the at least temporary refusal to establish an ad hoc commission to be dispatched to the Great Lakes region to gather objective and legitimate facts. He maintained that one could not penalize the new regime and the people of Burundi for crimes perpetrated by outlaws. He stated that what emerged from this state of affairs was that the Security Council resolution might from the moment of its adoption be hamstrung because of those defects, and he emphasized that they were counting on the assistance of the Security Council to bypass or remove those stumbling-blocks.⁷⁶

Decision of 30 May 1997 (3785th meeting):
statement by the President

At the 3785th meeting of the Security Council held on 30 May 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President, with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Burundi, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 18 April 1997 from the United Republic of Tanzania,⁷⁷ transmitting a copy of the official communiqué of the Fourth Arusha Regional Summit on the Burundi Conflict.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁷⁸

The Security Council is concerned that, despite recent positive developments, there is continuing instability in Burundi. It recalls its resolution 1072 (1996) of 30 August 1996, in which, inter alia, it demanded that all sides in Burundi declare a unilateral cessation of hostilities and initiate unconditional negotiations with a view to reaching a comprehensive political settlement.

The Council reiterates its support for the efforts of the regional leaders and takes note of the joint communiqué of 16 April 1997 issued following the Fourth Arusha Regional Summit on the Burundi Conflict. In particular, the Council welcomes the decision of the regional leaders to ease sanctions in order to alleviate the suffering of the people of Burundi.

The Council welcomes the fact that talks are being held in Rome which are complementary to the Arusha process. It also welcomes the commitment of the Government of Burundi to the comprehensive political dialogue among all the parties within the framework of the Arusha process. It urges all the parties in Burundi to continue to pursue a negotiated settlement and to refrain from actions which are detrimental to such dialogue.

The Council expresses its deep concern at the involuntary resettlement of rural populations and calls upon the Government of Burundi to allow the people to return to their homes without any hindrance.

The Council expresses its support and appreciation to former President Nyerere as well as to the Special Representative of the Secretaries-General of the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity in their efforts to find a peaceful solution to the crisis in Burundi.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to continue to keep it informed on the situation in Burundi, especially with regard to the progress of a negotiated and peaceful settlement in the country.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 12 November 1999 (4068th meeting): statement by the President

At the 4067th meeting of the Security Council, held on 12 November 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President, with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Burundi, Finland, Norway and the United Republic of Tanzania, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President, with the consent of the Council, also invited the Assistant Secretary-General for Political Affairs to present his report on the situation in Burundi under rule 39 of the provisional rules of procedure.

The Assistant Secretary-General for Political Affairs stated that since the Secretariat's previous briefing of the Security Council, the basic situation regarding the peace process in and around Burundi had not changed. The process remained at a very critical stage, which gave rise to little optimism owing to political tensions, insecurity, the deterioration of the humanitarian situation and the political vacuum caused by the death of the Facilitator, former President Nyerere. He stated that he would focus on two facets: the internal situation and the situation regarding the Arusha process. The internal situation remained disturbing at all levels. At the political level, Burundi was facing a worrisome internal crisis, and the political partnership was faced with serious difficulties that threatened its very survival. This polarization of positions risked affecting the upcoming series of negotiations. The security situation remained uncertain, volatile and disturbing, with regular acts of violence in a number of provinces. The insecurity had been heightened by the departure of many Burundians for the United Republic of Tanzania, where they would join the other refugees, who were already numbered at more than 300,000. Conditions in the camps were deeply worrying. As for the process of the Arusha accords, the death of former President Nyerere had created a political vacuum and the process had ground to a halt. He informed the Council that the Government of Burundi had requested assistance from the Secretary-General and the international community in seeking mediation and had suggested a South African mediator, although this had been opposed by some parties to the conflict.⁷⁹

The representative of Burundi stated that regarding the peace process, real progress had been made, even though the time limits set by both the Government and the facilitation process had not been respected. The death of the Facilitator had slowed the momentum of the peace negotiations and the Government had addressed a letter to the Secretary-General of the United Nations asking him to contribute to finding a new Facilitator as soon as possible. He maintained that the armed factions that considered themselves to have been excluded from the Arusha negotiations and to be the real combatants on the ground had to also be involved. He noted that since the beginning of the crisis they had been drawing attention to the contribution of the neighbouring countries to the return of peace since the rebels had bases outside the country and were in collusion with genocidal Rwandan elements, militias and the former Rwandan armed forces, which had begun to move back towards Burundi in the light of the Lusaka Accords. He noted that if the international community was not careful the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo could further complicate an already tense situation in the entire subregion. Speaking about the regroupement of the population, he stated that the Government had decided to regroup the population of the region of rural Bujumbura in what were called "protection areas". However, he emphasized that the regroupement was not forced, they had responded to a real concern of the population, which was necessary to protect them and the capital. He urged the United Nations and the non-governmental organizations working in the humanitarian sphere not to become discouraged but to continue to come to the assistance of those who needed it. He informed the Council that a judicial commission had been established to investigate the circumstances of the death of the two United Nations staff members. He also informed the Council that the economic and social situation was deplorable, noting that although the regional embargo had been suspended, regional actors did not want to resume cooperation until the peace agreement had been signed. He stated that the Government had already presented a peace plan and it was a real compromise. He expressed his hope that the neighbouring countries and the rest of the international community would accompany the process towards a definitive peace.⁸⁰

The representative of the United States stated that despite the upsurge in violence, there was a sizeable constituency for peace in Burundi and they needed to use this opportunity to ensure that the peace process went forward. She noted that the counter-insurgency effort now included the regroupement of 340,000 people near the capital, which they considered to be a major human rights violation and a matter of serious humanitarian concern. She maintained that the Security Council needed to endorse the immediate resumption of the peace process. She emphasized that the Security Council had to reassert its leadership in protecting the rights of individuals, and had to provide guidance and direction for non-governmental organizations operating in Burundi. She urged the Security Council to call for the resumption of negotiations, with a Facilitator acceptable to those Burundian parties that had entered into the process; affirm the Arusha process; condemn continuing violence and appeal to warring parties to come to the negotiating table; affirm the urgent need for States of the region to do everything possible to halt all cross-border insurgent activity; call for the dismantling of regroupement camps and recognize Burundi's desperate economic situation; and call for the donor community to expand economic assistance and deliver help as soon as possible.⁸¹

The representative of France stated that the death of the Facilitator of the Arusha accords had brought about a period of uncertainty and that the increased violence on the part of armed rebel groups had heightened tensions. He maintained that despite all difficulties, the reconciliation process, both internal and external, needed to resume and to make progress. He offered several suggestions that had resulted from the recent visit to the Great Lakes of the French Minister of Cooperation and La Francophonie. First, it was essential that the reconciliation process be based on what had already been achieved within the context of the Arusha

negotiations. Second, it was essential for all the parties to participate in the negotiations with a view to finding a settlement, with halting the fighting being a priority. Finally, the resumption and continuation of the process had to be supported by the international community in concrete and material terms with international assistance for reconciliation, reconstruction and democratization. He emphasized that the Council needed to consider the linkage with the situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. The implementation of the Lusaka Agreement was necessary if the full and complete recovery of Burundi was to be achieved. It was therefore necessary for the Council to consider the connection between the implementation of the Lusaka process and the resumption of the process that began with the Arusha negotiations. He concluded that a reasonable goal for the international community was the holding of a regional conference on the Great Lakes, sponsored jointly by the United Nations and OAU.⁸²

Several speakers spoke, expressing concern over the deteriorating situation; condemning the murder of United Nations staff; calling on the Government to provide security for all humanitarian personnel and on all parties to end hostilities and return to negotiations; paying tribute to former President Nyerere; supporting the idea of an international conference on the Great Lakes region; and urging that a new Facilitator be named as soon as possible.⁸³

The President, with the concurrence of the members of the Council, suspended the meeting.⁸⁴

When the Council resumed its 4067th meeting on 12 November 1999, the representative of Finland spoke on behalf of the European Union and the associated and aligned countries.⁸⁵ He expressed their serious concern about the slow pace of progress in the peace process and deplored the deterioration in the security, humanitarian and human rights situation in Burundi and its regional implications. He reiterated their support for the internal negotiations and the Arusha peace process and encouraged all Burundi rebel movements to join. While deploring the renewed outbreak of indiscriminate violence in Burundi, he urged that the neutrality of refugee camps in the region be assured and called upon States to prevent the use of their territory to stage attacks against their neighbours. He reiterated their appeal to all parties to respect human rights and international humanitarian law, and to cooperate with humanitarian organizations. He welcomed the Secretary-General's decision to extend the United Nations political presence in Burundi and stated that the European Union remained ready to support the Secretary-General in his task of facilitating the restoration of constitutional rule and to promote peace and reconciliation and the rule of law and called on the Government of Burundi to continue its cooperation with the United Nations human rights mechanisms, particularly the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights.⁸⁶

The representative of Norway stated that he was deeply concerned by the recent increase in violence and that the international community had a special responsibility to prevent another human tragedy from happening. He strongly urged all parties concerned to join in the effort to appoint a new Facilitator. In light of the volatile situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, he maintained that it would be difficult to ensure peace in Burundi if the Lusaka Agreement was not effectively implemented.⁸⁷

The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania stated that the most fitting tribute the Council could bestow on the memory of his country's former President, Mwalimu Julius Kambarage Nyerere, would be to rededicate itself to the resolute search for a lasting solution to the conflict in Burundi. The situation there remained tense and challenging and it was incumbent upon the Council to take stock of where the efforts for a negotiated settlement in Burundi stood. He noted that there had been frequent accusations against his country that they supported and harboured armed elements operating against Burundi. He strongly rejected the allegations and reiterated that the United Republic of Tanzania had no interest in supporting armed attacks against Burundi or in harbouring, training or arming its opponents and stated that they were determined to continue to honour their international obligations relating to the hosting of refugees and, together with the rest of the region, to strive for peace in Burundi. As for the role of the Security Council, he stated that it was important for it to come out unequivocally in support of the Arusha process and to continue to encourage the parties to persist in dialogue and to remain committed to the principle of a negotiated settlement. Second, it had to maintain and urge sustained support for the facilitation process and needed to provide it with resources. He expressed his gratitude on behalf of the facilitation, to the countries and organizations that had until now extended financial and other support to the Arusha process, which had enabled many actors to take part in the talks. Finally, he stated that his Government believed that the United Nations had to make contingency preparations for the outcome of the Arusha process, since they had learned in other situations how tragic it could be if they were not prepared. Burundi would also need to be supported in the area of reconstruction, in dealing with internally displaced people and refugees, and in building the institutions that would oversee the implementation of the peace process.⁸⁸

At the 4068th meeting of the Security Council, held on 12 November 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President, with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Burundi, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁸⁹

The Security Council notes with concern the recent outbreaks of violence in Burundi and the delays in the peace process. It calls upon all the parties to put an end to this violence and pursue negotiations towards the peaceful resolution of Burundi's ongoing crisis.

The Council reiterates its support for the Arusha peace process and for the efforts to build an internal political partnership in Burundi. It notes with great sadness the death of Mwalimu Julius Nyerere, while at the same time rededicating its efforts to the cause of peace he served. The Council firmly believes that the process chaired by the late Mwalimu Nyerere offers the best hope for peace in Burundi and should be the foundation for all-party talks leading to the conclusion of a peace agreement. The States of the region, in close consultation with the United Nations, need to act quickly to appoint a new mediation team that is acceptable to the Burundian parties to the negotiations.

The Council commends those Burundian parties, including the Government, that demonstrated their commitment to continue negotiations, calls upon those parties that remain outside the process to cease hostilities and calls for their full participation in Burundi's inclusive peace process.

The Council condemns the murder of United Nations personnel in Burundi in October. It calls upon the Government to undertake and cooperate with investigations, and for the perpetrators to be brought to justice. The Council urges all parties to ensure the safe and unhindered access of humanitarian assistance to those in need in Burundi and to guarantee fully the security and freedom of movement of United Nations and humanitarian personnel. The Council recognizes the important role of the States of the region, in particular the United Republic of Tanzania, which is host to hundreds of thousands of Burundian refugees and home to the Julius Nyerere Foundation, which has provided outstanding support to the talks.

The Council calls upon States of the region to ensure the neutrality and civilian character of refugee camps and to prevent the use of their territory by armed insurgents. It also calls upon the Government of Burundi to halt the policy of forced regroupment and to allow the affected people to return to their homes, with full and unhindered humanitarian access throughout the process. It condemns the attacks by armed groups against civilians and calls for an end to these unacceptable incidents.

The Council recognizes Burundi's dire economic and social conditions and affirms the need for the donor community to expand assistance for Burundi.

7. Letters dated 20 and 23 December 1991, from France, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America

Decision of 18 April 1996 (3655th meeting): statement by the President

At its 3655th meeting, held on 18 April 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the item entitled "Letters dated 20 and 23 December 1991, from France, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America".¹ in connection with (a) the judiciary inquiry conducted on the attack on the UTA DC-10 airliner, flight 772 of 19 September 1989 (S/23306); (b) the investigation into the destruction of Pan Am flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland on 21 December 1988 and a joint declaration by the United States and the United Kingdom; and (c) the text of a tripartite declaration on terrorism issued by the Governments of France, the United Kingdom and the United States on 27 November 1991 following the investigation into the bombings of Pan Am flight 103 and UTA flight 772.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²

On 16 April 1996, a Libyan-registered aircraft flew from Tripoli, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, to Jeddah, Saudi Arabia. The Security Council considers this clear violation of Council resolution 748 (1992) of 31 March 1992 as totally unacceptable and calls upon Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to refrain from any further such violations. It recalls that arrangements have been made consistent with resolution 748 (1992) in order to fly Libyan pilgrims to perform the Hajj. The Council will review the matter should further violations occur.

The Council has requested the Committee established pursuant to resolution 748 (1992) to draw to the attention of Member States their obligations under resolution 748 (1992) in the event that Libyan-registered aircraft land in their territory.

Decision of 29 January 1997 (3734th meeting): statement by the President

At the 3734th meeting of the Security Council, held on 29 January 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Japan) drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 20 January 1997 from the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, transmitting a letter dated 17 January 1997 addressed to the President of the Council from the Secretary of the General People's Committee for Foreign Liaison and International Co-operation of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, concerning the balloonist, Steve Fossett, who flew over Libyan airspace.³ The letter stated that a Mr. Steve Fossett, who was flying around the world in a balloon, had asked to be allowed to pass through Libyan airspace. It further stated that despite the aerial embargo on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, imposed by the Security Council in response to pressure from the United States, the United States had reproached them for preventing the balloon from passing through Libyan airspace. The letter maintained that it was incomprehensible that the United States should censure the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya while the "United States was behind the aerial embargo". He therefore informed the Security Council that as long as the United States censured the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya for having prevented the balloon from passing through its airspace because of the aerial embargo imposed on it, they in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya would not only allow the balloon's passage through Libyan airspace, but would also approve passage for all aircraft through the airspace of the Jamahiriya and the landing of all aircraft at its airports. Libyan Arab Airways would also immediately resume its flights to all of the world's countries.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴

The Security Council notes with concern the letter dated 17 January 1997 from the Secretary of the General People's Committee for Foreign Liaison and International Cooperation of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya addressed to the President of the Council, announcing that Libyan Arab Airways would resume international flights out of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya immediately. The Council considers the position expressed in the letter dated 17 January 1997 to be incompatible with Council resolution 748 (1992). Resolution 748 (1992) does not prohibit overflights of Libyan territory. Paragraph 4 (a) of the resolution does, however, prohibit all international flights to and from the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. The Council would consider any such flights to be a violation of the terms of resolution 748 (1992).

The Council takes note of the reports that a Libyan-registered aircraft, in apparent violation of resolution 748 (1992), flew from Tripoli to Accra, on 21 January 1997, where it landed and later departed. The Council has requested the Committee established pursuant to resolution 748 (1992) to follow up this matter. The Council draws the attention of Member States to their obligations under resolution 748 (1992) in the event that Libyan-registered aircraft seek to land in their territory.

Decision of 4 April 1997 (3761st meeting):
statement by the President

At the 3761st meeting of the Security Council, held on 4 April 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Portugal), made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁵

On 29 March 1997, a Libyan-registered aircraft flew from Tripoli, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, to Jeddah, Saudi Arabia. The Security Council considers this clear violation of Council resolution 748 (1992) of 31 March 1992 as totally unacceptable and calls upon the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to refrain from any further such violations. It recalls that arrangements have been made consistent with resolution 748 (1992) in order to fly Libyan pilgrims to perform the Hajj. The Council will review the matter should further violations occur.

Decision of 20 May 1997 (3777th meeting):
statement by the President

At the 3777th meeting of the Security Council, held on 20 May 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Republic of Korea), made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶

The Security Council takes note with concern of reports that Libyan-registered aircraft flew from the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to Niger on 8 May 1997 and returned to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya from Nigeria on 10 May in violation of Council resolution 748 (1992). The Council has requested the Committee established pursuant to resolution 748 (1992) to follow up this matter directly with the representatives of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Niger and Nigeria. The Council calls upon all States to fulfil their obligations under resolution 748 (1992) in the event that aircraft flights originating in Libya seek to land in their territory.

The Council takes note of the letters from the Permanent Representative of Libya to the United Nations dated 16 May 1997 and the Permanent Representative of Niger to the United Nations dated 13 May 1997, and the note verbale from the Permanent Representative of Nigeria to the United Nations dated 15 May 1997. The Council recalls that in paragraph 4 of resolution 748 (1992), it decided that all States shall deny permission to any aircraft to take off from, land in or overfly their territory if it is destined to land in or has taken off from the territory of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, unless the particular flight has been approved on grounds of significant humanitarian need by the Committee established pursuant to paragraph 9 of the resolution.

Deliberations of 20 March 1998 (3864th meeting)

By a letter dated 2 March 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁷ the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya informed the Security Council of the two judgments delivered on 27 February 1998 by the International Court of Justice on the interpretation and application of the 1971 Montreal Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Civil Aviation in connection with the Lockerbie incident of 1988. The judgments confirmed that the case was legal in nature and that it was the Court, not the Security Council, that had jurisdiction in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Montreal Convention of 1971. They also vindicated the several resolutions on the matter that had been adopted by various regional and international organizations, including the League of Arab States, the Organization of African Unity, the Organization of the Islamic Conference and the Non-Aligned Movement, as well as by other States expressing the will of the international community. He then reiterated his country's request pursuant to Articles 31 and 32 of the Charter of the United Nations for a formal meeting of the Security Council to consider the case in all its aspects in the light of those two judgments of the International Court of Justice as well as in the context of the review of the sanctions that was to take place during the first week of March 1998.

By a letter dated 4 March 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁸ the representatives of Algeria, Egypt, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mauritania, Morocco, the Syrian Arab Republic and Tunisia, writing as the members of the Arab Committee of Seven in New York, requested, as a matter of urgency pursuant to Articles 31 and 32 of the Charter of the United Nations, the convening of a formal meeting of the Security Council to consider all aspects of the dispute between the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and the United States and the United Kingdom, especially in the light of the two judgments delivered by the Court on 27 February 1998.

By a letter dated 4 March 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁹ the representative of Mali informed the Council that pursuant to the decision of the International Court of Justice pronouncing its competence to deal with the dispute under reference, the Group of African States in New York had convened a meeting on 4 March 1998 to review the position of the Court, especially within the framework of the decision taken by the Council of Ministers at the OAU from 23 to 27 February 1998. At the end of the meeting the Group of African States had requested him to ask the President of the Security Council to use his good offices to have the Security Council hold a public debate on the dispute between the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and the United States and the United Kingdom, before the Security Council held its session to review sanctions. It was the wish of the Group of African States to see the sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya either suspended or lifted altogether.

At its 3864th meeting, held on 20 March 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the item "Tribute to the memory of the victims of Pan Am Flight 103 and UTA Flight 772" and observed a minute of silence. Following the minute of silence, the President (Gambia), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Algeria, Colombia, Cuba, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, Egypt, Ghana, Guinea-Bissau, India, Indonesia, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Iraq, Jordan, Kuwait, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Malaysia, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Morocco, Namibia, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Qatar, the Sudan, the Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, Uganda, the United Arab Emirates, the United Republic of Tanzania, Viet Nam, Yemen and Zimbabwe, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The Council also decided, at the requests of the representatives of Indonesia, Bahrain and Gabon, respectively, to extend invitations under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure to the Deputy Permanent Observer of the Organization of the Islamic Conference to the United Nations, the Permanent Observer of the League of Arab States and the Permanent Observer of the Organization of African Unity.¹⁰

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to the following documents: letters dated 2, 2, 4 and 17 March 1998, respectively, from the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya addressed to the President of the Security Council;¹¹ a letter dated 4 March 1998 from the representative of Zimbabwe addressed to the Secretary-General,¹² transmitting a letter of the same date from the Secretary-General of the OAU; a letter dated 5 March 1998 from the representative of Saudi Arabia addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹³ supporting the request by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya for a meeting; a letter dated 5 March 1998 from the representative of Colombia addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁴ on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement, supporting the request for a meeting; a letter dated 15 January 1998 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁵ transmitting the report submitted to him by the fact-finding mission to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya; a letter dated 5 March 1998 from the representative of Zimbabwe addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁶ transmitting a letter of the same date from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Zimbabwe and Chairman of the OAU Committee on the dispute between the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, and the United Kingdom and the United States; and a letter dated 16 March 1998 from the representatives of the United Kingdom and the United States addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁷ giving their comments on the International Court of Justice judgments, noting that the Libyan letter was highly misleading when it suggested that anything in the judgments affected the resolutions of the Security Council.

At the same meeting, the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya stated that the meeting was being held in accordance with Articles 31 and 32 of the Charter, in response to their formal request. He noted that the agenda item went back seven years, and that the original letters contained demands from the United States and the United Kingdom upon Libya. Those demands were the extradition of two Libyan citizens suspected of being involved in the incident of the destruction of Pan Am flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland, in 1988, the payment of compensation and the provision of evidence proving the guilt of the two suspects. He emphasized that strange as they were, all these demands were related to legal procedures and any dispute over them was a legal one, and the Libyan Government thus had dealt with them on that basis. The representative stated that a new situation had arisen since the issuance of the two judgments by the Court, which should have been binding for all United Nations organs and their members given that, under Article 92 of the Charter, the Court was the principal judicial organ of the United Nations. The Lockerbie matter was a legal dispute between Libya, on the one hand, and the United States and the United Kingdom on the other. The Court had jurisdiction over that dispute in accordance with the Charter and the Statute of the Court. That being the case, the parties to the dispute needed to comply with the two judgments rendered by the Court in that respect. None of them could take unilateral or multilateral measures except through the Court. Since they were parties to the dispute, they needed to abstain in the voting on any decision or recommendation relating to it, in accordance with Article 27, paragraph 3, of the Charter. Libya, as a party to the dispute, had from the beginning taken all the steps needed to resolve it peacefully and had implemented all requests by international organizations, including the Security Council, in relation to it, except for those relating to the interpretation and application of the 1971 Montreal Convention, on which it resorted to the Court, as provided in Article 33 of the Charter and article 14, paragraph 1, of the Convention, where it had been vindicated. He stressed that the sanctions the Security Council had adopted in accordance with its resolutions 748 (1992) and 883 (1993) constituted collective punishment against the entire Libyan people as a result of nothing more than mere suspicion against two of its citizens. The two Libyan citizens were mere suspects who had not been accused, interrogated, brought to trial or convicted by a court of law. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had urged the two suspects to agree to appear before a Scottish court in Scotland, but the two suspects had refused to do so because their defence lawyers had advised them not to agree to a trial in the United Kingdom or the United States, as they had already been pre-condemned there by the intensive and concentrated media coverage of the issue and statements made against them by officials of the two countries. The lawyers for the two suspects threatened to sue the Libyan State under local and international law if it surrendered the two suspects against their will to either of the two States. He further underlined that the sanctions provided for in Security Council resolutions 748 (1992) and 883 (1993) had become irrelevant and moot since the Court had accepted jurisdiction in the matter on which the resolutions were based. In conclusion, the representative stressed that for the sake of cooperation between the Court and the Security Council, the Council needed to take the necessary measures to give effect to the two judgments rendered by the Court on 27 February 1998; the Council needed to refrain from renewing the sanctions imposed on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya pursuant to resolutions 748 (1992) and 883 (1993); those two resolutions needed to be rescinded insofar as they related to the imposition of sanctions on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya; the two cases before the International Court of Justice needed to be considered the only peaceful means for settling the dispute between the parties, and the Council needed to call on them not to take any unilateral or multilateral measures until the Court rendered its final decision; and finally as an interim measure, the Council needed to suspend implementation of the two resolutions insofar as they related to the sanctions imposed against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. Libya also believed that the two judgments by the International Court of Justice had paved the way for a definitive settlement of the Lockerbie dispute and thereby declared once more Libya's continued acceptance of the initiatives of international forums, including the League of Arab States, the Organization of African Unity, the Organization of the Islamic Conference and the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, addressed to the Security Council with regard to settling the dispute.¹⁸

The representative of the United States of America addressed the issue of the recent decision by the International Court of Justice. He stated that the rulings in no way questioned the legality of the Security Council's actions affecting the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya or the merits of the criminal cases against the two accused suspects, but that they involved technical procedural issues. The Court was not calling for the review or suspension of Security Council resolutions, and had made clear that it was not dealing with the substance or the merits of the case. In reality the Court had said that the parties must now argue the legal merits of the case, and while the case was proceeding, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya must finally adhere to the will of the international community, comply with its obligations pursuant to Security Council decisions and turn over the two accused suspects for a fair trial. Turning to the claims of humanitarian suffering in Libya, he stated that the United Nations sanctions against Libya were targeted sanctions imposed to address aspects of Libyan involvement in international terrorism but specifically designed to prevent suffering among the Libyan people. Those sanctions did not prohibit the importation of food, medicine or clothing. They did not close the land or sea borders of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, and they did not prevent the country from selling its oil on the open market. In fact, Libyan oil production under sanctions remained steady, so if the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya was suffering economically, it was not because of United Nations sanctions. Speaking about the report of United Nations Under-Secretary-General Petrovsky, the representative stated that the Petrovsky mission had adhered to its mandate, which was simply to listen to Libyan views, and did not agree with, endorse, or confirm the claims of the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. In fact, the report had underlined that Libya had failed to respond or take advantage of efforts by the United Nations to respond to its complaints. If Libya wanted the sanctions lifted, it could surrender the two suspects so that they could receive a fair trial in the appropriate criminal court.¹⁹

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the Security Council and the United Nations as a whole had repeatedly proven their ability to seek compliance with United Nations decisions by showing firmness on the substance of their demands and flexibility in the methods of attaining the goals. A speedy resolution of the Lockerbie case would be of great importance for United Nations efforts in combating the scourge of terrorism. He maintained that the serious humanitarian consequences of sanctions for the Libyan people were attested to by the recent report on the results of the mission of the Under-Secretary-General, which indicated the need to create humanitarian exemptions to the sanctions regime. He stated that his delegation believed that the findings of the report gave sufficient grounds to discuss the adoption by the Council of humanitarian exemptions to the sanctions regime. The Council needed to give an adequate reaction to the positive steps already undertaken by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to comply with the appropriate decisions of the United Nations. While appealing again to the parties to speedily attain a compromise on the basis of the Security Council resolutions, the Russian Federation was in favour of the immediate entry into force of the humanitarian exemptions. He expressed hope that all of their partners would be prepared to work constructively in that area, both within the Council and in the Sanctions Committee.²⁰

The representative of China stated that as the Security Council was the main United Nations organ for maintaining international peace and security and since the Council acted on behalf of the entire membership, in ¹⁸ S/PV.3864 and Corr.1, pp. 4-12. Libya and other speakers also spoke extensively on the technical and legal issues regarding the imposition of sanctions; this is covered in more detail in a case study in chapter XI in the section on Article 42.

accordance with the Charter, it needed to listen to the broad range of views of Member States on the question of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. He reiterated that China was opposed to terrorism in any form and was of the view that terrorists should be brought to justice. He stated that the key to resolving the Lockerbie case was for the parties concerned to agree at an early date on the venue and method of the trial of the two suspects. He also took note of the recent decision of the International Court of Justice to accept the Lockerbie case, and expressed his delegation's support of the resolution of the issue through peaceful means, including legal procedures. He emphasized that the sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had brought untold suffering to the Libyan people, had undermined the development of that country, and had affected the economic development of third world countries. He expressed his Government's grave concern about the adverse effects of the sanctions and underlined that facts had proven that sanctions rather than solving the problem only aggravated matters. In their view the sanctions needed to be lifted as soon as possible. Commenting on the Secretary-General's fact-finding mission to Libya, he noted that the report of the mission was essentially an accurate account of the situation there and stated that the Security Council and its Sanctions Committee ought to consider it seriously and take measures to ease the situation.²¹

The representative of Bahrain stated that the judgment of the International Court of Justice, which confirmed its competence in this issue, logically required that the Security Council consider the suspension of sanctions, at least until the Court took a decision on the substance of the matter. The harmful effects of those sanctions in the long term had begun to be felt by the Libyan people in spite of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya's oil riches. His delegation believed that the Council had to re-examine the sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya because of the new factors in the case: the judgment handed down by the International Court of Justice and the options submitted on the matter, which were legal in nature and not political. The Council had to respond by decreeing a suspension of the sanctions until a ruling was handed down.²²

The representative of Brazil stated that the future decision of the International Court of Justice would be a significant element to be considered by the Security Council in any decision referring to the present case. Brazil hoped that the international community, with the cooperation of the Government of Libya, would be able to ensure that in a fair and transparent way the responsibility for those "heinous acts" would finally be established by a fair trial. He also stressed that humanitarian aspects were especially important with regard to sanctions and that the relevant issues, which were then a part of the discussions in the Sanctions Committee, would benefit from statistical data and verifiable information on the possible links between humanitarian difficulties in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and the sanctions imposed by the United Nations.²³

The representative of France stated that for almost seven years the Security Council had been seized by three Governments, including that of France, of the attacks against Pan Am flight 103 and UTA flight 772. Following the investigations carried out by the competent authorities the Governments concerned had become convinced that Libyan nationals were involved in those terrorist acts. In its first resolution on the matter, the Security Council had urged the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to provide a full and effective response to the requests for cooperation in order to establish responsibility for the two attacks in question. The request was not satisfied and the Council therefore decided in resolutions 748 (1992) and 883 (1993) to impose sanctions on Libya. Those sanctions were tough but limited to specific areas. A Security Council committee was established to authorize exemptions to the Council's proscriptions in order, in particular, to allow urgent medical evacuations and to accommodate the religious obligations of the Libyan population. He stated that France had taken note of the two judgments rendered by the International Court of Justice in the Lockerbie case. The Court, under the Charter, was the principal judicial organ of the United Nations, and it was therefore natural for the Court to decide on the petitions submitted to it. Nevertheless they noted that those judgments were basically procedural in nature; the Court had recognized its competence to hear the matter put before it and would rule on the substance of the case later. He underlined that those decisions did not affect the relevant resolutions of the Council. They also took note that for several years a number of States and regional organizations had taken the initiative of putting forward proposals to resolve the impasse over the Lockerbie case, and that the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had accepted some of those proposals. He stated that in the meantime, France intended to be sensitive to the humanitarian consequences of the sanctions in force. In the Council, as in the Sanctions Committee, France acted to see to it that the exemptions regime was applied generously and effectively. In conclusion, he reiterated that the point of the debate was not whether to maintain sanctions; the sanctions were very recently renewed, and all knew that there was no agreement within the Council to amend the current sanctions regime.²⁴

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the solution to the issue lay in the hands of the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, as they had only to comply with the Security Council resolutions and hand over the two suspects in order for sanctions to be lifted. For whatever reasons, Libya had refused for over six years to comply and had instead sought to enlist other members of the United Nations behind its policies of non-compliance, on the basis of misrepresentations about the trial process, about the impact of sanctions and, most recently, about the preliminary ruling of the International Criminal Court of Justice. He expressed hope that those organizations would not be used to undermine the Council's resolutions and that their influence would eventually be deployed to bring about the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya's acceptance of international law and justice for the victims. He maintained that despite all attempts to muddy the waters, the plain fact remained that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya was under international obligations adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter, with which it had not yet complied. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya's claims that the ruling of the Court relieved it of its obligations to hand over the accused for trial in Scotland or the United States were simply false. Indeed, an application by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya that it should no longer be called upon to surrender the two accused because of those proceedings had already been rejected by the International Court in a 1992 decision. He also stated that, as concluded by the Secretary-General's own mission to Scotland, contrary to Libyan claims, the accused would receive a fair trial under the Scottish judicial system, and that their rights during the pre-trial proceedings would be fully protected in accordance with international standards. He made it clear that for the trial itself in Scotland, the Government of the United Kingdom would also welcome international observers, from the United Nations, from the OAU, from the Arab League and from the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. The independent United Nations experts had already concluded that their presence could be easily and fully accommodated.²⁵

The representative of the League of Arab States stated that within the framework of the international efforts undertaken to reach a peaceful and just solution to the crisis and on the basis of the provisions of Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter concerning the activities of regional organizations that were in keeping with the objectives of the United Nations, the League of Arab States, in cooperation with the Organization of African Unity and the Organization of the Islamic Conference, had submitted three options to the Security Council as a basis on which to solve the problem. Those proposals consisted of either a trial of the suspects in a neutral country, or at the headquarters of the International Court of Justice, or by a special court, provided that the Security Council would consider approval of provisional measures to except air travel for humanitarian, religious and official purposes from the application of sanctions. The main objective of all the efforts undertaken by the League of Arab States and the other regional and international organizations, such as the Non-Aligned Movement and the Group of 77, which represented the majority of the members of the international community, was to achieve a just, peaceful, and final settlement to the problem in the framework of international legitimacy that would be satisfactory to all the parties concerned, including the families of the victims, and at the same time to safeguard Libyan sovereignty within the framework of law and justice. The time had come to alleviate the suffering of the Libyan people and to allow that sister country to play its positive role fully in the Arab, African, Islamic and Mediterranean context. He noted that the report of the fact-finding mission sent by the Secretary-General to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya referred to the deteriorating economic and social conditions in the country, particularly in the health, social, agricultural and transportation sectors. The negative consequences of the sanctions also extended to other, neighbouring Arab and African countries, affecting the stability and the welfare of an entire region. He suggested that perhaps that was why many had raised their voices before the Council,

declaring that the time had come for the sanctions on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to be lifted and for a peaceful settlement of the dispute to be reached.²⁶

The representative of the Organization of African Unity stated that the dispute between the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and the United States and the United Kingdom fell under Article 33 of the Charter of the United Nations. The OAU was convinced that a rapid and just settlement of the dispute in accordance with international law would make it possible to bring about the justice to which they aspired. He stressed that the consistency of the OAU in that matter was rooted in the principle of the peaceful settlement of disputes. The OAU wanted to see a speedy resolution of the dispute and the immediate lifting of the harsh sanctions measures imposed against the people of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. The three options that OAU and the League of Arab States had submitted signalled the willingness and flexibility of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to seek a peaceful settlement of the dispute. It was therefore up to the Security Council to choose one of those options.²⁷

The representative of the Organization of the Islamic Conference stated that their Organization was concerned by the suffering and material and human harm being experienced by the Libyan and neighbouring people because of the sanctions imposed in the implementation of Security Council resolutions 748 (1992) and 883 (1993). The new situation created by the Court's decision and the positions expressed by the various international forums showed that the only action worth taking to stay within the spirit of the Court's judgments was suspension of the air embargo.²⁸

The representative of the United Kingdom spoke on behalf of the European Union and the associated and aligned countries.²⁹ The European Union reiterated its unequivocal condemnation of terrorism in all its forms. He emphasized that terrorism constituted a threat to international peace and security and stressed the need to strengthen international cooperation between States, international organizations, agencies, regional organizations and the United Nations in order to prevent, combat and eliminate terrorism in all its forms and manifestations, wherever and by whomsoever committed. The decisions taken by the Security Council with regard to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya were and remained guided by the desire to curb international terrorism and to ensure that justice was done. The European Union regretted that more than nine years after the bombing of Pan Am flight 103 those accused of the crime had still not been brought to justice. The European Union also called on the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to comply fully with the resolutions of the Council, in particular to ensure the appearance of those charged with the bombing for trial before the appropriate United Kingdom or United States court, as set forth in resolution 883 (1993). The European Union welcomed the report by independent legal experts appointed by the Secretary-General of the United Nations, whose findings made clear that the judicial system of Scotland was fair and independent; that the two accused would receive a fair trial in Scotland; and that their rights would be fully protected. The European Union also welcomed the offer of the United Kingdom to allow international observers to attend the trial in Scotland. The representative also welcomed the press statement by the Chairman of the Sanctions Committee emphasizing the readiness of that Committee to continue to respond promptly to requests for humanitarian exemptions and its determination to continue to pay special attention to all humanitarian issues arising under the relevant Security Council resolutions, including those pertaining to religious obligations. Finally, he stated that the European Union also noted declaration by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya that it no longer supported terrorism and the steps it had taken to end its support for terrorism. Nevertheless, that country's failure to comply fully with Council resolutions remained a serious obstacle in the way of the development of its relations with the international community. The requirements of Security Council resolutions 731 (1992), 748 (1992) and 883 (1993) were clear. In the European Union's view, only when the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had complied fully with those requirements would sanctions be lifted.³⁰

The representative of Malta stated that the meeting was an opportunity which allowed States Members of the United Nations who were not members of the Security Council to exercise the right under which justice and respect for the obligations arising from treaties and other sources of international law could be maintained, and to employ international machinery for the promotion of the economic and social advancement of all peoples. As a neighbouring country to a country hit by sanctions, he stated that Malta needed to ensure that any preventive or enforcement measures undertaken by the Security Council in accordance with Chapter VII of the Charter did not in any way contribute to increased tensions and instability in the Mediterranean region. Together with other countries, Malta felt that a collateral effect of the application and enforcement of the sanctions regime on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya was undermining the holistic approach of the political, economic and social initiatives launched to achieve security and stability in their region. He maintained that in their case those sanctions had had and continued to have a negative impact on their bilateral business and investment opportunities, on travel arrangements between the two countries, and on other economic and social exchanges. They expressed a strong belief that a serious and open debate should be launched to explore alternative measures for the application of sanctions and on measures that offered built-in incentives that encouraged changes in the behaviour of targeted countries. They also believed that the Council should impose sanctions only as a last resort. In their view the sanctions under the present format were not achieving their desired objective. While the Government of Malta would unequivocally continue to respect the sanctions imposed by the Council and abide by them to the letter, it felt duty bound not to remain silent in the face of undue suffering those sanctions could cause to the civilian populations. He reiterated his country's appeal to all Member States and members of the Council, to exhaust all diplomatic initiatives and all the tools of preventive diplomacy, for the peaceful and equitable solution to problems, be they at the global, regional or national level, before deciding on implementing such measures as were contemplated in Articles 41 and 42 of the Charter.³¹

The representative of Kuwait stated that they believed that the implementation by all States of all relevant Security Council resolutions was essential if they wished to ensure respect for the Charter, and supported international legitimacy and the rule of law while maintaining peace and security in the world. He also stated that a positive view needed to be adopted concerning the decisions of the International Court of Justice and they should be seriously considered by the Council in order to achieve progress. Within the framework of promoting close cooperation between regional organizations and the United Nations in the field of world peace and security, he suggested that the Council consider positively the options submitted by the regional organizations aimed at a speedy settlement of the case in order to alleviate the suffering of the Libyan people.³²

A number of speakers welcomed the fact that the problem was being addressed in an open debate; stressed that the Council measures remained in force because the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had not yet complied with its obligations under the relevant Council resolutions; noted that the recent decisions of the International Court of Justice changed nothing on the substance of the matter and did not question the validity of the relevant resolutions of the Security Council; encouraged the Sanctions Committee to consider favourably requests for humanitarian exceptions under resolution 748 (1992); and called on the Libyan authorities to cooperate with the Council and fulfil their obligations.³³

Other speakers supported the proposed three options put forward by the OAU and other regional bodies. A number of speakers also stressed that with regard to the judgments of the Court there was no longer any reason for the Security Council to maintain sanctions against the Libyan people. A few speakers maintained that the future ruling of the Court would be a significant element to be considered by the Council.³⁴

Decision of 27 August 1998 (3920th meeting):

By a letter dated 24 August 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁵ the United Kingdom and the United States expressed their grave concern that 10 years after the terrorist bombing of Pan Am flight 103 over Lockerbie, and several years since the Security Council in resolution 731 (1992), 748 (1992) and 883 (1993) had required the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to ensure the appearance of the two accused for trial in the appropriate United Kingdom or United States court, the accused had not yet stood trial. In the interest of resolving the situation in a way which allowed justice to be done, their Governments were prepared, as an exceptional measure, to arrange for the accused to be tried before a Scottish court sitting in the Netherlands, and the Government of the Netherlands had already agreed to facilitate arrangements for the court. Their two Governments were prepared to support a further Security Council resolution for the purposes of the initiative, which would also suspend sanctions upon the appearance of the two accused for the trial, and which would require all States to cooperate to that end. They were willing to proceed in that exceptional way only on the basis of the terms set out in the letter and provided that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya cooperated fully by ensuring the timely appearance of the two accused and the production of evidence and witnesses before the court, and complied fully with all the requirements of the Security Council resolutions.

At its 3920th meeting, held on 27 August 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Slovenia), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and the Netherlands, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.³⁶ He further drew the attention of the Council to letters dated 25 and 26 August 1998, respectively,³⁷ from the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya addressed to the President of the Security Council, requesting that a decision on the draft resolution presented to the Council be postponed until the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya's judicial authorities had completed their study of the proposal of the United Kingdom and United States and until the Secretary-General of the United Nations had played the role entrusted to him; and transmitting the text of the communiqué issued on 26 August 1998 by the General People's Committee for Foreign Affairs and International Cooperation of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, containing the response of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to the joint letter dated 24 August 1998 from the Governments of the United Kingdom and the United States.

The representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya welcomed the acceptance by the United States and the United Kingdom of the proposals already made by the League of Arab States and the OAU and supported by the OIC and the Non-Aligned Movement. The acceptance was a positive step likely to result in a satisfactory and just solution to the long-standing dispute. He stated that his country accepted that the two suspects should be tried in a Scottish court in the Netherlands by Scottish judges, according to Scots law. Commenting on the draft resolution, he stated that its language gave legitimacy to their concerns. By recalling previous Security Council resolutions, the first preambular paragraph gave the impression that the resolutions had been implemented neither in part nor in their entirety, although his country had fully responded to those resolutions. By referring to Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, the fifth preambular paragraph again placed the issue outside its proper context, especially since the intervention of the Security Council in the matter might be considered procedural, taking into account the Judgment of the International Court of Justice. Operative paragraph 1 of the resolution demanded once again that the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya immediately comply with resolutions 731 (1992), 748 (1992) and 883 (1993) and made no mention at all of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya denunciation and condemnation of terrorism. Operative paragraph 2 welcomed the letter from the representatives of the United Kingdom and the United States, and also referred to arrangements that took place between the United Kingdom and the Netherlands, in which the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya did not participate. Paragraph 3 called on the Governments of the Netherlands and the United Kingdom to undertake the necessary measures to implement the initiative, without mentioning the United States of America, which might therefore consider that it had not committed itself to any agreement between the Netherlands and the United Kingdom. Paragraph 4 decided that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya should ensure the appearance in the Netherlands of the two accused for the purpose of trial and that it should present any evidence or witnesses, but it did not provide for any assurances or special arrangements with regard to the two accused or the witnesses. Paragraph 5 requested the Secretary-General to assist the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya with transferring the two accused from there to the Netherlands. However, there were no guarantees or arrangements pertaining to the period of the trial itself. Paragraph 6 did not set out the tasks of the international observers. Paragraph 7 did not mention the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya or any arrangements with the Netherlands on transferring the two accused, nor did it mention their safety or residence or provide any guarantees to them. Paragraph 8 referred to the appearance of the two accused before an appropriate court in the United Kingdom or the United States at any time. Paragraph 9 pertained to additional measures that might be undertaken; this was particularly worrying as no dialogue or consultations had taken place with the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to date. In conclusion, he reaffirmed their seriousness and eagerness to close the file and open a new page in its relations with the United States and the United Kingdom, based on mutual respect, non-interference in internal affairs, and dialogue and mutual benefit, instead of embargo.³⁸

The representative of the United States stated that the arrangements endorsed in the draft resolution would assure a fair trial for the two Libyan suspects. The terms of the draft resolution and modalities of the trial had been carefully crafted by legal experts and were based on the decisions of the international community, as reflected in Security Council resolutions 731 (1992), 748 (1992), and 883 (1993). He expressed thanks to the Netherlands for helping bring about the arrangements endorsed in the draft resolution. He also stated that they deeply regretted the “hostile and negative content” of the Libyan representative’s statement. He called upon those nations and organizations to urge the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya in the strongest terms to turn over the two defendants for trial regarding Pan Am flight 103 without delay. He reaffirmed the United States’ support for

France in its ongoing investigation of the UTA bombing, and supported their demand for Libya’s full cooperation on the question of UTA flight 772. He also stressed that the draft resolution spelled out exactly what Libya had to do and noted the Security Council’s intention to consider further measures if the two suspects did not appear for trial promptly.³⁹

The representative of France noted their satisfaction with the decision by the United Kingdom and United States to try the two suspects in the Netherlands. He stated that the French authorities had regularly kept the Security Council and the Secretary-General informed about developments in the investigation into the attack on UTA flight 772, most recently on 6 November 1997 and would continue to transmit new information that needed to be brought to their attention. He also recalled that the draft resolution modified the conditions for suspending the sanctions as regarding the holding of the trial in the attack of Pan Am flight 103. However, the other provisions of resolution 883 (1993) relating to cooperation with the French judicial authorities and to the final lifting of sanctions against Libya were not affected by the draft resolution.⁴⁰

The representative of the Russian Federation observed that since the imposition of sanctions, Libya had made progress towards fulfilling the requirements set out in resolutions 731 (1992) and 748 (1992), which related to the condemnation of terrorism and to the provision of information on the subject. In addition thanks to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya cooperation, the investigation into the UTA flight 772 incident was being successfully concluded. He stated that the draft resolution would ensure a fair trial, with proper guarantees of the legal rights of the accused or witnesses. He stressed that it was extremely important that as soon as the two suspects arrived in the Netherlands, the sanctions regime against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya be terminated. He noted that agreement on the draft resolution confirmed that stepping up all-round interaction among States on the basis of the norms of international law was the only way they could put a firm halt to international terrorism. Noting the importance of the cooperation of all sides, he welcomed the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya’s expression of willingness to cooperate with the Secretary-General in order to fulfil the procedures envisaged in the draft resolution.⁴¹

The representative of China expressed hope that the current positive development on the Lockerbie case would facilitate the early lifting of sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. He pointed out that some elements of the text could have been improved, so as to create a better climate for resolving the question. He expressed regret that the sponsors had not incorporated some other constructive proposals from their side in the text. Finally, he reiterated that there had been no change in China's reservations concerning resolutions 748 (1992) and 883 (1993) referred to in the text.⁴²

A number of other speakers made statements, noting that the draft resolution would open the way to bringing to trial the persons charged with the bombing of Pan Am flight 103 and welcoming the step by the United Kingdom and United States and the positive response of the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. Several speakers reiterated the call upon the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to ensure the prompt appearance of the two accused for trial.⁴³

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1192 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 731 (1992) of 21 January 1992, 748 (1992) of 31 March 1992 and 883 (1993) of 11 November 1993,

Taking note of the report of the independent experts appointed by the Secretary-General,

Having regard to the contents of the letter dated 24 August 1998 from the Acting Permanent Representatives of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and of the United States of America to the Secretary-General,

Noting, in the light of the above-mentioned resolutions, the communications of the Organization of African Unity, the League of Arab States, the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries and the Islamic Conference as referred to in the letter dated 24 August 1998,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Demands once again that the Libyan Government immediately comply with the above-mentioned resolutions;

2. Welcomes the initiative for the trial of the two persons charged with the bombing of Pan Am flight 103 ("the two accused") before a Scottish court sitting in the Netherlands, as contained in the letter dated 24 August 1998 from the Acting Permanent Representatives of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and of the United States of America ("the initiative") and the attachments thereto, and the willingness of the Government of the Netherlands to cooperate in the implementation of the initiative;

3. Calls upon the Government of the Netherlands and the Government of the United Kingdom to take such steps as are necessary to implement the initiative, including the conclusion of arrangements with a view to enabling the court described in paragraph 2 above to exercise jurisdiction in the terms of the intended agreement between the two Governments, attached to the said letter dated 24 August 1998;

4. Decides that all States shall cooperate to this end and, in particular, that the Libyan Government shall ensure the appearance in the Netherlands of the two accused for the purpose of trial by the court described in paragraph 2 above, and that the Libyan Government shall ensure that any evidence or witnesses in Libya are, upon the request of the court, promptly made available at the court in the Netherlands for the purpose of the trial;

5. Requests the Secretary-General, after consultation with the Government of the Netherlands, to assist the Libyan Government with the physical arrangements for the safe transfer of the two accused from Libya direct to the Netherlands;

6. Invites the Secretary-General to nominate international observers to attend the trial;

7. Decides that, on the arrival of the two accused in the Netherlands, the Government of the Netherlands shall detain the two accused pending their transfer for the purpose of trial before the court described in paragraph 2 above;

8. Reaffirms that the measures set forth in its resolutions 748 (1992) and 883 (1993) remain in effect and binding on all Member States, and in this context reaffirms the provisions of paragraph 16 of resolution 883 (1993), and decides that the aforementioned measures shall be suspended immediately if the Secretary-General reports to the Council that the two accused have arrived in the Netherlands for the purpose of trial before the court described in paragraph 2 above or have appeared for trial before an appropriate court in the United Kingdom or the United States, and that the Libyan Government has satisfied the French judicial authorities with regard to the bombing of UTA 772;

9. Expresses its intention to consider additional measures if the two accused have not arrived or appeared for trial promptly in accordance with paragraph 8 above;

10. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that the adoption of the resolution was an opportunity to resolve the matter with justice in a manner acceptable to the families and to all the parties concerned. While he welcomed that the Libyan representative had clearly stated his Government's acceptance that the two accused be tried in a Scottish court in the Netherlands by Scottish judges under Scottish law, he emphasized that what was then required was that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya confirm through the Secretary-General of the United Nations its clear and unequivocal acceptance of that and its willingness to do so speedily and without prevarication. If the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya ensured the appearance of the accused in the Netherlands everything else would flow from that. He also stressed that the resolution clearly said that sanctions would be suspended as soon as the Secretary-General was able to confirm that the accused had been delivered to the Netherlands and that the requirements of French justice had also been met. The Governments of the United Kingdom and the United States had stated their commitment to that clearly in the letter to the Secretary-General. Once the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya accepted the proposal in its entirety they were prepared to do everything necessary to implement speedily the legal and other arrangements.⁴⁴

Decision of 8 April 1999 (3992nd meeting):
statement by the President

By a letter dated 5 April 1999 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴⁵ which constituted the report to be submitted pursuant to paragraph 8 of Security Council resolution 1192, the Secretary-General informed the Council that on 18 September 1998, the Governments of the Netherlands and the United Kingdom had signed an agreement concerning a trial in the Netherlands before a Scottish court and had enacted the necessary legislation. He also informed the Council that all the necessary assistance as requested in resolution 1192 (1998) had been provided to the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and that on 5 April 1999, the two accused had safely arrived in the Netherlands and been detained by the Dutch authorities, as provided for in paragraph 7. He also noted that he had been informed by the French authorities that in regard to the requests in the letter from the French authorities dated 20 December 1991,⁴⁶ in reporting to the Council under paragraph 8 of Security Council resolution 1192 (1998), he might indicate that the conditions set forth in resolution 1192 (1998) had been met, without prejudice to the other requests concerning the bombing of Pan Am flight 103. He stated that the measures set forth in Security Council resolution 748 (1992) and 883 (1993) should be suspended immediately as the conditions in Paragraph 8 of Security Council resolution 1192 (1998), that the two accused had arrived for trial in the Netherlands and that the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had satisfied French judicial authorities with regard to the bombing of UTA 772, had been met. Paragraph 8 of resolution 1192 (1998) also reaffirmed paragraph 16 of Security Council resolution 883 (1993), which requested the Secretary-General to report, within 90 days of the suspension of measures, on compliance by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya with the remaining provisions of resolution 731 (1992) and 748 (1992) so that the measures could be lifted immediately if he reported that they had fully complied. Therefore, he would proceed as expeditiously as possible with the preparing of the report.

At its 3992nd meeting, held on 8 April 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (France) drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 8 April 1999 from Tunisia, transmitting a statement on behalf of the States members of the Council of the League of Arab States.⁴⁷

The Security Council recalls its resolutions 731 (1992) of 21 January 1992, 748 (1992) of 31 March 1992, 883 (1993) of 11 November 1993 and 1192 (1998) of 27 August 1998.

The Council welcomes the letter dated 5 April 1999 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council, reporting that the two persons accused of the bombing of Pan Am flight 103 have arrived in the Netherlands for the purpose of trial before the court described in paragraph 2 of resolution 1192 (1998) and that, with regard to the bombing of UTA 772, the French authorities had informed the Secretary-General that he might indicate, in reporting to the Council under paragraph 8 of resolution 1192 (1998), that the conditions set forth in resolution 1192 (1998) had been met, without prejudice to the other requests concerning the bombing of Pan Am flight 103.

The Council expresses its deep appreciation to the Secretary-General, the Governments of the Republic of South Africa and the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia and other countries for their commitment towards reaching a satisfactory conclusion relating to Pan Am flight 103.

The Council further notes the role played by the League of Arab States, the Organization of the Islamic Conference, the Organization of African Unity and the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries in this regard.

The Council notes that, with the letter from the Secretary-General dated 5 April 1999, the conditions set forth in paragraph 8 of resolution 1192 (1998) for the immediate suspension of the measures set forth in resolutions 748 (1992) and 883 (1993) have been fulfilled. In this regard, the Council recalls that, in accordance with resolution 1192 (1998), the measures set forth in resolutions 748 (1992) and 883 (1993) were immediately suspended upon receipt of the letter from the Secretary-General on 5 April 1999 at 1400 hours Eastern Standard Time. This development was immediately acknowledged through a statement by the President of the Security Council to the press on 5 April 1999 following consultations of the whole.

The Council remains seized of the matter.

Decision of 9 July 1999 (4022nd meeting):
statement by the President

On 30 June 1999, the Secretary-General submitted a report pursuant to paragraph 16 of Security Council resolution 883 (1993) and paragraph 8 of resolution 1192 (1998), on the compliance of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya with the remaining measures.⁴⁹ He observed that the requirements referred to in document S/23306 relating to the bombing of UTA flight 772 had been met. He further noted that since the Scottish court had granted a request by defence lawyers of the two persons concerned to delay the trial for six months he was not in a position to provide any factual information on compliance with requirements emanating from document S/23308, as those requests related to actions which could only be undertaken during and following the conclusion of the trial. He stated that it appeared that under the circumstances the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya might only be expected to provide assurances of its commitment to comply with those requirements, particularly as regards access to witnesses, relevant documents and other material evidence. However, he pointed out that the Libyan authorities had indeed provided assurances that they would cooperate with the Scottish court. As for the requirement in document S/23309 that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya commit itself definitely to cease all forms of terrorist action and all assistance to terrorist groups, he noted that they had stated so on numerous occasions. Finally, he reported that he had hosted a tripartite meeting between the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the United States and the United Kingdom in order to assist the participants in clarifying the positions of their Governments regarding the requirements of the aforementioned Security Council resolutions for the lifting of measures.

At its 4022nd meeting, held on 9 July 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General of 30 June 1999 in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda the President (Malaysia) drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 6 July 1999 from the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya

reiterating that the Security Council was obliged, according to its decision, to lift the sanctions imposed on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya upon the receipt of the Secretary-General's report.⁵⁰

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁵¹

The Security Council recalls its resolutions 731 (1992) of 21 January 1992, 748 (1992) of 31 March 1992, 883 (1993) of 11 November 1993 and 1192 (1998) of 27 August 1998 and the statement by its President of 8 April 1999.

The Council welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 30 June 1999 submitted in fulfilment of the request contained in paragraph 16 of resolution 883 (1993).

The Council welcomes the positive developments identified in the report and the fact that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya has made significant progress in compliance with the relevant resolutions. It welcomes also the commitment given by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to implement further the relevant resolutions by continuing cooperation in order to meet all the requirements contained therein. It encourages all parties concerned to maintain their spirit of cooperation. The Council recalls that the measures set forth in resolutions 748 (1992) and 883 (1993) have been suspended, and reaffirms its intention to lift those measures as soon as possible, in conformity with the relevant resolutions.

The Council expresses its gratitude to the Secretary-General for his continued efforts in his role as set out in paragraph 4 of resolution 731 (1992) and paragraph 6 of resolution 1192 (1998), and requests him to follow developments regarding this matter closely and to report to the Council accordingly.

The Council remains actively seized of the matter.

8. The situation in Sierra Leone

Decision of 15 February 1996 (3632nd meeting): statement by the President

At the 3632nd meeting, held on 15 February 1996, the Security Council included in its agenda without objection the item entitled "the situation in Sierra Leone".¹ The President (United States), with the consent of the Council, then invited the representative of Sierra Leone, at his request to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²

The Security Council welcomes the results of the meeting of the National Consultative Conference on 12 February 1996 that overwhelmingly supported the decision to maintain 26 February 1996 as the date of the elections. The Council also welcomes the renewed promise of the Government of Sierra Leone, through the Chairman of the National Provisional Ruling Council, to abide by the will of the people expressed through the Conference to hold the elections as scheduled. The Council notes that the Chairman of the Interim National Electoral Commission has confirmed that all the necessary technical arrangements are in place for elections to proceed.

The Council reiterates its belief that the holding of free and fair elections as scheduled is of critical importance to Sierra Leone's transition to democratic constitutional rule. Any delay in the elections or interruption in this process is likely to erode international donor support for Sierra Leone. It is also likely to greatly increase the potential for further instability and violence, with devastating consequences for the people of Sierra Leone.

The Council cautions all groups and individuals in Sierra Leone not to attempt to disrupt through violence or intimidation the electoral process which the great majority of the people of Sierra Leone support. The Council calls upon the Government to fulfil its undertaking to ensure a safe and free environment for the elections.

The Council urges all parties to end the violence in Sierra Leone. The Council welcomes the initial contacts between the Government and the Revolutionary United Front and calls upon the Revolutionary United Front to renew its ceasefire and to enter into a full dialogue for peace without any conditions.

The Council expresses its continued concern about the humanitarian situation and suffering of the people resulting from the conflict in Sierra Leone. The Council calls upon Member States to continue to provide humanitarian assistance to address this problem.

The Council commends the efforts of the Secretary-General to assist the conduct of the elections, and in particular the establishment of the Joint International Observer Group. It also commends the work of the Special Envoy of the Secretary-General to support the democratic transition and to facilitate peace negotiations between the Government and the Revolutionary United Front. The Council appreciates the important role of the Organization of African Unity and others, including States neighbouring Sierra Leone, in attempting to bring peace to that country.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to continue to monitor the situation in Sierra Leone and to keep the Council informed of all significant developments.

Decision of 19 March 1996 (3643rd meeting): statement by the President

At its 3643rd meeting held on 19 March 1996, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Botswana) made the following the following statement on behalf of the Council:³

The Security Council welcomes the parliamentary and presidential elections held in Sierra Leone on 26 and 27 February 1996 and the second round of Presidential elections held on 15 March. It congratulates the people of Sierra Leone on the courage and determination they have shown in proceeding with the elections despite difficulties and disruptions, and pays tribute to all those involved in the success of the elections, in particular the Interim National Electoral Commission and its Chairman. The Council stresses the importance it attaches to a peaceful transition to civilian rule. It welcomes the commitment by the Chairman of the National Provisional Ruling Council to hand over authority by 31 March 1996 and calls upon all concerned to cooperate fully with the newly elected President and Parliament.

The Council notes that the Joint International Observer Group, which monitored the first round of elections, was impressed by the “overwhelming desire on the part of the people of Sierra Leone to exercise their democratic right in casting a ballot for the parties and candidates of their choice”. They have now done so, and it is incumbent on all concerned to help them to consolidate the gains that have been made. The Council is of the view that the circumstances created by the successful conclusion of the elections in Sierra Leone require redoubled efforts to end the fighting in that country. It commends the efforts of the Special Envoy of the Secretary-General and others, in particular the Government of Côte d’Ivoire, to that end. It reiterates its call to all parties to end the violence. It calls upon the Revolutionary United Front to accept the outcome of the elections, maintain the ceasefire and enter into a full dialogue for peace, without any conditions.

The Council calls upon the international community to provide generous assistance to help in resolving the humanitarian problems caused by the conflict in Sierra Leone, and to assist the Government and people of that country in the task of reconstruction that now faces them.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to continue to monitor the situation in Sierra Leone and to keep the Council informed of significant developments.

Decision of 4 December 1996 (3720th meeting): statement by the President

At the 3720th meeting of the Security Council, held on 4 December 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Italy), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Sierra Leone, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴

The Security Council warmly welcomes the Peace Agreement signed by the Government of Sierra Leone and the Revolutionary United Front in Abidjan on 30 November 1996. The Agreement brings to an end a bitter conflict which has caused appalling suffering to the people of Sierra Leone. The Council pays tribute to the courage and determination of all those who have worked tirelessly towards this end. The Council hopes that the Agreement will provide encouragement to those working for peace in other parts of Africa.

The Council commends in particular the role played by the Government of Côte d’Ivoire whose commitment and determination in the chairmanship of the negotiations between the parties have been crucial to this successful outcome. The Council also pays tribute to the support provided to the negotiations by the Special Envoy of the Secretary-General in close coordination with the Organization of African Unity, the Commonwealth, the Economic Community of West African States and other organizations and neighbouring countries.

The Council continues to follow developments in Sierra Leone with close interest. The Peace Agreement is an essential first step towards national reconciliation and reconstruction. The Council will continue to support the development of peace and democracy in Sierra Leone. It notes in particular the need for a successful process of demobilization and reintegration of former combatants and stands ready to assist in this process. It stresses the importance of a coordinated international effort to alleviate the humanitarian situation in the country.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to continue to monitor the situation in Sierra Leone and to keep the Council informed of further significant developments.

Decision of 27 May 1997 (3781st meeting): statement by the President

⁴ S/PRST/1996/46.

By a letter dated 10 December 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵ the Secretary-General informed the Council of the High Level Consultations on Post-Conflict Peace-Building in West Africa: Political and Development Initiatives held in New York on 21 October 1996.

By a letter dated 11 December 1996 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁶ the representative of Sierra Leone transmitted a document entitled “Peace Agreement between the Government of the Republic of Sierra Leone and the Revolutionary United Front of Sierra Leone”, signed at Abidjan on 30 November 1996.

By a letter dated 13 December 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁷ the Secretary-General transmitted two letters: one from the President of Sierra Leone and the other from the leader of the Revolutionary United Front, dated 30 November and 9 December 1996, respectively, and indicated his intention, subject to the concurrence of the Council, to send an assessment mission to Sierra Leone to develop recommendations on ways in which the United Nations could assist in monitoring the peace in that country.

In his report dated 26 January 1997, submitted pursuant to the letter of the President of the Council dated 17 December 1996,⁸ the Secretary-General reflected the findings of the assessment team which visited Sierra Leone from 22 December 1996 to 6 January 1997, and the team’s recommendations regarding the assistance the United Nations could extend to the parties in implementing the Abidjan Accord.⁹

At the 3781st meeting of the Security Council, held on 27 May 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Republic of Korea), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Sierra Leone, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁰

The Security Council is deeply concerned about the military coup d’état in Sierra Leone, especially when the United Nations is assisting the process of reconciliation in that country.

It strongly deplores this attempt to overthrow the democratically elected Government and calls for an immediate restoration of constitutional order. The Council takes note of the communiqué of 26 May 1997 of the Central Organ Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution of the Organization of African Unity, and underlines the imperative need to implement the Abidjan Agreement which continues to serve as a viable framework for peace, stability and reconciliation in Sierra Leone.

The Security Council strongly condemns the violence which has been inflicted on both local and expatriate communities, in particular United Nations and other international personnel serving in the country. It recalls the obligation of all concerned to ensure the protection of United Nations and other international personnel in the country, and calls for an end to the looting of premises and equipment belonging to the United Nations and international aid agencies.

Decision of 11 July 1997 (3798th meeting):
statement by the President

By a letter dated 9 July 1997 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹¹ the representative of Nigeria, on behalf of the Chairman of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) requested an open meeting of the Security Council to be held as soon as possible to consider the item “the situation in Sierra Leone”.

At the 3797th meeting of the Security Council held on 11 July 1997, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, and at the request contained in the letter dated 9 July 1997 from the representative of Nigeria, the President (Sweden), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Côte d’Ivoire, Ghana, Guinea, Nigeria, Sierra Leone and Zimbabwe, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. At the same meeting, the Council also extended, without objection, an invitation under rule 39 of the Council’s provisional rules of procedure to the Permanent Observer of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) to the United Nations.

At the same meeting, the representative of Nigeria stated that the crisis in Sierra Leone brought about by the seizure of power on 25 May 1997 by a section of the Sierra Leonean military, portended “grave consequences” for peace and stability in Sierra Leone and for the political process and constitutionality in the governance of that country. The countries of the subregion were horrified by the “sheer venom” of the operation, the mindless waste of human life, the disruption of civil society and the sustained destruction of infrastructure and property. He underlined that the presence of the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of Côte d’Ivoire, Ghana, Guinea and Nigeria, as well as the representatives of the secretariats of ECOWAS and the Organization of African Unity (OAU), underscored the extent of subregional concern over developments in Sierra Leone and the need for the international community to come to grips with the situation in that country and coordinate its efforts with those of the countries of the subregion to bring the crisis to a peaceful resolution. He warned that the developments in Sierra Leone gave cause for immediate concern. Sierra Leone, which shared vast borders with Liberia and Guinea, for no less than seven years had engaged the attention of the subregion as a country torn apart by inter-factional conflict. He maintained that with the sustained and collective efforts of the member States of ECOWAS, life had begun to return to normalcy in Liberia as the final phase of the peace process was being implemented, namely, the conduct of elections. It was important therefore to carefully manage the situation in Sierra Leone so that the progress so far achieved in Liberia would not be reversed. He further underlined that Guinea was also subject to the threat of destabilization from a number of sources. As a country bordering Liberia, it had received a considerable number of refugees from that country. With the situation in Guinea itself deteriorating, Guinea had also been burdened by a new wave of Sierra Leonean refugees. Those circumstances had overstretched the economy of Guinea and posed great difficulties to the political and social stability of the nation. The effects of refugees from Sierra Leone and Liberia went even beyond the confines of neighbouring countries. They were being felt all over the subregion, in particular in such countries as Côte d’Ivoire, the Gambia, Ghana and Nigeria, as well as in several others where sizeable numbers of refugees existed. In summarizing the actions and decisions undertaken by ECOWAS at its Ministerial meeting of Ministers for Foreign Affairs, held in Conakry, Guinea, on 26 June 1997, the representative of Nigeria highlighted the key elements of the communiqué issued at that meeting.¹² The first element included the objectives of calling for the reinstatement of the legitimate Government of President Ahmad Tejan Kabbah; the return of peace and security to Sierra Leone and the resolution of the issues of refugees and displaced persons. The second element consisted of the means of achieving these objectives. Accordingly, they pledged to work towards the reinstatement of the legitimate Government of Sierra Leone by a combination of three measures: dialogue; the imposition of sanctions and embargo; and the use of force. In that regard, the representative of Nigeria underlined the concerns expressed by delegations at the Ministerial meeting in Conakry with respect to the use of force as a means of resolving the crisis in Sierra Leone. He stated that it was recognized that the other two options, including negotiations and sanctions cum blockade, could not be achieved without the use of some military force and that all three measures required consultations at the highest level among ECOWAS countries. For the third element, which consisted of the mechanism for implementing the decisions, the Ministers had established a committee to ensure the implementation of the recommendations of the meeting in Conakry. On 5 July 1997, the ministerial committee of four, including representatives of OAU and ECOWAS, presented a report to the Chairman of ECOWAS, who endorsed the recommendations and mandated the Committee with the steps outlined in the ECOWAS plan. In conclusion, the representative of Nigeria underlined that the people of Sierra Leone, the member States of ECOWAS and the entire continent of Africa looked with great expectation to the outcome of the Security Council meeting, which would be a clear and unequivocal message to the regime in Sierra Leone that it had to comply with the demands of the international community and return power to the legitimate Government of President Ahmad Tejan Kabbah.¹³

At the same meeting, speaking on behalf of the Chairman of the Organization of African Unity (OAU), the representative of Zimbabwe stated that OAU fully and unreservedly supported the initiative of the four ECOWAS member States and stood behind President Kabbah and the elected Government of Sierra Leone; it condemned the coup d’état and called upon the Security Council to support the efforts of ECOWAS and OAU in seeking the non-recognition and demise of the military regime in Sierra Leone and in working for the restoration of the democratically elected government in that country.¹⁴

On 11 July 1997, at the 3798th meeting of the Security Council, held in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Sweden), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Côte d'Ivoire, Ghana, Guinea, Nigeria, Sierra Leone and Zimbabwe to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁵

The Security Council recalls the statement by its President of 27 May 1997 following the military coup d'état in Sierra Leone on 25 May 1997. It remains deeply concerned about the continuing crisis in Sierra Leone and its negative humanitarian consequences on the civilian population, including refugees and internally displaced persons, and, in particular, the atrocities committed against the citizens of Sierra Leone, foreign nationals and personnel of the Monitoring Group of the Economic Community of West African States. It reiterates its view that the attempt to overthrow the democratically elected Government of President Ahmad Tejan Kabbah is unacceptable and calls again for the immediate and unconditional restoration of constitutional order in the country.

The Council is concerned about the grave crisis in Sierra Leone which endangers the peace, security and stability of the whole region and, in particular, about its possible negative impact on the ongoing peace process in neighbouring Liberia.

The Council strongly supports the decision adopted by the Council of Ministers of the Organization of African Unity at its sixty-sixth ordinary session, held at Harare from 28 to 31 May 1997, in which the Council of Ministers appealed to the leaders of the Economic Community of West African States and the international community to help the people of Sierra Leone to restore the constitutional order in that country and in which it underlined the imperative need to implement the Abidjan Agreement, which continues to serve as a viable framework for peace, stability and reconciliation in Sierra Leone.

The Council welcomes the participation of the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the Economic Community of West African States members of the Committee of Four in its 3797th meeting of 11 July 1997.

The Council welcomes the mediation efforts initiated by the Economic Community of West African States and expresses its full support for the objectives of those efforts as set out in the final communiqué issued at the meeting of the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the Economic Community of West African States held in Conakry on 26 June 1997.

The Council calls upon those who have seized power to cooperate fully with those efforts so that the constitutional order in Sierra Leone will be restored immediately.

The Council will continue to follow closely the progress of efforts aimed at the peaceful resolution of the crisis and stands ready to consider appropriate measures if constitutional order in Sierra Leone is not restored without delay.

The Council will remain actively seized of this matter.

Decision of 6 August 1997 (3809th meeting):
statement by the President

At the 3809th meeting of the Security Council, held on 6 August 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (United Kingdom), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Sierra Leone, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁶

The Security Council recalls the statements of its President of 27 May and 11 July 1997 following the military coup d'état in Sierra Leone on 25 May 1997. It condemns the overthrow of the democratically elected Government of President Ahmad Tejan Kabbah and calls upon the military junta to take immediate steps to bring about the unconditional restoration of that Government. The Council remains deeply concerned about the situation in Sierra Leone, which endangers peace, security and stability in the whole region.

The Council underlines the need to implement the Abidjan Agreement, which continues to serve as a viable framework for peace, stability and reconciliation in Sierra Leone.

The Council expresses its appreciation to the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the Economic Community of West African States members of the Committee of Four for their efforts to negotiate with representatives of the military junta on 17 and 18 July and 29 and 30 July 1997 in Abidjan on a peaceful resolution of the crisis, and reiterates its full support for the objectives of this mediation. It deeply regrets the breakdown of these talks, and considers that the responsibility for this failure rests entirely with the military junta which refused to negotiate in good faith.

The Council considers that the attempt by the military junta to set conditions for the restoration of the democratically elected Government is unacceptable, and calls upon the junta to renounce its declared intention to remain in power and to resume negotiations with the Committee of Four Ministers for Foreign Affairs without delay.

The Council will, in the absence of a satisfactory response from the military junta, be ready to take appropriate measures with the objective of restoring the democratically elected Government of President Kabbah.

The Security Council remains deeply concerned about the deteriorating humanitarian situation in Sierra Leone and at the continued looting and commandeering of relief supplies of international agencies. It calls upon the military junta to cease all interference with the delivery of humanitarian assistance to the people of Sierra Leone. The Council condemns the continuing violence and threats of violence by the junta towards the civilian population, foreign nationals and personnel of the Monitoring Group of the Economic Community of West African States, and calls for an end to such acts of violence. The Council also expresses its concern at the effects of the continuing influx of refugees into neighbouring countries, in particular Guinea, due to the crisis in Sierra Leone. It calls upon all States and relevant international organizations to provide help to these countries in dealing with this problem.

The Council will remain actively seized of this matter.

Decision of 8 October 1997 (3822nd meeting):
resolution 1132 (1997)

At the 3822nd meeting of the Security Council, held on 8 October 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Chile), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Nigeria and Sierra Leone, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to the text of a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁷

At the same meeting, the representative of Sierra Leone, while expressing his country's appreciation to the delegation of the United Kingdom for initiating the draft resolution which was before the Council, recalled that the Sierra Leoneans were aware that in their history, Queen Victoria often referred to Sierra Leone as "ancient and loyal Sierra Leone", and that Sierra Leoneans everywhere understood and appreciated that the United Kingdom was their loyal friend at the hour of crisis. He also thanked the members of the Security Council, particularly his African colleagues, for their efforts and stated that the draft resolution, as it stood, far exceeded their expectations. He, however, expressed his delegation's concern over extent to which the military junta in Freetown would take seriously what would happen in the Security Council. He expressed further concern at the "high degree of recklessness" shown by the military junta in Freetown in dealing with the international community. He stated that the principal concern was that the junta should respect the institutional integrity of the Security Council. He informed the Council that since the coup d'état, the military junta had been consistently misled by "discredited" politicians and the so-called "elder statesmen" in Sierra Leone, who had told the military junta that the Security Council would reject the sanctions of ECOWAS and that the Council would not call for the restoration of the legitimate Government of Sierra Leone. He further added that during the four months of dialogue, the military junta had shown no inclination to agree to the restoration of the legitimate Government in Sierra Leone. His delegation believed that the draft resolution, if adopted, would perhaps make a new beginning — a new reality — which would enable the military junta to know that the world community was serious and wanted the legitimate Government to be restored. He further hoped that the draft resolution, when adopted, together with the talks that might start soon, would bring a new era in Sierra Leone, and one which was not one of recrimination but of reconciliation. In conclusion, the representative maintained that his delegation was in full agreement with the Secretary-General's statement that what they had in Sierra Leone was a matter of very serious principle, in which a Government was elected by the people under the rule of law.¹⁸

The representative of Nigeria stated that another important milestone had been reached in the fruitful cooperation between the United Nations and ECOWAS in their efforts to resolve the crisis situations in the subregion. He expressed satisfaction at the unchanged position of the United Nations, the Organization of African Unity and ECOWAS that the military junta in Freetown must step down and the democratically elected Government in Sierra Leone be restored without delay. He also urged the Security Council to remain unchanged on the principled position it had taken. He further informed the Council that although the initial round of talks between ECOWAS and the military junta, which aimed at a peaceful resolution of the crisis, had been encouraging and fruitful, the negotiations had fallen through during the following round of talks due to deliberate stalling and acts of bad faith on the part of the junta, whose representatives had reneged on their earlier commitments. Worse still, the regime had announced its intention to remain in power for four years and the situation in Sierra Leone, which was bad enough at the inception of the coup d'état, had since deteriorated. The representative reiterated that faced with such a situation, ECOWAS was left with no option but to adopt a set of measures in the form of sanctions and an embargo as a means of pressuring the regime in Freetown. He further added that the decisions and actions taken by ECOWAS to resolve the Sierra Leonean crisis were guided by the following considerations: that the situation in Sierra Leone was a clear threat to international peace and security in view of its potential to destabilize the entire region; that the subregion wanted to avoid another costly and long drawn-out engagement similar to what it had experienced in Liberia, with the attendant massive humanitarian problems; and that while ECOWAS was sufficiently seized of the matter, the support and endorsement of the United Nations was essential. He echoed the draft resolution in acknowledging that ECOWAS was the body closest to the situation on the ground and that it had a mechanism in the form of a monitoring group to carry out effective monitoring and implementation of whatever measures were agreed upon. In that regard, he welcomed the inclusion in paragraph 8 of the draft resolution enabling authorization of the Council for ECOWAS to carry out the tasks mandated by the ECOWAS summit. In conclusion, he appealed to all members of the international community to assist the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group (ECOMOG) to carry out those tasks by providing it with logistical assistance and vital information.¹⁹

Speaking before the vote, the representative of France stated that his delegation would vote in favour of the draft resolution and pointed out that while the draft resolution expressed the support of the United Nations for the efforts of the members of ECOWAS to bring about the peaceful restoration of constitutional order and the return of the democratically elected Government through negotiations, the decision of the States of the region to exert pressure in the form of economic sanctions, in view of the refusal of the perpetrators of the coup to join negotiations in good faith, were measures intended to promote a peaceful resolution of the crisis, and not to worsen the humanitarian situation of the people of Sierra Leone. With reference to the provisions for imposition of sanctions provided in the draft resolution, he underlined that the sanctions were defined to cover only travel of members of the military junta and their families, as well as the supply of weapons and petroleum. While stating that the draft also contained some fairly precise criteria for the lifting of the sanctions and that the provisions made it possible to aim to avoid an indefinite extension of sanctions, he maintained that periodic decisions by the Council on the continuation of sanctions would be the best way to achieve that goal. He further voiced his delegation's concern with regard to the effects and economic consequences of the situation in Sierra Leone on neighbouring States since those States were taking in a very large number of refugees, without creating camps, and were generously opening their towns and resources to them.²⁰

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that his country, which had helped with the organization of the elections in March 1996, was appalled by the turn of events in Sierra Leone, and joined ECOWAS, OAU and the rest of the international community in condemning unequivocally the "arbitrary and unconstitutional" overthrow of a democratic Government. He also paid tribute to the dedicated efforts of the countries of ECOWAS and the Council's practical backing for it as provided in the draft resolution. He further stated that by establishing an international arms and oil embargo and visa restrictions on members of the junta, the Security Council was making clear to the illegal regime in Freetown that the entire international community was committed to reversing the military coup and restoring the democratically elected Government.²¹

The representative of the Russian Federation, maintaining that a new threat to stability had emerged in the troubled region, decisively condemned the perpetrators of the coup and firmly supported the demand made by African States that constitutional order be restored. He commended Africa's principled position on the question and the efforts of the member countries of ECOWAS to resolve the crisis in Sierra Leone. He pointed out however, that in order to attain the goal, peaceful means were to be used first and foremost and that given the active involvement of ECOWAS in resolving the crisis in Sierra Leone, his delegation attached particular importance to strengthening coordination between the Security Council and the subregional organization. He further stressed that cooperation between the United Nations and the regional organizations on questions relating to the maintenance of peace and security should be based on the Charter of the United Nations and that enforcement action was not to be undertaken by regional organizations without the authorization of the Security Council. He stated that the powerful means of pressure on the junta brought into play by the Council — the embargo on the delivery of arms, military equipment, petroleum and petroleum products and visa restrictions on the leaders of the coup — had been fine-tuned and were aimed at specific targets. His delegation assumed that member countries of ECOWAS, the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the Sanctions Committee would carefully monitor the situation in Sierra Leone and regularly inform the Council of the impact that sanctions were having on the humanitarian situation there. Nevertheless, he voiced concern that the draft resolution did not establish a clear time-frame for the application of sanctions. This question was exceptionally important both for the effective impact on the conduct of parties targeted by the sanctions and for timely adjustments by the Council of measures it had adopted, in light of the results achieved. The point of sanctions was not to punish the party that had threatened international peace and security but to change the conduct of that party. The logic and practice of indefinite sanctions regimes could not in principle do that, and in his delegation's view they were counterproductive. Nevertheless, given the careful review of sanctions in six months' time, as envisaged in the draft resolution and in order to accommodate the wishes of African States for a speedy and unanimous adoption of a resolution, the delegation of the Russian Federation was prepared in this specific case to be flexible and to support the draft resolution.²²

The representative of Portugal, while fully supporting the objectives of the draft resolution before the Council, underlined that under Chapter VIII of the Charter of the United Nations, which foresaw the utilization of regional arrangements for the enforcement of Council decisions, ECOWAS had been authorized to ensure the strict implementation of the provisions of the draft resolution that were referred to in operative paragraph 8 and that the draft also sought the restoration of the democratically elected Government of Sierra Leone by peaceful means. Those sanctions were tailored to penalize those who had consistently refused to abide by the rules of democracy and they were not addressed against the people of Sierra Leone. He added that the crisis in Sierra Leone was worrying in itself on account of the usurpation of constitutional order, but it was also a destabilizing factor for the region, in particular for neighbouring countries, such as Liberia, where the still-fragile process of national reconciliation was trying to take hold.²³

The representative of the United States maintained that in voting for the draft resolution his delegation had joined with the citizens of Sierra Leone and with the other Council members to demand the immediate restoration of the democratically elected Government of President Kabbah and that with this draft resolution the Security Council had made clear its willingness to exercise the enforcement powers of Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter in the service of that goal. Furthermore, with this draft resolution, in accordance with Chapter VIII of the Charter, the Security Council also joined in the efforts of ECOWAS to try to resolve the crisis as ECOWAS had successfully done for neighbouring Liberia. He pointed out that the Security Council was voting to support the ECOWAS plan of action for Sierra Leone with concrete measures — sanctions that had been carefully targeted. The sanctions were designed to have maximum impact against the illegal junta of Sierra Leone, while imposing a minimum burden on the civilian population. With regard to the concerns of some members about the time frame for the sanctions, the representative maintained that “compliance, and not the calendar, should govern the Council's approach” and that the draft resolution had made clear how the junta could end those sanctions by restoring the legitimate Government of Sierra Leone.²⁴

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1132 (1997), which reads:

On 14 November 1997, the Security Council held its 3834th meeting in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations. The President (China), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Sierra Leone, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁵

The Security Council recalls its resolution 1132 (1997) of 8 October 1997 and the statements by its President of 27 May, 11 July and 6 August 1997 in response to the military coup in Sierra Leone on 25 May 1997. It reiterates its condemnation of the overthrow of the democratically elected Government of President Ahmad Tejan Kabbah, and its concern about the threat to peace, security and stability in the region which the situation in Sierra Leone continues to present.

The Council expresses its full support and appreciation for the continued efforts of the Committee of Five on Sierra Leone of the Economic Community of West African States to seek a peaceful settlement of the crisis and the restoration of the democratically elected Government and constitutional order. In this regard, it welcomes the peace plan agreed upon in Conakry on 23 October 1997 between the Committee and representatives of the junta as set out in the documents issued after the meeting. It also notes with satisfaction President Kabbah's acceptance of the peace plan in his statement of 5 November 1997.

The Council calls upon the junta to fulfil its obligations under the peace plan, and in particular the ongoing maintenance of the ceasefire. It calls upon all parties concerned to work for the early and effective implementation of the peace plan, and encourages the Committee of the Economic Community of West African States to cooperate closely with the Special Envoy of the Secretary-General on Sierra Leone.

The Council takes note with appreciation of the briefing on the outcome of the meeting in Conakry on 23 October 1997 provided to its members in New York by representatives of the Committee of the Economic Community of West African States on 11 November 1997. It expresses its readiness to consider how it can support the implementation of the peace plan, and looks forward to early recommendations from the Secretary-General on the role the United Nations could play to that end.

The Council reiterates the need for the provision and distribution of humanitarian assistance in response to local needs, and calls upon the junta to ensure its safe delivery to its intended recipients. It urges all States and relevant international organizations to continue to assist those countries dealing with the influx of refugees caused by the crisis in Sierra Leone.

The Council reminds all States of their obligation to comply strictly with the embargo on the sale or supply of petroleum and petroleum products and arms and related materiel of all types to Sierra Leone, and with the other measures imposed by its resolution 1132 (1997).

Decision of 26 February 1998 (3857th meeting):
statement by the President

On 26 February 1998, the Security Council held its 3857th meeting in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations. The President (Gabon), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Sierra Leone, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁶

The Security Council recalls its resolution 1132 (1997) of 8 October 1997, and the statements by its President of 27 May, 11 July and 6 August 1997, following the military coup d'état in Sierra Leone on 25 May 1997. It expresses its deep regret at the violence, loss of life and property and immense suffering undergone by the people of Sierra Leone since the coup. It remains gravely concerned at the continued violence in the country and calls for an urgent end to the fighting.

The Council welcomes the fact that the rule of the military junta has been brought to an end, and stresses the imperative need for the immediate restoration of the democratically elected Government of President Ahmad Tejan Kabbah and a return to constitutional order, in accordance with paragraph 1 of its resolution 1132 (1997).

The Council encourages the earliest possible return to Freetown by President Kabbah and looks forward to his re-establishing a functioning and autonomous government in the country.

The Council expresses its readiness to terminate the measures imposed by paragraphs 5 and 6 of its resolution 1132 (1997) as soon as the conditions referred to in paragraph 1 of that resolution have been fulfilled.

The Council commends the important role that the Economic Community of West African States has continued to play towards the peaceful resolution of this crisis. The Council encourages the Monitoring Group of the Economic Community of West African States to proceed in its efforts to foster peace and stability in Sierra Leone, in accordance with relevant provisions of the Charter of the United Nations. It underlines the need for close cooperation between the legitimate Government of Sierra Leone, the Economic Community of West African States, and in particular its Committee of Five Ministers for Foreign Affairs on Sierra Leone, the commanders of the Monitoring Group, the Special Envoy of the Secretary-General and his staff, United Nations agencies and relevant international organizations in their work, and specifically in the development of a plan for the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration into civilian life of all combatants in Sierra Leone. In this context, it supports the intention of the Secretary-General, subject to security conditions on the ground, to take rapid steps towards the reopening of the United Nations Liaison Office in Freetown in order to support the activities of his Special Envoy, and in particular to assist national reconciliation and political dialogue.

The Council expresses the view that the Conakry Agreement and the Abidjan Agreement provide important elements for a framework for peace, stability and national reconciliation in Sierra Leone. It calls upon all parties in Sierra Leone to work towards these objectives through peaceful means and political dialogue. In this regard, it condemns all reprisal killings and related violence in Sierra Leone and calls for an immediate end to such acts.

The Council looks forward to detailed proposals by the Secretary-General concerning the role of the United Nations and its future presence in Sierra Leone. It requests the Secretary-General to establish a trust fund to support such activities and calls upon all Member States to make early contributions to it.

²⁶ S/PRST/1998/5.

The Council welcomes the interim report of the inter-agency assessment mission to Sierra Leone of 10 February 1998 and commends those Member States and international organizations which have provided urgent humanitarian assistance to Sierra Leone. It remains deeply concerned about the serious and fragile humanitarian situation in the country, and calls upon all States and international organizations to provide further urgent assistance to Sierra Leone and neighbouring countries affected by the crisis. It calls upon the Monitoring Group and all those concerned to ensure safe and unrestricted access to those in need.

The Council expresses its concern about the safety of all humanitarian personnel in Sierra Leone and condemns the taking of hostages by former members of the deposed junta. It calls for the immediate release of all international personnel and others who have been detained or held hostage. It commends the Monitoring Group for its efforts to liberate those individuals being held against their will.

The Council will remain seized of this matter.

Decision of 16 March 1998 (3861st meeting):

By a letter dated 9 March 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁷ the representative of Sierra Leone requested a meeting of the Security Council to consider, following the ouster of the illegal military junta by forces of ECOMOG, the lifting of the sanctions imposed on the importation of petroleum and petroleum products into the country by paragraph 6 of Security Council resolution 1132 (1997).

At the 3861st meeting of the Council, held on 16 March 1998 in response to the request of the representative of Sierra Leone, the President (Gambia), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Sierra Leone to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Kenya and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.²⁸

At its 3872nd meeting, on 17 April 1998, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council resumed its consideration of the item entitled "The situation in Sierra Leone". The Council had before it the fourth report of the Secretary-General,²⁹ submitted pursuant to the presidential statement of 26 February 1998, in which the Council had requested the Secretary-General to submit detailed proposals concerning the role of the United Nations and its future presence in Sierra Leone.³⁰ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the removal of the military junta by the action of ECOMOG, which opened the way for the re-establishment not just of the legitimate Government but also of civil order, was a positive development. He commended the consistent diplomacy of ECOWAS and called on it to continue its efforts to bring peace to Sierra Leone. To take advantage of the changed situation, the Secretary-General proposed a comprehensive set of measures to assist the Government and people of Sierra Leone in both their immediate and longer-term needs, including the strengthening of the office of his Special Envoy in Freetown. In addition, he recommended the deployment mutilation, and slaughter. It calls for an immediate end to all violence against civilians. The Council, in this regard, expresses grave concern about reports of military support being provided to the rebels. It calls upon all States to observe strictly the provisions of resolution 1132 (1997) and to avoid any action that might further destabilize the situation in Sierra Leone.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:³²

The Council deplors the continued resistance to the authority of the legitimate Government of Sierra Leone and calls upon all rebels to cease their resistance, lay down their arms, and surrender to forces of the Monitoring Group of the Economic Community of West African States immediately. It again commends the Economic Community of West African States and the Monitoring Group for the important role they are playing to restore peace and security in Sierra Leone. The Council reiterates its call for States to provide technical and logistical support to assist the Monitoring Group to continue to enhance its ability to carry out its peacekeeping role and contribute to bringing an end to the atrocities being committed against the people of Sierra Leone.

The Council expresses deep concern for the plight of all those affected by the continuing insecurity, including the tens of thousands of refugees and displaced persons. It urges all those concerned to continue humanitarian assistance and underscores the importance of a comprehensive response by United Nations agencies in coordination with the Government of Sierra Leone and with the support of the Monitoring Group. The Council also recognizes the important role played by the international community, including the Organization of African Unity and relevant non-governmental organizations, to provide humanitarian assistance to civilians in dire need in Sierra Leone. The Council commends the Governments of neighbouring countries for their reception of refugees and calls upon all States and relevant international organizations to help them in responding to the refugee crisis.

The Council expresses concern for the safety of all humanitarian personnel working in Sierra Leone. It calls upon all parties concerned to facilitate the work of humanitarian agencies. The Council urges the parties to protect displaced persons seeking refuge, as well as United Nations and humanitarian aid workers.

The Council welcomes the efforts made by the democratically elected Government since its return on 10 March 1998 to restore peace and stability and to re-establish effective administration and the democratic process in Sierra Leone. It encourages the Economic Community of West African States to renew its political efforts to foster peace and stability and urges all parties in the country to embark on the tasks of national reconstruction, rehabilitation and reconciliation. The Council urges all parties concerned to respect fully international law, including human rights and humanitarian law.

The Council urges States and other parties concerned to contribute to the trust fund to support peacekeeping and related activities in Sierra Leone, and to humanitarian assistance efforts.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to keep it advised on the situation in Sierra Leone.

The Council will remain seized of this matter.

Decision of 5 June 1998 (3889th meeting):
resolution 1171 (1998)

At the 3889th meeting of the Security Council, held on 5 June 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Portugal), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Sierra Leone, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.³³ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1171 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 1132 (1997) of 8 October 1997, 1156 (1998) of 16 March 1998 and 1162 (1998) of 17 April 1998 and the statements by its President of 26 February and 20 May 1998,

Welcoming the efforts of the Government of Sierra Leone to restore peaceful and secure conditions in the country, to re-establish effective administration and the democratic process, and to promote national reconciliation,

Deploring the continued resistance to the authority of the legitimate Government of Sierra Leone, and stressing the urgency for all rebels to put an end to the atrocities, cease their resistance and lay down their arms,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides to terminate the remaining prohibitions imposed by paragraphs 5 and 6 of resolution 1132 (1997);

2. Also decides, with a view to prohibiting the sale and supply of arms and related materiel to non-governmental forces in Sierra Leone, that all States shall prevent the sale or supply, by their nationals or from their territories, or using their flag vessels or aircraft, of arms and related materiel of all types, including weapons and ammunition, military vehicles and equipment, paramilitary equipment and spare parts for the aforementioned, to Sierra Leone other than to the Government of Sierra Leone through named points of entry on a list to be supplied by that Government to the Secretary-General, who shall promptly notify all States Members of the United Nations of the list;

³³ S/1998/466.

3. Further decides that the restrictions referred to in paragraph 2 above shall not apply to the sale or supply of arms and related materiel for the sole use in Sierra Leone of the Monitoring Group of the Economic Community of West African States or the United Nations;

4. Decides that States shall notify all exports from their territories of arms or related materiel to Sierra Leone to the Committee established by resolution 1132 (1997), that the Government of Sierra Leone shall mark, register and notify to the Committee all imports made by it of arms and related materiel, and that the Committee shall report regularly to the Council on notifications so received;

5. Also decides that all States shall prevent the entry into or transit through their territories of leading members of the former military junta and of the Revolutionary United Front, as designated by the Committee established by resolution 1132 (1997), provided that the entry into or transit through a particular State of any such person may be authorized by the same Committee, and provided that nothing in the present paragraph shall oblige a State to refuse its own nationals entry to its territory;

6. Further decides that the Committee established by resolution 1132 (1997) shall continue to undertake the tasks referred to in subparagraphs 10 (a), (b), (c), (d), (f) and (h) of paragraph 10 of that resolution in relation to paragraphs 2 and 5 above;

7. Expresses its readiness to terminate the measures referred to in paragraphs 2, 4 and 5 above once the control of the Government of Sierra Leone has been fully re-established over all its territory, and when all non-governmental forces have been disarmed and demobilized;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council within three months of the date of adoption of the present resolution, and again within six months, regarding, in particular, the export of arms and related materiel referred to in paragraph 2 above, and on progress made towards the objectives referred to in paragraph 7 above;

9. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 13 July 1998 (3902nd meeting):
resolution 1181 (1998)

At its 3902nd meeting on 13 July 1998, the Security Council, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, resumed its consideration of the item entitled "The situation in Sierra Leone". The Council had before it the fifth report of the Secretary-General, dated 9 June 1998.³⁴ In his report, submitted in accordance with the time frame set out in paragraph 16 of resolution 1132 (1997) of 8 October 1997, the Secretary-General observed that the situation in Sierra Leone had, in some respects, improved considerably; however, in the eastern part of Sierra Leone and in parts of the north, the remnants of the former junta continued to resist ECOMOG forces and attack Sierra Leonean civilians. He recommended that the Security Council establish an observer mission in Sierra Leone to be known as the United Nations Observer Mission in Sierra Leone (UNOMSIL). He also supported the recommendation of his Special Representative for Children in Armed Conflict that Sierra Leone be made one of the pilot projects for a more concerted and effective response in the context of post-conflict peacebuilding.

At the same meeting, the President (Russian Federation), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Austria, Nigeria and Sierra Leone, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President also drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.³⁵

At the same meeting, speaking on behalf of the European Union and the associated and aligned countries,³⁶ the representative of Austria welcomed the decision of the Council to establish UNOMSIL and agreed that through the deployment of military observers, civilian police staff and human rights officers a much needed impetus could be lent to the vital but still fragile peace and reconciliation process in Sierra Leone. He also welcomed the efforts of the Government of Sierra Leone to establish a national commission for reconstruction, resettlement and rehabilitation. He encouraged ECOMOG to proceed in its efforts to foster peace and stability in Sierra Leone and to cooperate closely with UNOMSIL. It was the European Union's view that successful national reconstruction and rehabilitation had to be accompanied by regional cooperation. The European Union welcomed the efforts of regional leaders to promote mutual cooperation in the subregion and, particularly, relations between Liberia and Sierra Leone. He maintained that the European Union as the principal donor would continue to provide humanitarian assistance to Sierra Leone and would also provide assistance to Sierra Leonean refugees in Guinea. The European Union welcomed the intention of the

Secretary-General to convene a special conference to mobilize international assistance for the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration process and for the reconstruction and rehabilitation of Sierra Leone.³⁷

The representative of the United Kingdom welcomed the Secretary-General's initiative to hold a high-level special political conference on Sierra Leone to help mobilize support for ECOMOG and the Government of Sierra Leone and urged the States Members of the United Nations to contribute to the Trust Fund. He stressed that the intervention of ECOMOG, the creation of the national disarmament and demobilization plan and the forthcoming deployment of UNOMSIL had created the conditions for a decisive change in Sierra Leone.³⁸

The representative of Nigeria stated that the adoption of a draft resolution creating UNOMSIL would be a milestone in the constructive relationship between the United Nations and ECOWAS in the efforts to restore peace and security to Sierra Leone. He maintained that it was important to emphasize that the success of UNOMSIL would depend to a large extent on continued close cooperation and mutual support between UNOMSIL and ECOMOG, and that such cooperation and support would encourage greater and successful collaboration not only between the United Nations and ECOWAS but also between the United Nations and other regional bodies.³⁹

The representative of Japan maintained that his country's support for the draft resolution was based on its understanding that the role of UNOMSIL was to monitor the disarmament and demobilization process on behalf of the Government of Sierra Leone and ECOMOG, as well as to provide the necessary support for the maintenance of peace and security in the region, and that UNOMSIL would build upon the work of the Special Envoy, and in coordination with ECOMOG would provide the effective means of fostering the normalization of the situation in that country. Japan also welcomed the deployment of ECOMOG to monitor the border area between Liberia and Sierra Leone.⁴⁰

The representative of France, while maintaining that the presence of UNOMSIL would help to stabilize the situation in Sierra Leone, underlined that UNOMSIL was an interesting, promising and potentially fruitful experiment in coordination between a regional operation — that of ECOMOG on behalf of ECOWAS — and a United Nations operation. The success of UNOMSIL would depend on tangible cooperation between the two missions along the desired lines between the United Nations and the regional organizations.⁴¹

The representative of the United States maintained that the relationship between ECOMOG and the United Nations observers would be cooperative, as it was in Liberia. He hoped that the Secretary-General would quickly conclude status mission agreements with the Government of Sierra Leone and ECOWAS and applauded the commitment of ECOMOG to partnership and protection of the United Nations Observer Mission in Sierra Leone. Commenting on the draft resolution, he said that it reinforced his delegation's serious concern at reports of cross-border arms flows and support to the rebels in Sierra Leone, and that it reiterated the arms embargo that the Council had authorized in October. The neighbouring States had responsibility for implementing that embargo. He stated further that although preventing cross-border arms flow was a worthy idea, the United States had reservations about the proposal for border monitors under the existing circumstances, since the unfortunate reality was that ECOMOG was already overstretched and did not have the capability to take on this responsibility. The priority was to channel additional support for ECOMOG into its central function of providing security in Sierra Leone rather than monitoring the border or providing security for other monitors. He also underlined that coordination and planning among a variety of agencies and entities was critical to the success of conflict resolution and peacebuilding efforts.⁴²

Several other speakers, while commending the efforts of the ECOWAS Monitoring Group (ECOMOG) to restore peace and security to Sierra-Leone, welcomed the decision to establish the United Nations Observer Mission in Sierra Leone (UNOMSIL) as an important contribution of the international community to the process of peace and reconciliation in Sierra Leone.⁴³

Deliberations of 18 December 1998 (3957th meeting)

On 16 December 1998, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1181 (1998), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the United Nations Observer Mission in Sierra Leone.⁴⁴ In his report the Secretary-General observed that despite the progress made by the Government in consolidating its authority, he was disturbed at the continuing attacks inflicted by the rebels on civilians in the north. He stated that the elaboration of a dual-track approach to the resolution of the conflict following the ECOWAS summit of 31 October 1998 and the London meeting of the international contact group was a welcome development, and that UNOMSIL would work with the Government to pursue the approach. He called on the Government to explore ways to encourage more rebels to lay down their arms and surrender in order to avoid more bloodshed. He stated that clear evidence had emerged during the national consultative process that the people of Sierra Leone were willing to reconcile themselves with the rebels, on condition that they accept the authority of the Government, lay down their arms and surrender. He also noted that he was particularly encouraged by the outcome of the extraordinary summit meeting of the Mano River Union on 12 November 1998, at which the Presidents of Sierra Leone, Liberia and Guinea agreed to strengthen the Union and improve their mutual relations. The Secretary-General stressed that the importance of the subregional approach to the strengthening of stability and security could not be overemphasized. He concluded by saying that

UNOMSIL had proved its value to the Government and people of Sierra Leone and therefore he recommended that the mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission in Sierra Leone be extended for a further period of six months, until 13 July 1999. He also noted that he was planning a modest expansion of the civilian staff of UNOMSIL, to address the growing demands on the ground and to be able to assist the Government and people of Sierra Leone in their efforts.

At its 3957th meeting, held on 18 December 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Bahrain), with the consent of the Council, invited the Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations to participate in the discussion under rule 39 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure.

The Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations stated that, while the Government of Sierra Leone had continued to consolidate its political authority during the period under review, the military and security situation continued to be extremely volatile and unpredictable because of the persistent resistance of elements of the former military junta, which were especially active in the east and north of the country. He informed the Council that they were endeavouring to bring about the deployment of up to 70 military observers, as well as a 15-person medical unit, that the Council had authorized. However, since the security situation had not improved, and the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration programme had not progressed, only 40 military observers had been deployed to date. With regard to the humanitarian situation, he stated that the efforts of the humanitarian community to maintain access to populations in need, especially in the north and the east, had been disrupted further in the last few days by a spate of rebel attacks near Freetown, which had caused thousands of villagers to flee and had rendered the roads unsafe.⁴⁵

The representative of Sweden stated that in his capacity as Chairman of the Sierra Leone Sanctions Committee he had visited the area, to make clear that the Council was actively engaged in the implementation of sanctions and ensuring that they were enforced. Summarizing the situation in the country, he stated that Sierra Leone was still plagued by a civil war and the rebels had proved to be a very tough target. The acts of terror committed against civilians by the rebels in Sierra Leone were horrendous and the atrocities hard to describe. The humanitarian situation was also serious. He maintained that it was hard to see that any military solution could provide a lasting peace in Sierra Leone and that no effort ought to be spared to get the rebels to lay down their arms and surrender. He stressed the importance of the regional approach and of the relationship between Sierra Leone and Liberia. On the question of sanctions, he stated it was obvious they were not fully implemented and there were many reports of arms and ammunition getting through to the rebels from outside Sierra Leone, in contravention of the mandatory Security Council resolution. He stated that there was a strong perception in Sierra Leone that outside support was coming in from Liberia. The President of Liberia had stated that he could not dispute that some trafficking of arms had indeed come through Liberia, but he also stated that his Government had not been involved and also denied reports that the rebel leaders had been allowed to travel freely in his country. Referring to the proposal to set up a system of joint border controls between the two countries, the representative stated that it would be useful if the United Nations together with the international community were to consider supporting such joint operations. In conclusion, he reiterated that in the end it rested upon each and every State to do its utmost to ensure respect for United Nations sanctions.⁴⁶

The representative of France stated that although serious difficulties remained, with an impact on the humanitarian situation of the population, it was clear that the internal situation in Sierra Leone depended also on what took place at the regional level, so the Council should support anything that could be done to promote rapprochement among the three leaders and their countries. On the internal level, there was clearly only one solution: dialogue. The solution also needed to include support for regional initiatives, namely, for ECOWAS and ECOMOG. Finally, he stated that the Council needed to question itself about the effectiveness of its policy of embargo on the supply of arms to rebels in Sierra Leone, and whether it perhaps needed to be strengthened to promote an abatement of tension and an end to conflict in Sierra Leone.⁴⁷

The representative of Japan noted that there had been a request for the United Nations military observers to be deployed in assisting ECOMOG in patrolling the frontier. There had also been a proposal for cooperation between Liberia and Sierra Leone in joint border patrols. He questioned whether this would be viable and if it was worthwhile pursuing the expansion of the mandate and strength of UNOMSIL if necessary.⁴⁸

The representative of the United States inquired regarding the joint border monitoring mechanism proposal between Liberia and Sierra Leone, what practical steps might be taken or what role the Council or the Secretariat might play in trying to help the process along. Second, on the question of force protection of the United Nations personnel deployed there, he asked whether arrangements were still adequate for their protection or whether consideration was still being given to any redeployment of the personnel of UNOMSIL.⁴⁹

The representative of the United Kingdom maintained that his country had a very strong interest in remedying the situation. The people of Sierra Leone had to be protected, and although UNOMSIL was doing excellent work, there was a particular and urgent need for the international community to give greater support to ECOWAS, in particular to enable further troops to be sent there to join those troops already in the field.⁵⁰

The representative of China stressed that he was deeply disturbed by continuing reports that large amounts of arms had been flowing illegally from Liberia into rebel hands in Sierra Leone. The Security Council needed to attach great importance to that, since it not only violated the provisions of the relevant Security Council resolutions, but had also caused harm to large numbers of innocent civilians. He proposed that the Security Council Sanctions Committees on Sierra Leone and Liberia carry out the necessary investigation and propose measures for improving the effectiveness of the implementation of the arms embargo. He expressed the hope that the two Sanctions Committees could strengthen their coordination and exchanges in order to strengthen the implementation of the relevant Security Council resolutions.⁵¹

Several other speakers stressed the need to support the work of UNOMSIL and ECOWAS, and expressed concern over the humanitarian situation. A number of speakers also stressed the importance of strictly enforcing the sanctions.⁵²

The representative of Sweden responded to questions on the proposal for joint border surveillance between Sierra Leone and Liberia and possible assistance in that endeavour by the United Nations, stating that the proposal still had to be elaborated by the two countries and suggested that the Secretariat follow up on the discussions. However, any positioning of United Nations observers in the border zone would require that necessary security assurances be obtained, as there was at that time not enough security.⁵³

The Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations also responded to the question on border monitoring and stressed that it was essentially a question of security. He stated that there was a role for the Sierra Leonean authorities and ECOMOG, but taking into account the difficulties and the means at the disposal of ECOMOG, it was clear that they did not have the capacity to deploy their troops along the border. With regard to measures taken to guarantee the safety of observers, he stressed that the security situation was being continuously reviewed at each of the sites where observers were deployed.⁵⁴

The Security Council expresses its grave concern at the attacks by armed rebels of the former junta and the Revolutionary United Front in the capital of Sierra Leone and at the resulting suffering and loss of life. It condemns the unacceptable attempt by the rebels to overthrow by violence the democratically elected Government of Sierra Leone. The Council also condemns the continued campaign by the rebels to terrorize the population of Sierra Leone and, especially, the atrocities committed against women and children. The Council demands that the rebels lay down their arms immediately and cease all violence. The Council reiterates once more its firm support for the legitimate and democratically elected Government of President Ahmad Tejan Kabbah.

The Council strongly condemns all those who have afforded support, including through the supply of arms and mercenaries, to the rebels in Sierra Leone. In this context, it expresses its grave concern at reports that such support to the rebels is being afforded in particular from the territory of Liberia. It reaffirms the obligation of all Member States to comply strictly with existing arms embargoes. In that context, the Council urges the Committee established pursuant to resolution 985 (1995) and the Committee established pursuant to resolution 1132 (1997) to pursue active measures to investigate violations of the embargoes and to report to the Council, with recommendations as appropriate.

The Council stresses the importance of dialogue and national reconciliation for the restoration of lasting peace and stability to Sierra Leone. The Council welcomes the efforts to resolve the conflict being undertaken by the Government of President Kabbah, and further endorses the approach set out in the final communiqué of the meeting of the Committee of Six on Sierra Leone of the Economic Community of West African States, held in Abidjan on 28 December 1998. It welcomes the offers made by leaders in the region aimed at resolving the conflict and, in that context, urges them, including the Committee of Six, to facilitate the peace process. It also calls upon the Secretary-General to do all he can to assist in these efforts, including through his Special Representative.

The Council also expresses its concern at the serious humanitarian consequences of the escalating fighting in Sierra Leone. It calls upon all States and international organizations to provide appropriate humanitarian assistance and upon all parties in Sierra Leone to afford humanitarian access. The Council notes that United Nations agencies are working with the increasing numbers of refugees in neighbouring countries and calls upon all States to ensure that the humanitarian agencies are adequately resourced to meet the additional demand.

The Council commends the forces of the Monitoring Group of the Economic Community of West African States in Sierra Leone for the courage and determination they have demonstrated over the last year in their efforts to maintain security in Sierra Leone. It also commends the key contribution of the United Nations Observer Mission in Sierra Leone and the Special Representative of the Secretary-General in efforts to restore stability in the country. The Council urges all States urgently to provide resources, including logistical and other support, to help to maintain an effective peacekeeping presence in Sierra Leone.

The Council expresses its intention to continue to monitor the situation closely and to consider urgently any further action which may be necessary.

Decision of 12 January 1999 (3964th meeting): resolution 1220 (1999)

On 16 December 1998, pursuant to paragraph 19 of resolution 1181 (1998), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council his third progress report on the United Nations Observer Mission in Sierra Leone.⁵⁶ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that, despite the progress made by the Sierra Leonean Government in consolidating its authority, the continuing attacks inflicted by the rebels on civilians and the atrocities and abductions that accompanied such attacks were disturbing. However, the elaboration of a dual-track approach to the resolution of the conflict following the ECOWAS summit of 31 October 1998 and the London meeting of the International Contact Group of 5 November was a welcome development, and UNOMSIL would work with the Government to pursue this approach. He was encouraged by the outcome of the extraordinary summit meeting of the Mano River Union on 12 November 1998, at which the Presidents of Sierra Leone, Liberia and Guinea agreed to continue to strengthen the Union and improve their mutual relations, and that the importance of the subregional approach to the strengthening of stability and security in all three countries could not be overemphasized. As UNOMSIL had proved its value to the Government and people of Sierra Leone in restoring order and peace in the country, the Secretary-General recommended to the Council that the mandate of UNOMSIL be extended for a further period of six months until 13 July 1999. He further observed that the uncertain security situation in parts of the country and the delays to which the Government's disarmament, demobilization and reintegration programme had consequently been subjected made it premature at that stage to proceed with further deployments of United Nations military observers, as authorized by resolution 1181 (1998).

On 7 January 1999, pursuant to resolution 1181 (1998) and in view of the serious developments in Sierra Leone since his third progress report, the Secretary-

⁵⁶ S/1998/1176.

General decided to submit to the Council a special report on the United Nations Observer Mission in Sierra Leone.⁵⁷ In his report, the Secretary-General deplored the intensification of hostilities and the rebel attacks on Freetown. The ECOWAS Committee of Six on Sierra Leone had shown commendable initiative and resolve. He endorsed its conclusions and urged ECOWAS to meet at the summit level to consider ways of dealing with the situation. He stated that ECOWAS and ECOMOG should not bear the burden alone. He commended the Governments of the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States for their past and continuing efforts to ensure the provision of the necessary logistical support to ECOMOG, and encouraged Member States to be prepared to make further contributions to the peace process as might be required. He recommended that the mandate of UNOMSIL be extended for a two-month period until 13 March 1999.

[At its 3964th meeting, held on 12 January 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the Secretary-General's reports in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Brazil), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Sierra Leone and Togo, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁵⁸ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1220 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 1181 (1998) of 13 July 1998, and the statement by its President of 7 January 1999,

Expressing its deep concern over the recent deterioration of the situation in Sierra Leone, and encouraging all efforts aimed at resolving the conflict and restoring lasting peace and stability,

Having considered the third progress report of the Secretary-General of 16 December 1998 on the United Nations Observer Mission in Sierra Leone and his special report on the Mission of 7 January 1999, and noting the recommendations contained therein,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission in Sierra Leone until 13 March 1999;

2. Takes note of the intention of the Secretary-General, as expressed in paragraph 37 of his special report, to reduce the number of military observers in the Mission and to retain in Conakry a small number who would return to Sierra Leone when conditions permit, together with the necessary civilian substantive and logistical support staff under the leadership of his Special Representative;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council closely informed on the situation in Sierra Leone and to submit a further report to the Council with recommendations on the future deployment of the Mission and on the implementation of its mandate by 5 March 1999;

4. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 11 March 1999 (3986th meeting): resolution 1231 (1999)

On 4 March 1999, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1220 (1999), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his fifth report on the United Nations Observer Mission in Sierra Leone.⁵⁹

At the 3986th meeting of the Security Council, held on 11 March 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General's report in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (China) invited the representative of Sierra Leone, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁶⁰

In his statement to the Council, the representative of Sierra Leone acknowledged the special role that the Government of Nigeria had continued to play in peacekeeping and in the maintenance of international peace and security, not only in their subregion but in Africa at large. He maintained that his Government had made enough serious efforts to hold a dialogue with the rebels, but the insincerity of the rebels in advancing the peace process was clearly evident by their continued atrocities. He called on the Council to put pressure on the rebels to be serious about talking peace.⁶¹

The representative of the United Kingdom maintained that for ordinary people ECOMOG was the sole means of protection from rebel atrocities and presented the only hope in the short term of bringing peace and security to Sierra Leone. He urged the need for continued international financial and logistical support for ECOMOG. He stated further that the stabilization of Sierra Leone also depended on continuing international pressure on those providing support to the rebels. In this regard, much of the Council's attention had rightly focused on support coming from Liberia and through the involvement of Liberian nationals. Referring to the draft resolution and the report, which highlighted the need to help Sierra Leone ensure its own security when ECOMOG left, he maintained that it was the only way the country could look forward to lasting peace and stability.⁶²

Several other speakers also expressed support for the draft resolution, stating that it would enable UNOMSIL to continue to play its key role in the peace process in tandem with the efforts of the ECOWAS to restore peace and security in Sierra Leone.⁶³

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was adopted unanimously as resolution 1231 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 1181 (1998) of 13 July 1998 and 1220 (1999) of 12 January 1999 and the statement by its President of 7 January 1999,

Expressing its continued concern over the fragile situation in Sierra Leone,

Affirming the commitment of all States to respect the sovereignty, political independence and territorial integrity of Sierra Leone,

Having considered the fifth report of the Secretary-General of 4 March 1999 on the United Nations Observer Mission in Sierra Leone, and noting the recommendations contained therein,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission in Sierra Leone until 13 June 1999;

2. Welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to re-establish the Mission in Freetown as soon as possible and, to that end, to increase the current number of military observers and human rights personnel as referred to in paragraphs 46 and 54 of his report and to redeploy the necessary staff to support the relocation to Freetown, subject to strict attention to the security situation there;

3. Condemns the atrocities perpetrated by the rebels on the civilian population of Sierra Leone, including, in particular, those committed against women and children, deplores all violations of human rights and international humanitarian law which have occurred in Sierra Leone during the recent escalation of violence as referred to in paragraphs 21 to 28 of the report of the Secretary-General, including the recruitment of children as soldiers, and urges the appropriate authorities to investigate all allegations of such violations with a view to bringing the perpetrators to justice;

4. Calls upon all parties to the conflict in Sierra Leone fully to respect human rights and international humanitarian law and the neutrality and impartiality of humanitarian workers, and to ensure full and unhindered access for humanitarian assistance to affected populations;

5. Expresses its grave concern at continued reports that support is being afforded to the rebels in Sierra Leone, including through the supply of arms and mercenaries, in particular from the territory of Liberia;

6. Acknowledges the letter dated 23 February 1999 from the President of Liberia to the Secretary-General and the statement by the Government of Liberia of 19 February 1999 on the action it is taking to curtail the involvement of Liberian nationals in the fighting in Sierra Leone, including measures to encourage the return of Liberian fighters and directives to the Liberian national security agencies to ensure that no cross-border movement of arms takes place and that there is no trans-shipment of arms and ammunition through Liberian territory, and requests the Secretary-General to continue to consider, in coordination with the countries of the Mano River Union and other States members of the Economic Community of West African States, the practicability and effectiveness of the deployment of United Nations monitors along with forces of the Monitoring Group of the Economic Community of West African States at the Liberia/Sierra Leone border;

7. Reaffirms the obligation of all States to comply strictly with the provisions of the embargo on the sale or supply of arms and related materiel imposed by its resolution 1171 (1998) of 5 June 1998;

8. Expresses its intention to keep the issue of external support to the rebels in Sierra Leone under close review and to consider further steps to address this in the light of developments on the ground;

9. Expresses its support for all efforts, in particular by States members of the Economic Community of West African States, aimed at peacefully resolving the conflict and restoring lasting peace and stability to Sierra Leone, encourages the Secretary-General, through his Special Representative for Sierra Leone, to facilitate dialogue to these ends, welcomes the statement by the President of Sierra Leone of 7 February 1999 expressing the readiness of his Government to continue its efforts for dialogue with the rebels, and calls upon all parties involved, especially the rebels, to participate seriously in those efforts;

10. Commends the efforts of the Monitoring Group towards the restoration of peace, security and stability in Sierra Leone, and calls upon all Member States to provide the Monitoring Group with financial and logistical support and to consider the provision of prompt bilateral assistance to the Government of Sierra Leone in the creation of a new Sierra Leonean army to defend the country;

Decision of 15 May 1999 (4005th meeting):
statement by the President

At the 4005th meeting of the Security Council, held on 15 May 1999, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Gabon), with the consent of the Council invited the representative of Sierra Leone, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶⁴

The Security Council stresses that an overall political settlement and national reconciliation are essential to achieving the peaceful resolution of the conflict in Sierra Leone. In this context, it welcomes the recent holding of internal talks by a rebel delegation in Lomé, and urges the Government of Sierra Leone and rebel representatives to ensure that there are no further obstacles to a start of direct talks without delay.

The Council calls upon all concerned to remain committed to the process of negotiation and to demonstrate flexibility in their approach to the process. In this context, the Council underlines its strong support for the mediation efforts of the United Nations within the Lomé process, in particular the work of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General to facilitate dialogue, and for the key role being played by the President of Togo.

The Council commends, once again, the continued efforts of the Government of Sierra Leone and the Monitoring Group of the Economic Community of West African States towards the restoration of peace, security and stability in Sierra Leone, and calls for sustained support for the Monitoring Group from the international community.

The Council condemns the recent killings, atrocities, destruction of property and other violations of human rights and international humanitarian law perpetrated on civilians by the rebels in recent attacks, in particular at Masiaka and Port Loko. It calls upon the rebels to cease such actions immediately and urges the rebel leadership to release all hostages and abductees without delay.

The Council urges both parties to commit themselves to a cessation of hostilities for the duration of the Lomé talks, to ensure that this is fully respected on the ground and to work constructively and in good faith for a ceasefire agreement. It calls upon both sides to refrain from any hostile or aggressive act which could undermine the talks process.

The Council welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to increase, as security conditions permit, the presence on the ground of the United Nations Observer Mission in Sierra Leone within currently authorized levels, in anticipation of a cessation of hostilities. The Council also welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to send an assessment team to Sierra Leone to examine how an expanded Mission with a revised mandate and concept of operations might contribute to the implementation of a ceasefire and peace agreement in the event of a successful outcome to the negotiations between the Government of Sierra Leone and the rebels, and expresses its readiness to consider recommendations from the Secretary-General to that end.

The Council stresses, however, that it will be prepared to consider deploying monitors throughout Sierra Leone only when a credible ceasefire is in place and is being respected by all sides and there is a commitment by all parties to a framework peace agreement.

The Council underlines the importance, in the context of a lasting solution to the conflict in Sierra Leone, of a plan for the internationally supervised disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of ex-combatants, including child soldiers. It also draws attention to the need for the secure and timely disposal of collected arms, in accordance with any peace agreement reached.

The Council reaffirms the obligation of all States to comply strictly with the provisions of the embargo on the sale or supply of arms and related materiel imposed by its resolution 1171 (1998) of 5 June 1998.

The Council reiterates its grave concern at the humanitarian situation in Sierra Leone and urges all parties, in particular the rebel leadership, to guarantee safe and unhindered humanitarian access to all those in need.

The Council reiterates that a peaceful and lasting solution to the conflict in Sierra Leone remains the responsibility of the Government and people of Sierra Leone, but again emphasizes the strong commitment of the international community to support a sustainable peace settlement.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 11 June 1999 (4012th meeting),
resolution 1245 (1999)

On 4 June 1999, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1231 (1999), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his sixth report on the United Nations Observer Mission in Sierra Leone.⁶⁵ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that, despite the continued unpredictability of the conflict situation in Sierra Leone, he was encouraged by the significant progress that had been made in pursuit of a dialogue between the government of Sierra Leone and the Revolutionary United Front (RUF). He maintained, however, that the political developments, including the signing of a ceasefire agreement and the start of the dialogue, had significant implications for the work of UNOMSIL. It was critical that the Mission, under the leadership of his Special Representative, should remain in a position to render effective assistance to the peace process in Sierra Leone. He therefore recommended the extension of the Mission's mandate for a period of six months, until 13 December 1999.

At its 4012th meeting held on 11 June 1999, the Security Council, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, included the Secretary-General's report in its agenda.⁶⁶

At the same meeting, the President (Gambia), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Sierra Leone, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

Also at the same meeting, the President drew attention to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁶⁵ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1245 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 1181 (1998) of 13 July 1998, 1220 (1999) of 12 January 1999 and 1231 (1999) of 11 March 1999 and the statements by its President of 7 January and 15 May 1999,

Acknowledging the cooperation provided by the Economic Community of West African States and its Monitoring Group,

Expressing its continued concern over the fragile situation in Sierra Leone,

Affirming the commitment of all States to respect the sovereignty, political independence and territorial integrity of Sierra Leone,

Having considered the sixth report of the Secretary-General of 4 June 1999 on the United Nations Observer Mission in Sierra Leone, and noting the recommendations contained therein,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission in Sierra Leone until 13 December 1999;

2. Stresses that an overall political settlement and national reconciliation are essential to achieving a peaceful resolution of the conflict in Sierra Leone, and welcomes the holding of talks in Lomé between the Government of Sierra Leone and rebel representatives;

3. Calls upon all concerned to remain committed to the process of negotiation and to demonstrate flexibility in their approach to the process, underlines its strong support for all those involved in the mediation efforts of the United Nations within the Lomé process, in particular the Special Representative of the Secretary-General in his work to facilitate dialogue, and for the key role being played by the President of Togo as current Chairman of the Economic Community of West African States, and emphasizes the strong commitment of the international community to support a sustainable peace settlement;

4. Takes note of the intention of the Secretary-General, as expressed in paragraphs 52 to 57 of his report, to revert to the Council with recommendations on an expanded Mission presence in Sierra Leone with a revised mandate and concept of operations in the event of a successful outcome to the negotiations between the Government of Sierra Leone and rebel representatives in Lomé, and underlines the fact that further eventual deployment of the Mission should be considered, taking into account security conditions;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council closely informed on the situation in Sierra Leone;

6. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 20 August 1999 (4035th meeting):
resolution 1260 (1999)

On 30 July 1999, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council his seventh report on the United Nations Observer Mission in Sierra Leone.⁶⁷ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the signing of the Lomé Peace Agreement between the Government of Sierra Leone and the Revolutionary United Front was a great step forward for Sierra Leone, and he congratulated both sides for showing the flexibility that had made the agreement possible. The Secretary-General also credited the international community, in particular ECOWAS, for their leadership in bringing both sides together and facilitating the conclusion of the agreement. He cautioned, however, that the challenges ahead were daunting. Among those were the disarmament and demobilization of combatants, their reintegration into society, the restoration of State authorities and the necessity to address the humanitarian needs. He stressed that strict compliance with the terms of the agreement by both sides was indispensable and that the international community and the United Nations had an important responsibility to assist Sierra Leone and to ensure that momentum was maintained in the process, especially in the critical phase immediately after the signing of the peace agreement. The Secretary-General therefore recommended that the Security Council approve, as an immediate first step, the provisional expansion of the United Nations Observer Mission in Sierra Leone.

At the 4035th meeting of the Security Council, held on 20 August 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the Secretary-General's report in its agenda. At the same meeting, the President (Namibia) then invited the representative of Sierra Leone, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁶⁸

The representative of Sierra Leone informed the Council that after lengthy and often painful discussions in Lomé with the Revolutionary United Front, the Government of Sierra Leone had signed a comprehensive Peace Agreement with RUF on 7 July 1999. He expressed his delegation's gratitude to the Security Council for recognizing and commending, in the draft resolution before it, the courageous efforts of the Government of Sierra Leone to achieve peace. He maintained that the security and safety of the people of

Sierra Leone were vital and that the Peace Agreement signed in Lomé would remain fragile until the disarming of the combatants was successful. With regard to the ongoing consultations on the revised mandates of ECOMOG and UNOMSIL, he stated that there was a need to maintain the critical presence of ECOMOG in the country, which had executed a similar disarmament process in Liberia, which was familiar with the terrain as well as the operational tactics of the combatants in Sierra Leone, and which had performed the equally important job of retrieving hidden weapons. The Government of Sierra Leone therefore wholeheartedly welcomed the various provisions in the draft resolution concerning the need for international assistance in support of ECOMOG, the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration programme, humanitarian relief and long-term reconstruction, economic and social recovery and development.⁶⁹

The representative of the United Kingdom, while paying tribute to the Government of Sierra Leone and all those who had striven to bring about peace, particularly the role played by ECOMOG, maintained that Sierra Leone needed a coordinated and sustained effort by the international community to secure lasting peace. The United Kingdom viewed the draft resolution as a sign of the United Nations determination to support the implementation of the Lomé Agreement. Although the Lomé Agreement was not perfect, as it included a blanket amnesty for those who had committed atrocities, it was one of the hard choices that the Government of Sierra Leone had to make. Welcoming the steps that the Government of Sierra Leone had already taken, he stressed the need to immediately start the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration programme. He urged the Council to establish a full United Nations peacekeeping operation to assist in the implementation of the Peace Agreement and to help create a climate of confidence and he hoped that the United Nations and ECOMOG would soon agree on their respective areas of responsibility under the new peacekeeping regime.⁷⁰

The representative of the United States maintained that his country remained steadfast in its support for the Lomé Agreement and was ready to assist in its implementation. It also remained committed to supporting the efforts of the Military Observer Group of ECOWAS (ECOMOG) in implementing the Lomé

Agreement. Nevertheless, while the United States fully supported the Lomé Agreement, it was concerned by the Agreement's provisions of amnesty and was therefore eager to see the early establishment of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, as called for by the Agreement. The United States also remained open to the possible establishment of an objective international fact-finding mission to document evidence of atrocities and provide information to the Truth and Reconciliation Commission as a basis for its work. The United States also supported the deployment of additional United Nations military observers, medical personnel and other support staff to help implement the Lomé Agreement in Sierra Leone.⁷¹

Several other speakers also stressed the progress made by the Government of Sierra Leone and RUF towards the full implementation of the Peace Agreement, and commended the tireless efforts of ECOWAS and ECOMOG in helping restore peace and stability in the country. All of them supported the Secretary-General's recommendation to authorize a provisional increase in the number of UNOMSIL military observers. All speakers reiterated that the international community and the United Nations had an important responsibility to assist Sierra Leone and to ensure that momentum was maintained in the peace process. Some speakers stated that the peace in Sierra Leone was still fragile and therefore it was absolutely essential for the parties to do everything to consolidate the gains made. This also applied primarily to the representatives of the belligerent forces in Sierra Leone to abide by the Peace Agreement. The speakers reiterated that a great deal also depended on neighbouring countries and regional organizations and on the atmosphere in which peacebuilding in Sierra Leone would take place.⁷²

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1260 (1999), which reads:

Decision of 22 October 1999 (4054th meeting):
resolution 1270 (1999)

On 23 September 1999, pursuant to the Security Council's request for recommendations for the mandate and structure of an enhanced United Nations peacekeeping presence that might be required in the country, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his eighth report on the United Nations Observer Mission in Sierra Leone.⁷³ In that report, he observed that although with the signing of the Lomé Peace

⁷³ S/1999/1003.

Agreement, Sierra Leone had been able to repair some of the damage caused by the long conflict and get back on the road to peace and prosperity, it was in urgent need of security. Without security it would not be possible to carry out the programme of disarming and demobilizing approximately 45,000 ex-combatants, many of them children, and thus removing a threat to the stability of the State. He underscored that the United Nations could play its part in bolstering security in Sierra Leone by the swift deployment of a robust peacekeeping force. Such a force, which was called for by the Lomé Peace Agreement, would supplement the commendable efforts made over the past two and a half years by ECOMOG and would incorporate a substantial number of troops made available by ECOWAS countries. He further recommended that the Council authorize the deployment of the United Nations force, which, together with UNOMSIL military observers and civilian components, would be known as the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone (UNAMSIL). Since the international community would not be able to maintain a major military presence in Sierra Leone indefinitely, he urged that the Sierra Leone Government expedite the establishment and training of its national police and armed forces, without which it would not be possible to achieve long-term stability, national reconciliation and the reconstruction of the country.

At the same meeting, the President (Russian Federation), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Nigeria and Sierra Leone, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. In accordance with the understanding reached in the Council's prior consultations, the President also extended an invitation under rule 39 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure to Olara Otunnu, Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Children in Armed Conflict.

At the 4054th meeting of the Security Council, held on 22 October 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General's report in its agenda.

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁷⁴

⁷⁴ S/1999/1069.

At the same meeting, the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Children in Armed Conflict stated that in view of what he had witnessed on the ground in Sierra Leone and the discussions he had held with national leaders, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations, he proposed a special 15-point agenda for action for the children of Sierra Leone, which puts forward several measures and initiatives. Among the principal elements was an urgent need to establish a national commission for children to ensure that their protection and welfare would be the central concern in the aftermath of the war. He advocated incorporating child protection into the mandate and operations of UNAMSIL and stressed that the demobilization and integration of children should be given special attention. He further stated that since a number of cross-border issues, including small arms flow, refugee movements, cross-border recruitment of child soldiers, and family tracing and reunification, all had an impact on the protection and rights of children within Sierra Leone, a neighbourhood initiative for the subregion comprising Guinea, Liberia and Sierra Leone, had been proposed.⁷⁵

The representative of Sierra Leone stated that the adoption of the draft resolution before the Council approving the establishment and deployment of a full-fledged United Nations peacekeeping operation in Sierra Leone, while bringing some relief to its people, would also provide an additional and more durable security blanket for all Sierra Leoneans. Furthermore, while appreciating the role UNOMSIL had played in the peace process, he noted that it had not been equipped to deal with certain situations, before and after the Lomé Peace Agreement had been signed between his country's Government and the Revolutionary United Front. His delegation wished to highlight paragraph 14 of the draft resolution, according to which the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, would authorize the new United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone, in the discharge of its mandate, to take the necessary action to ensure the security and freedom of movement of its personnel and to afford protection to civilians under imminent threat of physical violence. He maintained that his delegation regarded the interpretation of this paragraph as an insurance policy for both international peacekeepers and innocent civilians. In connection with the second aspect of the draft resolution, he stated that it underscored the efficacy of practical cooperation between the United Nations and African regional or subregional organizations in peacekeeping activities. Maintaining that the continued presence of ECOMOG in Sierra Leone was crucial for the successful implementation of the Lomé Peace Agreement and the consolidation of peace in Sierra Leone, he appealed to the Council to do everything in its power to ensure that ECOMOG remained in Sierra Leone for the time being.⁷⁶

The representative of Nigeria stated that the draft resolution establishing UNAMSIL would be a landmark development in the search for a durable peace in Sierra Leone that would have an impact on the United Nations, ECOWAS, Nigeria and Sierra Leone. He noted that for the United Nations the draft resolution was an opportunity to fulfil its primary responsibility of maintaining international peace and security. It also represented a concrete attempt to assist the West African subregion in resolving a local conflict. For Nigeria, he said, the creation of UNAMSIL not only vindicated its conviction that the Sierra Leone crisis was a threat to international peace and security but also relieved them of a disproportionate burden in human and material resources. He underlined the Nigerian efforts in Liberia and later, in Sierra Leone, bore testimony to their devotion to the cherished principles of good neighbourliness and international responsibility, in the conviction that no meaningful development could take place in the absence of peace and stability, and he stressed that Nigeria stood ready to play its part in UNAMSIL to facilitate the implementation of the Lomé Peace Agreement. Expressing Nigeria's support and commending UNAMSIL as representing a rare but desirable form of cooperation between the United Nations and a subregional organization in fulfilment of Chapter VIII of the Charter of the United Nations, his delegation hoped that the United Nations would continue to employ a similar approach with other regional and subregional organizations in the pursuit of international peace and security.⁷⁷

The representative of the United Kingdom maintained that the draft resolution which the Council was about to adopt was an important and significant milestone on the long and challenging road to lasting peace in Sierra Leone. With the establishment of UNAMSIL, the United Nations would be making a major contribution to ensuring that the Lomé Peace

Agreement could succeed. He stated that the situation in Sierra Leone was a test case and the establishment of UNAMSIL would provide a clear opportunity for the Security Council and the United Nations membership generally to demonstrate that their commitment to conflict resolution applied as much to Africa as to other trouble spots around the world. He stressed further that the success of UNAMSIL would depend significantly on joint deployment and close cooperation with ECOMOG. The readiness of ECOWAS to work in tandem with the United Nations in Sierra Leone was an important example for cooperation with regional peacekeeping efforts around the world. In conclusion, he stated that the United Kingdom was also working with the Government of Sierra Leone to restructure and train a new professional and democratically accountable Sierra Leone army and police force to protect the people of Sierra Leone and encourage long-term stability.⁷⁸

The representative of the United States stated that the resolution of the conflict in Sierra Leone was a high priority for his Government. The representative stated that his Government recognized the enormous contributions made by the Monitoring Group's West African peacekeepers, led by Nigeria and commended the readiness of ECOMOG to remain in the field and to proceed with disarmament and demobilization. Furthermore, his delegation also remained committed to justice and accountability and establishing a truth and reconciliation commission and a human rights commission as called for in the Lomé Peace Agreement. His delegation also supported an international fact-finding mission to assist the work and proceedings of the truth and reconciliation and human rights commissions.⁷⁹

The representative of Malaysia maintained that, given the fragile, even volatile, political and security situation in Sierra Leone, only a peacekeeping force of credible strength, well equipped and well mandated would be able successfully to carry out the tasks assigned to it, and for that reason his delegation had underlined the need for the establishment of UNAMSIL under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, consistent with the "robust rules of engagement" that the Secretary-General had proposed for UNAMSIL in paragraph 43 of his report of 23 September 1999. The hostage-taking incident involving personnel of

ECOWAS, ECOMOG and UNAMSIL in August 1999 had served to highlight this concern. His delegation could support the language in the draft resolution with respect to Chapter VII. He stated that since the success of UNAMSIL could well have a bearing on future peacekeeping missions that the United Nations was planning in respect to other conflict areas in Africa, it was important for UNAMSIL to be given the tools to ensure that it had a fair chance of carrying out its mission successfully. His delegation welcomed the continued presence of ECOMOG in Sierra Leone to continue to provide security in accordance with its mandate to ensure the implementation of the Peace Agreement.⁸⁰

The representative of France stated that, as the Council adopted a draft resolution relating to UNAMSIL and at the same time envisaged prolonging the mandate of the United Nations Mission in the Central African Republic, it could conclude that those new developments were an encouraging sign for the African continent, which would take note of the extent of the sincere receptiveness of the members of the Security Council to its aspirations. France believed that when there were serious prospects of resolving conflicts, the international community and above all the Security Council needed to stand side by side with the leaders and people of Africa to facilitate a peaceful solution. It hoped that the commitment being made to Sierra Leone in the very tangible form of a United Nations peacekeeping operation could be pursued in other regions of Africa, particularly in the Democratic Republic of the Congo.⁸¹

Several other speakers welcomed the draft resolution establishing UNAMSIL and stated that the Security Council in doing so was taking a decisive and necessary step in support of the Lomé Peace Agreement. They maintained that the situation in Sierra Leone remained volatile and that robust rules of engagement were indeed essential if UNAMSIL was to fulfil its mandate and protect itself and civilians under threat. They all paid tribute to ECOMOG for its continued efforts towards peace in Sierra Leone and also supported the continued close cooperation between ECOMOG and UNAMSIL.⁸²

The representative of Argentina referred in particular to paragraph 14 of the draft resolution, which authorized UNAMSIL to act under Chapter VII of the Charter towards two well-defined objectives: to ensure the security and freedom of movement of its personnel and to afford protection to civilians under imminent threat of physical violence. He stated that the safety and security of personnel in the field of operations had to be an essential condition of all peacekeeping missions. He also stated that since there could be no doubt that the personnel of UNAMSIL would be carrying out their duties in a hazardous environment, Argentina deemed it appropriate that the draft resolution reinforce the rules of engagement of UNAMSIL with the additional authority of Chapter VII. Similarly, the Convention on the Safety of United Nations and Associated Personnel provided the legal mechanisms required for the trial and punishment of those committing crimes against United Nations personnel and in that regard his delegation ventured once again to appeal to those States that had not yet done so to ratify that Convention. Argentina believed that the protection of civilians under Chapter VII was a pertinent development in the context of the mandate of a peacekeeping operation. The draft resolution before them was significant in that it introduced a new fundamental, political, legal and moral dimension which had a bearing on the credibility of the Security Council and showed that the Council had learned from its own experience and that it would not remain indifferent to indiscriminate attacks against the civilian population. Realistically the objective to be fulfilled needed to be consonant with the means provided, and for that reason Argentina agreed with the limits that operative paragraph 14 of the draft resolution set on the actions of UNAMSIL. It established an objective limit, the competence the Council wished to give UNAMSIL; a geographic limit, the Mission's area of deployment; and a functional limit, so that it did not overlap the specific security responsibilities entrusted to ECOMOG pursuant to the mandate adopted by ECOWAS on 25 August 1999.⁸³

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1270 (1999), which reads:

Recalling also the report of the Secretary-General of 8 September 1999 and its resolution 1265 (1999) of 17 September 1999 on the protection of civilians in armed conflict,

Deliberations of 10 December 1999
(4078th meeting)

On 6 December 1999, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1270 (1999), the Secretary-General submitted his first report on the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone.⁸⁴ In his report the Secretary-General observed that some progress had been made in the implementation of the Lomé Peace Agreement with the return of the Revolutionary United Front and the Armed Forces Revolutionary Council leadership to Sierra Leone, the establishment of the Government of National Unity, the provisional registration of RUF as a political party and an increase of the number of ex-combatants registering for the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration programme. However, the serious human rights abuses, ceasefire violations, including fighting between RUF and AFRC, extensive movement of troops and weapons by the former and the targeting of personnel gave cause for very serious concern. Commending ECOMOG for its continued efforts in support of the Government and the people of Sierra Leone, the Secretary-General emphasized the urgent need to strengthen and accelerate the process of disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of ex-combatants. He also welcomed the progress made by the Government of Sierra Leone and the invaluable contributions of the donor community, especially the Government of the United Kingdom and the World Bank, in establishing the necessary demobilization facilities.

At its 4078th meeting held on 10 December 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda.

At the same meeting, the President (United Kingdom), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Sierra Leone, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The Council also extended an invitation, under rule 39 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure, to the Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations.

The representative of France emphasized the importance and the urgency of providing humanitarian assistance to Sierra Leone. He, however, also addressed a few questions to the representative of the Secretariat. He observed that UNAMSIL was deployed largely in the Southern part of the country, which also covered positions held by ECOMOG. His first question concerned the Secretariat's intentions as to the deployment in the northern part of the country and whether security guarantees for UNAMSIL troops had already been negotiated with the rebel movements active in those regions. Secondly, he asked how the Secretariat assessed the nature of the doubts with regard to the RUF commitment to the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration programme. Finally, he asked whether the plans concerning the organization of the work of the Commission for the Consolidation of Peace presented by the Chairman of the Commission truly reflected the wishes of all parties in Sierra Leone, and if those plans had also been discussed with the United Nations.⁸⁵

The representative of the United States expressed pleasure that things were under way in Sierra Leone, for the role of the United Nations was crucial to the success of the peace process. He underlined that some neighbours in Sierra Leone had direct responsibility in trying to push things forward, to move swiftly to disarm and demobilize as quickly as possible, and that the annual ECOWAS summit provided an opportunity for the leaders in the region to underscore that message. He stressed that it was important for all States in the region to support reintegration and to provide humanitarian development assistance.⁸⁶

The representative of the United Kingdom emphasized that while his delegation welcomed the continuing contribution of Nigeria, ECOMOG and the arrival of the Kenyan and Indian peacekeepers under the new Force Commander, it was crucial that the force be deployed to full strength as soon as possible and that the Council ensure that the Force Commander had the clearest possible guidance and backing from his headquarters in New York. He further expressed concern at the continuing ceasefire violations, human rights abuses and lack of humanitarian access. He underlined that the tensions between the different rebel groups and leaders lay behind much of the continuing unrest and violence and it was essential to maintain dialogue with each of them to bring them and their followers into the Lomé agreement framework. He further urged the parties and all those with influence over them to continue to ensure the implementation of the provisions of the Lomé Peace Agreement to allow the desperately needed peacekeeping operation to fulfil its mandate.⁸⁷

Several other speakers maintained that although progress had been made in the implementation of the Lomé Peace Agreement, they remained deeply concerned at the continuing evidence of the fragility of the peace process in Sierra Leone. They stressed that the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of ex-combatants was essential and in this respect they commended those Governments that contributed to the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration programme. Some speakers urged strict compliance with the provisions of the existing arms embargo on Sierra Leone and supported further measures such as the establishment of a monitoring and inspection mechanism to strengthen the effectiveness of the sanctions regime. All speakers expressed satisfaction with the deployment of UNAMSIL in support of the peace process. A number of speakers also supported the establishment of the Human Rights Commission in Sierra Leone and the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, and stated that the initiative to study the nexus between the work of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission and a possible international commission of inquiry into human rights violations would be welcomed. They further stated that the amnesty envisaged in the Lomé Peace Agreement was not to be extended to cover atrocities committed subsequent to that Agreement.⁸⁸

In response to questions raised by some delegations, the Under-Secretary-General for the Department of Peacekeeping Operations stated the following: with regard to the deployment in the north, which consisted of two contingents (Kenya and India), he underlined that the deployment was due in part to the desire of the organization and of the Secretariat to show clearly that the United Nations action was new and impartial and also to show their resolve that the action of the United Nations in that connection was vigorous. He also said that the deployment of those troops was taking place in a measured and well thought out manner in order to ensure security. With regard to the doubts about the implementation of the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration programme by the Revolutionary United Front, given the fact that Foday Sankoh and Johnny Paul Koroma were in Freetown and actively participating in all the negotiations, and that they had made statements, it was clear that if they had deliberately wished not to implement it, for their own safety and security, they would doubtless have preferred not to be in Freetown at that stage. With regard to the arrival of UNAMSIL troops with strong resources, in the areas that had been only under rebel control throughout the entire period, he emphasized that there was a need for dialogue and clarification so as to create conditions of confidence with regard to all the rebel leaders. Since they had been isolated for months, even years, by combat and distrust, the sudden arrival of well-equipped foreign troops would doubtless give rise to fears and questions. The Under-Secretary-General also stressed that it was necessary to show that the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration programme included all the parties not only the rebel groups. Furthermore, he reiterated that it was important for the dialogue to continue and for ECOMOG to maintain a consolidated, firm and assured presence. With regard to the question concerning discussion of the organization of the work of the Commission for the Consolidation of Peace with the United Nations, the Under-Secretary-General pointed out that the Commission was a national one created under the Agreement and was not a Commission under the responsibility of the United Nations Mission. It was therefore essentially for the Sierra Leoneans themselves to organize and discuss it.⁸⁹

9. Letter dated 9 January 1996 from the Permanent Representative of Ethiopia to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council concerning the extradition of the suspects wanted in the assassination attempt on the life of the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, on 26 June 1995

Initial proceedings

By a letter dated 9 January 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹ the representative of Ethiopia, in accordance with Article 35 of the Charter of the United Nations, requested an urgent meeting of the Security Council in view of the refusal of the Government of the Republic of the Sudan to comply with repeated demands for extradition to Ethiopia of the terrorists sought for their role in the assassination attempt against President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt and the serious implications of such non-compliance. In this regard the letter also referred to the meeting held between Ethiopia and members of the Security Council on 21 December 1995. The letter also included information on the assassination attempt as well as the statements issued at the end of the 11 September and 19 December 1995 meetings of the Central Organ of the Organization of African Unity Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution.

At the 3627th meeting of the Security Council, held on 31 January 1996 in response to the request contained in a letter dated 9 January 1996 from Ethiopia,² the Security Council included the letter in its agenda, without objection. At the same meeting, the President, with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Ethiopia, Pakistan and the Sudan, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the Council had before it the text of a draft resolution submitted by Botswana, Chile, Egypt, Guinea-Bissau, Honduras and Indonesia.³

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to the following letters: a letter dated 15 January 1996 from the representative of Ethiopia addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴ concerning “false accusations” of alleged Ethiopian aggression by the Sudan; a letter dated 11 January 1996 from the representative of the Sudan addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵ transmitting the response of the Government of the Sudan to the allegations of the Government of Ethiopia against his country regarding the assassination attempt on the life of the Egyptian President; a letter dated 12 January 1996 from the Foreign Minister of the Sudan to the Secretary-General of OAU,⁶ concerning the assassination attempt against President Mubarak of Egypt; and a letter dated 12 January 1996 from the representative of the Sudan addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁷ requesting an urgent meeting of the Security Council to deal with the issue of Ethiopian aggression against the airspace and territory of the Sudan, in accordance with the principles of the Charter and the mandate of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security.

The representative of Ethiopia stated that while his country enjoyed excellent relations with its neighbours and continued to contribute towards finding a durable solution to the crisis in Somalia, their efforts to cultivate and maintain good relations with the Sudan had not “yielded fruit”. This was because the forces that directed the Sudan had placed themselves on a collision course with the entire subregion. He stated that the “assassination attempt” directed against the President of Egypt had stunned the nation and shocked the world, especially Africa, whose leaders were congregating in Addis Ababa for the Organization of African Unity (OAU) summit. Even though the assassination attempt failed, the mounting evidence unearthed by their investigation team that implicated the Government of the Sudan clearly illustrated the continuing threat to the peace and security of the region. He maintained that it was with regret that they had brought the matter before the Council since it had been the intention of his Government to resolve the issue at the bilateral level. After investigation revealed that three of the terrorists suspected of involvement in the crime were taking shelter in the Sudan, his Government had provided the relevant information to the Government of the Sudan and requested it to extradite those three terrorists, on the basis of the 1964 extradition Treaty. He maintained that an act of State-sponsored international terrorism undertaken in the territory of another State constituted a clear threat to international peace and security, and since their efforts at the bilateral level had failed they were appealing to Council. He expressed their strong belief that a Security Council resolution calling on the Sudan to comply with the request made earlier by Ethiopia and then by OAU for the extradition of the three terrorists would confront the Sudanese authorities with a direct challenge. The Sudan needed to accept and carry out the decision of the Security Council, as stipulated in Article 25 of the Charter of the United Nations. He added that such action by the Security Council in support of the decisions of OAU would further enhance and strengthen cooperation and complementarity between the United Nations and regional organizations in the maintenance of peace and security. He noted that certain countries had been mentioned in their submission, which had provided some details of their investigation. Those were Kenya, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and Yemen, and he underlined that none of these States, except for the Sudan, were involved in supporting the activities of the terrorists in any way.⁸

The representative of the Sudan stated that in the submission of Ethiopia to the Security Council, it had accused the Government of the Sudan of sheltering three suspects of Egyptian nationality and requested that the Sudan be called upon to cooperate in this matter without consideration being given to the efforts already made by the Sudan towards solving the issue and without awaiting the outcome of the ongoing regional efforts. He underlined that the Sudan condemned, in the strongest terms, terrorism in all its forms and manifestations. They had consistently stated that the Sudan would not allow its territory, nationals or institutions to be used in any manner whatsoever for direct or indirect terrorist activities and were prepared to apply the severest punishments to all persons implicated in such acts. They were particularly outraged at the tragic incident of the terrorist assassination attempt on the life of the Egyptian President and condemned it, as the Sudan had done before on many other occasions involving attacks on the life of other Egyptian Presidents and Ministers. He noted that two weeks earlier, in an informal meeting with the members of the Security Council, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Sudan had reviewed what the Sudan had done in the face of the requests concerning the three Egyptian suspects and his delegation believed that it would be useful to recall the steps taken by the Sudan, with the aim of demonstrating the extent to which the Sudanese authorities had cooperated, and how much they wanted to uncover all the facts relating to those Egyptian suspects. He reiterated that upon receipt of the Ethiopian request the competent authorities in the Sudan had acted promptly in response. He informed the Council that the President of the Sudan himself had decreed the establishment of a high-level investigation committee from the relevant authorities and endowed it with all the necessary powers to undertake thorough investigations. The report of the investigations was communicated to the Government of Ethiopia within 10 days. The report reached the conclusion that there was no clue whatsoever showing that two of the terrorists had entered the Sudan at any time before or after the incident. Concerning the third suspect, the investigation had confirmed entry into the Sudan of a person bearing one of the three names given by the Ethiopian authorities, on a regular flight of Sudan Airways from Addis Ababa, and his disembarkation card was submitted in good faith. However, due to the time that had elapsed the Committee could not definitely locate the suspect, and this was conveyed to the Ethiopian authorities. He stated that in addition his country had reintroduced visa restrictions for entering the Sudan, which had been lifted for some nationalities. These had been adopted at great cost to their friendly relations with a number of countries, but were taken to cater to concerns expressed by the Government of Ethiopia and to assert the Sudan's cooperation and good will. The Government of Ethiopia responded to the Sudanese request for additional information with "more than rejection", and had preferred to bring the matter to the attention of OAU. The latter, without formally inviting the Sudan to attend the meeting, passed its resolution on 11 September 1995, in clear violation of the most basic principles of the established procedural rules of international organizations and basic principles of natural justice. He maintained that although the Sudan was disappointed at the outcome of the Central Organ meeting, it had loyally accepted the verdict and continued its cooperation by responding to the OAU mission, headed by an envoy of the Secretary-General of OAU, which visited the Sudan. The report of the Secretary-General was put before the meeting of the Central Organ of the OAU of 19 December 1995 and their Minister for Foreign Affairs had been invited to attend and address the meeting. He continued that, surprisingly, the same day as the adoption of the statement by OAU, the Deputy Foreign Minister of Ethiopia had flown to New York to bring the matter to the attention of the Security Council, which he had addressed informally on 21 December 1995. He asked why "some members of the Council" refused to await the outcome of OAU efforts on the question and why they were exerting pressure on the Security Council to consider the question at the same time as OAU was considering it. He maintained that the problem had not been created by any lack of cooperation on the part of the Sudanese authorities and that on the basis of OAU decisions, it had taken concrete, practical measures and had requested the Secretary-General of OAU to contact the Sudanese authorities with a view to implementing these decisions. He reaffirmed that the Sudan had always abided by the resolutions of OAU and any resolutions adopted by the United Nations. He stated that the draft resolution sought to achieve two main objectives: first, to send a clear message that the international community was determined to deal firmly with terrorism; and second, to ensure that the perpetrators of the attempt were brought to justice. The Sudan strongly supported these two aims. However, the draft resolution was imbalanced for a number of reasons including that it did not take into consideration the repeated position of the Sudan, which was to cooperate fully and unconditionally. He also noted the hasty manner in which the draft resolution had been prepared. Its authors had "spared no effort to inject into the draft all negative elements, relevant or irrelevant with only one objective: to implicate the Sudan, as the symbol of international terrorism". He stated that operative paragraphs 4 (a) and (b) were a clear, indisputable example of the real intentions of the original authors of the draft resolution. The language of operative paragraph 4 (a) completely ignored the 19 December 1996 decision of the Central Organ, the last meeting held by OAU, in which the Sudan was called upon to locate and, if they were found and apprehended, extradite the three terrorists. He also stated that the draft resolution reflected a new dimension of Security Council resolutions, based on "hypothesis and assumptions". It assumed that the three suspects were in the hands of the Government of the Sudan and that all the Government needed to do was to take immediate action to extradite them. Regarding relations between the Sudan and its neighbours, as reflected in operative paragraph 4 (b), he stated that it was not the Sudan that had committed aggression against the territories of its neighbours or occupied part of their territories. He asked the Council to recall the acts of aggression committed against the Sudanese territories. He noted that all African States were equally obligated to respect the Charters of OAU and the United Nations and the sovereignty of States. He informed the Council that the Sudan's answer to all the allegations was the invitation extended by the Minister for Foreign Affairs to the Secretary-General of OAU to visit the Sudan and establish a fact-finding mission consisting of all the interested African countries, to verify the allegations that the Sudan was assisting, supporting and facilitating terrorist activities and giving shelter and sanctuary to terrorist elements. In conclusion, he once again appealed to the parties concerned to adopt a cooperative attitude so as to bring about a peaceful resolution to the dispute and to the Council to persuade the other parties to do the same. He expressed his wish to put on record that the Sudan abided by the United Nations Charter and that it accepted that all Security Council resolutions were binding and must be complied with, and welcomed the role that the Secretary-General was expected to play in resolving the issue, stating that they would undertake to cooperate fully with him.⁹

⁹ Ibid., pp. 4-7.

The representative of Indonesia expressed his indignation at the assassination attempt on the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt, which was particularly abhorrent because it occurred in Ethiopia, thus constituting a glaring violation of the sovereignty and territorial integrity of that State. The Indonesian delegation strongly condemned acts of violence and terrorism, which were the most flagrant violation of human rights, and called for intensified cooperation, at the national, international and regional levels, in the fight against terrorism, wherever it might occur. He maintained that the most expeditious way to resolve this question would be for the Council fully to support the continuing bilateral efforts that had already been made. These endeavours needed to be augmented by OAU, as regional efforts would also make a substantial contribution. He stated that they gave their full support to operative paragraph 7 of the draft resolution, which requested the Secretary-General to seek the cooperation of the Government of the Sudan. There was merit in this proposal because the method established required the cooperation of the Government of the Sudan, without which cooperation the task of OAU would be rendered infinitely more difficult. He noted that the Government of the Sudan had expressed its condemnation of international terrorism and had voiced its willingness to cooperate with OAU and the countries concerned, and had extended invitations to the Secretary-General of OAU. He noted that the draft resolution should be viewed as supporting the thrust and the objectives of the statements by the Central Organ of the Organization of African Unity Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution, adopted on 11 September 1995 and 19 December 1995. He stated that he had decided to vote in favour of the draft resolution because it offered a pragmatic approach and provided OAU with a flexible and appropriate mechanism for resolving the question. His delegation was confident that the good offices of the Secretary-General of the United Nations and OAU would yield positive results.¹⁰

The representative of Botswana stated that it pained them to discuss this issue before the Security Council, because it was an African problem that deserved an African solution, and that they would have preferred to resolve the issue without reference to the Council. However, they were fully aware that any State Member of the United Nations had the right to bring any issue to the attention of the Council, and Ethiopia had exercised that right. He stated that the draft resolution before the Security Council was in no way intended to usurp the role and authority of OAU in this matter. They were convinced that OAU would greatly welcome and appreciate an early implementation of its decisions. In this respect, OAU needed the support of the international community. There was only one Security Council, and international legitimacy and authority stemmed from it alone. It was only natural, therefore, that the Council should support OAU in its efforts to bring the three suspects to justice. The draft resolution did not call for the imposition of any measures against the Sudan. It simply called upon the Government of the Sudan to comply with the requests of OAU to extradite without delay the three suspects to Ethiopia, and it was for those reasons that Botswana supported the adoption of the draft resolution.¹¹

The representative of Honduras stated that they had always unequivocally condemned all acts, methods and practices of terrorism, wherever and by whomever they were committed. There was an urgent need for States to cooperate with each other at all levels and for the United Nations to foster such cooperation in order to prevent and eradicate them. The assassination attempt was a clear example of an intolerable practice that had damaged the sovereignty and stability not only of Ethiopia but also of the African region as a whole. It served as a reminder to States of their obligation to adopt measures to combat and eliminate terrorism. He expressed his belief that one of the ways to combat and eliminate such acts and secure conviction of the guilty was cooperation between States and international organizations and he commended Ethiopia's efforts to resolve the problem of extraditing the suspects, both bilaterally and regionally. It was also necessary for States to show a resolute will and it was appropriate for the Council to urge the Sudan to comply with the requests contained in the statements of OAU. He would therefore vote in favour of the draft resolution.¹²

The representative of Chile stated that they supported the draft resolution and vigorously condemned the assassination attempt against a world leader. He noted that this reflected the position of the international community as expressed in General Assembly resolution 49/60. The unanimous decision of the Assembly was reinforced by the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected Persons, including Diplomatic Agents, which applied particularly in this case involving a Head of State. He stated their support for the decisions of OAU in this matter, and underlined that the draft resolution in no way interfered with or replaced or duplicated the work of that regional organ. He appealed to the Sudan to comply urgently with the decisions of OAU in this regard. He expressed his hope that the subject they were dealing with would help them deepen international cooperation in combating terrorism and that by adopting the draft resolution, the Security Council would be providing clear guidance in this field.¹³

The representative of China stated that they had always strongly opposed and condemned acts of terrorism in all forms, for they not only endangered innocent lives and social stability but also posed a threat to international security, and that China was deeply shocked by the terrorist assassination attempt on the President of Egypt. He noted that other countries in the region and OAU had made numerous efforts to learn the truth, apprehend suspects and resolve disputes arising from this matter, and the Sudan had also openly condemned terrorism and had expressed its readiness to cooperate with OAU and the other countries concerned. He expressed their appreciation and support for those efforts and noted that the main purpose of the draft resolution was to demonstrate the Council's support for and cooperation with OAU in this regard. The Council needed to observe the purposes and principles of the Charter, act strictly according to the norms of international law, and make its own judgment in a fair and objective manner by respecting the facts and giving due importance to the evidence. The Council needed to be careful, serious and prudent when taking any action. Therefore, they had reservations about that part of operative paragraph 4 (b) that called upon the Sudan to desist from engaging in activities of assisting, supporting and facilitating terrorist activities. The Council needed to listen fully to the views of the parties concerned and of OAU and allow them to play their respective roles to the fullest possible extent. Having clarified the position of China, he stated that his delegation would vote in favour of the draft resolution.¹⁴

The representative of Guinea-Bissau reaffirmed its firm position and determination in the fight against all acts of terrorism in all forms, which endangered or ended innocent lives and adversely affected international relations, to the detriment of the peace and security of States. His delegation believed that the international community had to further strengthen cooperation at all levels and reaffirm its determination to combat this scourge by adopting practical, effective measures to spare their societies from these odious acts. He reaffirmed their commitment to the Declaration on Measures to Eliminate International Terrorism, adopted by the General Assembly in 1994 and their respect for article III of the Charter of OAU, which unreservedly condemned political assassination. His delegation reiterated its vigorous condemnation of and its indignation at the terrorist assassination attempt against the President of Egypt. He stated that the seriousness of the matter called for it to be given the appropriate attention by the international community, and accordingly operative paragraph 7 of the draft resolution before them asked for close cooperation between the Council and OAU and the authorities of the Sudan in the search for a comprehensive solution to the crisis.¹⁵

Several other speakers spoke, stating their support for the resolution, condemning international terrorism in all its forms and the attack on the President of Egypt in particular, noting the threat to international peace and security and the responsibility of the Council to bring the three suspects to justice, noting that the resolution endorsed and complemented the actions taken by OAU and strengthened the authority of that organization.¹⁶

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1044 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Deeply disturbed by the worldwide persistence of acts of international terrorism in all its forms which endanger or take innocent lives, have a deleterious effect on international relations and jeopardize the security of States,

Recalling the statement made by the President of the Security Council on 31 January 1996 when the Council met at the level of heads of State and Government, in which the members of the Council expressed their deep concern over acts of international terrorism and emphasized the need for the international community to deal effectively with all such acts,

Recalling also the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected Persons, including Diplomatic Agents, opened for signature at New York on 14 December 1973,

Stressing the imperative need to strengthen international cooperation between States in order to make and adopt practical and effective measures to prevent, combat and eliminate all forms of terrorism that affect the international community as a whole,

Convinced that the suppression of acts of international terrorism, including those in which States are involved, is an essential element for the maintenance of international peace and security,

Gravely alarmed at the terrorist assassination attempt on the life of the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt, in Addis Ababa on 26 June 1995, and convinced that those responsible for that act must be brought to justice,

Noting that the Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution of the Organization of African Unity, at its third extraordinary session on 11 September 1995, considered that attack as aimed, not only at the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt, and not only at the sovereignty, integrity and stability of Ethiopia, but also at Africa as a whole,

Taking note of the statements of the Central Organ of the Mechanism of 11 September and 19 December 1995, and supporting the implementation of the requests contained therein,

Regretting the fact that the Government of the Sudan has not yet complied with the requests of the Central Organ of the Mechanism set out in those statements,

Taking note of the letter dated 9 January 1996 from the Permanent Representative of Ethiopia to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council,

Taking note also of the letters from the Permanent Representative of the Sudan to the United Nations dated 11 January and 12 January 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,

1. Condemns the terrorist assassination attempt on the life of the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt in Addis Ababa on 26 June 1995;

2. Strongly deplores the flagrant violation of the sovereignty and integrity of Ethiopia and the attempt to disturb the peace and security of Ethiopia and the region as a whole;

3. Commends the efforts of the Government of Ethiopia to resolve this issue through bilateral and regional arrangements;

4. Calls upon the Government of the Sudan to comply without further delay with the requests of the Organization of African Unity:

(a) To take immediate action to extradite to Ethiopia for prosecution the three suspects sheltering in the Sudan and wanted in connection with the assassination attempt on the basis of the 1964 Extradition Treaty between Ethiopia and the Sudan;

(b) To desist from engaging in activities of assisting, supporting and facilitating terrorist activities and from giving shelter and sanctuary to terrorist elements, and to act in its relations with its neighbours and with others in full conformity with the Charter of the United Nations and with the charter of the Organization of African Unity;

5. Urges the international community to encourage the Government of the Sudan to respond fully and effectively to the requests of the Organization of African Unity;

6. Welcomes the efforts of the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity aimed at the implementation of the relevant provisions of the statements of 11 September and 19 December 1995 of the Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution of the Organization of African Unity, and supports that organization in its continued efforts to implement its decisions;

7. Requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Organization of African Unity, to seek the cooperation of the Government of the Sudan in the implementation of the present resolution and to report to the Council within sixty days;

8. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States emphasized with reference to the terrorist attack on President Mubarak of Egypt that terrorism, much of it externally sponsored, was a recurring fact of life, not just for the people of Ethiopia and Egypt, but also in places stretching from Eritrea to Israel to Pakistan and Sri Lanka. However, with the growth of worldwide information links in the government and financial sectors, the web of money, weapons and communications that sustained terrorists was ever more transparent. With the stronger international consensus against dealing with terrorists and the States that support them, the number of places where terrorists could find refuge was ever smaller. She maintained that the United States had found that the evidence gathered by Ethiopia on the perpetrators of this crime to be compelling and convincing. The Government of the Sudan had to bear responsibility for the acts it had allowed its guests to perform, and also had the responsibility to extradite those guests to face justice. She maintained that contrary to what the Government of the Sudan had been claiming, this resolution was "not the product of a conspiracy" but had stemmed from their failure to observe the most basic norms of international relations, and the unanimous vote that had adopted it was a measure not only the balanced approach of those non-aligned members who drafted it, but also of the international isolation in which the Government of the Sudan had chosen to live. She maintained that the United States shared with the Government of the Sudan the wish for good relations between their two countries, but positive bilateral relations were built upon concrete action, not declarations. She noted that the demands in the resolution were simple and straightforward: the Government of the Sudan had to extradite immediately the terrorists it was sheltering, and stop its assistance and support for terrorism. The United States supported the resolution because, like the OAU decision on which it was based, its requirements were logical and justified. She expressed her belief that it was within the power of the Government of the Sudan to comply immediately and fully with these requirements and her hope that the Secretary-General would be able to report within 60 days that the Sudan had extradited the suspects.¹⁷

The representative of Egypt stated that the unanimous adoption by the Security Council of resolution 1044 (1996) had to send a clear, unambiguous message to the Government of the Sudan: that the international community, as represented by the Council, was resolute in its support for the implementation of all the decisions of the OAU Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution. The resolution of the Council had condemned the assassination attempt as a flagrant violation of the sovereignty and integrity of Ethiopia and as an attempt to disturb the peace and security of the region as a whole. The resolution had thus reaffirmed the statement of OAU that there was a conspiracy, whose consequences extended beyond Ethiopia, the State on whose territory the attempt had taken place, and also beyond Egypt, because the attempt was against the whole of Africa. Therefore, it was clear that the Council was dealing with a dispute that concerned the peace and security of the whole of Africa. After the efforts made on the bilateral level failed, Ethiopia resorted to the OAU Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution, twice, and OAU did not confine itself to the adoption of clear statements but also sent a mission to the Sudan to urge it to cooperate in the full implementation of the resolution. He noted that when Ethiopia resorted to the Security Council it had done so using its rights under the Charter of the United Nations, particularly Article 35. In addition Article 54 made it clear that the Security Council should be kept fully informed of activities undertaken by regional organizations for the maintenance of international peace and security. He maintained that the fact that the Council had considered the matter could well spare the international community a real crisis, which could threaten regional security and stability and jeopardize international peace and security. He expressed their sincere hope that the Government of the Sudan would take the Council's resolution and the decision of OAU with all necessary seriousness and comply without delay or equivocation, given that, under the Charter, all the Council's resolutions were binding on all States.¹⁸

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that they strongly rejected the evil that was international terrorism, in all its forms and manifestations, and firmly condemned the attempt to assassinate the President of Egypt. In the struggle against this threat to international peace and security, the Russian Federation stood ready to work constructively alongside all States and international and regional organizations to solve the global problem of establishing the necessary conditions for eradicating terrorism worldwide. He maintained that the greatest possible involvement by the regional machinery, the Organization of African Unity, was the best way to go, though he welcomed constructive cooperation between the United Nations and regional organizations, and also the involvement of the Security Council, where necessary, to support those organizations. However, he expressed his belief that there was no justification for the Council's taking their place in this issue. He stated that the Russia Federation was gratified that the sponsors had taken a number of his delegation's amendments, which were made in that spirit, into account and that the resolution would receive an appropriate response, first and foremost in Khartoum, and would give the Sudan an additional incentive to step up its efforts to uncover the three suspects. He also noted with satisfaction the explanations by the authors of the resolution that it was not aimed at isolating the Sudan internationally or at adopting measures against it, and that the appeal to the international community to encourage the Government of the Sudan to respond fully and effectively to OAU requests assumed, first and foremost, that bilateral diplomatic channels would be used to promote a solution, which in their view was the method most likely to succeed.¹⁹

Decision of 26 April 1996 (3660th meeting):
resolution 1054 (1996)

On 11 March 1996, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1044 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the implementation of resolution 1044 (1996).²⁰ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that in regard to the three suspects, the Government of the Sudan had not yet complied with the demands of the Council. After extensive investigations as well as on the basis of information gathered from interviews with three of the criminals involved in the assassination attempt, the Government of Ethiopia had reached the conclusion that the Sudan was sheltering the suspects. For its part, the Government of the Sudan maintained that the Government of Ethiopia had not provided it with adequate information on which to base its search for the suspects. Furthermore, even this sketchy information was received from Ethiopia after a lapse of 32 days. The Sudanese authorities had assured his Special Envoy that they were continuing with their efforts to look for the suspects. The Secretary-General observed that similar differences prevailed with regard to the second demand of the Security Council contained in paragraph 4 (b) of resolution 1044 (1996). All the neighbouring countries visited by his Special Envoy, Egypt, Eritrea, Ethiopia and Uganda, were unanimous in their conviction that the Sudan was actively engaged in supporting terrorist elements who operated from Sudanese territory, carrying out destabilizing activities in their countries. They had affirmed that they had conclusive evidence of the Sudan's involvement in such terrorist activities but were not willing to reveal it for reasons of security and confidentiality. They also affirmed that the Sudan was running camps for training terrorists. The Government of Tunisia had told his Special Envoy that the Sudan, until about two years ago, was actively supporting some Tunisian dissidents, furnishing them with sabotage equipment and even, in some cases, giving them Sudanese passports. The position of the Sudan on paragraph 4 (b) was that it was the Sudan who was the victim of destabilizing activities encouraged and supported by its neighbours. The Sudanese interlocutors had stated that heavy equipment, including tanks and anti-aircraft guns, had been observed in the South, and which, according to them, could only have come from Uganda. They also had referred to the activities of the Sudanese rebels who were alleged to be operating from Eritrean territory with the active and public support of the Government of Eritrea. The Sudanese authorities had complained about attacks launched by Ethiopian forces on its border and had maintained that it was Egypt that had illegally occupied Sudanese territory in Halaib. He stated, that in view of the situation, it was obvious that the Sudan had not yet complied with the demand of the Security Council to extradite the three suspects to Ethiopia and that all the neighbours of the Sudan, visited by his Special Envoy, had accused the Sudan of supporting terrorist activities within their territories.

At its 3660th meeting, held on 26 April 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Chile), with the consent of the Security Council, invited the representatives of Ethiopia, the Sudan and Uganda, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Botswana, Chile, Egypt, Guinea-Bissau, and Honduras²¹ and also to a technical correction in the English text of the draft resolution.

At the same meeting, the President also drew the attention of the Council to the following documents: letters dated 14 and 15 March 1996, respectively, from the representative of the Sudan addressed to the Secretary-General,²² transmitting a report on actions taken by the Sudanese authorities in response to Security Council resolution 1044 (1996) as well as the resolutions of OAU, and a comment by the Sudan on the Secretary-General's report dated 11 March 1996; a letter dated 28 March from the representative of the Sudan addressed to the President of the Security Council;²³ a letter dated 4 April 1996 from the representative of the

Sudan addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁴ transmitting a statement concerning the decision of Ethiopia to hold secret trials for the three Egyptians and some Ethiopians suspected of involvement in the assassination attempt against the Egyptian President and also asking the international community to urge Ethiopia to hold the trials in public; a letter from the representative of the Sudan dated 8 April 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁵ conveying the protest of the Government of the Sudan regarding the flagrant and massive attacks by Ethiopian forces against the territories of the Sudan; a letter from the representative of the Sudan dated 22 April 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council;²⁶ and a letter dated 11 April 1996 from the representative of the Sudan addressed to the Secretary-General.²⁷

The President further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 8 April 1996 from the representative of Ethiopia addressed to the President of the Security Council;²⁸ a letter dated 11 April 1996 from the representative of Ethiopia addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁹ transmitting a copy of a note from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Ethiopia to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Sudan in response to the accusations by the Government of the Sudan that Ethiopian armed forces had launched attacks on Sudanese territories; a letter dated 15 April 1996 from the representative of Uganda addressed to the President of the Security Council;³⁰ and a letter dated 12 April 1996 from the representative of the Central African Republic addressed to the President of the Security Council,³¹ transmitting the text of a communiqué informing the Council that they were holding in Bangui the tripartite Chad-Sudan-Central African Republic summit and issuing an appeal that preference be given to the search for a peaceful solution precluding punitive measures against the Sudan, which might considerably compromise the initiatives that were being undertaken.

The representative of the Sudan stated that when Security Council resolution 1044 (1996) was adopted, the pretexts used by the Council were the claims that the Sudan had not complied with the requests of the OAU statements. Regardless of the validity of these claims, the objective of the resolution was to reaffirm the strong will of the international community to combat terrorism, to pursue terrorists and to support the efforts of OAU. He noted that the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter established the legal framework for cooperation between the United Nations and regional organizations, including OAU. Yet the States parties to the current dispute had resorted directly to the United Nations in order for it to adopt measures to condemn and punish the Sudan. The OAU Mechanism should have been given the opportunity it needed to prove its ability in this regard. He stated that despite the fact that the report of the Secretary-General expressed his intention to remain in close contact with all parties concerned and with the Secretary-General of OAU with regard to all aspects of the resolution, the Security Council was again meeting in order to adopt coercive measures against the Sudan. He asked about the value of resolution 1044 (1996), which was aimed primarily at giving OAU the opportunity it needed to do its work, and whether the conflict-settlement Mechanism had reached a dead end, therefore making it incumbent upon the Council to discharge its responsibility under the Charter. Referring to the draft resolution he noted that the draft resolution fell within the framework of the measures provided for in Chapter VII of the Charter. He recalled that resolution 1044 (1996) had contained no condemnation of the Sudan, and had only called on the Sudan to comply with the resolutions of OAU, under Chapter VI of the Charter. Furthermore, the Security Council resolution had not taken the form of a warning to be followed by sanctions because that was not the main objective of its adoption, especially considering that the Security Council had not considered the substance of the dispute and considered what OAU had done to be sufficient in that regard.

He further noted that the Secretary-General's claim that the Sudan had not complied with paragraph 4 of resolution 1044 (1996) was amazing. Paragraph 4 (a) of that resolution called upon the Sudan to comply with the requests of OAU by immediately extraditing to Ethiopia the three suspects. However the Council had ignored the text of the OAU Mechanism of 12 December 1995, in which it called on all the parties to the dispute to cooperate and to provide all the necessary data and information that could help the Government of the Sudan to search for and locate the suspects and extradite them to the Ethiopian authorities. In fact, as to the extradition of the suspects, the Government had declared its full readiness to apprehend them once it knew their location and subsequently to extradite them, and had informed the Special Envoy of all the steps it had taken in this regard,³² and had also called upon Egypt and Ethiopia to cooperate and exchange information in order to clarify the situation with regard to the suspects. He asked whether it was fair to describe these efforts as constituting non-compliance with resolution 1044 (1996). He emphasized that the move by some States to persuade the Council to adopt a resolution imposing sanctions against the Sudan under Chapter VII of the Charter, under the pretext that it had not responded to the demands of paragraph 4 (a) of resolution 1044 (1996), would lead to a dead end. He stated that it was regrettable that the principles and objectives under which the United Nations Charter gave the Security Council the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, were being exploited as a pretext for punishing States and peoples that were not well liked by some members of the Council. He maintained that the draft resolution completely ignored the positive developments that had taken place in the Sudan during the last three months, vis-à-vis the first free presidential and parliamentary elections in the history of the Sudan. He stated that the adoption by the Council of any measures against the Sudan under Chapter VII of the Charter would be an obstacle to its achievements. The imposition of any measures against the Sudan would have a far-reaching effect on the stability of the country and on the unity of its territory, and therefore would have a grave effect on the stability of the region as a whole. In conclusion he maintained that the Council's return to adopt a resolution to impose sanctions against the Sudan despite all the facts raised a number of questions as to the priority in the work of the Council, in accordance with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations. He emphasized that the Sudan remained committed to the implementation of all resolutions adopted by all international organizations, including those of the Organization of African Unity and those of the Council, however contrary they might be to the spirit of justice and equality.³³

The representative of Uganda stated that since the matter before the Council dealt, to a large extent, with the dangerous policy of the Government of the Sudan's support for terrorism in the subregion, he would inform the Council of the persistent and determined efforts by the Sudanese regime to destabilize Uganda. He stated that in spite of their efforts to maintain a policy of good neighbourliness, the Sudanese regime had continued its activities of assisting, supporting, facilitating and even giving shelter and sanctuary to two rebel movements based on its soil, whose sole purpose was to wreak havoc on civilians in Uganda. Both rebel movements were based well inside the territory of the Sudan, from where they made incursions into Uganda. He maintained that while their people and security forces were playing their appropriate roles in defending the country against foreign aggression, they also needed the support of the international community, and the Security Council in particular. He underlined that Uganda condemned in the strongest possible terms the unprovoked acts of aggression visited upon it in April by the Government of the Sudan, and he called upon the Security Council and the international community at large to do the same and to take the strongest possible measures to halt them completely. It was the duty of the Council to live up to its responsibilities with regard to maintaining international peace and security by sending a clear and strong signal to the regime in Khartoum that terrorism and aggression would not be rewarded in today's world. He stated that they had looked at the draft resolution and he expressed their disappointment that it did not send the strong signal that Uganda had hoped for. Therefore, he reiterated the need for the Security Council to take any measures necessary, including an arms embargo against the Sudan, to ensure that it desisted from engaging in activities that were not just destabilizing Uganda but plunging the entire subregion into chaos.³⁴

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that it confirmed with the utmost clarity its strong, unwavering rejection of the evil of international terrorism in all its manifestations and that his country was ready at a solid and practical level, to cooperate constructively, with all international and regional organizations and States. They strongly condemned the attempted assassination of the President of Egypt, and urged that an objective investigation of this crime, to establish the facts, be carried out fully and be completed, and that those involved be brought to justice. He stated that this position underlay their approach in seeking an effective and fair way for the Security Council to take action, including taking account of the regional context. The task could be successfully carried out only through close cooperation between all interested parties, including OAU and other regional mechanisms and also on a bilateral level. He maintained that it was that approach that provided a real chance of finding the suspects and of unravelling this web of confusion with regard to the Sudan and of strengthening stability in this region of Africa. However, he noted that as events of the last few months had shown, their views were not taken duly into consideration. He stated that one could not avoid feeling that the draft resolution was used not so much to speed up the search for the suspects as to isolate the Sudan internationally. And it was a pity that such an important organization such as OAU, with such authority, was not able to counter that trend, basically just distancing itself from implementing its own decisions on the matter. He maintained that really convincing evidence about the involvement of Khartoum in the assassination attempt and the whereabouts of the suspects had not been given to the Security Council or to the Secretary-General. The co-sponsors of the draft resolution were forced to acknowledge that when they indicated that the Secretary-General of the United Nations needed to be asked to establish the facts. The situation had become even more complicated in view of recent reports that the suspects, or at least one of them, were not in the Sudan. Of course, the information needed to be checked very thoroughly. However, he stated that the draft resolution, with all of the proper and correct provisions it contained, in other parts basically disregarded the points which he had just underlined. Moreover, the draft had created an extremely serious problem which was totally unrelated to the situation in the Sudan, but referred to the overall approach to the use of an instrument such as international sanctions. He stated that the members of the Council and the United Nations had on several occasions come to realize that the arbitrary application of sanctions was essentially flawed when there were no clearly formulated criteria and conditions governing their imposition and their lifting. This problem was specifically being considered in the General Assembly Working Group on the Supplement to the Agenda for Peace, where the problem was being given special attention. He stated that apart from the understandable demand for the extradition of the three suspects, abstract demands were being made of Khartoum along the lines of living in friendly relations with its neighbours and complying with the Charter of the United Nations and with the Charter of OAU. He expressed his belief that objective criteria for checking the implementation of such vague demands simply did not exist. That meant that, if desired, the Sudan could be kept under sanctions indefinitely. Then they would have a repetition of what they were already seeing in other situations, namely, the introduction of economic sanctions with no time frame, the suffering of broad sectors of the population, an unavoidable humanitarian crisis, and the search for ways of dealing with that crisis, including, probably, the adoption of a resolution along the lines of resolution 986 (1995), and then it would go on and on in that already rather well-known vicious circle. He stated that the fact that it was known in advance that this kind of demand could not be met, along with the logic contained in operative paragraph 8 of the draft resolution, predetermined in a way the inevitability of a further escalation of sanctions against the Sudan, and this could lead the Security Council in the very near future into a stalemate, with no simple way out. He underlined that they were in favour of involving the Security Council in a real struggle against international terrorism, but they were against attempts to make use of this in order to punish certain regimes or in order to attain other political goals of one or more Member States. Such an approach was unacceptable, for it was not only destructive for the people of the Sudan and the countries in the region, but it also created a very dangerous precedent which could do real damage to the authority of the Security Council and could create the impression that the Council was not able to draw conclusions from the lessons of very recent history. Accordingly, he informed the Council that the Russian delegation could not support the draft resolution. They had found it possible not to prevent its adoption simply because implementation of the measures contained therein relating to diplomatic pressure on the Sudan would depend on the Members of the United Nations themselves and he trusted that what they had said had been heard and understood in all of its details, including what they had said about future consideration of this matter in the Security Council in two months' time.³⁵

The representative of Indonesia reiterated their steadfast position against international terrorism and all acts of violence, and unequivocally condemned the assassination attempt. He stated that while they were aware of the fact that the Sudan had indeed already taken some steps and was still continuing its efforts to fulfil its obligations under Security Council resolution 1044 (1996), it had not yet fully fulfilled all its obligations with regard to the efforts undertaken by OAU. However the fact that the Sudan had extended invitations to the Secretary-General of OAU to visit Khartoum and had requested assistance from INTERPOL in looking for the suspects, reflected the positive attitude of the Government in the Sudan. He expressed his belief that in order to ensure compliance with the Council's demands, it would have been more appropriate to deal with the situation in a gradual manner, by way of a presidential statement, which was their preference, rather than a draft resolution containing elements of sanctions. He also expressed belief that close cooperation between the United Nations, OAU, Ethiopia and the Sudan was of the utmost importance if the matter was to be resolved in a peaceful manner. In this respect, it was his delegation's fervent hope that the efforts of OAU, as the regional organization directly concerned, would make substantial contributions towards the resolution of the issues. It would also be appropriate for the Council to consider the letter of the Sudan pertaining to this matter.³⁶ If, after all avenues had been explored and all efforts exhausted, the Council ultimately assessed that the Government of the Sudan had still not fully complied with its requests, only then should the Security Council consider adopting further measures to ensure implementation of resolution 1044 (1996). While his delegation considered the draft resolution as supporting the thrust and objectives of the statements adopted by the OAU Mechanism for Conflict, Prevention, Management and Resolution, he expressed concern that the text contained measures which constituted sanctions. He maintained that the imposition of sanctions as a means to bring pressure on some Governments was a matter of the utmost seriousness. The imposition of sanctions needed to be considered only after all means for the pacific settlement of disputes under Chapter VI of the Charter had been exhausted and thorough consideration had been undertaken of the long-term and short-term effects of such sanctions. Sanctions were not meant to be punitive, but it was widely acknowledged that, irrespective of their objectives, they did affect the innocent population, and the adverse humanitarian impact therefore deserved their serious consideration and had to be given primary attention. In conclusion, he expressed his delegation's understanding of some paragraphs contained in the draft resolution: with regard to operative paragraph 1 (a), his delegation was of the view that the matter of extradition was a legal one and only involved two States. In this case the Sudan could extradite to Ethiopia only those suspects who were in its territory. With regard to operative paragraph 8 it did not prejudge whether further measures would be taken by the Council. The adoption of further measures by the Council would be determined only by its assessment of the situation and of the conditions prevailing after the 60-day re-examination period had elapsed. He stated that under those conditions, and in the light of those observations, his delegation would vote in favour of the draft resolution.³⁷

The representative of Botswana appealed to the Sudan and its neighbours to respect each other's territorial integrity. He stated that his delegation voted in favour of resolution 1044 (1996) because of its firm aversion to terrorism, which was the scourge of world society today, and it was incumbent upon all States, including the Sudan, to get rid of that scourge. The draft resolution sent the right message about commitment of the international community to effectively combat terrorism and it was therefore Botswana's ardent hope that the Government of the Sudan would also cooperate in this endeavour and take concrete steps to ensure compliance with the demands of the international community.³⁸

The representative of Germany stated that the draft resolution clearly reminded all States Members of the United Nations of their obligation in fighting terrorism and that Germany could accept the draft resolution. He maintained that the purpose of sanctions should not be punishment but that they should serve to achieve the implementation of measures decided upon by the Council, and should only be used if the issue was so serious that coercive measures were required. That condition was being met here, where the purpose was to put those suspected of an attempt on the life of the President of Egypt on trial. At the same time, he appreciated the efforts to target the sanctions in such a way that they did not affect the population as such but were limited to those who were in a position to take the required measures, since nobody wanted to see harm being inflicted on the Sudanese civilian population. He stated that what the draft resolution intended to do was to ensure compliance by the Government of the Sudan with Security Council resolution 1044 (1996). The Sudan had to do all it could to ensure that the three suspects who were sheltering or had taken shelter in the Sudan could be prosecuted in Ethiopia. The Sudan could not free itself from its obligations by allowing the suspects to leave for other countries, and the Sudan, like other countries, also bore responsibility for persons outside its borders whom it supported in one way or another. He appealed to the Government of the Sudan to use the 60-day period to take the necessary steps not only to avoid even farther-reaching measures, but to allow for an early lifting of the measures the Security Council was imposing.³⁹

The representative of China stated that the Chinese Government vigorously opposed and strongly condemned all forms of terrorism, particularly the attack on the President of Egypt. He held that terrorist activities not only wrought havoc on life, property and social stability, but also threatened international peace and security. Second, he stated their view that this act of terrorism, like any other international question, needed to be addressed by the Council in accordance with the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter. It was necessary to act based on facts, making sure that they stood on legal ground, paid attention to evidence and dealt with this question in a fair, objective and serious manner. Thirdly, in principle, they were against frequent recourse to sanctions under Chapter VII of the Charter. No matter how complex the question might be

and how difficult it was to resolve it, they should always insist on a peaceful solution through dialogue, consultation and mediation. Facts had shown that sanctions were often in the way of a settlement and worse still they might even exacerbate tension, bring suffering to the countries and peoples of the region and have serious adverse effects not only on the target country, but also on the neighbouring countries. He maintained that although the draft resolution talked about diplomatic sanctions only, diplomatic sanctions were still a form of sanctions, and by invoking Chapter VII of the Charter, the draft resolution also made reference to further measures to be taken by the Council, thus paving the way for possibly strengthening of the sanctions. They were of the opinion that imposing sanctions on the Sudan before incontrovertible evidence was in hand would set a bad precedent for the future work of the Council. Their position had been made clear by their delegation when the Council adopted resolution 1044 (1996). He also reaffirmed once again their reservations on the part of the draft resolution that called on the Sudan, in accordance with resolution 1044 (1996), to refrain from engaging in activities of assisting, supporting and facilitating terrorist activities. Accordingly, they would abstain in the voting on the draft resolution. He stated that ever since the failed assassination attempt, the United Nations, OAU and others had made tireless efforts in trying to resolve this question as early as possible. Egypt, Ethiopia and others had also done a great deal of painstaking investigative work in seeking to establish facts and track down the suspects. The Government of the Sudan had also publicly condemned terrorism and clearly stated its willingness to continue cooperation, with OAU and other States, in order to have the problem properly resolved. It had also held consultations with those countries for that purpose. He stated China's appreciation and support for all those efforts and he hoped that the parties concerned would, through dialogue and consultation, and taking full advantage of the role of OAU, continue their efforts in that regard.⁴⁰

Several other speakers spoke, stating their support for the resolution and calling on the Sudan to comply with the resolutions of the Council and OAU. Some speakers condemned all acts of terrorism and the attempted assassination of President Mubarak and noted that the sanctions imposed by the resolution did not seem to have economic implications that could adversely affect the civilian population of the Sudan. Some speakers also stated that operative paragraph 8 demonstrated the Council's determination to consider further measures, in the event that the Council's demands specified in operative paragraph 1 were not complied with within the 60-day period.⁴¹

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted by 13 votes to none, with 2 abstentions (China, Russian Federation), as resolution 1054 (1996),⁴² which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 1044 (1996) of 31 January 1996,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General of 11 March 1996, submitted pursuant to paragraph 7 of resolution 1044 (1996), and the conclusions contained therein,

Gravely alarmed at the terrorist assassination attempt on the life of the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt, in Addis Ababa on 26 June 1995, and convinced that those responsible for that act must be brought to justice,

Noting that in its statements of 11 September and 19 December 1995 the Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution of the Organization of African Unity considered the attempt on the life of President Mubarak as aimed, not only at the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt, and not only at the sovereignty, integrity and stability of Ethiopia, but also at Africa as a whole,

Regretting the fact that the Government of the Sudan has not yet complied with the requests of the Central Organ of the Mechanism set out in those statements,

Noting the continued effort of the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity to ensure the Sudan's compliance with the requests of the Central Organ of the Mechanism,

Taking note with regret that the Government of the Sudan has not responded adequately to the efforts of the Organization of African Unity,

Deeply alarmed that the Government of the Sudan has failed to comply with the requests set out in paragraph 4 of resolution 1044 (1996),

Reaffirming that the suppression of acts of international terrorism, including those in which States are involved, is essential for the maintenance of international peace and security,

Determining that the non-compliance by the Government of the Sudan with the requests set out in paragraph 4 of resolution 1044 (1996) constitutes a threat to international peace and security,

Determined to eliminate international terrorism and to ensure effective implementation of resolution 1044 (1996), and to that end acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Demands that the Government of the Sudan comply without further delay with the requests set out in paragraph 4 of resolution 1044 (1996) by:

(a) Taking immediate action to ensure the extradition to Ethiopia for prosecution of the three suspects sheltered in the Sudan and wanted in connection with the assassination attempt of 26 June 1995 on the life of the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt in Addis Ababa;

(b) Desisting from engaging in activities of assisting, supporting and facilitating terrorist activities and from giving shelter and sanctuary to terrorist elements, and by henceforth acting in its relations with its neighbours and with others in full conformity with the Charter of the United Nations and with the charter of the Organization of African Unity;

2. Decides that the provisions set out in paragraph 3 below shall come into force at 00.01 Eastern Standard Time on 10 May 1996, and shall remain in force until the Security Council determines that the Government of the Sudan has complied with paragraph 1 above;

3. Decides that all States shall:

(a) Significantly reduce the number and the level of the staff at Sudanese diplomatic missions and consular posts and restrict or control the movement within their territory of all such staff who remain;

(b) Take steps to restrict the entry into or transit through their territory of members of the Government of the Sudan, officials of that Government and members of the Sudanese armed forces;

4. Calls upon all international and regional organizations not to convene any conference in the Sudan;

5. Calls upon all States, including States not members of the United Nations and the specialized agencies, to act strictly in conformity with the present resolution, notwithstanding the existence of any rights granted or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or of any contract entered into or any license or permit granted prior to the entry into force of the provisions set out in paragraph 3 above;

6. Requests States to report to the Secretary-General of the United Nations within sixty days from the adoption of the present resolution on the steps they have taken to give effect to the provisions set out in paragraph 3 above;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Council within sixty days of the date specified in paragraph 2

above an initial report on the implementation of the present resolution;

8. Decides to re-examine the matter sixty days after the date specified in paragraph 2 above and to consider, on the basis of the facts established by the Secretary-General, whether the Sudan has complied with the demands in paragraph 1 above and, if not, whether to adopt further measures to ensure its compliance;

9. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of France stated that they supported efforts to combat international terrorism and, in particular, to shed light on the attempted assassination of President Mubarak. He stated that the resolution was aimed mainly at requiring the Sudan to fulfil its obligations under resolution 1044 (1996) and in particular to work to extradite to Ethiopia the individuals suspected of having participated in the attack and who were within its territory. The text of the resolution needed to be understood in the light of available information that led the Council members to suppose that the three suspects were in the Sudan. To comply with the resolution, the Sudan was required to work towards the extradition of those individuals if they were indeed within its territory. To ask more of it would not be in accordance with international law on extradition, nor was the resolution intended to do so. The Council could not hold the Sudan responsible for what it was not. He maintained that the Council had chosen not to impose on the Sudan sanctions that would have a noticeable economic impact on the population, which was among the most destitute in Africa. He noted that the Council would have to consider on the basis of facts established by the Secretary-General whether the Sudan had met the demands made of it, and if it had not, whether it needed to envisage the adoption of further measures. In this way, the Security Council's ability to judge the situation was retained.⁴³

The representative of the United States stated that his Government supported the resolution with reservations, because they did not believe that the sanctions outlined in the resolution were sufficient to convince the Government of the Sudan to cease its sponsorship of international terrorism and "return to the fold of responsible, law-abiding nations." He stated that while his Government welcomed the Council's concern to combat terrorism, failing to impose more meaningful sanctions against the Sudan risked further insecurity and instability for the people of eastern Africa, the Middle East and the Sudan itself. Resolution 1044 (1996) had required two simple steps from the Sudan, the surrender of the three remaining suspects and the cessation of its support for terrorism, and the Sudan had refused to comply with either. Instead, Khartoum had focused its efforts on a public-relations campaign and on smuggling the three suspects out of the Sudan. He maintained that as shocking as the complicity of the Sudan in the attack on the President was, it was only part of a broader pattern of Sudanese support for terrorism. He informed the Council that the efforts of the Sudan to export terrorism had even reached the United Nations. Two employees of the Sudanese Mission to the United Nations were active accomplices in the plot to assassinate the President of Egypt and to blow up the United Nations Secretariat in New York. They had provided information on the President's itinerary and offered to provide identification cards and parking passes so that terrorists could plant a bomb in the United Nations building. He continued that the Sudan regularly abused the prerogatives of sovereign States by giving out Sudanese passports, both diplomatic and regular, to help non-Sudanese terrorists travel freely, as documented in cases involving Ethiopia, Egypt and Tunisia. It used Sudan Airways to transport terrorists and their weapons, made financial resources and safe refuges available, and it provided the weapons terrorists used, as in the attempt in Addis Ababa. He stated that his delegation's objective was to bring about an end to the Sudan's support of terrorist groups. To do that they needed to turn their words into actions, and the resolution was another step towards that. On the positive side, the Council had determined that the Sudan's actions in supporting the attack on President Mubarak, and fostering terrorism internationally were indeed a threat to international peace and security, and the Council was telling the Sudan that they would not be content with mere words. He maintained that the Sudan should not take comfort in the fact that the measures of the resolution were not as strong as they might be, because the Council had promised that if they failed to meet the requirements in the next 60 days, the Council would seek more meaningful sanctions.⁴⁴

The representative of Egypt stated that the Council had adopted resolution 1044 (1996) to send a clear, unambiguous message to the Government of the Sudan that the international community, as represented by the Council, was taking a firm stand against international terrorism, and to deter those contemplating supporting terrorism, including countries. He noted that OAU had considered the assassination attempt against President Mubarak of Egypt to be an attack on the whole of Africa, threatening regional stability and international peace and security. He recalled the Secretary-General's report had drawn two firm conclusions: first, that the Sudan had not yet complied with the demands of the Security Council to extradite the three suspects to Ethiopia; and second that all the neighbouring countries of the Sudan visited by the Secretary-General's Special Envoy accused it in one way or another of supporting terrorist activities within their territories. He further maintained that although the Government of the Sudan had hinted that it was about to change its policies vis-à-vis the support of international acts and activities that targeted the security and stability of neighbouring countries, his delegation did not see that the words of the Sudan matched their deeds. By adopting resolution 1054 (1996), under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Council had reaffirmed that the dangers of international terrorism represented a grave threat to international peace and security and that concerted efforts by countries to eliminate that threat and deter those whose assisted in its perpetration were a basic requirement for the maintenance of international peace and security in the world. He underlined however, that Egypt categorically rejected the inclusion of any measure that would harm the Sudanese people or any measure that would negatively affect the unity, independence, and territorial integrity of the Sudan; a position which the members of the Council had supported. He stated that the measures imposed by the adopted resolution were restricted to diplomatic action in order to send to the Sudan a clear warning of the consequences of continuing its present policies. The Council was determined, in accordance with the resolution, to ensure the implementation of resolution 1044 (1996), and would look at the matter again in 60 days to decide whether the Sudan had complied with the resolution, and whether other measures could be adopted in order to guarantee compliance.⁴⁵

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that it was because the Sudan had not complied with the demands in resolution 1044 (1996) that the Council had to take further action and it had nothing to do with the orientation of the current Government in the Sudan. He expressed his delegation's full support for the resolution and their hope that it would contribute to an early change of heart in Khartoum. He noted that one of the principal demands of the resolution was the requirement for the Sudan to ensure that the three suspects were extradited, and the United Kingdom was convinced that the Sudan knew where they were. If they were still in the Sudan, the Government had to extradite them under the terms of the Bilateral Extradition Treaty. If the Sudan had helped at least one of the three leave the country, the resolution clearly required that the Government of the Sudan take immediate action, including, for example, by providing the necessary evidence, to bring about extradition to Ethiopia, and the United Kingdom would not be satisfied until the Sudan had secured that objective and had also ceased its support for international terrorism. The last paragraph of the resolution was a clear message that the Council would remain engaged in this matter.⁴⁶

The representative of Chile stated that they condemned and repudiated terrorism and rejected the attempted assassination of the President of Egypt. He stated that Chile had listened carefully to the African members of the Security Council to find guidance with respect to the path it should follow and had given special consideration to the option of regional action, the views of the countries of the region and that of OAU. Chile had been guided by the need to follow a procedure and a treatment of the question that would be fair and transparent and in which the Security Council would have all available background information and evidence. He noted that the Sudan and all Governments who wished to express their views had been offered full cooperation and the possibility of holding an open debate, which had not been requested. The draft had given rise to considerable discussion on the measures to be adopted and he noted that Chile had doubts as to the effectiveness of sanctions. Economic sanctions disproportionately affected the innocent and the weak rather than the leaders responsible. He maintained that in this case, they were using diplomatic sanctions, which while exerting a considerable degree of pressure, could not be equated with economic sanctions. He stated that the Council would continue to follow developments related to the implementation of the resolution and he appealed to the Sudan to do everything in its power to comply with it.⁴⁷

Decision of 16 August 1996 (3690th meeting): resolution 1070 (1996)

On 10 July 1996, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1054 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on steps taken to give effect to the provisions set out in paragraph 3 of resolution 1054 (1996).⁴⁸ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that while the Security Council had determined that the three suspects involved were sheltered in the Sudan and had called on the Government of the Sudan to ensure their extradition, the Government of the Sudan claimed that its investigations had produced no trace of their presence in the Sudan and that the identity of the third suspect was unknown. In addition, the Security Council had demanded that the Government of the Sudan desist from engaging in activities of assisting, supporting and facilitating terrorist activities and from giving shelter and sanctuary to terrorist elements, while the Government of the Sudan had asserted that it condemned terrorism and did not condone terrorist activities.

At its 3690th meeting, held on 16 August 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the above report in its agenda as well as the report of the Secretary-General of 11 March 1996, submitted pursuant to Security Council resolution 1044 (1996).⁴⁹ Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Germany), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of the Sudan, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁵⁰

At the same meeting, the President further drew the attention of the Council to letters dated 31 May and 24 June 1996, respectively, from the representative of the Sudan addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵¹ transmitting a report on the measures taken by the Sudan pursuant to Security Council resolution 1054 (1996), including the departure from the Sudan of Osama bin Laden, and reiterating their condemnation of terrorism; a letter dated 2 July 1996 from the representative of the Sudan addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵² informing the Council of reports of the presence of Mustafa Hamza in Afghanistan, including a statement by the Government of Afghanistan, and of the meetings of the Presidents of the Sudan and Egypt; and a letter dated 10 July 1996 from the representative of Ethiopia addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵³ transmitting a statement of the views of the Government of Ethiopia entitled "The Sudanese authorities continue to defy the Security Council and to hoodwink the international community".

The representative of the Sudan stated that the Sudan's firm condemnation of terrorism and the tragic terrorist attempt on the life of the Egyptian President as expressed in all international forums stemmed from its firm principle of refraining from violence and following a path of peace and security. He reiterated that the Sudan had not, and would not allow its territory to be used for any act of terror or to be used as a shelter for terrorists or by those who had eluded justice. The Sudan had expressed its full readiness to cooperate with all parties to bring the suspects to justice and taken tangible steps in that respect. However, to request the Sudan to extradite suspects it did not have was like asking it to square the circle, and was unjustified, unless the objective was to find an excuse to impose unjust sanctions. He noted that resolutions 1044 (1996) and 1054 (1996) had referred to three suspects. However, the only information available to the Sudan was a first name, that he was an Egyptian national, his age, and that he was married and lived in the Amarat quarter of Khartoum. Moreover, there was no photograph. They could find no trace of such a person and had concluded that he did not exist. Nonetheless, the Sudan was committed to turning over all available information stemming from the ongoing investigations. He stated that the rationale for holding the Sudan responsible for the presence of those people on its territory during a certain time period could also be used to make each State which they had passed through or resided in responsible. In that sense, Ethiopia, where the crime took place and where the suspects had remained for a considerable period of time, entering and leaving over a two-year period, could be considered directly responsible. It was unacceptable to fail to provide adequate information that would help the Sudan find the suspects, nor was it acceptable to use the pretext of protecting classified and delicate sources, because those sources were usually made available precisely at the critical moment when they were needed, and not afterwards. He asked why the suspects were being tried in secret and no one, including the ambassadors of the permanent members of the Council, was allowed to meet them.

With reference to the Security Council resolutions calling on the Sudan to desist from supporting terrorism and terrorists and from providing them with shelter, he noted that the Government of the Sudan had seriously sought to enter into contacts with the countries that had levelled those accusations. He further noted that the first reaction by the Government of the Sudan following the attempt on the life of the President of Egypt was to reintroduce the visa system. Pursuant to resolution 1044 and 1054 (1996) they had requested all foreigners to leave the country, though he clarified that the Sudan had not received accusations from any State against any of those expelled from the Sudan and none of those expelled was anyone who needed to be brought to justice in any country. They were expelled because the Sudan wished to be outside the circle of suspicion and to comply with the Security Council resolutions. He reiterated that the steps that had been taken by the Sudan were genuine measures that had yielded tangible and well-known results. Noting that the Security Council had called upon the Sudan to improve its relations with its neighbours, he noted that the Sudan had 10 neighbour States and had extremely good, friendly relations with 6 of them, to which they were committed through various agreements and joint ministerial committees that met regularly. He stated that the relations between the Sudan and Ethiopia had been very good, until the attempt on the life of the President of Egypt caused a misunderstanding between them. The Sudan had been eager to continue its contacts with Ethiopia to try to settle the problem and move forward. Their second neighbour was Uganda, with regard to which they inevitably harboured some resentment since it was well known that Uganda had supported the insurgency movement in southern Sudan. Eritrea, he said was a "poison dagger", which posed dangers that threatened to spread throughout the Horn of Africa. He noted that the President of Eritrea had declared in public that it would provide armed assistance to any opposition groups aiming to topple the legitimate Government of the Sudan. In addition, there had been intrusions into Sudanese territory and the laying of mines inside residential areas. Nevertheless, he underlined that the Sudan had not initiated hostilities against Eritrea and stood ready to eliminate the tension between the two countries if Eritrea showed its good intentions towards the Sudan. Regarding Egypt, he noted that major efforts had been made between the officials of their two countries, which had been crowned with success at the summit meeting between their Presidents in Cairo. In conclusion he stated that these were the efforts that the Sudan had made to comply with the Security Council resolutions.⁵⁴

Speaking before the vote, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that despite everything that had just been said by the representative of the Sudan, his delegation was unfortunately not persuaded that the Sudan had yet complied with the Council's demands in resolutions 1044 (1996) and 1054 (1996). That was why the Council had to take further action, it had nothing to do with the orientation of the current Government in the Sudan. Therefore, they welcomed the initiative of Egypt in bringing forward the draft resolution on which they were about to vote. The solution to the problem was simple: the Government of the Sudan had to recognize international concern about its behaviour and comply with the demands of the Security Council and OAU. He noted that one of the principal demands of the resolution was the requirement for the Sudan to ensure that the three suspects were extradited, and his delegation was convinced that the Sudan knew where they were. If they were still in the Sudan, the Government had to extradite them under the terms of the Bilateral Extradition Treaty. If the Sudan had helped at least one of the three leave the country, the resolution clearly required that the Government of the Sudan take immediate action, including, for example, by providing the necessary evidence, to bring about extradition to Ethiopia, and they would not be satisfied until the Sudan had secured that objective and had also ceased its support for international terrorism. He noted the moves the Sudan had made to distance itself from some of the terrorist groups it had supported and the claims made that it had demonstrated its readiness to cooperate with all parties concerned in seeking and apprehending suspects, but it still needed to do more to comply with the demands of the resolution. The draft resolution showed that the Council would remain engaged in this matter, and that it would not hesitate to implement air sanctions after a period of 90 days if Sudanese compliance were not forthcoming. Finally, he urged those States that had not yet reported to the Secretary-General on the steps they had taken to implement resolution 1054 (1996) to do so, noting that rigorous enforcement of sanctions was an important factor in ensuring the compliance of the Sudan.⁵⁵

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that they had always taken the position of resolutely resisting international terrorism in all its manifestations, including the attempted assassination of the President of Egypt, and had cooperated with various States in a concrete and constructive manner, including contributing in preparing the anti-terrorist decisions of the Group of Eight. He stated that an objective investigation of the assassination attempt could be accomplished only through constructive cooperation between all interested parties, including within OAU and other regional mechanisms, as well as at the bilateral level, with the involvement of competent international agencies. He noted that they were familiar with the pertinent proposal at Interpol, which unfortunately had been left floating in the air. Important information might come to light also during the in camera trial going on in Addis Ababa, and he repeated their request for members of the Security Council to be informed about that trial. He stated that his country could not fail to be concerned by the fact that when resolutions 1044 (1996) and 1054 (1996) were adopted, the prevailing approach in the Council was aimed not so much at investigating those suspected of perpetrating a terrorist act as at isolating the Sudan. In order to satisfy short-term interests, the voices were ignored of those who strongly objected to the unsound practice of imposing sanctions on the basis of vague, and therefore hard-to-meet demands, without clearly formulated criteria and conditions for their imposition and lifting. Unfortunately, a repetition of that approach could be seen in the draft resolution. The draft resolution predetermined the inevitability of an air embargo, without an attempt being made to assess the negative humanitarian consequences of this measure for the population of the Sudan, despite the fact that his delegation had suggested that such a prior evaluation be conducted. Moreover, operative paragraph 3 of the draft resolution would impose sanctions not only on Sudan Airways but on all other Sudanese airlines, which had never been accused of anything. He maintained that the question was how the Sudan should comply with the provisions of the resolution when they went beyond the limits of the Sudan's national jurisdiction and real capacity. The rash use of the sanctions instrument was not only destructive for the people of the Sudan and the countries of the region, but created a precedent which could do real damage to the authority of the Council by giving the impression that the Council was not able to draw conclusions from past lessons. In that light, his delegation could not support the draft resolution.⁵⁶

The representative of Indonesia stated that they were deeply concerned by the attempt against the President of Egypt and had always held a position against international terrorism, and reiterated that the Sudan bore the ultimate responsibility for fully complying with the provisions of Council resolutions 1044 (1996) and 1054 (1996). However, he expressed his belief that a gradual approach to dealing with the matter would have been preferable, particularly in the light of the efforts made by the Sudan. Given the insufficient information available at this juncture, he expressed his belief that it would be more constructive for the Council to further encourage the Sudan to undertake efforts to provide information on the suspects, including their whereabouts, by allowing more time and avoiding overly harsh measures that in the end might prove to be counterproductive in their attempt to ensure the cooperation of the Sudan with the international community. Therefore, he expressed his delegation's reservations regarding the imposition of wide-ranging sanctions against Sudan Airways, as reflected in operative paragraph 3 of the draft resolution. He also expressed their concern about the impact of the sanctions on the Sudan, noting that sanctions were not meant to be punitive and the adverse humanitarian impact, in particular in the case of the Sudan, could not be so quickly dismissed. He stated that while it was imperative to address not only the concerns of the issue at hand, but also to maintain strict adherence to the basic principle of non-punitive sanctions. For it would be a meaningless exercise if resolutions were adopted which were not implementable, as that would only affect the credibility of the Council. In the light of those observations, he stated that he would vote in favour of the draft resolution.⁵⁷

The representative of China stated that their delegation had reaffirmed on many occasions that it had consistently and resolutely been opposed to any form of terrorist activities, and that the attempt on the life of the President of Egypt constituted a serious incident. He maintained that all sides concerned needed to join in a common effort to apprehend the suspects for prosecution. Ever since the Council adopted resolution 1054 (1996), all sides concerned had made considerable efforts to implement its relevant provisions. In his report, the Secretary-General also pointed out that as a party directly concerned, the Sudan had on many occasions indicated in specific terms its opposition to terrorism and had taken some practical actions. He stated that in China's view, the Council needed to continue to encourage all sides to make greater efforts in order to settle the question as soon as possible. He maintained that China's position of principle on sanctions was a consistent one: they did not consider sanctions a panacea because sanctions, or the tightening of sanctions, could not solve a problem, but might aggravate it. Restrictions on Sudan Airways constituted an escalation in the sanctions regime on the Sudan. He maintained that although the draft resolution did not determine the date of entry into force of its provisions, it represented a clear decision on imposing such sanctions. This question concerning the Sudan was already quite complicated and he expressed their concern that tightening sanctions against the Sudan might further compound the problem. He noted that the Chinese delegation proposed some amendments to the draft resolution during consultations but that those reasonable suggestions had not found acceptance. Therefore, they would abstain in the vote on the draft resolution.⁵⁸

Several other speakers spoke, condemning international terrorism and the assassination attempt on the President of Egypt as a threat to international peace and security, stating that the Sudan had not fully complied with resolution 1044 (1996) and calling on them to do so, and noting that the draft resolution specified possible measures to be taken if the Sudan failed to comply after 90 days.⁵⁹

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted by 13 votes to none, with 2 abstentions (China, Russian Federation), as resolution 1070 (1996),⁶⁰ which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 1044 (1996) of 31 January 1996 and 1054 (1996) of 26 April 1996,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 10 July 1996,

Taking note of the letters dated 31 May, 24 June and 2 July 1996 from the Permanent Representative of the Sudan to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council,

Taking note also of the letter dated 10 July 1996 from the Permanent Representative of the Federal Democratic Republic of Ethiopia to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council,

Gravely alarmed at the terrorist assassination attempt on the life of the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt, in Addis Ababa on 26 June 1995, and convinced that those responsible for that act must be brought to justice,

Noting that in its statements of 11 September and 19 December 1995 the Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution of the Organization of African Unity considered the attempt on the life of President Mubarak as aimed, not only at the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt, and not only at the sovereignty, integrity and stability of Ethiopia, but also at Africa as a whole,

Regretting the fact that the Government of the Sudan has not yet complied with the requests of the Central Organ of the Mechanism set out in those statements,

Noting the continued efforts of the Organization of African Unity to ensure the Sudan's compliance with the requests of the Central Organ of the Mechanism, and regretting that the Government of the Sudan has not responded adequately to the efforts of the Organization of African Unity,

Deeply alarmed that the Government of the Sudan has failed to comply with the requests set out in paragraph 4 of resolution 1044 (1996) as reaffirmed in paragraph 1 of resolution 1054 (1996), ⁵⁷ Ibid., pp. 11-12.

⁶⁰ For the vote, see S/PV.3690, p. 14.

Reaffirming that the suppression of acts of international terrorism, including those in which States are involved, is essential for the maintenance of international peace and security,

Determining that the non-compliance by the Government of the Sudan with the requests set out in paragraph 4 of resolution 1044 (1996) as reaffirmed in paragraph 1 of resolution 1054 (1996) constitutes a threat to international peace and security,

Determined to eliminate international terrorism and to ensure the effective implementation of resolutions 1044 (1996) and 1054 (1996), and to that end acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Demands once again that the Government of the Sudan comply fully and without further delay with the requests set out in paragraph 4 of resolution 1044 (1996) as reaffirmed in paragraph 1 of resolution 1054 (1996);

2. Notes the steps taken by some Member States to give effect to the provisions set out in paragraph 3 of resolution 1054 (1996), and requests those States that have not yet done so to report to the Secretary-General as soon as possible on the steps they have taken to that end;

3. Decides that all States shall deny aircraft permission to take off from, land in, or overfly their territories if the aircraft is registered in the Sudan, or owned, leased or operated by or on behalf of Sudan Airways or by any undertaking, wherever located or organized, which is substantially owned or controlled by Sudan Airways, or owned, leased or operated by the Government or public authorities of the Sudan, or by an undertaking, wherever located or organized, which is substantially owned or controlled by the Government or public authorities of the Sudan;

4. Also decides that it shall determine, ninety days after the date of adoption of the present resolution, the date of entry into force of the provisions set out in paragraph 3 above and all aspects of the modalities of its implementation, unless it decides before then, on the basis of a report submitted by the Secretary-General, on the compliance of the Sudan with the demand in paragraph 1 above;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to submit, by 15 November 1996, a report on the compliance of the Sudan with the provisions of paragraph 1 above;

6. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

The representative of Egypt stated that since the adoption of resolution 1054 (1996) in April, and despite the fact that it imposed limited diplomatic measures to compel the Sudan to comply with the demands of the international community, the Sudan had persisted in its attempts to avoid complying with the Security Council's requests. He informed the Council that at the time of the meeting of the Presidents of Egypt and the Sudan at the Arab summit, Egypt had thought that the Sudan had the political will expected of it by the international community and had accepted the request of the Sudan to open a channel of communication between the countries' security authorities. Unfortunately they had later realized that the Sudan's aim was not to enter into a dialogue, but rather to try to take advantage of Egypt's assent to starting that dialogue to give the false impression to the international community that the Sudan was doing what was expected of it. He stated that resolution 1070 (1996) was a “mere wake-up call” addressed to the Sudan, which said that it must cooperate with the Council and with the concerned countries in order to comply with the requests of the Council. He reiterated that Egypt found it unacceptable to be behind anything that affected the interests of the Sudanese people, added to their economic suffering in their daily life or harmed the Sudan’s territorial integrity. He called on the Sudan to take advantage of the grace period given it by the Council until the middle of November 1996, to translate “sweet talk into proper action”. He expressed his hope that the coming period would witness positive developments, in terms of the extradition of the suspects, the provision of any information the Sudan had about them and the severance of all ties with terrorist organizations so that the interests of the people of the Sudan would not suffer.⁶¹

10. The situation in the Great Lakes region

Initial proceedings

Decision of 1 November 1996 (3708th meeting): statement by the President

By letters dated 14 October and 24 October 1996, respectively, addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹ the Secretary-General informed the Council of the outbreak of hostilities and worsening situation in eastern Zaire. In South Kivu, hostilities had broken out in the region of the Banyamulenge, who spoke the language of Rwanda and included both Hutus and Tutsis, though the majority were Tutsis. They were already settled in this area when Zaire became independent in 1960. In 1972, like all persons living within Zaire’s borders, they were granted Zairian nationality. However, a nationality law of 1981 subsequently withdrew this status from them but the law had not been enforced until the early months of 1996. Pressure on the Banyamulenge to leave Zaire and move to Rwanda had resulted in escalating hostilities between the Zairian armed forces and Tutsi groups, attacks on refugee camps and escalating tensions between Rwanda and Zaire, including cross-border exchanges of heavy weapons fire and mutual accusations between the two Governments. The result was that the humanitarian situation had further worsened. An estimated 300,000 people were on the move in the Uvira and Bukavu regions of Zaire, bordering Rwanda and Burundi, in the face of intensified fighting. Those on the move included the 220,000 refugees — 143,000 from Burundi and 75,000 from Rwanda — who had fled camps over the weekend of 19-20 October 1996. He had come to the conclusion that the deteriorating situation required him to offer his good offices to assist the Government of Zaire in addressing the political and security aspects of the problems in the eastern part of the country because of the threat they presented to peace and the security in the region and also because it could have a negative impact on the efforts already launched by the United Nations, at that Government’s request, to provide assistance to the elections planned for 1997. He stated that once again the failure to address the root causes of the conflicts in the region of the Great Lakes, in political and economic as well as security terms, had unleashed a spiral of violence and human suffering that might spin out of control unless urgent measures were taken immediately to contain the situation.

At its 3708th meeting, held on 1 November 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the letters from the Secretary-General and the item entitled “The situation in the Great Lakes region”. The President (Indonesia) then invited the representative of Zaire at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting the President called the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 23 October 1996 from the representative of Rwanda addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting a short synopsis of the historical background of the Banyamulenge people in Zaire and the current events which had led to the crisis in eastern Zaire,² and a letter dated 25 October 1996 from the representative of Ireland addressed to the president of the Security Council, transmitting a declaration which was issued by the European Union on the situation in ⁶¹ Ibid., pp. 14-15.

South Kivu.³ The President also called attention to his letter dated 25 October 1996 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁴ informing him that the situation in Zaire had been brought to the attention of the Security Council and that they supported the sending of a good offices mission to Zaire.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁵

The Security Council is gravely concerned at the deteriorating situation in the Great Lakes region, in particular eastern Zaire, and at the effect of the continued fighting on the inhabitants of the region, and it condemns all acts of violence. It underlines the urgent need for a comprehensive and coordinated response by the international community to prevent any further escalation of the crisis there.

The Council calls for an immediate ceasefire and a complete cessation of all fighting in the region. The Council calls upon all States to respect the sovereignty and territorial integrity of neighbouring States in accordance with their obligations under the Charter of the United Nations. In this connection, it urges all parties to refrain from the use of force as well as cross-border incursions and to engage in a process of negotiation.

The Council, in the light of the letters from the Secretary-General to the President of the Council and the information received from the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and the Assistant Secretary-General for Human Rights regarding the situation in eastern Zaire, is particularly concerned at the humanitarian situation and the resulting large-scale movements of refugees and displaced persons. It fully supports the efforts of the High Commissioner and humanitarian agencies to alleviate the suffering. It calls upon all parties in the region to allow humanitarian agencies and non-governmental organizations to deliver humanitarian assistance to those in need and to ensure the safety of all refugees as well as the security and freedom of movement of all international humanitarian personnel. It underlines the urgent need for the orderly voluntary repatriation and resettlement of refugees and the return of displaced persons, which are crucial elements for the stability of the region.

The Council agrees with the Secretary-General that the situation in eastern Zaire constitutes a serious threat to the stability of the Great Lakes region. It is convinced that the complex problems at issue can only be resolved through early and substantive dialogue. The Council urges the Governments of the region to pursue such a dialogue without further delay in order to defuse the tension. The Council calls upon all States in the region to create the conditions necessary for the speedy and peaceful resolution of the conflict and to desist from any acts that may further exacerbate the situation. In this context, the Council welcomes all regional efforts aimed at defusing tension in the region, in particular the announcement of the meeting of regional leaders scheduled for 5 November 1996 in Nairobi.

The Council fully supports the initiative of the Secretary-General to dispatch to the Great Lakes region a Special Envoy to consult with all concerned in order to establish the facts relating to the present conflict, to develop as a matter of urgency a plan to defuse tension and establish a ceasefire, to promote a process of negotiation, and to submit advice on the mandate to be given to a United Nations political presence which, in consultation with the Governments and parties concerned, will be established in the Great Lakes region. The Council also considers that the Special Envoy should be provided with adequate staff and logistic resources in order to carry out his mission. The Council also expressed the hope that the mediation efforts of the Organization of African Unity and the European Union will complement those of the Special Envoy of the Secretary-General. The Council calls upon all Governments and parties concerned to cooperate fully with the mission of the Special Envoy and to contribute to the search for a comprehensive solution to the problems facing the people of the Great Lakes region. Given the urgency of the situation, the Council expressed the hope that the Special Envoy will travel as soon as possible to the region and provide early information on the situation there.

The Council reiterates that the present situation in eastern Zaire underlines the need to organize a conference for peace, security and development in the Great Lakes region under the auspices of the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity. To this end, it calls upon the Secretary-General to ask his Special Envoy to promote the convening and to encourage the adequate preparation of such a conference on an urgent basis.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 9 November 1996 (3710th meeting):
resolution 1078 (1996)

By a letter dated 7 November 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁶ the Secretary-General informed the Council of the continuing dramatic deterioration of the situation in eastern Zaire. More than 1.2 million Burundian and Rwandan refugees and tens of thousands of Zairians had been displaced by the fighting and the international community now faced a situation in which a million or more people were scattered in eastern Zaire beyond the reach of humanitarian agencies. The events of recent weeks had also proved that peace and security would not be restored in the Great Lakes region unless the refugee problems created by the internal conflicts in Burundi and Rwanda were resolved. Therefore, the immediate requirement was to stabilize the situation and to create secure conditions for the delivery of humanitarian assistance to the refugees and displaced persons. However, the international community's response to this humanitarian crisis must also mark the beginning of a programme of repatriation. He maintained that it was clear that in the prevailing conditions in eastern Zaire, those objectives could not be achieved without the deployment of an international military force whose mandate would be to ensure the minimum security necessary to permit stabilization of the situation and enable civilian agencies to bring relief to the refugees and start preparing for their repatriation. He gave several options for the deployment of such a force and recommended that a group of Member States with the necessary capacity establish a multinational force in consultation with the Secretary-General of the OAU and the regional States concerned.

At its 3710th meeting, held on 9 November 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letter from the Secretary-General in its agenda. At the same meeting, the President, with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Burundi, Rwanda and Zaire, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁷ The President further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 23 October 1996 from the representative of Rwanda addressed to the President of the Security Council⁸ and to a letter dated 31 October 1996 from the representative of Zaire addressed to the President of the Security Council⁹, transmitting a note giving a chronological account of the aggression against the eastern part of Zaire and the historical background to the situation, including an explanation of why the "Banyamulenge" were not Zairian citizens, and stating that the weight of the United Nations was being put behind "historical errors" thus misleading the international community and exacerbating the conflict between the indigenous population and the immigrants.

The President further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 4 November 1996 from the representative of Uganda addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁰ transmitting a statement denying allegations that Uganda was involved in the fighting in Zaire; a letter dated 4 November 1996 from the representative of Italy addressed to the Secretary-General,¹¹ transmitting a press statement issued by Italy concerning the situation in eastern Zaire; and a letter dated 6 November 1996 from the representative of Kenya addressed to the Secretary-General,¹² transmitting the text of the communiqué of the Regional Summit on the Crisis in Eastern Zaire.

The attention of the Council was also drawn to the following documents: a letter dated 8 November 1996 from the representative of the Congo addressed to the Secretary-General,¹³ transmitting a statement on the situation in eastern Zaire made by the President of the Republic of the Congo, President of the Economic Community of Central African States and Chairman of the United Nations Standing Advisory Committee on Security Questions in Central Africa, appealing to the parties to the conflict to bring the hostilities to an end; a letter dated 8 November 1996 from the representative of Rwanda addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁴ informing the Council of their public appeal for all Rwandan refugees to return home; and a letter dated 8 November 1996 from the representative of Zaire addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁵ agreeing to the deployment of a multinational force pursuant to Chapter VII of the Charter, giving the conditions for deployment and calling on the United Nations to order Rwanda and Burundi to withdraw their troops from occupied Zairian territory, in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Charter of the United Nations and the Charter of the Organization of African Unity, and to strongly condemn the murderers of soldiers from the Zairian security contingent in the camps under United Nations mandate and the massacre of innocent civilians.

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote, and adopted unanimously as resolution 1078 (1996), which reads:

Decision of 15 November 1996 (3713th meeting): resolution 1080 (1996)

By a letter dated 14 November 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁶ the Secretary-General transmitted a letter from the representative of Canada stating his Government's intention to take the lead in organizing and commanding a temporary multinational operation consistent with the objectives outlined in resolution 1078; envisaging a resolution under Chapter VII of the Charter providing for a mandate to act; and encouraging the Council to authorize a follow-on operation on the basis of the recommendations of the Secretary-General to succeed the temporary multinational force.

At its 3713th meeting, held on 15 November 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President, with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Argentina, Austria, Belgium, Burundi, Cameroon, Canada, the Congo, Denmark, Finland, Gabon, Ireland, Israel, Luxembourg, Mali, the Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Rwanda, Spain, Sweden and Zaire, at their own request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Argentina, Belgium, Botswana, Canada, Chile,

Denmark, Egypt, France, Gabon, Germany, Guinea-Bissau, Honduras, Indonesia, Ireland, Italy, Mali, the Netherlands, Norway, Poland, Portugal, the Republic of Korea, Spain, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the United States of America and Zaire, and co-sponsored by Austria, Brazil, Cameroon, the Congo, Finland, Israel, Luxembourg and Sweden.¹⁷

At the same meeting the President also drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 11 November 1996 from the Organization of African Unity (OAU) addressed to the Secretary-General, transmitting the text of the communiqué of the Fourth Extraordinary Session of the Central Organ of the OAU Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution;¹⁸ a letter dated 15 November 1996 from the representative of Zaire addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting the text of the position of the Government of Zaire, on the deployment of an international force in Eastern Zaire;¹⁹ and to a letter dated 15 November 1996 from the representative of Eritrea addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting a press statement concerning the situation in eastern Zaire.²⁰

At the same meeting the President also drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 15 November 1996 from the representative of Rwanda addressed to the President of the Security Council, informing the Council that thousands of Rwandan refugees were returning to Rwanda.²¹

At the same meeting the representative of Zaire expressed his sincere thanks to the Secretary-General of the United Nations for his initiative in submitting the matter of the prevailing situation in eastern Zaire to the Security Council. He stated that his country was the victim of obvious aggression and that the key to the situation was the "problem of refugees, be they from Rwanda or Burundi". He called on the international community to intervene and exert pressure, particularly on Kigali. He expressed his belief that once the refugee problem had been solved calm would return to the region. He suggested that the cause of the refugee problem was the Government of Rwanda forcing a portion of its population out of the country after the 1994 tragedy. He recalled that Zaire was the sole country to agree to the Secretary-General's proposal to convene a regional conference in the region while Rwanda had rejected that initiative, called for the departure of the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda, reduced the number of United Nations staff to a level at which they could not work effectively and minimized the number of non-governmental organizations that were permitted to work there. He reminded the Council that Zaire had made a proposal to the Security Council for its help in separating armed elements from civilian refugees which was turned down due to the cost. He wondered how much the current operation would cost and suggested that it was the reluctance of the Council to act then that had brought them to the situation in which they found themselves. He recalled the efforts of Zaire in combating Iraqi aggression against Kuwait in 1990 and questioned the "timidity with which the Security Council is dealing with the aggression" against Zaire. Finally, he expressed his gratitude for the draft resolution that would enable the deployment of the multinational force to eastern Zaire and allow for the possibility of an extended mandate for the force under United Nations auspices.²²

The representative from Rwanda stated that his Government had been registering a hundred refugees per minute crossing the border from Zaire. He expected that the bulk of Rwandan refugees would have returned to the country by the following week and that he believed conditions were in place for the orderly return of many more. He maintained that local and Government machinery had been mobilized throughout the country to prepare the welcome centres for the refugees. He stated further that in the light of these developments it was the view of the Government of Rwanda that the proposed multinational force was no longer relevant, at least as far as rescuing the Rwandan refugees in eastern Zaire and that the multinational force needed to be smaller, the location of its troops reconsidered and a new, three-month mandate, to disarm the former Rwandan Government soldiers and militia, sought. He also expressed his view that the international community should help by making adequate resources available to facilitate the rehabilitation and integration of the returning refugees. He urged the Council not to hurry into the adoption of a resolution before they had the full facts about the changing circumstances on the ground. He also denied the allegations put forward by the delegation of Zaire. He called attention to a document,²³ which gave the historical background to the situation, and suggested that the root cause of the crisis in Zaire was its “denationalization” of its own citizens.²⁴

The representative of Burundi stated that while the principal cause of the current situation was the large number of refugees who fled after the Rwandan genocide, the greatest blame had to be borne by the former Rwandan Army and its militias. He stated that Burundi, Rwanda and Zaire, being aware of the risk inherent in the presence of large numbers of refugees along their shared borders and backed by UNHCR, had continually requested the assistance of the international community for a triple operation: the repatriation of the refugees to their countries; the disarmament of some 40,000 runaway Rwandan soldiers and militia; and encampment in an area far from the frontiers for refugees who opted to remain abroad. He maintained that it was the failure of the Security Council to neutralize the former Rwandan troops that had led to the present disaster and that the primary purpose of the multinational force should be to disarm these troops and quarter them in areas remote from the countries’ borders. He proposed an international conference on finding ways to bring about a return of refugees to their respective homelands that would be entrusted to the United Nations and OAU in close cooperation with the rest of the international community. He also stated that the four-month-old total economic blockade of Burundi, continued despite the fact that the new regime had abided by all the conditions imposed for two months, contravened the norms of international law and the charters of both the United Nations and OAU. He maintained that the embargo made it extremely difficult to deal with the Burundian refugees returning from Zaire and wondered how long the embargo would be maintained. He concluded by warning that failing to disarm the Rwandan soldiers could mean repetition of the error committed in 1994 when the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda (UNAMIR) stood by passively and then fled at the height of the genocide.²⁵

The representative of Canada recalled that the Council in resolution 1078 (1996) had stated that while the countries of the region had a responsibility to create the conditions necessary for the resolution of the crisis, the international community also needed to act. Therefore, Canada had decided to take a substantial role in mounting a multinational humanitarian intervention force to make possible the safe delivery of humanitarian aid and to facilitate the voluntary repatriation of refugees. He informed the Council that over 20 countries had committed over 10,000 troops, with the main body from Canada, France, the United Kingdom and the United States, and that they had firm offers from many other countries and regions. While efforts to find donors to contribute to the United Nations trust fund to support the participation of African countries were progressing, more help was urgently required. He noted that African participation in the multinational force was of vital importance to its legitimacy and expressed his gratitude for the firm offers of battalions from Ethiopia, Malawi and Senegal, and welcomed the vital involvement of regional leaders and the OAU. He urged as many countries as possible to assist African countries to bear the costs of participation and to provide strategic transport and medical support. He stated that the force, as noted in paragraph 3 of the draft resolution, would facilitate the immediate return of humanitarian organizations, the effective delivery of humanitarian aid by civilian relief organizations for displaced persons, refugees and civilians at risk and the voluntary, orderly repatriation of refugees by UNHCR. Therefore, Canada did not envisage disarmament or interposition as elements of the force’s mandate. The force would be deployed for four months alongside a civil component which included direct United Nations involvement. He stated that the transition from the force to a longer-term United Nations operation that would focus primarily on civilian peacekeeping, political reconciliation and reinforcement of the institutions of civil society needed to be carefully thought out. He concluded by urging the Security Council to authorize the operation without delay.²⁶

Speaking before the vote, the representative of France stated that his delegation would vote in favour of the draft resolution, but emphasized that the force had a strictly humanitarian mandate. He underlined the importance of convening of an international conference and noted that the proposal had been formally endorsed by the Organization of African Unity. He praised Canada for agreeing to lead the force and stated that the force should be followed by a United Nations operation to continue its work.²⁷

The representative of the United Kingdom, while maintaining his support for the resolution, emphasized the need for a properly balanced force, of a size adequate to the task and with a clear and achievable mandate. Due to the temporary nature of the operation, he stressed the importance of the United Nations immediately beginning preparations on the follow-on operation. He cautioned that the mission must not freeze the present situation as it would result in the re-establishment of camps in which armed elements would be allowed to operate. He hoped that African States would play an important role in the multinational force and the follow up and stressed the importance of them participating actively in the planning of both. He encouraged States that were not providing troops to contribute to the voluntary trust fund.²⁸

The representative of China expressed his concern over the renewed fighting and the displacement of refugees. He stated that the international community, including the Security Council, was duty-bound under Article 24 to settle the present crisis in the Great Lakes Region. Therefore, the Chinese delegation would support the resolution. Believing that the international military intervention in eastern Zaire involved many complicated and sensitive questions, he underlined the following principles to be observed in carrying out such an intervention: first, the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the countries concerned, particularly Zaire, had to be respected and there could be no interference in the internal affairs of these countries. Second, before initiating the action, there needed to be full consultations with the States concerned and their consent obtained. Third, the action needed to be strictly confined to humanitarian purposes. Fourth, since the Security Council had authorized the intervention, its political guidance had to be accepted. Fifth, there needed to be a clear time-frame and terms of reference. He also expressed his reservations about invoking Chapter VII of the Charter since the action mandated by the draft resolution was strictly confined to humanitarian purposes.²⁹

The representative of the Russian Federation expressed his deep concern with the humanitarian tragedy unfolding in eastern Zaire and which threatened to grow into a regional military conflict. He called upon all of the belligerent parties to cease hostilities immediately, enter into political dialogue and refrain from any actions that could exacerbate the crisis. He hoped that the multinational force would act impartially and in cooperation with the Secretary-General, the United Nations Coordinator for humanitarian assistance and the relevant humanitarian organizations and that it would regularly inform the Security Council of the course of the operation. He underlined the significance of the draft resolution's emphasis of the need for an international conference under the auspices of the United Nations and OAU to ensure a comprehensive political solution to the problems of the region. Finally, he stated that the delegation of the Russian Federation would support the draft resolution on the basis of the understanding that the Security Council would authorize the establishment of a follow-on operation as stated in paragraph 12 of the draft resolution.³⁰

The representative of the United States noted that the complexities of the situation in eastern Zaire, with multiple armed groups and a fragile political environment, required prudent preparation and expressed their strong support for the initiative of the Government of Canada to lead a multinational force. She welcomed the offers of nations around the world to participate in the multinational force that the Security Council would be authorizing with the draft resolution. She stated that the long-term solution to the problem was the voluntary repatriation of the refugees and that the Government of Rwanda had taken credible steps in this regard. The United States was working closely with other Governments, the United Nations agencies and the humanitarian community to determine the precise humanitarian requirements and how it might most usefully participate in these efforts and facilitate the orderly and successful repatriation of the refugees. She praised the efforts of the Secretary-General's Special Envoy, OAU, regional leaders, the European Union and other mediators to resolve the underlying problems. She urged all the parties in the region to cease hostilities directed at one another, cooperate with the mediation efforts, permit the flow of humanitarian assistance, support the secure repatriation of refugees and cooperate with the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, which was authorized to deal with those persons responsible for the 1994 genocide.³¹

Several other speakers also expressed their support for the resolution. While some emphasized the importance of the humanitarian mission and others the need for the voluntary repatriation of refugees, everyone recognized that both were critical aspects of the mission. Several members underlined the importance of participation by OAU and the African nations and the need for countries to donate to the trust fund to support that participation. A number of countries expressed their gratitude to Canada for leading the multinational force. The importance of the regional conference, of the follow-on United Nations mission and of the voluntary nature of repatriation of refugees was also stressed.³²

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1080 (1996), which reads:

Decision of 7 February 1997 (3738th meeting):
statement by the President

At the 3738th meeting of the Security Council, held on 7 February 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Kenya), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Zaire, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting the President called the attention of the Council to letters dated 6 January and 1 February, respectively, from the representative of Zaire addressed to the President of the Security Council,³³ transmitting the position of the Government of Zaire on the non-implementation of Security Council resolution 1080 (1996), informing the Security Council of armed aggression against Zaire by Burundi, Rwanda and Uganda, and requesting the Council to recognize and condemn it and adopt such measures as are required to put a stop to it. The President also drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 29 January 1999 from the representative of Kenya addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁴ transmitting the text of the communiqué issued at the end of the meeting of Cameroon, the Congo, Kenya, South Africa, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zimbabwe on the current situation in the Great Lakes region, and to letters dated 30 January and 4 February 1997, respectively, addressed to the President of the Security Council from the representatives of Uganda and Rwanda,³⁵ denying the allegations of aggressions by Zaire.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:³⁶

The Security Council expresses its grave concern at the deteriorating situation in the Great Lakes region, in particular in eastern Zaire, and at its humanitarian consequences on the refugees and inhabitants of the region. It calls for an end to the hostilities and the, withdrawal of all external forces, including mercenaries.

The Council also expresses its deep concern over the humanitarian crisis in the region and urges all parties to allow humanitarian agencies and organizations access to deliver humanitarian assistance to those in need. It also demands that the parties ensure the safety of all refugees and displaced persons as well as the security and freedom of movement of all United Nations and humanitarian personnel. It underlines the obligation of all concerned to respect the relevant provisions of international humanitarian law.

The Council reaffirms its commitment to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Zaire and other States in the Great Lakes region, and to the principle of the inviolability of borders. In this connection, the Council calls upon all the States in the region to refrain, in accordance with their obligations under the Charter of the United Nations and the Charter of the Organization of African Unity, from any act, including cross-border incursions, which would threaten the sovereignty and territorial integrity of any State and exacerbate the situation in the region, including endangering the refugees and displaced persons. Decision of 18 February 1997 (3741st meeting):

By a letter dated 18 February 1997 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁷ the Secretary-General informed the Council of the mission of the joint United Nations/Organization of African Unity Special Representative for the Great Lakes region, who was at that time in Kinshasa working on a five-point peace plan which was based on the statement by the President of the Security Council of 7 February 1997,³⁸ and which he hoped would be accepted by all parties. The Secretary-General stated that it would greatly assist the Special Representative's efforts if consideration were to be given by the Security Council, on an urgent basis, to an appropriate acknowledgement and support of his initiative. He also informed the Council of other initiatives to restore peace in eastern Zaire and that the Foreign Ministers of Cameroon, the Congo, Kenya, South Africa, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zimbabwe and the Secretary-General of OAU were in Kinshasa.

At its 3741st meeting, held on 18 February 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in prior consultations, the Security Council included the item in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President invited the representative of Zaire, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting the President also drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.³⁹

The President further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 16 February 1997 from the representative of Zaire addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴⁰ transmitting the text of a communiqué from the Government of Zaire which requested the Security Council to meet urgently in order to consider Zaire's complaint against Uganda and Rwanda, issue a strong condemnation of that aggression, order the withdrawal of foreign troops and establish monitoring mechanisms for that purpose, take measures to put an end to the extermination of Hutu refugees and remove all the Rwandan refugees in Zairian territory.

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1097 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Gravely concerned at the deteriorating situation in the Great Lakes region, in particular eastern Zaire, and expressing serious concern over the safety of refugees and displaced persons whose lives are in danger,

The President then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 5 March 1997 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting a copy of a statement by Zaire formally declaring its acceptance of the United Nations peace plan set out in resolution 1097 (1997).⁴¹

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴²

The Council reiterates, in that respect, its full support for the five-point peace plan for eastern Zaire contained in its resolution 1097 (1997) of 18 February 1997 and welcomes the endorsement of that plan by the Organization of African Unity at its sixty-fifth ordinary session of the Council of Ministers held in Tripoli from 24 to 28 February 1997.

The Council is concerned about the effect that the continued fighting is having on the refugees and inhabitants of the region and calls upon all parties to allow access by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and humanitarian agencies to refugees and displaced persons and to guarantee the safety of refugees and displaced persons as well as United Nations and other humanitarian aid workers. It also takes note with concern of allegations of violations of international humanitarian law in the conflict zone and welcomes the sending of a United Nations fact-finding mission to the area.

The Council reiterates its full support for the joint United Nations/Organization of African Unity Special Representative for the Great Lakes region and urges all Governments in the region and all the parties concerned to cooperate with him fully. It also urges the parties to the conflict to begin a dialogue, under his auspices, in order to achieve a lasting political settlement.

The Council welcomes all efforts, including those of the organizations and States of the region, aimed at resolving the crisis, inter alia, the initiative of President Daniel arap Moi of Kenya to convene another regional meeting in Nairobi on 19 March 1997 and the initiative of the Organization of African Unity to organize a summit of the members of the Central Organ of its Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution on the Great Lakes region in Lomé before the end of March 11 1997. The Council encourages other facilitators and representatives of the regional organizations, including the European Union, and the States concerned to coordinate closely their efforts with those of the Special Representative.

B. Letter dated 29 June 1998 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council

Letter dated 25 June 1998 from the Permanent Representative of the Democratic Republic of the Congo to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General

Letter dated 25 June 1998 from the Permanent Representative of Rwanda to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General

Decision of 13 July 1998 (3903rd meeting): statement by the President

By a letter dated 29 June 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the Secretary-General transmitted the report of his Investigative Team in the Democratic Republic of the Congo.⁶ He had established the Team in July 1997 to help break a deadlock between the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and the Joint Investigative Mission mandated by the Commission on Human Rights to investigate allegations of massacres and other violations of human rights which arose from the situation that had prevailed in what was then eastern Zaire since September 1996. The Government had objected to the participation in the Mission of the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Zaire and to the period covered by its mandate. They urged that the mandate be extended back to 1 March 1993, in order to include: the ethnic violence between self-styled “indigenous Zairians” against Zairians of both Hutu and Tutsi origin, as well as subsequent developments including the influx of Hutu refugees from Rwanda in 1994 following the genocide there; the insecurity generated in both Zaire and Rwanda by armed members of the ex-Forces armées rwandaises and Interahamwe militia who maintained strict control over the refugees and launched raids into Rwanda; and the increasing violence to which Zairian Tutsis were subjected until the October 1996 uprising. In response, the Secretary-General had extended the period under investigation back to 1 March 1993 and appointed Chief Justice Atsu-Koffi Amega (Togo) as leader of his Investigative Team, with a mandate to investigate serious violations of human rights and international humanitarian law alleged to have been committed in the Democratic Republic of the Congo up to 31 December 1997. The Secretary-General noted that the events described in the report of the Team had not occurred in a vacuum. The background to those events was the 1994 genocide in Rwanda, which led directly to the violence of the 1994-1996 period in eastern Zaire, which had been publicly denounced by the Rwandan Government as a resumption in a neighbouring country of the 1994 genocidal practices. That same violence resulted in the creation, in September 1996, of the Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of the Congo, and its successful military campaign against the regime of President Mobutu Sese Seko, which ended in Kinshasa on 17 May 1997. While it was a source of regret that the Team was not allowed to carry out its mission fully and without hindrance, they were able to reach a number of conclusions that were supported by strong evidence. The report found that all parties to the violence during the period under consideration had committed serious violations of human rights or international humanitarian law. It also found that the killings and the denial of humanitarian assistance to Rwandan Hutu refugees by the Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of the Congo (AFDL) and its allies, including elements of the Rwandan Patriotic Army, constituted crimes against humanity. The members of the Team also believed that some of the killings may have constituted genocide and called for further investigation of those crimes and of their motivation. The Secretary-General underlined that as the members of the Council read the report they would encounter one of the root causes of the recent conflicts in the Great Lakes region of Africa: a vicious cycle of violations of human rights and revenge, fuelled by impunity. That cycle had to be brought to an end if lasting peace and stability were to be restored to the region. He maintained that the international community, and especially donor countries, had a prominent role to play in all of this. He stated that in considering the attached report the Council would no doubt wish to respond to it in a way that reflected their responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security and at the same time gave full weight to consolidating the fragile stability in the region. Violations of human rights on such a scale as to constitute crimes against humanity had to be regarded as posing a threat to international peace and security. At the same time, full weight needed to be given to the importance of consolidating the fragile stability in the region, which plainly required a great deal of international assistance. It would, in his view, be a serious mistake if the international community were to turn its back on the countries concerned. What was needed was a consistent policy of critical engagement.

By a letter dated 25 June 1998 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁷ the representative of the Democratic Republic of the Congo stated with regard to the report of the Investigative Team that the Democratic Republic of the Congo was being charged by certain sectors of international public opinion, which alleged that units of the Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of the Congo had carried out massacres of Rwandan Hutu refugees. The frequent allusions to atrocities falsely attributed to AFDL had led the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights to request the Special Rapporteur for the former Zaire, appointed on 9 March 1994 by the Commission on Human Rights, to make another visit to the Democratic Republic of the Congo, who had prepared a very controversial report, which reflected a large degree of partiality. Particularly, he had deliberately and completely failed to mention that the main factors which led to the tragedy that occurred in the eastern part of the Democratic Republic of the Congo were criminal acts committed by the former regimes in the Great Lakes region. From the outset and in keeping with the spirit of Security Council resolution 1161 (1998) of 9 April 1998, the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo had requested that the United Nations investigation should include the period prior to the war of liberation because it was a period characterized by numerous violations of human rights committed by the former Forces armées zaïroises, the former Rwandan Army and the Interahamwe militias. Despite the differences between the parties, a compromise was struck, and after discussions, the Preparatory Commission and the Congolese Government on 4 June 1997 signed a protocol of agreement concerning the conduct of the investigation of the alleged massacres and other violations of human rights. However, notwithstanding the signing of the protocol of agreement, the investigative mission had continually distinguished itself by violating the agreed provisions. He noted that the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo had protested against: the failure of the mission to respect the agreed space and time period of the investigation; interference in the internal political affairs of the Congo; failure to respect the cultural values of the region being investigated; and a deliberate attempt to instigate incidents inimical to the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

He further stated that the report was a dangerous document that, contrary to the ideals of international peace and security propagated by the United Nations, exacerbated the ethnic hatred between Hutus and Tutsis by oversimplifying the complex problems which plagued the Great Lakes region. It was also politically motivated, its object being to camouflage the responsibilities of the Powers implicated in the genocide in Rwanda, specifically France in Operation Turquoise; and to upset the political stability of the Great Lakes region. Moreover, the rumours collected after several investigations were based on samplings too small to be statistically viable, with the result that the document was not based on concrete facts. As a result, he stated that the Government simply rejected the conclusions of the report as being a collection of unfounded allegations.

By a letter dated 25 June 1998 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁸ the representative of Rwanda stated that the report was incomplete and thus inconclusive, as the Team had admitted throughout the text; that the text was emotive; and significantly biased and bent on non-substantive issues of the terms of reference or mandate. Publication of such a report did not serve the human rights cause, and would compromise the possibility of getting to the truth as to what happened. He stated that it was also regrettable that there had been intensive and selective sensitization and lobbying of some Member States about the report before its publication. This was highly inappropriate, as any action that sought to influence Member States contradicted the Charter requirement of the neutrality of the Secretariat, and was a total breach of confidentiality. He maintained that the Government of Rwanda categorically denied and resented the insinuation in the report that Rwandan Government soldiers had committed any human rights violations against a section of its own people or anyone else, in the then Zaire. He maintained that the record of the Government of Rwanda was clear. The Rwandan refugees in the then Zaire had been held hostage by the ex-Forces armées rwandaises, Interahamwe militia and the Forces armées zaïroises, a fact of which the United Nations was well aware. He underlined that it had been the duty of the Government of Rwanda to rescue its people, and that this had been successfully done.

At its 3903rd meeting, held on 13 July 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the above-mentioned letters in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Russian Federation), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Rwanda, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁹

The Security Council condemns the massacres, other atrocities and violations of international humanitarian law committed in Zaire/Democratic Republic of the Congo, and especially its eastern provinces, including crimes against humanity and those other violations described in the report of the Secretary-General's Investigative Team. It notes the responses to the report provided by the Governments of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Rwanda. It recognizes the work of the Investigative Team in documenting some of these violations, in spite of the fact that the Team was not allowed to carry out its mission fully and without hindrance.

The Council reaffirms its commitment to the unity, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the States of the Great Lakes region.

The Council recognizes the necessity to investigate further the massacres, other atrocities and violations of international humanitarian law and to prosecute those responsible. It deplores the delay in the administration of justice. The Council calls upon the Governments of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Rwanda to investigate without delay, in their respective countries, the allegations contained in the report of the Investigative Team and to bring to justice any persons found to have been involved in these or other massacres, atrocities and violations of international humanitarian law. The Council takes note of the stated willingness of the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo to try any of its nationals who are guilty of or were implicated in the alleged massacres. Such action is of great importance in helping to bring an end to impunity and to foster lasting peace and stability in the region. It urges Member States to cooperate with the Governments of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Rwanda in the investigation and prosecution of these persons.

The Council encourages the Governments of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Rwanda to seek international assistance, such as technical assistance, as needed, in this process. It also invites the Governments concerned to consider the inclusion of international observers, as appropriate. It requests the Governments concerned to provide an initial progress report to the Secretary-General by 15 October 1998 on the steps being taken to investigate and prosecute those responsible.

The Council expresses its readiness to consider, as necessary in the light of actions by the Governments of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Rwanda, additional steps to ensure that the perpetrators of the massacres, other atrocities and violations of international humanitarian law are brought to justice.

The Council urges Member States, relevant United Nations bodies and agencies and other international agencies to provide the necessary technical and other assistance, as requested, to the Governments of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Rwanda in the development of independent and impartial judicial systems.

The Council expresses support for United Nations and other international activities to reduce ethnic tensions and promote national reconciliation in the region, and encourages the Governments concerned to continue to cooperate in these activities to bring about a real improvement in the situation.

The Council attaches great importance to the role of the Organization of African Unity and welcomes its decision to establish the International Panel of Eminent Personalities to Investigate the Genocide in Rwanda and the Surrounding Events. It appeals to Member States to contribute to the special trust fund established to support the work of the Panel.

The Council will remain actively seized of the matter.

C. The situation concerning the Democratic Republic of the Congo (continued)

Decision of 31 August 1998 (3922nd meeting): statement by the President

At the 3922nd meeting of the Security Council, held on 31 August 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Slovenia), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of the Democratic Republic of Congo, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁰

¹⁰ S/PRST/1998/26.

The Security Council expresses its deep concern about the current conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, which poses a serious threat to regional peace and security. The Council expresses alarm at the plight of the civilian population throughout the country.

The Council reaffirms the obligation to respect the territorial integrity and national sovereignty of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and other States in the region and the need for all States to refrain from any interference in each other's internal affairs. In this context, the Council calls for a peaceful solution to the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, including an immediate ceasefire, the withdrawal of all foreign forces, and the initiation of a peaceful process of political dialogue with a view to national reconciliation. The Council expresses support for all the regional diplomatic initiatives aimed at a peaceful settlement of the conflict. The problems of the Democratic Republic of the Congo must be solved on the basis of a process of all-inclusive national reconciliation which fully respects the equality and harmony of all ethnic groups and which leads to the holding of democratic, free and fair elections as soon as possible.

The Council urges all parties to respect and protect human rights and respect humanitarian law, in particular the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and the Additional Protocols thereto, of 1977, as applicable to them. It condemns reported summary executions, torture, harassment and detention of civilians based on their ethnic origin, the recruitment and use of child soldiers, the killing or wounding of combatants who have laid down their weapons, hate propaganda, sexual violence and other abuses by any side. In particular, the Council calls for the protection of the civilian population. It recalls the unacceptability of the destruction or rendering useless of objects indispensable to the survival of the civilian population, and in particular of using cuts in the electricity and water supply as a weapon against the population. The Council reaffirms that all persons who commit or order the commission of grave breaches of the above-mentioned instruments are individually responsible in respect of such breaches.

The Council calls for safe and unhindered access for humanitarian agencies to all those in need in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. It calls for unrestricted access by the International Committee of the Red Cross to all detainees in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. It urges all parties to guarantee the safety and security of United Nations and humanitarian personnel.

The Council encourages the Secretary-General to continue to consult, as a matter of urgency, with regional leaders in coordination with the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity about ways to bring about a peaceful and durable solution to the conflict, and to keep it informed about developments and his own efforts. It reaffirms the importance of holding an international conference on peace, security and development in the Great Lakes region under the auspices of the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity.

The Council will follow the situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo closely. It will remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 11 December 1998 (3953rd meeting): statement by the President

At the 3953rd meeting of the Security Council, held on 11 December 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Bahrain), made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹¹

The Security Council recalls the statement by its President of 31 August 1998 on the situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. It remains deeply concerned about the continuing conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, which threatens peace, security and stability in the region, and about its grave humanitarian consequences.

The Council reaffirms the obligation to respect the territorial integrity, political independence and national sovereignty of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and other States in the region, including the obligation to refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations. It also reaffirms the need for all States to refrain from any interference in each other's internal affairs, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations.

The Council, in this context, calls for a peaceful solution to the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, including an immediate ceasefire, the orderly withdrawal of all foreign forces, arrangements for security along the international borders of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the re-establishment of the authority of the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo over the whole territory of the country, and the initiation of an all-inclusive national reconciliation process in the Democratic Republic of the Congo which fully respects the equality and rights of all, irrespective of ethnic origin, and of a political process which leads to the early holding of democratic, free and fair elections.

The Council expresses its support for the regional mediation process begun by the Organization of African Unity and the Southern African Development Community, and currently led by the President of Zambia, takes note of the steps, including the establishment of the ad hoc liaison committee, that have been taken towards a peaceful settlement of the conflict and encourages the President of Zambia to continue his efforts.

The Council welcomes in particular the initiative taken by the Secretary-General at the Twentieth Conference of Heads of ¹¹ S/PRST/1998/36.

State of Africa and France, held in Paris from 26 to 28 November 1998, to bring about an end to the conflict and reach an immediate, unconditional ceasefire. The Council welcomes the public commitments made in Paris in this regard by the President of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the Presidents of Uganda and Rwanda and the Presidents and heads of delegation of Namibia, Zimbabwe, Angola and Chad. It strongly urges them to give effect to these commitments. To that end, the Council calls upon all the parties concerned to participate at the highest level possible in the upcoming summit to be held in Lusaka on 14 and 15 December 1998, and urges them to work in a constructive and flexible spirit with a view to the signing of a ceasefire agreement as a matter of urgency. The Council also encourages participants at the meeting of the central organ of the Organization of African Unity, to be held in Ouagadougou on 17 and 18 December 1998, to use that opportunity to take urgent steps towards a peaceful settlement of the conflict.

The Council is prepared to consider, in the light of efforts towards peaceful resolution of the conflict, the active involvement of the United Nations, in coordination with the Organization of African Unity, including through concrete, sustainable and effective measures, to assist in the implementation of an effective ceasefire agreement and in an agreed process for a political settlement of the conflict.

The Council condemns any violations of human rights and humanitarian law, including acts of and incitement to ethnic hatred and violence by all parties. It urges all parties to respect and protect human rights and respect humanitarian law, in particular the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and the Additional Protocols thereto, of 1977, as applicable to them, and the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide of 1948.

The Council notes with particular concern that the worsening of tensions is resulting in a deterioration of the food situation for the civilian population and an increase in the flow of refugees and displaced persons. In this context, the Council reiterates its call for safe and unhindered access for humanitarian agencies to all those in need in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and once again urges all parties to guarantee the safety and security of United Nations and humanitarian personnel.

The Council also reaffirms the importance of holding, at the appropriate time, an international conference on peace, security and development in the Great Lakes region under the auspices of the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity.

The Council strongly encourages the Secretary-General to continue to work actively with the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity and with all the parties concerned to help to find a peaceful and lasting solution to the conflict. It requests him to keep it informed about efforts to achieve a peaceful solution and to make recommendations on a possible role of the United Nations to this end.

The Council will remain actively seized of the matter.

Deliberations of 19 March 1999 (3987th meeting)

By a letter dated 4 March 1999 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹² the representative of the Democratic Republic of the Congo requested an open debate, at the Council's earliest convenience, on the question "Peaceful settlement of the conflict in the Democratic Republic of Congo".

At its 3987th meeting, held on 19 March 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations on the letter dated 4 March 1999 from the representative of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the Security Council included the letter in its agenda.¹³ At the same meeting the President (China), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Burkina Faso, Burundi, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Egypt, Germany, Japan, Kenya, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Rwanda, South Africa, the Sudan, Uganda, the United Republic of Tanzania, Zambia and Zimbabwe, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The Minister for Human Rights of the Democratic Republic of the Congo stated that Article 52 of the Charter encouraged the Security Council to encourage the development of peaceful settlement of local disputes through regional agreements. They were grateful for the Council's efforts to ensure the proper implementation of that provision, in particular in two statements it made on the situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. He further stated that the Council should not lose sight of the fact that the last paragraph of the same article allowed the Council simultaneously to apply the provisions of Articles 34 and 35 of the Charter. It was for that reason that he had initiated the process that led to this debate, with the goal of drawing the Council's attention to the danger posed by the continuation of the conflict under way in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. He stated that he wished to impress on the Council the difficulties that had meant that, despite all the concessions made by his Government, the negotiating process had not yet led to the signing of a ceasefire. The efforts deployed by certain countries that were Members of their Organization, at both the regional and international levels, to find a peaceful settlement would have already succeeded had all the parties involved acted in good faith. He stated that “the stubbornness and intransigence of Rwanda and their determination to remain on Congolese territory have been the sole obstacles to a peaceful solution”. Although negotiations were continuing at the regional level in the Organization of African Unity, the effective involvement of the international community would in no way thwart those regional efforts. Therefore the Democratic Republic of the Congo was appealing to the international community to become more involved. He expressed his belief that resolving the current crisis required the convening of a regional conference of the countries of the Great Lakes region. He noted that President Laurent Kabila, upon his accession to power, had focused on stabilizing the Great Lakes region and had organized a regional conference on peace and development in the subregion in close cooperation with the United Nations Development Programme. Unfortunately, in the case of Uganda and of its ally, Rwanda, just a few years after the coups d’état carried out by the current authorities of those countries, no effort had been made to reach out to the exiled opponents to integrate them into the structures of their respective societies. The war in the eastern Congo had resulted in horrible consequences for the populations, and he referred the Security Council to the “White paper on massive violations of human rights and of the basic rules of international humanitarian law by the aggressor countries (Uganda, Rwanda, and Burundi) in the eastern part of the Democratic Republic of the Congo”.¹⁴ Considering the ongoing “horrors” being committed by the regular armed forces of neighbouring countries, he believed that a strong condemnation of those violations of the basic principles of the Charters of the OAU and the United Nations would prevent the negotiations from being bogged down and further atrocities from being committed on the ground. He stated that paragraph 2 of Article 24 of the United Nations Charter called on the Council to act in accordance with the purposes and principles of the United Nations in such circumstances, which was why his Government wanted the Security Council to become more involved in the search for a peaceful solution to the current conflict. The Democratic Republic of the Congo agreed to sign a ceasefire agreement, followed by the deployment along the border of a buffer force, with a precise timetable for the withdrawal of aggressor troops. The force would be given the task of monitoring and securing the borders shared by the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Burundi, Rwanda and Uganda. The Government was also determined to re-establish a state of law and fundamental freedoms and had formalized the opening of the political landscape by promulgating a law liberalizing the activities of political parties and had proposed a convention that would include all groups in the country including the rebels. He stated that he was convinced that the Democratic Republic of the Congo would succeed in restoring peace and domestic harmony but that the international community had the duty and the obligation to help Burundi, Rwanda and Uganda resolve their internal problems, which were the source of the regional destabilization. In view of the Council’s powers in the area of international security, the least his Government expected from this meeting was for the Council to recognize that the Democratic Republic of the Congo was a victim of armed aggression, as defined in resolution 3314 (XXIX) adopted by the General Assembly with a view to defining aggression. Second, he expected the Council to condemn that aggression. Third, he sought full respect by the aggressors for international humanitarian law. Fourth, he expected the Council to make use of the provisions of Articles 39 to 42 of the Charter of the United Nations to facilitate the withdrawal of the troops of aggression from their territory. Fifth, he sought the deployment of an interposing force along common borders by the Security Council, since the pretext used by the aggressors to justify their aggression was insecurity along borders. Finally, he called for the convening of an international conference on the restoration of lasting peace in the Great Lakes region.¹⁵

The representative of Canada expressed hope that the debate could serve to define a solution to the conflict and reaffirmed that a military solution could not resolve a dispute that was essentially political and that only negotiations could lead to a lasting solution. He stated that like the OAU and the Security Council, Canada attached the highest importance to respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of States, whether those of the Democratic Republic of Congo or those of its neighbours. Canada supported without reservation the efforts of regional leaders to achieve a negotiated solution and invited the Southern African Development Community to continue their tireless efforts. He stated that it was an essential condition for the restoration of peace and security that all forces participate in a ceasefire while respecting the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, accompanied by a timetable for the withdrawal of all foreign forces involved in the conflict and monitoring arrangements in accordance with the Lusaka agreement. Canada was prepared to examine the active involvement of the United Nations in coordination with OAU in the implementation of a ceasefire agreement and an agreed process for a political settlement and would support adoption by the Security Council of concrete and effective measures to that end. He expressed Canada's support for an international conference on peace, stability and socio-economic development in the Great Lakes region of Africa, under the auspices of the United Nations and OAU and their belief that not only the countries of the region but Africa's civil society as a whole needed to participate in such a conference.¹⁶

The representative of Argentina stated that in their view the conflict was legally complex, neither exclusively internal nor international and was politically sensitive because it involved major countries of the subregion and had the potential to spread. He stated their support for the regional efforts under way and the Lusaka process, but underlined that this did not exclude the Security Council from playing a role by providing concrete support to the regional initiative. While negotiations in such conflicts were essentially political, this did not exclude the implementation of the principles and norms of international law. He expressed Argentina's belief that the following legal principles were essential: first, there was an obligation to peacefully resolve the dispute and mechanisms for inclusive dialogue, without prejudging the legal status of the actors, should be sought. Second, the use of force did not bring territorial rights or legitimize changes in established borders: the immutability of colonial borders was a principle of general international law. He also reiterated the principle of non-interference in the domestic affairs of other States, which was incompatible with presence of foreign forces. Within that legal context, he reiterated that the serious violations of human rights and international humanitarian law that had taken place and continued in the Democratic Republic of the Congo were also the essence of the problem and deserved to be condemned, and he urged that they be duly investigated and punished. Finally, he expressed his belief that convening an international conference on the Great Lakes region, could, under the proper circumstances and at the appropriate time, provide an appropriate forum to analyse all those aspects of the regional situation in a comprehensive manner.¹⁷

The representative of Namibia stated that the invasion of the Democratic Republic of the Congo by Uganda and Rwanda had "plunged that country into a devastating war" — whose premises were against the purposes and objectives enshrined in the Charter of OAU. He noted that in 1964 OAU had accepted the boundaries inherited from colonial states and informed the Council that the Inter-State Defence and Security Committee meeting of SADC in 1995 had decided to take collective action in the event of attempts to change the legitimate Governments of Member States by military means. Therefore, SADC had a stated obligation to ensure that the legitimate Government of a fellow member would not be removed by invasion. Namibia adhered to that principle and believed in the non-violability of the territorial integrity and sovereignty of States. Namibia's adherence to these principles had compelled them, along with Angola and Zimbabwe, to intervene in the Democratic Republic of the Congo at the expressed invitation of President Kabila and his legitimate Government. The sole purpose of their requested intervention was to prevent the collapse of the State machinery and the violation of the sovereignty and territorial integrity of a fellow SADC member State. He informed the Council that the SADC Summit held on 13 and 14 September 1998, had reaffirmed its call for an immediate cessation of hostilities and commended the Governments of Angola, Namibia and Zimbabwe for providing troops in a timely manner to help the Democratic Republic of the Congo defeat the illegal attempt by rebels and their allies to capture the capital city and other strategic areas. He called on all States Members of the United Nations to subscribe to the principles enshrined in the Charter by respecting the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Democratic Republic of the Congo. While the security concerns of any State were legitimate, he stated that they should refrain from defining their security needs beyond their own borders without working within the framework of the United Nations and of OAU. He underlined that the unprovoked invasion of the Democratic Republic of the Congo constituted an act of interference in the internal affairs of the country. He emphasized that OAU and SADC were continuing to make efforts to bring an end to the conflict. On January 18 1999, Namibia had hosted a summit of countries involved in the fighting at the request of Uganda, where the respective leaders resolved that a ceasefire agreement should be signed without delay. However, attacks continued on government and allied forces. Therefore, in their view, the time had come for the Council to become involved, in accordance with its Charter obligation to maintain international peace and security.¹⁸

¹⁶ Ibid., pp. 5-7.

¹⁷ Ibid., pp. 8-9.

The representative of Brazil noted that the Security Council, on 31 August 1998, had reaffirmed the obligation to respect the territorial integrity and national sovereignty of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and called for a ceasefire, the withdrawal of foreign forces and the initiation of political dialogue.¹⁹ While upholding the principle of non-interference, he recognized the right of a state threatened by foreign invasion to call for external assistance and the need to differentiate between those foreign forces within the Democratic Republic of the Congo that were invited and those whose presence reflected different motivations. He also noted that resolution 1197 (1998) stressed the responsibility of regional organizations. The Organization of African Unity and the Southern African Development Community had played a leading role in the attempts to solve the impasse in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. There was, however, a need for increased political will on the part of many players.²⁰

The representative of France noted that the principle of non-interference in the domestic affairs of states, as set out in the Charter of the United Nations, had not been respected in the situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. He stated that France deplored those violations and called for their immediate cessation. He stated that concluding a ceasefire was a matter of priority and he noted that the Council had declared itself ready to contemplate the active involvement of the United Nations,²¹ in coordination with OAU. This would require considerable effort on the part of the Organization and he hoped that the United Nations would fully play its part. A settlement would also require the implementation of an authentic process of national reconciliation, and he noted positively the President of the Democratic Republic of the Congo's recent proposal to organize a national debate. Finally, a settlement would require the negotiation of the necessary arrangements to guarantee the security, stability and future developments of the region, including respect for the territorial integrity and national sovereignty of all states, and, in that context, the orderly withdrawal of forces. It would also require arrangements for security along the borders; respect for human rights and humanitarian law; tackling the question of refugees; and the re-establishment of the authority of the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo over the whole territory of the country. He stated that the United Nations should provide the necessary assistance to the countries of the region so that those objectives could be attained. In that regard, he recalled the usefulness, at the appropriate time, of the convening of an international conference on peace, security and development in the Great Lakes region under the auspices of the United Nations and OAU.²²

The representative from the United States stated that the ongoing conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo represented one of the gravest threats to peace, stability and development in sub-Saharan Africa in decades and had led to a deepening humanitarian crisis. He informed the Council that the United States had just concluded a ministerial meeting with representatives of over 40 African countries where participants had agreed on a partnership agenda, a blueprint for the future of United States/African relations and the future of the continent. However, the goals discussed and the substantial process that had been made could be jeopardized by the growing conflict. The United States approach to the conflict was guided by the preservation of the territorial integrity and national sovereignty of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the belief that no military solution was possible, and the belief that the human and humanitarian rights of all people must be respected. He expressed his support for the regional mediation efforts under way, particularly those led by SADC, known as the Lusaka process, as well as for the work being done by OAU and the United Nations. He condemned the reported violations of human rights and expressed deep concern about the danger of renewed genocide in the region and urged all parties to respect international human rights and humanitarian law. He also noted that his Government was particularly troubled by the ethnicization of the conflict. They were in addition concerned by the apparent willingness of some regional States to collaborate militarily with ex-Forces armées rwandaises and Interahamwe, known genocidaires. They were also concerned by any development that encouraged insurgent movements, including UNITA, to threaten and destabilize neighbouring States from Congolese soil. He noted that any agreement reached by the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the rebels and external State actors would be unsustainable if an effective means to contain those groups was not found. He stated that United Nations investigative reports had pointed towards atrocities and violations of international humanitarian law in the Congo since 1996 and that the Government and other parties had failed to cooperate with United Nations efforts to investigate those abuses. In that regard, he welcomed the recent invitation by the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo to the United Nations human rights investigator. He called on members of the international community to redouble their efforts to limit arms flows to the region of conflict, called for safe and unhindered access for humanitarian agencies to all those in need and for all parties to guarantee the safety and security of United Nations and humanitarian personnel. He then reiterated the United States position: they would consider supporting a peacekeeping operation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo if there were a comprehensive agreement among the belligerents to end the conflict and to observe a ceasefire. He stated that any monitoring force should be limited in size and that its mandate should be to observe and monitor, not to enforce the peace or to maintain the security of the Congo's borders.²³

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that they shared the serious concerns expressed at the ongoing conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo which represented a serious threat to regional peace and security. Russia had constantly advocated achieving a peaceful political settlement of the crisis while preserving the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and had consistently supported the efforts of OAU, SADC and regional leaders. He emphasized the need for all States to abide by the principles of non-intervention in the internal affairs of other countries and the non-use of force, in accordance with the Charter and the aims of the United Nations. The basis for regulating the protracted conflict should be the approach suggested by the countries of the subregion based on a ceasefire agreement, the withdrawal of foreign troops from the territory and guarantees of peace and security along its borders with contiguous States. A key provision should be ensuring the territorial integrity of the Democratic Republic of the Congo. It was quite obvious that lasting peace and security in the Democratic Republic of the Congo could not be achieved unless the Congolese themselves organized a nationwide dialogue with the participation of all segments of Congolese society. The Russian delegation actively supported the policy of strengthening the coordination of the activities of the United Nations, OAU and SADC in order to reach a political settlement of the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. He expressed his belief that the initiative of the Secretary-General to send a special envoy to the region was a timely one. He stated that the possibility of the future deployment of a United Nations peacekeeping operation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo as well as the desirability and modalities of such an operation could be determined only after a stable ceasefire had been achieved. The Security Council's decision on that matter needed to be preceded by a very careful and thorough analysis of the situation both in the country and in the region. Finally, he stated their support for an international conference on peace and security in the Great Lakes region.²⁴

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the tribulations in Africa must be successfully addressed by the United Nations system as a whole, or that system would show itself incapable of meeting the increasing demands put on it. He informed the Council that the United Kingdom was prepared to make a special effort to establish how non-Africans could best help Africans and specifically OAU end the conflict. He informed the Council that the British Minister of State had gone to the region as a Special Envoy to explore what scope there was for ending the war. The Special Envoy had found common ground among the parties among the parties on what needed to be done to stop the fighting but he had also found a "startling lack of political will and creative thinking among the parties to get the building-blocks of a settlement into place". This was not for a want of external pressure or help. The Southern African Development Community and the Organization of African Unity had given the task of mediation, three Presidents and fifteen conferences had been held. The Special Envoy had judged that the key leaders involved could stop the war if they really wanted to. The representative of the United Kingdom maintained that the responsibility of the United Nations and other international actors was to make them want to. He noted that it was encouraging that there was such a clear consensus among representatives who had spoken on the steps which needed to be taken: a ceasefire agreement, the withdrawal of foreign troops and coherent international involvement to motivate, monitor and sustain those processes. As part of that process, the Security Council had already indicated its readiness to consider how it could assist in the implementation of a ceasefire and settlement. The United Kingdom, with several partners, had already done work on possibilities for a peacekeeping presence. The fourth and fifth steps were a framework for tackling the wider problems in the Great Lakes region and, finally, the economic angle and the need to plan for an economic development conference for the Great Lakes.²⁵

Speaking on behalf of the African States, the representative of Burkina Faso stated that the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo — because of its polymorphic nature, the overt and covert involvement of the countries of the region and its stakes for the belligerents — entailed serious dangers whose ramifications could harm the entire African edifice. Since it was an inextricable situation, it was easy to understand why neither the OAU meetings nor the efforts of the countries of the subregion had led to a conclusive settlement. At the African level, OAU had taken praiseworthy steps. In particular the most recent summit meeting of the Central Organ of its Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution, held on 17 December 1998, reaffirmed the guiding principles, contained in the OAU Charter, which alone could guarantee a lasting settlement of the Congolese crisis. Another fact of paramount importance was that the African heads of State reaffirmed their support for the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo as the sole legitimate authority, representative of the entire Congolese people. However, the OAU took into consideration another requirement of its charter: that all African disputes must be settled by peaceful means. He therefore appealed to the wisdom, patriotism and political will of all the actors to silence the weapons and to promote the establishment of real national accord. It was also increasingly becoming a question of an interposition force — a peacekeeping force — and an international conference on the Great Lakes. From that standpoint, it should be noted that there was no antagonism between the United Nations and OAU on the Congolese question. The Organization of African Unity had shown expertise in the area of conflict settlement. The only obstacle thwarting its efforts was the critical lack of logistical means and he expected that the United Nations and the international community would help reinforce those capacities.²⁶

The representative of Germany, speaking on behalf of the European Union and associated countries,²⁷ reiterated its support for the territorial integrity and national sovereignty of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and the need for all States to refrain from any interference in each other's internal affairs in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations. The European Union reiterated that the current conflict could be solved only through a negotiated settlement between all the parties concerned with a view to an urgent political solution to the conflict. He also reiterated their support for an international conference on peace, security and development and the regional peace initiatives undertaken by, among others, SADC and OAU. He welcomed more active involvement by the United Nations and the OAU to coordinate the various peace efforts. He informed the Council that the European Union was supporting regional peace efforts, through the assistance of the European Union Special Envoy for the Great Lakes region. It reiterated that it might find it increasingly difficult to continue its present level of budgetary assistance to countries involved in this conflict should they persist with the military option. He welcomed the statement of the President of the Security Council of 11 December 1998,²⁸ which expressed the preparedness of the Council to consider, in the light of efforts to achieve peaceful resolution of the conflict, the active involvement of the United Nations to assist in the implementation of a ceasefire and political settlement of the conflict.²⁹

Several other speakers also emphasized the need for a peaceful solution and immediate ceasefire, the importance of respecting the sovereignty and territorial integrity of all states involved, praised the work of regional organizations, particularly SADC and OAU, reiterated the need for an international conference on peace and security and supported the idea of appropriate action by the Security Council after a ceasefire had been obtained.³⁰

At the same meeting the President, with the concurrence of the members of the Council, suspended the meeting.

When the Council resumed its 3987th meeting on 19 March, 1999, the Council invited Jamaica, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.³¹

The representative of the Sudan noted that Chapter I of the Charter of the United Nations stated that the most important purpose of the United Nations was to maintain international peace and security and to that end it should take effective collective measures for the prevention and elimination of threats to the peace and for the suppression of acts of aggression or other breaches of the peace. Citing those principles, he recalled the steps taken by the Democratic Republic of the Congo when it provided timely notice regarding the aggression of a neighbouring State. The Democratic Republic of the Congo had requested the Council to meet its obligation to maintain international peace and security by condemning that aggression, demanding that the forces of aggression withdraw and asking the forces of aggression to respect the sovereignty of their country. However, the Council had remained idle and all the Government's requests had remained "dead letters". He noted that he regarded the position of the Council regarding this dispute as another testimony to the policy of "double standards" that had come to characterize the work of the Council. Sometimes the Council deplored and condemned and even considered the application of the provisions of Chapter VII, while on other occasions, in response to similar cases, "it completely closed its eyes". He stated that he expected the Security Council to fulfil its obligations and responsibilities in order to maintain peace and security by putting an end to the aggression and ensuring the withdrawal of forces that had violated the territorial integrity and national sovereignty of the Democratic Republic of the Congo. The Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo had made enormous efforts to restore peace and security in the Great Lakes region, and those efforts deserved to be commended. Therefore, he called on the Security Council to make a sincere effort to reach a peaceful resolution of the conflict that would ensure stability and restore the sovereignty of the country. He stated that the delegation of the Sudan supported all regional initiatives aimed at achieving a peaceful resolution of the conflict, including those of SADC.³²

The representative of Japan stated his deep concern about the situation and the urgent need for humanitarian assistance in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. He maintained that the conflict had to be resolved through dialogue and negotiation and appreciated the efforts of neighbouring countries, including Zambia, SADC and OAU. He called on all parties to further intensify efforts to bring this conflict to a peaceful resolution. He noted that the international community had to also focus on ensuring that post-conflict rehabilitation was successful in the context of both the reconstruction of the economy and reconciliation between peoples. Finally, he pointed out the fact that the parties involved in African disputes, which did not have the ability to produce weapons, nevertheless possessed vast quantities of them. As a country that prohibited the export of any weapons, Japan requested all States to ask themselves whether their own actions might not be leading to the intensification of conflicts in Africa.³³

The representative of Rwanda expressed his belief that the regional negotiation process was well under way and that the Council needed to support it as it had in the past in its resolutions and presidential statements. His view was that the Council should reaffirm its support for the regional processes, especially the Lusaka process, in which the OAU and the United Nations continued to play a major role. On all the issues dealt with by the Lusaka process, palpable progress had been made. The factor that caused insecurity to Rwanda was the presence in the Democratic Republic of the Congo of large numbers of armed elements of Rwandan nationality, including former Government forces and militia who were responsible for the genocide of 1994.

Another disturbing factor was the attempt by the Government to disown nationals who happened to have Rwandan culture. He stated that a comprehensive resolution of the crisis in Democratic Republic of Congo should be reached: first, through a resolution of the crisis of governance and leadership in the Democratic Republic of the Congo; second, through the neutralization, dismantling and containment of the non-State armies operating on the Democratic Republic of the Congo territory; and third, through the condemnation and isolation of all those who embraced the ideology and acts of genocide in the region. He reiterated his respect for the territorial integrity and sovereignty of all countries, as enshrined in the Charters of the United Nations and the OAU and called on the Democratic Republic of the Congo to use its sovereign rights and “put its act together” in order to dismantle the dozen non-State armies which were being used in aggression against the territorial integrity of its neighbours. Finally, he reaffirmed Rwanda’s respect for human rights and humanitarian law and their resolve to join others in a coalition against the recurrence of genocide and terrorism in the Great Lakes region and elsewhere.³⁴

The representative from Zambia stated that his country was honoured to be requested to spearhead a mediation effort in pursuit of the mandate by regional leaders. He felt that this was an indication of Africa’s strong belief that only a negotiated settlement could guarantee lasting peace. He thanked OAU and the United Nations for their contributions in the overall search for a peaceful solution. The mediation effort had revealed that the matter was as delicate as it was complex. Therefore there was a need to proceed with caution and patience to ensure that the solution enjoyed the support of all the parties concerned. The mediation effort was also expensive in time and energy and resources. Therefore he called for assistance from the international community to enrich the regional efforts. He recalled that the Security Council, by its statement of 11 December 1998,³⁵ had stated that it was prepared to consider the active involvement of the United Nations in assisting a political settlement. The fact that the Council was involved was as it should be, since under the Charter the Council had the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, which were currently being threatened by the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. For now it was essential that, given the limitations of the regional efforts, the Council should be able to augment those efforts in a tangible way. In that regard, he urged the Council at the appropriate time to put in place the machinery needed for policing the ceasefire once it had been realized.³⁶

The representative of Egypt stated that they had done their utmost to promote a ceasefire and had participated in peace initiatives at the regional and other levels within the context of OAU and the Central Organ of its Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution. Egypt was also very interested in a pan-African summit meeting aimed at strengthening security in the Great Lakes region under the auspices of the United Nations and OAU. On the role of the Council he noted with concern “the emergence of a trend in the Security Council not to take steps to halt crises in Africa”. He also noted that it was sometimes decided that the Council did not need to play its part when regional efforts were under way to defuse a crisis. However, regional efforts should merely complement the role of the Council, which was to maintain international peace and security. He maintained that the role of the Council must not be reduced to one of simply endorsing resolutions adopted by regional bodies. He stated that the steps taken by the Council in the increasingly complex conflicts in Africa had proved to be inadequate and that the Council needed to look at each crisis individually and seek to resolve Africa’s problems overall.³⁷

The representative of Uganda maintained their commitment to the peaceful and negotiated resolution of the conflict. He noted the efforts of Uganda as one of the leaders behind most of the initiatives to find a diplomatic solution to the problems, including initiating the meeting in Victoria Falls on 7 and 8 August 1998 and the Windhoek summit of January 1999. He stated that the crisis within the Democratic Republic of the Congo had two dimensions: an internal dimension and an external or regional dimension. The regional dimension had begun with the war that took place in Rwanda resulting in the 1994 genocide. He stated that the Government of the former Zaire had helped the génocidaires, who had fled Rwanda after 1994, to reorganize and gave them territorial support to recapture power in Rwanda. The Government of the former Zaire had also forged an alliance with the National Islamic Front regime in the Sudan, not only to aid and abet the crime of genocide in Rwanda, but also specifically to destabilize Uganda so that it would not be in a position to support Rwanda. Attacks were then launched from what was then Zairian territory and at the same time the reorganization and rearming of the génocidaires had reached an advanced stage. The Government of Uganda decided to act in self-defence by first recapturing the territory those criminals had captured and following them into Zairian territory, an act of self-defence which “had regional and international understanding and support”. This resulted in the fall of President Mobutu Sese Seko of Zaire and the rise to power of President Kabila. President Kabila, pleading incapacity to handle the situation, invited Uganda to deploy its forces inside the Democratic Republic of the Congo to flush out the Allied Democratic Forces, a rebel group that had been infiltrated into Zaire by the Sudan, and a protocol was signed between the two Governments on 24 April 1998. In the meantime, because of the internal political contradictions, rebellion broke out in August 1998 and the Democratic Republic of the Congo looked for military assistance which was given by Zimbabwe, Angola and Namibia, who decided on a unilateral military intervention rather than waiting for a regional, concerted approach. The intervention was made on the pretext that the Democratic Republic of the Congo had been invaded by Uganda and Rwanda. At that time Uganda had only two battalions in the country. While they were primarily concerned about the activities of the Ugandan rebel groups in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the intervention by Zimbabwe, Angola, Namibia and later on, Chad and the Sudan, introduced a new dimension to the conflict. To counter the perceived threat of the increased destabilization of Uganda, especially by the Sudan, using Congolese territory as they had done previously, Uganda had deployed additional forces. He stated that thus Uganda and Rwanda had acted in self-defence. He informed the Council that a lot of progress had already been registered. For example, it had already been agreed by all parties that there should be a ceasefire, whose principles had already been adopted at the regional level in draft form. The following positions to enhance the signing of a ceasefire agreement had also been agreed to: a cessation of hostilities; addressing of the security concerns of the neighbouring countries and the Democratic Republic of Congo; the need for rebel involvement in the peace process and deployment of a neutral international peacekeeping force as an interposition force in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and the need for the United Nations to manage that process; a withdrawal of all foreign forces in accordance with a timetable worked out by the United Nations and OAU and under the supervision of the neutral interposition force; and convening of a national conference involving all Congolese political stakeholders as soon as possible with the assistance of OAU, to determine the political future of the Democratic Republic of the Congo. On the issue of genocide, he called upon the Council and the international community as a whole to stand firm against the perpetuation of the culture of impunity in the region, measures to that effect had to include the discouragement of safe havens for génocidaires. Those who had committed crimes against humanity had to face justice. In conclusion, he asked the Security Council, the United Nations and the international community to give unqualified support to the region’s diplomatic efforts to resolve the crisis.³⁸
