The representative of Zimbabwe stated that Uganda and Rwanda had decided to invade the Democratic Republic of the Congo, purportedly in search of security, however they really wanted “to tear away the eastern parts of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and to create a State to be called ‘Ruwendzori’”. He alleged that they had been appointing officials and creating borders in blatant violation of the territorial integrity and national sovereignty of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, as well as smuggling commodities out of the Congo. Territorial integrity was enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations as an inviolable principle and the Charter of the Organization of African Unity also embodied that principle as well as the sanctity of colonial boundaries. Uganda and Rwanda, members of both the United Nations and OAU, had decided to violate international law, and it was therefore the “bounden duty” of the United Nations to condemn this wayward behaviour. His country, together with Angola, Namibia and Chad, had responded to a distress call by the legitimate Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and were now assisting that country to uphold its territorial integrity and national sovereignty. The intervention of the allied forces of SADC was upheld by the inherent right to individual or collective self-defence, in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations. He maintained that the Allied forces in the Democratic Republic of the Congo had no ulterior motive and were ready to pull out as soon as there was a ceasefire, that the invading States had withdrawn and that a United Nations peacekeeping force had been placed along the common borders of the country and the invading States. He called for an international conference on peace, security and stability in the Great Lakes region to be convened at the appropriate time and under the auspices of the United Nations and OAU.³⁹

The representative of Burundi called for an immediate cessation of armed hostilities and for the opening of dialogue between the parties directly or indirectly concerned, and for the initiation throughout the region of a genuine culture of peace that would restore the universal values of human rights. He called the attention of the Council to the reports of the United Nations International Commission of Inquiry on the movements of arms and of armed groups or genocidal militias in the Great Lakes region,⁴⁰ which deserved the close attention of the Security Council so that peace and security could be restored in that part of the world. He reaffirmed their support for regional initiatives, including the OAU, and called on the United Nations to take additional and complementary steps, especially in material and organizational terms.⁴¹

Several other speakers also deplored the humanitarian consequences of the war; praised the efforts of regional leaders, SADC and OAU in attempting to mediate the conflict; noted the importance of achieving a peaceful solution, condemning human rights violations; reiterated the need to respect the territorial integrity and sovereignty of all States; and maintained the need for a peace conference. Several speakers called for a peacekeeping force or appropriate international monitoring mechanism to be established under the auspices of the United Nations, the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity, or as an African force with material support from the United Nations.⁴²

The representative of the Democratic Republic of the Congo in his second intervention reiterated that his country had been a victim of aggression that constituted a breach of the peace and a serious threat to international security since August 1998. It had therefore been their duty to call on the Security Council. He maintained that the aggression pre-dated the intervention of the allied forces, implemented at the formal request of a legitimate Government in the context of the legitimate right to self-defence recognized in the Charters of the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity. He called upon the Security Council to act appropriately under the provisions of Articles 39 and 42 of the Charter to take the steps necessary to re-establish the territorial integrity of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and security in the region.⁴³

Decision of 6 August 1999 (4032nd meeting): resolution 1258 (1999)

At its 4032nd meeting, held on 6 August 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General dated 15 July 1999 on the United Nations preliminary deployment in the Democratic Republic of the Congo in its agenda.⁴⁹ Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Namibia), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

In his report, the Secretary-General reported on the implications for the United Nations of the signing of the Lusaka Agreement on 10 July 1999 and made recommendations concerning preliminary actions that the United Nations could take. The Lusaka agreement contained proposals for an “appropriate force” to be constituted, facilitated and deployed by the United Nations in collaboration with OAU. The Secretary-General observed that the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo had inflicted terrible suffering and the war’s effects had spread beyond the subregion to afflict the continent of Africa as a whole. The international community and the United Nations needed to therefore do everything in their power to assist the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, parties and people, as well as the other Governments involved, in achieving a peaceful solution. He stated that for any United Nations peacekeeping force to be effective it would have to be large and expensive, require the deployment of thousands of international troops and civilian personnel and face tremendous risks and obstacles. In the light of those difficulties, he strongly recommended that the Security Council immediately authorize the deployment of up to 90 United Nations military personnel, together with the necessary staff, to the subregion. They would serve mainly as liaison officers to the national capitals and rear military headquarters of the main belligerents. As a second stage, on the basis of the report of the technical survey team and liaison group, he would recommend a further deployment of up to 500 military observers within the Democratic Republic of the Congo and other States as required. He informed the Council that he had decided to appoint a Special Representative to lead the observer mission, which would be called the United Nations Observer Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (MONUC). He had also ordered the dispatch of a small advance team to the region “to clarify the role to be played by the United Nations”. He noted that the problem of armed groups was at the core of the conflict and its resolution was crucial to a lasting peace. Since a military solution appeared impossible he would revert to the Security Council with detailed proposals for the deployment of a peacekeeping mission and a programme for disarmament, demobilization and reintegration. He also noted that it was essential for the Congolese parties to proceed with their national debate in order to work towards national reconciliation. When this happened, the international community could then be in a position to convene an international conference on the Great Lakes region in order to secure the commitment of donors to recovery of the region as a whole.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council’s prior consultations.⁵⁰

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 23 July 1999 from the representative of Zambia addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting the text of the Ceasefire Agreement.⁵¹

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1258 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 1234 (1999) of 9 April 1999, and recalling the statements by its President of 31 August 1998, 11 December 1998, and 24 June 1999,

- To establish contacts and maintain liaison with the Joint Military Commission and all parties to the Agreement;
- To assist the Joint Military Commission and the parties in developing modalities for the implementation of the Agreement;
- To provide technical assistance, as requested, to the Joint Military Commission;
- To provide information to the Secretary-General regarding the situation on the ground, and to assist in refining a concept of operations for a possible further role of the United Nations in the implementation of the Agreement once it is signed by all parties;
- To secure from the parties guarantees of cooperation and assurances of security for the possible deployment in-country of military observers;

9. Welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to appoint a Special Representative to serve as the head of the United Nations presence in the subregion relating to the peace process in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and to provide assistance in the implementation of the Ceasefire Agreement, and invites him to do so as soon as possible;

11. Calls for safe and unhindered access for humanitarian assistance to those in need in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and urges all parties to the conflict to guarantee the safety and security of all humanitarian personnel and to respect strictly the relevant provisions of international humanitarian law;

12. Requests the Secretary-General to keep it regularly informed of developments in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and to report at the appropriate time on the future presence of the United Nations in the Democratic Republic of the Congo in support of the peace process;

13. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 5 November 1999 (4060th meeting):
resolution 1273 (1999)

At its 4060th meeting, held on 5 November 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the second report of the Secretary-General dated 1 November 1999 on the United Nations preliminary deployment in the Democratic Republic of the Congo in its agenda.⁵² Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Slovenia), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

In his report, submitted pursuant to paragraph 12 of resolution 1258 asking the Secretary-General to keep the Council regularly informed of developments, the Secretary-General observed that despite the enormous obstacles facing a United Nations operation in the Democratic Republic of Congo, the United Nations had to continue to support the peace process to the full extent of its capacities. He therefore recommended the extension of the mandate of the United Nations personnel currently in the Democratic Republic of the Congo until 15 January 2000. Subject to further progress in the peace process, he envisaged reverting to the Council with a further report containing recommendations and a proposed mandate and concept of operations for the deployment of United Nations peacekeeping troops, accompanied by military observers. In the meantime he would keep the Council informed of all developments and he urgently called on all parties to cooperate fully with the United Nations mission. He noted that the Joint Military Commission, established pursuant to the Lusaka Ceasefire Agreement, had a central role to play in the peace process and needed support to function effectively. While the deployment of four military liaison officers to Lusaka was a first step, he proposed that the United Nations provide the Joint Military Commission with the necessary logistical and other operational support and invited donors to redeem their pledges as rapidly as possible. He noted that he looked forward to continued close cooperation with OAU and intended to follow up the dispatch of two military liaison officers to OAU, including the permanent deployment of United Nations military personnel at OAU headquarters.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁵³

Also at the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 18 October 1999 from the representative of Finland addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵⁴ transmitting a statement on the Democratic Republic of the Congo on behalf of the European Union.

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1273 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 1234 (1999) of 9 April 1999 and 1258 (1999) of 6 August 1999 and the statements by its President of 31 August 1998, 11 December 1998 and 24 June 1999,

Reaffirming the sovereignty, territorial integrity, and political independence of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and all States in the region,

Reaffirming also that the Ceasefire Agreement signed at Lusaka on 10 July 1999 represents a viable basis for a resolution of the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 1 November 1999,

Noting with satisfaction the deployment of United Nations military liaison personnel to the capitals of the States signatories to the Ceasefire Agreement and to the Joint Military Commission established by them, and underlining the importance of their full deployment as provided for in its resolution 1258 (1999),

Noting that the Joint Military Commission and the Political Committee have held meetings as mandated under the Ceasefire Agreement,

Urging all parties to the Ceasefire Agreement to cooperate fully with the technical assessment team dispatched to the Democratic Republic of the Congo by the Secretary-General as indicated in his report of 15 July 1999, in order to allow it to assess conditions and to prepare for subsequent United Nations deployments in the country,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations military liaison personnel deployed under paragraph 8 of resolution 1258 (1999) until 15 January 2000;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to report to it regularly on developments in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, including on the future presence of the United Nations in the country in support of the peace process;

3. Calls upon all parties to the Ceasefire Agreement signed at Lusaka to continue to abide by its provisions;

4. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

At the 4076th meeting of the Security Council, held on 30 November 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Slovenia), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting the President again drew the attention of the Council to the second report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Preliminary Deployment in the Democratic Republic of the Congo.⁵⁵ The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,⁵⁶ which was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1279 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 1234 (1999) of 9 April 1999, 1258 (1999) of 6 August 1999 and 1273 (1999) of 5 November 1999 and the statements by its President of 31 August 1998, 11 December 1998 and 24 June 1999,

Expressing its concern also at the adverse impact of the conflict on the human rights situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, particularly in the eastern parts of the country, and the continuing violations of human rights and international humanitarian law committed throughout the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo,

Having considered the recommendations of the Secretary-General contained in his report of 1 November 1999,

Reiterating the importance of the successful completion of the mission of the technical assessment team dispatched to the Democratic Republic of the Congo to assess conditions and to prepare for possible subsequent United Nations deployment in the country as well as to obtain firm guarantees from the parties to the conflict over the safety, security and freedom of movement of United Nations and associated personnel,

(b) Liaise with the Joint Military Commission and provide technical assistance in the implementation of its functions under the Ceasefire Agreement, including in the investigation of ceasefire violations;

(c) Provide information on security conditions in all areas of its operation, with emphasis on local conditions affecting future decisions on the introduction of United Nations personnel;

(d) Plan for the observation of the ceasefire and disengagement of forces;

(e) Maintain liaison with all parties to the Ceasefire Agreement to facilitate the delivery of humanitarian assistance to displaced persons, refugees, children, and other affected persons, and assist in the protection of human rights, including the rights of children;

6. Underlines the fact that the phased deployment of United Nations military observers with the necessary support and protection elements in the Democratic Republic of the Congo will be subject to its further decision, and expresses its intention to take such a decision promptly on the basis of further recommendations of the Secretary-General, taking into account the findings of the technical assessment team;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to accelerate the development of a concept of operations based on assessed conditions of security, access and freedom of movement and cooperation on the part of the signatories to the Ceasefire Agreement;

8. Also requests the Secretary-General to keep it regularly informed and to report to it as soon as possible on the situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and submit his recommendations on further deployment of United Nations personnel in the country and on their protection;

9. Requests the Secretary-General, with immediate effect, to take the administrative steps necessary for the equipping of up to 500 United Nations military observers with a view to facilitating future rapid United Nations deployments as authorized by the Council;

10. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Deliberations of 16 December 1999 (4083rd meeting)

At the 4083rd meeting of the Security Council, held on 16 December 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (United Kingdom), with the consent of the Council, invited the Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations to give a briefing on the situation concerning the Democratic Republic of the Congo, under rule 39 of Council's provisional rules of procedure.

At the same meeting the Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations informed the Council that the military and security situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo had seriously deteriorated. As far as the deployment of United Nations personnel was concerned, the new Special Representative of the Secretary-General for the Democratic Republic of the Congo had arrived in Kinshasa to assume his functions. In addition, MONUC had deployed 62 of the 90 military liaison officers authorized under Security Council resolution 1258 (1999), of 6 August 1999. However, until MONUC was guaranteed the full security and freedom of movement it needed by both sides, it would not be able to complete its technical survey of the country or to station military liaison officers at the rear military headquarters of the parties, as stipulated by the Council. He stated that until they had the needed information from the survey and the relevant military headquarters they would not be able to submit a detailed and comprehensive concept of operations to the Council, as called for in resolution 1279 (1999). He stated that he intended to submit a further report on the situation in mid-January, which he anticipated would contain options and recommendations.⁵⁷

The representative of the United States noted that, while the Lusaka Agreement was an excellent document that was done by the parties themselves, it was being widely disregarded and violated. He welcomed the nomination of Sir Ketumile Masire, former President of the Republic of Botswana, to assume the role of neutral facilitator for the inter-Congolese political negotiations. He noted that the United States would have found it difficult to move forward in support of peacekeeping absent a facilitator to work on the critical political component. He underlined that the Joint Military Commission, OAU, the United Nations and MONUC needed to work more closely together. The United States really needed to know the composition and structure of the peacekeeping force and believed that it was imperative that there be a more intense planning effort involving the Department of Peacekeeping Operations, the nations on the Security Council and other potential major troop and money contributors. The relationship between OAU, SADC and the United Nations, the command and control situation on the ground, the mandate, the size, the costs and the backup all needed to be known, and the United States would not vote for a resolution until they knew what they were voting for.⁵⁸

The representative of the Netherlands reminded the Council that from the first day they had discussed the Lusaka Agreement they had already been put under pressure to dispatch peacekeepers right away despite the fact that none of the rebels had yet been prepared to sign. If the Lusaka Agreement was a “litmus test”, it was, first of all, one for the people who signed it, and if the parties themselves did not fulfil their engagements, there was nothing the Council could do. Noting the “emergence of the myth that it was the dilly-dallying of the Security Council that killed the Lusaka Agreement” he asked whether anyone believed that the Agreement was being observed by all parties for the first three months and had only began to unravel due to the Council’s inaction. He maintained that the commitment of the Netherlands to Africa could not be called into question and there had been no slackening in its commitment to African projects that were of special concern to the Security Council.⁵⁹

The representative of the Gambia stated that they were eagerly awaiting the report of the technical survey team and the report of the Secretary-General on the deployment to the Democratic Republic of the Congo and were gratified to note that the Joint Military Commission and the Political Committee established by the parties to the Agreement were up and running. He thanked the United States for their generous contribution to the Commission and encouraged others that could do so to help. He hoped the Security Council would act expeditiously with a view to deploying a fully fledged peacekeeping mission to the Democratic Republic of the Congo when the time was ripe.⁶⁰

The representative from Canada noted continuing concern with the major ceasefire violations by all sides in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. Such violations suggested that the security conditions required for the deployment of United Nations military observers did not yet exist. He requested the Secretariat’s views on how, short of deploying additional personnel to the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the United Nations could further assist in the implementation of the Lusaka Agreement in the face of continuing fighting. He welcomed the nomination of former President Masire of Botswana as facilitator for the inter-Congolese dialogue and urged all parties to commit themselves to the dialogue so that the process of reconciliation could begin in earnest.⁶¹

The representative of France stated that the situation was catastrophic and that a real, concrete effort was needed from the Council. He suggested that the Council ask itself what it could do immediately in order to try to deal with the immediate dangers in the region, which were leading to losses of human life. He suggested that they urge the Secretariat to continue its efforts to produce a concept of operations. He welcomed the nomination of former President Masire of Botswana as facilitator and the arrival of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General. He asked the Under-Secretary-General whether it wasn’t already possible for MONUC to provide some military assistance to the Joint Military Commission by providing it with staff officers to help the Commission do its work. He also wondered whether the Commission might not be able to provide reports to the Security Council on actions they were taking. This would respond to the wishes expressed for greater coordination between the regional organizations, specifically the Organization of African Unity, and the United Nations.⁶²

The representative from China stated that the peace process remained bogged down in difficulties and that the United Nations and the Security Council had been quite slow in responding to the situation. While welcoming the news of the nomination of former President Masire of Botswana as facilitator and stating his support for the holding of national political dialogues between the parties in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, he emphasized that it was an immediate priority of the Council and the United Nations to send in military observers and peacekeeping troops as soon as possible, because there could be effective monitoring and maintenance of the ceasefire only when such a force was deployed. He expressed his agreement with the view that had been expressed earlier that the Council's ability to push through a settlement of the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo with concrete actions would be the "litmus test" of the importance the Council attached to African conflicts. In that connection, while he looked forward to the implementation of resolution 1279 (1999) and welcomed the Secretariat's preparations for that purpose, he also expected that Council members would be unanimous on taking concrete actions as soon as possible for the deployment of military observers in the Democratic Republic of the Congo.⁶³

The representative of Namibia, while welcoming the appointment of former President Masire of Botswana as mediator for the national dialogue, stated that his delegation had noted that media reports had indicated that investors from several countries were doing business with the rebel movement, especially in the eastern part of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and that those actions clearly violated the territorial integrity of the country. He maintained that nobody was saying that the situation was easy but time was of the essence and the Council should assume its responsibilities in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. He called on all parties to carry out their commitment to the Lusaka Ceasefire Agreement and reiterated Namibia's commitment to full implementation. However, he maintained that while Namibia would maintain its position passively they would not offer themselves as "helpless targets when fired at by the rebels and those who support them". While welcoming the deployment of regional joint military commissions inside the Democratic Republic of the Congo and OAU observers, he expressed his hope that the Security Council would soon take a decision to authorize the deployment of military observers. He underlined the need for a rapid deployment, given the provisions of resolution 1279 and stated that "if we wait for perfection in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, we will lose everything that has been achieved in the Lusaka peace process".⁶⁴

The representative of Brazil asked how they could reconcile two contradictory positions, both of which were right. His colleagues, especially his African colleagues, had presented very clearly the need for the Security Council to act "very, very swiftly" and the representative of France had drawn their attention to the need for a concept of operations to be developed in a very precise and clear-cut way. All these were positive elements that they certainly needed to take into account in seeking a solution of the problem. He stated that the strength of peacekeeping operations would have to be "robust", and expressed his belief that if they analysed all the consequences of that adjective and added "sent urgently", they could begin to solve the problem.⁶⁵

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that they were coming to a critical moment: there was a peace agreement but the situation was deteriorating and not all parties were complying with their commitments. He suggested that the Council focus on six areas in particular. First, they needed to insist that all parties return to their Lusaka obligations and emphasize that there was no alternative to the negotiated peace. Second, they needed to do all they could to support the Lusaka framework. Third, they should support the deployment of an effective United Nations force to help implement the Lusaka Agreement. A peacekeeping force had to be capable of monitoring the ceasefire, verifying the withdrawal of foreign forces and investigating reports of military activities by other armed groups. However, the countries in the region had to bear the principal responsibility for their own future. Fourth, they needed a plan for the successful disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of the armed militia groups. He urged all parties to work through the Joint Military Commission, in close collaboration with OAU and the United Nations to continue to draw up a credible plan that would attract the levels of international support that were needed to make implementation of a disarmament, demobilization and reintegration process possible. Fifth, they had to address profiteering from and exploitation of the vast resources of the Democratic Republic of the Congo which were being used by all sides to sustain the war. Sixth, they should sustain their support for an international conference on the Great Lakes to address the region's underlying problems, to take place when the parties had implemented the main elements of Lusaka. He welcomed the nomination of former President Masire. He expressed his hope that the Political Committee established by the Lusaka Agreement would convene at an early date to discuss implementation.⁶⁶

The representative for Gabon welcomed the nomination of former President Masire of Botswana as the facilitator and the progress made in the activities of the Joint Military Commission, given the resources available to it. He expressed his belief that the Council "should focus its will to settle the conflict rather than on the difficulties" and that it would not be realistic to want to obtain absolute security guarantees. Africa expected real, immediate action and had already waited too long since the signing of the Agreement. The Security Council had to shoulder its responsibilities and also continue to exert pressure on the parties to ensure that they complied with their commitments under the Lusaka Agreement.⁶⁷

The representative of the Russian Federation stated his agreement with what had been said both by those who spoke about the need to take urgent decisions and those who saw the need to establish the necessary conditions. He stated his deep concern that the technical survey team, through no fault of its own, had not been able to complete its work on time, but trusted that when the relevant information was available the Security Council would take the appropriate decision on the deployment of up to 500 United Nations military observers pursuant to resolution 1279 (1999). He expressed his belief that there were two decisive factors: the willingness of the parties to the conflict to comply in good faith with their commitments and their cooperation with the United Nations, primarily in respect to practical matter relating to the technical survey team. He thanked those who had drawn attention to the particular importance of the swift organization of a national dialogue in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, as provided for in the Lusaka Agreement. In conclusion, he reiterated the Russian Federation's support for holding, under the auspices of the United Nations and OAU, an international conference on peace and security in the Great Lakes region, which would need to have a very strong political component, which would make it possible to consider the key issues of the strengthening of peace and security in the region as a whole.⁶⁸

Several other speakers stated the need for the deployment of a peacekeeping mission with all due speed following the assessment of the technical survey team and the establishment of sufficient security; emphasized the need for greater cooperation between OAU, the United Nations and SADC; welcomed the nomination of former President Masire of Botswana as mediator and Mr. Kamel Morjane as the Secretary-General's special representative; expressed concern over violations of the ceasefire; and called on all parties to comply with the provisions of the Lusaka Agreement. Some delegations questioned the delay in the peace process and why the United Nations was so reluctant to engage in the intervention necessary to replace the "current precarious" peace with a solid lasting one.⁶⁹

At the same meeting the President gave the floor to those members who wanted to make a second intervention.

The representative of the United States noted the emerging consensus on most aspects of the problem. Regarding deployment of a peacekeeping force, he stated that the question was not "whether, but when and how". He stated their desire to vote for the resolution once they knew the mandate, the size and the costs. He expressed his hope that as a result of the meeting they would be able to accelerate, intensify and clarify what it was that they would be asked to approve, which required a lot of staff work internally that the United States was prepared to do.⁷⁰

The representative of the Netherlands expressed his agreement with the representative of the United States. He also wondered whether it might be conceivable to ask the Joint Military Commission to "step up the frequency of its meetings a little".⁷¹

The representative of France expressed his agreement with the representative of the United States. He also noted the great desire of the Council to move ahead swiftly and the strong backing for an international conference on peace and security in the Great Lakes region under the auspices of the United Nations and

OAU. He asked the representative of the Secretariat to invite the next President of the Council to call for consideration of the subject of an international conference. He expressed his belief that the issue of Africa must be considered by the Council on a permanent basis.⁷²

The President, drawing some informal conclusions from the debate, reiterated that the Democratic Republic of the Congo was the major challenge facing Africa. The Lusaka Agreement was predicated on international support and there was thus a need for the United Nations to help implement that agreement through a further deployment. He underlined the point made that the parties needed to show their determination to meet their commitments before it would be right or sensible for the United Nations to deploy more widely. All those with responsibilities under the Lusaka Agreement needed to take them up urgently and the Security Council would act as rapidly and effectively as it could. The Council would return to this subject soon, analysing and acting on the import of this debate.⁷³

12. The situation in the Central African Republic

Initial proceedings

Decision of 6 August 1997 (3808th meeting): resolution 1125 (1997)

By identical letters dated 18 July 1997 addressed to the Secretary-General and to the President of the Security Council,¹ the President of the Central African Republic informed the Council of a grave crisis, in a context of regional instability, which stemmed from the army rebellions which broke out in 1996 and had left a large supply of weapons in the hands of the ex-rebels and militias. He requested the Security Council to authorize the States of the Inter-African Mission to Monitor the Implementation of the Bangui Agreements (MISAB), which had been set up at his request to help restore peace and security, to carry out the necessary operations, neutrally and impartially, to attain the objectives defined by the mandate of MISAB and to authorize, under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, those States and the States supporting them to ensure the security and freedom of movement of Inter-African Mission personnel. He also transmitted the mandate of the inter-African force to monitor the implementation of the Bangui Agreements and the text of the agreement on the status of this force.

At its 3808th meeting, held on 6 August 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda without objection the letters and the item entitled "The situation in the Central African Republic".

At the same meeting, the President (United Kingdom), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of the Central African Republic, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 7 July 1997 from Gabon,² writing as a mediator representing the Heads of State designated by the Ouagadougou Summit of December 1996, informing the Council of the formation of MISAB by Burkina Faso, Chad, Gabon and Mali for the purpose of helping to restore peace and security by monitoring the implementation of the Bangui agreement and conducting operations to disarm the ex-rebels and militia. He asked the Security Council to approve the mandate of MISAB and authorize the intervention under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, as a legal framework for their intervention, in view of the continuing tension and the threat that prolongation of the crisis was likely to constitute for the maintenance of international peace and security.

At the same meeting the President also drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by the Central African Republic, Egypt, Guinea-Bissau and Kenya.³

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Kenya stated that the Central African Republic had been in a situation of armed conflict since the beginning of 1996, which had affected every aspect of civil life and could destabilize the region, and that this situation posed a threat to international peace and security and required the urgent attention of the Security Council. The threat to regional stability had attracted the attention of the Ouagadougou Summit at which the Central African Republic had requested international intervention, and a regional initiative with the participation of Burkina Faso, Chad, Gabon, Mali, Senegal and Togo had been initiated and was already in the country. He stated that the present draft resolution would give the approval of the Council to this regional initiative in the capacity of its responsibility to maintain international peace and security and underlined that the Council had a responsibility to support regional initiatives. He maintained that the parties in the conflict of the Central African Republic had shown a willingness to settle the dispute through peaceful means by signing the Bangui Agreements. The Inter-African Mission was doing a good job trying to observe the implementation of these commitments, which all parties had freely entered into, and it was for that reason that he supported the present draft resolution. He noted the significant contribution that African countries and France were making in resolving the crisis and he appealed to the international community to continue to support the initiative.⁴

The representative of Egypt stated that the military mutiny and the ensuing events had had serious economic and social consequences. He noted that the establishment of an International Monitoring

Commission had had a tangible positive effect on the political situation and a dialogue between the two parties to the conflict had begun. He expressed his satisfaction that this effort had been further concretized in MISAB and that it had achieved tangible success in the discharge of its mandate, and expressed his appreciation for the role of Gabon and France. He stated that the regional intervention had proved once again that Africa did not lack the machinery necessary to contain the crises which took place in its states and constituted a successful example of preventative action that deserved all international support and encouragement. It was in this regard that they had not hesitated to sponsor and support the draft resolution. He maintained that an appropriate measure of economic and human development was the sole guarantee for the non-repetition of the crisis in Central Africa and expressed his support for the role played by the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP). He hoped that the Bretton Woods institutions, in cooperation with UNDP, would prepare a comprehensive plan for economic reform that would enable the Central African Republic to initiate genuine development for its people.⁵

The representative of Costa Rica stated that he had recently witnessed what he believed to be a new and important doctrinal approach on the part of the Council with respect to the concept of threats to international peace and security and peacekeeping. He highlighted the case of the multinational force for Albania that was authorized by the Council in March outside of the traditional framework of United Nations operations but in conformity with the principles and objectives of the Charter. The draft resolution was part of the new approach: in the past the Council might have interpreted the situation in the Central African Republic as an internal one and not been seized of it. He maintained that the Central African Republic was an example of an internal problem with international implications and an example of the resolve of African countries to collectively tackle and resolve their own issues. He noted that international intervention would not amount to much unless it was accompanied by actions to promote economic progress, justice, equality, the rule of law and human rights. In conclusion, he expressed strong support for the adoption of the draft resolution and expressed his trust that the approval of MISAB would be developed in keeping with the relevant international principles and with respect to the observance of human rights.⁶

The representative of France stated their support for the draft resolution and the efforts of several African countries to help the Central African Republic peacefully resolve a crisis situation. Noting that France supported politically and in material terms the regional endeavours in general including the one conducted by the member countries of MISAB, he stated that they also encouraged, in strict conformity with the Charter, any initiative that aimed at affirming the important role of the Security Council, especially under Chapter VII, which was why they had supported from the outset the actions of the Central African Republic and Gabon in seeking Council authorization for MISAB. He expressed his belief that this initiative was in keeping with a constructive evolution of the United Nations as reflected in three principles: scrupulous respect for the Charter, the affirmation of the role of the Security Council and support for the Council's backing of regional efforts.⁷

The representative of the United States, noting that MISAB was an important precedent and a test-case for African peacekeeping efforts, stated that he was pleased to support the draft resolution and expressed his support to the participants in the force. He expressed his concern at the continued instability in the region and the fact that not all elements had renounced violence or turned in their weapons. Taking special note of the financial and other contributions of France, Kenya and other donors which had made the Inter-African Mission possible and the resolution's statement that support for the force would continue to be born on a voluntary basis, he expressed their understanding that the Mission would not become a United Nations-assessed operation. He welcomed the provision that called for reporting every two weeks from the Inter-African Mission on the situation in the Central African Republic and expressed his belief that the Secretary-General needed to take steps to increase the knowledge of the United Nations regarding developments in the Central African Republic.⁸

The representative of the United Kingdom, noting the threat that instability might spread throughout the region, welcomed the contribution of countries that had provided troops to MISAB and applauded the role of regional leaders in the current mediation efforts. He stated that the support of UNDP for the wider peacebuilding process was an important factor in their success. He noted that the initiatives taken on the Central African Republic clearly demonstrated the importance and effectiveness of African leadership in dealing with conflict and instability in the region, and he reaffirmed his delegation's support for such initiatives. He noted the success of the efforts of MISAB in reducing the number of arms and heavy weaponry in the Central African Republic but remained concerned at the large amount of weapons still in circulation. In that regard, he believed that it was essential that the scope of the Inter-African Mission's operation was clearly defined. He expressed his gratitude for the information received on the activities of MISAB to date and on its objectives since it was essential for the Security Council to have a clear sense of the tasks of MISAB so that it could effectively monitor their implementation. He therefore looked forward to receiving further reports, as provided for in the draft resolution, on the progress of MISAB and the longer-term prospects for the political process in the country.⁹

Several other speakers spoke, noting that the situation in the Central African Republic threatened international peace and security; stating their support for authorizing MISAB under Chapter VII of the Charter; underlining the importance of the United Nations supporting regional initiatives; and commending the Governments involved and France for their efforts and support.¹⁰

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1125 (1997), which reads:

Decision of 6 November 1997 (3829th meeting):
resolution 1136 (1997)

By letters dated 27 October 1997 and 4 November 1997, respectively, addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹¹ the Presidents of Gabon and the Central African Republic requested, on behalf of all the heads of States with contingents in MISAB, the extension of the mandate of the Inter-African Mission for three months as from 6 November 1997.

At the 3829th meeting of the Security Council, held on 6 November 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (China), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of the Central African Republic, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹²

At the same meeting the President also drew the attention of the Council to a letter from the Secretary-General transmitting the sixth and final periodic report of MISAB.¹³ The report detailed the progress made in implementing the Bangui Agreements, including disarmament, restoration of security and national reconciliation. It stated that although undeniable progress had been made in implementing the Bangui Agreements, there was a long way to go in carrying out all the main provisions and, therefore, a need to renew the mandate of MISAB. However, owing to the insufficiency of the African countries' own resources, logistical support from the international community was still needed.

The representative of the Central African Republic expressed his gratitude to the Council for considering the draft resolution and pledged his Government's full cooperation with the Council, the Secretary-General and MISAB to strengthen and promote the cause of peace and democracy, and to create the necessary conditions for a better life for the people of his country.

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1136 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 1125 (1997) of 6 August 1997,

¹¹ S/1997/821 and S/1997/840.

¹³ S/1997/828.

Taking note of the sixth report to the Council by the International Committee for the follow-up of the Bangui Agreements,

Taking note also of the letter dated 17 October 1997 from the President of the Central African Republic to the Secretary-General,

Taking note further of the letter dated 23 October 1997 to the President of the Security Council from the President of Gabon, on behalf of the members of the International Committee for the follow-up of the Bangui Agreements,

Expressing appreciation for the neutral and impartial way in which the Inter-African Mission to Monitor the Implementation of the Bangui Agreements has carried out its mandate, in close cooperation with the Central African authorities, and noting with satisfaction that the Inter-African Mission has contributed to stabilizing the situation in the Central African Republic, in particular through the supervision of the surrendering of arms,

Noting that the States participating in the Inter-African Mission and the Central African Republic have decided to extend the mandate of the Mission to enable it to complete its mission,

Stressing the importance of regional stability and, in this context, supporting the efforts made by the Member States participating in the International Mediation Committee established by the Nineteenth Conference of Heads of State, Government and Delegation of France and Africa, and by the members of the International Committee for the follow-up of the Bangui Agreements,

Stressing also the need for all signatories of the Bangui Agreements to continue to cooperate fully in respecting and implementing the Agreements,

Determining that the situation in the Central African Republic continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security in the region,

1. Welcomes the efforts made by the Member States which participate in the Inter-African Mission to Monitor the Implementation of the Bangui Agreements and of those Member States which provide support to them, and their readiness to maintain these efforts;

2. Welcomes also the support provided by the United Nations Development Programme to the International Committee for the follow-up of the Bangui Agreements, and encourages the United Nations Development Programme to continue its support;

3. Approves the continued conduct by Member States participating in the Inter-African Mission of the operation in a neutral and impartial way to achieve its objective as set out in paragraph 2 of resolution 1125 (1997);

4. Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, authorizes the Member States participating in the Inter-African Mission and those States providing logistical

Decision of 5 February 1998 (3853rd meeting): resolution 1152 (1998)

At its 3853rd meeting, held on 5 February 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General dated 23 January 1998 pursuant to resolution 1136 (1997) concerning the situation in the Central African Republic.¹⁴

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that since the signing of the Bangui Agreements peace and security had been gradually restored to Bangui, with due credit to both the Central African Republic and the mediating role by African countries and MISAB, with the logistical and other support of France and UNDP. However, for lasting peace and stability, it was essential that the outstanding provisions of the Bangui Agreements be implemented. In light of the withdrawal of France in April 1998 and the lack of capacity of

MISAB to function without them, the President of the Central African Republic, the International Monitoring Committee and the States of the region had stated their belief that a credible peacekeeping force was essential for the maintenance of international peace and security. The Secretary-General thus recommended that the Council express its readiness to establish a United Nations peacekeeping operation on the basis of a more detailed concept of operations that he would submit in the light of the progress made by the Central African Republic in fulfilling their commitments. The structure and military role of the mission would be similar to that of MISAB and it would seek to maintain security, create an environment conducive to the holding of free and fair legislative elections and assist in building the capacity of the Central African police and gendarmerie. The mission would be of limited duration and would cooperate with other international partners in support of a lasting peace. He envisaged the appointment of a Special Representative to head the mission and the United Nations Resident Coordinator/United Nations Development Programme Resident Representative would serve as director of the office of his Special Representative.

At the same meeting the President (Gabon) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁵

At the same meeting the President also drew the attention of the Council to the following documents: a letter dated 30 January 1998 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting the third periodic report of MISAB pursuant to Security Council resolution 1136 (1997);¹⁶ a letter dated 28 January 1998 from the representative of the Central African Republic addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁷ stating their full agreement with the Secretary-General's plans for a peacekeeping operation to replace MISAB and asking for a five-week extension of Inter-African Mission's mandate to facilitate the transition; and a letter dated 4 February 1998, addressed to the President of the Security Council, from the President of Gabon in his capacity as Chairman of the International Mediation Committee on the Central African crisis and on behalf of the countries participating in MISAB requesting the Council to extend the mandate of MISAB until 16 March 1998 and stating that a United Nations peacekeeping operation might be necessary to prevent the situation from becoming precarious again.¹⁸

The representative of France stated that MISAB had been a remarkable example of preventative diplomacy, which was the very objective of much United Nations effort to prevent conflict and the deterioration of situations that threatened regional or international security and stability. Nonetheless, the situation in the Central African Republic remained precarious and still threatened security and stability in the region and it was necessary to prepare for the legislative elections, to restructure the security forces and to implement vigorous measures in the economic and social spheres in support of national reconciliation. He stated that his Government supported the recommendations of the Secretary-General to establish a peacekeeping operation and the draft resolution would allow the Secretariat to prepare operational proposals on which the Security Council would decide. He expressed his belief that the Council's decision would be unanimous.¹⁹

The representative of the United Kingdom commended the work of the President of Gabon, MISAB, France and those countries which had committed troops for their work in maintaining peace in the Central African Republic. He stated his Government's support for the idea of a deployment of a United Nations operation, conditional on the Central African Republic addressing the need for fundamental adjustments in its social, economic, financial and security policies, and welcomed the idea of a United Nations political office to monitor their progress in the implementation of those reforms.²⁰

The representative of the Russian Federation stated his support for the draft resolution extending the authorization for MISAB, noting that international assistance in support of the Bangui Agreements was of great significance for the stabilization of the situation. He stated that in principle, he took a positive view of the establishment in the Central African Republic of a United Nations peacekeeping operation that was limited in time and resources, and that his delegation was prepared to take a further, more specific, decision following an additional report from the Secretary-General.²¹

The representative of the United States, noting that through MISAB the international community had re-established security in Bangui and created the conditions necessary for the implementation of the Bangui Agreements, stated that his Government fully supported an initial extension of the Chapter VII authorization of MISAB until 16 March 1998 and would vote for the draft resolution. He informed the Council that they would be prepared to take a decision on a possible United Nations peacekeeping operation in the Central African Republic by 16 March and would consider whether the process of institutional, political, military and economic reforms in the Central African Republic could be assisted by the security umbrella that a peacekeeping operation could provide. While his delegation would study the Secretary-General's recommendations regarding the size, the mandate, the cost and the exit strategy of the proposed peacekeeping operation, they would give equal consideration to the commitment of the parties in the Central African Republic to the implementation of the Bangui Agreements noting that the international community could assist, but not replace, the efforts of the Government to achieve long-term stability. Noting that to be effective, a peacekeeping operation had to be linked to the implementation of fundamental political, economic, and security reforms, he urged the Government to undertake those reforms without delay. He stated his support for sending a special representative and expressed his belief that the prompt appointment of a special representative could help the Central African Republic, United Nations agencies and the international community develop a coordinated transition programme that could resolve the crisis and build a more permanent peace.²²

Several others speakers spoke praising the work of MISAB and the International Monitoring Committee, commending the participant countries and France for their efforts, encouraging all parties to cooperate to work towards a peaceful resolution, underlining the importance of political and economic reform by the government of the Central African Republic and stating their support for the extension of the mandate of MISAB until it could be replaced by a peacekeeping force, based on the subsequent report of the Secretary-General.²³

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1152 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 1125 (1997) of 6 August 1997 and 1136 (1997) of 6 November 1997,

Taking note of the third report to the Security Council by the International Committee for the follow-up of the Bangui Agreements,

Taking note also of the letter dated 28 January 1998 from the President of the Central African Republic to the President of the Security Council and the letter dated 4 February 1998 from the President of Gabon, on behalf of the members of the International Committee for the follow-up of the Bangui Agreements, to the President of the Security Council,

Noting that the States participating in the Inter-African Mission and the Central African Republic have decided to extend its mandate in order for it to complete its mission with the prospect of the United Nations establishing a peacekeeping operation,

Stressing the importance of regional stability, and in this context fully supporting the efforts made by the Member States participating in the International Mediation Committee established by the Nineteenth Summit of the Heads of State, Government and Delegation of France and Africa, held at Ouagadougou from 4 to 6 December 1996, and by the members of the International Committee for the follow-up of the Bangui Agreements,

Stressing also the need for all signatories of the Bangui Agreements to continue to cooperate fully in respecting and implementing the Agreements in order to help to foster the conditions for long-term stability in the Central African Republic,

Decision of 16 March 1998 (3860th meeting):
resolution 1155 (1998)

At its 3860th meeting, held on 16 March 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General of 23 February 1998 pursuant to resolution 1152 (1998) in its agenda.²⁴ Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Gambia), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of the Central African Republic, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

In his report the Secretary-General observed that significant progress had been made in implementing the Bangui Agreements and in initiating essential political and economic reforms in the Central African Republic. While most of the credit was due to the Central African Republic itself, progress could not have been achieved without the efforts of regional leaders and MISAB. The situation remained fragile and in order to consolidate this progress, substantial economic and social reforms, substantial assistance for legislative elections, and steps to reform and train the national army, police and gendarmerie were necessary. Since MISAB would not be able to continue its presence in Bangui without external financial and logistical support, a credible successor force was necessary to prevent the possibility of the situation rapidly deteriorating with serious implications for the humanitarian situation and peace and security in the region. Therefore, he maintained that the establishment of a United Nations peacekeeping operation to take over from MISAB was the only viable option. He recommended that the Security Council carefully consider the facts in his report to consider the establishment of such an operation. The mission would have to rely heavily on the readiness of all interested countries to remain closely involved in the peace process and to assist in every possible way and he informed the Council that France had agreed to provide logistical and medical support and assist in the evacuation of United Nations personnel in case of emergency. He recommended that the duration of mission be limited to 90 days after the announcement of legislative election results and that the initial mandate be for three months, in order to allow for review of the implementation of the commitments made by the Government of the Central African Republic. He also recommended that the Council approve the special arrangements to allow a smooth transition towards the new operation and authorize the continued conduct of MISAB until 15 April 1998 and stressed the continuing importance of MISAB troop contributors for the success of the United Nations efforts. He informed the Council that he intended to appoint a Special Representative to the Central African Republic, who would assist the parties in the implementation of the Bangui Agreements.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.²⁵

At the same meeting, the President also drew the attention of the Council to the following documents: a letter dated 11 March 1998 from the representative of the Central African Republic addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁶ informing the Council of the International Mediation Committee's extension of the Inter-African Mission's mandate and requesting the Council to extend their mandate also; and stating his support for a United Nations peacekeeping mission; a letter dated 11 March 1998 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting a letter from the International Monitoring Committee established pursuant to the mandate of MISAB,²⁷ transmitting the report of the Member States pursuant to resolution 1152 (1998); and a letter dated 13 March 1998 from the representative of Gabon addressed to the President of the Security Council, informing the Council of the signing of the National Reconciliation Pact.²⁸

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1155 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 1125 (1997) of 6 August 1997, 1136 (1997) of 6 November 1997 and 1152 (1998) of 5 February 1998,

Noting that the States participating in the Inter-African Mission and the Central African Republic have decided to extend the mandate of the Mission until 15 April 1998 in order to ensure a smooth transition to the prospective deployment of a United Nations peacekeeping operation,

Decision of 27 March 1998 (3867th meeting):
resolution 1159 (1998)

At its 3867th meeting, held on 27 March 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council again included the report of the Secretary-General dated 23 February 1998 in its agenda.²⁹ Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Gambia), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of the Central African Republic and the Sudan, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.³⁰

The representative of the Central African Republic expressed his gratitude to the international community, the Secretary-General, France and the Security Council for their continued support and reiterated his Government's determination to cooperate fully with the United Nations Mission in the Central African Republic (MINURCA) in every way possible and to fulfil all of its commitments and obligations. It was fully determined that peace, once established, would be monitored and the process of free and fair elections safeguarded.³¹

The representative of the United Kingdom, speaking on behalf of the European Union and associated and aligned countries,³² stated that they welcomed the significant steps made towards stabilization in the Central African Republic, including the Bangui Agreements, and the vital contribution of MISAB, regional leaders and France. He noted the President of the Central African Republic's efforts to further reform the social, economic, electoral and security spheres and to continue the process leading to the holding of free and fair elections. The European Union warmly welcomed the establishment of MINURCA and the appointment of a Special Representative to support the coordination and cooperation roles assigned to him, including the responsibility for encouraging assistance from the international community to the Central African Republic. He stated that the European Union would continue to provide development assistance, especially under the European Development Fund, which would include substantial support for the rehabilitation of the transport and health sectors. He expressed his belief that the United Nations, through MINURCA and the Special Representative, could make a significant contribution to building a lasting peace, democracy and development in the Central African Republic.³³

The representative of the Sudan informed the Council that his Government had had the honour of participating in the signing of the historic reconciliation pact in the Central African Republic. He expressed his admiration for the work of the President of Gabon, the Mediation Committee and MISAB. He stated that his Government supported the draft resolution and he reiterated the importance of regional cooperation and integration. He also underlined the importance of those provisions of the draft resolution with regard to the importance of the international community helping the Central African Republic proceed towards the economic development to which it aspired.³⁴

The representative of Kenya noted that many of the goals set by the International Mediation Committee, the International Monitoring Committee and MISAB had been accomplished, which was spelled out in the third periodic report.³⁵ However, the situation remained fragile and MINURCA would provide the needed assurance to the people of the Central African Republic that the international community would support those gains. He noted that the appointment of a Special Representative would boost confidence in the process of national reconciliation and help in the coordination of the United Nations post-conflict peacebuilding effort. He underlined that it was noteworthy that the draft resolution clearly recognized that, for long-term peace and stability in the Central African Republic, a sustained commitment by the international community in support of economic, social and institutional development was indispensable. In that regard, he welcomed the progress in discussions with international financial institutions and called on everyone to contribute to the Trust Fund established by the Secretary-General. However, he noted that a new dependency on United Nations peacekeeping to hold countries together was not one they would “want to see nourished” and stated that he believed that the limited period recommended by the Secretary-General for the mandate of MINURCA would be enough time to lay a solid foundation for the Central African Republic’s renaissance. In conclusion, he stated that he would vote in favour of the draft resolution.³⁶

The representative of France, noting that while MISAB had done “tremendous work” in restoring calm in Bangui, disarming groups and implementing the Bangui Agreement, the situation was not yet irreversible. That was why the intervention of the United Nations was necessary and MINURCA was an appropriate response. The mandate of MINURCA went beyond the capabilities of MISAB and involved continuing to monitor and promote the implementation of reforms and commitments made by the Central African authorities. Achievement of these objectives justified recourse to the competence and authority of a United Nations operation headed by a Special Representative of the Secretary-General. He noted that the initial mandate of three months could be extended if the efforts made by the United Nations were met by the efforts of the Central African authorities to fully implement the necessary actions and reforms. He noted that the six countries who participated in MISAB would keep their contingents in MINURCA and would be joined by two other African States, Côte d’Ivoire and Ghana. He stated that this demonstrated that there was no need to distinguish between the necessary strengthening of African peacekeeping capacity and the role of the United Nations since they complemented and reinforced each other. In that spirit his Government would continue to provide logistical and medical support to MINURCA. He underlined that MINURCA was a good example of preventative diplomacy and after MISAB had done their job, it would come to offer the Central African Republic and the subregion the opportunity to make solid and lasting their refound peace and security.³⁷

The representative of Brazil commended the valuable work performed by MISAB, the President of Gabon and the International Mediation Committee in the Central African Republic. He maintained that MINURCA would help keep the situation from deteriorating in the lead up to the legislative elections. He stated that the draft before them represented a satisfactory outcome and that MINURCA would operate under the explicit consent of the parties, which placed it in the corresponding legal framework under the Charter. Noting that operative paragraph 13 of the draft resolution affirmed that “MINURCA may be required to take action to ensure security and freedom of movement of its personnel in the discharge of its mandate”, it was their understanding that this rule should apply generally to peacekeeping operations under Chapter VI. He urged the President and the parties involved to make the best of the opportunity to ensure lasting peace in the Central African Republic and contribute to greater harmony in the entire region.³⁸

The representative of Japan expressed sincere appreciation to all those involved in efforts to maintain stability in the Central African Republic. Although significant progress had been achieved, several tasks, including the holding of elections, remained. Therefore, his Government would vote in favour of the draft resolution. He informed the Council that his Government had been engaged in the effort to devise a comprehensive and effective strategy for the prevention and early resolution of conflicts, with a particular focus on Africa. They had hosted the Tokyo International Conference on Preventative Strategy, where representatives from more than 20 countries and organizations met and discussed the subject in depth. Main elements of the strategy included an enhanced early warning capability for the United Nations, and greater coordination and cooperation between the United Nations and regional organizations such as the Organization of African Unity. In conclusion, he reiterated that MINURCA could not be viewed as a panacea for the problems confronting the Central African Republic. Its mission was simply to support the efforts of the Government to overcome its problems and it was the responsibility of the Central African Republic itself to rebuild the country and strive to achieve prosperity. He also stated that his Government would continue to assist the Central African Republic in its efforts to maintain stability and to enhance the well-being of its people.³⁹

The representative of China praised the work of MISAB, which had shown that through efforts by African countries themselves, with the full and timely support by the Security Council, the stability and development of countries involved could be gradually secured. He maintained that his Government had always supported the view that the Council should respect the reasonable demands of the African countries and render the necessary support. China supported the draft resolution and the establishment of MINURCA, and he expressed his belief that it would follow the good practices of MISAB, and fully respect the Government of the Central African Republic, respond to the specific situation in the country, continue to promote communications and dialogue among all sides and accomplish the tasks set forth in the draft resolution. He expressed his hope that the draft resolution would actively promote national reconciliation and economic reconstruction and help the country to move gradually towards peace, stability, development and prosperity.⁴⁰

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that his Government was pleased that progress had been achieved in normalizing the situation in the Central African Republic and that this was due to the vigorous work of the International Monitoring Committee and MISAB. However, international assistance was necessary for the consolidation of the process of national reconciliation and to maintain a secure environment conducive to the holding of free and fair elections. The effectiveness of the international community's assistance depended on the readiness of the Government and all parties in the Central African Republic to demonstrate further political will by strictly implementing the Bangui Agreements and complying with the National Reconciliation Pact. He maintained that the initial mandate for MINURCA, as defined in the present draft resolution, as well as the strength of its military component, was optimal. He noted that the question of the future role of the United Nations in fostering national reconciliation and in preparations for elections could be decided later in the light of developments and on the basis of the recommendations in the subsequent report of the Secretary-General.⁴¹

The representative of the United States of America stated that they were pleased to support a limited but essential peacekeeping mission for the Central African Republic. He stated that the Council's actions would help consolidate the work of the multinational force, which he commended for restoring order to Bangui and initiating an efficient disarmament programme. He stated that the role of the mission was to provide security long enough for the Government of the Central African Republic to undertake the reforms it had promised and provide its own security. He noted that in Council discussions, everyone had agreed that the United Nations would not assume responsibility for security in the Central African Republic indefinitely and that the Government must use the opportunity provided wisely and well. Noting that they had seen more progress by the Government of the Central African Republic in the last several weeks, "as the threat of the Inter-African Mission's departure loomed", than in the previous year, he maintained that progress towards reform had to continue. He stated his strong support for the initiatives of the Bretton Woods institutions to assist the Central African Republic's progress towards financial security, and stated that they would review the reports of those institutions as a measure of the Government's dedication to serious economic reform. He welcomed the three-month initial mandate for the mission, which would allow the Council to review progress made and adjust the mandate of the mission as necessary. He also noted that if the Government of the Central African Republic did not make concrete progress towards the necessary economic, political and security reforms, they would find it difficult to renew this mission for another period. Noting that the role of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General was critical for the transitional period, he stated that they were looking forward to the prompt appointment of a strong representative. The Special Representative would be in charge both of the mission and of overseeing all United Nations activities in the Central African Republic and the coordination of United Nations assistance programs with other international efforts, including those of the Bretton Woods institutions and other donors, which was essential for the ultimate success of that assistance. He stated that elections were another important part of the Central African Republic's democratic reform process and he hoped that election experts, from agencies such as the United Nations Development Programme or international non-governmental organizations experienced in election planning, would provide assistance to the Central African Republic. He welcomed the participation of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General in coordinating potential international assistance for the elections but did not think that election assistance was best placed under the military command of the peacekeeping operation; such assistance instead should form a separate building block of the broad programme of assistance that the Secretary-General would coordinate with support from other organizations. He also supported the formation of a "Friends of the Central African Republic" group to help coordinate international economic assistance for the country and to advise the nation as well. In conclusion, he emphasized the support of the United States for what they saw as a regional initiative to help a neighbour, and hoped that the mission would reinforce the Central African Republic's own efforts to enable the re-establishment of a stable and secure Government.⁴²

Several other speakers spoke, stating their support for the establishment of MINURCA and for the draft resolution, praising the work of MISAB, regional leaders and the International Monitoring and Mediation Committee, emphasizing the importance of the appointment of a Special Representative and noting the need for international support for economic and political reforms.⁴³

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1159 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Speaking after the vote, the representative of Gabon commended the efforts of the Secretary-General, MISAB, France and the International Mediation Committee in diminishing the turmoil in the Central African Republic. He stated his Government's full support for the objectives assigned to MINURCA to strengthen the national reconciliation process, strictly within the framework of the Bangui Agreements, and to establish the conditions necessary for the future legislative elections in a climate of transparency and with the close cooperation of MINURCA with regional initiatives, notably those of the International Mediation Committee, the International Follow-up Committee and OAU.⁴⁴

The representative of the Gambia stated that while MISAB had done a lot to improve the security situation in the Central African Republic, it remained precarious. He noted that the key provisions of the resolution, establishing a peacekeeping force, calling on States to contribute to the trust fund and for international organizations to assist in post-conflict development in the Central African Republic, requesting Member States to contribute resources to MINURCA and having the Secretary-General report on the progress made by the Central African Republic in developing plans for legislative elections, were steps in the right direction and they, therefore, had supported the resolution.⁴⁵

At the 3905th meeting of the Security Council, held on 14 July 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General dated 19 June 1998, submitted pursuant to resolution 1159 (1998), in its agenda.⁴⁶ Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Russian Federation), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of the Central African Republic, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that following the transfer of authority from MISAB to MINURCA on 15 April 1998, MINURCA had succeeded in maintaining security and stability in Bangui, and his Special Representative had been actively promoting the reforms necessary to achieve lasting national reconciliation, peace and development. All Central African parties and countries of the region had welcomed the deployment of MINURCA, and it was widely acknowledged that its establishment had contributed to maintaining international peace and security in the region. Some progress had been made in implementing the major reforms outlined in his previous report.⁴⁷ However, urgent action was still needed in the following priority areas: the restructuring of the defence and security forces; in the organization of free and fair legislative elections; and in economic and social recovery. He called upon traditional donors, Member States and regional organizations to provide the required assistance. Only when the minimum requirements, including an agreement with the Bretton Woods institutions and a detailed operational plan for the elections, were met would he be able to formulate recommendations on a future role of the United Nations in the legislative elections process. In the light of the current situation, he recommended that the Security Council extended the mandate of MINURCA until 15 September 1998 and noted that if the necessary electoral preparations were complete he would be prepared to submit detailed recommendations on possible United Nations involvement before the expiry of the mandate.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁴⁸ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1182 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 1125 (1997) of 6 August 1997, 1136 (1997) of 6 November 1997, 1152 (1998) of 5 February 1998, 1155 (1998) of 16 March 1998 and 1159 (1998) of 27 March 1998,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 19 June 1998, and noting the recommendations contained therein,

Noting with satisfaction the rapid and effective deployment of the United Nations Mission in the Central African Republic,

Stressing the importance of regional stability and the need to consolidate the progress achieved so far and, in particular, to assist the people of the Central African Republic to consolidate the process of national reconciliation and to help to sustain a secure and stable environment conducive to the holding of free and fair elections,

Welcoming the inauguration of the Electoral Commission with a neutral and independent Chairman, and stressing the need for all signatories to the Bangui Agreements to cooperate to ensure the effective functioning of the Commission,

Reiterating the need for the authorities of the Central African Republic to continue to take concrete steps to implement political, economic, social and security reforms as referred to in the report of the Secretary-General of 23 February 1998 and to fulfil the commitments expressed in the letter dated 8 January 1998 from the President of the Central African Republic to the Secretary-General, including continued cooperation with the international financial institutions,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Mission in the Central African Republic until 25 October 1998;

2. Calls upon the Government of the Central African Republic to adopt, as soon as possible, a plan for the effective restructuring of the armed forces of the Central African Republic based on the proposals submitted by the Commission on the Restructuring of the Defence and Security Forces;

3. Urges the international community to lend its support to the restructuring of the security forces of the Central African Republic, including the gendarmerie, through bilateral and multilateral assistance programmes, and recognizes the role of the Mission of providing advice and technical assistance for the initial steps in restructuring those security forces and, in this connection, coordinating and channeling international support to this end;

4. Recognizes that the Mission, in implementing its mandate, may conduct reconnaissance missions of limited duration outside Bangui, and other tasks involving the security of United Nations personnel in accordance with paragraph 10 of resolution 1159 (1998);

5. Calls upon the authorities of the Central African Republic to adopt rapidly an operational plan for the organization of the legislative elections and so enable the United Nations and international organizations to make arrangements for the provision of the necessary assistance;

6. Encourages the Mission to continue to consult with the United Nations Development Programme regarding the provision of advice and technical assistance to all relevant electoral bodies, and urges the Secretary-General to provide, as soon as possible, recommendations for United Nations assistance for the legislative election process;

⁴⁸ S/1998/637.

7. Urges Member States to provide the required technical, financial and logistical assistance for the organization of free and fair elections;

8. Also urges Member States to support the efforts of the authorities of the Central African Republic in the economic and social development of the country, and, in particular, encourages international financial institutions to cooperate with the Central African Republic in this regard;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to submit a report to the Security Council by 25 September 1998 on the implementation of the mandate of the Mission, on developments in the Central African Republic, on progress towards the implementation of the commitments expressed in the letter dated 8 January 1998 from the President of the Central African Republic to the Secretary-General and on the implementation of the Bangui Agreements and the National Reconciliation Pact, including on commitments related to ensuring the economic recovery of the country;

10. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the Central African Republic noted that the deployment of MINURCA, which had made a great difference in the preservation of peace and security in the Central African Republic, was a record for any United Nations peace operation and thanked the Secretary-General for his efforts. He stated that the enlargement of the mandate of the Mission to cover the whole country would enable the beneficial effect of its presence to be felt countrywide and therefore further accelerate the restoration of national peace, security and development. He informed the Council that his Government had exerted itself to ensure the fulfilment of their commitment to a transparent and accountable system of governance and taken steps to improve the performance of the various ministries, particularly those concerned with responsibility for finance and economic development. He hoped that the Bretton Woods institutions would encourage those efforts. He stated that his Government was determined to cooperate fully with the independent and mixed Electoral Commission and with MINURCA and that the Council's action concerned not only the Central African Republic but also the entire subregion of Central Africa, which required a period of stability and peace so that it could fully contribute to the development of the continent.⁴⁹

Decision of 15 October 1998 (3935th meeting):

At its 3935th meeting, held on 15 October 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the second report of the Secretary-General on MINURCA dated 21 August 1998, submitted pursuant to resolution 1182 (1998).⁵⁰ Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United Kingdom), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of the Central African Republic, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that substantial progress had been made by the Central African authorities in the preparations for the 1998 legislative elections. However, the operational activities of the Commission were well behind schedule and they had announced that the elections would be delayed. They would set a new date after the completion of certain key preparatory steps and once the role it expected the United Nations to play in the electoral process had been determined. He noted that any proposed United Nations assistance could only be complementary to the Commission's work and so it was essential that the Electoral Commission take the necessary steps for the timely delivery of electoral material to end its timely retrieval from all polling stations. He also stressed that the Central African authorities would be responsible for the maintenance of law and order throughout the country during the election process. With respect to the proposed international electoral observation, he informed the Council that the monitoring of the electoral process in Bangui and at the six selected sites would encompass at least 25 per cent of all polling stations which would enable his Special Representative to issue an overall assessment of the results. Despite the recent conclusion of an agreement with the Bretton Woods institutions, the situation remained fragile and successful elections were necessary to help further the peace process. Therefore, he recommended that the Security Council approve the proposals for United Nations assistance in the electoral process, including the redeployment of MINURCA troops to the provinces.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁵¹ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1201 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 1125 (1997) of 6 August 1997, 1136 (1997) of 6 November 1997, 1152 (1998) of 5 February 1998, 1155 (1998) of 16 March 1998, 1159 (1998) of 27 March 1998 and 1182 (1998) of 14 July 1998,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 21 August 1998 and noting the recommendations contained therein,

Stressing that the complete implementation of the Bangui Agreements and of the National Reconciliation Pact is essential to peace and national reconciliation in the Central African Republic, and recognizing the significant progress made by the Government of the Central African Republic in implementing the Bangui Agreements and initiating major political and economic reforms,

Emphasizing that the authorities of the Central African Republic and the mixed and independent Electoral Commission are responsible for the organization and conduct of the legislative elections,

Noting with satisfaction the adoption of an operational plan for the organization of the legislative elections by the Central African Republic and the mixed and independent Electoral Commission, and welcoming donor pledges made in support of the electoral process,

Recognizing the importance of the support already given by the United Nations Development Programme and the United Nations Mission in the Central African Republic to the mixed and independent Electoral Commission in the preparations for the elections, transport of United Nations electoral observers to and from electoral sites;

4. Welcomes the establishment of a joint committee of the Government of the Central African Republic and the Mission to address the restructuring of the Central African Armed Forces, and reiterates its call upon the Government of the Central African Republic to adopt as soon as possible a plan for the effective restructuring of the Armed Forces;

11. Expresses its intention to terminate the Mission no later than 28 February 1999, with its drawdown beginning no later than 15 January 1999, and requests the Secretary-General to make recommendations on this basis in his report referred to in paragraph 10 above;

12. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and the personnel of the Mission for their efforts to promote peace and national reconciliation in the Central African Republic;

13. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 18 February 1999 (3979th meeting): statement by the President

By a letter dated 9 February 1999 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵² the President of the Central African Republic, noting that the implementation of the remainder of the Bangui Agreements had to be accompanied by a formal return to constitutional legality, transmitted documents noting the normal functioning of the three levels of government and providing details of the establishment of the Provisional Bureau and the progress of structural adjustment and other reforms.

At the 3979th meeting of the Security Council, held on 18 February 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Canada), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of the Central African Republic, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁵³

The Security Council, noting the letter dated 9 February 1999 from the President of the Central African Republic to the President of the Council, notes with satisfaction the commitment expressed by the President of the Central African Republic to maintain peace in the Central African Republic through dialogue and consultation. In this context, it strongly reaffirms that the complete implementation of the Bangui Agreements and of the National Reconciliation Pact is essential to peace and national reconciliation in the Central African Republic.

The Council calls upon the Government of the Central African Republic to continue to take concrete steps to implement political, economic, social and security reforms as referred to in the report of the Secretary-General of 23 February 1998 and to fulfil the commitments expressed in the letters dated 8 January 1998 and 23 January 1999 from the President of the Central African Republic to the Secretary-General. It recalls that the success, the future mandate and the ongoing presence of the United Nations Mission in the Central African Republic are closely linked to the fulfilment of these commitments, in particular the immediate resumption of a constructive political dialogue.

The Council expresses its concern about the consequences that the current political tensions have for the stability and the functioning of the institutions of the Central African Republic. It reaffirms that the Government, the political leaders and the people of the Central African Republic bear the primary responsibility for national reconciliation, the maintenance of a stable and secure environment and the reconstruction of their country. It emphasizes the importance of continuing efforts in the Central African Republic to settle outstanding contentious issues peacefully and democratically in accordance with the Bangui Agreements. It stresses the need for both the “mouvance présidentielle” and the opposition parties to cooperate closely and work actively with the aim of achieving the political consensus indispensable to stability in the Central African Republic.

The Council considers that a smooth preparation of free and fair presidential elections, for which proper steps should be taken as soon as possible, requires a certain level of political consensus and the opening of a genuine dialogue between all the constituent parties of the National Assembly. It also considers that consensual preparation for the presidential elections can only reinforce the legitimacy of the next President of the Republic and also secure a sustainable civil peace. It fully supports the Special Representative of the Secretary-General in his call to the Central African political leaders and authorities to resolve the political impasse so the country can move forward, and welcomes the current efforts undertaken to this end.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 26 February 1999 (3984th meeting): resolution 1230 (1999)

At its 3984th meeting held on 26 February 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the third and fourth reports of the Secretary-General dated 18 December 1998 and 29 January 1999, respectively, submitted pursuant to resolution 1201 (1998), in its agenda.⁵⁴ Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Canada), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of the Central African Republic, Côte d’Ivoire, Egypt, Japan, Kenya, Senegal and Togo, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

In the third report, the Secretary-General observed that the establishment of MINURCA had been crucial for stability and allowed the successful holding of legislative elections under effective international monitoring. However, the results of the elections suggested that strong divisions continued to exist in the country along ethnic and regional lines and the post-electoral period might require close monitoring. In addition, there had been a broad-based appeal to the international community to maintain its assistance to the country during the period leading to the presidential elections. Considering the fundamental issues of reforms, elections and security, he stated that there was still a need for the presence of a credible neutral military force. Therefore, he asked the Security Council to consider extending the mandate of MINURCA with the existing structure and overall strength but with the following changes to its mandate: MINURCA would closely monitor the developments in the National Assembly, provide advice and limited training for the restructuring of the security forces and offer technical assistance and observation for the presidential elections; the Mission would be terminated no later than 60 days after the announcement of the results of the Presidential election. He also intended to discuss the possibility of a progressive reduction of the MINURCA military component, commensurate with the advances in the training and restructuring of the armed forces.

In his fourth report, the Secretary-General provided additional clarifications and commitments from the Government of the Central African Republic in the light of recent developments as provided by his Personal Envoy. He maintained that MINURCA had been a source of much-needed stability in the subregion as a whole and that the withdrawal of MINURCA would seriously jeopardize the progress made so far. He therefore confirmed his recommendations that its military component be retained at its current strength and that it remain to assist the Government in preparing for the Presidential elections. He recommended that in order to facilitate a continuing close review of the situation, the Council might wish to decide on an initial extension of the mandate for a period of six months, until 31 August 1999, subject to a further determination by the Council after three months that the Government had made acceptable progress in carrying out the reforms outlined in the letter dated 23 January 1999

from the President of the Central African Republic addressed to the Secretary-General.⁵⁵

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Canada, Côte d'Ivoire, Egypt, France, Gabon, Japan, Kenya, Senegal, Togo and the United States.⁵⁶

At the same meeting the President also drew attention of the Council to letters dated 22 December 1998 and 4 February 1999, respectively, from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵⁷ transmitting a letter from the President of the Central African Republic informing the Council of the progress of reforms and requesting the extension of the mandate of MINURCA until the Presidential elections, and to a letter from the President of the World Bank addressed to the President of the Security Council informing the Council of the progress in agreements between the Bretton Woods institutions and the Central African Republic and expressing his belief that the withdrawal of MINURCA as currently scheduled would adversely effect the prospects for continued security and economic improvement. The President further drew the attention of the Council to letters dated 9 February 1999 and 24 February 1999 from the representative of the Central African Republic addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting,⁵⁸ respectively, a letter from the President of the Central African Republic informing the Council of ongoing political reforms and a press communiqué by the Mouvement de libération du peuple centrafricaine, National Political Council, of the Central African Republic requesting the Security Council to extend the mandate of MINURCA until the Presidential elections.

Speaking before the vote, the representative of France stated that MINURCA and the Central African Republic had made important progress. The successful holding of legislative elections was an important stage in the reestablishment of national institutions. The formation of the first restructured unit of the armed forces and the continuation of the United Nations Development Programme-supported demobilization programme were also encouraging signs of the will of the authorities to restructure their military forces. However, he maintained that it would be a grave mistake to believe that the simple presence of MINURCA would make it possible to resolve all the problems that the country had to deal with. This was both because the mandate of MINURCA was time-limited and because the responsibility for national reconciliation devolved on the Central Africans themselves. He expressed his belief that the achievement of the commitments made by the President of the Central African Republic was essential. Since the mandate for the continued presence of MINURCA was linked to implementation of those commitments, the observable progress in their implementation would be reviewed every 45 days, as set forth in the draft resolution. He expressed his belief that the adoption of this resolution and the extension of the mandate of MINURCA would provide an outstanding opportunity for the authorities and political parties to make progress in their dialogue and in national reconciliation.⁵⁹

The representative of Gambia noted that all of the parties involved, as well as the World Bank, had supported the retention of MINURCA and stated that the progress made so far would not have been possible without it. Considering the fact that the overall situation was still volatile and was exacerbated by the conflict in the neighbouring Democratic Republic of the Congo, his Government was of the strong view that it would be premature to wind up the mandate of MINURCA and agreed with the recommendations of the Secretary-General to extend the mandate until 15 November 1999.⁶⁰

The representative of the Netherlands stated that he would vote in favour of the draft resolution both to express his firm support for the positive contribution of MINURCA to the political process in the Central African Republic and to welcome the fact that the draft resolution integrated in a comprehensive way essential aspects of peacebuilding and reconstruction. In this approach it was essential for the Government of the Central African Republic to continue to work closely with the Economic and Social Council, UNDP and the Bretton Woods institutions. He stated his expectation that important lessons could be learned and applied elsewhere from the implementation of this comprehensive approach in the Central African Republic and that his Government was looking forward to the progress reports of the Secretary-General.⁶¹

The representative of China noted that despite the conflict breaking out in many areas of Africa, the Central African Republic had maintained relative stability and had smoothly carried out legislative elections. That had been the result of the effort and cooperation of the Government and people of the Central African Republic and MINURCA. He maintained that the Bangui Agreements and the National Reconciliation Pact were the bases for bringing about peace and stability in the Central African Republic, stated his full support for the reforms in the political, economic, social and security areas and urged the international community to provide the necessary assistance. However, he also expressed his belief that such reforms, especially the restructuring of the armed forces, were the internal affairs of a country, and the Security Council should not intervene too much. He hoped that, in future consultations, the Special Representative of the Secretary-General would fully seek and respect the views of the host Government. In conclusion he emphasized the importance of operative paragraph 16 of the draft resolution and again appealed to the international community to help bring about sustainable economic and social development so as to achieve genuine and lasting peace and stability.⁶²

The representative of the United States stated that they would vote to extend the mandate of MINURCA despite their deep misgivings concerning the pace of reform and the need for Government-coordinated programmes to improve the political, economic and military situation in the Central African Republic and its abilities to meet its commitments under this resolution. However, he stated that they were aware of the need not to abandon African peacekeeping at this time of increased conflict on the continent and to strengthen democracy in the Central African Republic, so he had agreed to one further extension of the mandate of MINURCA until 15 November 1999. He stated that they had two main concerns in agreeing to this extension. The first was that the Government of the Central African Republic needed to “energetically avail itself of this renewed opportunity to institute the kind of reforms that engender long-term stability”. The second was that since the draft resolution clearly stated that MINURCA would end on 15 November the Security Council and the Secretariat had to begin work immediately to ensure a smooth transition from peacekeeping to non-assessed peacebuilding and could not delay in beginning to formulate a mechanism to ensure that economic restructuring, good-governance reforms, demobilization and military restructuring continued after the peacekeeping forces departed.⁶³

The representative of Canada stated that MINURCA had successfully provided vital assistance in ensuring the security necessary to allow peace to take root firmly in the Central African Republic and played a crucial role in the legislative elections. However, many of the economic and political problems were unresolved and the vital step of the presidential elections remained. The view of his Government was that MINURCA would likely remain necessary until those elections and they anticipated remaining in MINURCA until its core objectives were realized. He underlined that the primary responsibility for the maintenance of peace, economic recovery and the conduct of free and fair elections remained with the Government, leaders and people of the Central African Republic and he expected the President to honour his commitment and comply with the Bangui Agreements and the National Reconciliation Pact. He concluded by expressing his belief that MINURCA was a tangible demonstration of the commitment of the United Nations and the international community to peace and security in Africa, and that Canada as a member of the Friends of the Central African Republic as well as a troop contributor to MINURCA was proud to be a part of the effort.⁶⁴

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1230 (1999), which reads:

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the Central African Republic stated that while in a democracy it was important for the Government and the opposition to work together and to cooperate in furthering the interests of the State, micromanaging the Government and attempting to distribute ministerial and/or parliamentary posts was not helpful. He informed the Council that the Constitutional Court had rendered its decision that those opposition members who had defected to the Government side had every right to do so and that, therefore, the majority of the President's party in government was now official. The Bretton Woods group that had been in his country had concluded its work and had indicated to the Government its agreement to re-establish economic cooperation with his country. He also informed the Council that the first vice-presidency of the National Assembly had been offered to the opposition. In conclusion, he expressed his gratitude to the Council for all the help rendered to them and reiterated their determination to fulfil all their obligations under the Bangui Agreement and those commitments made by the President in his letter to the Council.⁶⁵

Decision of 22 October 1999 (4056th meeting): resolution 1271 (1999)

At its 4056th meeting, held on 22 October 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the eighth report of the Secretary-General, dated 7 October 1999, on the United Nations Mission in the Central African Republic, submitted pursuant to resolution 1230 (1999).⁶⁶ Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Russian Federation), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of the Central African Republic, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

In his report the Secretary-General observed that in spite of high levels of tension during the electoral campaign, high numbers of Central African voters went to the polls in a peaceful and calm manner and demonstrated their desire for peace, stability and development. Credit was also due to the considerable efforts of the international community and the assistance provided by Canada, China, Egypt, France, Gabon, Japan, Nigeria, the United States, the European Union and the United Nations Development Programme. He recommended that the assistance of the international community proceed from the peacekeeping phase to post-conflict peacebuilding. Noting that he was aware of the risks involved in a transition that might not give the Central African Republic enough time to fully prepare itself for the next challenging phase, he recommended that the Security Council authorize a gradual reduction of MINURCA during a three-month transition period ending on 15 February 2000. He trusted that the international community would continue to encourage and support positive developments in the Central African Republic and called upon donors to provide much-needed financial assistance and to support the restructuring of the armed forces as well as the process of economic and social reform and development.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁶⁷

Speaking before the vote, the representative of the United States stated that while the work of MINURCA was essentially complete much work remained to be done by the Government and the people of the Central

African Republic. He encouraged further military restructuring, demobilization and strict adherence to the International Monetary Fund programme, which included the regular payment of salaries to soldiers and other Government employees. He maintained that the need for a smooth transition to non-assessed post-conflict institution building was paramount and that thus the troops of MINURCA needed to begin withdrawing immediately. Departure could not be delayed until the end of the current extension and the United Nations needed to take steps as soon as possible to formulate a programme for the United Nations and other international donors to support reform after MINURCA departed. It was equally important that the Central African Republic use the next three months to complete the implementation of stabilizing reforms. Noting that his Government had opposed extensions of the mandate of MINURCA in the past, he stated that they were joining the consensus today because they were committed to promoting peace and security throughout Africa as a means for enhancing development and economic growth.⁶⁸

The representative of China observed that since the Council had authorized MINURCA the situation in the Central African Republic had remained peaceful and stable, national reconciliation had achieved positive results and work on various fronts had proceeded in a smooth and orderly manner. He also noted that various destabilizing factors remained and that work on national economic reconstruction and the restructuring of the Central African Armed Forces had yet to begin. He maintained that the continued presence of MINURCA in the Central African Republic for a period of time was highly necessary and they therefore supported the recommendations of the Secretary-General to extend the mission. He expressed his belief that the extension of the Mission and the future establishment of a United Nations office in Bangui would contribute to national reconciliation and economic reconstruction in the Central African Republic.⁶⁹

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1271 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming all its relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 1159 (1998) of 27 March 1998, 1201 (1998) of 15 October 1998 and 1230 (1999) of 26 February 1999, mentioned in the report of the Secretary-General of 23 February 1998 and to honour the commitments set forth, inter alia, in the letter dated 23 January 1999 from the President of the Central African Republic addressed to the Secretary-General, and reaffirms the role of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for the Central African Republic in assisting the promotion of reforms and national reconciliation;

forces and the functioning of the Special Force for the Defence of the Republican Institutions;

9. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

13. The situation in the Republic of the Congo

Initial proceedings

Decision of 13 August 1997 (3810th meeting): statement by the President

At its 3810th meeting, held on 13 August 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda without objection the item entitled “the situation in the Republic of the Congo”.

Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United Kingdom), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of the Republic of the Congo, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹

The Security Council is deeply concerned about the situation in the Republic of the Congo following the outbreak of factional fighting in Brazzaville on 5 June 1997. The Council is particularly concerned at the plight of civilians caught up in the fighting, which has resulted in widespread loss of life, displacement of the population and severe humanitarian conditions in Brazzaville. The Council considers that the situation in the Republic of the Congo is likely to endanger peace, stability and security in the region.

The Council expresses its full support for the efforts of the International Mediation Committee, under the chairmanship of the President of Gabon, and the National Mediation Committee, under the chairmanship of the Mayor of Brazzaville, to persuade the parties involved to reach agreement on a ceasefire and a peaceful settlement of the current crisis. It also affirms its support for the important and constructive role of the joint United Nations/Organization of African Unity special Representative for the Great Lakes region in these negotiations.

The Council expresses its grave concern at the recent recurrence of fighting in Brazzaville, calls upon the two parties to the conflict to halt all acts of violence immediately and underlines the need to respect the ceasefire agreement signed on 14 July 1997. It also calls upon the two parties to resolve the crisis on the basis of the proposals submitted by the President of Gabon

At the same meeting the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²

The Security Council is deeply concerned about the grave situation in the Republic of the Congo and calls for an immediate end to all hostilities. It deplores the loss of life and the deteriorating humanitarian situation and calls upon all parties to ensure the safety of the civilian population and the safe and unrestricted delivery of humanitarian assistance.

The Council calls upon all States in the region to support a peaceful resolution of the conflict and to avoid any actions which currently under discussion in Libreville, including agreement on an interim government of national unity and a timetable for the holding of presidential elections.

The Council recalls the letter dated 20 June 1997 from the Secretary-General to its President drawing attention to the request by the President of Gabon for deployment of an appropriate force to Brazzaville, and the relevant letters to the Secretary-General from the President of the Republic of the Congo and the Secretary-General of the Organization of African The Council endorses three conditions for the establishment of such a force set by the Secretary-General, namely, complete adherence to an agreed and viable ceasefire, agreement to the international control of the Brazzaville airport and a clear commitment to a negotiated settlement covering all political and military aspects of the crisis.

The Council is of the view that, despite some positive political developments, these conditions have not yet been fulfilled and calls upon the parties to them fulfil them without delay. The Council intends to take a decision on this matter once the Secretary-General has submitted a report to it on the question of the fulfilment of these conditions and containing recommendations on further United Nations involvement in the Republic of the Congo.

The Council also calls upon both parties to respect relevant provisions of international humanitarian law and to ensure safe and unimpeded access by international humanitarian organizations to persons in need of assistance as a result of the conflict, and in any other way to facilitate the effective implementation of humanitarian programmes.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 16 October 1997 (3823rd meeting): statement by the President

At the 3823rd meeting of the Security Council, held on 16 October 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Chile), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of the Republic of the Congo, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

intervention of foreign forces, in violation of the Charter of the United Nations, and calls for the immediate withdrawal of all foreign forces, including mercenaries.

The Council reiterates the importance of a political settlement and national reconciliation and calls upon the parties to cooperate with the International Mediation Committee chaired by the President of Gabon and with the joint United Nations/Organization of African Unity Special Envoy in reaching rapid agreement on peaceful transitional arrangements leading to the holding of democratic and free and fair elections with the participation of all parties.

The Council remains ready to consider how the United Nations can further contribute to a political settlement, including the possibility of a United Nations presence, on the basis of recommendations to be provided by the Secretary-General as soon as possible.

14. The situation in Africa

Initial proceedings

Decision of 25 September 1997 (3819th meeting): statement by the President

At its 3819th meeting, held on 25 September 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the item entitled "The situation in Africa" in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, and in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council invited Mr. Robert Mugabe, President of the Republic of Zimbabwe and Chairman of the Organization of African Unity (OAU), and Mr. Salim Ahmed Salim, Secretary-General of that Organization, to take a seat at the Council table.

The President (United States) stated that the Security Council was holding its first ministerial meeting on Africa, an unprecedented event taking place at a time when there was a new partnership in global responsibility, which was shared by all Council members and by the international community as a whole. Her delegation firmly believed that the discussions would spur common efforts to assist African peoples and nations to lay the foundations for a peaceful and prosperous future. She then drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 22 September 1997 from the representative of Argentina addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹ transmitting a letter of the same date from the Minister for Foreign Affairs, International Trade and Worship of Argentina addressed to the President of the Security Council, supporting the initiative to convene a meeting of Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the members of the Council to promote peace and security in Africa.

Opening the debate, President Mugabe of Zimbabwe thanked the Council for convening a special ministerial-level meeting to launch a new partnership between OAU and the United Nations. Security Council meetings and debates on African issues had been in the past often convened on an ad hoc basis to address crises and armed conflicts afflicting one country after another. The special meeting was, however, different in a unique way because it was being held against the backdrop of an African renaissance that was reshaping not only its societies but also the relations of the continent with the rest of the world. In the area of peace and security, Africa's determination to take greater responsibility to resolve its own crises, including armed conflicts, was being pursued in full cognizance of the relationship between African countries, OAU and the United Nations. He noted, however, that the Council was endowed with the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, and thus there could never be an exclusively African agenda for peace; it would be the United Nations agenda, to which the entire international community subscribed and lent support. That was the understanding of OAU of the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter on cooperation between the United Nations and regional organizations. The OAU members attached special value to the establishment and maintenance of peace and security, at all levels, for the achievement of sustainable economic growth and development. Conversely, they strongly believed that their aim could not be attained in the conditions of abject poverty prevailing in the region and that a politically stable and prosperous Africa would best contribute to greater global peace and security. He stated that through subregional groupings, such as the Southern African Development Community (SADC)

and the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS), Africa had activated subregional mechanisms in the search for solutions to subregional crises. The Organization of African Unity too had endeavoured to play its part in such efforts. However, international support for such efforts, including in the area of capacity-building, was needed for those institutions and mechanisms to play their role. He further emphasized that although the majority of African countries had embarked on and were pursuing economic structural adjustment programmes, the need for investment in infrastructure development was critical. The success of those policies would be greatly enhanced by improving support from the international financial institutions and the donor community. He recalled that, since 1990, free and fair elections had been held in over 20 African countries which, however, had not proved to be the panacea that some had hoped for, due in large part to the prevailing economic conditions on the continent. In that context, he stressed that regimes which had assumed power through undemocratic and unconstitutional means could no longer be tolerated. The United Nations and the international community at large must assist African countries to ensure that democracy became an irreversible process. In conclusion, President Mugabe maintained that Africa was not asking for charity but for a new partnership which was mutually beneficial. There was a growing worldwide interest in investing in and trading with African countries, which was welcomed and encouraged. As the frontiers of peace, democracy and stability broadened, a favourable environment for secure and lucrative investments in Africa would also undoubtedly grow.²

The Secretary-General of the United Nations stated that Africa and its relations with the rest of the world were changing. It was therefore timely to examine how the international community could support and assist African countries at that juncture. Noting the new consensus that Africans needed to bear the primary responsibility for the solution of regional problems, he pointed out that it also placed responsibilities on the shoulders of both African Governments and those outside Africa. The Secretary-General noted that Africa was the only region in the world where poverty was expected to increase and that, despite all the advances made, armed conflict and political instability were still preventing some countries from moving forward.

Economic development remained fragile, and in some parts of the continent, vast movements of refugees and displaced persons continued. In addition, nationalism was on the rise, with cleavages between ethnic groups as they battled for economic and political power. Internal conflicts were threatening the cohesion, and even the survival of those countries. The Secretary-General further noted that although African Governments and people shared the primary responsibility to mobilize and maximize their internal resources, external financing, from both public and private sectors, remained essential. The Security Council, the United Nations and the international community, as a whole, needed to therefore respond promptly and effectively to Africa's call. For his part, he would continue to bring to the attention of the Council developments relating to peace and security that required timely action to prevent the escalation of conflicts. The Secretary-General stressed that after the unprecedented humanitarian crises of recent years, preventive diplomacy was no longer an option – it was a vital necessity. He therefore asked the Council to support the efforts of OAU and strengthen its capacity in the field of preventive diplomacy.³

The Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity stated that peace, security and stability issues, as well as economic development problems, needed to be addressed simultaneously. The conflicts that continued to rage in some parts of the continent had caused irreparable loss, damage and destruction and had created acute humanitarian tragedies, by forcing millions into a life of exile. The international community needed, therefore, to pool its resources and work closely together to address those crises and to promote peace, security, and stability in the region. He pointed out that although Africa, like any other region, had the responsibility to address its own problems, the United Nations could not exonerate itself from its Charter responsibilities towards the continent. With respect to cooperation between the United Nations and OAU, they need to build a new partnership, in accordance with the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter and the Agenda for Peace. Such cooperation needed to focus on addressing current outbreaks of violence and conflicts. It needed to also pay more attention to preventive diplomacy, action and deployment, and be reoriented towards building a joint capacity for post-conflict reconstruction and peacebuilding.⁴

The representative of China stated that his delegation supported the decision of African countries to choose their own political system, and opposed any external interference in their internal affairs. It also supported their efforts, as well as those of OAU, the League of Arab States and other regional organizations, to resolve conflicts through peaceful means. The international community, including the United Nations, needed to pay more attention to African issues; seriously consider the proposals and demands of African countries; support and coordinate their efforts to safeguard regional peace and security; and fully respect their sovereignty and territorial integrity.⁵

The representative of Costa Rica stated that the Council devoted most of its time to the African issues on its agenda, namely the socio-economic crises which gave rise to armed conflicts. Each one of those issues illustrated to what extent the Council's concepts and working practices had changed, and the interpretation of its powers, obligations and duties under Chapters VI and VII of the Charter.⁶

The representative of Egypt stated that Africa had taken serious steps to address three main issues, namely, the peaceful settlement of regional conflicts and the solution to the refugee problem; economic and social development; and democratization and respect for human rights by African communities. Such developments highlighted the need for enhancing the Organization of African Unity's role and providing it with the necessary political, material and technical support to improve its capabilities to resolve conflicts and problems within an African framework. While acknowledging that Africa needed to assume a greater role in security issues, he noted that the Council had the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security. What was needed was a partnership that would enhance African capabilities in the field of conflict prevention and peacemaking within the continent. In conclusion, he stated that African States also sought democracy at the international level; hence their collective support of the process of reforming the United Nations and restructuring of the Security Council and of the attainment of a more just representation of all regions, including Africa, in terms of both the permanent and the non-permanent seats in the Council.⁷

The representative of France stated that the reduction of international development assistance to Africa, at a time when it was engaged in structural adjustment processes, could exacerbate tensions and crises on the continent. African nations had already demonstrated the will to prevent and settle their own conflicts, and regional groups, such as the OAU, continued to play an increasing and positive role in many sensitive situations. Those positive developments needed to be encouraged. The international community needed to not, however, relinquish its responsibilities towards the continent but, on the contrary, had to become involved and intervene in conflict situations, as soon as conditions would allow for an effective presence. For its part, his Government was working tirelessly to help prevent crises, increasingly favouring a multilateral approach to security issues, but without being drawn into internal conflicts or interfering in the internal affairs of its African partners.⁸

The representative of Kenya noted that African issues constituted 65 per cent of the current work of the Security Council. Africa's socio-economic situation, characterized by poverty and underdevelopment, remained precarious, and in fact, it was the only continent unable to feed its rising population without outside support. However, despite those problems, African countries were striving to lay a solid development foundation, and deserved the support of the international community. His delegation reiterated the importance of the United Nations role as the central forum for dialogue and negotiations in matters of international peace and security, as well as economic and social development. It also stressed the importance of the relationship between the United Nations and OAU, and the need to respect the latter's resolutions on African issues.⁹

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the current debate acknowledged the urgent need for a coordinated strategy to maintain peace and stability on the continent. The Council and the United Nations in general had already gained a wealth of experience in resolving disputes between States.

However, they had not yet reached the required level of response to the newer conflicts which, although mainly internal in character, could jeopardize regional peace and security. The international community needed to collectively reflect on how it could strengthen the role of African regional organizations, primarily OAU, both in peacemaking and preventive diplomacy, and consolidate interaction between that organization and the United Nations. He emphasized, however, that the Charter of the United Nations, Security Council decisions and relevant international bilateral and multilateral agreements needed to remain the legal basis for peacemaking, and that no coercive action needed to be undertaken by regional structures unless authorized by the Council. Affirming his delegation's willingness to contribute to Africa's peacekeeping capability, he stressed, however, that external assistance needed to complement rather than replace the course of action by the African States themselves.¹⁰

The representative of Sweden stated that Africans did not want special treatment, but equal treatment in access to markets, cooperation with investors, exchange of experiences and cultural interaction. She pointed out that an important part of the United Nations' role in Africa was to assist Africans to maintain and restore peace and human security. Greater efforts should, therefore, be directed at preventing armed conflicts and including long-term measures to build an environment conducive to the peaceful settlement of disputes, between and within States. The international community, including the Security Council, had an obvious responsibility in African crises, as it had in other parts of the world. The United Nations needed to study how the instruments at its disposal could be used more effectively to prevent and resolve conflicts, in cooperation with regional organizations. However, in cases of self-defence, only the Security Council could legally authorize the use of force.¹¹

The representative of the United Kingdom pointed out that in Africa, while democracy was spreading, good government was taking strong roots in many countries and the peaceful dismantling of apartheid in South Africa was a great success story, progress in some countries could not hide the real problems which remained. Africa was the only continent where there had been no increase in per capita income over recent decades. Africa was the continent which had benefited the least from the opening up of the global economy. Some analysts claimed that sub-Saharan Africa would be a net loser under the Uruguay Round of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT). Africa, as the continent with the least economic progress, had also produced the greatest conflicts. Where people were poor and becoming poorer in real terms, tension was bound to thrive. The atrocities that were occurring nightly in Algeria were shocking. The United Kingdom condemned such terrorism and called for improvement in the security of the lives of the ordinary people. He also stressed the need to acknowledge that the International Monetary Fund (IMF) package in Algeria over that decade had had the effect of reducing the standard of living of many of its people. He further emphasized that the war on terrorism needed to be fought on three fronts: better security, political mediation and also economic development. There were three important ways in which the international community could be of help to Africa. First was the eradication of poverty. Africa needed aid. The second way to help was with conflict prevention and peacekeeping. The United Kingdom was pleased by the determination of OAU to tackle Africa's problems in conjunction with the United Nations. The third area in which the international community could help Africa was human rights. The compelling lesson from the recent history of Africa was that honest, open and democratic government was crucial to success. The representative of the United Kingdom noted that although Nigeria and the former Zaire were countries rich in resources their people lived in poverty because of poor government and self-interest on the parts of those who had ruled them. In conclusion, he stated that there were challenges ahead and there were problems for the present, but with a genuine partnership, with the commitment of African Governments and with the international community playing their part, the future could be bright for Africa.¹²

Several other speakers spoke, noting how the debate highlighted the priorities of the international community towards Africa. Speakers stressed that the underlying causes of conflict in Africa needed to be addressed in a comprehensive manner. A number of speakers emphasized the importance of strengthening the role of regional and subregional arrangements.¹³

The President, in her capacity as the representative of the United States, stated that the international community needed to listen carefully to the views of African leaders and citizens regarding their crises and solutions. She requested that the Secretary-General report on how they could better identify sources of conflict and help Africans lay the groundwork for peace and prosperity. She further urged support for the Secretary-General's reform proposals, which provided an important opportunity for the United Nations to use better its resources to address security, humanitarian and development needs in Africa. She stated that the Council's starting point was peace and security, its traditional responsibility, but the Council also needed to take the opportunity to look at the broad picture of its interactions with Africa. She noted that a decade ago, Africa was the scene of multiple conflicts fuelled, in large measure, by cold war rivalries and, in Southern Africa, by the effects of apartheid. She said that the greatest threat to international peace and security in the current times were posed by civil strife caused by ethnic tensions or by straightforward competition for resources and power. These threats were aggravated by lack, in some societies, of strong representative institutions of governance and by poor economic prospects. She stressed that in such an environment, a security strategy needed to include political, economic and humanitarian components. Nevertheless, to implement these components a climate of relative safety needed to be established and maintained. The United Nations was central to meeting those challenges through its peacekeeping operations, good offices missions and emergency relief preparations. She further stated that her Government supported the Organization of African Unity's role in preventing and responding to crisis, and was assisting the latter to build a conflict management centre to enhance its ability to react quickly to emergencies. She congratulated and commended ECOWAS for their peace efforts in Liberia and Sierra Leone and also endorsed strongly the efforts of the United Nations supported by SADC to ensure full implementation of the Lusaka Protocol in Angola. She warned that her delegation would use the powers of the Council to penalize any party that failed to meet its obligations. She further stated that the United States was also developing working partnerships with Africans and donors to enhance the ability of African nations to respond when peacekeeping was needed. She called special attention to lessons learned during the past in the Great Lakes region and to consider steps for ensuring that refugee camps were not used as safe havens for war criminals or as a base for military operations. She further stated that the United Nations efforts also played a central role in Africa's plans for development. His country was committed to working with Africa and the international community to help develop durable and effective democratic institutions, such as legislative assemblies, judiciaries and an independent press. While welcoming the increasing contributions of Africa to the solutions of global problems that concerned all, such as the proliferation of crime, terrorism, environmental degradation and the spread of infectious disease, she underlined that the greatest divide in the world was not between East and West or North and South, but was between those trapped by the grievances and preconceptions of the past and those who had the vision and courage to shape the future.¹⁴

Resuming her functions as President, she made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁵

The Security Council met on 25 September 1997, at the level of Ministers for Foreign Affairs, to consider the need for a concerted international effort to promote peace and security in Africa.

The Council reaffirms its commitment to Africa in keeping with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations. The Council also reaffirms the principles of political independence, sovereignty, and territorial integrity of all Member States.

The Council notes that African States have made significant strides towards democratization, economic reform, and respect for and protection of human rights in order to achieve political stability, peace, and sustainable economic and social development.

Despite these positive developments, the Council remains gravely concerned by the number and intensity of armed conflicts on the continent. Such conflicts threaten regional peace, cause massive human dislocation and suffering, perpetuate instability and divert resources from long-term development.

The Council reaffirms the responsibility of all Member States to settle their international disputes by peaceful means and its own primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations.

The Council welcomes the important contributions of the Organization of African Unity, including through its Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management, and Resolution, as well as those of subregional arrangements, in preventing and resolving conflicts in Africa, and looks forward to a stronger partnership between the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity, as well as subregional arrangements, in conformity with Chapter VIII of the Charter of the United Nations. The Council supports enhancement of the capacity of African States to contribute to peacekeeping operations, including in Africa, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations. The Council highlights the important contribution of the African Nuclear-Weapon-Free Zone Treaty to international peace and security.

The Council fully supports the engagement of the United Nations in Africa through its diplomatic, peacekeeping, humanitarian, economic development and other activities, which are often undertaken in cooperation with regional and subregional organizations. The United Nations makes an important contribution to the efforts of Africa to construct a future of peace, democracy, justice, and prosperity. The Council underlines the importance of the commitment of the United Nations through the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and other humanitarian organizations to assist the efforts of African States to address humanitarian and refugee crises in accordance with international humanitarian law.

The Council considers that the challenges in Africa demand a more comprehensive response. To this end, the Council requests the Secretary-General to submit a report containing concrete recommendations to the Council by February 1998 regarding the sources of conflict in Africa, ways to prevent and address these conflicts, and how to lay the foundation for durable peace and economic growth following their resolution. Because the scope of this report may extend beyond the purview of the Security Council, the Council invites the Secretary-General to submit his report to the General Assembly and other relevant bodies of the United Nations for action as they deem appropriate, in accordance with the Charter.

The Council affirms its intention to review promptly the recommendations of the Secretary-General with a view to taking steps consistent with its responsibilities under the Charter.

Decision of 28 May 1998 (3886th meeting):
resolution 1170 (1998)

On 13 April 1998, pursuant to a Security Council presidential statement issued on 25 September 1997,¹⁶ the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report entitled “The causes of conflict and the promotion of durable peace and sustainable development in Africa”.¹⁷

In his report, the Secretary-General noted that although Africa as a whole had made significant economic and political progress, conflicts continued to threaten many parts of the continent. That situation posed a major challenge to the United Nations which was being increasingly required to respond to intra-State instability and conflict which sought the destruction not just of armies but also of civilians and entire ethnic groups. Preventing such wars was no longer a matter of defending States or protecting allies, but of defending humanity itself.

He recalled that since 1970, more than 30 wars had been fought in Africa, the vast majority of them of intra-State origin. In 1996 alone, fourteen of Africa’s 53 countries had been afflicted by armed conflicts, which accounted for more than half of all war-related deaths worldwide, resulted in over 8 million refugees, returnees and displaced persons, and had seriously undermined the efforts of the region to ensure long-term stability and development.

In terms of responding to conflict situations, the Secretary-General noted that although the United Nations early warning capabilities had been significantly improved, that was of little use without early action. He therefore urged Governments facing situations of potential or actual conflict to consider the appointment of special mediators or commissions to look into the sources of the dispute and recommend practical solutions. As to peacekeeping, the Secretary-General stated that the United Nations had deployed more peacekeeping operations in Africa than in any other region. Stressing the importance of re-examining the Organization’s experience in that field to extract guidance for future operations, the Secretary-General discussed lessons learned; roles for United Nations peacekeeping operations in Africa; support for regional and subregional initiatives; and ensuring a consistent approach. Addressing the issue of humanitarian assistance, the Secretary-General noted that crises, particularly in Africa, had become more complex. He maintained that Governments, international organizations, non-governmental organizations and anti-government forces had an important impact on humanitarian situations. Humanitarian action could also have important political, social, economic and environmental repercussions. Noting the need to maintain the momentum, the Secretary-General called upon the Council to reconvene at the ministerial level on a biennial basis to assess progress in promoting peace and security in Africa. The Council also needed to consider reconvening at summit level within five years, for that purpose. In conclusion, the Secretary-General stated that the report was meant to provide a clear and candid analysis of the sources of conflicts in Africa and the reasons why they persisted. He had recommended realistic and achievable actions and goals, to reduce crises and to promote a strong and durable peace, and had urged Africans and non-Africans alike to summon the political will to rise to that challenge. The time was long past when one could ignore the events on the continent, or what was needed to achieve progress there. The time was also past when the responsibility for producing change could be shifted on to other shoulders; it was a responsibility that must be shared by all. The United Nations, for its part, stood ready to play its role.

At its 3871st meeting, held on 16 April 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda and resumed consideration of the item.

Introducing the report, the Secretary-General stated that he had been guided, above all, by a commitment to honesty and clarity in analysing and addressing the challenges of conflict in Africa. Conflict in Africa, as everywhere else, was caused by human action and could be ended the same way. Colossal human tragedies had taken place in the region over the last decade, which could and needed to have been prevented. At that time, in many parts of the continent, efforts to break up those past patterns were beginning to succeed. In that context, he expressed the hope that his report would add momentum to Africa's renewed quest for peace and prosperity by offering an analysis of conflicts and proposing realistic and achievable recommendations which, over time, could reduce, if not entirely end them. The Secretary-General pointed out that his proposals required, in some cases, new ways of thinking; in others, they required new ways of acting. Whether in peacekeeping, humanitarian assistance or post-conflict peacebuilding, sustainable progress depended on three critical factors: a clear understanding of the challenge; the political will to respond to it; and the necessary resources to provide an adequate response. The Secretary-General maintained that African countries must demonstrate the political will to rely upon political rather than military responses to their problems; they must also take good governance seriously, ensuring respect for human rights and the rule of law, strengthening democratization and promoting transparency and the capability of public administration. He stated that the report needed to mark a new beginning in the relationship between the United Nations and Africa on all those issues.¹⁸

The President (Japan) stated that the Council had requested the Secretary-General to submit a report on Africa in view of its continuing grave concern over the number and intensity of armed conflicts on the continent.¹⁹ That situation threatened regional peace, caused massive human dislocation and suffering, perpetuated instability and diverted resources away from long-term development. The Secretary-General's recommendations were concrete and comprehensive, and provided ample basis for discussions on how the Council could best contribute to peace, stability and prosperity on the African continent. He reaffirmed the Council's intention to review them promptly and to take the appropriate steps consistent with its responsibilities under the Charter to implement them.²⁰

At its 3875th meeting, held on 24 April 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council resumed consideration of the item on its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Algeria, Argentina, Bangladesh, Belgium, Cameroon, Canada, Colombia, the Comoros, Cuba, Cyprus, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Djibouti, Egypt, Ethiopia, Germany, Guyana, India, Indonesia, Italy, Kuwait, Lebanon, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Malawi, Malaysia, Mauritania, Morocco, the Netherlands, Nigeria, Norway, Pakistan, the Philippines, the Republic of Korea, South Africa, Tunisia, Uganda, Ukraine, the United Arab Emirates, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zimbabwe, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. It also extended invitations, under rule 39, to Mrs. Sadako Ogata, United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, to Mrs. Sylvie Junod, Head of the Delegation of the International Committee of the Red Cross to the United Nations and to Archbishop Jean-Louis Tauran, Secretary for Relations with States of the Holy See.

Opening the debate, the representative of Gabon stated that although armed conflicts were not exclusively an African problem, they warranted urgent preventive measures. That concern had led to the establishment of the OAU Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution, which was already doing remarkable work and needed to be strengthened and supported. He noted that, whenever possible, African leaders and States had spared no effort to resolve crises before they degenerated into violent armed conflict. However, owing to the diversity of the sources of those disputes, Africa could not bear sole responsibility for their outbreak nor could it resolve them on its own. In that context, he acknowledged the need for cooperation between the Security Council and subregional organizations. He stressed, however, that there could be no delegation of responsibility and that the Council must play a full role in coordinating and reconciling initiatives for the maintenance of international peace and security.²¹

A number of speakers commended the Secretary-General for his comprehensive report on Africa, and supported the recommendations contained therein.²² They echoed the concerns expressed in the statement by the President regarding the consequences of continuing armed conflict on the continent. They stressed that, although African States were responsible for solving their own problems, the Security Council had the primary responsibility, under the Charter, for the maintenance of international peace and security. In addition, recalling the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter on regional arrangements, they emphasized the importance of strengthening cooperation between the United Nations, OAU and other regional organizations, to enhance their capacity to prevent and resolve conflicts. Moreover, stressing the close linkage between peace and security and sustainable economic development, they expressed the hope that the United Nations and other relevant bodies of its system, and international financial institutions, would consider the report and would take appropriate action within their respective areas of competence to implement its recommendations.

Some speakers supported the Secretary-General's proposal that the Council reconvene at ministerial level on a biennial basis, to assess progress made in promoting peace and security in Africa, and that it meet at the summit level within five years, for that purpose.²³

The representative of the Russian Federation acknowledged the need to step up efforts to prevent and settle conflict situations in Africa on the basis of the Charter with regard to the peaceful resolution of disputes. Noting the fundamental role and responsibilities of the Security Council in peacekeeping operations in Africa, he stressed the need to strengthen the Council's capacity to monitor the authorized activities of regional and subregional organizations in that field. He also acknowledged the important role of African States in conflict resolution. Referring to the Secretary-General's recommendations on the traffic of weapons, including the proliferation of small arms, he stated that a clear distinction needed to be made between the legitimate right of countries to ensure their own security and the illegal flow of weapons. He pointed out that the report contained various recommendations which did not lie within the direct competence of the Security Council, particularly in the economic area, and thus required further consideration. The Council and other United Nations bodies to whom the report was also addressed needed to analyse it in order to prepare practical proposals to implement the recommendations.²⁴

The representative of France stated that the report contained a precise and honest analysis of present and past realities in Africa. Although some pessimism persisted, there were also positive and encouraging developments, including the containment of certain crises and the resolution of some conflicts. While success depended on Africans themselves, it did not exempt the United Nations and non-African Member States from supporting their efforts to resolve their own problems. In that context, he stressed the need to strengthen cooperation and coordination with OAU and other regional organizations. Acknowledging the United Nations' positive peacekeeping role in Africa, he remarked that financial constraints needed to not become a decision-making criterion for conflict prevention, and that Member States must provide the necessary financial, material and human resources to enable the Organization to respond to crises. He also stated that it was important to strengthen the capacities of African States to play their part in peacekeeping in the world, especially in Africa. That was the intent of the initiative presented jointly by France, the United Kingdom and the United States which aimed at coordinating international co-operation in that field under the auspices of the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity.²⁵

The representative of China stated that his delegation supported a greater Security Council role in Africa and the timely deployment of peacekeeping operations, in accordance with the Charter and at the request of the African countries concerned. He noted, however, that the Council must respect their views, as well as their sovereignty and territorial integrity, and follow the principle of non-interference in internal affairs. International assistance needed to also be based on actual conditions and truly benefit the African people, without any conditions attached. He acknowledged the important role played by OAU and subregional organizations in both international and regional affairs, as well as their achievements in dealing with African conflicts and "hot spots".²⁶

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that Africa had been the scene of some of the United Nations' greatest successes, as well as of its many failures. Intervention could sometimes be difficult and dangerous, but it could often be unavoidable if humanitarian catastrophes and the insidious spread of instability were to be prevented. The Security Council could not shun its responsibilities towards Africa; moreover, although regional and subregional organizations had a key role to play, they could not substitute the role of the United Nations. While agreeing with the Secretary-General that sanctions could be effective in encouraging States to bring their behaviour back into line with accepted international norms, he expressed his delegation's support for the Secretary-General's call for Member States to adopt legislation which would make the violation of any Security Council arms embargo a criminal offence.²⁷

The representative of Slovenia regretted that the lack of success in one of the United Nations peacekeeping missions in Africa had had a disproportionately negative effect on the international community's perception of peacekeeping. Thus, in order to ensure the Organization's credibility, the international community must be willing to act to advance peace and security on the continent. His delegation supported the cooperation between the United Nations and OAU and other regional and subregional organizations, in accordance with the framework established by Chapter VIII of the Charter. He noted, however, that some situations required specific measures, including the imposition of sanctions under Chapter VII.²⁸

The representative of Costa Rica stated that the report contained a programme of work for the entire United Nations system, with the Security Council playing a central coordinating role on peace and security issues. He noted, however, that current realities had changed the Council's traditional concepts and practices and the interpretation members placed on its responsibilities, in particular those under Chapters VI and VII of the Charter.²⁹

The representative of Brazil stated that the report contained an objective analysis of the causes of conflict in Africa, as well as recommendations which must be carefully examined not only by the Security Council, but also by the General Assembly, the Economic and Social Council and other relevant bodies of the United Nations system. In that context, his delegation would be “particularly interested in looking at ways to activate Article 65”, which dealt with the Economic and Social Council assistance to the Security Council. He noted the constructive role of the Organization in bringing peace and relief to many areas of Africa, either through peacekeeping missions or the various programmes directed at improving people’s lives.³⁰

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of Japan, commenting on the aspects of the report which fell within the Council’s purview, stated that instability in Africa, resulting largely from intra-State and regional conflicts, could have a direct and serious impact on international peace and security. In addition, the continent’s economic stagnation would have a crippling effect on the world economic system, while its full integration could have a beneficial impact. He commended the report’s comprehensive coverage and clear analysis, and suggested that the Council needed to establish a working group to study the recommendations contained therein, in order to devise a plan of action, which could then be submitted to the Council for its consideration.³¹

The representative of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Organization of African Unity, urged the international community to buttress the capacity of the organization in the prevention, management and resolution of regional conflicts. In that context, he requested the Secretary-General to send a team of experts to OAU headquarters to speed up the establishment of an early warning system there; provide technical assistance and training of personnel, including a staff exchange programme; institutionalize the exchange and coordination of information between the early warning systems of both organizations; provide logistical support; and mobilize financial support for the OAU Peace Fund. As the world’s poorest region, Africa had been disproportionately afflicted by intra-State conflicts, and therefore deserved special attention, he stated.³²

The representative of the United States pledged his Government’s commitment to an active partnership with

Africa to promote democracy, human rights and to accelerate its integration into the global economy. Africa did not need nor want the world’s sympathy; it needed foreign investment, new trade and commercial links, increased tax revenue and improved infrastructure that came with economic growth, he stated.³³

The representative of Nigeria, speaking on behalf of the Economic Community of West African States, noted that three successive years of improved economic performance, beginning in 1994, gave grounds for cautious optimism. The recent upturn in sub-Saharan Africa was underpinned by a rigorous implementation of economic reform programmes, as well as reductions in socio-economic and political instability. In that context, he stressed the need for further international action to reduce the debt burden of African States and reinforce their gains from economic reforms. He reaffirmed commitment of ECOWAS to the collective security of the entire subregion through the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group (ECOMOG), which deserved the support of the international community.³⁴

The representative of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the member States of the Southern African Development Community,³⁵ stated that the United Nations must strengthen its peacekeeping capacity in Africa in a manner that would inspire confidence in the Organization’s role as custodian of international peace and security. The Southern African Development Community shared the Secretary-General’s concern about the proliferation of arms and endorsed his proposals for strengthening international and regional policies against illicit arms trafficking, as well as the need to divert the expenditure of scarce resources from military to development projects. He affirmed Africa’s determination to demonstrate to the world its readiness to tackle its own problems, and stressed the SADC commitment to the eradication of the causes of conflict on the continent to ensure a sustainable development.³⁶

The representative of the United Kingdom, speaking on behalf of the European Union,³⁷ stated that the report encouraged the Union to pursue its efforts in the field of peace-building and conflict prevention, management and resolution, and to enhance African capacities in those areas. Expressing support for the recommendation calling for the strengthening of relations between the United Nations and African regional organizations, he noted that the European Union had already established a consultative mechanism with OAU. It also supported the recommendations on restructuring, international aid, reducing debt burdens and opening international markets, and stood ready to play its part to ensure their effective follow-up.³⁸

The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees stated that Africa had the largest number of refugees and internally displaced persons, a situation that constituted a grave violation of human rights and posed a threat to the stability, peace and prosperity of entire regions. She drew attention to one of the greatest challenges to her organization's work, namely the presence of "fighters" and "criminals" in refugee camps, and expressed concern that the situation would get worse, if it was not dealt with. She strongly supported the creation of an international mechanism to assist Governments to maintain the civilian character of the camps, and hoped that the Council would follow-up that recommendation and examine the possibility of creating a stand-by international force to support humanitarian operations.³⁹

The representative of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) reaffirmed the relevance of international humanitarian law and the need to assist victims of conflict. The rich traditions and values of Africa needed to be revived in order to make everyone aware that there were limits to violence. Each State must also incorporate in its national legislation adequate measures dealing with humanitarian law and the prosecution of offenders. She pointed out, however, that nothing could replace the political will necessary to address the root causes of conflicts, and the ensuing tragedies, by all legitimate means available, including force. Humanitarian assistance was not a substitute.⁴⁰

The representative of Canada stated that collaboration in capacity-building must not have the sole objective of equipping Africans to respond to regional crises in order to absolve the international community of that responsibility. A selective allocation of responsibility would undermine the very notion of collective responsibility and collective action that underpinned the Charter. The credibility of the Security Council, in particular, was linked to its willingness to act decisively and effectively and to make available the necessary resources to counter threats to peace and security. He noted, however, that it was not enough simply to act; Member States must be swift in their response to crises to ensure the effectiveness and credibility of the Organization. The representative further underlined that it was important to be vigilant to avoid the danger of cascading responsibility for peacekeeping from the global level to the regional or even the subregional level. Even by default the responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security could not be subcontracted. Regional and subregional bodies needed to respond, not to vacuums created as a result of inaction on the part of the Security Council, but to collaborative programmes developed in close consultation with the Council. Such collaboration needed to be based on Articles 53 and 54 of the Charter of the United Nations and ought fully to reflect the Security Council's exclusive mandate for authorizing the use of force.⁴¹

The representative of Egypt stated that the report acknowledged United Nations past errors and failures, and reflected its determination to absorb the lessons of the past. He recalled that, since 1993, Africa had taken positive steps to resolve its disputes. OAU and African leaders had also played an active mediation role in preventing crises. He noted, however, that at a time when the continent was shouldering greater responsibility for the settlement of African questions, there was increasing international reluctance regarding the role of the Security Council in some of those issues. The report dealt with the importance of supporting regional and subregional initiatives as a way to promote collective action to contain crises. At the same time, it had to remain clear that such assistance needed to enable regional arrangements to play a complementary role to the efforts of the United Nations, under Chapter VIII of the Charter, and that it needed to not be used as a pretext for the Council to shirk its primary responsibilities or fail to adopt the appropriate decisions at the appropriate time. He also expressed the support of his delegation for the reform and restructuring of the Organization, including the Security Council.⁴²

The representative of Algeria suggested the establishment of an ad hoc working group, in cooperation with OAU, to review the report's recommendations and to follow up on their implementation. The United Nations needed to go beyond making declarations of intent and expressions of solidarity and truly commit itself, side by side with Africa, through a programme of action that fully addressed the continent's concerns and expectations.⁴³

The representative of India stated that the solution to Africa's problems — aid, development, trade and cooperation — did not fall within the Council's mandate. His delegation was therefore pleased that the report was also being submitted to the General Assembly and to other relevant bodies of the United Nations system, including financial institutions.⁴⁴

At its 3886th meeting, held on 28 May 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council resumed consideration of the item on its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Kenya) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of prior consultations.⁴⁵

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1170 (1998), which reads:

Decision of 16 September 1998 (3927th meeting): resolution 1196 (1998) and statement by the President

At its 3927th meeting, held on 16 September 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council resumed consideration of the item on its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Sweden) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of prior consultations, and to the text of an agreed statement by the President.⁴⁶

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 1196 (1998), which reads:

8. Expresses its willingness to consider, whenever it establishes arms embargoes, all appropriate measures to assist their effective implementation, and notes, in this context, that measures such as inquiries into arms-trafficking routes, the follow-up of possible specific violations and the deployment of

12. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴⁷

The Security Council welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 13 April 1998 entitled "The causes of conflict and the promotion of durable peace and sustainable development in Africa", which was submitted to the General Assembly and the Security Council.

It agrees with the Secretary-General that the credibility of the United Nations in Africa to a great extent depends upon the willingness of the international community to act and to explore new means of advancing the objectives of peace and security in the African continent.

The Council, which has the primary responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations for international peace and security, expresses its commitment to exercising this responsibility in relation to Africa, and affirms that strengthening Africa's capacity to participate in all aspects of peacekeeping operations, including their military, police, humanitarian and other civilian components, is a key priority.

The Council encourages increased bilateral and multilateral cooperation in the field of peacekeeping, especially capacity-building, between Member States, the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity as well as subregional organizations in Africa. It welcomes the efforts already undertaken by the United Nations and Member States to promote greater transparency and coordination in multilateral efforts to enhance Africa's capacity for peacekeeping. In particular, it welcomes efforts to implement the recommendations in the report of the Secretary-General of 1 November 1995 entitled "Improving preparedness for conflict prevention and peacekeeping in Africa" and to follow up the outcome of the meetings organized by the Department of Peacekeeping Operations of the Secretariat in December 1997 and May 1998. It encourages all States and organizations concerned to work with African States in particular on the basis of African initiatives and proposals.

The Council encourages contributions, financial and in kind, aimed at enhancing Africa's peacekeeping capacity. In particular, it urges Member States to contribute to the trust funds established by the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity to improve preparedness for conflict prevention and peacekeeping in Africa.

The Council affirms the role of the United Nations in setting general standards for peacekeeping, and urges compliance with existing United Nations guidelines, including through the use of the "Ten Rules: Code of Personal Conduct for Blue Helmets", which were elaborated following a request by the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations. It encourages all those involved in enhancing Africa's peacekeeping capacity to ensure that training for and the conduct of peacekeeping give due emphasis to international humanitarian law and human rights, including the rights of the child, as well as to gender issues. It requests all those conducting peacekeeping operations in Africa to pay particular attention to the situation of children in armed conflict, as appropriate, both in mandates for and reports about such operations.

The Council supports the efforts of the United Nations, regional and subregional organizations as well as Member States in the field of training for peacekeeping.

The Council welcomes the readiness of the United Nations to act as a clearing house for information on available training initiatives. It particularly welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to establish a United Nations database on training. With the aim of strengthening Africa's peacekeeping capacity, the Council requests the Secretary-General to pursue these plans and to include in the database information about African needs in this field, possible regional and extra-regional contributions to assist in achieving this goal, and available expertise on training. It encourages Member States and regional and subregional organizations to contribute information to the database. It encourages the Secretary-General to consider possible further uses and broadening of United Nations databases, for instance in humanitarian crises.

The Council also welcomes the proposal of the Secretary-General to establish an informal working group composed of African and non-African States directly involved or interested in the provision of training assistance.

The Council emphasizes the value of training aimed at improving coordination and cooperation among military, police, humanitarian and other civilian components of peacekeeping operations. It encourages the Secretary-General and Member States to engage international and non-governmental humanitarian organizations, as appropriate, in peacekeeping training activities.

The Council underlines the importance of the availability of appropriately trained personnel and relevant equipment for all components of peacekeeping operations. In this context, it encourages increased participation by Member States, in particular from Africa, in the United Nations standby arrangements. The Council further encourages the use of United Nations Training Assistance Teams as a useful tool in support of national peacekeeping training. It recognizes the value of joint training exercises, as well as the establishment of partnerships between States whose contingents require equipment and States and organizations that are able to assist them. It also encourages the exchange of lessons learned from previous operations.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to study ways to improve the availability of logistics for peacekeeping efforts in Africa.

The Council stresses the need for it to be fully informed of peacekeeping activities carried out or planned by regional or subregional organizations and underlines the fact that the improved flow of information and the holding of regular briefing meetings between members of the Council, African regional and subregional organizations involved in peacekeeping operations and troop contributors and other participating Member States have an important role to play in helping to enhance African peacekeeping capacity. In that context, the Council encourages the Secretary-General to establish appropriate United Nations liaison with regional and subregional organizations and invites those organizations and Member States to provide the Council and the Secretary-General with information on their activities in the field of peacekeeping.

Decision of 18 September 1998 (3928th meeting): resolution 1197 (1998)

At its 3928th meeting, held on 18 September 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council resumed consideration of the item on its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Sweden) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of prior consultations.⁴⁸ The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 1197 (1998), which reads:

Decision of 24 September 1998 (3931st meeting): statement by the President

At its 3931st meeting, held on 24 September 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council resumed consideration of the item on its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Sweden) invited Mr. Blaise Compaoré, President of Burkina Faso and, at that time, Chairman of the Organization of African Unity, as well as Mr. Salim Ahmed Salim, Secretary-General of that Organization, to take a seat at the Council table.

The President stated that the Council having before it the report of the Secretary-General on the causes of conflict and the promotion of peace and sustainable development,⁴⁹ was holding its second ministerial meeting on Africa. She then drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 18 September 1998 from the representative of Austria addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting a letter of 18 September 1998 from the Vice-Chancellor and Federal Minister for Foreign Affairs of Austria, in his capacity as President of the Council of Ministers of the European Union, addressed to the President of the Security Council, on the item under consideration.⁵⁰ She recalled that the Council had established an ad hoc Working Group on Africa to review all the recommendations in the report related to the maintenance of international peace and security. On the basis of the proposals made by the Working Group, the Council had recently adopted two resolutions and a presidential statement.⁵¹

Opening the debate, the President of Burkina Faso acknowledged the extent and complexity of Africa's security problems. He drew attention to several areas where crises still persisted, as well as new conflicts which called for concerted action by the United Nations and OAU. Acknowledging that economic development was another dimension of peace, he proposed the convening of a summit conference to address economic questions related to development in Africa.⁵²

The Secretary-General expressed satisfaction at the constructive manner in which the Council, through its ad hoc working group, had begun to address the report's recommendations. The Council had also shown its commitment to the report's goals, by setting up working groups and adopting resolutions, and by authorizing new peacekeeping operations. The United Nations was increasingly taking a comprehensive and holistic approach to its peacekeeping and peacebuilding activities, he stated. It was also applying lessons learned, namely, that electoral assistance must be part of democracy building; that securing human rights would ensure political liberty; and that political development must be an integral part of economic development. In addition, the Organization, in partnership with OAU, was actively involved in seeking an end to every crisis in Africa and alleviating the suffering of its civilian population. He stressed, however, that without the determination of the parties concerned, there was little the Organization could do except offer the “band-aid” of humanitarian assistance, often with difficulty and at great risk.⁵³

The Secretary-General of OAU stated that the continent continued to face serious socio-economic problems. On the political front, despite encouraging developments, regional conflicts had caused loss of lives, destruction and human suffering. He noted that although efforts needed to continue to focus on peace, security and stability, they needed to also take into consideration the magnitude of the socio-economic problems, which were at the very core of the issue of peace in Africa.⁵⁴

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs of the United Kingdom affirmed his country’s commitment to the main goals of the report. The United Kingdom would help build prosperity by promoting African trade, reducing its debt, promoting development and encouraging sound economic management. It would make it a priority to build peace and prevent conflict in the continent; support the peacekeeping initiatives of OAU; and fund the process of rebuilding peace where war had destroyed it. It would also exercise responsibility in its own policy on the export of arms. In addition, Britain would support Africa’s democratic process through the funding of voter education and the supply of election monitors, and would support human rights through development aid.⁵⁵

The Secretary of State of the United States stated that conflicts in Africa were taking a tremendous toll — in regional trust eroded, development opportunities lost and, most important, in human lives. African leaders had one choice; they could guide their nations towards a future of cooperation, or they could continue into a past of hatred, violence, instability and isolation. Nobody could make that choice for them. He noted, however, that the international community had a critical role to play. Member States, acting together, could make it harder to solve disputes through violence, or could make it easier for African nations to choose the path of peace. For example, they could curb the transfer of arms to zones of conflict, and support a voluntary moratorium on the sale of arms that could fuel those conflicts.⁵⁶

The representative of China expressed concern at the increasing number of conflicts in Africa, which not only adversely impacted unity, stability, security and development in the region, but also affected world peace. His Government urged the international community to support the efforts of African regional organizations to prevent and resolve conflicts, by providing the necessary material and financial assistance to their security and peacekeeping mechanism, without any political conditions.⁵⁷

The representative of Costa Rica noted that his delegation had actively participated in the work of the ad hoc Working Group on Africa.⁵⁸ Since its establishment, the Group had taken important decisions on such matters as support for regional and subregional initiatives; strengthening cooperation between the United Nations and regional and subregional organizations in the areas of conflict prevention and peacekeeping; enhancement of sanctions regimes imposed by the Council; and availability of peacekeeping resources for Africa.⁵⁹

The representative of France stated that the number of African conflicts had actually risen. While the contagious effect of those crises warranted a greater role by regional organizations, the Council must retain primary responsibility for international peacekeeping and security operations, in Africa and elsewhere. Remarking that peacekeeping could not depend solely on shifting coalitions and optional financing, he maintained that the United Nations had to be given the financial, material and human resources needed for intervention.⁶⁰

The representative of the Russian Federation also expressed concern over the increasing number of conflicts throughout Africa and their destabilizing effect on entire regions. He noted that the Charter encouraged regional organizations to take greater initiative in the field of preventive diplomacy and peaceful settlement of disputes. At the same time, it also stipulated that military operations conducted by regional structures, especially those involving the use of force, needed to be explicitly authorized by the Council.⁶¹

The President, speaking in her capacity as the representative of Sweden, stated that in defining its responsibility for international peace and security in Africa, the Council needed to look ahead at what it could do differently and better. First and foremost, the Council must be ready to take action, in Africa as elsewhere: from early warning, prevention and political persuasion to peacekeeping and, if necessary, to Chapter VII action, as well as post-conflict and peacebuilding. It must also support African security efforts, without minimizing its own involvement, to ensure regional support for peaceful solutions. In addition, both the Council and the United Nations system had to close the gap between political and humanitarian action. Finally, the Council needed to ensure that the United Nations system as a whole, together with African organizations, gave full priority to conflict prevention.⁶²

Resuming her functions as President, she made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶³

The Security Council met on 24 September 1998, at the level of Ministers for Foreign Affairs, in accordance with its resolution 1170 (1998) of 28 May 1998, to assess progress in achieving peace and security in Africa since the last ministerial meeting on 25 September 1997. It recalls the statement by its President of 25 September 1997 and reiterates its appreciation to the Secretary-General for his report of 13 April 1998.

The Council reaffirms its commitment to Africa in the areas of conflict prevention and the maintenance of international peace and security, in accordance with its responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations. It also reaffirms the principles of the political independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of all States.

The Council underlines the fact that peaceful societies rest upon respect for fundamental human rights and the dignity and worth of the human person. It recognizes the close linkage between the promotion of economic and social development and the prevention of conflict. It stresses that the quest for peace in Africa requires a comprehensive, concerted and determined approach, encompassing the eradication of poverty, the promotion of democracy, sustainable development and respect for human rights, as well as conflict prevention and resolution, including peacekeeping and humanitarian assistance. It underlines the fact that genuine political will is necessary, in Africa and beyond, to achieve durable results towards these ends, and stresses the urgent need for Member States, the United Nations system, including the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council, the international financial institutions and other relevant organizations to continue to consider appropriate action in response to the comprehensive recommendations set out by the Secretary-General in his report.

⁶² Ibid., pp. 32-33.

The Council recognizes the positive developments in Africa in the past year and welcomes progress achieved by African States in promoting democratization, economic reform, the protection of human rights and sustainable development. It commends efforts by African States and regional and subregional organizations, in particular the Organization of African Unity, to resolve conflicts by peaceful means. It welcomes progress made in Sierra Leone and the Central African Republic, and in the peace process in Burundi. It urges all States and relevant bodies to provide financial and technical support to strengthen African regional and subregional arrangements for conflict prevention, the maintenance of peace and security and dispute settlement. It calls for an enhanced partnership between the United Nations and African regional and subregional organizations in support of these efforts.

The Council expresses its continuing concern over the number and intensity of, and the interrelationship among, conflicts in Africa, and especially at the emergence of new conflicts during the past year. The border conflict between Ethiopia and Eritrea, the resurgence of the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the impasse in the peace process in Angola, the continued violence in Sierra Leone, and the complex emergencies in Somalia and the Sudan, among others, cause grave concern. These situations, which in some cases threaten the stability of large parts of the continent, called for concerted action by African States, the international community and the United Nations system to prevent further tragedy.

The Council urgently calls upon African States and all parties concerned to demonstrate the political will to settle their disputes by peaceful rather than military means, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, and to respect international humanitarian law and the sovereignty, political independence and territorial integrity of States in the region. It also encourages States in the region to continue to improve the implementation of good governance and undertake the various reforms needed to promote economic growth. It calls upon the international community to assist those efforts initiated by African States and regional and subregional organizations aimed at such goals.

For its part, the Council expresses its renewed commitment to contributing to conflict resolution in Africa. In this context, it recalls its decisions during the past year to authorize two new United Nations peacekeeping operations, in the Central African Republic and Sierra Leone, to assist efforts towards peace and national reconciliation. It also expresses its determination to improve further its ability to prevent conflicts, and to make its responses to conflicts more efficient and effective, and underlines its support for measures taken within the United Nations system to strengthen post-conflict peacebuilding efforts.

The Council, based on the recommendations of its ad hoc Working Group established pursuant to its resolution 1170 (1998), has already begun to take concrete steps as part of a wider, comprehensive response to the recommendations put forward by the Secretary-General. It has taken action to help to strengthen support for regional and subregional initiatives as well as to enhance coordination between the United Nations and regional and subregional organizations in the areas of conflict prevention and the maintenance of peace. It has also taken action in order to strengthen the effectiveness of arms embargoes imposed by the Council and addressed the need to support the strengthening of African peacekeeping capacity.

The Council encourages the ad hoc Working Group to continue its work, in accordance with its mandate, and to elaborate further concrete recommendations to the Council, in particular on the need to stem illicit arms flows to and in Africa and with regard to measures to assist host Governments in Africa in maintaining the security and neutrality of refugee camps and to enhance the ability of the Council to monitor activities authorized by it but carried out by Member States or coalitions of Member States.

The Council, recognizing that the challenge of achieving peace and security in Africa is a continuous process, will continue to assess progress in promoting peace and security in Africa at the level of Ministers for Foreign Affairs, on a biennial basis, in accordance with its resolution 1170 (1998).

Decision of 19 November 1998 (3945th meeting): resolutions 1208 (1998) and 1209 (1998)

At its 3945th meeting, held on 19 November 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council resumed consideration of the item on its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (United States) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of two draft resolutions prepared in the course of prior consultations.⁶⁴ He recalled that the Council had already taken action on the first set of proposals submitted by the ad hoc Working Group on Africa. It would now adopt additional concrete measures to implement the recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-General. The first draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1208 (1998), which reads:

Decision of 30 November 1998 (3950th meeting): statement by the President

At its 3950th meeting, held on 30 November 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council resumed consideration of the item on its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United States) made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶⁵

The Security Council recalls the report of the Secretary-General of 13 April 1998 entitled 'The causes of conflict and the promotion of durable peace and sustainable development in Africa'. While reaffirming its primary responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security, it underlines the increasingly important role of regional arrangements and agencies and of coalitions of Member States in the conduct of activity in this field. The Council reaffirms that all such activity undertaken under regional arrangements or by regional agencies, including enforcement action, shall be carried out in accordance with Articles 52, 53 and 54 of Chapter VIII of the Charter. It also underlines the importance of all such activity being guided by the principles of sovereignty, political independence and territorial integrity of all States, and by the operational principles for United Nations peacekeeping operations set out in the statement by its President of 28 May 1993.

The Council welcomes the views expressed by the Secretary-General in paragraphs 42 to 44 of his report, in particular as they relate to Africa. It recognizes that the authorization by the Council of action by regional or subregional organizations, or by Member States or coalitions of States, can be one type of effective response to conflict situations, and commends Member States and regional and subregional organizations which have undertaken efforts and initiatives towards the maintenance of peace and security. In order to enhance its ability to monitor any activities that it has authorized, the Council expresses its readiness to examine appropriate measures whenever such an authorization is being considered.

In this regard, the Council notes that there is a wide variety of arrangements and relationships which have developed in different instances of cooperation between the United Nations, Member States and regional and subregional organizations in the maintenance of peace and security, and that monitoring requirements will vary and should be tailored according to the specifics of the operations in question, including in relation to ongoing peace efforts. But, in general, operations should have a clear mandate, including a statement of objectives, rules of engagement, a well-developed plan of action, a time-frame for disengagement, and arrangements for regular reporting to the Council. The Council affirms that a high standard of conduct is essential for successful operations, and recalls the role of the United Nations in setting general standards of peacekeeping. The Council stresses that missions and operations must ensure that their personnel respect and observe international law, including humanitarian, human rights and refugee law.

The Council is also of the view that, where necessary or desirable, monitoring of such activities could also be enhanced by the inclusion of certain civilian elements, for instance dealing with political and human rights issues, within missions and operations. In this context, the Council also recognizes that the attachment of a United Nations liaison officer or team could improve the flow of information between the Council and those engaged in the conduct of an operation authorized by it but carried out by a coalition of Member States or a regional or subregional organization. It expresses its readiness to consider, in consultation with the Member States and the regional or subregional organization concerned, the deployment of liaison officers to such operations, on the basis of recommendations by the Secretary-General and as proposed in paragraph 8 of its resolution 1197 (1998) of 18 September 1998. In the case of operations conducted by regional or subregional organizations, the Council also expresses its readiness to consider, in consultation with the regional or subregional organization concerned, whether the deployment of liaison officers at the headquarters of the organization would be valuable.

The Council also underlines the fact that the monitoring of such operations could be enhanced by the improved flow and exchange of information, inter alia, through regular submission of reports, as in the case of the Inter-African Mission to Monitor the Implementation of the Bangui Agreements in the Central African Republic, and through the holding of regular briefing meetings between its members and regional and subregional organizations and Member States conducting such operations, and troop contributors and other participating Member States.

The Council shares the view of the Secretary-General that one possible means of monitoring activities of forces authorized by it, while also contributing to the broader aspects of a peace process, is through co-deployment of United Nations observers and other personnel together with an operation carried out by a regional or subregional organization or by a coalition of Member States. The Council agrees with the Secretary-General that, while such collaboration is not applicable in all cases, co-deployment can make an important contribution to peacekeeping efforts, as in the cases of Liberia and Sierra Leone where United Nations observer missions have been deployed alongside the Monitoring Group of the Economic Community of West African States.

The Council underlines the importance, whenever the United Nations deploys forces alongside forces of regional or subregional organizations or Member States, of establishing a clear framework for cooperation and coordination between the United Nations and the regional or subregional organizations or coalition of Member States concerned. Such a framework should include specifying objectives, the careful delineation of the respective roles and responsibilities of the United Nations and the regional or subregional organization or coalition concerned and of the areas of interaction of forces, and clear provisions regarding the safety and security of personnel. The Council also stresses the importance of ensuring that United Nations missions maintain their identity and autonomy with regard to operational command and control and logistics.

The Council urges Member States and regional and subregional organizations to ensure the Council is kept fully informed of their activities for the maintenance of peace and security. The Council undertakes to consult regularly with Member States and regional and subregional organizations involved in such activities to facilitate this.

Deliberation of 21 September 1999 (4047th meeting)

At its 4047th meeting, held on 21 September 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the item "Briefing by His Excellency Mr. Frederic J. T. Chiluba, President of the Republic of Zambia". Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Netherlands) invited the President of the Republic of Zambia to take a seat at the Council Table.

The President of the Republic of Zambia, commenting on the ceasefire agreement in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, stated that the negotiations, as well as the mechanisms for implementing and monitoring it, had involved numerous consultations, taking into account both the internal conflict and external security concerns. Acknowledging the contributions of all parties involved, including the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the United Nations, OAU, SADC and Congolese rebels, he expressed hope for the successful implementation of the agreement. He commended the United Nations for its participation at all stages of the mediation process and appealed to Council to send peacekeeping forces to the Democratic Republic of the Congo. Its tasks would include the disarmament of Congolese non-statutory forces and relocating foreign militias, tasks that went beyond Chapter VI of the Charter. He expressed the hope that the question of cost would not impede international support for Africa on the issue of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and that the Council would be quick to act on the issue.⁶⁶

Responding to the briefing, Council members agreed, inter alia, that the time had come for the Council to move ahead with the task of forging greater cooperation with Africa; expressed appreciation for the efforts of everyone who had contributed to the ceasefire agreement; and expressed support for the concept of a peacekeeping mission. Council members also asked a number of questions on the proposed mission and the ceasefire agreement.⁶⁷

Deliberations of 29 and 30 September 1999 (4049th meeting)

On 25 September 1999, the Secretary-General submitted a progress report on the implementation of the recommendations contained in the report on the causes of conflict and the promotion of durable peace and sustainable development in Africa.⁶⁸ In the report, the Secretary-General observed that despite the many problems still facing African nations, there were also places witnessing dramatic changes for the better. Africans were also taking charge of their political fortunes, and through the sustained diplomatic efforts of African countries themselves, important breakthroughs had been made in the search for negotiated solutions in some of the protracted conflicts, such as those in Sierra Leone and the Democratic Republic of the Congo. A beginning had also been made in the strengthening of cooperation between the United Nations and regional organizations for the enhancement of African peacekeeping capacity. He noted the ongoing problem of the lack of resources and stressed that with the political will on the part of both Africa and the international community, peace and development in African could be given a new momentum.

At its 4049th meeting, held on 29 and 30 September 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General's report in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Netherlands) invited the representatives of Algeria, Australia, Belgium, the Comoros, Cuba, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Djibouti, Egypt, Finland, Ghana, India, Indonesia, Jamaica, Japan, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Malawi, Morocco, Mozambique, Nigeria, Norway, Pakistan, the Philippines, Portugal, the Republic of Korea, Rwanda, Senegal, Slovakia, South Africa, the Sudan, Swaziland, Togo, Uganda, Ukraine, the United Arab Emirates, the United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Yemen and Zambia, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. It also extended an invitation, under rule 39, to the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity. The Secretary-General was also present.

The Secretary-General welcomed the fact that Africans were taking charge of their political fortunes and were willing to acknowledge past mistakes. A majority of Africans lived under democratic systems, and OAU had recently agreed to insist on the principle that Governments which came to power through unconstitutional means could no longer expect to be received as equals in an assembly of elected heads of State. However, he noted that progress would remain tenuous until Africa got a handle on its conflicts, including those in Angola, the Sudan and Ethiopia and Eritrea. He also underlined that while each crisis situation in the world was different, for the Council to retain its credibility, the commitment to peacekeeping, humanitarian assistance and other action needed to be applied fairly and consistently, irrespective of region or nation. He also underlined the importance of partnerships with OAU, other regional and subregional organizations, and with civil society groups as well as individuals.⁶⁹

The Secretary-General of OAU stressed the importance of cooperation with the United Nations and noted the significant development in efforts for the peaceful resolution of conflicts in Africa. He underlined the efforts being made by Africans themselves to resolve conflicts in Angola, Burundi, Comoros, the Democratic Republic of the Congo and elsewhere. Finally, he stressed the importance of timely action by the international community and the Security Council to support peace agreements promoted by OAU or by the regional economic communities in cooperation with OAU. Noting the plans to establish an African Union, he reiterated that African countries were not shying away from their responsibilities, but maintained that for the process to remain meaningful, Africa needed the active support of the international community.⁷⁰

During the course of the debate, the speakers touched on, inter alia, the importance of an effective partnership between the United Nations, OAU and other regional organizations in Africa, such as ECOWAS; the need to enhance Africa's security by helping it resolve and prevent armed conflicts and grapple with transnational threats, such as HIV/AIDS and terrorism; ways to support African peacekeeping; the need to support democracy and good governance; the interrelationship between peace and development; the challenge of dealing with small arms and enforcing arms embargoes; and the importance of the Security Council responding more rapidly to situations in Africa, including by authorizing peacekeeping missions. Speakers referred to a wide variety of situations in Africa, including those in Angola, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Ethiopia and Eritrea, Guinea-Bissau, Rwanda and the Sudan,⁷¹ as well as the sanctions on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.

(4081st meeting)

At its 4081st meeting, held on 15 December 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in the Council's prior consultations, the Council invited the representatives of Algeria, the Bahamas, Bangladesh, Belgium, Burundi, Cameroon, Colombia, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Egypt, Finland, Germany, Ghana, India, Indonesia, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Kenya, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mozambique, New Zealand, Nigeria, Norway, Portugal, the Republic of Korea, Rwanda, Sierra Leone, South Africa, Spain, Uganda, Ukraine, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zimbabwe, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The Secretary-General was also present.

At the outset of the meeting, the President (United Kingdom) suggested that the discussion focus on three questions: how coordination could be improved between the Security Council, the Organization of African Unity and the key subregional organizations; how the needs for African peacekeeping could be met more effectively; and the additional instruments the Council could bring to help solve and prevent conflicts in Africa.⁷²

The Secretary-General noted that there was a need for the Council to show sustained and effective interest in African conflicts or potential conflicts. He emphasized that closer cooperation and coordination with the relevant regional and subregional organizations needed to be established. While African States had risen to the challenge of playing a leading role on that continent, through regional operations, there was a great need for assistance to Africa in strengthening the capacity of its regional and subregional institutions. In that regard, the Council should consider urgently how such regional operations could be more fairly and efficiently financed. While such funding was most often obtained through trust funds, such funds did not always attract donations on an adequate scale. He also recommended that the Council make greater use of such diplomatic initiatives as contact groups and joint working groups focused on conflict prevention or containment, as well as Council missions with clear goals, such as the recent one to Jakarta and East Timor.⁷³

During the course of the discussion speakers stated, inter alia, that regular and more structured consultation and coordination between the Council and OAU and the regional and subregional bodies should be instituted; agreed that the Council needed to meet the needs of African peacekeeping more quickly and effectively; suggested increased United Nations assistance to building Africa's own peacekeeping capabilities through training, personnel exchange and logistics partnership arrangements; underscored the importance of providing the right resources for specific mandates; stressed the need for more use of preventive measures, Security Council missions and other approaches; cited the need for stricter and more targeted implementation of the Council's other key tool, sanctions and arms embargoes; and called for a greater focus on the problem of HIV/AIDS.⁷⁴

9. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 10 February 1999 (3975th meeting): resolution 1227 (1999)

At the 3975th meeting of the Security Council, held on 10 February 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Canada), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Eritrea and Ethiopia, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,¹¹ as well as to the following documents: letters dated 29 January, 5 and 8 February 1999, respectively, from the representative of Eritrea,¹² informing the Council of Ethiopian aggression and requesting the Council to condemn it; letters dated 2, 4, 5 and 9 February 1999 from the representative of Ethiopia,¹³ informing the Council of Eritrean aggression and calling on the international community to pressure them to accept the OAU proposal; and a letter dated 8 February 1999 from the representative of Burkina Faso,¹⁴ transmitting a statement by the Organization of African Unity (OAU) on the dispute between Eritrea and Ethiopia.

At the same meeting the representative of Ethiopia stated that it had been nine months since Eritrea had committed an act of aggression against Ethiopia and occupied Ethiopia's territory by force. Although recognizing its right as a sovereign country to defend itself, he maintained that Ethiopia had chosen instead to seek a diplomatic solution to the crisis. He noted that the Council was aware that Ethiopia had accepted the OAU Framework Agreement, for which the Council, in resolution 1226 (1999) of 29 January 1999, had expressed its full support. He also noted that Eritrea had not only sabotaged and rejected all peace proposals but had carried out provocative military actions in order to create an atmosphere of general crisis and divert the attention of the international community from the core issue of the withdrawal of Eritrea from Ethiopian territory. He drew the attention of the Council to his letters of 4 and 5 February 1999¹⁵ and informed the Council that considering those Eritrean military actions against Ethiopia, his Government had no choice but to exercise its legitimate right of self-defence, as stipulated in Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations. He commented on the draft resolution, welcoming the fact that the Council reaffirmed resolution 1226, in which it had strongly urged Eritrea to accept the OAU Framework Agreement and underlined that the Framework Agreement remained a viable and sound solution to the conflict. He, however, expressed his delegation's reservations, "in the strongest possible terms", regarding paragraph 7 of the draft resolution, which called for the cessation of arms sales to both countries. He maintained that Ethiopia was a victim of Eritrean aggression and that placing the aggressor and the victim on the same footing was contrary to elementary principles and the sense of justice. He recalled Ethiopia's treatment by the League of Nations in 1936 when the organization imposed an arms embargo on both Italy and Ethiopia, knowing that Italy was self-sufficient in arms while Ethiopia was not. He maintained that since Ethiopia, which was a landlocked country with no relations with rogue States, had no arms supplies, while Eritrea had a long coastline and relations with States whose "commitment to international law is highly questionable", paragraph 7 was essentially targeted against Ethiopia. He concluded by reiterating readiness of Ethiopia to cooperate with parties working for a peaceful resolution of the dispute, despite being a victim of aggression, while maintaining its resolve to defend its sovereignty.

The representative of Eritrea stated that he appreciated the concern of the Council over the conflict and the dangerous level to which it had been escalated by the Ethiopian Government and welcomed the Council's decision to be actively seized of the matter. He noted that Eritrea had submitted in writing a reaction to resolution 1226 (1999) and informed the Council that Ethiopia had broken the de facto truce and restarted an all-out offensive against Eritrea.¹⁶ He maintained that it was well known to the Council that Eritrea had consistently called for a renouncement of the threat and use of force, for a firm commitment to a peaceful and legal solution of the conflict and for a binding ceasefire or cessation of hostilities so an atmosphere conducive to the success of the peace process could be created. Such calls were repeated by the international community, including the Council. Despite those calls being rejected by Ethiopia and their threats and preparations for war, Eritrea had continued to engage in good faith with all peace endeavours by concerned parties. He informed the Council that Eritrea had been forced to defend itself from an all-out offensive by Ethiopia, which had been launched pursuant to a standing declaration of Ethiopia's parliament, and not in response to any Eritrean actions. This offensive had escalated the conflict from a containable border skirmish to an all-out war. He maintained that the fact that Ethiopia had initiated the current offensive and violated the United States-brokered moratorium on air attacks had been ascertained by numerous outside observers. He stated that it was "tragic" that the Security Council would not condemn the Ethiopian regime for its irresponsible resort to force to resolve a border conflict. Allowing the Government of Ethiopia to continue to wage war with impunity in violation of the sovereignty of another country would only encourage them to continue, with grave consequences. In conclusion, he reiterated Ethiopia's full responsibility for the escalation and urged the Security Council to act appropriately.¹⁷

At the same meeting the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1227 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 1177 (1998) of 26 June 1998 and 1226 (1999) of 29 January 1999,

Expressing its grave concern regarding the border conflict between Ethiopia and Eritrea and the resumption of hostilities between the parties,

Recalling the commitment of Ethiopia and Eritrea to a moratorium on the threat of and use of air strikes,

Stressing that the situation between Ethiopia and Eritrea constitutes a threat to peace and security,

1. Condemns the recourse to the use of force by Ethiopia and Eritrea;

¹⁷ S/PV.3975, pp. 3-5.

2. Demands an immediate halt to the hostilities, in particular the use of air strikes;

3. Also demands that Ethiopia and Eritrea resume diplomatic efforts to find a peaceful resolution to the conflict;

4. Stresses that the Framework Agreement as approved on 17 December 1998 by the Summit of the Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution of the Organization of African Unity remains a viable and sound basis for a peaceful resolution of the conflict;

5. Expresses its full support for the efforts of the Organization of African Unity, the Secretary-General and his Special Envoy for Africa, and concerned Member States to find a peaceful resolution of the present hostilities;

6. Calls upon Ethiopia and Eritrea to ensure the safety of the civilian population and respect for human rights and international humanitarian law;

7. Strongly urges all States to end immediately all sales of arms and munitions to Ethiopia and Eritrea;

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁹

The Security Council reaffirms its resolutions 1177 (1998) of 26 June 1998, 1226 (1999) of 29 January 1999 and 1227 (1999) of 10 February 1999, which called upon Ethiopia and Eritrea to refrain from armed conflict and to accept and implement the Framework Agreement as approved on 17 December 1998 by the Summit of the Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution of the Organization of African Unity.

The Council demands an immediate halt to all hostilities and calls upon the parties to refrain from the further use of force.

8. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 27 February 1999 (3985th meeting): statement by the President

At the 3985th meeting of the Security Council, held on 27 February 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Canada), drew the attention of the Council to identical letters dated 27 February 1999 addressed to the Secretary-General and to the President of the Security Council, respectively, from the representative of Eritrea,¹⁸ noting its reservations concerning certain aspects of the OAU Framework and calling on the Council to condemn Ethiopian territorial ambitions and aggression, ensure the implementation of Security Council resolutions and ensure that observers were sent to verify facts on the ground and facilitate demarcation.

The Council welcomes the acceptance by Eritrea, at the level of head of State, of the Framework Agreement and recalls the prior acceptance of the Agreement by Ethiopia. The Framework Agreement remains a viable and sound basis for a peaceful resolution of the conflict.

The Council reaffirms the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Ethiopia and Eritrea.

The Council expresses its willingness to consider all appropriate support to implement a peace agreement between the two parties.

The Council expresses its continuing support for the efforts of the Organization of African Unity, the Secretary-General and his Special Envoy, Mr. Mohammed Sahnoun and concerned Member States to find a peaceful resolution of the border dispute.

The Council remains actively seized of the matter.

16. The situation in Guinea-Bissau

Initial proceedings

Decision of 6 November 1998 (3940th meeting): statement by the President

By a letter dated 3 November 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹ the representative of Nigeria transmitted the text of the peace agreement signed by the President of Guinea-

Bissau and the head of the self-proclaimed military junta at the end of the twenty-first Summit of the Authority of the Heads of State and Government of the Economic Community of West African States held at Abuja on 31 October and 1 November 1998. The parties to the conflict thereby agreed to reaffirm the ceasefire agreement signed in Praia on 26 August 1998, and agreed to the total withdrawal from Guinea-Bissau of all foreign troops and the deployment of an ECOWAS Military Observer Group (ECOMOG) interposition force that would guarantee security along the Guinea-Bissau/Senegal border and keep the warring parties apart and guarantee free access to humanitarian organizations and agencies. They would immediately put in place a government of national unity, which would include among other things, representatives of the self-proclaimed junta, and general and presidential elections would be held not later than the end of March 1999.

At the 3940th meeting of the Security Council, held on 6 January 1998, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda without objection the above letter and the item entitled "The situation in Guinea-Bissau". Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United States), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative from Guinea-Bissau, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²

The Security Council welcomes the agreement reached on 1 November 1998, in Abuja, between the Government of Guinea-Bissau and the Self-Proclaimed Military Junta during the Twenty-first Summit of the Authority of the Heads of State and Government of the Economic Community of West African States. In this context, the Council commends the mediation efforts of the Economic Community of West African States and of the Community of Portuguese-speaking Countries, and their respective Chairmen, and recognizes the role of other leaders, in particular the preponderant role of the President of the Gambia, in the negotiations that led to that agreement.

The Council affirms its firm commitment to preserve the unity, sovereignty, constitutional order and territorial integrity of Guinea-Bissau.

The Council considers the agreement to be a positive step towards national reconciliation and lasting peace in Guinea-Bissau. The Council calls upon the Government and the Self-Proclaimed Military Junta to respect fully their obligations under the Abuja Agreement and the Praia Agreement of 26 August 1998. The Council welcomes, in particular, the decision to put in place immediately a government of national unity and to hold general and presidential elections no later than the end of March 1999.

The Council takes note of the agreement regarding the withdrawal from Guinea-Bissau of all foreign troops and of the simultaneous deployment of the interposition force from the Monitoring Group of the Economic Community of West African States, which will take over from the withdrawn forces. The Council calls upon all States to provide voluntarily technical, financial and logistical support to assist the Monitoring Group to carry out its mission.

The Council appeals to States and organizations concerned to provide urgent humanitarian assistance to displaced persons and refugees. It calls upon the Government and the Self-Proclaimed Military Junta to continue to respect relevant provisions of international law, including humanitarian law, and to ensure safe and unimpeded access by international humanitarian organizations to persons in need of assistance as a result of the conflict. In this regard, it welcomes the decision to open the international airport and the seaport at Bissau.

The Council will remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 21 December 1998 (3958th meeting): resolution 1216 (1998)

At its 3958th meeting of the Security Council, held on 21 December 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President, with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Guinea-Bissau and Togo, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.³

The President also drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 15 December 1998 from the representative of Togo, which transmitted the text of the final communiqué and the additional protocol to the Abuja Accord of 1 November 1998 concerning the formation of the Government of National Unity of the Republic of Guinea-Bissau.⁴

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1216 (1998), which reads:

Decision of 6 April 1999 (3991st meeting):
resolution 1233 (1999)

At its 3991st meeting, held on 6 April 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultation, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General dated 17 March 1999, submitted pursuant to paragraph 12 of the Security Council resolution 1216 (1998) of 21 December 1998.⁵ Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (France), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Guinea-Bissau and Togo, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the post-conflict situation in Guinea-Bissau remained very fragile, that the economy, basic social services and State institutions all needed to be rebuilt virtually from scratch and that the people of Guinea-Bissau needed a durable peace to attend to their shattered livelihoods. The Secretary-General strongly hoped that the parties would translate into concrete measures the commitments they had undertaken under the Abuja Agreement. He further observed that the significant actions they had taken, so far, towards the implementation of that Agreement were steps in the right direction and in this regard, he wished to commend the efforts both of the regional leaders and of civil society inside Guinea-Bissau for their unstinting support during the crisis. He wanted to particularly commend the Chairman of ECOWAS for his timely actions and leadership. He said he was heartened by the undertaking made by the President of Guinea-Bissau and the head of the self-proclaimed military junta never to resort to arms again and said that the United Nations stood ready to support their efforts. He was confident that the "Group of Friends of Guinea-Bissau", then established in New York under the Chairmanship of the Gambia, would do the same. He expressed his appreciation to those Member States that made possible the deployment of ECOMOG to Guinea-Bissau, and encouraged other Member States to make timely contributions to the United Nations Trust Fund set up the previous month to support ECOMOG.

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 18 February 1999, from the representative of Togo,⁶ transmitting the text of the final communiqué of a meeting held in Lomé on 17 February 1999 in relation to the implementation of the peace process in Guinea-Bissau and the text of the ceasefire agreement signed on 3 February 1999 by the parties to the conflict; and to a letter dated 2 March 1999 from the representative of Germany,⁷ transmitting a statement on Guinea-Bissau by the Presidency of the European Union welcoming the fact that the Government of National Unity had taken office.

At the same meeting the President also drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁸ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1233 (1999), which reads:

Americas

17. Central America: efforts towards peace

Decision of 10 January 1997 (3730th meeting): rejection of a draft resolution

On 17 December 1996, pursuant to the request of the Government of Guatemala and the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca (URNG), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on "Central America: efforts towards peace" dealing exclusively with the Agreement on the definite ceasefire in Guatemala, which had been signed by the parties on 4 December 1996 in Oslo, Norway.¹ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that this had been the third agreement on the definitive ceasefire signed that year. The Government and URNG wanted to see the military aspects of the peace settlement implemented as soon as possible, which created a need for the United Nations to deploy the new military component of the United Nations Verification Mission in Guatemala (MINUGUA) rapidly. Verification of the definitive ceasefire would also require the deployment of military observers, which would require authorization by the Council. The Secretary-General therefore asked the Council to grant him the contingent authority to attach the military component to MINUGUA. The Secretary-General also informed the Council of the signing of the Agreement on a Firm and Lasting Peace on 29 December 1996,² and requested authorization of the Security Council for the deployment of military observers for a period of three months.

At its 3730th meeting, held on 10 January 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council resumed consideration of the item entitled "Central America: efforts towards peace". The President (Japan), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Argentina, Canada, Colombia, Guatemala, Mexico, the Netherlands, Norway, Spain and Venezuela, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution submitted by Argentina, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Mexico, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, the United Kingdom, the United States and Venezuela.³ He also drew their attention to a letter dated 10 January 1997 from the representative of Guatemala addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting a letter of the same date from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Guatemala.⁴ In the letter, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, referring to the favourable results that were hoped for on the verification mission requested by both the Government of Guatemala and the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca for demobilization and disarmament of former guerrilla combatants involved in the Guatemalan armed conflict, stated that it might be useful for the members of the Security Council to know that separate consultations had taken place in both New York and Geneva between high-level delegations of the People's Republic of China and Guatemala. He stated that the Guatemalan delegations had reaffirmed the conviction of their Government that in accordance with the principles contained in the Charter of the United Nations all countries needed to refrain from taking any action that might affect the territorial integrity or political independence of other countries. They had also stated that those principles would guide Guatemala's future actions at the United Nations with regard to initiatives related to Taiwan Province of China.

At the same meeting, the representative of Guatemala stated that, following the signing of the final agreement on 29 December 1996, his country had successfully concluded the peace negotiations which now merely required verification through a peacekeeping force, as requested by the Secretary-General in his reports.⁵ Over the past years, the international community had followed with great interest and had supported the Guatemalan process. It now awaited the Council's decision to send a peacekeeping mission to assist in the consolidation of the peace process by verifying implementation of the ceasefire agreement. His delegation remained fully convinced that the majority of Council members would agree to authorize the mission. However, he was also aware of a problem of a bilateral nature which had been raised by one of the permanent members of the Council. In spite of that “unusual situation”, Guatemala had been holding consultations with the delegation of that country to overcome the existing difficulty. In that context, he emphasized his Government’s willingness to contribute to friendly relations among countries and affirmed that it had never been its intention to interfere in the internal affairs of another State. Recognizing the gravity of the situation, in addition to the important bilateral consultations in which there had been constructive exchanges and substantial advances, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Guatemala had sent a letter to the President of the Security Council explaining the scope of those consultations.⁶ In conclusion, he stressed that the members of the Council “must not allow bilateral issues unrelated to matters under consideration to hinder their decisions”.⁷

During the Council’s deliberations, many speakers welcomed the signing of the final peace agreement between the Government of Guatemala and the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca; expressed full support for the rapid deployment of a group of United Nations military observers to verify the ceasefire agreement; and urged Council members to adopt the draft resolution.⁸ Some speakers also maintained that this was a case in which the Council was called upon to exercise its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security.⁹

In a statement before the vote, the representative of the United Kingdom said that his Government welcomed the signing of the final peace agreement between the Government of Guatemala and URNG and supported the Secretary-General’s recommendation for a rapid deployment of United Nations military observers to verify the ceasefire. His delegation would therefore vote in favour of the draft resolution. He called upon both parties to implement fully their commitments and to cooperate with the United Nations in the verification of the ceasefire and demobilization of combatants.¹⁰

The representative of France praised the efforts of the Secretary-General and noted that his proposal to create an observer mission attached to MINUGUA was “in keeping with the United Nations mission and with the competence of the Security Council and the responsibilities of its members”. The French delegation would therefore vote in favour of the draft resolution.¹¹

The Council then proceeded to vote on the draft resolution. It received 14 votes in favour and 1 against (China), with no abstentions, and was not adopted owing to the negative vote of a permanent member of the Council.¹² Under the draft resolution, the Council would have recalled, inter alia, the Framework Agreement of 10 January 1994 and all subsequent agreements in which the parties agreed to request the United Nations to carry out international verification of the peace accords; and, taking note of the reports of the Secretary-General of 26 November and 17 December 1996, would have authorized a three-month attachment to MINUGUA of a group of 155 military observers and requisite medical personnel for the purpose of verifying the agreement on the definitive ceasefire; it would have called upon both parties to implement fully their commitments under the agreements and to cooperate fully with the verification of the ceasefire, separation of forces, disarmament and demobilization of URNG combatants; invited the international community to continue its support for the peace process in Guatemala; and finally, would have requested the Secretary-General to keep the Council fully informed on the implementation of the resolution and to report on the conclusion of the military observer mission.

Following the vote, the representative of the United States stated that it was unfortunate that the Security Council could not reach agreement on authorizing a military observer component to MINUGUA, and regretted that “one member of the Council was not able to give the larger interest of regional peace and security the priority it deserves".¹³

The representative of Costa Rica deeply regretted that one delegation had exercised its right of veto due to "a situation that has nothing whatsoever to do with the peace process in Guatemala". He stated that the ensuing situation was extremely damaging not only to Guatemala or to Central America, but also to the United Nations.¹⁴

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that his delegation regretted that the draft resolution had been put to a vote in such haste, without allowing sufficient time for further consultation.¹⁵

The representative of China stated that his Government had consistently supported the Guatemalan peace process. "Regrettably, however, the Government of Guatemala has, for four consecutive years, unscrupulously supported activities aimed at splitting China at the United Nations, in flagrant violation of the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations". Guatemala had also "infringed upon China's sovereignty and territorial integrity and interfered in its internal affairs". Should that situation be corrected, the Chinese delegation might "reconsider the authorization of the deployment of military observers in Guatemala by the Security Council".¹⁶

Decision of 20 January 1997 (3732nd meeting): resolution 1094 (1997)

By a letter dated 16 January 1997 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁷ the Secretary-General transmitted the text of two agreements pertaining to the Guatemalan peace process.

At its 3732nd meeting, held on 20 January 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the previous report of the Secretary-General dated 17 December 1996 in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Japan), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Guatemala, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁸ He further drew their attention to a letter dated 10 January 1997 from the representative of Guatemala addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁹ transmitting the text of a letter of the same date from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Guatemala addressed to the President of the Security Council. The President also drew attention to the letter dated 16 January 1997 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting the texts of two agreements pertaining to the Guatemalan peace process.²⁰ He also drew attention to a letter dated 20 January 1997 from the representative of China addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting the position paper of the Government of China on the authorization of the deployment of military observers in Guatemala.²¹

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Costa Rica in his capacity as spokesman and Secretary pro tempore of the Central American Presidential Summits stated that Central Americans were grateful to all members of the Council for the decision which would make it possible for a United Nations contingent to verify compliance with the peace agreements in Guatemala and expressed their respect and appreciation to China for its support for the decision.²²

The representative of China stated that when his delegation had voted against the draft resolution on sending military observers to Guatemala on 10 January 1997, they had made it clear that it was not a situation they had wanted to see. He reiterated that China was in favour of the peace process in Guatemala, monitored by and under the auspices of the United Nations. He stated that there had been many rounds of consultations with Guatemala and that the two sides, guided by the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter and through a forward-looking, pragmatic approach, had found a solution acceptable to both sides, thereby removing the obstacles to China's support for the draft resolution.²³

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1094 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Expressing its full support for the peace process in Guatemala,

Noting the fact that the peace process in Guatemala has been monitored by the United Nations and has been under the auspices of the Organization since 1994,

Noting the letter dated 20 January 1997 from the Permanent Representative of the People's Republic of China to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council,

Recalling the Framework Agreement for the Resumption of the Negotiating Process between the Government of Guatemala and the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca of 10 January 1994 and all subsequent agreements, in which the parties agreed to request the United Nations to carry out international verification of the peace accords,

Acknowledging the efforts of the Secretary-General, the Group of Friends of the Guatemala peace process, the international community, the United Nations system and other international agencies in support of the peace process,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General of 26 November 1996 on the United Nations Mission for the Verification of Human Rights and of Compliance with the Commitments of the Comprehensive Agreement on Human Rights in Guatemala which states that verification measures related to the agreement on the definitive ceasefire signed at Oslo on 4 December 1996²⁴ would involve, inter alia, the deployment of United Nations military personnel,

Taking note also of the report of the Secretary-General of 17 December 1996 outlining the measures necessary for the verification of the agreement on the definitive ceasefire and the addenda to that report of 23 and 30 December 1996, and noting that the ceasefire will enter into force on the date the United Nations mechanism is in place with full operational capacity,

Welcoming the agreements between the Government of Guatemala and the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca which were signed at Guatemala City on 29 December 1996²⁵ and which, with the overall package of peace accords signed in Madrid, Mexico City, Oslo and Stockholm, put a definitive end to the Guatemalan internal conflict and will foster national reconciliation and economic development,

1. Decides, in accordance with the recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-General of 17 December 1996, to authorize for a three-month period the attachment to the United Nations Mission for the Verification of Human Rights and of Compliance with the Commitments of the Comprehensive Agreement on Human Rights in Guatemala of a group of 155 military observers and requisite medical personnel for the purposes of verification of the agreement on the definitive cease fire and requests the Secretary-General to notify the Council no later than two weeks before the operation is to begin;

2. Calls upon both parties to implement fully their commitments under the agreements signed in Guatemala and to cooperate fully with the verification of the ceasefire, separation of forces, disarmament and demobilization of the combatants of the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca, as well as the commitments under the other agreements in the overall package of peace accords;

3. Invites the international community to continue its support for the peace process in Guatemala and, in particular, for the implementation of the agreements referred to in paragraph 2 above;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council fully informed on the implementation of the present resolution and to report on the conclusion of the military observer mission.

Addressing the Council after the vote, the Secretary-General expressed satisfaction that the obstacles to the deployment of United Nations military observers to Guatemala had been overcome. Paying tribute to the constructive approach demonstrated by the Member States directly involved and the efforts of the Group of Friends of the Guatemalan Peace process,²⁴ he noted that the adoption of the resolution would allow for the effective verification of one of the most crucial elements of Guatemala's transition to peace and reconciliation. The Secretary-General recalled that the United Nations had been involved in the Guatemalan process since 1990, when it had been invited to provide an observer to the peace talks. Since 1994, the Organization had played a particularly active role, both through moderation of the peace negotiations and in the deployment of MINUGUA. The signing of the final peace agreement opened a new chapter in the responsibilities of the United Nations.²⁵ The Secretary-General concluded by acknowledging the support of the Security Council and Member States at large for what it would hopefully “become recognized as one of the Organization’s success stories”.²⁶

Decision of 5 March 1997 (3744th meeting):
statement by the President

By a letter dated 5 February 1997 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁷ the Secretary-General transmitted to the Council the last two agreements pertaining to the Guatemalan peace process.

On 13 February 1997, pursuant to paragraph 1 of resolution 1094 (1997) of 20 January 1997, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council his report on the implementation of that resolution.²⁸ He informed the Council that the group of military observers attached to MINUGUA would begin operations on 3 March 1997, by which date the United Nations verification mechanism would be fully operational.

At its 3744th meeting, held on 5 March 1997, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Poland) invited the representative of Guatemala, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁹

The Security Council recalls its resolution 1094 (1997) of 20 January 1997 and takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of that resolution.

The Council welcomes the deployment on 3 March 1997 of the group of United Nations military observers attached to the United Nations Mission for the Verification of Human Rights and of Compliance with the Commitments of the Comprehensive Agreement on Human Rights in Guatemala for the purposes of verification of the agreement on the definitive ceasefire between the Government of Guatemala and the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca signed at Oslo on 4 December 1996.

The Council recalls its constant support for the peace process in Central America, which it has expressed since the adoption of its resolution 530 (19133) of 19 May 1983. It reaffirms its full support for the peace process in Guatemala.

The Council reiterates its call in resolution 1094 (1997) that both parties implement fully their commitments under the agreements signed in Guatemala City on 29 December 1996 and cooperate fully with the verification of the ceasefire, separation of forces, disarmament and demobilization of the combatants of the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca, as well as the commitments under the other agreements in the overall package of peace accords.

The Council will remain actively seized of the matter.

Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Republic of Korea) invited the representative of Guatemala, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:³⁰

The Security Council welcomes the successful conclusion of the military observer mission attached to the United Nations Verification Mission in Guatemala, in accordance with resolution 1094 (1997) of 20 January 1997, to verify the agreement on the definitive ceasefire between the Government of Guatemala and the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca signed at Oslo on 4 December 1996. The Council commends the Secretary-General, his Special Representative, the Chief Military Observer and other dedicated personnel of the United Nations who have contributed to this undertaking. The Council further welcomes the full compliance of the Government of Guatemala and the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca with the terms of the definitive ceasefire.

The Council commends both parties for the progress made in the implementation of the peace accords to date, in particular for the establishment of the Follow-up Commission, which will oversee the implementation of the agreements, and for steps taken towards the establishment of the Historical Clarification Commission. The Council reiterates its call for both parties to continue to implement fully their commitments under the agreements signed in Guatemala City on 29 December 1996 as well as the commitments under the other agreements in the overall package of peace accords signed in Madrid, Mexico City, Oslo and Stockholm.

The Council reaffirms its full support for the peace process in Guatemala. The Council expresses its confidence that the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, the Mission, and the international community will continue their support for the peace process in Guatemala and, in particular, for the implementation of the peace accords.

18. The question concerning Haiti

Decision of 29 February 1996 (3638th meeting): resolution 1048 (1996)

On 14 February 1996, pursuant to a request made by the Security Council at its 3594th meeting on 16 November 1995,¹ the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the United Nations Mission in Haiti (UNMIH),² covering significant developments in the country and providing an assessment of United Nations achievements there. The report also contained his recommendations on the future role of the Organization in Haiti, taking into account a letter dated 9 February 1996 from the newly elected President of Haiti,³ requesting a further extension of the mandate of UNMIH. In his report, the Secretary-General stated that although there was no indication of an organized threat to the Government of Haiti, there was some concern that growing popular discontent could be used by “disgruntled groups” to foment trouble, especially after the departure of UNMIH. Under those circumstances, he believed that the Mission should not cease its activities abruptly, but should continue to assist the Government for a few more months, while its assets were gradually withdrawn. He therefore recommended that the Council should give a positive response to the request of the President of Haiti and extend the mandate of UNMIH for a further period of six months. He further recommended that in the light of the gradual transfer of some of the Mission’s earlier functions to the Haitian authorities its strength be substantially reduced.

At its 3638th meeting, held on 29 February 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Argentina, Bangladesh, Canada, Haiti and Venezuela, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (United States) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution submitted by Argentina, Canada, Chile, France, Honduras, the United States and Venezuela.⁴ She also drew their attention to a letter dated 13 February 1996 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵ transmitting a letter dated 9 February 1996 from the President of Haiti, addressed to the Secretary-General, requesting a further extension of the mandate of UNMIH.

Opening the debate, the representative of Haiti thanked the Council for considering the request of his Government, thereby helping the country to consolidate its economic and social progress, and supporting the new Haitian National Police, as it gained the experience it lacked and as it continued to acquire the equipment it still needed. Politically speaking, he said, there was cause for optimism; elections had been held and, for the first time in Haiti’s history, a democratically elected President had transferred power to another. Moreover, thanks to the assistance of UNMIH, the role of public security forces had been strengthened, security had improved and the population was more confident. The situation, however, remained precarious and there were serious risks of disturbances. In that context, he believed that the forthcoming departure of the Mission would leave a considerable void, which the inexperienced and under-equipped Haitian National Police would be unable to fill. His delegation therefore hoped that the Council would heed the request made by his Government and that it would authorize the extension of UNMIH.⁶

During the deliberations, a number of speakers welcomed the first democratic presidential election in Haiti and the peaceful transfer of power. They emphasized, however, that despite significant progress since the return of a constitutional Government, challenges still persisted and the security situation remained fragile. For that reason, they supported the extension of UNMIH to assist the Government of Haiti to fulfil its responsibilities, and to contribute to the training of the new national police force. Some speakers also pointed out that the Government and the people of Haiti bore the ultimate responsibility for national reconciliation, economic reconstruction and the maintenance of a secure and stable environment in their country.⁷

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the Haitian problem was unique, because in essence the situation there did not threaten regional peace and security. Nevertheless, taking into account the exceptional circumstances, the Council had agreed to establish a United Nations peacekeeping operation in Haiti. He further stated that although his Government acknowledged the importance of supporting the Haitian National Police, it also had reservations about the continuing presence in Haiti of a large United Nations military contingent. This should be the last extension of UNMIH, he said.⁸

The representative of China stated that, despite significant progress in the Haitian peace process, some issues still needed to be addressed, in particular the economic recovery and reconstruction of the country, as well as the question of security. At the same time, considering precedents in view of the Organization's other United Nations peacekeeping operations and the current serious financial situation, his delegation believed that UNMIH should be withdrawn as scheduled. However, considering the recommendations of the Secretary-General, the request of the Government of Haiti and the attitude of the Latin American and non-aligned countries on the question of UNMIH, his delegation exercised maximum flexibility during the consultations of the Council and had done its best to find a compromise proposal. In view of the fact that the draft resolution before the Council had basically incorporated the amendments by his delegation, they would vote in favour of the draft resolution.⁹

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1048 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling the provisions of its resolutions 841 (1993) of 16 June 1993, 861 (1993) of 27 August 1993, 862 (1993) of 31 August 1993, 867 (1993) of 23 September 1993, 873 (1993) of 13 October 1993, 875 (1993) of 16 October 1993, 905 (1994) of 23 March 1994, 917 (1994) of 6 May 1994, 933 (1994) of 30 June 1994, 940 (1994) of 31 July 1994, 944 (1994) of 29 September

Speaking after the vote, the representative of Chile drew attention to one of the significant elements of the resolution, namely that peace was no longer the absence of armed conflict, but there was now an integral concept of peace that consisted of two constituent parts: security and development. Progress in those areas was thus vital for the promotion of peace and security in Haiti. He noted with satisfaction the fact that the Council's support for Haiti sought to restore democracy in Latin America and the Caribbean, which was a primary objective for the countries of the region.¹⁰

The representative of France stated that the United Nations role in Haiti could have been completed after the presidential elections. However, the new President of Haiti had requested the presence, for a few more months, of an international force to maintain security and stability in the country and to continue the training of its police force. France, for its part, would continue to participate in UNMIH and to provide economic assistance to Haiti.¹¹

The President, speaking in her capacity as representative of the United States, stated that, by approving the extension of the Mission, the international community had renewed its support to Haitian security and stability by continuing its much-needed assistance to the newly deployed Haitian National Police. It would also allow the Government of Haiti to consolidate and further expand its recent political, social and economic advances. The resolution just adopted was designed to help "finish the job". During the following months, her Government would welcome recommendations from the Secretary-General on further ways that the international community could contribute to development, democracy and security in Haiti.¹²

The representative of Canada stated that his delegation would have much preferred if the Secretary-General's recommendations had been approved in their entirety. However, given the strength of its determination not to abandon Haiti at this critical stage, the Government of Canada had decided, pursuant to paragraph 11 of resolution 1048 (1996) to make available, at its own expense, additional military personnel to enable UNMIH to fulfil its mandate. He stressed, however, that such a step was not an ideal arrangement, and should not be used as a model for future United Nations peacekeeping operations. In that context, his delegation firmly believed that all Member States should help shoulder the burden of maintaining international peace and security, through assessed contributions.¹³

On 5 June 1996, pursuant to paragraph 10 of resolution 1048 (1996) of 29 February 1996, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNMIH, providing an update of the activities of the United Nations system to promote development in the country.¹⁴ The report also contained his recommendations on the role of the United Nations in Haiti after the expiration of the mandate of the Mission, which took into account a letter dated 31 May 1996 from the President of Haiti to the Secretary-General,¹⁵ requesting the presence of a multinational force for a further six-month period. In his report, the Secretary-General stated that, for the first time in its history, Haiti had a professional police force, committed to the rule of law. Although he was aware that the last extension of UNMIH was intended to be final, it was also clear that the Haitian National Police was still not in a position to ensure, on its own, a stable and secure environment in Haiti, and that complete withdrawal of a United Nations presence, at that juncture, could jeopardize the success achieved so far. He therefore recommended to the Council the establishment of a new mission, to be known as the United Nations Support Mission in Haiti (UNSMIH), for a period of six months and with a limited mandate.¹⁶

At its 3676th meeting, held on 28 June 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General. After the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Canada and Haiti, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Egypt) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of its prior consultations.¹⁷ He also drew their attention to the following documents: a letter dated 10 June 1996 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁸ transmitting a letter dated 31 May 1996 from the President of Haiti addressed to the Secretary-General, requesting the Council to authorize the presence of a multinational force in Haiti for a further six-month period; and a letter dated 12 June 1996 from the representative of El Salvador addressed to the Secretary-General, transmitting the text of a resolution on the international presence in Haiti, adopted by the Organization of American States (OAS), on 6 June 1996 in Panama City.¹⁹

At the same meeting, the representative of Italy, speaking on behalf of the European Union, as well as of Bulgaria, Cyprus, the Czech Republic, Estonia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Malta, Poland, Romania, Slovakia and Slovenia, stated that the adoption of the draft resolution would once again demonstrate the international community's strong commitment to the consolidation of Haitian democracy and institutions. The European Union fully supported the continuation of the United Nations operation in Haiti and believed, in particular, that the process of creating a new police force, committed to the rule of law and respect for human rights, was one of the key issues facing the country. Every other aspect of its future was related to the question of internal security.²⁰

The representative of Canada stated that the United Nations presence in Haiti had been an essential complement to the Haitian people's efforts to build a democratic, safe and fair society. The Council would now establish a new Mission, significantly reduced in size and with a new, leaner mandate. In that context, he reiterated that his Government would continue to provide, on a voluntary basis, many of the additional troops required to fulfil the mandate of the Mission.²¹

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Chile recalled that, under the Charter of the United Nations, the main purpose of the Organization was to maintain international peace and security. However, in recent years, the Security Council had turned its attention to conflicts within States, not between them, and had thus found it necessary to assess those situations and to involve itself in the internal affairs of States, at their request. Operations had taken place that constituted true exceptions to the principle of non-intervention. The new situation facing the Security Council posed new challenges to its members. The case of Haiti was an example of a situation demanding subjective assessment of the country's internal problems that required the support of the international community.²²

A number of speakers, while acknowledging the successful role of UNMIH in laying the foundations for a peaceful and democratic Haiti, underlined that the overall security situation in the country remained unstable, and a premature departure of United Nations troops could jeopardize everything achieved so far. For that reason, and taking into account the request of the Government of Haiti, they supported the draft resolution and the establishment of a new Mission to contribute to the professionalization of the Haitian National Police and to promote a stable and secure environment in the country.²³

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that his Government had "misgivings" about the need for a new operation, particularly the retention of a military component, at a time when, on the whole, the situation in Haiti was stable and secure, and there was no threat of organized violence to destabilize the situation. However, taking into consideration the appeal made by the President of Haiti and the position of the Organization of American States and the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General for Haiti,²⁴ his delegation had joined other members of the Council in consenting to the establishment of UNSMIH. He underlined that this was possible because the sponsors of the draft resolution had taken into account proposals made by Russia and China, which were along the same lines. In conclusion, he added that it was important that the draft resolution sought to continue and further step up the efforts of OAS to provide assistance in resolving Haiti's problems.²⁵

The representative of China had reservations about the continued presence of United Nations military personnel in Haiti, since there were no indications of an organized threat to the Government, nor did the situation there pose any threat to international peace and security. However, in view of the request made by the Government of Haiti and the wishes of the Latin American countries, the Chinese delegation would agree in principle to the establishment of UNSMIH, and would therefore vote in favour of the draft resolution.²⁶

The representative of the Republic of Korea stated that the role of the United Nations in Haiti should be reoriented and its focus shifted from the current peacekeeping operations to enhanced socio-economic development activities. The United Nations Mission in Haiti had been a successful model for combining a traditional peacekeeping operation with post-conflict peacebuilding efforts. His delegation therefore believed that a continued United Nations presence would contribute to a smooth transition from peacekeeping to the peacebuilding stage. He noted, with satisfaction, that the draft resolution had taken into account the difficult financial situation of the Organization by substantially reducing the troop strength of the Mission.²⁷

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1063 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions and those adopted by the General Assembly,

Taking note of the request of 31 May 1996 from the President of the Republic of Haiti to the Secretary-General,

Commending the role of the Mission in assisting the Government of Haiti in fulfilling its responsibilities (a) to sustain the secure and stable environment which has been established, and (b) to professionalize the Haitian National Police, and expressing appreciation to all Member States which have contributed to the Mission,

Noting the termination of the mandate of the Mission as of 30 June 1996, in accordance with resolution 1048 (1996) of 29 February 1996,

Noting also the key role played to date by the United Nations civilian police, supported by United Nations military personnel, in helping to establish a fully functioning Haitian National Police of adequate size and structure as an integral element of the consolidation of democracy and the revitalization of Haiti's system of justice, and, in this context, welcoming progress to establish the Haitian National Police,

Welcoming and supporting the efforts of the Organization of American States, in cooperation with the United Nations, and in particular the contribution of the International Civilian Mission in Haiti, to promote consolidation of peace and democracy in Haiti,

Taking note of the resolution on the international presence in Haiti adopted at the seventh plenary session of the twenty-sixth regular session of the Organization of American States, which, inter alia, encourages the international community to sustain the same level of commitment it demonstrated during the years of crisis and recommends that, at the request of the Government of Haiti, the community maintain a strong presence in Haiti and extend its full support for strengthening the national police force and consolidating the stable and democratic environment necessary for economic growth and development, and inviting the further participation of the Organization of American States,

Recognizing the link between peace and development, and stressing that a sustained commitment by the international community and the international financial institutions to assist and support the economic, social and institutional development in Haiti is indispensable for long-term peace and stability in the country,

Welcoming the continued progress towards consolidation of democracy by the people of Haiti since the historic peaceful transfer of power from one democratically elected President to another on 7 February 1996,

Recognizing that the people of Haiti bear the ultimate responsibility for national reconciliation, the maintenance of a secure and stable environment, the administration of justice, and the reconstruction of their country,

1. Affirms the importance of a professional, self-sustaining, fully functioning national police force of adequate size and structure, able to conduct the full spectrum of police functions, to the consolidation of democracy and revitalization of Haiti's system of justice;

2. Decides to establish the United Nations Support Mission in Haiti until 30 November 1996 in order to assist the Government of Haiti in the professionalization of the police force and in the maintenance of a secure and stable environment conducive to the success of the current efforts to establish and train an effective national police force, and supports the role of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General in the coordination of activities by the United Nations system to promote institution-building, national reconciliation and economic rehabilitation in Haiti;

3. Decides that the Support Mission initially will be composed of three hundred civilian police personnel and six hundred troops;

4. Welcomes the assurance that the Secretary-General will be alert to further opportunities to reduce the strength of the Support Mission so that it can implement its tasks at the lowest possible cost;

5. Recognizes that major tasks facing the Government and people of Haiti include economic rehabilitation and reconstruction, and stresses the importance of the Government of Haiti and the international financial institutions agreeing as soon as possible on the steps necessary to enable the provision of additional financial support;

6. Requests all States to provide appropriate support for the actions undertaken by the United Nations and by Member States pursuant to the present and other relevant resolutions in order to carry out the provisions of the mandate as set out in paragraph 2 above;

7. Also requests all States to make voluntary contributions to the trust fund established in resolution 975 (1995) of 30 January 1995 for the support of the Haitian National Police, to ensure that its members are adequately trained and that it is fully operational;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council on the implementation of the present resolution, including prospects for further reductions in the strength of the Support Mission, by 30 September 1996;

9. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States stated that, since assuming responsibility from the United States-led Multinational Force, UNMIH had helped to ensure a climate of security conducive to free elections, economic development, political reconciliation and the consolidation of democratic institutions in Haiti. The Security Council had once again reaffirmed its determination to contribute to regional stability, and the principles of human rights, freedom and social progress enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations. Over the next five months, international civilian police monitors would continue their efforts to professionalize the Haitian National Police, while the military contingent of the Mission would help deter those who might be tempted to disrupt the democratization process. Ultimately, however, the Haitian authorities would have to assume full responsibility for public order.²⁸

The representative of France stated that the United Nations operation in Haiti was undoubtedly one of the great success stories of the Organization in recent times. He noted, however, that despite significant progress made by the Haitian National Police, assistance should continue. His delegation supported the establishment of the new mission, as it believed that a sudden interruption in assistance could compromise the results obtained so far. In addition, any deterioration in the Haitian situation could have a negative impact on the democratic process and on regional stability.²⁹

The representative of Haiti welcomed the adoption of the resolution authorizing the establishment of UNSMIH and stated that the new Mission would enable his Government to maintain a secure environment, while it continued to strengthen and professionalize the police force with the assistance of the international community. Measures had also been taken to address the serious economic and social problems, through a new “ambitious” programme which should enable the country to emerge from its economic stagnation within three years. The success of that plan, however, would depend on maintaining the atmosphere of security in the country.³⁰

Decision of 29 November 1996 (3719th meeting): resolution 1085 (1996)

On 1 October 1996, pursuant to paragraph 8 of resolution 1063 (1996) of 28 June 1996, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on the United Nations Support Mission in Haiti (UNSMIH).³¹ In his report, the Secretary-General reported that, although the Government of Haiti had taken steps to correct some of its pressing economic and social problems, progress had been inadequate in several areas. The security situation in Haiti had recently deteriorated and common crime had become an increasing concern, together with drug trafficking and contraband. In addition, abuse of authority and human rights violations by the Haitian National Police were also on the rise. While those incidents did not pose a serious threat to the Government, they caused disquiet among the population, affected the morale of the police, and distracted the Government from focusing on pressing social and economic issues and promoting the reconciliation of Haitian society. The Secretary-General was convinced that any further reductions in the strength of UNSMIH would diminish its capability and place its mandate at risk. He therefore recommended that the Mission’s current strength be maintained for the time being.

In an addendum to his report dated 12 November 1996, the Secretary-General transmitted his recommendations on the role of the United Nations in Haiti after the expiration of the current mandate of the Mission on 30 November.³² He reiterated that the Haitian National Police had not yet reached the level of experience and competence required to control and defeat threats posed by subversive groups, and that it was therefore clear that the presence of the military component of UNSMIH was a key factor in enabling the Haitian authorities to contain the danger of destabilization. To that end, and should the Government so request, he would recommend to the Council the extension of the Mission until 30 June 1997, at its current strength. The Secretary-General remained convinced that, in the present circumstances, any further reduction in the size of the Mission would diminish its operational and training capabilities and place its mandate at risk.

Subsequently, on 15 November 1996, the Secretary-General informed the Council that he had received a letter from the President of Haiti requesting an extension of the mandate of UNSMIH.³³ He therefore confirmed his earlier recommendation to extend the Mission’s mandate until 30 June 1997.

At its 3719th meeting, held on 29 November 1996, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Indonesia) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of its prior consultations.³⁴ He also drew their attention to a letter dated 15 November 1996 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council.³⁵

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and unanimously adopted as resolution 1085 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 1063 (1996) of 28 June 1996 which established the United Nations Support Mission in Haiti,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Support Mission in Haiti for an additional period terminating on 5 December 1996;

2. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

At its 3721st meeting, held on 5 December 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General.³⁶ Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Argentina, Canada, Haiti and Venezuela, at their request, to participate in the discussion, without the right to vote. The President (Italy) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution submitted by Argentina, Canada, Chile, France, the United States and Venezuela.³⁷ He further drew their attention to the earlier letter dated 15 November 1996 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council.³⁸

Opening the debate, the representative of Haiti stated that in the coming months his Government would strive to complete the formation of the Haitian National Police and, before the end of the following year, the force would be able to maintain peace and security throughout the country. He stressed, however, that the country's infrastructure remained largely dilapidated, rendering living conditions extremely difficult. Moreover, the difficult socio-economic situation was a

“breeding ground” in which subversive groups could sow discontent, thereby creating a climate of instability that harmed economic investments and hindered the reform of Haitian institutions.³⁹

During the Council's deliberations, most speakers, taking into account the recommendation of the Secretary-General and the appeal made by the President of Haiti, expressed support for a further renewal of UNSMIH to assist the Government to complete the professionalization of the Haitian National Police and to maintain a secure and stable environment in the country.⁴⁰

The representative of the Russian Federation reiterated his country's doubts regarding the necessity of extending the mandate of the mission, and in particular to preserve its military element. He underlined that it was his delegation's conviction that the situation in that country “did not” and “does not” represent a threat to international or even regional peace and security. At the same time, taking into account the appeals of Haiti, the Secretary-General and the views of the group of Friends of the Secretary-General for Haiti, Russia agreed, in principle and in a spirit of compromise, to a final extension of the UNSMIH mandate for a concluding eight-month period.⁴¹

The representative of China stated that the efforts by the Government of Haiti to maintain political and social stability would help create a favourable environment in Haiti to attract foreign financial assistance and investments and that it would also contribute to economic reconstruction in the country. His delegation believed that under the current circumstances, the United Nations peacekeeping mission in Haiti was over. The main task facing Haiti was economic reconstruction, which would mainly depend on the Haitian people themselves. However, in view of the urgent request of the Government of Haiti for an extension of the mandate of UNSMIH, his delegation was ready to treat it as a unique case, so as to promote further the peace process in Haiti. He added that the draft resolution before the Council had not only accommodated the request of the Government of Haiti, but also had taken into proper consideration the actual needs and positions of all those concerned. His delegation would therefore vote in favour of the draft resolution.⁴²

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and unanimously adopted as resolution 1086 (1996), which reads:

Decision of 30 July 1997 (3806th meeting):
resolution 1123 (1997)

⁴² Ibid., p. 9.

On 19 July 1997, pursuant to resolution 1086 (1996) of 5 December 1996, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report on UNSMTH, covering developments in the country, and recommending the establishment of a new mission, to be known as the United Nations Transition Mission in Haiti (UNTMTH).⁴³ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that Haiti continued to face political and economic challenges, largely as a result of discontent over the economic situation and lack of improvement in living conditions. The international community itself had come under attack and was being blamed for the country's continuing difficulties, and some "popular organizations" had publicly opposed what they termed a "foreign occupation". Reporting on the security situation, the Secretary-General stated that although progress had been made in the establishment of the new police force, as well as in the other fields, it had been slow and uneven. He shared the view of Haiti's political leaders that, without steady long-term support from the international community, the force might not be able to cope with serious incidents, risking deterioration in the security situation. The Secretary-General observed that although he was preparing to withdraw the Mission by 31 July, the ending of a United Nations presence in Haiti at such a stage might jeopardize the progress achieved so far. He recommended to the Council the establishment of the United Nations Transition Mission in Haiti to assist the Haitian authorities in the further professionalization of the Haitian National Police, with a mandate limited to a single four-month period ending on 30 November 1997.⁴⁴ The new operation would be composed of military and civilian police personnel, and the expiration of its mandate would not mean the termination of United Nations involvement in Haiti. A follow-on presence to provide advice and support in public security and judicial reform, as well as human rights monitoring, would still be required.

At its 3806th meeting, held on 30 July 1997, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Bahamas, Barbados, Canada, Ecuador, Guatemala, Guyana, Haiti, Jamaica, Nicaragua, Suriname, Trinidad and Tobago and Venezuela, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Sweden) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution submitted by Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Bahamas, Barbados, Canada, Chile, Costa Rica, Ecuador, France, Guatemala, Guyana, Jamaica, Nicaragua, Suriname, Trinidad and Tobago, the United States and Venezuela.⁴⁵ He also drew their attention to a letter dated 20 July 1997 from the representative of Haiti addressed to the Secretary-General,⁴⁶ requesting the extension of UNTMTH until 30 November 1997.

Opening the debate, the representative of Haiti stated that despite certain difficulties, there had been significant progress as long-term projects began to replace emergency programmes. Nevertheless, serious problems still persisted and national reconciliation continued to be threatened by the proliferation of criminal gangs, whose acts created a climate of insecurity among the population. Such factors, combined with the difficult economic situation, posed a challenge for the police force. In that context, he noted that the Secretary-General, in his last report, had recognized that the Haitian National Police was not capable of coping alone with all those problems, and that much still remained to be done before the force could attain the proper degree of professionalism and efficiency. His delegation was therefore convinced that UNTMTH would be able to help the Haitian authorities to complete their work and to prepare a smooth transition to another type of commitment to Haiti by the international community.⁴⁷

The representative of Canada stated that the draft resolution represented a significant milestone in a series of steps undertaken by the international community to consolidate the democratic government in Haiti. He underlined that the responsibility for the security and stability of the country would be assumed by the Government of Haiti as the Transition Mission developed a plan and timetable for early and efficient handover of those responsibilities to the national police.⁴⁸

Speaking before the vote, the representative of France stated that the two previous peacekeeping missions had played a central role in efforts to enhance the effectiveness of the Haitian National Police. He stressed, however, that in spite of significant progress, security conditions remained unstable and the force was not yet fully able to meet the emerging challenges. For those reasons, his delegation supported the request made by the Haitian authorities, and the Secretary-General's recommendations, and would therefore vote in favour of the draft resolution and the establishment of UNTMIH.⁴⁹

The representative of Costa Rica stated that by adopting the draft resolution on UNTMIH, the Council would be firmly endorsing a broader and more comprehensive view of the concept of international peace and security. That new approach encompassed difficult and complex situations, such as that of Haiti. The Security Council was moving forward in the right direction in terms of understanding what constituted a threat to international peace and security, he said.⁵⁰

A number of speakers, while acknowledging the contribution made by the previous United Nations mission to Haiti's political stability, noted that the overall situation remained fragile and the Haitian National Police were not yet fully prepared to cope on its own with the emerging security challenges. For that reason, and bearing in mind the request of the Government of Haiti and the wishes of the countries of the region, they supported the establishment of UNTMIH with a clear four-month mandate to contribute to the formation of the Haitian National Police. Some speakers stressed, however, that the ultimate responsibility for the future of Haiti rested with its Government and people and that international support could not substitute for their efforts.⁵¹

The representative of China stated that the situation in Haiti no longer posed a threat to international peace and security and that the United Nations peacekeeping mission in Haiti had already been completed. The main task facing Haiti was economic reconstruction and development which should mainly be the responsibility of the Haitian people themselves. However, considering the urgent request of the Haitian government and the wishes of Latin American and Caribbean countries the Chinese Government supported the establishment of UNTMIH as a transitional measure.⁵²

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that although his delegation was satisfied that there had been some improvement in the situation in Haiti in terms of security, the situation remained unstable and cause for concern. He stated that the situation in Haiti had not and did not pose a threat to regional peace and security. The situation was exacerbated by the protracted social and economic crisis. He further underlined that his delegation was not opposed to maintaining a United Nations presence in Haiti, but it had to be commensurate with the real requirements. The delegation of the Russian Federation saw no compelling reason for retaining a United Nations military presence in Haiti. However, bearing in mind the appeal of the President of Haiti, the recommendations of the Secretary-General and the view of the Friends of the Secretary-General for Haiti and also the contributors to the civilian police element, his delegation supported the establishment of a new United Nations Transition Mission in Haiti on the understanding that, as stipulated in the draft resolution, it would have a clearly defined, single four-month mandate.⁵³

The representative of the United States recalled that much had been achieved since 1994. For the first time in Haitian history, a democratically elected President had peacefully succeeded another, and the economy was showing signs of recovery from years of decline. Yet, despite those advances, much still needed to be done. In that context, the creation of UNTMIH would further bolster the rule of law, development, democratization and peace in Haiti. His Government would therefore vote in favour of the draft resolution and the continued support for the Haitian Government.⁵⁴

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1123 (1997), which reads:

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General of 19 July 1997, and the recommendations contained therein,

Commending the role of the United Nations Support Mission in Haiti in assisting the Government of Haiti in the professionalization of the police and in the maintenance of a secure and stable environment conducive to the success of the current efforts to establish and train an effective national police force, and expressing its appreciation to all Member States which have contributed to the Support Mission,

Noting the termination, in accordance with resolution 1086 (1996), of the mandate of the Support Mission as of 31 July 1997,

Supporting the role of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General in the coordination of activities by the United Nations system to promote institution-building, national reconciliation and economic rehabilitation in Haiti,

Decision of 28 November 1997 (3837th meeting):
resolution 1141 (1997)

On 31 October 1997, pursuant to resolution 1123 (1997) of 30 July 1997, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on the United Nations Transition Mission in Haiti.⁵⁵ The report provided an overview of the political, economic and security situation in Haiti, together with his recommendations on future international peacebuilding efforts, following the expiration of the mandate of the Mission mandate on 30 November 1997. In his report, the Secretary-General stated that Haiti had not had a fully functioning Government since the resignation of its Prime Minister on 9 June 1997. Efforts were currently under way to find a solution to the crisis and to reach a compromise between the two main factions. Seriously concerned about the political stalemate and its negative repercussions on the economy, he had called upon the Haitian authorities and political leaders to negotiate in a spirit of tolerance and reconciliation to reach an agreement and enable the country to move forward. He added that international assistance beyond November needed to focus on strengthening the existing institutions, including the Haitian National Police and the justice system, restoring people's trust in future electoral processes, and supporting economic and social development. On the security situation, the Secretary-General stated that despite growing popular discontent the situation remained relatively stable. For that reason, and given the absence of a military threat against the Haitian authorities, he hoped that the military component of UNTMIH would be able to leave the country at the end of its current mandate.

Subsequently, on 20 November 1997, in an addendum to his report of 31 October,⁵⁶ the Secretary-General stated that while the Haitian National Police had made substantial progress, its development into a professional force continued to be slow and uneven, and the force would need international assistance to continue to pursue its own institutional development while meeting the country's increasing security needs. Accordingly, and in the light of the request from the President of Haiti,⁵⁷ the Secretary-General suggested to the Council the establishment of a follow-on mission, whose main task would be to support and contribute to the formation of the Haitian National Police. He also recommended that the proposed mission, to be known as the United Nations Police Mission in Haiti (MIPONUH), be established for an initial period of six months, until 31 May 1998.⁵⁸

At its 3837th meeting, held on 28 November 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Argentina, Canada, Haiti and Venezuela, at their request, to participate in the discussion, without the right to vote. The President (China) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution submitted by Argentina, Canada, Chile, Costa Rica, France, Portugal, the United States and Venezuela.⁵⁹

Opening the debate, the representative of Haiti recalled that since 1995, the United Nations had played a decisive role in the maintenance of stability and security in the country and the consolidation of the democratic process. He noted, however, that after the departure of the international military forces the Haitian National Police would be alone to face security challenges. The Haitian National Police needed international assistance to continue its own institutional development while also doing its job of maintaining security. In addition, insecurity remained a problem, living conditions continued to deteriorate, with poverty gaining ground despite the Government's efforts to remedy the situation. At the current stage in Haiti's national reconstruction, the Haitian people continued to count on the support of the international community. For all those reasons, his delegation would ask the Security Council to adopt the draft resolution unanimously.⁶⁰

The representative of Canada stated that the draft resolution calling for the establishment of the new civilian police mission in Haiti demonstrated the continuing commitment of the international community to assist that country on its road to democracy. He expressed concern at the growing gap between the development of the Haitian National Police and the slow pace of the judicial reform, but stressed that ultimately it was the responsibility of the Government of Haiti to revitalize its own system of justice. He also urged all political parties in Haiti to work together to resolve the political impasse and enable the Government to move forward.⁶¹

A number of speakers stated that despite considerable progress since the return of democratic rule to Haiti, serious problems still persisted and the Haitian National Police had not reached the level of professionalization required to confront emerging difficulties. For that reason, and taking into consideration the recommendations of the Secretary-General and the request of the President of Haiti, they supported the establishment of MIPONUH in order to continue to assist the Haitian Government by supporting and contributing to the training of its police force. Several speakers also stressed the need for a sustained commitment by the international community and financial institutions to the economic, social and institutional development in Haiti.⁶²

The representative of France stated that, despite earlier United Nations efforts, particularly in the area of police training, the Haitian National Police still needed support to complete its development. The situation in the country remained precarious, so it was essential that the security of the population be guaranteed by a competent and effective police force, which enjoyed the trust of the people. For all those reasons, the Government of France supported the establishment of a civilian police mission, and would therefore vote in favour of the draft. The new operation would differ from previous missions and would be entirely composed of civilian police. Special arrangements for the security of United Nations monitors would not constitute precedents for other similar civilian police operations.⁶³

The representative of the Russian Federation reiterated that the situation in Haiti did not pose a threat to regional peace and security, and that in his opinion the United Nations peacekeeping role in Haiti had been successfully fulfilled. His delegation would, however, support the establishment of MIPONUH with the clear understanding that the new operation would have a clearly defined, single one-year mandate, ending on 30 November 1998. Future assistance to the Haitian National Police should be provided through United Nations specialized agencies and programmes, and other international and regional organizations, and by interested Member States.⁶⁴

The representative of the United States stated that his Government remained committed to the political and economic development of Haiti. Despite some progress in the field of public safety, the Haitian National Police still needed help in dealing with gangs, drug traffickers and political groups that sought to manipulate the police. The presence of a civilian police mission for another year would enable the force to continue to grow professionally. For that reason his delegation strongly supported the establishment of MIPONUH.⁶⁵

The representative of China stated that his delegation believed that the United Nations should conclude its peacekeeping operation in Haiti and concentrate instead on providing technical and financial assistance. However, in view of the current situation and the request from the Haitian Government, his delegation would agree, as an exceptional case, to maintain a civilian police mission in Haiti to support the formation of the Haitian National Police and to contribute to the stability and development of the country.⁶⁶

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1141 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions and those adopted by the General Assembly,

Decision of 25 March 1998 (3866th meeting): statement by the President

On 20 February 1998, pursuant to resolution 1141 (1997) of 28 November 1997, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the United Nations Civilian Police Mission in Haiti.⁶⁷ The report provided information on the implementation of the mandate of the Mission, as well as an account of developments in the mission area. In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the international community was deeply concerned that Haiti still did not have a functioning Government, and the political impasse had serious consequences for the economic and social development of the country, jeopardizing the democratic process and seriously compromising international cooperation. Although the Haitian National Police continued to make steady progress, the absence of a functioning judicial system severely hindered its ability to carry out its tasks.

While acknowledging the difficulties entailed in “revamping” the system, he stressed that, without a functioning judiciary, international efforts to help create an effective and professional police force would become increasingly difficult.

At its 3866th meeting, held on 25 March 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Haiti, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President (the Gambia) made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶⁸

The Security Council recalls its resolution 1141 (1997) of 28 November 1997 and welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 20 February 1998 on the United Nations Civilian Police Mission in Haiti.

The Council commends the achievements of the Representative of the Secretary-General in Haiti, United Nations staff and the civilian police officers of the Mission in Haiti. It notes with appreciation the important contributions made by the United Nations Development Programme and the International Civilian Mission in Haiti.

The Council welcomes the progress made by the Haitian people towards the establishment of a durable democratic and constitutional system. It also welcomes the sustained improvement in security and stability in Haiti. The Council agrees with the Secretary-General in his assessment of the Haitian National Police, as expressed in his recent report. It also welcomes the significant progress made by the Haitian National Police, as mentioned in the report of the Secretary-General, and expresses confidence that activities of the Civilian Police Mission will continue to build on the achievements of previous United Nations missions in Haiti and to further the professional development of the Haitian National Police. The Council expresses the hope that achievements of the Haitian National Police will be matched by progress in other areas, including the development of a functioning judicial system, and in this regard recognizes the importance of judicial reform.

The Council reaffirms that further assistance to the Haitian National Police, should it be needed, should be provided with the full support of the international community through the specialized agencies and programmes of the United Nations system, and through international and regional organizations and by interested Member States.

The Council reaffirms also that the people and Government of Haiti bear the ultimate responsibility for national reconciliation, the maintenance of a secure and stable environment, the administration of justice and the reconstruction of their country. It emphasizes the importance of Haiti’s continuing to settle its contentious issues peacefully and democratically. It expresses the view that a prompt solution of these issues in Haiti will facilitate economic development and the provision of international assistance. It fully supports the appeal of the Secretary-General to Haitian authorities and political leaders to resolve Haiti’s political impasse so that the country can move forward and welcomes current efforts undertaken to this end.

The Council stresses that it is of the utmost importance that the next parliamentary and local elections in Haiti be conducted in a free, fair and transparent manner in order to allow the broadest possible voter participation, consistent with Haitian law. It notes that a substantial effort will be required to ensure the success of these vitally important elections. The Council looks forward to the steps taken by the Government of Haiti in this regard and urges the international community to be ready to provide electoral assistance as may be requested.

The Council recognizes that economic rehabilitation and reconstruction constitute the major tasks facing the Haitian Government and people and stresses that a sustained commitment by the international community and the international financial institutions, as well as the relevant United Nations bodies, to assist and support economic, social and institutional development in Haiti is indispensable for long-term sustainable development in the country. It commends the efforts of those organizations and countries currently involved in meeting these needs and encourages them to coordinate their activities.

The Council will remain seized of this matter.

Decision of 25 November 1998 (3949th meeting):
resolution 1212 (1998)

On 24 August 1998, pursuant to resolution 1141 (1998) of 28 November 1997, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on MIPONUH, covering the activities of the Mission and developments in the mission area since his last report.⁶⁹ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that efforts to resolve the institutional crisis in Haiti had not been successful and the country was still without a functioning Government. The continuing political deadlock threatened the fragile Haitian democratic process, and hindered economic development and international assistance. Stressing the importance of ensuring the fairness and transparency of the upcoming parliamentary and local elections, he stated that the United Nations stood ready to provide international electoral assistance, should the Haitian authorities so request. He further reported that although progress had been made in both the training and performance of the Haitian National Police, the development of an effective police force was a complex and lengthy task, which called for sustained international training to strengthen the capacity of the force and consolidate the gains it had already achieved.

On 11 November 1998, in pursuance to resolution 1141 (1998) of 28 November 1997, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on MIPONUH, covering the activities of the Mission and recent developments in the mission area.⁷⁰ In his report the Secretary-General noted that Haiti's democratic process continued to be undermined by the absence of a Prime Minister. The protracted political stalemate had also eroded public confidence in the capacity and willingness of the authorities to solve the pressing economic and social problems facing the country, and jeopardized international assistance. He reported that although the Haitian National Police had developed a greater capacity to maintain law and order, it still lacked the experience, professional skills and cohesion to become a well-established police force. He stressed the importance of creating an effective judicial system in Haiti. He underscored that the Secretary-General had stressed that the termination of MIPONUH at that stage would not only jeopardize the achievements made so far, but would also have a negative impact on the efforts of the Government to reinforce its institutions. He therefore shared the views expressed by the President of Haiti in his letter of 22 October 1998,⁷¹ and accordingly suggested that the Council might authorize an extension of the mandate and concept of operations of MIPONUH for another year, until 30 November 1999.⁷²

At its 3949th meeting, held on 25 November 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the two reports of the Secretary-General dated 24 August and 11 November 1998, respectively. After the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Argentina, Canada, Chile, Haiti and Venezuela, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (United States) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution submitted by Argentina, Canada, Chile, Costa Rica, France, the United States and Venezuela.⁷³ He also drew their attention to a letter dated 27 October 1998 from the representative of Haiti addressed to the Secretary-General.⁷⁴

Opening the debate, the representative of Argentina stated that while understanding the hesitation of some Council members to renew the mandate of MIPONUH, he however wished to request those delegations to understand the significance of maintaining the rule of law and democratic institutions in the region. The Council had on several occasions heeded the needs of specific regions, and hopefully it would do the same for Haiti. However, the Haitian leadership needed to show its recognition of the efforts of the international community by taking concrete action aimed at resolving the political crisis in Haiti.⁷⁵

The representative of Chile considered that the adoption of the draft resolution extending MIPONUH would comply with the responsibility of the Council under the Charter to maintain international peace and security. The international community should not abandon the Haitian people, but should continue to support them.⁷⁶

The representative of Canada stated that his Government would continue its contribution to MIPONUH at the same level. A great deal remained to be done, particularly regarding the reform of the Haitian judicial system. Time had come to reflect on how to continue to strengthen the Haitian National Police and, more broadly, the Haitian system of justice after the departure of the Mission. The draft resolution encouraged that process and would lead to recommendations by the Secretary-General on a viable transition.⁷⁷

The representative of Costa Rica recalled that Article 24 of the Charter conferred on the Security Council primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security. That responsibility, under Article 1, was proactive and comprehensive for it stated that the United Nations should “take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to peace”. The situation in Haiti constituted a clear example of the need for organized international participation from the standpoint of guaranteeing and building peace and thus preventing a return of conflict and instability. In addition, dramatic statistics on Haitian social conditions, including education and poverty levels, were sufficient reason to continue assisting its people to promote a new political, economic and social model. The United Nations role in Haiti, he said, went beyond the traditional concept of development assistance; it promoted legal and institutional reforms to prevent a return to hostilities.⁷⁸

The representative of Brazil noted that despite significant progress, the Haitian National Police was still not self-sustainable and there had been regrettable delays in the judicial reform. Moreover, a political stalemate continued to undermine national institutions and hinder the implementation of reforms aimed at solving the serious economic and social problems in Haiti. His delegation regarded the extension of the Mission as part of a preventive strategy that would include economic assistance for the reconstruction and development process of the country. The renewed mandate of MIPONUH would also provide an opportunity for the gradual transfer of its tasks to other bodies. Highlighting paragraph 8 of the draft resolution before the Council, he further stated that it was a small but in a certain sense innovative step by the Council to revive Article 65 of the Charter.⁷⁹

The representative of Kenya welcomed the Council’s strong appeal urging the Haitian authorities and political leaders to negotiate urgently an end to the crisis. Expressing his delegation’s support for the extension of MIPONUH, he stressed the need to switch mechanisms of engagement and of assisting Haiti from a policing mode to one which focused more on peacebuilding.⁸⁰

The representative of Portugal expressed his delegation’s concern at the climate of violence and unrest, the difficult economic situation, the high level of unemployment, the rising cost of living and the slow pace of change in Haiti. It was also troubling that parliamentary and local elections had been postponed, thereby prolonging the political stalemate. His delegation therefore urged the Haitian authorities and political leaders to urgently seek a negotiated solution to end the crisis. It also believed that a United Nations presence in the country was crucial and would therefore vote in favour of the draft resolution.⁸¹

The representative of France stated that his Government shared the concern expressed by previous speakers urging the Council to wind down the activities of MIPONUH and transfer its management to another framework. That transition however, must be well organized and carried out in such a way as to avoid damaging the results already obtained. His delegation fully supported the draft resolution and the extension of the Mission’s mandate.⁸²

The representative of the Russian Federation shared the view that Haiti continued to need assistance “to get back on its feet” and overcome its socio-economic crisis. He maintained that from the beginning the situation in Haiti had not posed a threat to international peace and security. It was a typical situation: the difficult transition of a society that lacked a democratic tradition — a transition that was made more difficult by chronic socio-economic difficulties and widespread poverty. The situation in Haiti was no different from many other developing countries which were also experiencing the same problems. The speaker recalled that the first United Nations Mission in Haiti had been deployed in September 1993, and had since been extended several times “for the last time” under various names. The proposed draft resolution extending the peacekeeping operation in Haiti again would not enhance the Council’s authority nor confidence in its own decisions. His delegation would therefore not be able to support the draft resolution.⁸³

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted by 13 votes in favour, none against and 2 abstentions (China, Russian Federation), as resolution 1212 (1998),⁸⁴ which reads:

Recalling all its relevant resolutions, in particular resolution 1141 (1997) of 28 November 1997, and those adopted by the General Assembly,

Taking note of the request of 22 October 1998 from the President of the Republic of Haiti to the Secretary-General,

Taking note also of the reports of the Secretary-General of 24 August and 11 November 1998, and the recommendations contained therein,

Commending the role of the United Nations Civilian Police Mission in Haiti in assisting the Government of Haiti by supporting and contributing to the professionalization of the Haitian National Police, and expressing its appreciation to all Member States which have contributed to the Civilian Police Mission,

Commending also the role of the Representative of the Secretary-General in Haiti in the coordination of activities by the United Nations system to promote institution-building, national reconciliation and economic rehabilitation in Haiti,

Noting the key role played to date by the United Nations civilian police, the International Civilian Mission in Haiti and the technical assistance of the United Nations Development Programme, as well as bilateral programmes, in helping to establish a fully functioning Haitian National Police Force of adequate size and structure as an integral element of the consolidation of democracy and the revitalization of Haiti's system of justice, and in this context, stressing the importance of the reform of Haiti's system of justice for the successful development of the Haitian National Police, and welcoming continued progress towards the professionalization of the Haitian National Police and towards fulfilment of the May 1997 "Haitian National Police development plan for 1997-2001",

Stressing the link between peace and development, noting that significant international assistance is indispensable for sustainable development in Haiti, and stressing that a sustained commitment by the international community and the international financial institutions to assist and support the economic, social and institutional development in Haiti is indispensable for long-term peace and security in the country,

Expressing deep concern over the prolonged political stalemate, which presents considerable risks for peace and development,

Expressing its deep regret that this political stalemate has not yet made possible the transfer of the activities of the Civilian Police Mission to other forms of international assistance,

Recognizing that the people and the Government of Haiti bear the ultimate responsibility for national reconciliation, the maintenance of a secure and stable environment, the administration of justice, and the reconstruction of their country,

1. Reaffirms the importance of a professional, self-sustaining, fully functioning national police of adequate size and structure, able to conduct the full spectrum of police functions, for the consolidation of democracy and the revitalization of

Haiti's system of justice, and encourages Haiti to pursue actively its plans in these respects;

2. Decides, further to paragraph 1 above, and at the request of the President of the Republic of Haiti, to extend until 30 November 1999 the present mandate, including the concept of operation, of the United Nations Civilian Police Mission in Haiti, in order to continue to assist the Government of Haiti by supporting and contributing to the professionalization of the Haitian National Police in accordance with the arrangements set out in paragraph 32 of the report of the Secretary-General of 11 November 1998, including monitoring the field performance of the Haitian National Police and strengthening the capability of the central directorate of the police force to manage aid provided to it from bilateral and multilateral sources;

3. Affirms that future international assistance to the Haitian National Police should be considered through specialized agencies and programmes of the United Nations system, in particular the United Nations Development Programme, and through other international and regional organizations and by Member States;

4. Requests Member States to provide appropriate support for the actions undertaken by the United Nations and by Member States pursuant to the present and other relevant resolutions in order to carry out the provisions of the mandate referred to in paragraph 2 above;

5. Underlines the importance of full coordination among multilateral and bilateral contributors in order to assure the effective allocation of international assistance provided to the Haitian National Police, and requests the Representative of the Secretary-General in Haiti to work closely with Member States to ensure that bilateral and multilateral efforts are complementary;

6. Strongly urges the Haitian authorities and political leaders to fulfil their responsibilities and to negotiate urgently an end to the crisis in a spirit of tolerance and compromise;

7. Calls upon the Haitian authorities to pursue the reform and strengthening of Haiti's system of justice, in particular its penal institutions;

8. Emphasizes that economic rehabilitation and reconstruction constitute the major tasks facing the Haitian Government and people and that significant international assistance is indispensable for sustainable development in Haiti, stresses the commitment of the international community to a long-term programme of support for Haiti, and invites United Nations bodies and agencies, especially the Economic and Social Council, to contribute to the designing of such a programme;

9. Requests all States to make voluntary contributions to the trust fund established pursuant to resolution 975 (1995) of 30 January 1995 for the Haitian National Police, in particular for the recruitment and deployment by the United Nations Development Programme of police advisers to assist the Inspector General, Directorate General and department headquarters of the Haitian National Police;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council on the implementation of the present resolution every three months from the date of its adoption until the mandate of the Civilian Police Mission expires on 30 November 1999;

11. Expresses its intention not to extend the Civilian Police Mission beyond 30 November 1999, and requests the Secretary-General to make recommendations on a viable transition to other forms of international assistance in his second report referred to in paragraph 10 above, for the consideration of the Security Council, taking into account the need to preserve the progress made in the reform of the Haitian National Police and to strengthen further United Nations support for the consolidation of democracy, respect for human rights and the maintenance of law and order in Haiti;

12. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of China stated that the United Nations peacekeeping operation in Haiti had existed for five years and had been extended in various forms many times. He noted that the situation there had since been relatively stable and did not constitute any threat to international or regional peace and security. The resolution before the Council stressed that economic reconstruction was the main task facing the country. His delegation had shown flexibility by suggesting that the Mission be extended for an appropriate period. He regretted however, that the Chinese major amendment proposals had not been taken into account and adopted by the co-sponsors and as a result his delegation was compelled to abstain in the voting.⁸⁵

The representative of the United States stated that his Government welcomed the Council's decision to continue the role of MIPONUH for another year to provide training and guidance to the Haitian National Police. His delegation remained concerned about the continuing political impasse and urged the Haitians to resolve their differences in the interest of the country's immediate and long-term future. In the months ahead, the international community would need to develop a viable transition mechanism outside the peacekeeping framework to sustain Haitian National Police professionalization.⁸⁶

The representative of Haiti stated that by authorizing the renewal of MIPONUH, the Council would not only ensure the development of the young police force, but it would also help it preserve the progress achieved so far. Haiti was currently facing a continuing institutional crisis; however, despite the frustrating nature of the situation, a forced solution could in fact cause serious problems in the future. The Haitian Parliament had met in a special session to debate the issue and to find a solution within the framework of the Haitian Constitution.⁸⁷

Decision of 30 November 1999 (4074th meeting):
resolution 1277 (1999)

On 24 August 1999, pursuant to resolution 1212 (1998) of 25 November 1998, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on MIPONUH, covering the activities of the Mission and developments in the mission area.⁸⁸ The report also included, for the consideration of the Council, further comments on a viable transition to other forms of international assistance beyond those made in previous reports. In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the period under review was marked by ongoing negotiations between the political parties and the Government of Haiti on how to further the democratic process through the holding of legislative and municipal elections. The security situation remained a matter of concern, and a coordinated effort by the Haitian Government, the police and political and civil leaders would be required to avoid a further deterioration in the months leading to the elections. He also stated that the question of security was the responsibility of all Haitians, and that the Haitian National Police could not operate effectively without the full support of the Government and the population at large. The Secretary-General further observed that it would be appropriate, at that juncture, to assess the extent to which some of the functions currently exercised by the two existing missions in Haiti — MIPONUH and the International Civilian Mission in Haiti (MICIVIH) — could be combined into one integrated operation. Subject to the availability of resources, the new mission could also operate in the areas of human rights monitoring and institution-building to provide support to the judicial sector and the national police. The mission would also encourage the Haitian authorities to speed up the reform of its system of justice; verify and support the promotion and protection of human rights; and assist the development and strengthening of democratic institutions, including civil society.

On 18 November 1999, pursuant to resolution 1212 (1998) of 25 November 1998, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council another report on MIPONUH, covering the activities of the Mission and developments in the mission area since his last report.⁸⁹ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that the setting of a date for Haiti's long-delayed legislative and local elections was a significant step forward. He noted, however, that a number of disturbing developments had raised concerns about the electoral process, the security situation and the potential politicization of the Haitian National Police. Moreover, a new postponement of the elections would further erode the confidence of the Haitian people in the Government. The Secretary-General further reported that the Haitian National Police had made significant progress since the establishment of MIPONUH. The termination of the Mission would mark the end of United Nations peacekeeping efforts in Haiti. He underlined further the importance of a continued United Nations presence in the country to assist the Government in the democratization process, professionalization of the police, and reinforcement of the justice system, as called for in a letter dated 8 November 1999 from the President of Haiti.⁹⁰

At its 4074th meeting, held on 30 November 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the two reports of the Secretary-General. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Haiti and Venezuela, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Slovenia) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution submitted by Argentina, Brazil, Canada, France, the United States and Venezuela.⁹¹

Opening the debate, the representative of Haiti stated that MIPONUH, as well as the other previous United Nations missions in Haiti, had carried out their mandate in a positive environment. However, threatening elements still persisted which could reverse the democratic process. He recalled that the Secretary-General had suggested, in his report, that the new mission could carry out the tasks currently handled by MIPONUH and MICIVIH and assist the Haitian Government in areas which were essential for the promotion of democracy, such as the police force, justice and human rights. His delegation therefore hoped that the draft resolution on a phased transition to an International Civilian Support Mission in Haiti (MICAHA) as well as the draft before the General Assembly proposing the establishment of that Mission would be adopted by the respective bodies.⁹²

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that his delegation would abstain in the voting for reasons of principle. By extending the mandate of MIPONUH, the Council was once again in breach of its own decision. The fact that in the text the words "to continue" were used instead of "to extend the mandate" did not change the essence of the matter. Moreover, the President of Haiti had clearly set forth his position when he expressed the desire that a new mission be established whose members would be neither uniformed nor armed.⁹³ That approach was at variance with the draft resolution. He underlined that since there was no official written request from the Government of Haiti to extend MIPONUH the Security Council should not take a decision to extend the mandate.⁹⁴

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted by 14 votes in favour, none against and 1 abstention (Russian Federation), as resolution 1277 (1999),⁹⁵ which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions, in particular resolution 1212 (1998) of 25 November 1998, and those adopted by the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council,

Taking note also of the reports of the Secretary-General of 24 August and 18 November 1999,

Commending the valuable contributions of the Representative of the Secretary-General, the United Nations Civilian Police Mission in Haiti, the International Civilian Mission in Haiti and the technical assistance programmes of the United Nations Development Programme and bilateral donors, in assisting the Government of Haiti by supporting and contributing to the professionalization of the Haitian National Police Force as an integral element of the consolidation of Haiti's system of justice, as well as by their efforts in developing national institutions,

Recognizing that the people and Government of Haiti bear the ultimate responsibility for national reconciliation, the maintenance of a secure and stable environment, the administration of justice and the reconstruction of their country, and that the Government of Haiti bears particular responsibility for the further strengthening and effective functioning of the Haitian National Police Force and the justice system,

1. Decides to continue the United Nations Civilian Police Mission in Haiti in order to ensure a phased transition to an International Civilian Support Mission in Haiti by 15 March 2000;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to coordinate and expedite the transition from the United Nations Civilian Police Mission in Haiti and the International Civilian Mission in Haiti to the International Civilian Support Mission in Haiti and to report to the Security Council on the implementation of the present resolution by 1 March 2000;

3. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of Argentina stated that the resolution was a technical measure aimed at facilitating the smooth transition between the missions currently deployed and the new International Civilian Support Mission in Haiti, the creation of which would be considered by the General Assembly shortly.⁹⁶

The representative of the United States of America stated that her Government strongly endorsed the proposal to extend MIPONUH until 15 March 2000, so as to give the United Nations additional time to recruit the technically skilled personnel required to fulfil the MICAH mandate. The transition over the following months between the two missions, MIPONUH and

MICAH, reflected the changing realities in the type of international help most suitable for the present situation in Haiti. In their new role, the armed and uniformed international civilian police currently in the country would be replaced by technical advisors who would concentrate on developing a competent cadre of Haitian police commanders and managers.⁹⁷

The representative of Brazil stated that the General Assembly would soon approve the establishment of a new integrated mission in Haiti, thereby bringing to an end the Security Council's peacekeeping involvement in that country. The extension of MIPONUH would allow the necessary time for a smooth transition to new forms of international assistance until the new mission became fully operational.⁹⁸

The representative of China stated that his delegation supported the Secretary-General's proposal to set up MICAH and hoped that the General Assembly would take a decision on a relevant resolution shortly. He noted, however, that given the overall situation in Haiti, MIPONUH should consider completing its operation so that the relevant agencies could play a bigger role in the peacebuilding field.⁹⁹

The representative of Canada stated that the achievements of MIPONUH had enabled the Council to move to a more flexible mechanism adapted to Haiti's priority needs. The future Mission would complete the ongoing transition from a military peacekeeping presence to a civilian police presence evolving towards a long-term programme of cooperation. The transition period then adopted by the Council to continue MIPONUH until 15 March 2000 was essential if MICAH was to be organized, deployed and utilized to its full potential. He added that MICAH would be a new kind of mission, fundamentally different from a peacekeeping mission.¹⁰⁰

19. Shooting down of two civil aircraft on 24 February 1996

Initial proceedings

Decision of 27 February 1996 (3635th meeting): statement by the President

By a letter dated 26 February 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹ the representative of the United States requested an urgent meeting of the Council in view of “the seriousness of the situation created by the shooting down of two civil aircraft by Cuban Forces”.

At its 3634th meeting, held on 27 February 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United States), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Cuba, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 26 February 1996 from the representative of Cuba, transmitting a note dated 25 February 1996 from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Cuba, in connection with the shooting down of two United States “civilian” aircraft by Cuban planes and the readiness of the Government of Cuba to discuss the matters with the United States Government, in the Security Council or elsewhere; and a note dated 26 February 1996 from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Cuba, stating that two Cessna private aircraft, which had taken off from Florida, while in the act of violating the airspace over Cuban territorial waters were brought down by aircraft of the Cuban Air Force. The letter also included a chronology of violations of Cuban airspace from 1994 to 1996.²

At the same meeting, the representative of Cuba stated that during the previous 20 months, 25 aircraft originating in United States territory had violated Cuban airspace and that in every case it had been officially communicated to the United States interests section in Havana. He further stated that Cuba had “irrefutable proof” that the two aircraft in the present case were in violation of Cuban airspace when they were shot down. He noted that before being shot down one of the pilots of the aircraft heading for Cuba was warned that defences had been activated and of the risk they would run by entering those areas. The pilot had replied that he would fly despite the prohibition. The representative further maintained that Cuba had repeatedly communicated, both publicly and officially to the Government of the United States — including to the Federal Aviation Administration — the dangers to aircraft that unauthorized flights in their airspace entailed. He maintained that despite those warnings, which it publicly acknowledged on several occasions, the Government of the United States had taken no effective measures to prevent such flights from taking place in Cuban airspace. He stressed that on many occasions, Cuban territorial waters and airspace had been violated by organizations based in the United States that, in civilian guise, had committed terrorist acts, while no effective measures had been taken by the Government of that country to stop such actions originating in its territory. The representative observed further that in the past Presidents of the Security Council had invoked rule 20 of the Council’s provisional rules of procedure to demonstrate clearly to the international community that, in line with basic ethical behaviour, they would not attempt to benefit from the prerogatives of their office. He noted that it was abundantly clear that the fact that the United States was presiding over the Council at that time had engendered a very particular dynamic and very particular features in the Council’s work.³ In conclusion, he wished to make very clear to the Security Council that neither the presidential statement before it, if issued, nor any other action would be acceptable to Cuba if it did not include clear, unequivocal condemnation of the acts of aggression against his country carried out from the territory of the United States.⁴

At the same meeting, the representative of the United States stated that his country reserved the right to respond to the unfounded comments in the statement of the Cuban representative.⁵

At its 3635th meeting, held on 27 February 1996, the Council resumed its consideration of the item. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (United States) made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶

The Security Council strongly deplores the shooting down by the Cuban Air Force of two civil aircraft on 24 February 1996, which apparently has resulted in the death of four persons.

The Council recalls that according to international law, as reflected in article 3 bis of the Convention on International Civil Aviation of 7 December 1944, added by the Montreal Protocol of 10 May 1984, States must refrain from the use of weapons against civil aircraft in flight and must not endanger the lives of persons on board and the safety of aircraft. States are obliged to respect international law and human rights norms in all circumstances.

The Council requests that the International Civil Aviation Organization investigate this incident in its entirety and calls upon the Governments concerned to cooperate fully with this investigation. The Council requests that the International Civil Aviation Organization report its findings to it as soon as possible. The Council will consider that report and any further information presented to it without delay.

Decision of 26 July 1996 (3683rd meeting):
resolution 1067 (1996)

At its 3683rd meeting, held on 26 July 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda a note by the Secretary-General dated 1 July 1996, transmitting a letter dated 28 June 1996 from the President of the Council of the International Civil Aviation Organization addressed to the Secretary-General⁷ containing the report of the investigation regarding the shooting down of two U.S.-

registered private civil aircraft by Cuban military aircraft on 24 February 1996. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (France), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Colombia, Cuba, the Lao People's Democratic Republic and Viet Nam, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President then drew the attention of the Council to the text of a draft resolution submitted by the United States.⁸ The President further drew the attention of the Council to the following other documents: a letter dated 1 March 1996 from the representative of Cuba addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁹ and letters dated 1 March, 22 May, 18, 18, 21, 25, 28 and 28 June, and 2, 3, 4, 16 and 17 July 1996, respectively, from the representative of Cuba addressed to the Secretary-General,¹⁰ concerning aspects of the incident involving the shooting down of the two aircraft.

At the same meeting, the representative of the United States said that the draft resolution dealt with a fundamental question of international law and with the observance or non-observance of international standards. She stated that Cuba had violated the principle of customary international law that States must refrain from resorting to the use of weapons against civil aircraft in flight, a principle that applied whether the aircraft was in national or international airspace. She recalled that Cuba had violated the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO) principle that interception of civil aircraft be undertaken only as a last resort and had also failed to follow proper warning procedures. She noted that the Government of Cuba still refused to acknowledge the unlawful nature of its actions. She stressed that the primary mission of the Council was to maintain international peace and security and the draft resolution served that goal by calling upon all nations to refrain from shooting down civil aircraft in violation of international legal standards.¹¹

The representative of Cuba, referring to the ICAO report, maintained that the United States had concealed information, falsified data and impeded the analysis, and had tried to make consideration of the item before the Security Council as difficult as possible. The United States had presented the case as if it were a question of destruction over international waters and not, as was the case, well within the territory of the Republic of Cuba. He also noted that as stated in an ICAO Secretariat document, the use of the aircraft in question was the determining criterion for deciding if an aircraft had civil status or not. He stressed that in this case neither the use nor the mission related to the transport of passengers, mail or cargo. He underscored that there had been no other case before the international community of premeditated activities undertaken by an organization that was involved not in civil aviation but in illegitimate activities that not only violated international law, United States regulations and Cuban sovereignty, but were also related to very serious crimes against the Cuban people. Moreover, he stated that the policy of the United States had not been to prevent those incidents, but to promote and encourage them. He noted that there had never been an incident involving a United States civil aircraft, out of the hundreds that pass each day through these corridors linking Cuba with the United States.¹²

The representative of Colombia stated that the principle that States needed to refrain from the use of weapons against civil aircraft in flight was as relevant as that which established that each State shall take appropriate measures to prohibit the deliberate use of any civil aircraft registered in that State for any purpose inconsistent with the aims of the Convention on International Civil Aviation. He expressed regret that the draft resolution did not contain some of the amendments proposed by the caucus of members of the Non-Aligned Movement, and also noted that Colombia found no justification for the Security Council remaining indefinitely seized of the matter before it.¹³

The representative of Lao People's Democratic Republic stated that his delegation was of the firm opinion that in all circumstances every country or sovereign State had the right and the sacred duty to defend its independence and territorial integrity if it considered that those were threatened or violated. However, given that a multitude of technical questions had not yet been clarified, his delegation did not believe that there were yet grounds to resolve the substance of the question. He appealed to both parties to endeavour to improve their bilateral relations and resolve their disputes peacefully.¹⁴

The representative of Viet Nam stated that his delegation fully supported the ongoing efforts made by the international community, including those of the non-aligned countries with a view to maintaining the principles of national independence, sovereignty, territorial integrity, non-intervention and non-interference in the internal affairs of other countries.¹⁵

Speaking before the vote, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that there could be no doubt that Cuba had contravened principles of international law in using force against civil aircraft and in not following established international procedures on interception of such aircraft. The Security Council was doing no more than upholding the principles of international law and fulfilling its responsibilities to safeguard international peace and security. He added that the Security Council was to vote on a draft resolution which made clear the Council's condemnation of the use of weapons against civil aircraft in flight.¹⁶

The representative of China stated that the provisions of international law on the non-use of weapons against civil aircraft should be respected and at the same time those on the inviolability of territorial airspace and those against the abuse of civil aviation must also be observed. However, he stated that as key amendments proposed by the parties concerned had not been accepted, the current draft resolution had a "biased tilt," as a result of which his delegation would abstain in the vote.¹⁷

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the draft resolution reaffirmed the conclusion of the Council of the International Civil Aviation Organization that States must refrain from the use of weapons against civil aircraft in flight and that when civil aircraft were intercepted the lives of persons on board must not be endangered. However, the Security Council bore a great responsibility in terms of effective and timely measures to ensure compliance with international law, which included not allowing violations of the sovereignty of Member States or of the standards and rules of international civil aviation. He stated that the draft resolution had continued to deviate from the general direction consistent with the interests of all members of the international community. He said that the text remained unbalanced from the political and international legal standpoints, as it did not strike a balance between two fundamental principles: the non-use of weapons against civil aircraft and the non-use of such aircraft for illegal purposes, which established an unfortunate precedent for the future. He also expressed unhappiness that the resolution emphasized the report of the Secretary-General of ICAO, which had not been given an unequivocal assessment when it was considered, over the resolution of the International Civil Aviation Organization Council. He reiterated that his delegation could not support the draft resolution in its present form and would abstain in the voting.¹⁸

A number of other speakers endorsed the draft resolution. They supported the principle that States must refrain from the use of weapons against civil aircraft in flight. Many representatives also highlighted that each contracting State needed to take appropriate measures to prohibit the deliberate use of any civil aircraft for any purposes inconsistent with the aims of article 3 bis (d) of the Chicago Convention.¹⁹

The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and adopted by 13 votes to none with 2 abstentions (China, Russian Federation), as resolution 1067 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling the statement made by its President on 27 February 1996 strongly deploring the shooting down by the Cuban Air Force of two civil aircraft on 24 February 1996, which resulted in the death of four persons, and requesting the International Civil Aviation Organization to investigate this incident in its entirety and to report its findings to the Security Council,

Taking note of the resolution adopted by the Council of the International Civil Aviation Organization on 6 March 1996 which strongly deplored the shooting down of the two civil aircraft and which directed the Secretary-General of the International Civil Aviation Organization to initiate an immediate investigation of the incident in its entirety in accordance with the Security Council presidential statement of 27 February 1996 and to report on that investigation,

Commending the International Civil Aviation Organization for its examination of this incident, and welcoming the resolution adopted by the Council of the International Civil Aviation Organization on 27 June 1996, transmitting the report of the Secretary-General of that organization to the Security Council,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of the International Civil Aviation Organization regarding the shooting down of civil aircraft N2456S and N5485S by Cuban MiG-29 military aircraft, and noting in particular the conclusions of the report,

Recalling the principle that every State has complete and exclusive sovereignty over the airspace above its territory, and that the territory of a State shall be deemed to be the land areas and territorial waters adjacent thereto, and noting in this connection that States shall be guided by the principles, rules, standards and recommended practices laid down in the Convention on International Civil Aviation of 7 December 1944 and the annexes thereto (the Chicago Convention), including the rules relating to the interception of civil aircraft, and the principle, recognized under customary international law, concerning the non-use of weapons against such aircraft in flight,

1. Endorses the conclusions of the report of the International Civil Aviation Organization and the resolution adopted by the Council of the International Civil Aviation Organization on 27 June 1996;

2. Notes that the unlawful shooting down by the Cuban Air Force of two civil aircraft on 24 February 1996 violated the principle that States must refrain from the use of weapons against civil aircraft in flight and that, when intercepting civil aircraft, the lives of persons on board and the safety of the aircraft must not be endangered;

3. Expresses deep regret over the loss of four lives, and offers its deep sympathy and condolences to the bereaved families of the victims of this tragic event;

4. Calls upon all parties to acknowledge and comply with international civil aviation law and related internationally agreed procedures, including the rules and standards and recommended practices set out in the Chicago Convention;

5. Reaffirms the principle that each State shall take appropriate measures to prohibit the deliberate use of any civil aircraft registered in that State or operated by an operator who has his principal place of business or permanent residence in that State for any purpose inconsistent with the aims of the Chicago Convention;

6. Condemns the use of weapons against civil aircraft in flight as being incompatible with elementary considerations of humanity, the rules of customary international law as codified in article 3 bis of the Chicago Convention, and the standards and recommended practices set out in the annexes of the Convention, and calls upon Cuba to join other States in complying with their obligations under these provisions;

7. Urges all States which have not yet done so to ratify as soon as possible the Montreal Protocol adding article 3 bis to the Chicago Convention, and to comply with all the provisions of the article pending the entry into force of the Protocol;

8. Welcomes the decision of the Council of the International Civil Aviation Organization to initiate a study of the safety-related aspects of the report of the investigation with regard to the adequacy of standards and recommended practices and other rules relating to the interception of civil aircraft with a view to preventing the recurrence of a similar tragic event;

9. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of France noted that two points regarding the events had emerged. First, the events had occurred in a context of tension caused by repeated violations of Cuban airspace. The second was that weapons had been deliberately used against unarmed aircraft without prior recourse to procedures that would have made it possible to divert the planes. He concluded that the resolution adopted was completely consistent with the results of the International Civil Aviation Organization's work.²⁰

At the same meeting, both the United States and Cuba took second interventions to reiterate the points made in their respective statements.²¹

Introduction

The present publication (volumes I and II) constitutes the thirteenth supplement to the Repertoire of the Practice of the Security Council, 1946-1951, which was issued in 1954. It covers the proceedings of the Security Council from the 3616th meeting, on 5 January 1996, to the 4086th meeting, on 30 December 1999.

The Repertoire was mandated by the General Assembly in its resolution 686 (VII) of 5 December 1952, entitled “Ways and means for making the evidence of customary international law more readily available”. It is a guide to the proceedings of the Council and sets forth in a readily accessible form the practices and procedures to which the Council has had recourse. The Repertoire is not intended as a substitute for the records of the Council, which constitute the only comprehensive and authoritative account of its deliberations.

The categories employed to arrange the material are not intended to suggest the existence of procedures or practices that have not been clearly or demonstrably established by the Council itself. The Council is at all times, within the framework of the Charter of the United Nations, its own provisional rules of procedure, and practice established through notes by the President of the Security Council, master of its own procedure.

In recording the Council’s practice, the headings under which the practices and procedures of the Council were presented in the original publication have been largely retained. Where necessary, however, adjustments have been made to better reflect the Council’s practice. For ease of reference, the studies contained in chapter VIII are organized according to region or thematic issues. This introduction contains a table indicating the membership of the Security Council during the period under review.

The agenda items considered by the Council during 1996-1999, and the meetings at which they were considered, are presented in a table hereunder in the order in which the items were initially taken up during the period.*

Symbols of United Nations documents are composed of letters combined with figures. Security Council documents are indicated by a symbol such as S/1996/380. References to the verbatim records of meetings of the Council are given in the form S/PV.3677, meetings being numbered consecutively, starting with the first meeting in 1946. As in previous recent supplements, reference is made in this Supplement only to the provisional verbatim records of Security Council meetings, as the practice of publishing the meeting records in the Official Records has been discontinued.

The resolutions adopted by the Security Council and most of the statements by the President are published in the yearly volumes of Resolutions and Decisions of the Security Council. Resolutions are identified by a number followed by the year of adoption in parentheses, for example, resolution 1273 (1999). Statements by the

Consideration of questions under the responsibility of the Security Council for the maintenance of international peace and security

Introductory note

Chapter VIII focuses on the substance of each of the questions included in the agenda of the Security Council that relate to its responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security. By examining the entire sequence of proceedings, it provides an overall sense of their political context.¹ The range of questions covers broadly those that may be deemed to fall under Chapters VI and VII of the Charter, constituting a framework within which to consider the ancillary legal and constitutional discussion recorded in chapters X to XII of the Repertoire.

The questions are dealt with by region, for ease of reference. There is also a category of thematic issues.

Each section is organized around the decisions taken by the Council on each agenda item. Procedural decisions related to the subject matter of chapters I to VII of the Repertoire are, with certain exceptions, omitted as not relevant to the purpose of this chapter. For instance, information on invitations to participate in the discussion and on rules 37 and 39 of the provisional rules of procedure is provided in chapter III.

Summaries of the statements made in the Council and of the documents considered by the Council during its deliberations have been included to provide a better understanding of the basis of decisions. Affirmative decisions have been reproduced in full, while negative decisions are indicated in summarized form.

¹ The Repertoire of the Practice of the Security Council covers formal meetings and documents of the Security Council. Some of the questions considered in this chapter may also have been discussed in informal consultations among the members of the Council.

20. The situation in East Timor¹

Decision of 7 May 1999 (3998th meeting): resolution 1236 (1999)

On 5 May 1999, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in East Timor.² In his report, the Secretary-General recalled that since 1983 the Governments of Indonesia and Portugal had undertaken, through his good offices, to find a just, comprehensive and internationally acceptable solution to the question of East Timor. Those efforts had culminated in the signature, on 5 May 1999, of an overall Agreement between the two Governments,³ which had entrusted him with the task of organizing and conducting a popular consultation to ascertain whether the people of East Timor accepted or rejected a proposed constitutional framework providing for a special autonomy for East Timor within Indonesia. The Agreement also requested him to establish a United Nations mission to conduct the consultation. Two supplementary agreements between the United Nations and the two Governments had been signed on the same date, on the modalities for the popular consultation of the people of East Timor through a direct ballot and security arrangements.⁴

At its 3998th meeting, held on 7 May 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda and began consideration of the item entitled "The situation in Timor". After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Gabon) invited the representatives of Indonesia and Portugal, at their request, to participate in the discussion without a vote. He also drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of its prior consultations.⁵

The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1236 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous resolutions on the situation in East Timor,

Recalling also General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960, 1541 (XV) of 15 December 1960 and 2625 (XXV) of 24 October 1970 and Assembly resolutions on the question of East Timor, in particular resolution 37/30 of 23 November 1982,

Bearing in mind the sustained efforts of the Governments of Indonesia and Portugal since July 1983, through the good offices of the Secretary-General, to find a just, comprehensive and internationally acceptable solution to the question of East Timor,

Welcoming the progress made at the last round of talks between the Governments of Portugal and Indonesia, under the auspices of the Secretary-General, leading to the conclusion of a series of agreements in New York on 5 May 1999,

Commending in particular the efforts of the Personal Representative of the Secretary-General in this regard,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General,

Taking note also of the concerns expressed in the report of the Secretary-General regarding the security situation in East Timor,

1. Welcomes the concluding of the Agreement between Indonesia and Portugal on 5 May 1999 on the question of East Timor (the General Agreement); the necessary security situation exists for the peaceful implementation of the consultation process;

11. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 11 June 1999 (4013th meeting):
resolution 1246 (1999)

On 22 May 1999, pursuant to resolution 1236 (1999), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the question of East Timor, proposing the establishment of the United Nations Mission in East Timor (UNAMET).⁶ In his report, the Secretary-General provided a detailed description of the consultation process to be conducted by the United Nations, as well as his recommendations on the mandate, size, structure and budget of the Mission. He stressed that UNAMET must have the confidence and backing of the Council, full cooperation of the Indonesian authorities, and the required resources to carry out its tasks. The Secretary-General noted that the situation in East Timor remained tense and volatile. He expressed the hope that all necessary steps would be taken to improve security, so that the consultation process could move forward in a secure and peaceful atmosphere. In conclusion, he requested the Council to approve the mandate of the Mission and the modalities for the implementation of the popular consultation process.

At its 4013th meeting, held on 11 June 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General on its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Gambia) invited the representatives of Australia, Indonesia, New Zealand and Portugal, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. He also drew the attention of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of its prior consultations.⁷ The President also drew attention to several documents: a letter dated 11 May 1999 from the representative of Germany addressed to the Secretary-General, transmitting the statement on East Timor issued on 7 May 1999 by the Presidency on behalf of the European Union, welcoming the signing of the agreement on the future of East Timor by the Secretary-General, Portugal and Indonesia;⁸ a letter dated 27 May 1999 addressed to the President of the Security Council by the representative of Indonesia, pointing out that certain aspects of the report of the Secretary-General depicted an imbalanced picture of the prevailing realities;⁹ and a letter dated 7 June 1999 addressed to the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council by the representative of Portugal, informing them of the appointment of the Portuguese Commissioner to support the transition in East Timor.¹⁰

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1246 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous resolutions on the situation in East Timor, in particular resolution 1236 (1999) of 7 May 1999,

Recalling also the Agreement between Indonesia and Portugal of 5 May 1999 on the question of East Timor (the General Agreement) and the Agreements between the United Nations and the Governments of Indonesia and Portugal, of the same date, regarding the modalities for the popular consultation of the East Timorese through a direct ballot and regarding security arrangements (the Security Agreement),

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 22 May 1999 on the question of East Timor, Noting with concern the assessment by the Secretary-General in that report that the security situation in East Timor remains “extremely tense and volatile”,

Taking note of the pressing need for reconciliation between the various competing factions within East Timor,

Welcoming the fruitful cooperation of the Government of Indonesia and the local authorities in East Timor with the United Nations,

Taking note of the letter dated 7 June 1999 from the Permanent Representative of Portugal to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council,

Welcoming the conclusion of consultations between the Government of Indonesia and the United Nations on the deployment of military liaison officers within the mission established by paragraph 1 below,

Bearing in mind the sustained efforts of the Governments of Indonesia and Portugal since July 1983, through the good offices of the Secretary-General, to find a just, comprehensive and internationally acceptable solution to the question of East Timor.

Welcoming the appointment of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for the East Timor Popular Consultation, and reiterating its support for the efforts of the Personal Representative of the Secretary-General for East Timor,

1. Decides to establish until 31 August 1999 the United Nations Mission in East Timor to organize and conduct a popular consultation, scheduled for 8 August 1999, on the basis of a direct, secret and universal ballot, in order to ascertain whether the East Timorese people accept the proposed constitutional framework providing for a special autonomy for East Timor within the unitary Republic of Indonesia or reject the proposed special autonomy for East Timor, leading to East Timor’s separation from Indonesia, in accordance with the General Agreement and to enable the Secretary-General to discharge his responsibility under paragraph 3 of the Security Agreement;

2. Authorizes until 31 August 1999 the deployment within the Mission of up to 280 civilian police officers to act as advisers to the Indonesian Police in the discharge of their duties and, at the time of the consultation, to supervise the escorting of ballot papers and boxes to and from the polling sites;

3. Also authorizes until 31 August 1999 the deployment within the Mission of fifty military liaison officers to maintain contact with the Indonesian Armed Forces in order to allow the Secretary-General to discharge his responsibilities under the General Agreement and the Security Agreement;

4. Endorses the proposal of the Secretary-General that the Mission should also incorporate the following components:

(a) A political component responsible for monitoring the fairness of the political environment, for ensuring the freedom of all political and other non-governmental organizations to carry out their activities freely and for monitoring and advising the Special Representative on all matters with political implications;

(b) An electoral component responsible for all activities related to registration and voting;

(c) An information component responsible for explaining to the East Timorese people, in an objective and impartial manner without prejudice to any position or outcome, the terms of the General Agreement and the proposed autonomy framework, for providing information on the process and procedure of the vote, and for explaining the implications of a vote in favour or against the proposal;

5. Notes the intention of the Governments of Indonesia and Portugal to send an equal number of representatives to observe all the operational phases of the consultation process both inside and outside East Timor;

6. Welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to conclude with the Government of Indonesia, as soon as possible, a status-of-mission agreement, and urges the early conclusion of negotiations with a view to the full and timely deployment of the Mission;

7. Calls upon all parties to cooperate with the Mission in the implementation of its mandate, and to ensure the security and freedom of movement of its staff in carrying out that mandate in all areas of East Timor;

8. Approves the modalities for the implementation of the popular consultation process scheduled for 8 August 1999 as set out in paragraphs 15 to 18 of the report of the Secretary-General of 22 May 1999;

9. Stresses once again the responsibility of the Government of Indonesia to maintain peace and security in East Timor, in particular in the present security situation referred to in the report of the Secretary-General, in order to ensure that the popular consultation is carried out in a fair and peaceful way and in an atmosphere free of intimidation, violence or interference from any side and to ensure the safety and security of United Nations and other international staff and observers in East Timor;

10. Welcomes in this regard the decision taken by the Government of Indonesia to establish a ministerial team to monitor and ensure the security of the popular consultation in accordance with article 3 of the General Agreement and paragraph 1 of the Security Agreement;

11. Condemns all acts of violence from whatever quarter, and calls for an end to such acts and the laying down of arms by all armed groups in East Timor, for the necessary steps to achieve disarmament and for further steps in order to ensure a secure environment devoid of violence or other forms of intimidation, which is a prerequisite for the holding of a free and fair ballot in East Timor;

12. Requests all parties to ensure that conditions exist for the comprehensive implementation of the popular consultation, with the full participation of the East Timorese people;

13. Urges that every effort be made to make the Commission on Peace and Stability operative, and in particular stresses the need for the Indonesian authorities to provide security and personal protection for members of the Commission in cooperation with the Mission;

14. Reiterates its request to the Secretary-General to keep the Security Council closely informed of the situation, and to continue to report to it every fourteen days on the implementation of its resolutions and of the tripartite Agreements and on the security situation in East Timor;

15. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 29 June 1999 (4019th meeting):
statement by the President

On 22 June 1999, pursuant to resolution 1246 (1999), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the question of East Timor, providing an update on the activities of UNAMET and the security situation in the Territory.¹¹ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that pro-integration militias, believed to be operating with the acquiescence of army elements, had carried out acts of violence and intimidation against the local population. Those activities continued to restrict political freedom, thus jeopardizing the openness of the consultation process. Given the serious security situation throughout much of the territory and the absence of a “level playing field”, and in order to allow enough time for the full deployment of the Mission, he had decided to postpone the registration process, which would in turn entail a two-week postponement of the ballot date.

At its 4019th meeting, held on 29 June 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General on its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Gambia) invited the representatives of Indonesia and Portugal, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹²

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 22 June 1999 on the question of East Timor.

The Council notes with understanding the decision of the Secretary-General to postpone for three weeks his determination, which he will base on the main elements identified in his report of 5 May 1999, of whether the necessary security situation exists for the start of the operational phases of the consultation process in accordance with the Agreement between the United Nations and the Governments of Indonesia and Portugal. The Council also endorses his intention not to start the operational phases of the popular consultation until the United Nations Mission in East Timor is fully deployed, and his decision to postpone the ballot date for two weeks.

The Council emphasizes that a popular consultation of the East Timorese people through a direct, secret and universal ballot represents an historic opportunity to resolve the question of East Timor peacefully. It concurs with the Secretary-General's assessment that this process must be transparent and that all parties must have the opportunity to express themselves freely.

In this regard, the Council expresses serious concern that the Secretary-General, in his assessment, concludes that the necessary conditions do not yet exist to begin the operational phases of the consultation process, given the security situation throughout much of East Timor and the absence of a "level playing field". It is especially concerned that the militias and other armed groups have carried out acts of violence against the local population and exercise an intimidating influence over them, and that these activities continue to constrict political freedom in East Timor, thus jeopardizing the necessary openness of the consultation process. The Council notes the Secretary-General's assessment that while the security situation has severely limited the opportunity for public expression by pro-independence activists, pro-autonomy campaigning has been actively pursued.

The Council stresses the need for all sides to put an end to all kinds of violence and for utmost restraint before, during and after the consultation. It calls upon the Mission to follow up reports of violent activity by both the pro-integration militias and Falintil (the Armed Forces for the National Liberation of East Timor). In this regard, it expresses grave concern at the attack on the Mission office in Maliana, East Timor, on 29 June 1999. The Council demands that the incident be thoroughly investigated and the perpetrators be brought to justice. The Council also demands that all parties respect the safety and security of Mission personnel. The Council supports the statement of the spokesman for the Secretary-General of 29 June 1999 and requests the Secretary-General to report further.

The Council welcomes the positive developments identified by the Secretary-General. The Council warmly welcomes the excellent channels of communication between the Mission and the Indonesian authorities, which have been facilitated by the establishment of a high-level Indonesian task force in Dili. The Council warmly welcomes the opening of the DARE II talks in Jakarta with representatives of all sides in East Timor, and the progress towards making the Commission on Peace and Stability operative.

The Council stresses once again the responsibility of the Government of Indonesia to maintain peace and security in East Timor. The Council emphasizes that all local officials in East Timor must abide by the provisions of the tripartite Agreements, in particular as regards the designated campaign period, the use of public funds for campaign purposes and the need to campaign only in their private capacity, without recourse to the pressure of office.

The Council is particularly concerned at the situation of internally displaced persons in East Timor and the implications which this may have for the universality of the consultation. It calls upon all concerned to grant full access and freedom of movement to humanitarian organizations for the delivery of humanitarian assistance, to cease immediately activities which may cause further displacement and to allow all internally displaced persons who wish to do so to return home.

The Council notes that full deployment of the Mission will not be possible before 10 July 1999. It urges the Secretary-General to take all necessary steps to ensure full deployment by that time, and urges all parties to cooperate fully with the Mission. It stresses the importance of allowing complete freedom of movement for the Mission within East Timor in order to carry out its tasks.

The Council urges the Indonesian Government and the pro-integration and pro-independence groups to continue to enhance cooperation with the Mission, to allow the popular consultation to go ahead in a timely manner.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 3 August 1999 (4031st meeting):

By a letter dated 28 July 1999, the Secretary-General informed the Council that, following discussions with his Personal Representative for East Timor and advice received from UNAMET, he had decided to postpone the date of the forthcoming consultation in East Timor until 30 August 1999.¹³ He, therefore, requested the Council to authorize an extension of the current UNAMET mandate by one month, until 30 September 1999. He stated that the United Nations would continue to have a presence in East Timor after the consultation and was currently planning for that phase, in talks with the Governments of Indonesia and Portugal.

At its 4031st meeting, held on 3 August 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the letter from the Secretary-General on its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Namibia) drew the attention of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of its prior consultations.¹⁴ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1257 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous resolutions on the situation in East Timor, in particular resolution 1246 (1999) of 11 June 1999,

Taking note of the letter dated 28 July 1999 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council which informs the Council of his decision to postpone the popular consultation in East Timor until 30 August 1999 and requests the authorization of a one-month extension to the mandate of the United Nations Mission in East Timor,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Mission in East Timor until 30 September 1999;
2. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 27 August 1999 (4038th meeting): resolution 1262 (1999) and statement by the President

On 9 August 1999, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the question of East Timor, providing information on the United Nations role in the post-ballot period and recommending that the tasks and structure of UNAMET be adjusted accordingly.¹⁵ In his report, the Secretary-General requested that the Council consider his recommendations regarding the composition of UNAMET and authorize their implementation for an initial period of three months from the date of the popular consultation in East Timor scheduled for 30 August 1999.

At its 4038th meeting, held on 27 August 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General on its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Namibia) invited the representatives of Australia, Finland, Indonesia, New Zealand, Portugal and the Republic of Korea, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The representative of Portugal expressed his Government's concern that on the eve of the consultation in East Timor armed militias were still operating in the territory and their criminal actions were not being investigated or punished. Recent events had proven that the measures taken so far had been inadequate and insufficient. He appealed to the Indonesian authorities to take concrete steps to stop violence and ensure that the popular consultation was held in an atmosphere free of intimidation, violence or interference from any side. Referring to the future of East Timor, he highlighted the role of the people of East Timor in moving towards national reconciliation. He stated that overcoming their differences and living together peacefully would be their biggest challenge after the consultation.¹⁶

The representative of Indonesia affirmed that his Government was determined to shoulder its responsibilities under the Agreements and to ensure that the security situation was conducive to the holding of a free, fair and peaceful popular consultation in East Timor. While acknowledging some "unfortunate" incidents, attributable to the actions of both sides, he maintained that in each instance the Indonesian police had acted promptly and had carried out the necessary investigations. He regretted that misperceptions continued to be cultivated. He observed that "there [were] two groups in East Timor, and neither could or should be dismissed out of hand."¹⁷

The representative of Australia supported the restructuring of UNAMET to enable the Mission to continue its assistance during the next phase between the consultation in East Timor and the implementation of its result. The responsibilities of the United Nations in the post-consultation period had to include building confidence, supporting stability, and reassuring all groups, including those disappointed by the results.¹⁸

The representative of Finland, speaking on behalf of the European Union, stated its intention to send a team of observers to the consultation in East Timor. The representative underlined that the European Community was deeply concerned about the security situation in East Timor, in particular the intimidation by pro-integration militias, which had been linked by many independent observers to elements of the Indonesian Army.¹⁹

The representative of New Zealand said that there could be no "cooling off" period for UNAMET. During the interim phase following the ballot, the Mission would face a range of different tasks, and its structure needed to be adjusted to reflect the new demands. The reconciliation process and the establishment of confidence between all groups would also be of critical importance during that period. He therefore urged Indonesia, and particularly the military authorities, to redouble their efforts to ensure peace and security in the run-up to the ballot and the period thereafter.²⁰

The representative of the Republic of Korea affirmed that his delegation had full confidence in the commitment and capability of the Government and people of Indonesia to maintain law and order in East Timor.²¹

The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1262 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous resolutions on the situation in East Timor, in particular resolutions 1246 (1999) of 11 June 1999 and 1257 (1999) of 3 August 1999,

Recalling also the Agreement between Indonesia and Portugal of 5 May 1999 on the question of East Timor and the Agreements between the United Nations and the Governments of Indonesia and Portugal of the same date regarding the modalities for the popular consultation of the East Timorese through a direct ballot and security arrangements,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 9 August 1999,

Taking note of the need for the United Nations to pursue its efforts in East Timor in the period following the ballot to build confidence and support stability and to reassure all groups, in particular those in the minority in the ballot, that they have a role to play in the future political life of East Timor,

Welcoming the proposal of the Secretary-General that the United Nations Mission in East Timor continue its operations in the interim phase between the conclusion of the popular consultation and the start of the implementation of its result and that its tasks and structure be adjusted accordingly,

Commending the Mission for the impartial and effective implementation of its mandate, and welcoming the confirmation in the report of the Secretary-General that the Mission will continue to do its utmost to fulfil its responsibility in this manner,

Welcoming the fruitful cooperation of the Government of Indonesia in East Timor with the United Nations,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Mission in East Timor until 30 November 1999, and endorses the proposal of the Secretary-General that in the interim phase the Mission should incorporate the following components:

(a) An electoral unit as set out in the report of the Secretary-General;

(b) A civilian police component of up to 460 personnel to continue to advise the Indonesian Police and to prepare for the recruitment and training of the new East Timorese police force;

(c) A military liaison component of up to 300 personnel as set out in the report of the Secretary-General to undertake the necessary military liaison functions, to continue to be involved in the work of the East Timorese bodies established to promote peace, stability and reconciliation, and to provide advice to the Special Representative for the East Timor Popular Consultation on security matters as required, pursuant to the implementation of the Agreements of 5 May 1999;

(d) A civil affairs component to advise the Special Representative for the East Timor Popular Consultation in monitoring the implementation of the Agreements of 5 May 1999, as set out in the report of the Secretary-General;

(e) A public information component to provide information on progress made towards implementation of the outcome of the ballot, and to disseminate a message promoting reconciliation, confidence, peace and stability;

2. Calls upon all parties to cooperate with the Mission in the implementation of its mandate, and to ensure the security and freedom of movement of its staff in carrying out that mandate in all areas of East Timor;

3. Recalls the continuing responsibility of Indonesia to maintain peace and security in East Timor in the interim phase;

4. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Following the adoption of the resolution, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:

On the eve of the ballot, the members of the Security Council wish me to affirm their view, set out in document S/PRST/1999/20, that the popular consultation of the East Timorese people on 30 August represents a historic opportunity to resolve the question of East Timor peacefully. The people of East Timor have a unique opportunity to decide their own future. Whatever the outcome of the consultation, members of the Security Council strongly hope that the people of East Timor will respect that decision and work together to build a peaceful and prosperous future. In adopting the resolution mandating the United Nations presence until 30 November 1999, the Council is demonstrating its readiness to continue to support them after they have made their decision.²²

Decision of 3 September 1999 (4042nd meeting):
statement by the President

By a letter dated 3 September 1999, the Secretary-General informed the Council that UNAMET had completed the popular consultation in East Timor on the proposed autonomy. The ballot result, and the consultation process as a whole, had been duly certified by the Electoral Commission, and was as follows: 94,388 or 21.5 per cent in favour, and 344,580 or 78.5 per cent against. The people of East Timor had thus rejected the proposed special autonomy and expressed their wish to begin a process of transition towards independence. The Secretary-General further noted that the orderly and peaceful transfer of authority in East Timor to the United Nations, under the Agreements of 5 May 1999, would be complex and difficult, given the current insecurity in the Territory.²³

At its 4041st meeting, held on 3 September 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council continued consideration of the item on its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (the Netherlands) invited the representatives of Indonesia and Portugal, at their request, to participate in the discussion, without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, addressing the Council, the Secretary-General recalled that on 5 May 1999, Portugal, Indonesia and the United Nations had concluded a historic set of Agreements to determine the future of East Timor. On 30 August 1999, the people of East Timor had turned out in massive numbers to vote and had rejected the proposed special autonomy. Thus after 24 years of conflict, East Timor stood at the threshold of what it was hoped would be a process of orderly and peaceful transition towards independence. He urged all parties to end the violence and to begin a process of dialogue and reconciliation through the East Timor Consultative Commission. He also called upon the Government of Indonesia to ensure its success by maintaining law and order in the Territory.²⁴

At its 4042nd meeting, held on 3 September 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the letter dated 3 September 1999 from the Secretary-General on its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (the Netherlands) invited the representatives of Indonesia and Portugal, at their request, to participate in the discussion, without the right to vote.

At the same meeting the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁵

The Security Council welcomes the successful popular consultation of the East Timorese people on 30 August 1999 and the letter dated 3 September 1999 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council announcing the ballot result. The Council expresses its support for the courage of those who turned out in record numbers to express their views. It regards the popular consultation as an accurate reflection of the views of the East Timorese people.

The Council pays tribute to the extraordinary work of the Personal Representative of the Secretary-General. It also commends the courage and dedication of the Special Representative for the East Timor Popular Consultation and of the staff of the United Nations Mission in East Timor in organizing and conducting the popular consultation in extremely difficult conditions.

The Council calls upon all parties, both inside and outside East Timor, to respect the result of the popular consultation. The Council urges the East Timorese people to work together to implement their decision as freely and democratically expressed in the ballot and to cooperate in the building of peace and prosperity in the territory. The Council now looks to the Indonesian Government to take the necessary constitutional steps to implement the result of the ballot, in accordance with the Agreements of 5 May 1999.

The Council recognizes that the Agreements of 5 May 1999 which led to the popular consultation of the East Timorese people would not have been possible without the timely initiative of the Government of Indonesia and the constructive attitude of the Government of Portugal. It commends the sustained efforts of the Governments of Indonesia and Portugal, through the good offices of the Secretary-General, to find a just, comprehensive and internationally acceptable solution to the question of East Timor, and expresses its appreciation to the Government of Indonesia for its cooperation with the United Nations in the process.

The Council condemns the violence in East Timor which both preceded and followed the ballot of 30 August 1999. It expresses its condolences to the families of United Nations local staff and others so tragically killed. It underlines the need for the result to be implemented in an atmosphere of peace and security without further violence and intimidation. In accordance with its responsibility for maintaining peace and security under the Agreements of 5 May 1999, it is for the Government of ²⁵ S/PRST/1999/27.

Indonesia to take steps to prevent further violence. It also looks to the Government of Indonesia to guarantee the security of Mission personnel and premises. The Council is ready to consider sympathetically any proposal from the Secretary-General to ensure the peaceful implementation of the popular consultation process.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to report as soon as possible on the implementation of the ballot result, including recommendations on the mandate, size and structure of the United Nations presence in East Timor in the implementation phase (phase III).

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 15 September 1999 (4045th meeting): resolution 1264 (1999)

By letters dated 8 and 9 September 1999, respectively, addressed to the President of the Security Council, the representatives of Portugal and Brazil requested the convening of an urgent meeting of the Council to discuss “the grave and alarming” situation in East Timor.²⁶

At its 4043rd meeting, on 11 September 1999, the Council included the letters from the representatives of Portugal and Brazil on its agenda and began consideration of the item entitled “The situation in East Timor”. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (the Netherlands) invited the representatives of Angola, Australia, Austria, Belarus, Belgium, Cambodia, Cape Verde, Chile, Cuba, Denmark, Ecuador, Egypt, Finland, Germany, Greece, Guinea-Bissau, India, Indonesia, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Iraq, Ireland, Italy, the Lao People’s Democratic Republic, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Luxembourg, Mozambique, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Papua New Guinea, the Philippines, Portugal, the Republic of Korea, Singapore, South Africa, Spain, the Sudan, Sweden, Uruguay and Viet Nam, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 7 September 1999 from the representative of Ireland addressed to the Secretary-General, in which he indicated that, while the very high turnout of registered voters and the orderly and peaceful conduct of the poll represented a great success, there were growing concerns about the security situation on the ground. He expressed the view of Ireland that if Indonesia was unable to maintain security in East

Timor, other possibilities must be examined, and that in this context, Ireland would support the deployment of a peacekeeping force.²⁷ The President further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 8 September 1999 from the representative of Angola addressed to the President of the Council, attaching the declaration on the situation in East Timor made by the member States of the Community of Portuguese-speaking Countries in Lisbon on 6 September 1999, which, inter alia, called upon the international community, and in particular the Security Council, to do everything for the rapid re-establishment of security and normality, including the deployment of peacekeeping forces to the territory;²⁸ and to a letter dated 10 September 1999 from the representative of Portugal addressed to the President of the Council, reiterating the request of Portugal for an immediate meeting of the Council to consider the situation in East Timor, where widespread killings and destruction of property had continued and there had been a marked deterioration of the humanitarian situation on the ground.²⁹

Addressing the Council, the Secretary-General recalled that just one week earlier he had informed the Council that the people of East Timor had rejected the autonomy option and had voted in favour of a transition towards independence. Unfortunately, after the ballot results were announced, the situation had become chaotic, and the scale of violence, death and destruction had gone far beyond what had been foreseen. He had been in constant contact with Heads of State and, in particular, with the President of Indonesia, in an effort to create conditions that would enable UNAMET to carry out its mandate. The Council had also dispatched a mission to Indonesia to emphasize to the leaders of that country the urgency of the situation and the need for immediate action.³⁰ However, despite all those efforts, the security situation had steadily deteriorated, forcing UNAMET to close all but one of its offices. The Secretary-General further noted that some 1,000 people from East Timor had taken refuge in the United Nations compound and were living in precarious conditions. Moreover, the vast majority of the population had been forcibly displaced. With access to the whole Territory being denied, the international community could not evaluate the full dimensions of the humanitarian crisis or the basic survival requirements of the uprooted population. He also urged the Government of Indonesia to agree immediately to the deployment of an international force to East Timor. He underscored that the time had come to seek the help of the international community in fulfilling its responsibilities, which included guaranteeing the safety and protection of the civilian leaders of the pro-independence camp.³¹

At the same meeting, the representative of Portugal recalled that, under the Charter, the Council had the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, and undoubtedly both were being threatened in East Timor. Never in the history of the Organization had institutions of one Member State so blatantly attempted to destroy a process which had been organized and conducted by the United Nations. He affirmed that the Organization had a legal and ethical obligation to protect the people of East Timor, and indeed, at that stage, its credibility was at stake. He stressed that the Council should, inter alia, ensure that Indonesia took concrete steps to stop the killings and restore order; act to halt the forced dislocation of the civilian population and create conditions for their safe return; allow unimpeded access by all United Nations humanitarian agencies and the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) to provide relief to those in need; and create security conditions to allow UNAMET to fulfil its mandate. He also urged the Government of Indonesia to accept the deployment of an international force, and to identify and bring to justice those responsible for the atrocities in East Timor.³²

The representative of Brazil affirmed that the Council was dealing “with an urgent and serious threat to international security”. The international community must not remain passive in the face of the atrocities committed against the people of East Timor who were also being denied the most fundamental right the Organization stood for — the right to self-determination. The international community must be prepared to use all available means at its disposal, under the Charter, to guarantee the restoration of peace and the full implementation of the Agreements of 5 May 1999. He stated that no option should be excluded.³³

The representative of the United States said that UNAMET had worked successfully to allow the people of East Timor to express their will and that on 30 August over 400,000 had made their choice clear. However, on the day when the ballot results should have been celebrated, the militia took to the streets and began a “murderous rampage”. Hundreds had been killed, and United Nations personnel had come under attack. Moreover, there were clear indications that Indonesian troops had “backed, encouraged, directed and perhaps, in many cases, participated in the atrocities on the ground”. The present meeting would convey to the Indonesian authorities that they would face international isolation if they did not act to stop the violence. He therefore urged the Government to allow the immediate deployment of a multinational force into East Timor.³⁴

The representative of France said that the events in East Timor could not be tolerated any longer. The United Nations had encouraged and conducted a negotiating process leading to self-determination that had seemed exemplary. Suddenly, everything had collapsed. Violence had caused large flows of refugees and displaced persons, and Dili had been devastated by the militias. The measures undertaken by the Indonesian authorities had not been effective, and the choice of independence was being contested by force of arms. They should therefore accept the international community offer of assistance to help restore peace and security. Should the Council decide to deploy an international force, France would participate, he said.³⁵

The representative of Australia stated that his country had watched with growing alarm and concern the developments that had unfolded in East Timor. While stating that the deplorable situation had arisen because of the failure of the military to honour the commitment of Indonesia to provide security to East Timor for the United Nations consultation and transition process, the representative called on

Indonesia to agree immediately to the deployment of a United Nations-authorized international force to provide the necessary security for UNAMET to resume its role. He further urged Indonesia, as a friend and neighbour, to support the people of East Timor in the realization of their goal of independence. He pledged the readiness of Australia to assist in restoring peace and security to the territory and in creating the conditions in which the people of East Timor could build their lives. He concluded that the interest of Australia was in an Indonesia that was successful and was constructively engaged with the international community, not an Indonesia that was isolated and disadvantaged through confrontation over East Timor.³⁶

During the debate, most speakers expressed deep concern at the deterioration of the security and humanitarian situation in East Timor, and the continuing acts of violence against the civilian population and UNAMET personnel. Underlining the responsibility of the Government of Indonesia for security in East Timor, as stipulated in the Agreement of 5 May 1999, they called on the Indonesian authorities to act immediately to re-establish law and order, and allow the results of the popular consultation to be implemented peacefully. They also urged the Government to accept the offer of international assistance and to agree to the deployment of a multinational force to assist in restoring order and in securing a peaceful transition to independence for the Territory.³⁷ Some speakers stressed that the deployment of any peacekeeping force must be endorsed by the Council and accepted by the Government of Indonesia.³⁸ Others contended that the Government of Indonesia had recently undertaken measures to improve the security situation in the field, and thus deemed that the deployment of such force should be studied carefully to avoid aggravating the situation.³⁹

The representative of China stated that the people of East Timor had made a choice for their future and appealed to all concerned to respect their will. He called for the immediate cessation of all acts of violence and the protection of United Nations personnel. He also stressed that the issue of East Timor needed to be solved through the United Nations and that the deployment of any peacekeeping force should be done at the request of the Government of Indonesia and endorsed by the Council.⁴⁰

The representative of the United Kingdom said that his country had repeatedly made clear to the Government of Indonesia its willingness to provide support for a multinational force to restore security in East Timor. However, those offers had so far been declined on the grounds that Indonesia was capable of restoring security by itself. The Government of Indonesia must meet its obligations under the Tripartite Agreement and allow UNAMET to operate throughout the territory, otherwise, it must understand that it would be held responsible by the international community.⁴¹

The representative of the Russian Federation said that assistance should be given to the Government of Indonesia to help restore order in East Timor and to implement the results of the public consultation in East Timor. If the situation was not brought under control, and should the deployment of an international force be considered, it would need acceptance of such a force by the Indonesian authorities, and there would have to be an endorsement by the Security Council of an appropriate resolution setting forth its mandate. He stated that the Russian Federation would be prepared, together with other members of the Council, to expeditiously consider additional measures to resolve the East Timor crisis, including in the light of the report of the Security Council mission dispatched to Indonesia.⁴²

The representative of Indonesia said that his Government would continue to support United Nations efforts in East Timor and would not renege on its commitments under the Agreements of 5 May 1999. He reiterated that the Government had never condoned any form of violence or intimidation. It had accepted the results of the popular consultation and would honour them. Despite some random incidents, the situation was presently being brought under control, and Dili and the surrounding areas were returning to normal. The Indonesian authorities had restructured the chain of command of the security forces, and were focusing on the humanitarian situation and facilitating the delivery of assistance to those in need. Under those circumstances, the Government of Indonesia, while fully understanding the willingness of some countries to provide security assistance, did not foresee the need for the deployment of a multinational force at that stage. Such an operation might exacerbate the situation and be counterproductive, he said.⁴³

On 14 September 1999, the Security Council mission dispatched to Jakarta and Dili with the task of discussing with the Government of Indonesia concrete steps for the peaceful implementation of the Agreements of 5 May 1999 submitted a report on the results of its meetings in Jakarta and Dili from 8 to 12 September 1999.⁴⁴ In the report, the Mission concluded that the accounts given by the Government of Indonesia of events in East Timor and of actions taken by Indonesia to carry out its responsibilities under the Agreement of 5 May 1999 did not tally with the briefings provided by United Nations staff and senior diplomats in Jakarta and Dili, nor with the events observed on the ground. Moreover, the repeated failure of the defence forces to carry out the obligations of the Government to provide security to UNAMET, international organizations and the population as a whole, meant that the Indonesian authorities were either unable or unwilling to provide the proper environment for the peaceful implementation of the Agreement of 5 May 1999. The introduction of martial law did not alter that state of affairs, nor did it adequately respond to the humanitarian crisis in East Timor. In its recommendations, the Mission called on the Security Council to welcome the Indonesian President's decision to invite an international peacekeeping force to cooperate with Indonesia in restoring peace and security in East Timor, and to adopt a resolution providing a framework for its implementation; to authorize an advance party of the international security presence to undertake essential tasks in and around Dili related to UNAMET and the delivery of humanitarian supplies; to hold the Government of Indonesia to its obligations under phase II of the Agreement of 5 May 1999; and to institute the investigation of apparent abuses of international humanitarian law in East and West Timor. The mission further called on the United Nations to give top priority to the grave humanitarian crisis in East Timor and insist on the Government's provision of access and security to United Nations and international humanitarian organizations.

At its 4045th meeting, held on 15 September 1999, the Council continued consideration of the item on its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Netherlands) invited the representatives of Australia, Finland, Indonesia, Japan, New Zealand and Portugal, at their request, to participate in the discussion, without the right to vote. The President drew the attention of the members of the Council to the report of the Security Council Mission to Jakarta and Dili,⁴⁵ and to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of its prior consultations.⁴⁶ He also drew their attention to a letter dated 14 September 1999 from the representative of Australia addressed to the Secretary-General, accepting the leadership of the multinational force and indicating their readiness to make a substantial contribution to the force itself.⁴⁷

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 1264 (1999), which reads:

Recalling its previous resolutions and the statements by its President on the situation in East Timor,

Recalling also the Agreement between Indonesia and Portugal of 5 May 1999 on the question of East Timor and the Agreements between the United Nations and the Governments of Indonesia and Portugal, of the same date, regarding the modalities for the popular consultation of the East Timorese through a direct ballot and security arrangements,

Reiterating its welcome for the successful conduct of the popular consultation of the East Timorese people of 30 August 1999, and taking note of its outcome, which it regards as an accurate reflection of the views of the East Timorese people,

Deeply concerned by the deterioration in the security situation in East Timor, and in particular by the continuing violence against and large-scale displacement and relocation of East Timorese civilians,

Deeply concerned also at the attacks on the staff and premises of the United Nations Mission in East Timor, on other officials and on international and national humanitarian personnel,

Recalling the relevant principles contained in the Convention on the Safety of United Nations and Associated Personnel adopted on 9 December 1994,

Appalled by the worsening humanitarian situation in East Timor, particularly as it affects women, children and other vulnerable groups,

Reaffirming the right of refugees and displaced persons to return in safety and security to their homes,

Welcoming the statement by the President of Indonesia on 12 September 1999 in which he expressed the readiness of Indonesia to accept an international peacekeeping force through the United Nations in East Timor,

Welcoming also the letter dated 14 September 1999 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Australia to the Secretary-General,

Reaffirming respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Indonesia,

Expressing its concern at reports indicating that systematic, widespread and flagrant violations of international humanitarian and human rights law have been committed in East Timor, and stressing that persons committing such violations bear individual responsibility,

Determining that the present situation in East Timor constitutes a threat to peace and security,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Condemns all acts of violence in East Timor, calls for their immediate end, and demands that those responsible for such acts be brought to justice;

2. Emphasizes the urgent need for coordinated humanitarian assistance and the importance of allowing full, safe and unimpeded access by humanitarian organizations, and calls upon all parties to cooperate with such organizations so as to ensure the protection of civilians at risk, the safe return of refugees and displaced persons and the effective delivery of humanitarian aid;

3. Authorizes the establishment of a multinational force under a unified command structure, pursuant to the request of the Government of Indonesia conveyed to the Secretary-General on 12 September 1999, with the following tasks: to restore peace and security in East Timor, to protect and support the United Nations Mission in East Timor in carrying out its tasks and, within force capabilities, to facilitate humanitarian assistance operations, and authorizes the States participating in the multinational force to take all necessary measures to fulfil this mandate;

4. Welcomes the expressed commitment of the Government of Indonesia to cooperate with the multinational force in all aspects of the implementation of its mandate, and looks forward to close coordination between the multinational force and the Government of Indonesia;

5. Underlines the continuing responsibility of the Government of Indonesia under the Agreements of 5 May 1999, taking into account the mandate of the multinational force set out in paragraph 3 above, to maintain peace and security in East Timor in the interim phase between the conclusion of the popular consultation and the start of the implementation of its result and to guarantee the security of the personnel and premises of the Mission;

6. Welcomes the offers by Member States to organize, lead and contribute to the multinational force in East Timor, calls upon Member States to make further contributions of personnel, equipment and other resources, and invites Member States in a position to contribute to inform the leadership of the multinational force and the Secretary-General;

7. Stresses that it is the responsibility of the Indonesian authorities to take immediate and effective measures to ensure the safe return of refugees to East Timor;

8. Notes that article 6 of the Agreement of 5 May 1999 states that the Governments of Indonesia and Portugal and the Secretary-General shall agree on arrangements for a peaceful and orderly transfer of authority in East Timor to the United Nations, and requests the leadership of the multinational force to cooperate closely with the United Nations to assist and support those arrangements;

9. Stresses that the expenses for the force will be borne by the participating Member States concerned, and requests the Secretary-General to establish a trust fund through which contributions could be channelled to the States or operations concerned;

10. Agrees that the multinational force should collectively be deployed in East Timor until replaced as soon as possible by a United Nations peacekeeping operation, and invites the Secretary-General to make prompt recommendations on a peacekeeping operation to the Security Council;

11. Invites the Secretary-General to plan and prepare for a United Nations transitional administration in East Timor, incorporating a United Nations peacekeeping operation, to be deployed in the implementation phase of the popular consultation (phase III) and to make recommendations as soon as possible to the Security Council;

12. Requests the leadership of the multinational force to provide periodic reports on progress towards the implementation of its mandate through the Secretary-General to the Council, the first such report to be made within fourteen days of the adoption of the present resolution;

13. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

At the same meeting, the representative of Portugal stated that the security and humanitarian conditions in East Timor had not improved and that there were alarming reports of continued brutality, violence against refugees and internally displaced persons, and major food and medicine shortages. Moreover, in spite of guarantees given by the Indonesian authorities, UNAMET had been forced to withdraw from its headquarters and the same had happened to the Observer Mission of Portugal created by the New York agreements. Those events were completely unacceptable and they were hard evidence of the inability of Indonesia to maintain peace and stability in the Territory. He therefore welcomed the establishment of a multinational force and urged Indonesia to cooperate fully.⁴⁸

The representative of Indonesia stated that following the visit of the Indonesian Armed Forces Commander to East Timor who accompanied the Security Council Mission to directly observe the effect of the declaration of a state of military emergency, the Government of Indonesia had reviewed the situation in East Timor and had decided to request the cooperation of the United Nations in dealing with the security situation in East Timor. Moreover, in a spirit of cooperation and flexibility, it had placed no conditions on the deployment of a multinational force, under Chapter VII of the Charter, and would extend its cooperation to facilitate the force's tasks. He also assured the Council that adequate measures would be taken for the safety and security of those rendering humanitarian aid.⁴⁹

The representative of Australia welcomed the decision of the Government of Indonesia to invite a multinational force into East Timor. At the Secretary-General's request, his country was willing to accept the leadership of such a force. It also stood ready to assist in providing urgent humanitarian assistance and in the reconciliation process.⁵⁰

The representative of Finland, speaking on behalf of the European Union and the associated and aligned countries,⁵¹ welcomed the early decision by the Council to enable the rapid deployment of an international presence. He underlined that the attitude of the European Union towards Indonesia would depend on its full co-operation with the international force. In this context, he informed the Council that the European Union had agreed at its meeting on 13 September on an embargo on the export of arms, munitions and military equipment, a ban on the supply of equipment that might be used for internal repression or terrorism, and a suspension of bilateral military cooperation, for a period of four months. The European Union also called on Indonesia to allow the safe return of international humanitarian organizations and agencies to East Timor without delay.⁵²

The representative of Japan, while welcoming the establishment of a multinational force to restore peace and security in East Timor, further underlined his delegation's view that the immediate task in East Timor was threefold, namely that law and order in East Timor had to be quickly restored; and an appropriate environment, in which UNAMET could resume operations and humanitarian activities could be safely carried out, had to be established. With the acceptance of the Security Council resolution, Japan would continue to provide support and assistance to the political and humanitarian process of restoring peace in East Timor and to the implementation of the result of the ballot of 30 August. The representative further pointed out that, in pursuing the goal stipulated in the resolution, it needed to be borne in mind that Indonesia itself was at a precarious stage in its democratization process, which its Government and people were pursuing in the face of tremendous economic difficulties. It was important for the international community to keep this broader picture in mind as it continued to address this difficult issue.⁵³

The representative of New Zealand welcomed the adoption by the Council of the resolution authorizing the deployment of a multinational force to East Timor in response to the decision by the Government of Indonesia to invite an international peacekeeping presence through the United Nations. New Zealand had urged Indonesia to invite an international peacekeeping presence, as friend and regional partner, and was gratified by the response of the Indonesia Government. Welcoming the role of Australia in making the multinational force possible, he also wished to place on record that, while it had proved necessary at the time for the Council to establish a multinational force in view of the urgency of the situation, his country expected the early replacement of the multinational force by a United Nations peacekeeping operation, as envisaged in the resolution and the recommendations of the Secretary-General, as soon as possible.⁵⁴

On 4 October 1999, pursuant to resolution 1264 (1999), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in East Timor, providing the framework and concept of operations for the United Nations Transitional Administration in East Timor (UNTAET), and updating developments on the ground and UNAMET activities.⁵⁵ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the implementation of the Agreements of 5 May 1999 had been significantly affected by the violence and destruction that had engulfed East Timor following the announcement of the result of the popular consultation. Civil administration had collapsed and the judicial system had ceased to function. Moreover, there were no medical services, and hundreds of thousands of displaced persons were in dire need of emergency relief. Indonesia had already transferred the responsibility for law and order to the multinational force which, however, could not fill the vacuum in civil administration. He therefore recommended that the Council approve the establishment of UNTAET, with overall responsibility for the administration of East Timor during its transition to independence and empowered to exercise all legislative and executive authority, including the administration of justice.⁵⁶ The Transitional Administration would operate under the authority of the Council, vested in the Secretary-General and exercised by his Special Representative. It would provide security and maintain law and order throughout the Territory; establish an effective administration; assist in the development of civil and social services; ensure coordination and delivery of humanitarian, rehabilitation and development assistance; support capacity-building for self-government; and assist in the establishment of conditions for sustainable development. It would also establish a mechanism for consultation with Portugal, and organize consultations with Indonesia as necessary. Pending elections, the Special Representative would establish advisory bodies at all levels to ensure the participation of the people of East Timor in governance and administration. The Secretary-General further noted that a number of the tasks of UNTAET would be funded by voluntary contributions and a trust fund would be established for that purpose. He therefore called on Member States to contribute to the fund generously and on an urgent basis.

At its 4057th meeting, held on 25 October 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Russian Federation) invited the representatives of Australia, Finland, Indonesia, Japan, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal and the Republic of Korea, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution submitted by Argentina, Brazil, Canada, France, Namibia, the Netherlands, Portugal, the Russian Federation, Slovenia, the United Kingdom and the United States.⁵⁷ He also drew their attention to several other documents: a letter dated 21 September 1999 from the representative of Finland addressed to the Secretary-General, conveying the statement on East and West Timor issued on 21 September 1999 by the Presidency on behalf of the European Union, in which it welcomed the progress in the deployment of the international force in East Timor and commended the cooperation of the Government of Indonesia;⁵⁸ and letters dated 4 and 15 October 1999, respectively, from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Council, transmitting the first and second periodic reports by Australia on the operations of the International Force, East Timor (INTERFET).⁵⁹

At the same meeting, the representative of Portugal stated that the establishment of UNTAET was the culmination of a process of self-determination for which the people of East Timor and Portugal had fought very hard and for so long. He stressed that successful Transitional Administration would require close contact and constant coordination between UNTAET and the leadership of East Timor. He noted that East Timor was a non-self-governing territory whose privileges and rights accorded to it by Article 73 had been denied. This situation had to be reversed. In that context, he expressed support for the draft resolution to be adopted by the Council. To ensure that, not only the letter, but also the spirit of the Agreement and the resolutions were complied with in practice. The Council needed to guarantee: a rapid and effective transfer of power between INTERFET and UNTAET without disruption; full respect for the territorial integrity of East Timor; distribution of humanitarian assistance to those in need; and the security and safety of refugees in West Timor and other parts of Indonesia, in accordance with international humanitarian law. Finally, the Council also needed to ensure that Indonesia guaranteed that the territory of West Timor would not be used by the so-called militias as a platform to destabilize East Timor.⁶⁰

The representative of Indonesia stated that his country's responsibilities had begun more than two decades ago, when East Timor had been plunged into civil war. Abandoned by its former colonial Power after more than four centuries of colonial rule, the leaders of East Timor had appealed to Indonesia to accommodate the aspirations of the majority of its people. Through that act of integration with Indonesia, East Timor had set out on the challenging path to nation-building. Indonesia had accepted that solemn responsibility and additional burden, even though East Timor had not been part of the Dutch East Indies, out of which the nation of Indonesia had evolved. He noted that since 1983, Indonesia had been engaged in a tripartite dialogue with Portugal, under the auspices of the Secretary-General, to find a just, comprehensive and internationally acceptable solution to the question of East Timor. He affirmed that his Government had never wavered in its commitments to the people of East Timor. It had extended full cooperation to UNAMET and provided security personnel for the popular consultation in East Timor. When violence had erupted, the Government of Indonesia had immediately declared a state of emergency, thereby establishing a legal framework to enable the armed forces to take the necessary measures to restore law and order. Subsequently, following a reappraisal of the situation on the ground, it had invited the assistance of INTERFET to restore peace and security on the ground, to protect the people, and to implement the result of the popular consultation. His delegation rejected allegations that Indonesian armed forces were behind the recent incidents in East Timor. He also expressed deep concern at the "unverified" reports of human rights violations following the popular consultation. Referring to the draft resolution, he underlined that one of the most important tasks for UNTAET was to promote reconciliation among the people of East Timor, if East Timor was to become a viable independent nation. Given that there were two factions, it was essential for UNTAET to carry out its duties with impartiality.⁶¹

The representative of Australia emphasized that security had been restored to most of East Timor, humanitarian agencies were again able to conduct their work and the people of East Timor had begun to return to the homes from which they had been driven out. Her delegation commended the decision of the People's Consultative Assembly of Indonesia to revoke its 1978 decree incorporating East Timor into Indonesia, and hoped that such action would mark the beginning of a new relationship between the peoples of Indonesia and East Timor, as well as of reconciliation among the people of East Timor. Australia, as a neighbour of East Timor and a member of its region and the wider community, was committed to assisting UNTAET and the people of East Timor to prepare for independence and rebuild and develop the country. He stated that his country considered this to be a long-term regional and international responsibility.⁶²

The draft resolution was put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 1272 (1999), which reads as follows:

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous resolutions and the statements by its President on the situation in East Timor, in particular resolutions 384 (1975) of 22 December 1975, 389 (1976) of 22 April 1976, 1236 (1999) of 7 May 1999, 1246 (1999) of 11 June 1999, 1262 (1999) of 27 August 1999 and 1264 (1999) of 15 September 1999,

Reiterating its welcome for the successful conduct of the popular consultation of the East Timorese people of 30 August 1999, and taking note of its outcome through which the East Timorese people expressed their clear wish to begin a process of transition under the authority of the United Nations towards independence, which it regards as an accurate reflection of the views of the East Timorese people,

Welcoming the decision of the Indonesian People's Consultative Assembly on 19 October 1999 concerning East Timor, Stressing the importance of reconciliation among the East Timorese people,

Commending the United Nations Mission in East Timor for the admirable courage and determination shown in the implementation of its mandate,

Welcoming the deployment of a multinational force to East Timor pursuant to resolution 1264 (1999), and recognizing the importance of continued cooperation between the Government of Indonesia and the multinational force in this regard,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General of 4 October 1999, ⁶² Ibid., pp. 6-7.

Noting with satisfaction the successful outcome of the trilateral meeting held on 28 September 1999, as outlined in the report of the Secretary-General,

Deeply concerned by the grave humanitarian situation resulting from violence in East Timor and the large-scale displacement and relocation of East Timorese civilians, including large numbers of women and children,

Reaffirming the need for all parties to ensure that the rights of refugees and displaced persons are protected, and that they are able to return voluntarily in safety and security to their homes,

Reaffirming respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Indonesia,

Noting the importance of ensuring the security of the boundaries of East Timor, and noting in this regard the expressed intention of the Indonesian authorities to cooperate with the multinational force deployed pursuant to resolution 1264 (1999) and with a United Nations Transitional Administration in East Timor,

Expressing its concern at reports indicating that systematic, widespread and flagrant violations of international humanitarian and human rights law have been committed in East Timor, stressing that persons committing such violations bear individual responsibility, and calling on all parties to cooperate with investigations into these reports,

Recalling the relevant principles contained in the Convention on the Safety of United Nations and Associated Personnel adopted on 9 December 1994,

Determining that the continuing situation in East Timor constitutes a threat to peace and security,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

19. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Deliberations of 22 December 1999 (4085th meeting)

At its 4085th meeting, held on 22 December 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council continued consideration of the item on its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (United Kingdom) extended an invitation under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure to the Assistant Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations, to brief the Council on the situation in East Timor. He also drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 10 December 1999 addressed to him by the Secretary-General, transmitting the fifth periodic report from Australia on the operations of INTERFET.⁶³

The Assistant Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations stated that the situation in East Timor remained largely stable, despite isolated incidents against returning refugees. UNTAET military observers had been deployed throughout the territory and had set up posts on both sides of the border with West Timor to ensure liaison between INTERFET and the Indonesian armed forces and to facilitate the return of refugees. The transition from INTERFET to the United Nations would take place in February under an agreed concept that would ensure that a strong operational capacity would be maintained throughout. The humanitarian situation, although still very difficult, had also improved. Relations between UNTAET and the people of East Timor were very good. To that end, the Transitional Administration had established, in close cooperation with the people of East Timor, the National Consultative Commission of East Timor, chaired by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General. There were also positive prospects for national reconciliation. The establishment of good relations between East Timor and Indonesia was also high on the agenda of UNTAET, he said.⁶⁴

The representative of the United States noted that overall the United Nations operations and INTERFET were working quite well in a unique arrangement. She welcomed the recent meeting between the East Timor independence leader and the former pro-integrationist factions, and the militia's subsequent decision to lay down its weapons. She expressed concern, however, over the slowdown in the return of refugees, and noted that the Government of Indonesia must resettle those who opted to remain in that country. She also stressed that the International Commission of Inquiry on East Timor and the Indonesian commission on human rights must continue their investigations into the events in East Timor so that those responsible could be brought to justice.⁶⁵

Most speakers noted with satisfaction the improvement of the situation in East Timor and praised UNTAET, INTERFET and the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for their excellent work. They expressed concern, however, at the humanitarian situation, in particular the slowdown of the return of refugees and the need to ensure their safety and security. They welcomed the establishment of the National Consultative Commission of East Timor to strengthen the involvement and direct participation of the people of East Timor in decision-making; and supported the investigation process into the violations of human rights and humanitarian law so that those responsible would be brought to justice. Some speakers emphasized the importance of an early transition from INTERFET into a United Nations peacekeeping operation, so that its military component might be progressively reduced, as the people of East Timor moved towards self-government.⁶⁶

Responding to comments and questions raised, the Assistant Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations stated that, with regard to the decrease in the rate of return of refugees from West Timor, it could be attributable to a combination of factors: misinformation and intimidation by the militias; and widespread destruction of areas where they wished to return to. In addition, many of those who had voted for autonomy — over 20 per cent of the population — might be reluctant to return to East Timor at the present time. As for the strength of the United Nations peacekeeping forces, he noted that the security situation had improved thanks to INTERFET. If such a trend continued, the Secretary-General would undoubtedly reassess the situation and propose reductions as long as they could be safely undertaken.⁶⁷

22. The situation in Tajikistan and along the Tajik-Afghan border

Decision of 29 March 1996 (3646th meeting): statement by the President

On 22 March 1996, pursuant to paragraph 4 of resolution 1030 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on progress towards a comprehensive settlement of the conflict and on the operations of the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan (UNMOT).¹ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that although the beginning of the continuous inter-Tajik negotiations at Ashgabat had raised hopes for substantive progress towards a general peace agreement, in accordance with the provisions of the 17 August 1995 protocol, very little progress had been achieved. Unfortunately, the special session of the Tajik Parliament, which had the potential of becoming a turning-point in the process of national reconciliation, had not been attended by the opposition delegation. The Secretary-General expressed concern with the serious violations of the ceasefire by both sides and the grave difficulties that had been encountered with the extension of the Tehran ceasefire agreement of 17 September 1994.² He appealed to the leadership of the opposition to consider positively the proposal of the Government regarding the extension of the ceasefire agreement for the whole duration of the inter-Tajik negotiations. He also noted that he had been receiving alarming information on a deterioration of the humanitarian situation in Tajikistan.

At its 3646th meeting, held on 29 March 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Botswana), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Tajikistan, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

² Agreement on a Temporary Cease-fire and the Cessation of Other Hostile Acts on the Tajik-Afghan Border and within the Country for the Duration of the Talks (Tehran agreement) (S/1994/1102, annex I).

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:³

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 22 March 1996 on the situation in Tajikistan.

The Council regrets that insufficient progress has been achieved during the continual round of the inter-Tajik talks in Ashgabad towards the solution of fundamental political and institutional issues. It calls upon the Tajik parties to accelerate substantially their efforts to reach agreement on the basis of the protocol on the fundamental principles for establishing peace and national accord in Tajikistan of 17 August 1995. It urges them to negotiate constructively and in good faith and to search for solutions on the basis of mutual concessions and compromises.

The Council is deeply concerned about the violations of the Tehran ceasefire agreement of 17 September 1994, and in particular about the ongoing fighting in the Tavildara region. It appeals to the Tajik parties to comply strictly with all their obligations undertaken under this agreement. It reminds them that the mandate of the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan is subject to the proviso that the Tehran ceasefire agreement remains in force and the parties continue to be committed to an effective ceasefire, to national reconciliation and to the promotion of democracy. The Council notes with concern that the ongoing military operations and other violations of the ceasefire create doubt regarding the commitment of the parties to an effective ceasefire.

The Council acknowledges the extension of the ceasefire by the parties for a further period of three months until 26 May 1996. It is concerned, however, that the ceasefire has been extended for only this short period. The Council fully supports the appeal by the Secretary-General to the Tajik opposition contained in his report to agree to the extension of the ceasefire agreement for the duration of the inter-Tajik talks.

The Council reiterates the importance of direct political dialogue between the President of the Republic of Tajikistan and the leader of the Islamic Revival Movement of Tajikistan for the peace process and encourages them to hold the next meeting as soon as possible.

The Council welcomes the position of the Majlis-i Oli (Parliament) of Tajikistan which at its special session on 11 and 12 March 1996 expressed its strong support for the efforts to achieve national reconciliation and for the search for compromise at the inter-Tajik talks held under the auspices of the United Nations. It regrets that the leaders of the Islamic Revival Movement of Tajikistan declined to participate in the special session of the Majlis-i Oli.

The Council expresses its deep concern over the kidnapping on 24 February 1996 of the opposition co-chair of the Joint Commission and calls upon the Tajik Government to intensify its investigation into this incident. The Council joins the Secretary-General in calling upon the Government to provide the necessary security guarantees to allow the Joint Commission to function safely and effectively.

The Council expresses the hope that the agreement on social accord in Tajikistan signed on 9 March 1996 in Dushanbe by the leaders of Tajikistan and of political parties, social movements and ethnic communities will contribute to national reconciliation.

The Council expresses its serious concern at the deterioration of the humanitarian situation in Tajikistan. It calls upon Member States and others concerned to respond promptly in support of the humanitarian relief efforts of the United Nations and other international organizations.

The Council welcomes the positive role played by the Mission under difficult circumstances. The Council expresses deep concern over recent incidents in which Mission personnel were harassed and threatened and reiterates its call to the parties to cooperate fully with the Mission and to ensure the safety and freedom of movement of the personnel of the United Nations and other international organizations.

The Council is concerned about delays in the establishment of a liaison post of the Mission at Taloqan (northern Afghanistan) and encourages the relevant Afghan authorities to facilitate its opening.

The Council welcomes the creation of the office of an independent ombudsman for human rights in Tajikistan with the help of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe and expresses the hope that his activities will contribute to a lessening of tensions.

The Council commends the tireless efforts of the former Special Envoy of the Secretary-General in Tajikistan, Mr. Píriz-Ballón. It understands that his successor will be appointed promptly and expresses the hope that the new Special Envoy will begin without delay the preparation of the next phase of the continual round of the inter-Tajik talks which should be convened as soon as possible.

Decision of 21 May 1996 (3665th meeting):
statement by the President

By a letter dated 16 May 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴ the representative of Tajikistan transmitted an appeal dated 14 May 1996 from the President of the Republic of Tajikistan. In his appeal, the President of Tajikistan drew attention to the increasing deterioration in the social and political situation in certain regions of his country as a result of the obvious reluctance of the forces opposing the constitutional authorities to settle outstanding questions by peaceful means, particularly through the mechanism of the inter-Tajik talks which were being held under the auspices of the United Nations.

At its 3665th meeting, held on 21 May 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (China), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Tajikistan, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁵

The Security Council condemns the recent violations of the Tehran ceasefire agreement of 17 September 1994, in particular the planned and organized offensive by the armed Tajik opposition in the Tavildara region. It strongly deplors the loss of life of civilians and of members of the collective peacekeeping forces of the Commonwealth of Independent States as a result of acts of violence. It affirms that such acts are totally unacceptable.

The Council expresses its grave concern that all such actions further aggravate the already serious humanitarian situation in Tajikistan. It demands the immediate cessation of the offensive actions and acts of violence.

The Council reaffirms its commitment to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Tajikistan and to the inviolability of its borders.

The Council emphasizes its support for the extension of the ceasefire agreement for the whole duration of the inter-Tajik talks, and notes that the Islamic Revival Movement of Tajikistan has agreed to extend the ceasefire, albeit only for a further period of three months. It calls upon the parties to demonstrate their commitment to peace by strict compliance with the ceasefire and other obligations which they have assumed, as well as with the relevant resolutions of the Council. It also reminds the parties that the mandate of the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan is subject to the proviso that the ceasefire agreement remains in force and that the parties continue to be committed to an effective ceasefire, to national reconciliation and to the promotion of democracy.

The Council commends the personnel of the Mission for their contribution under difficult circumstances. It expresses its concern at the restrictions placed upon the Mission by the parties and calls upon them, in particular the Government of Tajikistan, to ensure the safety and freedom of movement of the personnel of the United Nations and other international organizations.

The Council calls upon both parties to resolve their differences over the functioning of the Joint Commission, including the issue of security guarantees for Commission members, and to recommence the operations of the Commission as soon as possible.

The Council is concerned that the worsening humanitarian situation makes it all the more urgent to obtain the required resources and calls upon Member States and others concerned to respond promptly in support of the humanitarian relief efforts of the United Nations and other international organizations.

The Council invites the Secretary-General and his Special Representative to continue their efforts aimed at the earliest possible resumption of the inter-Tajik talks and calls upon the countries and regional organizations acting as observers at those talks to render all possible support to those efforts.

Decision of 14 June 1996 (3673rd meeting): resolution 1061 (1996)

On 7 June 1996, pursuant to paragraph 4 of resolution 1030 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the progress towards a comprehensive political settlement of the conflict and on the operations of UNMOT.⁶ In his report, the Secretary-General expressed concern at the serious deterioration of the situation in Tajikistan since the end of the civil war of 1992. He had taken note of the conviction expressed by both parties that the conflict in Tajikistan could not be settled by military means and of their declared willingness to resume the inter-Tajik negotiations as soon as possible. He therefore recommended that the Security Council extend the mandate of UNMOT for a further period of six months. If at the end of the period, prospects had not improved, he would recommend that the Security Council review the United Nations commitment in Tajikistan. He stated that in the present circumstances, the first priority was the restoration of an effective ceasefire. He called upon the Afghan authorities and the United Tajik Opposition (UTO) to finalize arrangements that would permit the establishment of an additional liaison post at Taloqan.

At its 3673rd meeting, held on 14 June 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Egypt), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Tajikistan, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁷

The representative of Tajikistan stated his appreciation for the assistance of the international community in resolving the inter-Tajik conflict. He noted with satisfaction the existence of close and useful ties between UNMOT and the collective peacekeeping forces of the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS), as well as with the border forces in Tajikistan, which had clearly been an important factor in stabilizing the situation. He maintained that the unresolved conflict and its socio-economic consequences were a heavy burden on the shoulders of the long-suffering people of Tajikistan. In that connection, he reiterated that his Government was fully committed to a solely peaceful political solution to existing problems and firmly favoured the continuation of the inter-Tajik talks under the aegis of the United Nations, despite their relatively meager results so far, for which the government delegation was not to blame. He stressed that his Government was closely cooperating with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and with UNMOT, and was also taking additional steps to establish civil peace and accord in the country. He pointed out that the irreconcilable armed wing of the opposition was inclined to pursue its policy of exerting continuous armed pressure on the Government. Those forces continued to make a wide use of the tactics of terrorism and intimidation and to systematically and flagrantly violate the Agreement on a Temporary Ceasefire and the Cessation of Other Hostile Acts on the Tajik-Afghan Border and within the Country for the Duration of Talks. The Security Council rightly condemned the planned and organized offensive acts of the armed Tajik opposition, which had caused many casualties among the civilian population. He stressed that despite the intensive humanitarian support of the international community, the situation remained critical. Finally, he reaffirmed that the Government of Tajikistan would welcome a decision by the Security Council to extend the mandate of UNMOT as it promoted stability and the continuation of the peace process as a whole.⁸

The representative of Italy, speaking on behalf of the European Union and the associated and aligned countries,⁹ noted that the Security Council had closely monitored the situation in Tajikistan and had expressed its great concern at the worsening of conditions on the ground. Military activities by the opposition and, more recently, by the Government had shown that the ceasefire was at best frail and subject to large-scale violations. The political stalemate in the inter-Tajik dialogue following the Ashgabat talks had been blamed on the loss of trust between the parties. Some of the elements involved were the attitude of the opposition in the negotiations and in the field; and the lack of adequate written safety guarantees given by the Government to opposition members on the Joint Commission. He stressed that a solution to the conflict could only be achieved through the inter-Tajik dialogue. The parties needed to respect obligations undertaken as the international community could not continue to provide support and commitment without a much greater level of cooperation from the parties themselves. While the European Union supported the Secretary-General's recommendation to extend the mandate of UNMOT, it remained concerned that delays in implementing an effective ceasefire might create a situation in which direct United Nations involvement after the six-month period would not be advisable. Further delays in reaching a significant outcome in the inter-Tajik dialogue might prejudice not only the momentum in the negotiations that the United Nations was trying to maintain, but also the financial support badly needed by a population and a country so much afflicted by the crisis.

The representative of Germany stated that the meeting of the Security Council had provided an important opportunity to take stock of what had been achieved by the efforts of the parties to the conflict, the Council, the Secretary-General and other States and entities involved. The result was that there was still intensive fighting in the Tavildara area, the humanitarian situation was very serious and the prospects for progress in the inter-Tajik talks were bleak. The armed Islamist opposition seemed to be about to take control of a large and strategically important part of Tajikistan. The region of Leninabad and other areas were gradually slipping from Government control. There were even some signs of disunity within the Kulyabi-dominated Government. His delegation, therefore, saw a concrete danger of an “Afghanization” of the conflict, with serious consequences for regional stability. He stressed that both parties bore a heavy load of responsibility for that development. Germany, however, saw a major obstacle to a settlement in the Government’s failure to open itself up to the participation of other regional and political groups in Tajikistan. A viable political compromise could not consist only of power-sharing between the parties to the conflict, but had to aim at establishing genuine democratic decision-making processes. While noting that Germany supported the draft resolution, he stressed the importance of the intention to seriously review the future of the United Nations commitment in Tajikistan after the six months, if there was no meaningful progress in the peace process.¹⁰

The representative of the Russian Federation expressed extreme concern at the lack of progress towards a political settlement of the conflict in Tajikistan and by the wide-scale hostilities in the Tavildara region. The Tajik parties needed to reaffirm their declared dedication solely to a peaceful political settlement of the conflict on the basis of mutual concessions and compromises. His delegation was firmly convinced that only full and unswerving implementation by the parties of all the commitments they had undertaken and of Security Council resolutions could create the requisite conditions for successful progress in the negotiating process. He firmly condemned the terrorist acts against the civilian population and the CIS peacekeeping forces. He stated that his country was in favour of making the inter-Tajik dialogue truly continuous and dynamic and called upon the parties to take a responsible attitude towards their participation and to demonstrate the political will to achieve compromise solutions to key problems in the settlement. The delegation of the Russian Federation attached great importance to the extension of the mandate of UNMOT, whose activities were an important factor for restraint and stabilizations and provided indispensable support for constructive political dialogue. The collective peacekeeping forces of CIS and the border forces of the Russian Federation would continue to support the efforts of the Mission in implementing its mandate.¹¹

The representative of China reiterated that the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Tajikistan needed to be respected. The basic approach to settling the question of Tajikistan was for the parties concerned to resolve their differences through peaceful negotiations and to achieve national reconciliation. He endorsed the recommendation of the Secretary-General that UNMOT needed to be maintained in the current circumstances.¹²

Several other speakers expressed concern at the situation, and, while expressing support for the extension of UNMOT, stressed that the extension of the mandate was contingent on an effective ceasefire, progress in the peace talks and the parties respecting the Tehran agreement.¹³

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1061 (1996) which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions and the statements by its President,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 7 June 1996,

13. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States expressed concern about the deterioration of the military situation in Tajikistan and the continued lack of progress in the United Nations-mediated inter-Tajik talks. The two sides continued to profess their commitment to the standing ceasefire but, in practice, had reinforced their troops, conducted offensives and counter-offensives and had shown little inclination to end the dangerous spiral. There had also been reports that areas of northern Afghanistan had been bombed or shelled in recent months, apparently in connection with the Tajik conflict. One key step towards national reconciliation would be resumption of the operations of the Joint Commission for monitoring the ceasefire accord. He stated that the two sides also needed to abide by their commitment to allow UNMOT observers freedom of movement and unfettered access to areas where ceasefire violations might have occurred. Finally, he underlined his Government's strong endorsement of the passage in the resolution calling for a review of the future of UNMOT in

Tajikistan should prospects for the peace process not improve during the mandate period.¹⁴

Decision of 20 September 1996 (3696th meeting): statement by the President

On 13 September 1996, pursuant to paragraph 10 of resolution 1061 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the progress towards a comprehensive political settlement of the conflict and on the operations of UNMOT.¹⁵ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the situation in Tajikistan had deteriorated and the agreements reached in Ashgabat had not been implemented. In addition to the heavy fighting in the Tavildara sector, military confrontations had intensified in the Karategin valley and the Garm district, and a tense situation existed on the Tajik-Afghan border. The activities of UNMOT had been impeded by restrictions on the freedom of movement of the military observers. Those developments, which contradicted the stated intentions of the Tajik parties to resolve the conflict through political means, were a cause of serious concern. He stressed that it was imperative to resume the political dialogue. In response to the acute crisis of the people of Tajikistan, the Secretary-General informed the Council that he had asked the Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs to arrange for an inter-agency mission to Tajikistan to help determine how the United Nations system might respond most effectively to the situation.

At its 3696th meeting, held on 20 September 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 8 August 1996 from the representative of the Russian Federation addressed to the Secretary-General,¹⁶ which proposed the convening of a meeting of representatives of the Russian Federation, Tajikistan and Afghanistan to work out urgent measures for building confidence and promoting security; and a letter dated 9 August 1996 from the representative of Tajikistan addressed to the Secretary-General, expressing concern at the escalation of armed confrontation in the areas adjacent to the Tajik-Afghan border.¹⁷

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁸

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 13 September 1996 on the situation in Tajikistan.

The Council expresses its concern at the deterioration of the situation in Tajikistan and at the increasing tension along the Tajik-Afghan border. It reaffirms its commitment to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Tajikistan and to the inviolability of its borders.

The Council is also concerned about the violations of the Tehran ceasefire agreement of 17 September 1994 and about the failure of both parties to implement the Ashgabat agreements. It is, in particular, concerned about the ongoing fighting in the Tavildara region and the seizure of the towns of Jirgatal and Tajikabad by the opposition. The Council demands the immediate cessation of all hostilities and acts of violence.

The Council recalls the commitments made by the Government of Tajikistan and by the leadership of the United Tajik Opposition to resolve the conflict and to achieve national reconciliation through peaceful means. It regrets that these commitments have so far not been honoured.

The Council commends the efforts of the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan and urgently calls upon the parties to cooperate fully with the Mission and to ensure the safety of the personnel of the United Nations and other international organizations. The Council also calls upon the parties to lift all restrictions on the freedom of movement of Mission personnel. In this connection it is concerned about the large-scale use of landmines owing to the threat it creates for the population and Mission personnel.

The Council welcomes the initiative of the Secretary-General to arrange for an inter-agency mission to Tajikistan to determine how to respond most effectively to the humanitarian situation.

The Council welcomes the renewed work of the Joint Commission and the results of its efforts in reducing tensions in the Garm region and in the Karategin valley.

The Council emphasizes that the primary responsibility for resolving their differences rests with the Tajik parties themselves. It recalls paragraphs 3 and 4 of its resolution 1061 (1996) of 14 June 1996.

The Council commends the efforts of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and calls upon the parties to cooperate fully with him in resuming the inter-Tajik talks. The Council reiterates the importance of the continuation of direct political dialogue between the President of the Republic of Tajikistan and the leader of the United Tajik Opposition for the peace process and encourages them to hold their next meeting as soon as possible.

Decision of 13 December 1996 (3724th meeting):

On 5 December 1996, pursuant to paragraph 10 of resolution 1061 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the progress towards a comprehensive political settlement of the conflict and on the operations of UNMOT.¹⁹ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the overall situation in Tajikistan had deteriorated and the ceasefire had been frequently violated by both sides. However, he had taken note of the readiness of the Tajik parties to meet in Northern Afghanistan and Moscow by the end of the year. He welcomed those plans and expressed hope that the progress made in the latest rounds of preparatory talks in Tehran would be given substance in an agreement, which could give much-needed impetus to the negotiating process. In that context he recommended that the Security Council extend the mandate of UNMOT for a further period of six months.

At its 3724th meeting, held on 13 December 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Italy), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Tajikistan, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.²⁰ The President also drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 4 December 1996 from the representative of Tajikistan addressed to the Secretary-General, reporting that armed formations of the Tajik opposition had attacked the town of Garm causing casualties amongst the civilian population.²¹

The representative of Tajikistan expressed gratitude to the United Nations, the Organization for

Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE), the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC), States acting as observers of the inter-Tajik talks and the Russian Federation, which had contributed the core of the collective peacekeeping forces. Those forces also included the participation of military contingents from Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan and Kyrgyzstan, which were carrying out the difficult task of preventing the unsealing of the southern border of CIS. That task remained pressing, as the situation along the Tajik-Afghan border was considered to be tense, and the groups of fighters of the irreconcilable wing of the armed Tajik opposition, which included a significant number of foreign mercenaries, regularly attempted to make their way from Afghan territory into Tajikistan. He welcomed the resumption of the activity of UNMOT and hoped that there would be cooperation in verifying compliance with the agreements that had been achieved. For its part, the Government of Tajikistan would continue, firmly and consistently, to follow the path of the peace process. Finally, he stated that Tajikistan would welcome the decision of the Security Council to extend the mandate of UNMOT.²²

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the draft resolution reflected the profound concern of the Council over the acute deterioration of the situation in Tajikistan as a result of the offensive actions of the opposition in the Garm region and over the continuing stagnation in the inter-Tajik talks caused by the unconstructive policy of the opposition leaders. The Russian Federation condemned the continuing terrorist acts in Dushanbe aimed at the peaceful population, the military personnel of CIS peacekeeping forces and the border forces of the Russian Federation. It also condemned the gross mistreatment of the United Nations observers at the hands of both the government personnel and the fighters of the opposition. The Russian Federation was firmly convinced that only the rejection of force as a solution to the Tajik problem, the sincere implementation of the commitments made by the sides and their readiness to make mutual concessions and compromises would allow progress to be made. He concluded by stating that his country intended to comprehensively strengthen further

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1089 (1996), which reads:

Decision of 7 February 1997 (3739th meeting):
statement by the President

On 21 January 1997, the Secretary-General submitted a report on the issue of compliance by the parties with the provisions of the ceasefire agreement and on possible results of the meeting between the parties.²⁴ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that the agreement reached in Moscow had broken the long impasse that had existed between the parties on the main political issues and represented a qualitative change for the better. Nevertheless, the situation in Tajikistan remained extremely fluid. He stated that the agreements reached between the two sides entailed new tasks for UNMOT. With reference to paragraph 6 of resolution 1089 (1996) of 13 December 1996, the Secretary-General was recommending no changes in the nature and size of the United Nations presence in Tajikistan at that stage, although he would keep the situation under review and revert to the Council in due course.

At its 3739th meeting, held on 7 February 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Kenya), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Tajikistan, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to the following documents: a letter dated 23 December 1996 from the representative of Ukraine addressed to the President of the Security Council;²⁵ a letter dated 24 December 1996 from the representative of the Russian Federation addressed to the Secretary-General;²⁶ a letter dated 24 December 1996 from the representatives of the Islamic Republic of Iran and the Russian Federation addressed to the Secretary-General;²⁷ and a letter dated 17 January 1997 from the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran addressed to the Secretary-General.²⁸

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council.²⁹

The Security Council has considered the progress report of the Secretary-General of 21 January 1997 on the situation in Tajikistan, submitted pursuant to paragraph 6 of Council resolution 1089 (1996) of 13 December 1996.

The Council welcomes the signing in Moscow on 23 December 1996 by the President of Tajikistan and the leader of the United Tajik Opposition of the agreement, including the protocol on the Commission on National Reconciliation, and notes the progress made in the inter-Tajik talks in Tehran in particular the signing of the protocol on refugees. It believes that these agreements, provided they are carried out as written, represent a qualitative change for the better and give a new impetus to efforts aimed at achieving national reconciliation. The Council urges the parties to honour and implement consistently and in good faith the agreements already reached, in particular in the course of negotiating future agreements. It also urges them to make further substantive progress at the next rounds of the inter-Tajik talks.

The Council notes with satisfaction that the ceasefire has been generally observed by the parties since December 1996 and calls upon them to maintain it scrupulously for the whole duration of the inter-Tajik talks in accordance with their obligations and commitments.

²⁷ Letter transmitting the text of a joint statement of the Islamic Republic of Iran and the Russian Federation on Tajikistan adopted at the talks in Tehran on 22 and 23 December 1996 between the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Islamic Republic of Iran and the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Russian Federation (S/1996/1071).

²⁸ Letter transmitting the text of the Protocol on refugees, signed in Tehran on 13 January 1997 by the heads of the delegation of the Government of the Republic of Tajikistan and of the United Tajik Opposition in the presence of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General of the United Nations (S/1997/55).

The Council commends the efforts of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and calls upon the parties to cooperate fully with him in continuing the inter-Tajik talks. The Council also commends the efforts of the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan in fulfilling its mandate.

The Council calls upon the parties to ensure the safety and the freedom of movement of the personnel of the United Nations, the collective peacekeeping forces of the Commonwealth of Independent States and other international personnel in Tajikistan.

The Council strongly condemns the attacks on and kidnapping of international personnel, in particular personnel of the Mission, the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and the International Committee of the Red Cross and others, and demands the immediate release of all those taken hostage. It stresses the inadmissibility of kidnapping and any other mistreatment of United Nations personnel and supports the efforts of the Secretary-General to ensure that the essential security requirements of the Mission are met.

In this context, the Council expresses satisfaction at the efforts by and cooperation between the Mission, the Russian Federation and the parties to resolve the hostage crisis.

The Council considers it necessary for the United Nations to continue its vigorous support for the political process in Tajikistan. It takes note of the request from the parties to the Mission to extend the necessary assistance in the implementation of the Moscow agreement and to cooperate closely with the Commission on National Reconciliation in its activities. The Council accepts the recommendation of the Secretary-General not to change the nature and size of the United Nations presence in Tajikistan at this stage. It requests the Secretary-General to keep the situation under review and to submit in due course his recommendations with regard to the United Nations presence in Tajikistan in the light of the progress in implementation of the inter-Tajik agreements and bearing in mind the request for assistance by the parties contained in the Moscow agreement and the tasks and functions that would be required to provide such assistance.

The Council expresses deep concern over the deteriorating humanitarian situation in Tajikistan and calls for continuing emergency relief, including assistance for the return of refugees, in the context of the implementation of the protocol on refugees, and support to Tajikistan for rehabilitation, aimed at mitigation of the consequences of the war and reconstruction of its economy.

Decision of 14 March 1997 (3752nd meeting):

On 5 March 1997, pursuant to resolution 1089 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the progress towards a comprehensive political settlement of the conflict and on the operations of UNMOT.³⁰ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that the documents agreed at Mashhad on the settlement of the military and political situation in the areas of confrontation; the Moscow agreement and protocol of 23 December 1996; and the Tehran protocol of 13 February 1997 on refugees, had been significant steps on the difficult path from armed conflict to normal peaceful political competition. As a result, the negotiating process had acquired a strong momentum. At the same time, he had been profoundly disturbed at the threat to the personnel of the United Nations and he had therefore decided, so long as the situation in Tajikistan continued in a state of flux and international personnel were at particular risk, to maintain for the time being the suspension of United Nations activities in Tajikistan, except for a limited UNMOT presence. He therefore recommended that the Security Council extend the mandate of UNMOT for a period of three months only, until June 1997, on the understanding that he would be keeping the Council informed of any significant developments.

At its 3752nd meeting, held on 14 March 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Poland), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Tajikistan, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.³¹ The President further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 24 February 1997 from the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General;³² and a letter dated 10 March 1997 from the representative of the Russian Federation addressed to the Secretary-General.³³

The representative of Tajikistan stated that the restoration of peace, stability and civil harmony in Tajikistan had been and continued to be the central task with which his Government had been dealing. Active progress had been to a large extent possible thanks to the sincere support and assistance of the Russian Federation, the Islamic Republic of Iran, the observer States and international organizations, to which his Government would like to express its sincere gratitude. He stated that the March agreements in Moscow had opened the door to a new, final stage of inter-Tajik political dialogue. A very important stage lay before them: the consistent and steadfast implementation of the agreements. He expressed hope that the Secretary-General would offer his good offices to achieve a full and effective implementation of the agreements signed. In that connection, he would welcome a decision by the Council to extend the mandate of UNMOT.³⁴

The representative of the Russian Federation noted that the peaceful settlement process in Tajikistan had become increasingly irreversible. An important step in the Tajik settlement had been the signing of the Protocol on Military Issues and the joint statement on the outcome of the Moscow round of inter-Tajik talks. His delegation attached particular significance to an early elaboration by the United Nations of the parameters of its contribution to the achievement of the inter-Tajik agreements so that it could render speedy assistance in the implementation of those agreements immediately after their entry into force. He considered central to the draft resolution before them those provisions in which the Security Council welcomed the inter-Tajik agreements and expressed its intention to consider the Secretary-General's recommendations on the ways in which the United Nations could assist in their implementation in accordance with the requests of the parties. He reiterated that the Russian Federation, in cooperation with the United Nations, OSCE, the observer countries at the negotiations and all interested States, were actively promoting consistent progress in the inter-Tajik negotiating process and a final agreement on national reconciliation in Tajikistan.³⁵

The representative of the United States congratulated the parties on their accomplishments and at the same time urged them to complete successfully the difficult task of negotiating peace for their country. In contrast to those successes, however, he stressed that the security threat to international personnel had hindered the ability of the international community to assist the parties in their quest. Those threats had forced the Secretary-General to suspend United Nations activities in Tajikistan to the real detriment of the people of Tajikistan. He underscored that the situation needed to be resolved immediately. His country could not in good conscience condone the return of all UNMOT personnel to Tajikistan or another extension of its mandate until it was clear that the personnel would be able to carry out their mandate free of threats.³⁶

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1099 (1997) which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions and the statements by its President,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 5 March 1997,

Reaffirming its commitment to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Tajikistan and to the inviolability of its borders,

Welcoming the agreements signed by the President of Tajikistan and the leader of the United Tajik Opposition since December 1996, by which the efforts towards national reconciliation have made important progress and gained strong momentum, noting with satisfaction the personal contribution made in this respect by the President of Tajikistan and the leader of the United Tajik Opposition, with the assistance of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative, and encouraging the parties to continue their efforts to this end,

Welcoming, in particular, the results of the latest round of inter-Tajik talks held in Moscow from 26 February to 8 March 1997, including the signing of the protocol on military issues, which contains agreements on reintegration, disarmament and disbandment of the armed units of the United Tajik Opposition, reforming the power structures of the Republic of Tajikistan and a detailed timetable for their implementation,

Taking note of the requests of the parties, contained in the statute of the Commission on National Reconciliation and in the protocol on military issues, for the assistance of the United Nations in the full and effective implementation of those agreements,

Gravely concerned about the worsening humanitarian situation in Tajikistan,

Deeply concerned about continuing attacks on the personnel of the United Nations, the collective peacekeeping forces of the Commonwealth of Independent States and other international personnel in Tajikistan, and deploring the deterioration in the security situation which necessitated the decision of the Secretary-General to suspend the United Nations activities in Tajikistan, except for a limited presence of the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan,

1. Expresses its appreciation for the report of the Secretary-General of 5 March 1997;

2. Welcomes the agreements reached by the parties since December 1996, in particular the protocol on military issues, which represents an important new step towards the successful completion of the task of national reconciliation in Tajikistan, and calls upon the parties to honour and implement consistently and in good faith those agreements, as well as to make further substantive progress in the next rounds of the inter-Tajik talks;

3. Expresses its satisfaction that the ceasefire has been generally observed by the parties since December 1996, and calls upon the parties to maintain it scrupulously for the whole duration of the inter-Tajik talks, in accordance with their obligations and commitments;

4. Strongly condemns the acts of mistreatment against personnel of the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan and other international personnel, and urgently calls upon the parties to cooperate in bringing the perpetrators to justice, to ensure the safety and freedom of movement of the personnel of the United Nations, the collective peacekeeping forces of the Commonwealth of Independent States and other international personnel, and to cooperate fully with the Mission;

5. Calls upon the Government of Tajikistan, in particular, to take further, more rigorous security measures to this end, thus enabling the international community vigorously to support Tajikistan on its difficult path from armed conflict to normal peaceful life;

6. Decides to extend the mandate of the Mission until 15 June 1997, subject to the proviso that the Tehran agreement remains in force and the parties demonstrate their commitment to the agreements already reached, and further decides that this mandate will remain in effect until that date unless the Secretary-General reports to the Council that these conditions have not been met;

7. Welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to inform the Council of any significant developments with regard to the situation in Tajikistan, in particular of a decision to resume all those United Nations activities presently suspended, including those of the Mission;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to inform the Council by 30 April 1997 on possible ways and means by which the United Nations could assist in the implementation of the protocol on military issues;

9. Also requests the Secretary-General to submit a report on the situation in Tajikistan to the Council no later than 1 June 1997, including recommendations on the United Nations presence in Tajikistan, in particular the manner in which the United Nations can assist in the implementation of the inter-Tajik agreements, based on the requests by the parties contained in those agreements and in the light of the security situation;

10. Commends the efforts of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and of the personnel of the Mission, and calls upon the parties to cooperate fully with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General in conducting the inter-Tajik talks in order to achieve a comprehensive political settlement;

11. Calls upon Member States and others concerned to respond promptly and generously to the consolidated interagency donor alert on urgent humanitarian needs for the period from 1 December 1996 to 31 May 1997, launched by the Secretary-General, and to offer support to Tajikistan for rehabilitation, aimed at mitigation of the consequences of the war and reconstruction of its economy;

12. Encourages Member States to contribute to the voluntary fund established by the Secretary-General in accordance with its resolution 968 (1994) of 16 December 1994;

13. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 12 June 1997 (3788th meeting): resolution 1113 (1997)

On 30 May 1997, pursuant to resolution 1099 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in Tajikistan, including the United Nations presence in the country and the manner in which it could assist in the implementation of the inter-Tajik agreements.³⁷ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the signing of the protocol on guarantees at Tehran on 28 May 1997 completed the series of agreements to be concluded by the parties. The determination and effort invested by the United Nations in those negotiations had been rewarded by success. The Commission on National Reconciliation would be the principal implementing body for the transition period leading to general elections. However, the agreements foresaw the support and assistance of the international community and gave the United Nations a leading role in that regard. In addition, OSCE was to assist in the development of democratic political and legal institutions and processes; and the Collective Peacekeeping Forces of CIS had been requested to escort, under the supervision of UNMOT, the personnel, weapons and ammunition of the United Tajik Opposition from the Tajik-Afghan border to the designated assembly areas. The Mission was to continue to monitor the ceasefire agreement and to monitor the process of reintegration, disarmament and disbandment. The Secretary-General pointed out to the Council that those tasks were not fully covered by the present mandate of UNMOT, nor did UNMOT have the capacity to perform them. To fulfil the tasks envisaged, the mandate would require amendment and its civilian component would need to be strengthened and the number of military observers significantly increased. He recommended that the Security Council extend the mandate of UNMOT for a period of three months, until 15 September 1997.

At its 3788th meeting, held on 12 June 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Russian Federation), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Tajikistan, at his request, to participate in the discussion, without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.³⁸

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 20 May 1997 from the representative of Kyrgyzstan addressed to the Secretary-General,³⁹ and a letter dated 28 May 1997 from the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran addressed to the Secretary-General.⁴⁰

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1113 (1997). The resolution reads as follows:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions and the statements by its President,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 30 May 1997 on the situation in Tajikistan,

Reaffirming its commitment to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Tajikistan and to the inviolability of its borders,

Welcoming the signing by the Government of the Republic of Tajikistan and the United Tajik Opposition in Moscow on 8 March 1997 of the protocol on military issues, in Bishkek on 18 May 1997 of the protocol on political questions and in Tehran on 28 May 1997 of the protocol on the guarantees of implementation of the general agreement on the establishment of peace and national accord in Tajikistan,

Noting that those agreements foresee the support and assistance of the international community, in particular the United Nations, in different aspects of their implementation,

Expressing concern that the security situation in Tajikistan remains precarious and that the humanitarian situation has continued to deteriorate,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 30 May 1997;

2. Calls upon the parties to implement fully the agreements reached in the course of the inter-Tajik talks, and encourages them to sign the general agreement on the establishment of peace and national accord in Tajikistan as a matter of priority;

3. Emphasizes that the implementation of the agreements reached in the course of the inter-Tajik talks will require the consistent good faith and constant effort of the parties, as well as the sustained and vigorous support of the United Nations and the international community;

4. Calls upon the parties to cooperate further in ensuring the safety and freedom of movement of the personnel of the United Nations, the collective peacekeeping forces of the Commonwealth of Independent States and other international personnel;

5. Commends the efforts of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and of the personnel of the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan, and calls upon the parties to cooperate fully with them;

6. Decides to extend the mandate of the Mission for a period of three months until 15 September 1997;

Decision of 12 September 1997 (3816th meeting): resolution 1128 (1997)

On 4 September 1997, pursuant to resolution 1113 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on developments in Tajikistan with recommendations on the role of the United Nations in support of the implementation of the inter-Tajik agreements and the adjustment of the mandate and strength of UNMOT.⁴¹ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the situation in the country remained fluid and the hostilities within the government camp and between government forces and certain UTO groups indicated how much was yet to be achieved. He recommended that the Security Council expand the mandate of UNMOT and authorize the strengthening of the Mission. He also recommended that the new mandate be authorized for an initial period of six months.

At its 3816th meeting, held on 12 September 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United States), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Tajikistan, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁴² The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1128 (1997), which reads:

Welcoming the successful conclusion of the inter-Tajik talks, conducted under United Nations auspices since 1994, with the signing by the President of Tajikistan and the leader of the United Tajik Opposition in Moscow on 27 June 1997 of the General Agreement on the Establishment of Peace and National Accord in Tajikistan,

Noting that the implementation of the General Agreement will require the consistent good faith and constant effort of the parties, as well as the sustained and vigorous support of the United Nations and the international community,

Taking note with appreciation of the readiness of the collective peacekeeping forces of the Commonwealth of Independent States to assist in providing security for United Nations personnel at the request of the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan and with the agreement of the parties,

Expressing concern that the security situation in Tajikistan remains volatile,

2. Takes note of the recommendations on the expansion of the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan, contained in the report of the Secretary-General;

Decision of 14 November 1997 (3833rd meeting): resolution 1138 (1997)

On 5 November 1997, pursuant to resolution 1128 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the progress made towards a comprehensive political settlement of the conflict and on the operations of UNMOT.⁴³ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that the main development had been the convening of the Commission on National Reconciliation and the progress achieved on a number of fronts, including the exchange of prisoners of war and detainees, the registration of UTO fighters inside Tajikistan and the repatriation of refugees from Afghanistan. Both the Government and UTO had made serious efforts to carry out their commitments under the General Agreement on the Establishment of Peace and National Accord in Tajikistan (the General Agreement) and their representatives to the Commission had cooperated. While the pace at which the implementation of the peace agreement had progressed had lagged behind the ambitious timetable envisaged in the agreement, it was still possible to complete the process in the course of 1998. He noted that the ceasefire between the Government and UTO had been firmly maintained, although the level of violence had continued to be high in the central part of the country. Therefore, the safety of United Nations personnel would remain an important concern and the decision of CIS to authorize its peacekeeping force in Tajikistan to provide security to the United Nations on request provided a most welcome additional reassurance. The Secretary-General recommended that the Security Council expand the mandate of UNMOT, in accordance with the proposals he had submitted.

At its 3833rd meeting, held on 14 November 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (China), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Tajikistan, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁴⁴ The President also drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 17 October 1997 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council.⁴⁵

The representative of Tajikistan stated that expanding the mandate of UNMOT would definitely mark the beginning of a qualitatively new stage in the practical implementation of the General Agreement. He thanked the Security Council for its constant attention to the situation in Tajikistan and on the Tajik-Afghan border. Resolutions of the Security Council and statements of its Presidents had had a decisive impact on resolving the inter-Tajik conflict by stressing the main responsibility of the Council for the maintenance of international peace and security, pursuant to the Charter of the United Nations. The Council's authority had been enhanced by the individual efforts of a number of members who had sought to move the peace process in Tajikistan forward. He also expressed gratitude to the Russian Federation and the Islamic Republic of Iran, which had played an exceptionally important role in promoting and successfully concluding the inter-Tajik talks, and for their having provided substantial assistance in the post-conflict period.⁴⁶

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the signing of the General Agreement and the start of the work of the Commission on National Reconciliation had opened prospects for overcoming the political and military confrontation and for the achievement of peace and national reconciliation in

Tajikistan. It was important that the Security Council had achieved agreement on the need to help to consolidate that trend and to show solidarity with the Tajik people, who needed emergency assistance. He stated that the establishment of stable peace and national reconciliation in Tajikistan was important for the Central Asian region and beyond, and it would help the efforts of the international community to combat the drugs trade, terrorism and arms smuggling.⁴⁷

The representative of the United States expressed support for the expansion of UNMOT at a critical time in the peace process so that the parties could demobilize rapidly and turn their efforts towards rebuilding Tajikistan. He noted that the road ahead would be difficult because of the proliferation of armed groups beyond the control of the parties that threatened the security and tranquillity of Tajikistan.⁴⁸

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that his delegation was encouraged by the progress which had been reported by the Secretary-General in the implementation of the General Agreement. He noted that his delegation considered the exchange of prisoners of war and the process for the return of refugees as particularly important and urgent items. He commended the parties in Tajikistan for their commitment to the peace process and urged them to continue to cooperate with each other and with the United Nations to ensure rapid progress on what was an ambitious timetable. He noted that, while his delegation accepted the recommendations for an expansion of UNMOT and would vote in favour of the draft resolution in Tajikistan, it remained concerned about the security situation in Tajikistan.⁴⁹

The representative of France maintained that the United Nations needed to help the Tajiks restore peace to their country and rebuild it. The maintenance of international peace and security had never been risk free; the United Nations needed to shoulder its responsibilities, because a lack of support from the Organization could hamper the rapid and complete implementation of the General Agreement.⁵⁰

The representative of China stated that, as a neighbour of Tajikistan, China welcomed the General

Agreement, signed by the two parties in Tajikistan, as well as the stabilization of the overall situation. His delegation believed that the recommendation of the Secretary-General for the extension of the mandate of UNMOT and its expansion was in conformity with the wishes of the parties concerned and was conducive to the implementation of the General Agreement, and would, therefore, vote in favour of the draft resolution. He expressed hope that through the common efforts of the parties concerned and the help of the international community, Tajikistan could achieve sustained stability and economic development.⁵¹

A number of other speakers expressed support for the draft resolution and the expansion of the mandate of UNMOT.⁵²

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1138 (1997), which reads:

Decision of 24 February 1998 (3856th meeting): statement by the President

On 10 February 1998, pursuant to resolution 1138 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the developments in Tajikistan and on the activities of UNMOT.⁵³ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that work on the implementation of the General Agreement had continued at a slow pace.

He expressed hope that there would be practical work and tangible progress on such matters as the reintegration of UTO fighters and the revision of the Constitution and adoption of new laws. He would also encourage the Commission on National Reconciliation to launch the broad dialogue among the various political forces, including those not represented on the Commission, as foreseen in the General Agreement. He noted that for the United Nations, safety of its personnel had continued to be a major preoccupation. Security in Tajikistan had been precarious and was likely to remain so for the foreseeable future. The United Nations needed to seek to limit the risks for its personnel to the extent possible. He had outlined the simple practical steps that needed to be taken in that regard and for which the United Nations needed to rely on the cooperation of the Tajik authorities, and he trusted that they understood the importance of this and would accord it the highest priority.

At its 3856th meeting, held on 24 February 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Gabon), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Tajikistan, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁵⁴

The Security Council has considered the progress report of the Secretary-General of 10 February 1998 on the situation in Tajikistan, submitted pursuant to paragraph 12 of its resolution 1138 (1997) of 14 November 1997.

The Council regrets that during the last three months work on the implementation of the General Agreement on the Establishment of Peace and National Accord in Tajikistan and the relevant activities of the Commission on National Reconciliation have proceeded very slowly. It welcomes recent efforts made by the parties in order to fulfil their obligations. The Council calls upon them to intensify their efforts to implement fully the General Agreement, including the protocol on military issues. It also encourages the Commission on National Reconciliation to continue its efforts aimed at the institution of a broad dialogue among the various political forces, as foreseen in the General Agreement.

The Council commends the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and the personnel of the United Nations

Mission of Observers in Tajikistan for their work and encourages them to continue assisting the parties in the implementation of the General Agreement. It welcomes the results of the international donor conference in support of peace and reconciliation in Tajikistan convened by the Secretary-General in Vienna on 24 and 25 November 1997, and looks forward to the contribution of those results to consolidating the peace process in Tajikistan.

The Council reiterates its concern that the security situation in some parts of Tajikistan remains precarious. It reminds both parties that the international community is ready to continue assisting in the implementation of the General Agreement as well as in humanitarian and rehabilitation programmes, but that its ability to do so and also the ability of the Mission to carry out its tasks more effectively is linked to improvements in security conditions.

The Council firmly condemns the hostage-taking of relief workers that took place in November 1997 and urges the parties to cooperate further in ensuring the security and freedom of movement of the personnel of the United Nations, the collective peacekeeping forces of the Commonwealth of Independent States and other international personnel, and to take practical steps in this respect, such as those mentioned in paragraph 7 of the report of the Secretary-General.

The Council welcomes the presidential decree establishing a joint security unit with the task of providing security, including armed escorts, for Mission personnel and calls upon the parties to make the unit operational as soon as possible. It also welcomes the readiness of the collective peacekeeping forces to arrange for the guarding of United Nations premises in Dushanbe, as mentioned in the report of the Secretary-General, and encourages the Mission and the collective peacekeeping forces to make the relevant detailed arrangements.

The Council encourages the Secretary-General to continue the expansion of the Mission to the strength authorized by its resolution 1138 (1997) as soon as the Secretary-General deems conditions appropriate.

Decision of 14 May 1998 (3879th meeting):
resolution 1167 (1998)

On 6 May 1998, pursuant to resolution 1138 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on developments in Tajikistan and on the activities of UNMOT.⁵⁵ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that progress in the peace process had been very slow, and it had become clear that the task of building confidence between the former adversaries was more difficult than anticipated and would take longer than allowed for in the ambitious timetable of the peace agreement. As a result, it seemed unlikely that elections could be held in 1998. It was clear that comprehensive international support remained essential for the continuation of the peace process. The Mission and other members of the United Nations system, as well as the Contact Group, provided much-needed impetus and helped stabilize the situation during crises. In the light of those circumstances, the Secretary-General recommended that the Council extend the mandate of UNMOT for a further period of six months, until 15 November 1998.

At its 3879th meeting, held on 6 May 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Kenya), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Tajikistan, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁵⁶ The President further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 1 May 1998 from the representative of Tajikistan addressed to the Secretary-General, which reported continuing armed violations of the General Agreement by individual armed units of UTO.⁵⁷

The representative of Tajikistan stated that the assistance of the international community to the efforts of the Government of Tajikistan aimed at a further stabilization of the situation and the continued progress of the country towards peace and national accord was particularly important at this time, when tensions had ignited in March and April resulting in the loss of human life. The Government of Tajikistan had expressed its concern at the local conflicts, which had been initiated by individual field commanders of UTO. He informed the Council that the President of Tajikistan was firm in his position that there was no reasonable alternative to the peace agreement and that progress towards national accord was irreversible. The representative noted that despite the fact that the implementation of key agreements on military issues had been unjustifiably delayed, thus holding back the progress of the entire peace process, that process was moving forward at a steady pace. In that respect, a significant role was being played by UNMOT with which his Government was maintaining the closest contacts.⁵⁸

Speaking before the vote, the representative of the Russian Federation noted that despite the agreed timetable, there were significant delays in the implementation of key elements of the inter-Tajik agreement, particularly regarding the problems of reintegration, disarmament and the disbanding of the armed units of UTO. The delays in the implementation of the Protocol on military issues had led to an unjustified shift in emphasis and a break in the sequence of steps in the implementation of the General Agreement, with major emphasis being placed on political aspects to the detriment of the resolution of military issues. Such an imbalance contradicted the logic of the complex peace process and had become the major reason for the dangerous complications in the situation in a number of regions in Tajikistan. He drew the attention of the parties to the provisions in the draft resolution that reflected the need for a balanced approach to the implementation of the General Agreement. He expressed support for the intention of the Secretary-General to conclude the deployment of UNMOT and to reduce its personnel to the level authorized by the Security Council. He also reaffirmed the readiness of CIS peacekeepers to continue to provide assistance in resolving issues with regard to the security of the United Nations military observers, and to resolve with the leadership of UNMOT specific issues for taking measures in that respect.⁵⁹

The representative of China stated that China supported the peace process in Tajikistan and advocated an active role for the United Nations in promoting peace and reconciliation in Tajikistan and was in favour of further extending the mandate of UNMOT. The assessment of China of the regional peacekeeping efforts of the CIS countries in Tajikistan was also positive. He expressed the belief that the international community, including the United Nations, needed to support those efforts.⁶⁰

A number of other speakers made statements expressing support for the draft resolution and the extension of the mandate of UNMOT.⁶¹

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1167 (1998) which reads:

The Security Council,

11. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States stated that his delegation had voted in favour of extending the mandate of UNMOT as a sign of continued faith in the peace process. However, he stressed that the willingness of the United States to support "a broken process" was not infinite. He stressed that, while the United States and the international community wanted to give the parties the time they needed to establish an enduring peace, the parties needed to recognize that they alone held the responsibility for moving the process forward. It was clearly within the capacity of both to comply with their obligations under the peace accords. The parties also had a responsibility for ensuring the security of UNMOT, foreign diplomatic missions and international personnel. They needed to cooperate in that effort, specifically making the joint protection unit into a showcase of national cooperation.⁶²

On 3 November 1998, pursuant to resolution 1167 (1998), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on developments in Tajikistan and on the activities of UNMOT.⁶³ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that, after a period of relative stagnation, the crisis at the end of September started by the assassination of a prominent member of UTO had led to renewed movement in the political process. However, much remained to be done before the holding of elections and the installation of a new national Government, which was to mark the end of the transition period. The Secretary-General was convinced that the political process would continue to require active international support, through UNMOT and the Contact Group in particular. Therefore, he recommended that the mandate of UNMOT be extended for another six months, until 15 May 1999. Regarding the killing of four members of UNMOT in July 1998, he expressed deep concern that there had not been more progress in establishing all of the relevant facts.

At its 3943rd meeting, held on 12 November 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United States), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Tajikistan, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁶⁴ The President further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 4 November 1998 from the representative of Tajikistan addressed to the Secretary-General, transmitting a statement by the Government inviting members of the anti-Government movement that carried out attacks in various towns on 3 and 4 November to lay down their arms and surrender to the country's forces of law and order.⁶⁵

The representative of Tajikistan expressed deep distress at the murder in July 1998 of four staff members of the United Nations Mission and stated that his Government was taking all possible measures to prevent the tragic incident from having consequences for the future relations with the United Nations and with other international organizations. The leadership of Tajikistan had already taken serious measures to improve security conditions for international personnel working in the country and was firmly committed to close cooperation with the leaders of UTO to successfully complete the investigation of all circumstances surrounding the incident. Noting that the dedication to the peace process of both parties to the General Agreement had been severely tested during the recent hostilities, which had erupted as a result of the attempt made by an armed group of rebels in northern Tajikistan to seize power by force, he informed the Council that the President of Tajikistan had resolutely embarked on a course of protecting the unity and territorial integrity of the country and the existing constitutional system. The President had firmly stated that the peace process in the Republic was moving ahead and that no force could stop it. He expressed gratitude to the Security Council, the Secretary-General and the States members of CIS, particularly the Russian Federation, for their timely and clear political assessment of the rebels' subversive and destabilizing activities and for their determined and unequivocal moral support for the Government and people of Tajikistan at a difficult time. Tajikistan was counting on continued cooperation with their partners in CIS in order to ensure the security of Tajikistan and to prevent any new attempt by destructive forces to strike a blow against the process of national reconciliation.⁶⁶

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1206 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions and the statements by its President,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 3 November 1998 on the situation in Tajikistan,

Welcoming the movement towards the implementation of the General Agreement on the Establishment of Peace and National Accord in Tajikistan and the effective maintenance of the ceasefire between the Government of Tajikistan and the United Tajik Opposition, and noting that there remain difficulties to be resolved in this regard,

Welcoming also the intensified regular contacts between the leadership of the Government of Tajikistan and of the United Tajik Opposition which helped to contain the crises in the period covered by the report of the Secretary-General, confirmed the commitment of both parties to the peace process and contributed to the implementation of the General Agreement,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 3 November 1998;

2. Strongly condemns the recent fighting in the Leninabad area initiated by forces trying to hinder the peace process in Tajikistan, and calls upon all concerned to refrain from the use of force;

6. Strongly condemns the murder of four members of the Mission, recognizes that the completion of the investigation into this case is important for the resumption of the field activities of the Mission, urges the Government of Tajikistan to complete the investigation expeditiously and to bring to justice all those found to be responsible for the crime, and also urges the United Tajik Opposition leaders to continue to cooperate fully with these efforts;

Decision of 23 February 1999 (3981st meeting): statement by the President

On 8 February 1999, pursuant to resolution 1206 (1998), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on developments in Tajikistan and on the activities of UNMOT.⁶⁷ In his report, the Secretary-General noted that there had been slow progress in the peace process and a great deal remained yet to be done. The holding of the constitutional referendum, as well as presidential and parliamentary elections, all to be held in 1999, remained uncertain. The risk inherent in the slow pace was the growing restlessness among the groups that were not direct parties to the peace agreement and to its power-sharing arrangements, as well as among UTO fighters, who were awaiting reintegration into the Tajik army or demobilization. He expressed concern at the precarious security situation in Tajikistan and noted that UNMOT had continued to limit its activities to Dushanbe and observe strict security precautions.

At its 3981st meeting, held on 23 February 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Canada), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Tajikistan, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶⁸

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 8 February 1999 on the situation in Tajikistan, submitted pursuant to paragraph 11 of its resolution 1206 (1998) of 12 November 1998.

The Council welcomes the regular contacts between the President of the Republic of Tajikistan and the leader of the United Tajik Opposition and the work of the Commission on National Reconciliation aimed at achieving further progress in the peace process. It regrets that progress has remained slow during the last three months and underlines the necessity for the parties to speed up the full and sequential implementation of the General Agreement on the Establishment of Peace and National Accord in Tajikistan, especially the protocol on military issues. The Council calls upon the parties to intensify their efforts to create conditions for the holding in 1999 of a constitutional referendum and presidential elections, as well as for the timely holding of parliamentary elections.

The Council notes with appreciation the work of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and of all the personnel of the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan and encourages them to continue assisting the parties in the implementation of the General Agreement. It underlines the importance of the Mission playing a full and active role in the implementation of the General Agreement and requests the Secretary-General to continue to consider means of achieving this, taking into account the security situation.

The Council welcomes the continued contribution made by the collective peacekeeping forces of the Commonwealth of Independent States in assisting the parties in the implementation of the General Agreement in coordination with all concerned.

The Council welcomes also the contribution of the Contact Group of Guarantor States and International Organizations to the peace process and, in this context, considers that the holding of a meeting of the Contact Group at the level of Ministers for Foreign Affairs, in support of the peace process, could indeed be useful, if properly prepared.

The Council welcomes further the activities of various international organizations and humanitarian workers related to the implementation of the General Agreement and addressing the humanitarian, rehabilitation and development needs of Tajikistan. It calls upon Member States and others concerned to respond promptly and generously to the consolidated appeal for Tajikistan for 1999 launched in Geneva in December 1998.

The Council reiterates its concern that the security situation in some parts of Tajikistan remains precarious. It reiterates the importance of a full investigation into the murder in July 1998 of four members of the Mission and notes with appreciation the efforts of the Government of Tajikistan in this regard. The Council calls upon the United Tajik Opposition to contribute more effectively to the investigation in order to bring those responsible to justice. It acknowledges the efforts of the Government of Tajikistan to enhance the protection of international personnel and calls upon the parties to cooperate further in ensuring the security and freedom of movement of the personnel of the United Nations, the collective peacekeeping forces and other international personnel. The Council reminds both parties that the ability of the international community to mobilize and to continue assistance for Tajikistan is linked to the security of the personnel of the Mission and international organizations, and of humanitarian workers.

Decision of 15 May 1999 (4004th meeting): resolution 1240 (1999)

On 6 May 1999, pursuant to resolution 1206 (1998), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on developments in Tajikistan and on the activities of UNMOT.⁶⁹ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the peace process in Tajikistan had made some progress, although it continued to be held back by a deep-seated lack of confidence between the parties. UNMOT, in close cooperation with OSCE and the other members of the Contact Group, had been assisting the parties in overcoming obstacles and contributing to an atmosphere conducive to finding agreed solutions. Stating that the peace process in Tajikistan had continued to require direct international attention and support, he recommended that the mandate of UNMOT be extended for another six months, until 15 November 1999.

At its 4004th meeting, held on 15 May 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Gabon), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Tajikistan, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁷⁰

The representative of Tajikistan stated that it was important that the Security Council advocate protecting the valuable active role played by UNMOT in helping to implement the General Agreement, and to that end needed to strengthen the organizational and financial foundations of the Mission's activities. He stated that the peace process in Tajikistan, supported by the invaluable contribution of the United Nations and the entire international community, was entering a new and extremely serious stage in its development. The constitutional reform exercise and elections would be a serious test of the unified nature and sustainability of that process.⁷¹

7. Calls upon the parties to cooperate further in ensuring the security and freedom of movement of the personnel of the United Nations, the collective peacekeeping forces and other international personnel, and reminds the parties that the ability of the international community to mobilize and to continue assistance for Tajikistan is linked to the security of those personnel;

11. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 19 August 1999 (4034th meeting): statement by the President

On 12 August 1999, pursuant to resolution 1240 (1999), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council an interim report on developments in Tajikistan and on the activities of UNMOT.⁷² In his report, the Secretary-General stated that there had been significant progress in the implementation of the General Agreement by the Government of Tajikistan and UTO. Major obstacles that had held that process back had been removed. He informed the Council that Tajikistan was facing three important ballots: the referendum on constitutional amendments on 26 September, and presidential and parliamentary elections in November 1999 and February 2000, respectively. The United Nations and OSCE had agreed on a joint approach to the parliamentary elections and were in close contact concerning the modalities of their cooperation.

At its 4034th meeting, held on 19 August 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the interim report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Namibia), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Tajikistan, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁷³

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 12 August 1999 on the situation in Tajikistan, submitted pursuant to paragraph 10 of its resolution 1240 (1999) of 15 May 1999.

The Council welcomes significant progress in the implementation of the General Agreement on the Establishment of Peace and National Accord in Tajikistan, achieved to a great extent owing to the renewed efforts of the President of the Republic of Tajikistan and the leadership of the Commission on National Reconciliation. It particularly welcomes the official declaration by the United Tajik Opposition of the disbandment of its armed units and the decision by the Supreme Court of Tajikistan lifting the bans and restrictions on activities by the political parties and movements of the United Tajik Opposition as important steps contributing to the democratic development of Tajik society. The Council reiterates its encouragement to the Commission on National Reconciliation to intensify its efforts aimed at the institution of a broad dialogue among the various political forces in the country in the interests of the restoration and strengthening of civil accord in Tajikistan.

The Council encourages the parties to undertake further concerted measures to ensure the full and sequential implementation, in a balanced manner, of the General Agreement, especially all the provisions of the protocol on military issues, including those related to the reintegration of former opposition fighters. It also encourages them to continue their active work in creating conditions for the timely holding of a constitutional referendum and presidential and parliamentary elections, underlines the importance of the involvement of the United Nations in this process, in continued close cooperation with the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, and welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to approach Member States with concrete proposals on voluntary contributions to support such involvement.

The Council notes with appreciation the work of the outgoing Special Representative of the Secretary-General, Mr. Ján Kubiš, and of all the personnel of the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan, and encourages the Mission to continue assisting the parties in the implementation of the General Agreement. It underlines the need for the Mission to operate throughout Tajikistan and to have the necessary personnel and financial support, and requests the Secretary-General to continue to consider means of ensuring a full and active role for the Mission in the implementation of the General Agreement up to the strength authorized by its resolution 1138 (1997) of 14 November 1997, while continuing to observe stringent security measures. The Council urges the Secretary-General to appoint a successor to Mr. Kubiš as the Special Representative as soon as possible.

The Council supports the continued active involvement of the Contact Group of Guarantor States and International Organizations in the peace process.

The Council welcomes the continued contribution made by the collective peacekeeping forces of the Commonwealth of Independent States in assisting the parties in the implementation of the General Agreement in coordination with all concerned.

The Council expresses its concern at the precarious humanitarian situation in Tajikistan. It welcomes the activities of various international organizations and humanitarian workers related to the implementation of the General Agreement and addressing the humanitarian, rehabilitation and development needs of Tajikistan. The Council calls upon Member States and others concerned to respond promptly and generously to the mid-year review of the consolidated inter-agency appeal for Tajikistan for 1999.

Decision of 12 November 1999 (4064th meeting): resolution 1274 (1999)

On 12 August 1999, pursuant to resolution 1240 (1999), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council an interim report on developments in Tajikistan and on the activities of UNMOT.⁷⁴ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that during the previous three months, the peace process in Tajikistan had made further progress, with the constitutional referendum and the lifting of the ban on political parties associated with UTO, both important milestones. The last major event of the transition period envisaged in the General Agreement would be the parliamentary elections, to be held before the term of the current parliament expired at the end of February 2000. He noted that, as the transition period neared its end, UNMOT also approached the end of its assignment. However, close international involvement remained essential to assist Tajikistan in any political tensions, to ensure that they were resolved by peaceful means rather than by violence, for which the potential remained. Under the circumstances, the Secretary-General recommended that the Council extend the mandate of UNMOT for another six months, until 15 May 2000. He envisaged that extension of the mandate as the final one, since the transition process stipulated in the General Agreement would come to an end during that period. However, he stressed that it was widely held that the continued political presence of the United Nations would greatly assist in ensuring that Tajikistan could consolidate the path of peace and national reconciliation. Therefore, he intended to outline, in an interim report following the parliamentary elections, a possible political role for the United Nations in that respect for the Council to consider.

At its 4064th meeting, held on 12 November 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the above report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Slovenia), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Tajikistan, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁷⁵ The President further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 11 November 1999 from Tajikistan, transmitting the text of the Protocol on Political Guarantees During the Preparation for and Holding of the Elections to the Majlis-i Oli (the Parliament) of Tajikistan.⁷⁶

The representative of Tajikistan informed the Council that the meeting was taking place after the presidential elections on 6 November 1999 and after the national referendum on changes and amendments to the Constitution of the Republic of Tajikistan. The presidential elections had been an important step forward towards establishing lasting peace and stability and reliable conditions for further democratic development in Tajikistan. The successful implementation of the political measures and the further progress in implementing the General Agreement had been helped to a large extent by the continuing generous support provided by the guarantor States, the United Nations, OSCE and other international organizations involved. He maintained that the full and active support of the United Nations would be decisive as Tajik society faced the holding of the first parliamentary elections under the new conditions. The important work of drafting a law on elections to the Parliament was being done with assistance from the joint OSCE/United Nations assessment mission. He concluded by stressing that comprehensive international support was an important factor for ensuring that the peace process in the country was irreversible.⁷⁷

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1274 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions and the statements by its President,

13. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

23. The situation in Afghanistan

Decision of 15 February 1996 (3631st meeting): statement by the President

At its 3631st meeting, held on 15 February 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the item entitled "The situation in Afghanistan" in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (United States) invited the representative of Afghanistan, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹

The Security Council deeply deplores the continuation of armed hostilities in Afghanistan, which have brought death and destruction to the people and property of the country and threaten the peace and security of the region.

The Council is particularly concerned about the recent intensification of shelling and air attacks in and around the capital city of Kabul and the blockade of the city, which has prevented the delivery of foodstuffs, fuel and other humanitarian items to its population.

The Council calls upon the parties involved to end the hostilities forthwith and not to obstruct the delivery of humanitarian aid and other needed supplies to the innocent civilians of the city. In this regard, the Council commends the efforts of the United Nations, the International Committee of the Red Cross and other humanitarian agencies in Afghanistan, which are working under the most trying circumstances, and the airlift of food supplies from Peshawar to Kabul, and urges the international community to continue its support of those life-saving efforts.

The Council is deeply concerned that the continued conflict in Afghanistan provides fertile ground for terrorism, arms transfers and drug trafficking, which destabilize the whole region and beyond. It calls upon the leaders of the Afghan parties to put aside their differences and to halt such activities.

The Council reaffirms its full support for the efforts of the United Nations Special Mission to Afghanistan to bring about a peaceful solution to the conflict through the establishment of a fully representative, broad-based, authoritative council acceptable to all Afghans. It calls upon all Afghans to cooperate fully with the Special Mission as it works towards this goal.

The Council calls upon all States in a position to do so to take steps to promote peace and stability in Afghanistan, in particular by urging the parties to the conflict to cooperate fully with the Special Mission. It also calls upon all States to refrain from interfering in the internal affairs of Afghanistan and to prevent the flow to the Afghan parties of weapons and other supplies that can fuel the fighting.

The Council urges the captors of the members of the crew of the Russian aircraft in Kandahar to release them immediately and without any preconditions.

The Council reaffirms its commitment to the full sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Afghanistan. It reaffirms its readiness to assist the Afghan people in their efforts to return peace and normalcy to their country and it encourages all States, as well as the Organization of the Islamic Conference, the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries and others, to support the efforts of the Special Mission to the same end.

The Council will remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 28 September 1996 (3699th meeting): statement by the President

At its 3648th meeting, held on 9 April 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Chile) invited the representatives of Afghanistan, Argentina, India, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Japan, Malaysia, Pakistan, Tajikistan, Tunisia, Turkey, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. He also extended an invitation, under rule 39 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure, to the Permanent Observer of the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC).

At the outset, the representative of Afghanistan noted that, over the last four years, "conspirators" and "interventionists" linked to Pakistani military intelligence circles, sometimes in connivance with other outside supporters, had been attempting to overthrow the Government of the Islamic State of Afghanistan and to enthrone a "Pakistani-approved regime" in Kabul. He stated that since the establishment in April 1992 of the Islamic State of Afghanistan, Pakistani military intelligence circles had been covertly working towards that goal by creating and then supporting the "mercenaries called the Taliban", who claimed to monopolize the absolute truth and righteousness of Islam. He urged the United Nations Special Mission to identify foreign interference as the root cause of the conflict and to recommend effective measures to terminate it; to identify and observe a logical sequence for the stages of the peace process on a pragmatic and realistic basis; and to identify the true nature of the Taliban and reveal their foreign linkage. Rebutting the allegations of Pakistan that the Government of the Islamic State of Afghanistan had been receiving military assistance from certain countries, he said that Afghanistan, as a sovereign State, reserved its legitimate right to seek the assistance — political, moral and humanitarian — of any country in conformity with Article 51 of the United Nations Charter. He suggested that a United Nations monitoring post along the borders with Pakistan be established to halt the flow of illicit arms and ammunition into Afghanistan and that a United Nations fact-finding mission should be sent to the provinces controlled by the Taliban.²

The representative of China stated that the factions in Afghanistan needed first to implement a ceasefire, establish mutual trust and create conditions for a peaceful settlement. Second, with the assistance of the United Nations, the Organization of the Islamic Conference and the neighbours of Afghanistan, the Afghan parties needed to conduct peaceful negotiations and consultations in order to find a satisfactory solution. He stressed that all countries needed to abide by United Nations resolutions, respect the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Afghanistan, refrain from interference in its internal affairs and prevent the transfer of weapons to it.³

The representative of Indonesia reaffirmed his delegation's support for the efforts of the United Nations Special Mission to Afghanistan, which offered hope for ending the conflict through the establishment of a broadly based transitional government acceptable to the Afghan people. He stressed that the time had come for the launching of a credible intra-Afghan dialogue to restore peace and stability and he appealed to all States to refrain from engaging in activities that would hamstring the ongoing endeavours for a peaceful solution, especially in preventing the flow of weapons to the parties in conflict.⁴

The representative of the United States underscored that his country favoured none of the factions, movements or individuals currently vying for power in Afghanistan, nor did the United States supply weapons or other military or financial support to any of the factions or movements. He called upon all the Afghan factions and the outside parties that supported them to realize the futility of continuing the conflict. Regarding the proposed arms embargo, he stated that it was worth exploring further if it could be effectively implemented. He also suggested discussing prospects for convening a conference on Afghanistan that could help accelerate the peace process.⁵

The representative of the United Kingdom maintained that the territory of Afghanistan was increasingly used to train terrorists whose activities had consequences far beyond that country's borders. An unstable Afghanistan represented a threat to the stability of the region. Noting that it was of particular concern that foreign interference by countries in the region and beyond, both military and political, had been increasing, he called for an end to the flow of weapons into Afghanistan. Finally, he stressed that peace could not be won by force of arms; it could only be won when the arms were laid down and Afghans themselves accepted that reconciliation was the way forward.⁶

The representative of Botswana stated that it was clear that the situation in Afghanistan posed a serious threat to both regional and international peace and security. He stressed that any solution which did not include the establishment of a ceasefire and negotiations for a new political dispensation would be equally unrealistic.⁷

At its 3650th meeting, held on 9 April 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council resumed consideration of the

item on its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Chile) invited the representatives of Afghanistan, Argentina, India, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Japan, Malaysia, Pakistan, Tajikistan, Tunisia, Turkey, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The representative of the Russian Federation stressed that the ongoing civil war in Afghanistan posed a grave threat to the security and stability of other states and underscored the need to ensure the security of the borders between Afghanistan and countries of the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) and to make certain that the territory of Afghanistan was not used to carry out acts undermining the security and stability of its neighbours. He stated that the United Nations had a fundamental role to play in the process of achieving an Afghan settlement. Welcoming the efforts by other international organizations to promote an Afghan settlement, he stated that his country supported in principle the convening of an international conference on Afghanistan. He further underscored that his country firmly adhered to its policy not to be drawn into the inter-Afghan fighting and expected that all other States would act in a similar fashion.⁸

The representative of France reiterated that no military solution was possible in Afghanistan and stressed the obligation to allow free access to Kabul for humanitarian assistance. He also maintained that if a return to peace was to last, a government needed to be established that was accepted by all the various components of the country.⁹

The representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran noted that his country had hosted more than 2.5 million Afghan refugees and urged the parties to agree on a durable ceasefire and to seek a negotiated solution acceptable to all.¹⁰

The representative of Pakistan stressed that the consistent position of his Government on the conflict had always been that only a broad-based interim mechanism, in which all factions would participate, could pave the way to a democratic government that alone could provide the necessary durable fabric for the multi-ethnic country. He maintained that much of the strife in Afghanistan could be attributed to the absence of legitimate governance. The massive infusion of weapons and funds from abroad for various political and military factions had compounded the problem and weakened the resolve on the part of the protagonists to seek national reconciliation. He charged that those who accused his country of interfering in Afghanistan knew that Pakistan had refrained from supporting one faction or another. He maintained that the allegations were an attempt to explain away the untenable situation that the factions found themselves in, due to a complete lack of popular support from the Afghan people. He observed that “the nominal central authority” in Afghanistan controlled only 5 of the 32 provinces. Yet, despite its long, self-extended term, it had not been able to obtain the allegiance of those over whom it arrogated to itself the right to govern. On the other hand, the Taliban controlled more than half the country and were locked in a struggle with the nominal central authority. Noting that those opposed to the nominal central authority questioned its legitimacy, he maintained that central to that was the fact that under the Afghan accords of March 1993, the term of the Government in Kabul had expired in June 1994. He expressed support for a representative gathering of the Afghan leaders under United Nations auspices, or under the joint auspices of the United Nations and neighbouring countries, with a view to launching a credible process, involving the transfer of power to a fully representative, broad-based government. Pakistan also favoured a complete ban on weapons and arms supplies to the warring factions. He suggested that the Council consider imposing an embargo to interdict the planeloads of ammunition being flown into Afghanistan. Monitoring the arms and air embargoes would require an effective mechanism, perhaps set up by the United Nations in cooperation with OIC. However, in the view of Pakistan, it would be premature to convene an international conference on Afghanistan. He concluded by welcoming the open debate but maintained that the Security Council had not heard the “true voice” of the Afghan people.¹¹

The representative of OIC expressed the belief that the proposal regarding the convening of an intra-Afghan meeting under joint United Nations/OIC sponsorship, to be joined at a later stage by other countries directly concerned, provided a viable alternative. He also reiterated that OIC proposals and initiatives provided for no outside interference whatsoever.¹²

The representative of Tajikistan noted with concern that armed attacks were being launched from several regions of Afghanistan across the Tajik-Afghan border.¹³

The representative of India, noting that the spread of terrorism in their region and beyond was a matter of deep concern, argued that United Nations peace efforts should focus on the cessation of hostilities, as well as prevention of foreign interference and outside support for rebel forces.¹⁴

The representative of Turkmenistan expressed the concern of her Government at the many years of conflict in a neighbouring country with which it shared a boundary of 800 kilometres. Political, economic and cultural links, as well as trade, had always been of great significance for the peoples of the two countries. She said that there were approximately one million of her ethnic compatriots in the territory of Afghanistan. As neighbours, Turkmenistan felt the “hot breath” of the Afghan conflict and the problems that accompanied it. It prevented the realization of the delivery through Afghanistan of sources of energy, which was one of the major potential economic areas for Turkmenistan. She further underlined that the destabilizing effect of the protracted Afghan conflict had also affected the situation throughout the region, in particular the prospect of a speedy inter-Tajik settlement, which had been the subject of ongoing talks under the aegis of the United Nations in Turkmenistan. She further recalled that it was her country that had proposed the initiative of convening an international conference under the aegis of the United Nations on the question of Afghanistan. Referring to the idea of placing an embargo on arms deliveries to Afghanistan, she underlined that such an embargo needed to be covered by an appropriate control mechanism. In conclusion, she stated that it would be an honour for neutral Turkmenistan to host such a conference in its capital, Ashgabat.¹⁵

A number of other speakers expressed concern at the deteriorating situation, calling on the parties to renounce violence and end the civil war. They condemned any political or military interference by outside forces in the internal affairs of Afghanistan, and reiterated that the situation in Afghanistan constituted a serious threat to international peace and security. Speakers stressed that no military solution was possible in Afghanistan. A number of representatives spoke in support of an expanded mechanism for a fully representative and authoritative council as a way towards national reconciliation or for an international conference to address all aspects of the Afghan question.¹⁶

At its 3699th meeting, held on 28 September 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Guinea-Bissau) made the following statement on its behalf of the Council:¹⁷

The Security Council reiterates its grave concern about the military confrontation in Afghanistan.

The Council is also concerned at the violation of the United Nations premises in Kabul and expresses its dismay at the brutal execution by the Taliban of the former President of Afghanistan, Mr. Najibullah, and others who had taken refuge in these premises.

The Council demands that all parties fulfil their obligations and commitments regarding the safety of the United Nations personnel and other international personnel in Afghanistan. It calls upon all Afghans to cooperate fully with the United Nations and associated bodies as well as with other humanitarian organizations and agencies in their efforts to respond to the humanitarian needs of the people of Afghanistan.

The Council reaffirms its commitment to the sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Afghanistan. It calls for the immediate cessation of all armed hostilities and urgently calls upon the leaders of the Afghan parties to renounce the use of force, to put aside their differences and to engage in a political dialogue aimed at achieving national reconciliation. The Council also calls upon all States to refrain from interfering in the internal affairs of Afghanistan.

¹⁷ S/PRST/1996/40.

The Council reaffirms its full support for the efforts of the United Nations in Afghanistan, in particular the activities of the United Nations Special Mission. It calls upon all parties to cooperate with the Special Mission which will act as a key and impartial facilitator in order to bring about a peaceful solution to the conflict as soon as possible. The Council calls upon all States to take all steps necessary to promote peace in Afghanistan and to work together with the United Nations to this end.

The Council will continue to follow with close attention developments in Afghanistan.

Decision of 22 October 1996 (3706th meeting):

By a letter dated 8 October 1996 addressed to the Secretary-General,¹⁸ the representatives of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, the Russian Federation, Tajikistan and Uzbekistan transmitted the text of a joint statement made on 4 October 1996 by the leaders of their respective countries, in which they stated that the war in Afghanistan posed a direct threat to the national interests and security of their States, as well as the Commonwealth of Independent States as a whole, and requested a special meeting of the Security Council to be held without delay, with the participation of interested countries, with a view to adopting urgent measures to halt the fighting and achieve a comprehensive settlement of the Afghan conflict.

At its 3705th meeting, held on 16 October 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the letter in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Honduras) invited the representatives of Afghanistan, India, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Ireland, Japan, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Pakistan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, Turkey and Uzbekistan, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. He also extended an invitation, under rule 39 of the provisional rules of procedure, to the Permanent Observer of the Organization of the Islamic Conference.

The President then drew the attention of members of the Council to a note verbale dated 30 September 1996 from the representative of Kazakhstan addressed to the Secretary-General, transmitting the text of a statement by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Kazakhstan, dated 28 September 1996, on the recent events in Afghanistan;¹⁹ and to a letter dated 9 October 1996 from the Vice-Minister for Foreign Affairs of Afghanistan addressed to the President of the Security Council, on the alleged use of “some type of chemical or internationally banned weapon” by the Taliban.²⁰

At the meeting, the representative of Afghanistan stated that Pakistan had been acting as an obstacle to the return of peace and it was for that reason that Afghanistan was turning to the Council, which was entrusted with the responsibility and the task of preserving peace and security, at the regional and international level. He noted that for years, delegations of Afghanistan had complained to the General Assembly and the Security Council about the continuation of foreign intervention in Afghanistan. Unfortunately, the measures taken by the United Nations had been limited to the adoption of resolutions and the issuance of statements, a situation which had encouraged the aggressor to take further measures for the realization of its objective to recruit, train, equip and send “mercenaries called the Taliban” into the territory of Afghanistan. He alleged that since their takeover of Kabul, the Taliban had committed condemnable acts, such as closing schools for girls, forcing women to stay at home and banning television viewing. Afghanistan was asking and urging the United Nations to send a fact-finding mission to Afghanistan where the authorities of Afghanistan would put at its disposal all the hard evidence relating to different aspects of the continued conflict there. The mission should also look into the issue of chemical weapons used against Afghan government troops. In regard to the arms embargo on Afghanistan, he maintained that no Article of the Charter stipulated that such measures should be imposed against the Government of a Member State that was itself the victim of foreign intervention and conspiracies and which was defending its sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity. He maintained that in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter, Afghanistan had the inherent right to self-defence, and any attempt to prevent Afghanistan from strengthening its defences as a sovereign State would be against the Charter and the interests of peace, stability and security in the region. Afghanistan agreed with the majority of Member States that the Security Council should not adopt any resolution where the implementation would be exhaustively burdensome and ultimately unattainable. As more than 1,250 kilometres of frontier in the south-east and south of Afghanistan were unguarded, the requirements of implementing an arms embargo on such a basis were not workable. He stated that Afghanistan would observe an immediate ceasefire under the following conditions: first, the Taliban armed forces needed to evacuate the capital immediately; second, their heavy weapons needed to be withdrawn; third, Kabul needed to be recognized as a demilitarized zone; fourth, a police force needed to be formed under the supervision of the United Nations and OIC to ensure the security of Kabul; and fifth, negotiations needed to start in order to pave the way for the formation of an interim government of national unity in the capital city of Kabul. He urged the Council to exert the necessary international pressure on the Taliban to agree to this proposal.²¹

The representative of Kazakhstan stated that the worsening of the situation in Afghanistan and its possible implications for the destabilization of the situation in the Central Asian region had led to the convening on 4 October 1996 of a meeting at Almaty, which had been attended by the leaders of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, the Russian Federation, Tajikistan and Uzbekistan. Those leaders had appealed to the Afghan parties to the conflict, first of all the Taliban, to call an immediate halt to hostilities and to begin to seek ways of achieving national accord. He stated that the United Nations and the Security Council needed to intensify their activities to arrive at the measures necessary to bring a halt to the conflict. Kazakhstan supported the steps taken towards a settlement of the dispute between the Afghan parties exclusively by peaceful means, and supported the preservation of Afghanistan as a single country. He expressed the belief that the United Nations needed to play a fundamental role in that process, with cooperation from interested States.²²

The representative of Uzbekistan stressed that the conflict in Afghanistan could not be allowed to threaten the stability and national security of neighbouring countries. He expressed alarm that in the midst of a war, the territory remained a place for the massive, uncontrolled production and illegal export of drugs. He also expressed the belief that the imposition of an embargo on the delivery of all forms of weapons to Afghanistan was an important element in establishing conditions for the cessation of hostilities and the achievement of peace. The implementation of such measures should not be aimed against any of the Afghan parties but against outside suppliers of weapons. He stressed that all possible means needed to be used to cut off the delivery of the weapons that were being used to fuel the Afghan conflict.²³

The representative of Kyrgyzstan expressed the belief that it was necessary to make use of all means at the disposal of the United Nations to contain the military and political conflict and to prevent its growth, which would pose a threat to regional security. The position of his delegation was that there needed to be an immediate cessation of hostilities, and the holding, on neutral territory, of negotiations between the parties to the conflict. He stressed that third parties should not interfere in the internal affairs of Afghanistan and that the political process to establish a broad-based interim government needed to be promoted.²⁴

The representative of Tajikistan, noting that the Tajik-Afghan border was still an area of particular tension, stated that his country was convinced that if a comprehensive political settlement to the Afghan problem was found, the situation on the southern borders of CIS, and the Tajik stretch of its outer frontier, would stabilize significantly.²⁵

The representative of the Russian Federation reiterated that it considered the approach of war towards the borders of CIS to be a direct threat to its national interests and security and a threat to stability in the region. He stated that in reaction to the threat there had been an exodus of the population from Kabul — a new wave of refugees and displaced persons. This was a new and serious exacerbation of the internal conflict, which could lead to the collapse of Afghanistan and have highly negative consequences for the stability of the region. He stated that in multinational and multireligious Afghanistan, the only possible option for a solution to the crisis was to achieve an accord based on recognition of the legitimate interests and rights of all groups of the population, and the United Nations needed to focus its efforts on the achievement of precisely those objectives. He suggested that the Council could adopt a politically authoritative resolution with an appeal to all of the Afghan parties to halt armed action and begin a political dialogue for lasting peace in Afghanistan. He stressed that it was also important for the Council to emphasize the inadmissibility of external interference in Afghan affairs, including the need for any delivery of weapons to be stopped.²⁶

The representative of the United Kingdom noted that the kaleidoscope of alliances had shifted markedly in the past few weeks, and that while events were moving so fast it would be a mistake to rush to judgment. He stressed that the aims of the international community needed to be an immediate ceasefire, negotiations between all the parties, and the establishment of a peace process leading to the formation of a broad-based representative government which respected human rights. He stated that the United Nations Special Mission to Afghanistan (UNSMA) had a critical role in achieving those aims. With regard to the call by the representative of Afghanistan for the dispatch of United Nations fact-finding missions, he noted that there was already a United Nations Special Mission on the ground. He reiterated that Afghanistan had been subjected to interference from outside, which had only served to prolong the conflict. He called for an end to such interference, and an end to the continuing supply of arms and ammunition to the factions. He called on the factions to respect international human rights norms and to act in accordance with those international instruments which Afghanistan had signed and ratified. He concluded by stating that the Security Council and the international community as a whole needed to keep a close watch on the rapidly changing situation in Afghanistan.²⁷

The representative of France stated that the situation in Afghanistan showed that the appeals of the Council had not been heard, as the war endangered peace and stability in the entire region. He stressed that France did not intend to take the side of any of the forces in the conflict, but would call for a ceasefire and for dialogue with a view to national reconciliations. He noted that the alternation of alliances and counter-alliances in Afghanistan confirmed that the conflict could not be resolved through weapons but only through a political settlement based on an equitable understanding that respected the interests of all, which required that interference ceased. He also noted that the continuation of the conflict in Afghanistan was creating fertile soil for terrorist activities.²⁸

The representative of Egypt stated that the situation in Afghanistan was a protracted and complex problem, whose continuation represented a direct threat to international peace and security. He noted that Afghanistan had fallen victim to a destructive civil war and to intervention in support of the various Afghan factions by foreign powers, which were providing military and other supplies. He further underlined that the effects of the crisis in Afghanistan had turned it into a stronghold for training and exporting extremists, which had spilled the conflict beyond its borders. He recalled that his country had suffered from terrorist activities perpetrated by foreign nationals trained in Afghanistan.²⁹

The representative of China stated that the recent changes in the political and military situation of Afghanistan had caused widespread concern among the international community and particularly among the countries neighbouring Afghanistan, which feared that the escalation of the internal conflict in Afghanistan might endanger their border security. His delegation was of the view that what was needed was the realization of genuine national reconciliation, which depended mainly on the parties in Afghanistan. He expressed hope that the parties would soon resolve their political, religious and racial differences, immediately stop armed conflicts in the general interest of the country and nation, and establish through peaceful negotiations, under the auspices of the United Nations and the international community, a broad-based and stable government acceptable to all parties.³⁰

The representative of the United States noted that the political and military situation in Afghanistan had been dramatically altered by events but that the position of the United States with respect to that turmoil had not changed. She called on all parties to stop fighting and to begin negotiations aimed at a political settlement. The United States reiterated its concern about the dangers of foreign interference in the internal affairs of Afghanistan and urged all outside parties to refrain from meddling. She urged the regional Powers and all of the neighbours of Afghanistan to work together with the United Nations to encourage the Afghan parties to move towards peace. She stated that the United States continued to support an arms embargo and urged the international community to establish a process that would unite Afghanistan and lead to a future characterized by stability, economic recovery and law. She emphasized that the United States remained concerned that all parties in Afghanistan respected international human rights standards and that every Member of the United Nations was obliged to uphold the provisions of the Charter, which affirmed the principle of equal rights for men and women.³¹

The representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran expressed the belief that the conflict in Afghanistan had no military solution. In their opinion, there was no justification for the violence and bloodshed in Afghanistan and no faction or State could endorse the ongoing violence in the name of Islam. He stressed that only a broad-based Government free from foreign interference could protect and guarantee the rights of all Afghan people. He stated that his Government was determined to cooperate and coordinate with the neighbouring State of Afghanistan, the United Nations and OIC to bring peace and security to Afghanistan and the region. His delegation had redoubled efforts to convene a regional conference in Tehran with the participation of regional foreign ministers and representatives of the United Nations and of OIC.³²

The representative of India stated that the eruption of renewed fighting that had led to the fall of Kabul had created a dangerous new situation of great fluidity. He said that Afghanistan had suffered from foreign interference and that there was ample evidence to show that some Afghan parties that had engaged in violent activities had been supported, trained and actively assisted by foreign powers.³³

The representative of Pakistan stated that Afghanistan was neither a failed State nor engaged in a simple civil war, but was a country that had been systematically ravaged by long years of foreign military occupation. That occupation had been resisted by a heroic people, rooted in fierce nationalism and in strong religious beliefs. He stated that the marked intensification of the conflict was again attributable to the massive foreign interference in the internal affairs of Afghanistan. Prompted by their narrow strategic political interests in Afghanistan, regional and extraregional Powers had again chosen to compound the miseries of the Afghan people by creating alliances and counter-alliances. Instead of a concerted regional and international effort under the auspices of the United Nations for the restoration of peace in Afghanistan, what they were witnessing was a brute power play by those who had no legitimate interest in the unity and territorial integrity of Afghanistan. He stated that the time had come for the Security Council to act decisively for the cause of peace in Afghanistan. Pakistan believed that the Security Council needed to adopt a binding resolution under Chapter VII of the Charter. Pakistan had already circulated to the members of the Council a draft resolution, which would have the Council call for the immediate cessation of all armed hostilities in Afghanistan; demand that all the Afghan parties abide by the ceasefire; and support the efforts of the United Nations Special Mission to promote peace and reconciliation. He stated that Pakistan was committed to supporting the efforts of the United Nations Special Mission, and of the Security Council, to restore peace in Afghanistan.³⁴

A number of other speakers expressed concern at the situation, reaffirmed the sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity of Afghanistan, and called on the parties to reach a negotiated political settlement. Several speakers spoke in favour of convening an international conference on the situation in Afghanistan, under the auspices of the United Nations. A number of representatives called for an end to foreign interference in Afghanistan.³⁵

At its 3706th meeting, held on 22 October 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Honduras) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution³⁶ submitted by Germany, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, the Russian Federation, Tajikistan, the United States and Uzbekistan. France, Italy and the Republic of Korea also joined as sponsors of the draft resolution. He also drew the attention to identical letters dated 18 October 1996 from the Vice-Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Islamic State of Afghanistan, addressed to the Secretary-General and to the President of the Council,³⁷ containing a list of the names of foreign fighters which had allegedly been fighting alongside the Taliban.

The draft resolution, in its provisional form, as orally revised, was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1076 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Having considered the situation in Afghanistan,

Recalling the previous statements by the President of the Security Council on the situation in Afghanistan, including the statements of 15 February and 28 September 1996, and the letter dated 22 August 1996 from the President to the Secretary-General,

Decision of 16 April 1997 (3766th meeting):
statement by the President

On 16 March 1997, in response to the request of the Security Council in resolution 1076 (1996) for regular information, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his report on the main developments in Afghanistan.³⁸ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the situation in Afghanistan remained precarious and might soon deteriorate further with the onset of spring offensives. He noted that despite the continuous suffering of the Afghan people, the warring factions had not heeded the repeated appeals for peace and appeared determined to pursue the military option. However, he remained convinced that a negotiated settlement was the only solution to the conflict and that the United Nations was the most appropriate forum to bring this about. The Secretary-General observed that the international community needed to coordinate its efforts so as to increase international pressure on the Afghan parties to solve the conflict in a peaceful way. To this end, he proposed to convene a meeting of concerned countries in the near future, using the formula that had been used for the meeting held in New York on 18 November 1996, with a view to reassessing the situation and discussing how best to promote a negotiated settlement of the conflict. He took note of the proposals that an intra-Afghan meeting among the warring parties be held outside Afghanistan in order to provide an opportunity for them to talk to each other in a secure environment. He expressed his intention to consult the Afghan parties, Member States and international organizations, in particular OIC, on the advisability of such a meeting.

At its 3765th meeting, held on 14, 15 and 16 April 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Portugal) invited the representatives of Afghanistan, Germany, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Italy, the Netherlands, Pakistan, Tajikistan and Turkey, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. He also extended an invitation, under rule 39 of the provisional rules of procedure, to the Permanent Observer of the Organization of the Islamic Conference.³⁹

At the same meeting, the representative of Afghanistan drew the attention of the Council to the destabilizing effects of the turmoil, which might spill over beyond the border. He claimed that the Taliban was a “mercenary group” which supported international terrorism and sheltered those who financed them. He also accused the Taliban of conducting a “Serbian-style ethnic cleansing” involving 140,000 non-Pashtun Afghans, and alleged that the Taliban had been preparing a “massive attack” against the northern part of the country. He called on the Council to take appropriate measures, including sanctions against the Taliban and their supporters, who were supplying arms and logistical support.⁴⁰

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the situation in Afghanistan continued to represent a threat to international peace and security in the region, and was fraught with the danger of a large-scale humanitarian catastrophe. His delegation was deeply concerned over the course of events and urged the Council to constantly follow the situation in Afghanistan and adopt appropriate measures. He further stated that his country was maintaining its useful and productive contacts on Afghanistan with other States in the region, in particular India, the Islamic Republic of Iran and Pakistan. The coordinated effort of all concerned States would help in reaching a formula acceptable to all for a settlement in Afghanistan.⁴¹

The representative of China expressed the belief that the achievement of national reconciliation was the key to a just and lasting settlement of the Afghan question. Stating that the problem had many complex causes, he urged all sides to take account of the fundamental interests of the Afghan people, set aside their political and religious differences and engage in serious negotiations so as to establish a stable, broad-based government acceptable to all sides. He said that his country had hoped that the United Nations could continue to play a central and leading role in seeking a political settlement of this question.⁴²

The representative of Egypt called on the Afghan parties to mobilize political will for a negotiated settlement and stressed the need to stop all outside military assistance to the parties.⁴³

The representative of the United Kingdom expressed concern that the parties continued to receive arms from foreign countries, despite the clear call of the Council in resolution 1076 (1996) for this to stop.⁴⁴

The representative of France recalled that his country, like its European Union partners, was complying with a full embargo on the supply of weapons to Afghanistan. He stated that the continuation of the conflict in Afghanistan could result in the destabilization of the region and could also have adverse consequences for the entire international community. He also noted that many “terrorists” were being sheltered in Afghanistan.⁴⁵

The representative of Japan stated that neighbouring countries should refrain from exercising their influence on the factions involved in order to avoid exacerbating the situation, and repeated its offer to host a meeting between the Afghan parties.⁴⁶

The representative of the United States, responding to claims that the United States had given support to the Taliban, underlined that his country did not support the Taliban or any other group, but neither did his country put blame on the Taliban for the ills of Afghanistan, for which all parties were responsible. He expressed his delegation’s view that the Council needed to remain concerned about the unrelenting flow of weapons and equipment to the warring parties by outside powers. He further noted that the Taliban had brought a modicum of peace to a large part of Afghanistan, but “at a real price”.⁴⁷

The representative of the Netherlands, speaking on behalf of the European Union, called on all Afghan parties to cease hostilities and reaffirmed the central role of the United Nations in international efforts towards a peaceful resolution of the conflict. He urged third parties to refrain from interfering in the conflict and from supplying arms to the warring factions.⁴⁸

The representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran called for a comprehensive approach whereby the views of all parties and all segments of Afghan society would be taken into account, and suggested the demilitarization of Kabul as an important first step to establish a broad-based government.⁴⁹

The representatives of Germany, Italy and Portugal expressed concern about the humanitarian situation, as well as about reported human rights abuses, especially those against women and girls.⁵⁰

The representative of Tajikistan reported that on 5 April 1997, the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of Central Asia and the Russian Federation had reaffirmed in Dushanbe their readiness to cooperate closely to ensure the security of their southern borders with Afghanistan.⁵¹

The representative of Pakistan stated that his country had a deep vested interest in peace in Afghanistan. As a consequence of the continued instability in Afghanistan, there were more than 1.5 million refugees in Pakistan. He stressed that his country was also the victim of terrorism, drug trafficking and arms smuggling as a result of conditions inside Afghanistan. He further noted that the Taliban, who controlled Kabul and two thirds of Afghanistan, were a reality and could not be “wished away”. He maintained that the Islamic State of Afghanistan, headed by President Rabbani, had neither de facto control of the capital nor de jure legitimacy, and that the United Nations should adopt the “vacant seat” formula as to the representation of Afghanistan, which had been adopted by OIC. He urged the Security Council to listen to the views of the Taliban in order to have a more balanced view of the situation, possibly under the Arria formula.⁵²

At its 3766th meeting, held on 16 April 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Portugal) made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁵³

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 16 March 1997 concerning the situation in Afghanistan. It has also considered the views expressed at its 3765th meeting, on 14 and 15 April 1997, on the subject.

The Council expresses its grave concern at the continued fighting in Afghanistan and its intensification in recent months. It reiterates that the continuation of the conflict threatens to destabilize the region and prevents steps towards the formation of a fully representative and broad-based government able to address effectively Afghanistan's acute social and economic problems.

The Council calls upon the Afghan parties to cease immediately all hostile actions and to enter into sustained negotiations. The Council strongly believes that a negotiated settlement is the only solution to the longstanding conflict in this country.

The Council fully supports the United Nations efforts to facilitate national reconciliation in Afghanistan. It is convinced that the United Nations must continue to play the central role in assisting the warring Afghan factions in engaging in a fully-fledged negotiating process on the basis of Council resolution 1076 (1996) and General Assembly resolution 51/195. The Council welcomes the activities of the United Nations Special Mission to Afghanistan and supports further efforts by the Secretary-General to give a new impetus to its work. In this context, it welcomes the holding by the Special Mission of intra-Afghan working group meetings in Islamabad but regrets that these efforts have not yet achieved positive results.

The Council deeply regrets that many important provisions of Council resolution 1076 (1996) and General Assembly resolution 51/195 remain unimplemented. It calls upon all Afghan parties, in particular the Taliban, to abide by these resolutions, to cooperate fully with the Special Mission and to participate in serious and honest negotiations through the good offices of the Mission. The Council urges interested countries to coordinate their activities with those of the Special Mission and to refrain from supporting one Afghan party against another.

The Council welcomes the convening by the Secretary-General of a meeting of concerned countries on 16 April 1997, following the earlier meeting held in New York on 18 November 1996.

The Council takes note of the intention of the Secretary-General to consult the Afghan parties and all those concerned on the advisability of an intra-Afghan meeting at some stage and requests him to put forward a concrete plan if and when he decides that it will contribute to the peace process.

The Council again calls upon all States to end immediately the supply of arms and ammunition to all parties to the conflict in Afghanistan.

The Council reiterates its concern that the continuation of the conflict in Afghanistan provides a fertile ground for terrorism and drug trafficking which destabilize the region and beyond, and calls upon the leaders of the Afghan parties to halt such activities.

The Council is deeply concerned at the worsening of the humanitarian situation, including the displacement of the civilian population. It is also deeply concerned at the discrimination against women and other violations of human rights and of international humanitarian law in Afghanistan. The Council deplores the mistreatment of international humanitarian organizations, which inhibits the ability of the international community to respond to Afghanistan's pressing humanitarian needs.

The Council welcomes the convening of an International Forum on Assistance to Afghanistan on 21 and 22 January 1997 at Ashgabat and the forthcoming meeting of the Afghanistan Support Group on 21 April 1997 in Geneva. It encourages all States and international organizations to continue to extend all possible humanitarian assistance, which should be distributed equitably throughout the country.

The Council will remain seized of the matter and requests the Secretary-General to continue to keep it regularly informed of the situation in Afghanistan.

Decision of 9 July 1997 (3796th meeting): statement by the President

On 16 June 1997, in response to the Council's request in resolution 1076 (1996) for regular information, the Secretary-General submitted his report on major developments in Afghanistan.⁵⁴ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the situation in Afghanistan remained volatile, with the warring parties bent on resolving their problems through military means rather than through peaceful negotiations. However, the conflict was increasingly being fuelled by strong ethnic feelings between the predominantly Pashtun Taliban, on the one hand, and the Tajiks, Hazaras and Uzbeks, who comprised the opposition camp, on the other. In addition, while all Member States concerned claimed to agree that peace was needed in Afghanistan, it appeared that a number of them were not yet ready to put concerted pressure on the warring factions to stop the civil war. He concluded by urging the Afghan factions to return to the negotiating table immediately. He also called upon the Member States concerned to cease their military support to the warring factions, to seek how best they could contribute to the resolution of the Afghan conflict, and to coordinate their efforts closely with the United Nations.

At its 3796th meeting, held on 9 July 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Sweden) invited the representative of Afghanistan, at its request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 27 May 1997 from the representative of Pakistan addressed to the Secretary-

General, on the decision to recognize the new Government of the Islamic State of Afghanistan;⁵⁵ and to identical letters dated 2 and 16 June 1997, respectively, from the representative of Afghanistan addressed to the Secretary-General and to the President of the Security Council, which transmitted the text of the first declaration of the United Islamic and National Front for the Salvation of Afghanistan (UINFSA) dated 12 June 1997, outlining essential concepts and major practical points with regard to the solution of the Afghan conflict.⁵⁶

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁵⁷

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 16 June 1997 concerning the situation in Afghanistan.

The Council expresses its grave concern at the continued escalation of military confrontation in Afghanistan. It calls for an immediate end to the fighting.

The Council calls upon all Afghan parties to return to the negotiating table immediately and to work together towards the formation of a broad-based, fully representative government that will protect the rights of all Afghans and abide by Afghanistan's international obligations.

The Council, taking into account risks of regional destabilization, believes that peace and stability in Afghanistan can best be attained through intra-Afghan political negotiations under United Nations auspices with the active and coordinated assistance of all countries concerned. It urges the Afghan parties and countries concerned to abide by the provisions of relevant resolutions on Afghanistan adopted by the Council and the General Assembly.

The Council stresses that all external interference in Afghan affairs must cease, and, in this context, it calls upon all States to end immediately the supply of arms and ammunition to all parties to the conflict in Afghanistan.

The Council is deeply concerned at the continuing discrimination against girls and women and other violations of human rights, as well as at violations of international humanitarian law.

The Council reiterates that the continuation of the conflict in Afghanistan provides a fertile ground for terrorism and illegal drug production and trafficking, which destabilize the region and beyond, and calls upon the leaders of the Afghan parties to halt such activities.

The Council is deeply concerned at the worsening of the humanitarian situation, including the displacement of the civilian population. In this regard, it calls upon Member States to respond generously to the 1997 United Nations consolidated appeal for emergency humanitarian assistance for Afghanistan.

The Council reaffirms its full support for the efforts of the United Nations in Afghanistan, in particular the activities of the United Nations Special Mission to Afghanistan. It requests the Secretary-General to continue to keep it regularly informed of the situation and his efforts, as well as those of the Special Mission.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 16 December 1997 (3841st meeting): statement by the President

On 14 November 1997, pursuant to resolution 1076 (1996) of 22 October 1996, the Secretary-General submitted his report to the Council on the progress of the United Nations Special Mission in Afghanistan, as well as the main developments in Afghanistan.⁵⁸ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that in July 1997, he had appointed Lakhdar Brahimi as his Special Envoy for Afghanistan, whose activities were to be distinguished from those of UNSMA. Based on the findings of his Special Envoy, he noted that Afghanistan, which was once a flashpoint of superpower rivalry, had since become a typical post-cold war regional and ethnic conflict, and had become a place where even responsible local authorities, let alone a central government, had virtually ceased to exist. He stated that the Afghan parties seemed determined to go on fighting, while outside Powers continued to provide material, financial and other support to their respective "clients" inside Afghanistan. In addition, major Powers with potential influence in Afghanistan had yet to demonstrate the necessary degree of determination to move the situation forward. In these circumstances, he stated, it was illusory to think that peace could be achieved. The Secretary-General stressed the need for a solid international framework to address the external aspects of the Afghan question and to bring the Afghan parties to the negotiating table. He stated that the meetings held in New York of countries with influence in Afghanistan,⁵⁹ as well as those of the immediate neighbours and other countries,⁶⁰ were part of his efforts in this direction. Parallel to the international framework, he also expressed his intention to maintain close contact with the warring parties, through UNSMA and at United Nations Headquarters, as well as with other influential Afghan individuals and organizations, with a view to preparing the ground for an intra-Afghan dialogue. He stated that over the past several years, it had become increasingly difficult to justify the continuation of United Nations peace efforts in Afghanistan in the absence of any positive signs suggesting a fundamental change of attitude on the part of those Governments that were capable of contributing decisively to a peaceful solution of the conflict. He maintained that much more needed to be done by Governments, with a greater sense of unity, in order for the peace efforts spearheaded by the United Nations to stand a realistic chance of success.

At its 3841st meeting, held on 16 December 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Costa Rica) invited the representative of Afghanistan, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President then made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶¹

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 14 November 1997 on the situation in Afghanistan and its implications for international peace and security, which was also considered by the General Assembly.

The Council reiterates its grave concern at the continued military confrontation in Afghanistan, which has caused human suffering and material destruction, which threatens to lead to the disintegration of the country and which represents a growing threat to regional and international peace and security. It deplores the unwillingness of the Afghan warring factions to lay down their arms and cooperate with the United Nations for peace.

Turkey, Turkmenistan, United Kingdom, United States and Uzbekistan, as well as the Organization of the Islamic Conference.

⁶⁰ The Group of Eight which was later referred to as the "six plus two" group, comprised the neighbouring countries of Afghanistan — China, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Pakistan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan — as well as the Russian Federation and the United States.

The Council stresses that the Afghan conflict has no military solution and that the primary responsibility for finding a peaceful settlement lies with the Afghan parties themselves. It urges all Afghan parties to take genuine confidence-building measures, to agree immediately on a ceasefire, and to engage without preconditions in a political dialogue aimed at achieving national reconciliation, a lasting political settlement of the conflict and the formation of a broad-based, fully representative government that will protect the rights of all Afghans and abide by Afghanistan's international obligations.

The Council deplores the fact that foreign military support to the Afghan parties continued unabated through 1997 and reiterates its call to all States to end immediately the supply of arms, ammunition, military equipment, training or any other military support to all parties to the conflict in Afghanistan, including the involvement of foreign military personnel.

The Council encourages the Secretary-General and Member States to undertake preliminary studies on how an effective arms embargo could be imposed and implemented in a fair and verifiable manner.

The Council insists that the United Nations, as a universally recognized and impartial intermediary, must be given all necessary support so it can continue to play a pivotal, central role in coordinated international efforts, including the efforts of interested countries and organizations, towards a peaceful resolution of the Afghan conflict. It believes that peace and stability in Afghanistan can best be attained through intra-Afghan political negotiations under United Nations auspices with the active and coordinated assistance of all countries concerned. The Council reiterates its full support for the activities and mandates of the United Nations Special Mission to Afghanistan and those of the Special Envoy of the Secretary-General for Afghanistan.

The Council supports the efforts of the Secretary-General aimed at the establishment of a solid international framework in order to address the external aspects of the Afghan question and, in this context, welcomes the convening of meetings of concerned countries as well as those of the immediate neighbours and other countries.

The Council remains deeply concerned at the continuing discrimination against girls and women and other violations of human rights, as well as at violations of international humanitarian law in Afghanistan.

The Council notes with deep concern the reports about mass killings of prisoners of war and civilians in Afghanistan and supports the intention of the Secretary-General to continue to investigate fully such reports.

The Council expresses serious concern over the looting of United Nations premises and food supplies and deliberate restrictions placed on the access of humanitarian organizations to some parts of the country and on other humanitarian operations, and urges all parties to prevent their recurrence.

The Council reiterates that the continuation of the conflict in Afghanistan provides a fertile ground for terrorism and illegal drug production and trafficking which destabilize the region and beyond, and calls upon the leaders of the Afghan parties to halt such activities.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to continue to keep it regularly informed about the situation in Afghanistan and his efforts.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 6 April 1998 (3869th meeting):
statement by the President

On 17 March 1998, pursuant to resolution 1076 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in Afghanistan and its implications for international peace and security.⁶² In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the Afghan tragedy continued, as the factions, supported by the uninterrupted supply of arms from outside of the territory, kept fighting in defiance of the will of the vast majority of the Afghan people. Foreign interference by countries in the region and beyond in the form of political and military support of one faction or another, reinforced the reluctance of the faction leaders to engage in serious political dialogue with one another. He remained convinced that the United Nations and Member States must seriously consider the external aspects of the Afghan question and attempt to address them in earnest. Those countries concerned needed to also find a common approach to the Afghan question and to agree on measures to curb the flow of arms and other war-making materials into Afghanistan. As part of those efforts, the "six plus two" group⁶³ had held its fourth meeting on 3 March 1998 and finalized the common talking points on Afghanistan,⁶⁴ which were to be used by them individually and collectively when they consulted the Afghan factions.

At its 3869th meeting, held on 6 April 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the above report of the Secretary-General on its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Japan) invited the representative of Afghanistan, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶⁵

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 17 March 1998 concerning the situation in Afghanistan.

The Council expresses its grave concern at the continued Afghan war, which is a serious threat to regional and international security and causes extensive human suffering, further destruction, refugee flows and other forcible displacement of large numbers of people.

The Council is concerned by the increasingly ethnic nature of the conflict, by reports of persecution based on ethnicity, and by the threat this poses to the unity of the Afghan State.

The Council urges all Afghan parties to stop the fighting, to agree immediately on a ceasefire, and to engage without preconditions in a political dialogue aimed at achieving national reconciliation, a lasting political settlement of the conflict, which has no military solution, and the formation of a broad-based fully representative government.

The Council reaffirms its strong commitment to the sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Afghanistan, and respect for its cultural and historical heritage.

The Council deplores the fact that foreign interference in Afghanistan continues unabated in the form of the supply of war-making materials to the factions. It also deplores the active political and military support from outside Afghanistan to the factions, thereby reinforcing the reluctance of faction leaders to engage in serious political dialogue with one another. The Council reiterates its call to all States to stop such interference immediately.

The Council notes with concern that all the Afghan parties have been actively engaged in arms replenishment throughout the last months, warns the conflicting parties that the resumption of large-scale fighting will seriously undermine the attempts of the international community to assist them in finding a political solution to the conflict and urges them to live up to their declared desire for such a solution.

The Council reiterates its position that the United Nations, as a universally recognized intermediary, must continue to play its central and impartial role in international efforts towards a peaceful resolution of the Afghan conflict and extends its full support for the activities of the United Nations Special Mission to Afghanistan and those of the Special Envoy of the Secretary-General for Afghanistan, particularly in his current mission in the region.

The Council commends the consolidation of the process, initiated by the Special Envoy with the convening of the “six plus two” group, and calls upon all countries involved in it to continue to participate in its work in good faith, including in the discussion to devise effective and impartial ways to curb the flow of arms and other war-making materials into Afghanistan. The Security Council welcomes the support of other Member States for this process.

The Council is deeply concerned by the deteriorating security conditions for United Nations and humanitarian personnel and calls upon all Afghan factions, in particular the Taliban, to take necessary steps to assure their safety.

The Council remains deeply concerned at the continuing discrimination against girls and women and other violations of human rights as well as violations of international humanitarian law in Afghanistan.

The Council supports the steps of the Secretary-General to launch investigations into alleged mass killings of prisoners of war and civilians in Afghanistan, the outcome of which will be submitted to the General Assembly and the Security Council as soon as it becomes available.

The Council is also concerned with the sharp deterioration of the humanitarian situation in several areas in Central and Northern Afghanistan, which is caused by the Taliban-imposed blockade of the Bamyan region remaining in place despite appeals by the United Nations and several of its Member States to lift it, as well as by the lack of supplies coming in from the northern route owing to insecurity and looting. The Council strongly urges the Taliban to let the humanitarian agencies attend to the needs of the population.

The Council reiterates that the continuation of the conflict in Afghanistan provides a fertile ground for terrorism and illegal drug production and trafficking, which destabilize the region and beyond, and calls upon the leaders of the Afghan parties to halt such activities.

The Council will remain seized of the matter and requests the Secretary-General to continue to keep it regularly informed of the situation in Afghanistan.

Decision of 14 July 1998 (3906th meeting):
statement by the President

On 19 June 1998, pursuant to resolution 1076 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in Afghanistan and its implications for international peace and security.⁶⁶ In his report, the Secretary-General observed with concern the start of the spring offensive as well as the suspension in early May 1998 of the full-fledged talks among the warring factions, which had been started earlier in Islamabad as part of the “ulema process”. Those alarming developments were further evidence that, despite their claim to the contrary, the Afghan factions were not ready for serious peace talks, but were determined to pursue the “mirage” of the military option. He regretted that some countries in the region, which supported one Afghan faction or another, were supplying armaments to them despite repeated appeals by the international community. He believed that a major handicap to the peacemaking efforts remained the absence of a coherent approach to the problem, as well as a lack of political will on the part of those countries with influence on the warring factions. He noted with concern that, to date, those players had not been able to rise above their national interests and consider the Afghan question in terms of the interests of the region as a whole nor had agreed on a common platform for the settlement of the conflict. In addition to appealing to the Afghan factions to return to the negotiating table, the Secretary-General called upon the regional powers to intensify their contacts among themselves on Afghanistan. He also called on those that were not directly involved, but were nevertheless concerned, to assist the United Nations in encouraging talks among the regional powers.

At its 3906th meeting, held on 14 July 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶⁷

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 19 June 1998 concerning the situation in Afghanistan of 19 June 1998.

The Council reaffirms its strong commitment to the sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Afghanistan, and respect for its cultural and historical heritage. It reiterates its concern at the increasingly ethnic nature of the conflict, and at the continuing threat this poses to the unity of the Afghan State.

The Council expresses its grave concern at the continued Afghan conflict, which is a serious threat to regional and international security, and causes extensive human suffering, further destruction, refugee flows and other forcible displacement of large numbers of people.

The Council deplores the fact that military support, including the supply of arms and other related materiel, from outside Afghanistan to the warring factions continues unabated, despite repeated pleas to halt it made by the Council, the General Assembly and the Secretary-General. It reiterates its call to all States, in particular those in the region, to cease such interference immediately.

The Council considers it necessary that more active efforts be undertaken under the aegis of the United Nations and with the participation of interested countries aimed at a peaceful settlement of the Afghan conflict, taking into account the interests of all ethnic and religious groups and political forces involved therein.

The Council deplores the breakdown of the intra-Afghan talks in Islamabad and calls upon the parties to respect the wishes of the overwhelming majority of Afghans, to stop the fighting, to return without delay and preconditions to the negotiating table and to engage in a political dialogue aimed at achieving national reconciliation, a lasting political settlement of the conflict, which has no military solution, and the formation of a broad-based fully representative government. As an initial step towards that goal, the Council calls upon the parties to agree immediately on a ceasefire, an exchange of prisoners, and the lifting of all restrictions on the shipments of humanitarian supplies throughout the country.

The Council reiterates its position that the United Nations, as a universally recognized intermediary, must continue to play its central and impartial role in international efforts towards a peaceful resolution of the Afghan conflict, and extends its full support for the activities of the United Nations Special Mission to Afghanistan and those of the Special Envoy of the Secretary-General for Afghanistan.

The Council takes note of the assessment of the Secretary-General that loya jirgah as an informal, time-honoured Afghan method of settling disputes, advocated by some leaders of non-warring Afghan factions, continues to deserve attention, and encourages the Special Mission to continue to maintain useful contacts with them.

The Council commends the work of the “six plus two” group and calls upon all countries involved in the group to continue to participate in good faith with the aim of elaborating, on the basis of the agreed talking points, a coherent approach to the peacemaking efforts in Afghanistan, including the problem of curbing the flow of arms and other related materiel into Afghanistan in an effective and even-handed manner. It welcomes and encourages the additional support of other Member States for this process.

The Council urges all Afghan factions to cooperate fully with the Special Mission and international humanitarian organizations and calls upon them, in particular the Taliban, to take all necessary steps to assure the safety and freedom of movement of such personnel.

The Council acknowledges the signing of the memorandum of understanding between the United Nations and the Taliban on humanitarian issues and stresses the importance of its full implementation, including full respect for immunities of United Nations staff and for the assistance of the United Nations in health and education. Noting that some of the obstacles to the provision of assistance to Hazarajat have been overcome, it nevertheless remains concerned at the continuing use by the Taliban of United Nations humanitarian aid as a weapon against the Hazara and demands that this practice cease immediately. The Council also remains concerned at the lack of supplies coming from the northern route due to insecurity and looting. It calls upon all Afghan factions to lift unconditionally any blockade of humanitarian relief supplies.

The Council is concerned at recent reports of harassment of humanitarian organizations and at the unilateral decision by the Taliban to relocate humanitarian organizations’ offices in Kabul. It calls upon all factions to facilitate the work of humanitarian agencies to the greatest extent possible.

The Council remains deeply concerned at the continuing discrimination against girls and women and other violations of human rights as well as violations of international humanitarian law in Afghanistan.

The Council supports the steps of the Secretary-General to launch investigations into alleged mass killings of prisoners of war and civilians in Afghanistan, the outcome of which will be submitted to the General Assembly and the Council as soon as it becomes available.

The Council reiterates that the continuation of the conflict in Afghanistan provides a fertile ground for terrorism and illegal drug production and trafficking which destabilize the region and beyond, and calls upon the leaders of the Afghan parties to halt such activities.

The Council will remain seized of the matter and requests the Secretary-General to continue to keep it regularly informed of the situation in Afghanistan.

Decision of 6 August 1998 (3914th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3914th meeting, held on 6 August 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council resumed consideration of the item on its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Slovakia) invited the representative of Afghanistan, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶⁸

The Security Council expresses its grave concern at the new sharp escalation of the military confrontation in Afghanistan, which is a growing threat to regional and international peace and security, and demands an urgent and unconditional ceasefire leading to a final end to the hostilities.

The Council reiterates that the Afghan crisis can be settled only by peaceful means, through direct negotiations between the Afghan factions under United Nations auspices, aimed at achieving mutually acceptable solutions accommodating the rights and interests of all ethnic, religious and political groups of Afghan society.

The Council calls upon all Afghan parties to return to the negotiating table without delay and preconditions and to cooperate with the aim of creating a broad-based and fully representative government, which would protect the rights of all Afghans and observe the international obligations of Afghanistan. The Council calls upon all States neighbouring Afghanistan and other States with influence in Afghanistan to intensify their efforts under the aegis of the United Nations to bring the parties to a negotiated settlement.

The Council demands that the Afghan parties and those countries concerned observe fully the provisions of the relevant resolutions on Afghanistan adopted by the General Assembly and the Council.

The Council calls upon all States to refrain from any outside interference in the internal affairs of Afghanistan, including the involvement of foreign military personnel. It reiterates that any such interference from abroad should cease immediately and calls upon all States to end the supply of arms and ammunition to all parties to the conflict and to take resolute measures to prohibit their military personnel from planning and participating in combat operations in Afghanistan.

The Council is deeply concerned at the serious humanitarian crisis in Afghanistan. It calls upon all Afghan parties and, in particular, the Taliban, to take the necessary steps to secure the uninterrupted supply of humanitarian aid to all in need of it and in this connection not to create impediments to the activities of the United Nations humanitarian agencies and international humanitarian organizations. The Council condemns the killing of the two Afghan staff members of the World Food Programme and the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in Jalalabad.

The Council once again urges all Afghan factions to cooperate fully with the United Nations Special Mission to Afghanistan and international humanitarian organizations and calls upon them, in particular the Taliban, to take the necessary steps to assure the safety and freedom of movement of such personnel. The Council deplores the measures taken by the Taliban which have made it impossible for nearly all international humanitarian organizations to continue their work in Kabul. It supports the efforts of the Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs in its current talks with the Taliban in order to ensure adequate conditions for the delivery of aid by humanitarian organizations.

The Council remains deeply concerned at the continuing discrimination against girls and women and other violations of human rights as well as violations of international humanitarian law in Afghanistan.

The Council calls upon all parties to respect international conventions regarding the treatment of prisoners of war and the rights of non-combatants.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 28 August 1998 (3921st meeting): resolution 1193 (1998)

At its 3921st meeting, held on 28 August 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Slovakia) invited the representatives of Afghanistan, Austria, India, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Pakistan, Tajikistan, Turkey and Uzbekistan, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution, submitted by Costa Rica, France, India, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Japan, Kazakhstan, Kenya, Kyrgyzstan, Portugal, the Russian Federation, Slovenia, Sweden, Tajikistan, Turkey, the United Kingdom, the United States and Uzbekistan.⁶⁹

At the outset, the representative of Austria, speaking on behalf of the European Union and the associated and aligned countries,⁷⁰ noted with concern the escalation of the conflict in Afghanistan and called on all factions to cease hostilities and engage in negotiations under United Nations auspices. He expressed concern about the consequences of the latest fighting for the Hazara and strongly urged the Taliban to refrain from all acts of violence, especially against the civilian population. He reiterated that there was no military solution to the Afghan conflict, and that only a political settlement aimed at the establishment of a fully representative, broad-based government, could lead to peace and reconciliation. The European Union strongly deplored the fact that third parties, instead of using their influence on the warring factions to support the efforts to restore peace, continued to interfere in the internal affairs of Afghanistan by supplying the factions with weapons and other materiel. In this connection, the European Union wished to reaffirm its strong commitment to the sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Afghanistan. It strongly urged that all kind of strategic and military support to Afghan factions, including involvement of foreign military personnel, needed to cease. He further underlined that the European Union continued to enforce the embargo on the export of arms, munitions and military equipment. Finally, he stated that the conflict in Afghanistan continued to threaten peace and security and stability in the whole region with the trafficking of drugs as well as providing terrorist bases and training camps. The conflict's repercussions reached far beyond Afghanistan and its neighbours and caused serious damage to States Members of the European Union.⁷¹

The representative of Pakistan stated that no other country had suffered more from the conflict in Afghanistan than Pakistan. As a consequence of continued instability in Afghanistan, Pakistan continued to host more than 1.5 million refugees, and had also been the victim of terrorism, drug trafficking and arms smuggling. He stressed that his country's consistent policy had been the promotion of a peaceful and negotiated settlement in Afghanistan, and had been the only country that had engaged with all the sides in the conflict. He stressed that, while the military fortunes or misfortunes of any of the parties were purely an internal affair of the Afghan people, the new ground realities could not be ignored by the international community. He expressed the belief that there was a distinct possibility for the restoration of peace in Afghanistan. His delegation had been encouraged by the positive pronouncements made by the Afghan authorities in Kabul: that they would grant amnesty to all who surrendered; and that the local commanders were under strict instructions not to indulge in revenge killings. He stressed that the recent air strikes by the United States in Afghanistan against alleged terrorist targets were likely to complicate the situation. In dealing with terrorism, recourse to any means other than established principles and international norms was likely to have a negative effect. It could "spiral out of control" and further complicate matters in a vicious circle of action and retaliation. He stated that the time had now come "for the international community to engage with the authorities in Kabul" and that there was an urgent need for the opening of an effective channel of communication with the "true representatives of Afghanistan and its people". He appealed to the international community to accord formal recognition to the Government in Kabul. The Afghanistan seat at the United Nations needed to be assumed by the "true representatives of the people" and the "non-existing regime of northern Afghanistan" needed to cease to occupy the United Nations seat.⁷²

The representative of Tajikistan stated that the leadership of the Taliban movement had been banking on a military solution to the Afghan problem with the direct and massive support from outside, and that this was a source of apprehension regarding possible armed actions by the Taliban on the Tajik-Afghan border. Expressing concern over the reports regarding "glaring" violations of human rights and international law in Afghanistan, he noted that his country did not exclude the possibility of an uncontrollable surge of Afghan refugees into Tajikistan. He stressed that the events in the north of Afghanistan confirmed the timeliness of the decision to establish a Russian Federation-Tajikistan-Uzbekistan "troika" to counteract religious extremism, which could have a highly negative effect on the peace process in Tajikistan. There was a need for urgent practical steps on the part of the United Nations aimed at stepping up assistance for a peaceful settlement in Afghanistan, such as holding high-level meetings in the region for representatives of States Members of the "six plus two" group to consider a concrete plan for a settlement to the conflict.⁷³

The representative of India stated that peace and stability in Afghanistan were in the security interest of India, as they were for almost all of the neighbours of Afghanistan. In respecting the unity, independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Afghanistan, India was concerned that all the evidence pointed to a de facto invasion of Afghanistan by foreign military forces in support of the Taliban. The fighting in Afghanistan was both exploiting and heightening ethnic differences. If this continued, the unity and independence of Afghanistan would be in danger and, if Afghanistan unravelled, the impact would be felt across the region. He further noted that “ruthless terrorist organizations” had used Afghanistan as a base to recruit, train and harbour operatives who were sent abroad to “carry out atrocities”. That was an issue of particular concern to India as it had been the victim of State-sponsored, cross-border terrorism.⁷⁴

⁷³ Ibid., pp. 6-7.

The representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran stated that, as a neighbour, Iran was seriously concerned about the following threats: the continued violence close to its borders; the danger of violence and conflict spilling over into its territory; the flow of more refugees as a result of the escalation of the conflict and of displacement by the Taliban of groups of the Afghan population on ethnic and religious grounds; the escalation of drug cultivation and trafficking; and the continued presence and activities of terrorist elements and terrorist organizations in that country. He further expressed concern about the fate of the personnel of the Iranian Consulate-General in Mazar-e-Sharif, which had been seized by the Taliban.⁷⁵

The representative of Uzbekistan expressed concern that the continuing military action in Afghanistan posed a major threat to international and regional peace and security, particularly in the region of Central Asia. He noted that one of the main concerns of his Government was the continuing supply of arms and ammunition to the parties to the Afghan conflict and the unabated foreign interference in Afghanistan. Furthermore, Uzbekistan believed that the United Nations needed to play a central and impartial role in international efforts towards a peaceful resolution of the Afghan conflict. He also reiterated his delegation’s position that the activities of the “six plus two” group were a very important part of the achievement of a peaceful resolution to the Afghan conflict. In conclusion, he reaffirmed the proposal of his Government that a meeting of the “six plus two” group be held in the region.⁷⁶

⁷⁵ Ibid.; see also S/1998/776.

⁷⁶ Ibid., pp. 10-11.

The representative of Afghanistan maintained that the statement by the delegation of Pakistan was “nothing but a commitment to the pursuit of a policy of intervention and hegemony based on Pakistan’s attitude of blatancy and impunity towards Afghanistan”. He stated that some elements killed in the United States missile strikes on the terrorist camps in eastern Afghanistan had been “identified by both intelligence sources and the world news media as Pakistani nationals, either plain-clothes army officers of the Pakistani Government or members of the organizations based in Pakistan evidently engaged in terrorist activities worldwide”. He underscored that only an immediate halt to the Pakistani interventions in Afghanistan, and thereby the establishment of a broad-based, fully representative Government in the country, would lead to an early return of lasting peace and civility.⁷⁷

At the resumption of the same meeting, the representative of the Russian Federation stated that the Taliban had undertaken another attempt by force of arms to extend their control over the entire territory of Afghanistan. This new phase of the civil war was destabilizing the situation in the entire region of Central Asia and beyond. It created a direct threat to the southern borders of CIS. Noting that the military expansion of the Taliban movement in the northern region of Afghanistan was being carried out with direct external assistance and the involvement of military personnel, he stressed that foreign interference in the Afghan conflict needed to cease. His delegation was deeply concerned about ethnic and religious-based persecution, ethnically motivated acts of forced displacement of large segments of the population and violations of international conventions relating to the treatment of prisoners of war and of the rights of persons not involved in combat. In conclusion, he stressed that his delegation was convinced that there could be no military solution to the Afghan conflict. He strongly supported efforts aimed at a political settlement in Afghanistan that responded to the interests of all Afghans.⁷⁸

The representative of China noted that Afghanistan was a multi-ethnic country whose ethnic disputes had deep historical roots. That, in addition to the involvement of outside forces, had made the situation in Afghanistan even more complex. He expressed the belief that any military advance was temporary. Both the history and the realities of Afghanistan had demonstrated that military means were not helpful to finding a solution. He maintained that the resumption of negotiations among all the factions in Afghanistan, under United Nations auspices, was the only way to a solution of the conflict in Afghanistan.⁷⁹

⁷⁸ S/PV.3921 (Resumption), pp. 2-3.

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the recent fighting had threatened the peace and stability of the region. He reiterated that only a political settlement negotiated between the factions and accommodating the rights and interests of all Afghans could achieve a durable peace. His delegation strongly supported the demand that the Afghan factions stop fighting and enter urgently into negotiations, under United Nations auspices, aimed at creating a fully representative, broad-based government. He stressed that the worrying aspect of the current situation was the increasingly ethnic nature of the conflict. He also stressed that his country remained deeply concerned by continuing reports of outside interference in the internal affairs of Afghanistan.⁸⁰

The representative of France, recalling resolution 1076 (1996), reiterated that the Afghan parties needed to put an end to hostilities without delay and without preconditions and engage in true political dialogue aimed at achieving national reconciliation. He stressed that outside interference, especially in the form of arms supplies, needed to cease.⁸¹

The representative of the United States emphasized that no faction in Afghanistan could impose its will on the entire country through military action. A lasting settlement could be achieved only by establishing a representative and broad-based multi-ethnic Government that could effectively govern and honour the international obligations of Afghanistan. He called on the Afghan factions to facilitate the delivery of humanitarian aid by the United Nations and non-governmental organizations and urged the Afghan factions to cease all assistance to terrorists, including providing sanctuary, and to expel them from

Afghanistan. He asked the neighbours of Afghanistan to not interfere or take any actions that could further inflame the conflict at that critical time.⁸²

A number of other speakers expressed grave concern at the situation in Afghanistan, particularly the violations of human rights. They stressed that political dialogue and a broad-based government in which all groups were represented remained the only solution to the conflict.⁸³

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1193 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Having considered the situation in Afghanistan,

Recalling its resolution 1076 (1996) of 22 October 1996 and the statements by the President of the Security Council on the situation in Afghanistan,

Recalling also General Assembly resolutions 52/211 A and B of 19 December 1997,

Expressing its grave concern at the continued Afghan conflict which has recently escalated sharply as a result of the offensive by the Taliban forces in the northern parts of the country, causing a serious and growing threat to regional and international peace and security, as well as extensive human suffering, further destruction, refugee flows and other forcible displacement of large numbers of people,

Concerned by the increasingly ethnic nature of the conflict, by reports of ethnicity and religion-based persecution, particularly against the Shiites, and by the threat this poses to the unity of the Afghan State,

Reaffirming its strong commitment to the sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Afghanistan, and its respect for its cultural and historical heritage,

Deploring the fact that despite repeated pleas by the Council, the General Assembly and the Secretary-General to halt foreign interference in Afghanistan, including the involvement of foreign military personnel and the supply of arms and ammunition to all parties in the conflict, such interference continues unabated,

Expressing its grave concern at the capture by the Taliban of the Consulate-General of the Islamic Republic of Iran in Mazar-e-Sharif and at the fate of the personnel of the Consulate-General and of other Iranian nationals missing in Afghanistan,

Deeply disturbed by the deteriorating security conditions for United Nations and other international and humanitarian personnel,

Decision of 15 September 1998 (3926th meeting): statement by the President

At its 3926th meeting, held on 15 September 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁸⁴

The Security Council strongly condemns the murder of Iranian diplomats in Afghanistan by Taliban combatants. This was a crime committed in flagrant violation of international law and despite repeated assurances by the Taliban leaders guaranteeing the safety and security of the personnel of foreign missions in Mazar-e-Sharif. The killing of Iranian diplomats by Taliban combatants has seriously increased tension in the region.

The Council expresses its deepest condolences to the families of the Iranian diplomats and to the Government of the Islamic Republic of Iran. It believes that this criminal act should be fully investigated with the participation of the United Nations with a view to prosecuting those responsible. The Council demands that the Taliban release other Iranians detained in Afghanistan and ensure their safe and dignified passage out of Afghanistan without further delay.

The Council recalls its condemnation of the murders of members of the United Nations Special Mission to Afghanistan and the personnel of humanitarian agencies in areas controlled by the Taliban and demands that these crimes be investigated and the Taliban ensure the safety and security of all international personnel.

The Council expresses its deep concern at the escalating military operations in the Bamyan province and at reports of mass killings of civilians in northern Afghanistan. It demands that the Taliban fully respect international humanitarian law and human rights.

⁸⁴ S/PRST/1998/27.

The Council calls upon all concerned to exercise maximum restraint. It also calls upon the parties, in particular the Taliban, to take action in response to the strong concerns expressed by the international community, to stop fighting and resume negotiations aimed at achieving a peaceful settlement of the conflict on the basis of the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly and of the Council.

The Council will keep the situation under close review and is prepared to consider urgently further action.

Decision of 8 December 1998 (3952nd meeting): resolution 1214 (1998)

On 23 November 1998, pursuant to resolution 1193 (1998), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in Afghanistan and its implications for international peace and security.⁸⁵ In his report, the Secretary-General noted that Afghanistan, once a flashpoint of superpower rivalry, had become the stage for a new, regional version of the “Great Game”, in which the economic and security interests of the country’s neighbours and their supporters were played out. A vicious cycle had developed in which the inability of the Afghan factions to agree to a political settlement was both the cause and the effect of persistent outside interference in the affairs of Afghanistan. He stated that the Taliban had taken control of most of the country and the anti-Taliban coalition, with the exception of the fighters under the command of Ahmed Shah Massoud, appeared to have been largely eliminated as a viable fighting force. He further said that the success of the Taliban on the battlefield appeared to have diminished the willingness of some parties to negotiate further and had also increased the prospect of a deeper regionalization of the conflict. The Secretary-General remained convinced that a durable settlement could be achieved only through a ceasefire and the start of a political dialogue among the Afghans leading to national reconciliation. While appreciating the “six plus two” group as a useful forum to discuss the Afghan issues, he stated that he was somewhat disappointed “by the failure of some of those countries to narrow their differences and to cease supplying the weapons and other war materiel that fuel the conflict in Afghanistan”. At that juncture, he welcomed the proposal to convene a ministerial meeting of the group in Tashkent, with the participation of all major Afghan factions. The Secretary-General welcomed the success of his Special Envoy in defusing a possible military confrontation between the Islamic Republic of Iran and the Taliban during the envoy's recent visit to the region, following the murder of the Iranian diplomats and the journalist in Mazar-e-Sharif in August 1998. Expressing concern at reports of mass killings and other forms of gross violations of human rights and international humanitarian law, he proposed to establish a separate civil affairs unit in UNSMA, with the primary objective of promoting respect for humanitarian standards and deterring future violations of human rights.

By a letter dated 23 November 1998,⁸⁶ the Secretary-General informed the Council of his intention, with the agreement of the Council, to establish a Civil Affairs Unit within UNSMA and proposed to send an assessment mission to Afghanistan in order to determine the exact mandate, composition and location of the civil monitors.

At its 3952nd meeting, held on 8 December 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General and the letter dated 23 November 1998 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Bahrain) invited the representatives of the Islamic Republic of Iran and Pakistan, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁸⁷

At the outset, the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran underlined that the capture by the Taliban of the Consulate-General of the Islamic Republic of Iran and the murder of the Iranian diplomats and a journalist added to the already chronic and complex problems in Afghanistan, which threatened regional and international peace and security. His delegation remained deeply concerned about the political and humanitarian situation in Afghanistan. The persistence of the Taliban in seeking a military solution, despite the wishes of the international community and repeated pleas by the Security Council, continued to pose an increasing threat to regional peace and security. He maintained that the historical realities and the traditional structure of Afghanistan as a multi-ethnic country made it abundantly clear that no single group or ethnicity, however supported by outside forces, could rule over the country and bring back peace and normalcy to Afghanistan. The solution lay in a resolute process of international persuasion for inter-Afghan political negotiations under the auspices of the United Nations.⁸⁸

The representative of Pakistan urged the international community to adjust to "the new realities on the ground" by recognizing the Kabul authorities as the de jure and de facto Government of Afghanistan. He maintained that despite significant modifications of the original text, the draft resolution continued to have "a number of significant shortcomings", including the failure to acknowledge that the Taliban controlled 90 per cent of the country and the forces of Massoud continued to shell Kabul. He stated that the overall tone and tenor of the draft resolution was thus biased against one party to the conflict. That and its noticeable and numerous omissions did not augur well for the image of the United Nations, or of the Security Council for that matter, as an impartial player. With regard to the Security Council expressing its readiness to consider the imposition of measures against the Taliban, he stressed that it was likely to send the wrong signal to the Kabul authorities. His delegation strongly believed that dialogue and engagement, rather than coercion and intimidation, would produce the desired results.⁸⁹

Speaking before the vote, the representative of the Russian Federation stated that the escalation of military activities in the north of Afghanistan by the Taliban was a real threat to the southern borders of CIS and, together with other members of CIS, reserved the right of his Government to take all necessary measures to ensure the proper protection of its borders, including measures in accordance with existing international legal commitments. He maintained that the military expansion of the Taliban in northern Afghanistan was being carried out with the direct involvement of foreign military personnel. His delegation called on the Taliban leadership to immediately halt military activities and establish a long-term ceasefire and commence serious negotiations regarding ways and means to establish peace in the country. Only through the steadfast implementation of United Nations decisions by the Taliban, could there be a basis for constructive interaction with other Afghan parties and the world community to establish a lasting peace in Afghanistan.⁹⁰

The representative of the United States stated that by adopting the draft resolution, the Council had taken a clear stand against terrorism and those who provided safe haven to terrorists. She called on all Afghan factions, particularly the Taliban, to abide by the Council resolutions and to ensure that all indicted terrorists on their soil were brought to justice. She condemned the killing of the Iranian diplomatic staff at the Consulate-General in Mazar-e-Sharif, expressed support for an international investigation into those deaths and reminded all Afghan factions of the special protected status of diplomats under international law. She also stressed their support for the demand of the draft resolution that the Taliban immediately inform the United Nations of the results of their investigation into the deaths of United Nations workers in Kabul and Jalalabad.⁹¹

The representative of China was deeply concerned by the fact that fighting had continued in Afghanistan and that a political solution to the conflict remained elusive. Afghanistan was a multi-ethnic country, where ethnic problems had deep roots in history. With the involvement of outside forces, the complex of tensions and contradictions had become even more entrenched. His delegation sincerely hoped that the Afghan factions responded positively to the appeal of the international community and endeavoured through negotiations to establish a broad-based representative government and to restore peace and stability as soon as possible. At the same time, he expected the international community to make concerted efforts to prevent outside forces from meddling in the Afghan conflict so as to create external conditions that would allow the silencing of the guns in Afghanistan. He expressed hope that the international community would exert a positive influence and that any action taken by the Security Council would contribute to the resumption of talks among the Afghan factions with a view to agreement on a plan for a political settlement.⁹²

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that it was deeply disturbing that some countries that professed to support peace in Afghanistan continued to prolong the war by supplying the factions with arms and funding. The call on all States to demonstrate their commitment to peace by stopping the supply of arms was as clear and strong in the draft resolution before the Council as it was in resolution 1193 (1998), and all Member States had to comply with that call. He maintained that there could be no question of the Security Council taking sides in the Afghan conflict. As the report of the Secretary-General made clear, all factions were guilty of abusing human rights, and violating Security Council and General Assembly resolutions. The responsibility of the Council required it to increase the pressure on all factions to stop the fighting and to recognize that the conflict could only have a political solution, which safeguarded the rights of all ethnic and religious groups in Afghanistan. He stated that the international community needed to prevent the conflict from threatening lives beyond the borders of Afghanistan through the export of international terrorism and illegal drugs. His delegation welcomed the work of the "six plus two" group and urged them to redouble their efforts.⁹³

The representative of France stated that the draft resolution before the Council was necessary because it described a situation of ongoing conflict, external interference, discrimination, the assassination of Iranian diplomatic personnel, the murders of high-ranking United Nations officials, humanitarian crisis and unacceptable constraints imposed upon humanitarian agencies and non-government organizations. He maintained that the fighting went on and the negotiations between the parties had yet to resume. The United Front was prepared to open a political dialogue with the Taliban and to conclude a ceasefire, but the Taliban, for its part, had shown no readiness to resume the negotiations or to put an end to hostilities. He said that it was, therefore, fitting that the draft resolution, while referring to all the factions, concerned the Taliban first and foremost. It was also appropriate that the draft reflected the idea that the Council was prepared to consider imposing further measures in order fully to implement its resolutions.⁹⁴

A number of other speakers appealed to all internal and external parties to the conflict, to find an early and negotiated settlement to the armed conflict. Most speakers demanded that the Afghan factions, and the Taliban in particular, put an immediate end to military confrontation, conclude a ceasefire, and cease all activities contrary to international humanitarian law.⁹⁵

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1214 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Having considered the situation in Afghanistan,

Reaffirming its previous resolutions, in particular resolutions 1189 (1998) of 13 August 1998 and 1193 (1998) of 28 August 1998, and the statements by its President on the situation in Afghanistan,

Recalling General Assembly resolutions 52/211 A and B of 19 December 1997,

Expressing its grave concern at the continued Afghan conflict, which has recently escalated sharply as a result of the offensive by the Taliban forces, which is continuing despite the repeated pleas by the Security Council to cease the fighting, and is causing a serious and growing threat to regional and international peace and security, as well as extensive human suffering, further destruction, refugee flows and other forcible displacement of large numbers of people,

Deploring the fact that despite the readiness of the United Front of Afghanistan to conclude a durable ceasefire and to enter into a political dialogue with the Taliban, fighting continues on both sides,

Concerned by the increasingly ethnic nature of the conflict, by reports of ethnic and religious-based persecution, particularly against the Shiites, and by the threat this poses to the unity of the Afghan State,

Reaffirming its strong commitment to the sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of

Afghanistan, and its respect for its cultural and historical heritage,

Reiterating that any outside interference in the internal affairs of Afghanistan, including the involvement of foreign military personnel and the supply of arms and ammunition to all parties to the conflict, should cease immediately,

Reaffirming its full support for the efforts of the United Nations, in particular the activities of the United Nations Special Mission to Afghanistan and those of the Special Envoy of the Secretary-General for Afghanistan, in facilitating the political process towards the goals of national reconciliation and a lasting political settlement with the participation of all parties to the conflict and all segments of Afghan society, and reiterating its position that the United Nations must continue to play its central and impartial role in international efforts towards a peaceful resolution of the Afghan conflict,

Welcoming the work of the “six plus two” group, and supporting in this regard the “points of common understanding” adopted at its meeting at the level of Ministers for Foreign Affairs, convened and chaired by the Secretary-General on 21 September 1998,

Deeply concerned at the serious and rapidly deteriorating humanitarian crisis in Afghanistan, deploring in this regard the measures taken by the Taliban which resulted in the evacuation of the United Nations humanitarian personnel from Afghanistan, and underlining the urgent need for the prompt implementation of the necessary security requirements to allow their early return,

Reaffirming that all parties to the conflict are bound to comply with their obligations under international humanitarian law and, in particular, under the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and that persons who commit or order the commission of breaches of the Conventions are individually responsible in respect of such breaches,

Deeply disturbed by the continuing use of Afghan territory, especially areas controlled by the Taliban, for the sheltering and training of terrorists and the planning of terrorist acts, and reiterating that the suppression of international terrorism is essential for the maintenance of international peace and security,

Deeply disturbed also by the growing cultivation, production and trafficking of drugs in Afghanistan, especially in areas controlled by the Taliban,

Reiterating its deep concern at the continuing discrimination against girls and women and at other violations of human rights and of international humanitarian law in Afghanistan,

1. Demands that the Taliban, as well as other Afghan factions, stop fighting, conclude a ceasefire and resume negotiations without delay and preconditions under the auspices of the United Nations, and cooperate with the aim of creating a broad-based and fully representative government, which would

7. Supports the proposal of the Secretary-General, as contained in his letter dated 23 November 1998 to the President of the Security Council, to establish within the Special Mission, without prejudice to its mandate and taking into account security conditions, a civil affairs unit with the primary objective of monitoring the situation, promoting respect for minimum humanitarian standards and deterring massive and systematic violations of human rights and humanitarian law in the future, and to send an assessment mission to Afghanistan, as soon as security conditions permit, in order to determine the exact mandate, composition and location of the civilian monitors;

16. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Deliberations of 27 August 1999 (4039th meeting)

At its 4039th meeting, held on 27 August 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Namibia) invited the representatives of Afghanistan, Egypt, Finland, India, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Japan, Kazakhstan, Norway, Pakistan, Tajikistan, Turkey, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The Council also extended an invitation, under rule 39 of the provisional rules of procedure, to the Under-Secretary-General for Political Affairs and the Permanent Observer of the Organization of the Islamic Conference.⁹⁶

The Under-Secretary-General for Political Affairs briefed the Council on the deteriorating military situation in Afghanistan following the launch of the long-anticipated Taliban offensive on 28 July, and on the consequences of the resumed fighting on the political, human rights and humanitarian situations. He noted that the attacks had been reinforced by a large influx of recruits from religious schools in Pakistan, with the participation of an estimated 2,000 to 5,000 students of Afghan and other nationalities. He stated that the involvement of neighbouring and other countries in the Afghan conflict not only continued to fuel the fighting but also brought into question the practical significance of the various declarations adopted by the members of the “six plus two” group, including the Tashkent Declaration on Fundamental Principles for a Peaceful Settlement of the Conflict in Afghanistan. He added that the disunity among the “six plus two” members could call into further question the relevance of that group as presently constituted. The Secretary-General hoped that the debate in the Council would generate new ideas and approaches to end the senseless fighting in Afghanistan.⁹⁷

The representative of Afghanistan stated that the aggression and state-sponsored terrorism of Pakistan, which posed a threat to the peace and security of the region and hampered regional development and cooperation, needed to be condemned and dealt with by taking appropriate measures. He accused the Taliban of launching an “all-out offensive” on the Shomali plains, north of Kabul, “aided and accompanied by Pakistani consignments”, just nine days after the group’s meeting in Tashkent. Citing paragraph 15 of resolution 1214 (1998), he urged the Council to consider the immediate imposition of sanctions against the Taliban and “their Pakistani mentor”.⁹⁸

The representative of the Russian Federation, while appreciating the role of the United Nations, stated that his country, mindful of the principle of a peaceful solution to the conflict, earnestly desired a broad-based, fully representative and multi-ethnic government in Afghanistan. He stated that his delegation strongly opposed the continuing escalation of the fighting in Afghanistan by the Taliban and condemned the policy of the Taliban leadership of using force to solve the Afghan problem. He noted the particular cynicism displayed by the Taliban in carrying out a major offensive literally two days after the conclusion of the Tashkent meeting of the “Group of friends and neighbours of Afghanistan”. His country was seriously concerned by the increasing external interference in the internal affairs of Afghanistan and called on Pakistan to take immediate measures to prevent its territory from being used to provide military support to the Taliban in line with the commitments made by Pakistan, along with the other members of the “six plus two” group, in accordance with the Tashkent Declaration. His delegation could not accept the continuation of a situation in which the territory of Afghanistan was used to support international terrorism and extremism of all stripes and also to encourage the illegal production of and trafficking in narcotics. In connection with such developments that directly affected the security of the Russian Federation, his country, jointly with partners in CIS, would continue to take all necessary measures. While expressing satisfaction with the results of the meeting of the “six plus two” group, held in July in Tashkent, he stressed that the group needed to increase its efforts aimed at achieving a political settlement to the conflict, and that the Security Council needed to support it in every way possible.⁹⁹

The representative of China stated that his Government offered encouragement and support to the conflicting parties in Afghanistan to put the interests of their nation above everything else, disregard their ethnic, religious and political differences, stop fighting among themselves and establish a broad-based and stable government acceptable to all sides, on the basis of mutual respect and extensive consultations. He stressed that military means would not advance the achievement of a final settlement of the issue, and the only way to achieve such a settlement was for all the parties in Afghanistan to return to negotiations under the auspices of the United Nations. He also stated that the United Nations might want to consider imposing a stringent arms embargo on Afghanistan and formulating a specific monitoring mechanism in order to stop the provision of military assistance to the various factions in Afghanistan.¹⁰⁰

The representative of the United States, expressing grave concern about the most recent Taliban

offensive and subsequent retreat, stated that this had again demonstrated the futility of any attempt to impose a military solution. Only by the formation of a broad-based government that represented the interests of all Afghans could a lasting resolution of the conflict be achieved. Her delegation supported the continuing efforts of the United Nations and the group of “six plus two” to help shape the outcome through a ceasefire, the exchange of prisoners and the resumption of negotiations. She expressed deep concern that the Afghan territory, particularly that under Taliban control, continued to be used for the sheltering and training of terrorists and for terrorist acts. Citing resolution 1214 (1998), in which the Council expressed its readiness to consider the imposition of measures with the aim of achieving full implementation of its resolutions, she warned that if, in defiance of Security Council resolutions, the Taliban failed to end their protection of terrorists, the international community should bring “increasing and certain pressure” to bear on them.¹⁰¹

The representative of France stated that the internal situation in Afghanistan had undergone a clear deterioration following the new offensive waged in the north. He was particularly concerned by these developments, which were blocking a settlement of the conflict by peaceful means, flouting the Tashkent Declaration of 19 July 1999 and exacerbating the terrible situation of the civilian population. He noted that the refusal of the Taliban to engage in constructive dialogue with the United Front was a major obstacle to the implementation of a peaceful solution. He demanded that the various Afghan factions cease sheltering of and training terrorist organizations and halted the production of and trade in illegal drugs. He also demanded an immediate cessation to all foreign interference in the Afghan conflict, and in particular the sending of arms and volunteers to the factions.¹⁰²

The representatives of the United Kingdom stated that the neighbours of Afghanistan needed to face facts and commit themselves wholeheartedly to a negotiated settlement. Pakistan, with its unique influence over the Taliban, had a particularly important role to play. He recalled that the Taliban and the Northern Alliance had at last acknowledged the “six plus two” group as a valid mechanism, which could help bring progress. In the next few months, all concerned needed to find a way to build on the Tashkent Declaration and lock the parties into a genuine negotiation.¹⁰³

The representative of Finland, speaking on behalf of the European Union and associated and aligned countries,¹⁰⁴ stated that the European Union was deeply concerned at the recent escalation of the military confrontation in Afghanistan. It was dismayed that the Taliban had ignored the call in the Tashkent Declaration for the Afghan conflict to be settled through peaceful political negotiation and had instead launched a major offensive. He reiterated the position of the European Union that there was no military solution to the conflict, and that only a political settlement, aimed at the establishment of a fully representative, broad-based Government could lead to peace and reconciliation. He reiterated that the European Union had reaffirmed its strong commitment to the sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Afghanistan and strongly condemned all foreign interference in Afghanistan. He recalled that the European Union continued to enforce the embargo on the export of arms, munitions and military equipment provided for in its Common Position of 17 December 1996 on Afghanistan, and urged other countries to adopt a similar policy of restraint. He also expressed strong support for the proposal of the Secretary-General to add a new function to UNSMA by establishing a separate civil affairs unit within the Mission whose primary objectives would be to promote respect for humanitarian standards and deter massive and systematic violations of human rights and humanitarian law in the future.¹⁰⁵

The representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran stated that the recourse of the Taliban to violence against ethnic groups tended to further polarize the multi-ethnic Afghan society and consequently aggravated the situation. That trend posed a serious threat to the future of the country as a whole. He expressed deep concern that the path taken by the Taliban might jeopardize the unity of Afghanistan and lead to a situation that endangered the national security of the neighbouring countries and thus further destabilize the region. He pointed out that the continuation of military offensives by the Taliban, which could not be carried out without outside political and military support, certainly destabilized the whole region. The engagement of an ever-growing number of non-Afghan nationals, fighting alongside the Taliban forces, could change the Afghan conflict into a transnational one. The persistence of that dangerous element could cause the conflict to spread beyond Afghan borders. He stressed that the Council needed to review the situation in Afghanistan with a view to taking a number of concrete measures in line with its previous resolutions aimed at compelling the Taliban to heed the demands of the international community concerning peace in Afghanistan.¹⁰⁶

The representative of India stated that the territories in Afghanistan that the Taliban had occupied through military force had become a breeding ground for international terrorism, which had also found a safe haven in the areas straddling the southern borders of Afghanistan. He stressed that the efforts of the international community to bring peace and stability to Afghanistan had to be active and purposeful. Those efforts had to be channelled through the United Nations and all countries that had an interest and influence in Afghanistan needed to be brought within the ambit of those peacemaking efforts.¹⁰⁷

The representative of Tajikistan reiterated that his country was very seriously concerned at the situation that prevailed in neighbouring Afghanistan, because the “hot breath” from the Afghan conflict was felt in the immediate vicinity and all along the 1,500 kilometre border shared with Afghanistan. He called upon the Taliban movement to halt military action and enter into peace negotiations. He emphasized the need to halt direct foreign military interference in the internal affairs of Afghanistan. His country was firmly convinced that the Council needed to take concrete measures to force the perpetrators of the short-sighted destructive policy on Afghanistan to heed the clear demands in the resolutions relating to the Afghan settlement. He believed that the “six plus two” group needed to make a more important contribution and were obliged to agree as soon as possible on a specific formula for resolving the crisis in Afghanistan. He stated that Tajikistan was prepared to support any international efforts under the aegis of the United Nations to bring about a radical change in the situation in Afghanistan. In that connection, he again reaffirmed the proposal regarding the need to convene an international conference on Afghanistan, to encourage the Afghan parties to enter into serious talks on fundamental problems of an Afghan settlement.¹⁰⁸

The representative of Uzbekistan stressed that the Afghan conflict had grown from an internal problem of Afghanistan into a conflict of regional scale. In that context, some of his delegation’s main concerns were the use of Afghan territory for terrorist activities and for the training and concealing of international terrorists and their organizations, a policy whose consequences created a great danger not only for the region of Central Asia itself, but also for wider international peace and stability. Afghanistan had become one of the main exporters of international terrorism and religious extremism, as well as the largest producer and supplier of narcotics in the world. One of the main concerns of his Government was the continued supply of arms and ammunition to the parties to the Afghan conflict and the unabated foreign interference in Afghanistan. He maintained that the Tashkent meeting of the “six plus two” and its political Declaration had provided a solid basis for the achievement of a regional consensus among the members of the group, elaborated common principles and a single approach to the resolution of the Afghan conflict, and provided an opportunity for the Afghan parties to renew the negotiating process.¹⁰⁹

The representative of Turkmenistan stated that the internal conflict in Afghanistan, which had lasted many years and which had been caused by foreign intervention 20 years ago, was a source of grief in her country. She noted that Turkmenistan remained the only country that maintained an ongoing presence in Afghanistan. Although the domestic political situation had changed, the consular office of Turkmenistan had remained, because it ensured the normal functioning of the border. For neutral Turkmenistan the border was not a fence, but was an instrument for carrying out a foreign policy that sought to help establish an atmosphere of peace, security and mutually advantageous partnership in the region. Turkmenistan would maintain relations with Afghans irrespective of what position was adopted. She called on the United Nations to be more active and to focus its efforts on one goal: the resumption of a direct inter-Afghan dialogue without any discriminatory evaluations of any Afghan party, and particularly without the imposition of any formulas or outside participants. She stated that in the efforts of the United Nations and of all those concerned to see a solution to the Afghan conflict, an important role needed to be played by countries that bore a special responsibility, in particular the five permanent members of the Security Council, States that were the immediate neighbours of Afghanistan and the major regional Powers — India, Turkey and Saudi Arabia. She stated that Turkmenistan, which had direct ongoing relations with the parties to the Afghan conflict, was prepared to continue to promote the process of seeking peace, with the agreement of the Afghans.¹¹⁰

The representative of Pakistan maintained that however ardently his country desired to insulate itself from events in Afghanistan, it could not do so. The 2,500 kilometre-long border shared by Pakistan and Afghanistan consisted of extremely difficult terrain and had always been very porous. Historically, there had been tribal movements from Afghanistan to Pakistan during the winter months and back to Afghanistan during the summers. Millions of Afghan refugees trekked to Pakistan after the Soviet occupation, and their movement to and from Afghanistan had since been largely uncontrolled. Pakistan had to cope with those realities, which was the fundamental difference between its situation and those of others. The reality in Afghanistan was also that the Taliban controlled 90 per cent of the territory, including the capital. He stressed that the international community needed to recognize this reality. Due to the major economic and social costs that Pakistan had had to bear and the price that the people of Pakistan had paid and continued to pay in terms of the impact on the quality of their lives and on their personal security, a peaceful and stable Afghanistan with its unity, territorial integrity and sovereignty fully intact was in the highest national interest of Pakistan. He emphasized that a durable peace in Afghanistan was possible only on the basis of an intra-Afghan consensus and that any solution to the Afghan conflict had to be indigenous. Afghan history was witness to the fact that external solutions could not be imposed on the fiercely independent people of Afghanistan. He stressed that Pakistan understood this reality and had no desire to interfere in the internal affairs of Afghanistan. Pakistan did not lend any support to any side in Afghanistan, but some countries in the neighbourhood and beyond were doing so by various means, including provision of defence experts, military equipment and even landmines. He agreed with the proposal of China for an arms embargo on Afghanistan and noted that his delegation had also proposed the imposition of a verifiable arms embargo applicable to the whole of Afghanistan. With regard to moves for the imposition of sanctions against the Taliban, his delegation firmly believed that sanctions would be counter-productive, as they would give rise to the feeling of injustice and victimization, which could strengthen extremist sentiments. Finally, he expressed support for the decisions adopted by the “six plus two” group and believed that the group needed to continue and intensify its laudable efforts.¹¹¹

A number of speakers expressed concern at the deterioration of the situation in Afghanistan and called on the parties to cease hostilities and return to the negotiating table under the auspices of the United Nations. Most speakers expressed support for the work of the “six plus two” group. Several speakers expressed concern over the production of drugs and drug trafficking, as well as the harbouring of international terrorism in Afghanistan.¹¹²

At its 4051st meeting, held on 15 October 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (the Russian Federation) invited the representatives of Afghanistan and the

Islamic Republic of Iran, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution, submitted by Canada, the Netherlands, the Russian Federation, Slovakia, the United Kingdom and the United States.¹¹³

At the outset, the representative of Afghanistan expressed support for the draft resolution, which would send an “adequate signal to the Taliban and to their Pakistani mentors”, indicating that the international community was extremely concerned about the policy of Pakistan and the Taliban, which was a major threat to international peace and security.¹¹⁴

The representative of the United States stated that the adoption of the draft resolution would send a strong message to the Taliban that the continued harbouring of Osama bin Laden posed a threat to international peace and security. The draft resolution would bring new pressure on the Taliban to turn over Osama bin Laden to authorities in a country where he would be brought to justice. It also established a Committee to monitor implementation of sanctions.¹¹⁵

While announcing that they would vote in favour of the draft resolution, the representatives of Malaysia¹¹⁶ and Bahrain¹¹⁷ expressed concern about measures in the draft resolution which might affect the civilian population.

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1267 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its previous resolutions, in particular resolutions 1189 (1998) of 13 August 1998, 1193 (1998) of 28 August 1998 and 1214 (1998) of 8 December 1998, and the statements by its President on the situation in Afghanistan,

Reaffirming its strong commitment to the sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Afghanistan, and its respect for Afghanistan’s cultural and historical heritage,

Reiterating its deep concern over the continuing violations of international humanitarian law and of human rights, particularly discrimination against women and girls, and over the significant rise in the illicit production of opium, and stressing that the capture by the Taliban of the Consul-General of the Islamic Republic of Iran and the murder of Iranian diplomats and a journalist in Mazar e Sharif constituted flagrant violations of established international law,

Recalling the relevant international counter-terrorism conventions and in particular the obligations of parties to those conventions to extradite or prosecute terrorists,

Strongly condemning the continuing use of Afghan territory, especially areas controlled by the Taliban, for the sheltering and training of terrorists and planning of terrorist acts, and reaffirming its conviction that the suppression of international terrorism is essential for the maintenance of international peace and security,

Deploing the fact that the Taliban continues to provide safe haven to Osama bin Laden and to allow him and others associated with him to operate a network of terrorist training camps from Taliban-controlled territory and to use Afghanistan as a base from which to sponsor international terrorist operations,

Noting the indictment of Osama bin Laden and his associates by the United States of America for, inter alia, the 7 August 1998 bombings of the United States embassies in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam and for conspiring to kill American nationals outside the United States, and noting also the request of the United States to the Taliban to surrender them for trial,

Determining that the failure of the Taliban authorities to respond to the demands in paragraph 13 of resolution 1214 (1998) constitutes a threat to international peace and security,

Stressing its determination to ensure respect for its resolutions,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Insists that the Afghan faction known as the Taliban, which also calls itself the Islamic Emirate of Afghanistan, comply promptly with its previous resolutions and in particular cease the provision of sanctuary and training for international terrorists and their organizations, take appropriate effective measures to ensure that the territory under its control is not used for terrorist installations and camps, or for the preparation or organization of terrorist acts against other States or their citizens, and cooperate with efforts to bring indicted terrorists to justice;

2. Demands that the Taliban turn over Osama bin Laden without further delay to appropriate authorities in a country where he has been indicted, or to appropriate authorities in a country where he will be returned to such a country, or to appropriate authorities in a country where he will be arrested and effectively brought to justice;

(a) Deny permission for any aircraft to take off from or land in their territory if it is owned, leased or operated by or on behalf of the Taliban as designated by the Committee established by paragraph 6 below, unless the particular flight has been approved in advance by the Committee on the grounds of humanitarian need, including religious obligation such as the performance of the Hajj;

(b) Freeze funds and other financial resources, including funds derived or generated from property owned or controlled directly or indirectly by the Taliban, or by any undertaking owned or controlled by the Taliban, as designated by the Committee established by paragraph 6 below, and ensure that neither they nor any other funds or financial resources so designated are made available, by their nationals or by any persons within their territory, to or for the benefit of the Taliban or any undertaking owned or controlled, directly or indirectly, by the Taliban, except as may be authorized by the Committee on a case-by-case basis on the grounds of humanitarian need;

5. Urges all States to cooperate with efforts to fulfil the demand in paragraph 2 above, and to consider further measures against Osama bin Laden and his associates;

(f) To consider requests for exemptions from the measures imposed by paragraph 4 above as provided for in that paragraph, and to decide on the granting of an exemption to these measures in respect of the payment by the International Air Transport Association to the aeronautical authority of Afghanistan on behalf of international airlines for air traffic control services;

(g) To examine the reports submitted pursuant to paragraph 10 below;

7. Calls upon all States to act strictly in accordance with the provisions of the present resolution, notwithstanding the existence of any rights or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or any contract entered into or any licence or permit granted prior to the date of coming into force of the measures imposed by paragraph 4 above;

8. Calls upon States to bring proceedings against persons and entities within their jurisdiction that violate the measures imposed by paragraph 4 above and to impose appropriate penalties;

9. Calls upon all States to cooperate fully with the Committee established by paragraph 6 above in the fulfilment of its tasks, including supplying such information as may be required by the Committee in pursuance of the present resolution;

13. Requests the Secretariat to submit for consideration by the Committee established by paragraph 6 above information received from Governments and public sources on possible violations of the measures imposed by paragraph 4 above;

14. Decides to terminate the measures imposed by paragraph 4 above once the Secretary-General reports to the Security Council that the Taliban has fulfilled the obligation set out in paragraph 2 above;

15. Expresses its readiness to consider the imposition of further measures, in accordance with its responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations, with the aim of achieving the full implementation of the present resolution;

16. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representative of China expressed reservations about the imposition of sanctions, which would only exacerbate the suffering of the Afghan people.¹¹⁸

The representative of Canada praised the resolution, which was necessary for the Council to support the fight against terrorism.¹¹⁹

Decision of 22 October 1999 (4055th meeting):
statement by the President

On 21 September 1999, pursuant to resolution 1076 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in Afghanistan and its implications for international peace and security.¹²⁰ In his report, the Secretary-General noted with concern that the Taliban had started a new offensive only one week after the meeting of the “six plus two” group in Tashkent, and maintained that the disregard of the Taliban for the Tashkent Declaration raised serious concerns about the intentions of their leadership. He urged the Taliban leadership to accept an offer made by the United Front to resume negotiations. He stated that he was deeply disturbed by the reported involvement of thousands of non-Afghan nationals, mostly students from religious schools, in the fighting. The unabated external involvement in the conflict raised a question to the role of the “six plus two” group, as it appeared that, despite agreements and declarations, the group had not been able to make real progress on a more unified approach vis-à-vis the warring parties. He therefore supported his Special Envoy’s recommendation to review the United Nations approach regarding the Afghan conflict.

At its 4055th meeting, held on 22 October 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (the Russian Federation) invited the representative of Afghanistan, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President then made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹²¹

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 21 September 1999 concerning the situation in Afghanistan and its implications for international peace and security.

The Council reiterates its grave concern at the continued Afghan conflict, which is a serious and growing threat to regional and international peace and security. It strongly condemns the Taliban for the launching in July 1999, only one week after the meeting of the “six plus two” group in Tashkent, of a new offensive, despite the repeated demands by the Council to cease fighting. This has undermined international efforts to facilitate the restoration of peace in Afghanistan. The fighting following the offensive has resulted in enormous suffering to the civilian population of Afghanistan. The Taliban has a primary responsibility for this.

The Council reiterates that there is no military solution to the conflict in Afghanistan and that only a negotiated political settlement aimed at the establishment of a broad-based, multi-ethnic and fully representative government acceptable to all Afghans can lead to peace and reconciliation. It recalls its demand that the parties to the conflict, especially the Taliban, resume negotiations under United Nations auspices without delay and preconditions in full compliance with the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly and the Council. The Council notes that the United Front of Afghanistan has repeatedly made clear that it is willing to talk with the Taliban in order to reach a solution to the country’s problems.

The Council reiterates that outside interference in the internal affairs of Afghanistan, including the involvement of foreign combatants and military personnel and the supply of weapons and other materials used in the conflict, should cease immediately. It calls upon all States to take resolute measures to prohibit their military personnel from planning and participating in combat operations in Afghanistan, and immediately to withdraw their personnel and to assure that the supply of ammunition and other war-making materials is halted. The Council expresses its deep distress over reports indicating the involvement in the fighting in Afghanistan, on the side of the Taliban forces, of thousands of non-Afghan nationals, mostly from religious schools and some of whom are below the age of 14.

The Council reaffirms its full support for the efforts of the United Nations, in particular the activities of the United Nations Special Mission to Afghanistan and those of the Special Envoy of the Secretary-General for Afghanistan, in facilitating the political process towards the goals of national reconciliation and a lasting political settlement with the participation of all parties to the conflict and all segments of Afghan society, and reiterates its position that the United Nations must continue to play its central and impartial role in international efforts towards a peaceful resolution of the Afghan conflict.

The Council expresses its grave concern at the seriously deteriorating humanitarian situation in Afghanistan. It calls upon all Afghan parties, and in particular the Taliban, to take the necessary steps to secure the uninterrupted supply of humanitarian aid to all in need of it and in this connection not to create impediments to the activities of the United Nations humanitarian agencies and international humanitarian organizations.

The Council once again urges all Afghan factions to cooperate fully with the Special Mission and international humanitarian organizations, and calls upon them, in particular the Taliban, to take the necessary steps to ensure the safety and freedom of movement of such personnel.

The Council welcomes the Tashkent Declaration on Fundamental Principles for a Peaceful Settlement of the Conflict in Afghanistan, adopted by the "six plus two" group on 19 July 1999, particularly the agreement of members of the group not to provide military support to any Afghan party and to prevent the use of their territories for such purposes. It urges the members of the group and the Afghan factions to implement these principles in support of the efforts of the United Nations towards a peaceful resolution of the Afghan conflict.

The Council strongly condemns the continuing use of Afghan territory, especially areas controlled by the Taliban, for the sheltering and training of terrorists and planning of terrorist acts, and reaffirms its conviction that the suppression of international terrorism is essential for the maintenance of international peace and security. It insists that the Taliban cease the provision of sanctuary and training for international terrorists and their organizations, take effective measures to ensure that the territory under its control is not used for terrorist installations and camps or for the preparation or organization of terrorist acts against other States or their citizens, and cooperate with efforts to bring indicted terrorists to justice. The Council demands once again that the Taliban turn over indicted terrorist Osama bin Laden to appropriate authorities as set out in its resolution 1267 (1999) of 15 October 1999. It reaffirms its decision to implement on 14 November 1999 the measures contained in that resolution, unless the Secretary-General reports that the Taliban has fully complied with the obligation set out in paragraph 2 of that resolution.

The Council is deeply disturbed also by a significant increase in the cultivation, production and trafficking of drugs in Afghanistan, especially in areas controlled by the Taliban, which will contribute to the war-making capabilities of the Afghans and will have even more serious international consequences. It demands that the Taliban, as well as others, halt all illegal drug activities. The Council calls upon Member States, in particular those neighbouring Afghanistan, and all others concerned to undertake concerted measures to stop the trafficking of illegal drugs from Afghanistan.

The Council deplores the worsening human rights situation in Afghanistan. It expresses particular alarm at the continuing disregard by the Taliban of the concerns expressed by the international community. The Council underlines the unacceptability of the forced displacement of the civilian population, in particular that conducted by the Taliban during their recent offensive, summary executions, the deliberate abuse and arbitrary detention of civilians, violence and continuing discrimination against women and girls, the separation of men from their families, the use of child soldiers, the widespread burning of crops and destruction of homes, the indiscriminate bombing and other violations of human rights and international humanitarian law in Afghanistan. It calls upon all Afghan parties, especially the Taliban, to put an end to such practices, to adhere to the international norms and standards in this sphere, to take urgent measures to improve the human rights situation and, as an immediate first step, to ensure the protection of civilians.

The Council reiterates that the capture by the Taliban of the Consulate-General of the Islamic Republic of Iran and the murder of the Iranian diplomats and a journalist in Mazar e Sharif constitute flagrant violations of international law. It demands that the Taliban cooperate fully with the United Nations in investigating these crimes with a view to prosecuting those responsible.

The Council looks forward to the next report of the Secretary-General on the situation in Afghanistan, and encourages him to review options for the Council and the General Assembly.

The Council deplores the failure of the leadership of the Taliban to take measures to comply with the demands made in its previous resolutions, especially to conclude a ceasefire and to resume negotiations, and in this context reaffirms its readiness to consider the imposition of measures, in accordance with its responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations, with the aim of achieving the full implementation of its relevant resolutions.

24. Letter dated 31 March 1998 from the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of the Permanent Mission of Papua New Guinea to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council

Initial proceedings

Decision of 22 April 1998 (3874th meeting): statement by the President

By a letter dated 31 March 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹ the representative of Papua New Guinea transmitted a letter from the Minister for Foreign Affairs addressed to the President of the Security Council, which informed the Council of developments through which the parties to the nine-year-old conflict in Bougainville, Papua New Guinea, had met and agreed to a secure and lasting peace by peaceful means. They included a truce, signed in Burnham, New Zealand, on 10 October 1997 (the Burnham Truce), which contained an agreement to invite a neutral regional Truce Monitoring Group to promote and instil public confidence in the peace process and to oversee and monitor implementation of the truce; and the Agreement on Peace, Security and Development on Bougainville, signed at Lincoln, New Zealand, on 23 January 1998 (the Lincoln Agreement), which made clear that the parties to the ceasefire looked to the United Nations to support their efforts to secure a lasting peace by peaceful means. The letter further stated that the United Nations would be sending important and encouraging signals of the support of the international community for peace by accepting the requests of Papua New Guinea, respectively, for Security Council endorsement and for the Secretary-General to send a small observer mission to monitor implementation of the Lincoln Agreement.

At its 3874th meeting, held on 22 April 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Japan), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Papua New Guinea, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²

The Security Council, taking note of the development of the Bougainville conflict, strongly supports the Agreement on Peace, Security and Development on Bougainville, signed at Lincoln University, New Zealand, on 23 January 1998 (the "Lincoln Agreement"), achieved by the Government of Papua New Guinea, the Bougainville Transitional Government, the Bougainville Resistance Force, the Bougainville Interim Government, the Bougainville Revolutionary Army and the Bougainville leaders, with regard to a ceasefire among conflicting parties.

The Council welcomes the extension of the period of truce, and welcomes further a permanent and irrevocable ceasefire which will take effect on 30 April 1998 as stipulated in the Lincoln Agreement.

The Council encourages all parties to cooperate in promoting reconciliation, so that the objectives of the Lincoln Agreement can be met, and urges all parties to continue to cooperate in accordance with the Lincoln Agreement in order to achieve and maintain peace, to renounce the use of armed force and violence, to resolve any differences by consultation, both now and in the future, and to confirm their respect for human rights and the rule of law.

The Council commends the efforts of countries in the region for the resolution of the conflict, and welcomes the establishment, as outlined in the Lincoln Agreement, of the peace-monitoring group composed of civilian and military personnel from Australia, Fiji, New Zealand and Vanuatu, the mandate of which is to monitor the implementation of the said Agreement.

The Council notes that the Lincoln Agreement calls for the United Nations to play a role in Bougainville, and requests the Secretary-General to consider the composition and financial modalities of such involvement by the United Nations.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

25. Letters dated 23 September 1996 and 3 and 11 October 1996 from the Permanent Representative of the Republic of Korea to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council

Letters dated 23 September 1996 from the Permanent Representative of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council on 27 September 1996 addressed to the Secretary-General

Decision of 15 October 1996 (3704th meeting): statement by the President

By a letter dated 23 September 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹ the representative of the Republic of Korea referred to the consultations held by the members of the Security Council on 20 September 1996 regarding the infiltration into the Republic of Korea of armed agents of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea in a military submarine. On 18 September a military submarine had been found grounded in shallow water near the coastal city of Kangnung, one of the major ports on the eastern coast of the Republic of Korea. On the basis of the accumulation of concrete evidence, including arms and ammunition made in the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, the team had determined that the submarine belonged to the armed forces of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea and that the occupants of the submarine were all officers of the regular army of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea. It had also been determined that all of them had gone ashore, infiltrating the territory of the Republic of Korea. He stated that his Government believed that the incident posed a serious threat to peace and security on and around the Korean peninsula. The dispatch by the Democratic People's Republic of Korea of armed agents using a military submarine clearly constituted a grave act of military provocation to the Republic of Korea, as well as a serious violation of the Korean Armistice Agreement. He reaffirmed that his Government reserved the right to raise the issue in the Council, whenever necessary.

By a letter dated 3 October 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,² the representative of the Republic of Korea informed the Council that two more commandos of the army of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea had been killed in an exchange of fire with the army of the Republic of Korea, with three remaining at large. Eight Republic of Korea soldiers and one civilian had been killed. He expressed the belief that appropriate action by the Council was in order. He maintained that the incident reflected a clear pattern of military provocations by the Democratic People's Republic of Korea against the Republic of Korea and formed part of a larger scheme not only to dismantle the Korean Armistice Agreement but also to destabilize the Republic of Korea. It was therefore important for the international community to send a clear and strong signal to the Democratic People's Republic of Korea that further provocations on its part would not be tolerated.

By a letter dated 11 October 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³ the representative of the Republic of Korea transmitted the text of the resolution adopted by the National Assembly of the Republic of Korea on 23 September 1996 concerning the recent infiltration of armed commandos of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea by submarine into the territory of the Republic of Korea.

By a letter dated 23 September 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴ the representative of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea transmitted a statement by the spokesman of the Ministry of the People's Armed Forces of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea dated 23 September 1996. The statement noted that a small training submarine, conducting routine training on the waters of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea side of the East Sea, had run aground on the waters of Kangnung while drifting due to sudden engine trouble. When the ship was stranded, the soldiers had needed to get to land and there had been armed clashes because it was the area under the enemy's control. The spokesman stated that the Republic of Korea needed to send back the small submarine, survivors and the dead unconditionally and immediately.

By a letter dated 27 September 1996 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁵ the representative of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea reiterated that if the "enemies" did not return the small submarine, survivors and the dead unconditionally, while continuing to make "ill use of the incident for the sinister political purpose", the Democratic People's Republic of Korea would be forced to take strong countermeasures.

At its 3704th meeting, held on 15 October 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the letters in its agenda.

At the same meeting, the President (Honduras) made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶

The Security Council has considered the letters from the Permanent Representative of the Republic of Korea to the United Nations and the letters from the Permanent Representative of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea to the United Nations, regarding the incident of a submarine of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea on 18 September 1996.

The Council expresses its serious concern over this incident. The Council urges that the Korean Armistice Agreement should be fully observed and that no action should be taken that might increase tension or undermine peace and stability on the Korean peninsula.

The Council stresses that the Armistice Agreement shall remain in force until it is replaced by a new peace mechanism.

The Council encourages both sides of the Korean peninsula to settle their outstanding issues by peaceful means through dialogue, so that peace and security on the peninsula will be strengthened.

26. The situation in Cyprus

Decision of 28 June 1996 (3675th meeting): resolution 1062 (1996)

On 7 June 1996, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the United Nations operation in Cyprus, covering developments from 11 December 1995 to 10 June 1996 and providing an update of the activities of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus (UNFICYP).¹ In his report, the Secretary-General reported that UNFICYP had continued to carry out its functions effectively and that the overall situation on the island remained generally calm. He expressed concern, however, at the excessive levels of military forces and armaments in Cyprus and at the rate at which they were being strengthened. Furthermore, the opposing forces still had not heeded the Council's repeated calls to implement specific measures aimed at reducing the risk of confrontation along the ceasefire lines. Stressing the role of bicomunal contacts in facilitating an overall settlement, the Secretary-General urged both communities, and especially the Turkish Cypriot authorities, to lift all obstacles to such contacts. In the prevailing circumstances, the Secretary-General concluded that the presence of UNFICYP on the island remained indispensable to achieving the objectives set out by the Council and recommended the extension of the mandate of the Force for a further six months, until 31 December 1996.

On 25 June 1996, pursuant to resolution 1032 (1995) of 19 December 1995, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on his mission of good offices in Cyprus, including a full assessment of his efforts towards reaching a settlement of the situation in Cyprus.² In his report, the Secretary-General reported that he had met personally with the leaders of the two communities in June 1996 and had expressed to them his concern that the negotiations had remained at a standstill for too long. The Greek Cypriot leader had reiterated his commitment to a negotiated settlement through direct talks, but had emphasized that sufficient common ground had to exist before the negotiations began. The Turkish Cypriot leader had reaffirmed his readiness to participate in the negotiating process within the parameters of an equal partnership that would treat the Greek Cypriot and the Turkish Cypriot communities as equal in all aspects. The Secretary-General reiterated the importance of creating, as soon as possible, a basis for the resumption of direct talks between the two leaders and, to that end, called upon both parties to cooperate with the efforts of his representatives. He also stated that the decision of the European Union to begin accession negotiations with Cyprus was an important new development that should facilitate a settlement. He concluded that the international community had to build on those developments and give a new impetus to the negotiating process.

At its 3675th meeting, held on 28 June 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the two reports of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Egypt) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of its prior consultations.³ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1062 (1996), which reads:

Decision of 23 December 1996 (3728th meeting):
resolution 1092 (1996)

On 10 December 1996, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the United Nations operation in Cyprus, covering developments from 11 June to 10 December 1996 and providing an update on the activities of UNFICYP.⁴ In his report, the Secretary-General reported that the situation in Cyprus had deteriorated in the last six months, with incidents of violence along the ceasefire lines to an extent not seen since 1974. Tension had risen in anticipation of a symbolic motorcycle demonstration organized by Greek Cypriots, originating in Berlin and ending in Kyrenia, a route that would take the demonstrators across the United Nations buffer zone and the Turkish forces' ceasefire line. The Secretary-General noted that, although the Force had done its best to prevent the demonstrators from entering the buffer zone, control of the civilian population was the exclusive responsibility of the local authorities, who were perfectly capable of fulfilling that task. He stressed that the leaders on both sides needed to make a serious effort to reverse the negative trend of recent months and build an atmosphere of trust and goodwill between the two communities. The proposals of the Force towards that process included early agreement on the package of reciprocal measures to reduce tension along the ceasefire lines; implementation of the measures to improve the living conditions of the Greek Cypriots and Maronites living in the northern part of the island; and removal of all impediments to the movement of people and increased contacts and communication between the two sides. Under those circumstances, the Secretary-General believed that the continued presence of the Force on the island remained indispensable, and therefore recommended an extension of its mandate for a further period ending on 30 June 1997.

On 17 December 1996, pursuant to resolution 1062 (1996) of 28 June 1996, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on his mission of good offices in Cyprus.⁵ The Secretary-General reported that, over the past six months, intensive efforts had been made to break the impasse and to establish common ground on which direct negotiations could be resumed. His Special Representative had met extensively with the two Cypriot leaders, in June and July 1996, and had found that their positions remained far apart on a number of issues. His second visit to the area, in mid-September, had been overshadowed by heightened tension between the two sides in the wake of the August incidents and the discussions had therefore focused on ways of reducing the tension. During a third visit, in mid-December, the gap in the position of the two sides had not narrowed and each of them continued to express serious doubts about the true intentions of the other, thus making it difficult to be optimistic about prospects for direct talks. The Secretary-General observed that the current situation offered the two communities, and the region, both a warning signal and an opportunity. The two leaders needed to recognize the seriousness of the moment and seize the opportunity by agreeing to negotiate a comprehensive settlement on the basis of mutual concessions.

At its 3728th meeting, held on 23 December 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the two reports of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Italy) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁶

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1092 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 10 December 1996 on the United Nations operation in Cyprus, ⁵ S/1996/1055.

⁶ S/1996/1062.

Welcoming also the report of the Secretary-General of 17 December 1996 on his mission of good offices in Cyprus,

Noting that the Government of Cyprus has agreed that in view of the prevailing conditions on the island it is necessary to keep the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus beyond 31 December 1996,

Reaffirming its earlier relevant resolutions on Cyprus, in particular resolutions 186 (1964) of 4 March 1964, 939 (1994) of 29 July 1994 and 1062 (1996) of 28 June 1996,

Gravely concerned by the deteriorating situation in Cyprus and by the fact that intercommunal tensions on the island have escalated and, over the last six-month period, violence along the ceasefire lines has reached a level not seen since 1974, as stated in the report of the Secretary-General of 10 December 1996,

Concerned at the increased use of and threat to use violence against the personnel of the Force,

Noting the beginning of indirect discussions, through the Force Commander, between the military authorities of the two sides on measures aimed at the reduction of military tensions,

Reiterating its concern that negotiations on a final political solution have been at an impasse for too long,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus for a further period ending on 30 June 1997;

2. Deplores the violent incidents of 11 and 14 August, 8 September and 15 October 1996, which resulted in the tragic deaths of three Greek Cypriot civilians and one member of the Turkish Cypriot Security Forces, as well as injuries to civilians and Force personnel, in particular the unnecessary and disproportionate use of force by the Turkish/Turkish Cypriot side, as well as the largely passive role played by the Cypriot police in response to civilian demonstrations;

3. Reminds both sides of their obligation to prevent acts of violence directed against Force personnel, particularly those involving firearms, which inhibit the Force from carrying out its mandated responsibilities, and demands that they ensure the Force complete freedom of movement and extend to it their full cooperation;

4. Emphasizes the need to maintain law and order and, in this context, demands that both parties prevent unauthorized incursions into the buffer zone and respond immediately and responsibly to any demonstrations which violate the buffer zone and any demonstrations near the buffer zone that might lead to an increase in tensions;

5. Calls upon the parties to accept as a package, without delay or preconditions, the reciprocal measures proposed by the Force, namely, (a) to extend the 1989 unarming agreement to other areas where the two sides remain in close proximity to each other; (b) to prohibit loaded weapons along the ceasefire lines; and (c) to adopt a code of conduct, based on the concept of minimal force and proportional response, to be followed by troops of both sides along the ceasefire lines, and expresses its disappointment that no progress has been made towards implementing these measures thus far;

6. Calls upon the military authorities on both sides:

(a) To clear all minefields and booby-trapped areas inside the buffer zone without further delay, as requested by the Force;

(b) To cease military construction in the immediate vicinity of the buffer zone;

(c) To refrain from any military exercises along the buffer zone;

7. Reiterates its grave concern about the excessive levels of military forces and armaments in the Republic of Cyprus and the rate at which they are being expanded, upgraded and modernized, including by the introduction of sophisticated weaponry, as well as the lack of progress towards a significant reduction in the number of foreign troops in the Republic of Cyprus, which threaten to raise tensions both on the island and in the region and complicate efforts to negotiate an overall political settlement;

8. Again calls upon all concerned to commit themselves to a reduction in defence spending and a reduction in the number of foreign troops in the Republic of Cyprus to help to restore confidence between the parties and as a first step towards the withdrawal of non-Cypriot forces as described in the set of ideas, stresses the importance of eventual demilitarization of the Republic of Cyprus as an objective in the context of an overall comprehensive settlement, and calls upon the Secretary-General to continue to promote efforts in this direction;

9. Expresses continuing concern about military exercises in the region, including overflights in the airspace of Cyprus by military fixed-wing aircraft, which have markedly increased political tension on the island and undermined efforts towards achieving a settlement;

10. Reiterates that the status quo is unacceptable, and stresses its support for the Secretary-General's mission of good offices and the importance of the concerted efforts to work with the Secretary-General towards an overall comprehensive settlement;

11. Welcomes the efforts of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, and of those working in support, to prepare the ground for open-ended direct negotiations in the first half of 1997 between the leaders of the two Cypriot communities in order to secure an overall settlement;

12. Calls upon the parties to cooperate with the Special Representative to that end, as well as with his intensified preparatory work in the first months of 1997, with the objective of clarifying the main elements of an overall settlement;

13. Underlines the fact that the success of this process will require the creation of genuine mutual confidence on both sides and the avoidance of actions which increase tension, and calls upon the leaders of both communities to create a climate of reconciliation and confidence;

14. Reaffirms its position that a Cyprus settlement must be based on a State of Cyprus with a single sovereignty and international personality and a single citizenship, with its independence and territorial integrity safeguarded, and comprising two politically equal communities as described in the relevant Security Council resolutions, in a bicomunal and bi-zonal federation, and that such a settlement must exclude union in whole or in part with any other country or any form of partition or secession;

15. Welcomes the continuous efforts by the Force to implement its humanitarian mandate in respect of Greek Cypriots and Maronites living in the northern part of the island, and Turkish Cypriots living in the southern part, and regrets that there has been no further progress on the implementation of recommendations arising out of the humanitarian review undertaken by the Force in 1995;

16. Welcomes the continuing efforts of the United Nations and others in the international community to promote bicomunal events, regrets the obstacles which have been placed in the way of such contacts, and strongly urges all concerned, and especially the Turkish Cypriot community leadership, to lift all obstacles to such contacts;

17. Reaffirms that the decision of the European Union concerning the opening of accession negotiations with Cyprus is an important new development that should facilitate an overall settlement;

18. Requests the Secretary-General to keep under review the structure and strength of the Force, with a view to its possible restructuring, and to present any new considerations he may have in this regard;

19. Also requests the Secretary-General to submit a report by 10 June 1997 on the implementation of the present resolution;

20. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 27 June 1997 (3794th meeting):
resolution 1117 (1997)

On 5 June 1997, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the United Nations operation in Cyprus, describing developments from 11 December 1996 to 5 June 1997 and providing an update of the activities of UNFICYP.⁷ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that although the number of serious incidents had decreased in comparison to the preceding period, tension along the ceasefire lines remained higher than in the past. Moreover, there had been no change in the levels of military forces and armaments, nor had the military authorities accepted the UNFICYP package of reciprocal measures. He urged both sides to reconsider their positions and to reach an agreement on the package without further delay. He also urged them to facilitate and encourage direct contacts between the two communities. The Secretary-General continued to believe that the presence of the Force on the island remained indispensable and, therefore, recommended that the Council extend the mandate of the Force for a further period ending on 31 December 1997.

By a letter dated 20 June 1997 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁸ the Secretary-General informed the Council that he had written to the leaders of the two Cypriot communities, inviting them to a session of face-to-face discussions on a comprehensive settlement of the Cyprus issue, to be held in New York, from 9 to 13 July 1997. The first session would be followed by another in August and by a third one, if necessary. The Secretary-General noted that a number of Governments, as well as the Presidency of the European Union, had appointed special representatives in support of the initiatives within the framework of his mission of good offices. The support of all concerned, and particularly of the Security Council, was also indispensable to ensure the success of the current efforts. The Secretary-General asked the Council to urge the parties to commit themselves to the process of direct negotiations and to fully cooperate with his efforts and those of his Special Adviser.

At its 3794th meeting, held on 27 June 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report and the letter of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Russian Federation) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁹

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1117 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

3. Underlines the importance of agreement by both sides to the reciprocal measures for the reduction of tension along the ceasefire lines proposed by the Force, as set forth in resolution 1092 (1996), deeply regrets the fact that, in spite of the efforts of the Force, neither side has so far accepted such measures as a package, and reiterates its call upon both sides to do so without further delay or preconditions;

4. Calls upon the military authorities on both sides to refrain from any action, particularly in the vicinity of the buffer zone, which would exacerbate tensions;

5. Reiterates its grave concern at the continuing excessive level of military forces and armaments in the Republic of Cyprus and the rate at which they are being expanded, upgraded and modernized, including by the introduction of sophisticated weaponry, and the lack of progress towards any significant reduction in the number of foreign troops in the Republic of Cyprus, which threaten to raise tensions both on the island and in the region and complicate efforts to negotiate an overall political settlement;

13. Welcomes also the efforts of the United Nations and others concerned to promote the holding of bicomunal events so as to build trust and mutual respect between the two communities, urges that these efforts be continued, acknowledges the recent cooperation from all concerned on both sides to that end, and strongly encourages them to take further steps to facilitate such bicomunal events and to ensure that they take place in conditions of safety and security;

14. Reaffirms that the decision of the European Union concerning the opening of accession negotiations with Cyprus is an important development that should facilitate an overall settlement;

16. Also requests the Secretary-General to submit a report by 10 December 1997 on the implementation of the present resolution;

17. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 23 December 1997 (3846th meeting): resolution 1146 (1997)

On 8 December 1997, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the United Nations operation in Cyprus, covering developments since 6 June 1997 and providing an update of the activities of UNFICYP.¹⁰ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that, while the situation in Cyprus was calmer, it nevertheless continued to be marked by tension and an increased number of restrictions to the freedom of movement of the Force. Moreover, the continued lack of progress towards an overall settlement, coupled with increasing belligerent rhetoric, had contributed to a growing sense of frustration in both communities. He had appealed to both sides, as well as to Greece and Turkey, to refrain from any action that could raise tension and negatively affect the negotiating process. He had also urged the military authorities to be more responsive to the UNFICYP observations and protests concerning their responsibilities along the ceasefire lines. He further noted that, despite the Council's repeated appeals, the levels of military forces and armaments in Cyprus continued to grow, and the UNFICYP package of reciprocal measures still had not been implemented. Maintaining that the presence of UNFICYP on the island remained indispensable, he, therefore, recommended the extension of the mandate of the Force for a further period ending on 30 June 1998.

On 12 December 1997, pursuant to resolution 1117 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on his mission of good offices in Cyprus.¹¹ In that report, he informed the Council that the first round of talks between the leaders of the two Cypriot communities had been held in New York where the two leaders had discussed a draft statement for launching the process of negotiations that would set out the principles and objectives of the settlement and establish the modalities for future negotiations. The second round of talks had been held in Switzerland, where the Turkish Cypriot leader had stated that, pending clarification of some of the statements contained in a document published by the European Union entitled "Agenda 2000", his delegation would not be in a position to adopt any formal understandings or agreements. The talks had ended inconclusively. Under those circumstances, the Secretary-General had considered that a third round of talks would have been unproductive.

At its 3846th meeting, held on 23 December 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the two reports of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Costa Rica) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹² The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1146 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 8 December 1997 on the United Nations operation in Cyprus,

Welcoming also the report of the Secretary-General of 12 December 1997 on his mission of good offices in Cyprus,

Noting that the Government of Cyprus has agreed that in view of the prevailing conditions on the island it is necessary to keep the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus beyond 31 December 1997,

Reaffirming all its earlier relevant resolutions on Cyprus, in particular resolutions 186 (1964) of 4 March 1964, 367 (1975) of 12 March 1975, 939 (1994) of 29 July 1994 and 1117 (1997) of 27 June 1997,

Noting with concern that tensions along the ceasefire lines remain high, despite the further decrease in the number of serious incidents in the last six months, and that restrictions to freedom of movement of the Force have increased,

Reiterating its concern that negotiations on a comprehensive political solution have yet to make progress, despite the efforts made at the two rounds of direct negotiations, held in July and August 1997, between the leaders of the two communities, at the initiative of the Secretary-General,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus for a further period ending on 30 June 1998;

¹⁰ S/1997/962 and Add.1.

2. Reminds both sides of their obligation to prevent any violence directed against Force personnel, to cooperate fully with the Force and to ensure its complete freedom of movement;

3. Underlines the importance of early agreement to the reciprocal measures for the reduction of tension along the ceasefire lines proposed and subsequently adapted by the Force, notes the fact that only one side has so far accepted this package, calls for early agreement to and rapid implementation of reciprocal measures, and encourages the Force to continue its efforts towards that end;

4. Calls upon the leaders of the two communities to continue the discussions on security issues begun on 26 September 1997;

5. Calls upon the military authorities on both sides to refrain from any action, particularly in the vicinity of the buffer zone, which would exacerbate tensions;

6. Reiterates its grave concern at the continuing excessive and increasing level of military forces and armaments in the Republic of Cyprus and the rate at which they are being expanded, upgraded and modernized, including by the introduction of sophisticated weaponry, and the lack of progress towards any significant reduction in the number of foreign troops in the Republic of Cyprus, which threaten to raise tensions both on the island and in the region and complicate efforts to negotiate an overall political settlement;

7. Calls upon all concerned to commit themselves to a reduction in defence spending and a reduction in the number of foreign troops in the Republic of Cyprus to help to restore confidence between the parties and as a first step towards the withdrawal of non-Cypriot forces as described in the set of ideas, stresses the importance of eventual demilitarization of the Republic of Cyprus as an objective in the context of an overall comprehensive settlement, and encourages the Secretary-General to continue to promote efforts in this direction;

8. Reiterates that the status quo is unacceptable, and stresses its support for the Secretary-General's mission of good offices and the importance of concerted efforts to work with the Secretary-General towards an overall comprehensive settlement;

9. Expresses its full support for the intention of the Secretary-General to resume in March 1998 the open-ended process of negotiations initiated by him in July 1997 and aimed at achieving a comprehensive settlement;

10. Calls upon the leaders of the two communities to commit themselves to that process of negotiations and to cooperate actively and constructively with the Secretary-General and his Special Adviser on Cyprus, and urges all States to lend their full support to these efforts;

11. Calls upon, in this context, all parties concerned to create a climate for reconciliation and genuine mutual confidence on both sides and to avoid any actions which might increase tension, including further expansion of military forces and armaments;

12. Reaffirms its position that a Cyprus settlement must be based on a State of Cyprus with a single sovereignty and international personality and a single citizenship, with its independence and territorial integrity safeguarded, and comprising two politically equal communities as described in the relevant Security Council resolutions, in a bicomunal and bi-zonal federation, and that such a settlement must exclude union in whole or in part with any other country or any form of partition or secession;

13. Welcomes the ongoing efforts by the Force to implement its humanitarian mandate in respect of Greek Cypriots and Maronites living in the northern part of the island, and Turkish Cypriots living in the southern part, and welcomes also the progress in the implementation of recommendations arising out of the humanitarian review undertaken by the Force in 1995, as mentioned in the report of the Secretary-General;

Decision of 29 June 1998 (3898th meeting):
resolutions 1178 (1998) and 1179 (1998)

By a letter dated 20 April 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹³ the Secretary-General informed the Council that his Special Adviser had visited Nicosia from 17 to 22 March 1999, for consultations with the leaders of the two Cypriot communities on the resumption of the negotiations process. He noted that although both leaders had reiterated that the resolution of the Cyprus problem should be pursued through the United Nations, they strongly disagreed on the parameters that should govern that process. As a result, it had not been possible to find a common basis for the resumption of the negotiations.

By a letter dated 19 May 1998,¹⁴ the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General that his letter had been brought to the attention of the members of the Council, and that they strongly supported his mission of good offices for Cyprus.

On 10 June 1998, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the United Nations operation in Cyprus, covering developments from 8 December 1997 to 8 June 1998 and updating the activities of UNFICYP.¹⁵ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the situation along the ceasefire lines remained relatively calm, despite minor violations. Moreover, both sides continued to dispute the delineation of their respective lines in certain areas within the buffer zone, often challenging the authority of the Force, and had continued to ignore the protests by UNFICYP against violations of the status quo by continuing military construction along and in close proximity to the ceasefire lines. He noted that the repeated Council appeals for a reduction in defence spending and in the number of foreign troops had not been heeded by either side and there had also been no progress concerning the package of reciprocal measures. He regretted the decision by the Turkish Cypriot authorities to suspend all bicomunal activities on the island and urged both sides, in particular the Turkish Cypriot leadership, to allow the resumption of those events. Therefore, he concluded that the presence of UNFICYP on the island remained indispensable and recommended its extension for a further period ending on 31 December 1998.

On 16 June 1998, pursuant to resolution 1146 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report on his mission of good offices in Cyprus.¹⁶ In his report, the Secretary-General informed the Council that during the visit to the island by the Special Adviser, from 17 to 22 March 1998, the President of Cyprus had reiterated his readiness to resume direct talks on the basis of the relevant Council resolutions. The leader of the Turkish Cypriot community, on the other hand, had called for a new approach based on the "acknowledgment of the existence of two fully functioning democratic States on the island". The Secretary-General, however, regretted that, so far, and in spite of all efforts, it had not been possible to resume the negotiations. He hoped that all parties would abstain from any action that could further exacerbate tensions and called upon them to cooperate with the United Nations efforts to resume the process of direct talks.

At its 3898th meeting, held on 29 June 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached at its prior consultations, the Council included the two reports of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Portugal) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of two draft resolutions prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations. The first draft resolution¹⁷ was thereupon put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1178 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 10 June 1998 on the United Nations operation in Cyprus,

Noting that the Government of Cyprus has agreed that in view of the prevailing conditions on the island it is necessary to keep the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus beyond 30 June 1998,

Reaffirming all its earlier resolutions on Cyprus,

Noting with concern that tensions along the ceasefire lines and restrictions to the freedom of movement of the Force continue,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus for a further period ending on 31 December 1998;

2. Reminds both sides of their obligations to prevent any violence directed against Force personnel, to cooperate fully with the Force and to ensure its complete freedom of movement;

3. Calls upon the military authorities on both sides to refrain from any action, particularly in the vicinity of the buffer zone, which would exacerbate tensions;

4. Underlines the importance of early agreement to the reciprocal measures for the reduction of tension along the ceasefire lines proposed and subsequently adapted by the Force, notes the fact that only one side has so far accepted this package, calls for early agreement to and rapid implementation of reciprocal measures, and encourages the Force to continue its efforts towards that end;

¹⁴ S/1998/411.

¹⁶ S/1998/518.

5. Reiterates its grave concern at the continuing excessive and increasing levels of military forces and armaments in the Republic of Cyprus and the rate at which they are being expanded, upgraded and modernized, including by the introduction of sophisticated weaponry, and the lack of progress towards any significant reduction in the number of foreign troops in the Republic of Cyprus, which threaten to raise tensions both on the island and in the region and complicate efforts to negotiate an overall political settlement;

6. Calls upon all concerned to commit themselves to a reduction in defence spending and a reduction in the number of foreign troops in the Republic of Cyprus to help to restore confidence between the parties and as a first step towards the withdrawal of non-Cypriot forces as described in the set of ideas, stresses the importance of eventual demilitarization of the Republic of Cyprus as an objective in the context of an overall comprehensive settlement, and encourages the Secretary-General to continue to promote efforts in this direction;

7. Calls upon the leaders of the two communities to resume the discussions on security issues begun on 26 September 1997;

8. Welcomes the ongoing efforts by the Force to implement its humanitarian mandate in respect of Greek Cypriots and Maronites living in the northern part of the island, and Turkish Cypriots living in the southern part, and welcomes also the progress in the implementation of recommendations arising out of the humanitarian review undertaken by the Force in 1995, as mentioned in the report of the Secretary-General;

9. Welcomes also the appointment of the new third member of the Committee on Missing Persons, and calls for implementation without delay of the agreement on missing persons of 31 July 1997;

10. Reiterates its support for the efforts of the United Nations and others concerned to promote the holding of bi-communal events so as to build cooperation, trust and mutual respect between the two communities, regrets the suspension of such activity by the Turkish Cypriot leadership, and urges both sides, and in particular the Turkish Cypriot side, to facilitate arrangements within which bicomunal contacts can take place uninterrupted and without formalities;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to submit a report by 10 December 1998 on the implementation of the present resolution;

12. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

The second draft resolution¹⁸ was also put to the vote, and was adopted unanimously as resolution 1179 (1998), which reads:

¹⁸ S/1998/576.

The Security Council,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 16 June 1998 on his mission of good offices in Cyprus,

Reaffirming all its earlier resolutions on Cyprus,

Calling once more upon all States to respect the sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity of the Republic of Cyprus, and requesting them, along with the parties concerned, to refrain from any action which might prejudice that sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity, as well as from any attempt of partition of the island or its unification with any other country,

Reiterating its growing concern that negotiations on a comprehensive political solution have yet to make progress, despite the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Adviser and others in support of the United Nations efforts to promote a comprehensive settlement,

1. Reaffirms that the status quo is unacceptable and that negotiations on a final political solution of the Cyprus problem have been at an impasse for too long;

2. Reaffirms its position that a Cyprus settlement must be based on a State of Cyprus with a single sovereignty and international personality and a single citizenship, with its independence and territorial integrity safeguarded, and comprising two politically equal communities as described in the relevant Security Council resolutions, in a bicomunal and bi-zonal federation, and that such a settlement must exclude union in whole or in part with any other country or any form of partition or secession;

3. Stresses its full support for the Secretary-General's mission of good offices and for the efforts of his Special Adviser on Cyprus to resume a sustained process of direct negotiations aimed at achieving a comprehensive settlement on the basis of the relevant Security Council resolutions, and stresses also the importance of concerted efforts to work with the Secretary-General to that end;

4. Welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to continue to explore possibilities that may lead to a new momentum in that process of negotiations;

5. Calls once again upon the leaders of the two communities, in particular the Turkish Cypriot side, to commit themselves to this process of negotiations, to cooperate actively and constructively with the Secretary-General and his Special Adviser and to resume the direct dialogue without further delay, and urges all States to lend their full support to these efforts;

6. Calls upon, in this context, all parties concerned to create a climate for reconciliation and genuine mutual confidence on both sides, and to avoid any actions which might increase tension, including through further expansion of military forces and armaments;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to submit a report by 10 December 1998 on the implementation of the present resolution;

8. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 22 December 1998 (3959th meeting): resolutions 1217 (1998) and 1218 (1998)

On 7 December 1998, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the United Nations operation in Cyprus, covering developments from 9 June to 8 December 1998 and providing an update of the activities of the Force.¹⁹ In his report, he observed that there had been no change with regard to reducing tension, the increasing levels of military forces and armaments, demilitarization and discussion on security issues. Moreover, as a result of the suspension of bicomunal contacts by the Turkish Cypriot authorities in December 1997, Turkish Cypriot participation in those events had ceased. He further noted that UNFICYP continued to maintain the ceasefire by controlling the buffer zone and responding quickly to any incidents. He concluded that the presence of the Force on the island remained indispensable and, therefore, recommended an extension of its mandate for a further period ending on 30 June 1999.

By a letter dated 14 December 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁰ the Secretary-General reported on his mission of good offices in Cyprus since the adoption of resolution 1179 (1998). In his report, the Secretary-General stated that his Deputy Special Representative had begun “shuttle-talks” with a view to reducing tension and promoting a lasting settlement. Both leaders had expressed their support for the process and promised to cooperate in a constructive and flexible manner. The issues under discussion included, inter alia, a commitment to reject the use of force; a commitment to prevent further military expansion; and an agreement to the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus package of measures for reducing tension along the ceasefire lines, including demining. Several meetings and consultations had also been held with representatives of Greece and Turkey. The Secretary-General urged the two leaders to promote a climate of reconciliation and mutual confidence, especially by avoiding any actions that might increase tension, including the further expansion of military forces and armaments.

At its 3959th meeting, held on 22 December 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report and the letter of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Bahrain) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of two draft resolutions prepared in the course of the Council’s prior consultations.

The first draft resolution²¹ was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1217 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 7 December 1998 on the United Nations operation in Cyprus,

Welcoming also the letter from the Secretary-General dated 14 December 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council on his mission of good offices in Cyprus,

Noting that the Government of Cyprus has agreed that, in view of the prevailing conditions on the island, it is necessary to keep the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus beyond 31 December 1998,

Noting with concern that restrictions to the freedom of movement of the Force continue,

Noting with satisfaction that the situation along the ceasefire lines has remained generally calm, notwithstanding numerous minor violations,

Reiterating the need to make progress on a comprehensive political solution,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus for a further period ending on 30 June 1999;

2. Reminds both sides of their obligations to prevent any violence directed against Force personnel, to cooperate fully with the Force and to ensure its complete freedom of movement;

3. Calls upon the military authorities on both sides to refrain from any action, particularly in the vicinity of the buffer zone, which would exacerbate tensions;

4. Reiterates its grave concern at the continuing excessive levels of military forces and armaments in the Republic of Cyprus and the rate at which they are being expanded, upgraded and modernized, including by the introduction of sophisticated weaponry, and the lack of progress towards any significant reduction in the number of foreign troops in the Republic of Cyprus, which threaten to raise tensions both on the island and in the region and complicate efforts to negotiate an overall political settlement;

5. Calls upon all concerned to commit themselves to a reduction in defence spending and a reduction in the number of foreign troops in the Republic of Cyprus to help to restore confidence between the parties and as a first step towards the withdrawal of non-Cypriot forces as described in the set of ideas, stresses the importance of eventual demilitarization of the Republic of Cyprus as an objective in the context of an overall comprehensive settlement, and encourages the Secretary-General to continue to promote efforts in this direction;

6. Reaffirms that the status quo is unacceptable and that negotiations on a final political solution of the Cyprus problem have been at an impasse for too long;

8. Stresses its full support for the Secretary-General's mission of good offices and for the efforts of his Special Adviser and Deputy Special Representative in Cyprus to resume, when appropriate, a sustained process of direct negotiations aimed at achieving a comprehensive settlement on the basis of the relevant Security Council resolutions, and stresses also the importance of concerted efforts to work with the Secretary-General to that end;

9. Calls once again upon the leaders of the two communities to commit themselves to this process of negotiations, to cooperate actively and constructively with the Secretary-General, his Special Adviser and his Deputy Special Representative and to resume when appropriate the direct dialogue, and urges all States to lend their full support to these efforts;

10. Welcomes the ongoing efforts by the Force to implement its humanitarian mandate in respect of Greek Cypriots and Maronites living in the northern part of the island, and Turkish Cypriots living in the southern part, as mentioned in the report of the Secretary-General;

11. Welcomes also the resumption of work of the Committee on Missing Persons, and calls for implementation without delay of the agreement on missing persons of 31 July 1997;

12. Reiterates its support for the efforts of the United Nations and others concerned to promote the holding of bicomunal events so as to build cooperation, trust and mutual respect between the two communities;

13. Welcomes the efforts made to improve the efficiency of the Force, including by the establishment of a new Civil Affairs Branch;

14. Requests the Secretary-General to submit a report by 10 June 1999 on the implementation of the present resolution;

15. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

The second draft resolution²² was then put to the vote, and was adopted unanimously as resolution 1218 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming all its earlier resolutions on Cyprus,

Reiterating its grave concern at the lack of progress towards an overall political settlement on Cyprus,

1. Expresses its appreciation for the letter dated 14 December 1998 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council on his mission of good offices in Cyprus, in particular on the work of his Deputy Special Representative;

2. Endorses the initiative of the Secretary-General announced on 30 September 1998 within the framework of his mission of good offices, with the goal of reducing tensions and promoting progress towards a just and lasting settlement in Cyprus;

3. Expresses its appreciation for the spirit of cooperation and constructive approach the two sides have demonstrated thus far in working with the Deputy Special Representative of the Secretary-General;

4. Requests the Secretary-General, in view of the objectives of promoting progress towards a just and lasting settlement and of reducing tension, set out in his initiative of 30 September 1998, and building on the serious engagement already demonstrated by the two sides to continue to make progress towards these two objectives, on the basis of relevant Security Council resolutions;

5. Also requests the Secretary-General, in particular, to work intensively with the two sides on the following, taking into account resolution 1178 (1998) of 29 June 1998:

(a) An undertaking to refrain from the threat or use of force or violence as a means to resolve the Cyprus problem;

(b) A staged process aimed at limiting and then substantially reducing the level of all troops and armaments in Cyprus;

(c) Implementation of the package of measures of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus aimed at reducing tensions along the ceasefire lines, and a commitment to enter into discussions with the Force with a view to early agreement on further specific and related tension-reducing steps, including demining along the buffer zone;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Security Council informed of progress made on his initiative;

8. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 29 June 1999 (4018th meeting):
resolutions 1250 (1999) and 1251 (1999)

On 8 June 1999, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the United Nations operation in Cyprus, covering developments from 9 December 1998 to 9 June 1999 and providing an update on the activities of the Force.²³ The Secretary-General said that the situation along the ceasefire lines remained stable and the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus continued to respond quickly to incidents between the two sides. While most were minor, the increase in provocative behaviour by members of the opposing forces along the lines heightened the risk of more serious problems. He underlined that the best way to prevent incidents was through enforcement of strict discipline along the ceasefire lines and cooperation with the Force on the basis of long-standing principles and practices. The adoption of measures by UNFICYP to reduce tension would further contribute to stabilizing the situation. More direct contact between Greek and Turkish Cypriots would also influence the atmosphere positively. In the existing circumstances, the Secretary-General concluded that the presence of the Force remained indispensable and, therefore, recommended its extension for a further period, until 31 December 1999.

On 22 June 1999, pursuant to resolution 1218 of (1998), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on his mission of good offices in Cyprus.²⁴ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that his Deputy Special Representative had continued to meet with both Cypriot leaders. Although the substance of those “shuttle-talks” remained confidential, the discussions had reconfirmed the importance of the issue of political equality. The Turkish Cypriot leadership had contended, however, that some aspects of the situation placed the Turkish Cypriots at a disadvantage and undermined the commitment to political equality. The Secretary-General noted that, while there had been no resumption of fighting between the two sides for the past 25 years, the absence of a settlement remained a source of instability and tension, and neither side had anything to gain from waiting any longer. A compromise on the remaining core issues of security, distribution of powers, property and territory would remove the remaining obstacles towards a lasting settlement of the Cyprus question. It was essential, however, that those issues be addressed without preconditions and in a realistic and straightforward manner in comprehensive negotiations. In the light of the above and subject to the Council’s guidance, the Secretary-General was ready to invite both leaders to resume the direct dialogue without further delay, without preconditions and in a spirit of compromise and cooperation.

At its 4018th meeting, held on 29 June 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the two reports of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Gambia) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of two draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council’s prior consultations.

The first draft resolution²⁵ was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1250 (1999), which reads:

²⁴ S/1999/707.

²⁵ S/1999/724.

The Security Council,

6. Requests the Secretary-General, in accordance with the relevant Security Council resolutions, to invite the leaders of the two sides to negotiations in the autumn of 1999;

7. Calls upon the two leaders, in this context, to give their full support to such a comprehensive negotiation, under the auspices of the Secretary-General, and to commit themselves to the following principles:

- No preconditions;
- All issues on the table;

- Full consideration of relevant United Nations resolutions and treaties;

8. Requests the two sides in Cyprus, including military authorities on both sides, to work constructively with the Secretary-General and his Special Representative to create a positive climate on the island that will pave the way for negotiations in the autumn of 1999;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Security Council informed of progress towards the implementation of the present resolution and to submit a report to the Council by 1 December 1999;

10. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

The second draft resolution²⁶ was also put to the vote, and was adopted unanimously as resolution 1251 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 8 June 1999 on the United Nations operation in Cyprus,

Noting that the situation along the ceasefire lines is essentially stable, but expressing its grave concern at the increasing practice by both sides of engaging in provocative behaviour along the ceasefire lines, which heightens the risk of more serious incidents,

Reminding the parties that the package of measures of the Force aimed at reducing tensions along the ceasefire lines was designed to reduce incidents and tensions, without affecting the security of either side,

Reiterating the need to make progress on a comprehensive political solution,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus for a further period ending 15 December 1999;

2. Reminds both sides of their obligation to prevent any violence directed against Force personnel, to cooperate fully with the Force and to ensure its complete freedom of movement;

6. Urges the Greek Cypriot side to agree to the implementation of the package of measures of the Force, and encourages the Force to continue its efforts towards the rapid implementation of the package by both sides;

7. Reiterates its grave concern at the continuing excessive levels of military forces and armaments in the Republic of Cyprus and the rate at which they are being expanded, upgraded and modernized, including by the introduction of advanced weapon systems by either side, and at the lack of progress towards any significant reduction in the number of foreign troops in the Republic of Cyprus, which threaten to raise tensions both on the island and in the region and complicate efforts to negotiate an overall political settlement;

9. Calls upon both sides to refrain from the threat or use of force or violence as a means to resolve the Cyprus problem;

14. Requests the Secretary-General to submit a report by 1 December 1999 on the implementation of the present resolution;

15. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 15 December 1999 (4082nd meeting): resolution 1283 (1999)

On 29 November 1999, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the United Nations operation in Cyprus, covering developments from 10 June to 29 November 1999 and giving an update of the activities of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus.²⁷ The Secretary-General said that the situation along the ceasefire lines had remained stable and that the prevention of incidents depended on the discipline imposed upon the troops on both sides and upon sustained cooperation with the Force. He further stated that on-island contact between the two communities remained limited, owing to early restrictions imposed by the Turkish Cypriot authorities. Meanwhile, the Force continued to promote civilian activities in the buffer zone, subject to operational and security arrangements. Reporting on his mission of good offices, the Secretary-General said that the leaders of the two Cypriot communities had agreed to start proximity talks, in New York, on 3 December 1999, in order to prepare the ground for meaningful negotiations towards a comprehensive settlement. Under the existing circumstances, he concluded that the presence of the Force on the island remained indispensable, and he therefore recommended the extension of the mandate of the Force for a further period ending on 15 June 2000.

At its 4082nd meeting, held on 15 December 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United Kingdom) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.²⁸ The draft

B. The situation in Croatia

Decision of 8 January 1996 (3617th meeting): statement by the President

On 21 December 1995, pursuant to resolution 1019 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on measures taken by the Government of Croatia in implementing resolutions 1009 (1995) and 1019 (1995) from 23 August until November 1995.³ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that human rights violations in former Sectors

North and South continued to be reported, although on a reduced scale. Moreover, there was a considerable discrepancy between the number of perpetrators that had been brought to justice and the number of reported violations of human rights. Croatian police officials had generally appeared to have displayed an unresponsive attitude to complaints against Croatian civilians and security personnel and, in many cases, had taken no action. He stated that the rights of Krajina Serbs to remain in their homes had not been adequately safeguarded and they had faced extensive harassment and intimidation. In addition, the rights of the Serb population that had fled during the military operation to return to their homes in safety and dignity were being seriously curtailed by the absence of constructive measures to facilitate their return. He emphasized that the humanitarian situation of the Serb population who had remained, consisting mainly of elderly and disabled people, was particularly disturbing, and stressed that many more might die during the winter if adequate assistance was not provided in a timely manner. Failure to respect the right to a fair trial of those Serbs who had remained and had been arrested on grounds of having committed “war crimes” or “armed rebellions” was also noted as a point of concern by the Secretary-General. Finally, the rights of the minority population in Croatia were being restricted by changes in the Constitution and new legal provisions, such as the law concerning the return and reclamation of property, were inhibiting the full enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms. He underlined that it was necessary to ensure that the rights of the Serb minority were adequately safeguarded in the legal and constitutional framework of Croatia.

At its 3617th meeting, held on 8 January 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United Kingdom), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 21 December 1995 submitted pursuant to its resolution 1019 (1995) of 9 November 1995 on Croatia, in particular the humanitarian situation and human rights violations described therein.

The Council strongly condemns the violations of international humanitarian law and human rights in the former sectors North and South in the Republic of Croatia, as described in the report of the Secretary-General, including killings of several hundreds of civilians, systematic and widespread looting and arson and other forms of destruction of property. The Council expresses its deep concern that there is a considerable discrepancy between the number of perpetrators that have so far been brought to justice and the number of reported violations of international humanitarian law and human rights. The Council urges the Government of the Republic of Croatia to make every effort to arrest all perpetrators and bring them to trial promptly.

The Council is disturbed by the humanitarian and security situation of the mostly elderly Serb population who have remained in the former sectors in the Republic of Croatia. The Council is gravely concerned at the information contained in the report on continuing extensive harassment and intimidation, looting of property and other forms of abuse. It reaffirms once again its demand that the Government of the Republic of Croatia take urgent measures to stop all such acts immediately and calls upon the Government to provide urgently needed food, medical assistance and proper shelter to the Serb population.

The Council reaffirms that all those who commit violations of international humanitarian law will be held individually responsible in respect of such acts. It recalls with dismay the failure to date of the Government of the Republic of Croatia to transfer to the custody of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991, established pursuant to its resolution 827 (1993), persons indicted by the International Tribunal, and expresses its concern at the recent appointment of one of those indicted to a position in the Croatian Army. The Council reiterates that all States must cooperate fully with the International Tribunal and its organs.

The Council expresses its deep concern at the situation of the refugees from the Republic of Croatia who wish to return. The Council shares the view of the Secretary-General that the rights of the members of the Serb population who fled during the military operation to return to their homes in safety and dignity are being severely curtailed by the absence of constructive measures to facilitate their return. The Council reaffirms its demand that the Government of the Republic of Croatia respect fully the rights of the members of the local Serb population, including their right to remain, leave or return in safety, and demands that the Government create conditions conducive to the return of those persons and urgently establish procedures to facilitate the processing of requests by persons wishing to return. It also urges the Government of the Republic of Croatia to refrain from any measure which would adversely affect the exercise of the right to return.

The Council reaffirms its call upon the Republic of Croatia to lift any time limits placed on the return of refugees to reclaim their property. It notes the decision of the Government of the Republic of Croatia of 27 December 1995 to suspend the deadline set in the relevant Croatian law as a step in the right direction. The Council will follow closely whether the Republic of Croatia will lift any such time limit in a definitive manner.

The Council takes note with appreciation of the decision of the Government of the Republic of Croatia of 30 December 1995 to suspend criminal proceedings against and release 455 local Serbs detained on suspicion of armed rebellion. The Council calls upon the Government of the Republic of Croatia to take appropriate measures to ensure that the right to a fair trial of those Serbs who remained and have been arrested and accused of war crimes or armed rebellion is safeguarded.

The Council affirms that it is necessary to ensure that the rights of persons belonging to the Serb minority are adequately safeguarded in the legal and constitutional framework of the Republic of Croatia. It urges the Government of the Republic of Croatia to rescind its decision to suspend several articles of the 'Constitutional Law on Human Rights and Freedoms and the Rights of National and Ethnic Communities in the Republic of Croatia' as described in the report of the Secretary-General. The Council stresses that strict respect for the rights of persons belonging to the Serb minority will also be of great importance to the implementation of the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium of 12 November 1995.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to keep it regularly informed on the progress of measures taken by the Government of the Republic of Croatia to implement resolution 1019 (1995) and the demands set out in the present statement, requests the Secretary-General to report to it no later than 15 February 1996 on this matter and expresses its intention to act as appropriate.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 15 January 1996 (3619th meeting): resolutions 1037 (1996) and 1038 (1996)

At its 3619th meeting, held on 15 January 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (United Kingdom), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.⁵ The President, with the consent of the Council, also invited Mr. Jovanović, at his request, to address the Council in the course of the discussion. He also drew the attention of the Council to an earlier report of the Secretary-General pursuant to Security Council resolution 1025 (1995).⁶

At the same meeting, the President further drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by France, Germany, Italy, Poland, the Republic of Korea, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States,⁷ and to a second draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁸

At the same meeting, the President further drew the attention of the Council to the following other documents: letters dated 15 November 1995 and 10 January 1996, respectively, from the representative of Croatia addressed to the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council, respectively, which expressed support for the deployment of United Nations military observers in the Prevlaka peninsula to be replaced by a regional arrangement;⁹ and a letter dated 11 January 1996 from the representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia addressed to the President of the Security Council, requesting the Security Council to regulate the question of the further continuation of the United Nations monitoring mission in the disputed area pending the peaceful settlement of the dispute.¹⁰

The representative of Croatia stated that his Government understood the draft resolution as an expression of the Council's determination to go beyond passive protection of Croatia's territorial integrity within its internationally recognized borders and to actively restore Croatian sovereignty to the region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, through the work of the Transitional Administrator and the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium (UNTAES). He underlined that the demilitarization aspect of the UNTAES mandate was the most critical element for its success. He noted that there might be some resistance to it, but that this could be overcome by creating a programme of second-country resettlements for local occupation leaders and through an active role on the part of the Government in Belgrade. That could begin with an immediate withdrawal of regular and paramilitary troops and assets from the region. He also stated that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had to move towards recognition of Croatia within its internationally recognized borders, in line with the Council's calls for such recognition. He noted that Croatia was also willing to do the same and recognize the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. The momentum created by the rapid and assertive implementation of the Multinational Military Implementation Force (IFOR) mandate could benefit the demilitarization aspect of the UNTAES mandate and, therefore, his Government welcomed any form of linkages between the two missions. He emphasized the importance of operative paragraphs 5, 6 and 7 of the draft resolution, noting that his Government interpreted those paragraphs to mean that the Security Council would terminate the mandate of UNTAES, if the demilitarization aspect was not achieved and, at any other time, if any other significant aspect of the mandate failed to be implemented, particularly if 126,000 non-Serb displaced persons and refugees were unable to return to the region in a timely and meaningful manner. Commenting on the second draft resolution, he expressed support for it and noted that Croatia was pleased that the issue of the Prevlaka peninsula was addressed in a separate document. He noted that the draft resolution recognized that the Prevlaka peninsula was an integral part of Croatia and opened a door for establishing a new monitoring arrangement in the area. He reiterated that, while the question of the Prevlaka peninsula could in no way be considered a border dispute, Croatia was ready to continue to explore all possible ways to peacefully resolve existing problems in the area, centred not on Prevlaka but on the Boka Kotorska harbour. He expressed support for the view that access to the Boka Kotorska harbour in the neighbouring Republic of Montenegro should be harmless.¹¹

At the same meeting, Mr. Jovanović stated that the conclusion of the Basic Agreement on Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, together with the Peace Agreement for Bosnia and Herzegovina, represented a major step towards the establishment of a lasting and just peace in the territories of the former

Yugoslavia. He stated that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia wanted to emphasize that, under the Basic Agreement, the Security Council had undertaken the responsibility to guarantee peace and stability in Eastern Slavonia in the transitional period, which meant ensuring the equality of all citizens and the protection of their human rights, including those of refugees and other people who chose to return to live in Eastern Slavonia. His delegation also commended the conclusions contained in the report of the Secretary-General and expected the United Nations forces to efficiently and impartially contribute to the full implementation of the Agreement. He stated that his delegation considered that a sufficient number of soldiers needed to be dispatched to Eastern Slavonia in order to enable the United Nations to entirely fulfil all the tasks that lay ahead, and he underlined that if that was not the case the efficient implementation of the Agreement would be at risk. He noted that the transitional authority needed to take control of and enhance all existing public services and administration and that it was imperative that the proportionality of the ethnic structure of the region be maintained in the number of people employed, particularly in top management jobs, the police and the judicial system. Noting that the implementation of the Basic Agreement could not depend solely on the United Nations, but lay with the two sides, he stressed that it was essential that confidence-building measures be urgently established and the full security of the local population ensured. He emphasized that the dispute over the Prevlaka peninsula was one of the most complex and significant issues and was of particular importance for the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, considering that access to the Montenegrin Bay of Boka Kotorska was fully controlled from the Prevlaka peninsula. He stated that what was at stake was a classic territorial dispute, and that considering the sensitivity of the issue, as well as the strategic relevance of the area, he felt that the further presence of United Nations troops would be the best guarantor, if misunderstandings and new problems were to be avoided. The Federal Republic of Yugoslavia therefore commended the Security Council for having decided to accept the recommendations of the Secretary-General to extend the presence of the United Nations monitors pending a mutually acceptable solution. He stated that his country believed the question could be resolved peacefully, and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia was ready, on the basis of relevant mutual agreements as well as Security Council resolutions, to continue to negotiate with Croatia.¹²

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Egypt stressed the need to show the utmost flexibility in implementing the provisions of the draft resolution, particularly when determining the size of the military component of UNTAES, by giving the Transitional Administrator the opportunity to propose an increase in the size of that component when he reported to the Secretary-General in the framework of paragraph 4 of the draft resolution or any subsequent report. He also stressed the need to achieve the greatest possible balance between participation in the UNTAES military component by State members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) on the one hand and non-NATO States on the other.¹³

The representative of China underlined that the main task of the Transitional Administration would be to assist the parties concerned in implementing the Basic Agreement, and that its activities needed to be strictly restricted to what was requested therein. Reiterating China's reservations about elements of the draft resolution, he stated that, when it came to the deployment of United Nations peacekeeping operations, China was never in favour of enforcement action under Chapter VII of the Charter. He noted that, as the two Croatian parties had explicitly pledged their cooperation, the military component of the Transitional Administration would be engaged mainly in monitoring and assisting demilitarization. He stated that, under those circumstances, it was not necessary to invoke Chapter VII in the authorization. Moreover, the use of close air support, as appropriate, in the case of insufficient manpower in peacekeeping operations needed to be limited to self-defence. Peacekeeping forces should not use force indiscriminately, and even less employ it as a means of retaliation. Finally, he stressed that the Transitional Administrator should exercise caution when making such requests.¹⁴

The representative of Indonesia underlined that the draft resolution provided for the Council's reconsideration of the mandate, if at any time it received a report from the Secretary-General that the parties had significantly failed to comply with the terms of the Basic Agreement. This was important because it provided the Council with the flexibility to adapt to rapidly changing circumstances but also because it underscored the message to the parties concerned of the need for their strict and scrupulous compliance with the Agreement.¹⁵

¹⁴ Ibid., pp. 8-9.

The representative of the Russian Federation noted that there were initial signs of an exodus of the Serb population, and that every effort needed to be made to prevent such a turn of events. He maintained that the situation in that part of Croatia needed to be carefully monitored by the Security Council so that the Council could promptly consider any further steps to fully implement the provisions of the current draft resolution if necessary.¹⁶

Speaking before and after the vote, several other speakers took the floor, expressing their support for the draft resolution, emphasizing the importance of the full cooperation of the parties to the conflict with the international community and observance of their commitments under the Basic Agreement; underlining the importance of the authorization for Member States to take all necessary measures, including close air support, in defense of UNTAES and for the close cooperation between IFOR and UNTAES including the provision of military support; and for cooperation between UNTAES and the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia.¹⁷

At the same meeting, the first draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1037 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its earlier relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 779 (1992) of 6 October 1992, 981 (1995) of 31 March 1995 and 1025 (1995) of 30 November 1995,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 13 December 1995,

Reaffirming once again its commitment to the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Croatia,

Noting the Joint Declaration signed at Geneva on 30 September 1992 by the Presidents of the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia which reaffirmed their agreement concerning the demilitarization of the Prevlaka peninsula, emphasizing the contribution that this

demilitarization has made to the decrease of tension in the region, and stressing the need for the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to agree on a settlement which would peacefully resolve their differences,

Stressing the importance it places on mutual recognition among the successor States to the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, within their internationally recognized borders,

Determining that the situation in Croatia continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security,

1. Authorizes the United Nations military observers to continue monitoring the demilitarization of the Prevlaka peninsula in accordance with resolutions 779 (1992) and 981 (1995) and paragraphs 19 and 20 of the report of the Secretary-General of 13 December 1995 for a period of three months, to be extended for an additional period of three months upon a report by the Secretary-General that such extension would continue to contribute to the decrease of tension there;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Council by 15 March 1996, for its early consideration, a report on the situation in the Prevlaka peninsula as well as on progress made by the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia towards a settlement which would peacefully resolve their differences, and on the possibility that the existing mandate may be extended or that another international organization may assume the task of monitoring the demilitarization of the Prevlaka peninsula;

3. Requests the United Nations military observers and the multinational Implementation Force authorized by the Council in resolution 1031 (1995) of 15 December 1995 to cooperate fully with each other;

4. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States stated that, as requested by the parties, the mandate of UNTAES ensured that it would be able to “govern” the region in an authoritative fashion. She stated that, in agreeing to undertake this complex responsibility, the international community would demand that both the Serb and Croat sides fully implement the 12 November Agreement. The Transitional Administration would not be expected to implement the Agreement by force, nor would it be expected to defend the region from an armed incursion. The international community would not tolerate actions that endangered the lives of the peacekeepers that were being sent. She emphasized that the meaning of paragraph 14 of the resolution was clear, namely that UNTAES would have the right to ask for assistance if its personnel were in danger. Further, North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) had already decided to provide close air support if requested by UNTAES.

Regarding the resolution that authorized United Nations military observers to continue to monitor the agreement on the demilitarization of the Prevlaka peninsula and surrounding territory, she stated that, while her Government had no doubt that the Prevlaka peninsula was sovereign Croatian territory, the United States called on both sides to continue to comply with their agreement to demilitarize the strategically important area. She also noted that the resolution called on the Secretary-General to submit, by 15 March 1996, a report which would comment on the possibility of another international organization assuming the task of monitoring the Prevlaka peninsula.¹⁸

Decision of 31 January 1996 (3626th meeting):

By a letter dated 26 January 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the Secretary-General referred to Security Council resolution 1037 (1996) of 15 January 1996, by which the Council established the United Nations Transitional Administration in Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, and to his report of 13 December 1995.¹⁹ He recalled that in his report he had recommended that a force of 9,300 combat troops would be necessary to ensure security in the region and to supervise demilitarization through a visible and credible presence. He noted that, given that number of troops, the concept had not required the deployment of United Nations military observers. However, in its resolution 1037 (1996), the Security Council decided that the military component of UNTAES would consist of a force with an initial deployment of up to 5,000 troops. In view of the more limited presence of the smaller force, the Transitional Administrator and his military staff had identified the need for 100 United Nations military observers for a period of six months in order to enable UNTAES to supervise and facilitate the demilitarization provided for in the Basic Agreement. He expressed his agreement with this recommendation and therefore sought the authorization of the Security Council for the deployment of 100 United Nations military observers for six months.

At its 3626th meeting, held on 31 January 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United Kingdom), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations. The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1043 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 1037 (1996) of 15 January 1996 establishing the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium,

Having considered the letter dated 26 January 1996 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council,

1. Decides to authorize, as part of the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, and in accordance with the provisions of resolution 1037 (1996), the deployment of one hundred military observers for a period of six months;

2. Decides also to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 23 February 1996 (3633rd meeting):
statement by the President

On 14 February 1996, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1019 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the progress of measures taken by the Government of Croatia to implement resolution 1019 (1995), which demanded that the rights of the local Serb population in the former Sectors be respected and that an end be put to all violations of international humanitarian law and human rights.²⁰ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the report by the Government of 28 January 1996 constituted a welcome statement of intended policy and operational initiatives to improve Croatia's human rights record. However, it was clear that international concern and attention in that area would not dissipate until there was evidence that the various policy initiatives had been implemented. He stated that it was gratifying that the incidence of human rights violations noted in the past two months in the former Sectors in Croatia had been greatly reduced from the levels recorded in the months immediately following last summer's military operations. The potential for recurrence remained substantial and, in that regard, the continuing absence of a strong and responsible local police presence remained a cause for concern. He also underlined that it would be important to continue to monitor the judicial process to ensure that the widespread criminality documented by international observers would be addressed. In addition, continued vigilance in respect of the humanitarian needs of the elderly Croatian Serbs who remained in the former Sectors was essential. Finally, little progress had been made on the return of Croatian Serb refugees to Croatia, and the Government had indicated that this would be addressed principally in the course of initiatives to be taken for the normalization of relations between Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. The Secretary-General also expressed hope that Serbs alleged to have taken up arms in support of the "Republic of Serb Krajina" would be granted fair judicial proceedings and that due consideration would be given to granting them amnesty, in accordance with the principles of international law. With the termination of the United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation in Croatia mandate on 15 January 1996, the number of international personnel in Croatia (outside the former Sector East) with a mandate to monitor human rights had been drastically reduced. Therefore, he stated that the ability of the United Nations to assess further developments would accordingly be very limited.

At its 3633rd meeting, held on 23 February 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United States), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²¹

The Security Council has considered the further report of the Secretary-General of 14 February 1996 submitted pursuant to its resolution 1019 (1995) on Croatia.

The Council recalls the statement by its President of 8 January 1996. The Council acknowledges that the incidence of human rights violations has been greatly reduced. However, it expresses concern that isolated incidents of killings and other violations of human rights have been reported. The Council also acknowledges the significant progress made by the Croatian Government in alleviating the humanitarian plight of the mostly elderly Serb population who remain in the former sectors in the Republic of Croatia. The Council looks to the Croatian Government to ensure the security and well-being of that population and to ensure the provision of basic humanitarian assistance, including access to medical facilities, pension allowances and property. The Council also looks to the Croatian Government to pursue vigorously prosecutions against those suspected of past violations of international humanitarian law and human rights against the local Serb minority.

The Council calls upon the Croatian Government to give due consideration to granting amnesty to local Serbs remaining in detention on charges arising from their alleged participation in the conflict.

The Council reiterates that all States must cooperate fully with the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 and its organs, established pursuant to its resolution 827 (1993). It notes that Croatian legislation providing for full cooperation with the International Tribunal is reported to be imminent. The Council urges the Government of the Republic of Croatia to uphold its obligations with respect to the International Tribunal unreservedly and without delay.

The Council remains deeply concerned at the situation of those refugees from the Republic of Croatia who wish to return. It condemns the fact that effective measures have so far not been taken in that respect. It calls upon the Croatian Government to ensure the expeditious processing of all requests from refugees. It underlines the fact that the exercise by members of the local Serb population of their rights, including their right to remain, leave or return to their homes in safety and dignity and reclaim possession of their property, cannot be made conditional upon an agreement on the normalization of relations between the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. The Council demands that the Croatian Government take measures forthwith to ensure that those concerned may fully exercise these rights. The Council also calls upon the Croatian Government to rescind its earlier decision to suspend articles of the constitutional law affecting the rights of national minorities and to proceed with the establishment of a provisional human rights court. It reminds the Croatian Government once again that the promotion of strict respect for the rights of persons belonging to the Serb minority is relevant to the successful implementation of the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, signed on 12 November 1995.

The Council welcomes and supports the Croatian Government's agreement to the establishment by the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe of a long-term mission with a view to monitoring respect for human rights throughout the Republic of Croatia. The Council pays tribute to the valuable work carried out by the United Nations Confidence Restoration Organization, which is known as UNCRO, and the European Community Monitoring Mission in this field over the past year.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to keep it regularly informed and to report in any case no later than 20 June 1996, drawing inter alia on information available from other relevant United Nations bodies, including the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, and the European Community Monitoring Mission, on the progress of measures undertaken by the Government of the Republic of Croatia in the light of the present statement.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 22 May 1996 (3666th meeting):
statement by the President

By a letter dated 20 May 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²² the Secretary-General informed the Council, with reference to operative paragraph 3 of resolution 1037 (1996), that the Transitional Administrator had assessed that the military component of the Transitional Administration had been deployed and was ready to undertake its mission of demilitarization of the region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium. As other arrangements to support the process of demilitarization were also in place, it was the intention of the Transitional Administrator to commence demilitarization of the region at 1200 hours, local time, on Tuesday, 21 May 1996.

At its 3666th meeting, held on 22 May 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (China), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 20 May 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council from the representative of Croatia,²³ which informed him that the Croatian Sabor (Parliament) had adopted a law that granted amnesty to all persons who committed crimes between 17 August 1990 and 1 June 1996 in the last remaining occupied Croatian territory, presently under the temporary administration of UNTAES, although this excluded persons who were suspected of violations of international humanitarian law and the laws of war.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁴

The Security Council has considered the letter dated 20 May 1996 from the Secretary-General to its President in which he informed the Council of the assessment of the Transitional Administrator that the military component of the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium had been deployed and was ready to undertake its mission of demilitarization of the region. That mission of demilitarization began on 21 May 1996.

The Council calls upon the parties to comply strictly with their obligations under the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, signed on 12 November 1995, and to cooperate fully with the Transitional Administration. It stresses that they must refrain from any unilateral action which could hinder the implementation of the Basic Agreement, including the process of demilitarization.

The Council reminds the parties that the successful implementation of the Basic Agreement requires the respect by them of the highest level of internationally recognized human rights and fundamental freedoms. It calls upon the parties to continue to cooperate with the Transitional Administration in adopting confidence-building measures to promote an environment of mutual trust.

The Council calls upon the Government of the Republic of Croatia to grant amnesty to all persons who, either voluntarily or by coercion, served in the civil administration, military or police forces of the local Serb authorities in the former United Nations Protected Areas, with the exception of those who committed war crimes as defined in international law. It notes that the law on amnesty recently passed in the Republic of Croatia is a step in this direction. The Council calls upon the Government of the Republic of Croatia to make this amnesty comprehensive as soon as possible and stresses the importance such a measure would have for maintaining public confidence and stability during the demilitarization and demobilization process.

The Council underlines the key importance of attention to the need for economic reconstruction and rehabilitation of the region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium and encourages Member States to contribute to this end.

The Council will remain seized of the matter and requests the Secretary-General to keep it regularly informed of developments in the situation.

Decision of 3 July 1996 (3677th meeting):
statement by the President

On 21 June 1996, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1019 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report on the situation of human rights in Croatia.²⁵ The Secretary-General stated that it was evident that measures taken by the Government of Croatia to provide security to residents of the former Sectors in Croatia had been insufficient. The prevailing lawlessness clearly demanded that additional steps be taken and that the professional police presence be strengthened. He underlined that the Government's failure thus far to provide reasonable security in the former Sectors had not created conditions likely to encourage the return of Croatian Serbs. Concern was also warranted by the lack of progress in the investigation and prosecution of numerous crimes committed against the local Serb population in the previous summer's military operations. He also noted that, while Croatia had embarked on a major programme to return displaced Croats and Croat refugees from elsewhere to the former Sectors West, North and South, there was no determined effort to facilitate the return of Croatian Serb refugees and the rapid repopulation was likely to create major obstacles for their return. The continued failure by the Government to enact a broad amnesty for former soldiers of the so-called "Republic of Serb Krajina" also mitigated against the large-scale return of Croatian Serbs. He also noted that, while the Government should be credited for its generally cooperative attitude with international human rights mechanisms and various initiatives for the protection of minority rights, such protection could not be linked with the political negotiations with the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, as the protection arose from obligations under various legal instruments. He summed up by saying that there was an absence of concrete initiatives to encourage the return of Croatian Serb refugees, which suggested continuing hostility to the presence of a significant Serb population in the territory of Croatia.

At its 3677th meeting, held on 3 July 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (France), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁶

The Security Council has considered the further report of the Secretary-General of 21 June 1996 submitted pursuant to its resolution 1019 (1995) on Croatia.

The Council is deeply concerned at the failure by the Croatian Government to take sufficient measures to safeguard the rights of the local Serb population and to ensure their safety and well-being. The Council is also deeply concerned at the Croatian Government's failure to promote conditions, including satisfactory procedures, facilitating the return of all Croatian Serbs who wish to do so. The Council strongly deplores such failure to act.

The Council notes that the Croatian Government has begun to cooperate with international human rights mechanisms and that it has considered various initiatives for the protection of minority rights. Nevertheless, the Council underlines the fact that the Croatian Government must undertake determined and sustained efforts to ensure respect for and protection of the rights of Croatian Serbs and to provide for their safeguarding in the legal and constitutional framework of the Republic of Croatia, including by the reactivation of the relevant articles of its constitutional law. The Council reminds the Croatian Government that its obligation to promote respect for and protection of such rights cannot be made conditional upon other factors, including upon political negotiations with the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.

The Council expects the Croatian Government to take steps forthwith to comply with the demands contained in its resolution 1019 (1995) and in its presidential statements of 8 January, 23 February and 22 May 1996.

The Council reiterates that all States must cooperate fully with the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 and its organs, established pursuant to its resolution 827 (1993). It notes the cooperation by the Croatian Government with the International Tribunal to date and reminds the Croatian Government of its obligation to execute arrest warrants in respect of any person in its territory indicted by the Tribunal. The Council calls upon the Croatian Government, with due respect to the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Bosnia and Herzegovina, to use its influence with the Bosnian Croat leadership to ensure their cooperation with the International Tribunal.

The Council will continue to follow this issue closely. It requests the Secretary-General to keep it regularly informed on measures undertaken by the Croatian Government in the light of the present statement, and to report in any case no later than 1 September 1996.

²⁶ S/PRST/1996/29.

Decision of 3 July 1996 (3678th meeting):
statement by the President

On 26 June 1996, pursuant to paragraph 4 of Security Council resolution 1037 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the activities of the Transitional Administration and the implementation of the Basic Agreement by the parties.²⁷ He stated that UNTAES had achieved significant progress in the implementation of its mandate and had contributed to the gradual normalization of relations between Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. Moreover, the demilitarization of the region had been completed with relative ease, and the parties had displayed a willingness to abide by the Basic Agreement and to recognize the desire of the international community to help them to implement it. Although the Transitional Administration would endeavour to build confidence by maintaining stability and security in the region in the post-demilitarization period, the mandate of the military observers who were serving with UNTAES in accordance with Security Council resolution 1043 (1996) would expire on 30 July 1996. The post-demilitarization period was a critical time for the Transitional Administration, with the region still tense and subject to the possibility of infiltration. The Force Commander felt strongly that a continued presence of United Nations military observers would enhance the ability of UNTAES to monitor the situation. The Secretary-General concurred with this view and thus recommended that the mandate of the military observers be extended to 15 January 1997. He noted that many challenges awaited UNTAES in the next phase, with the return of displaced persons among the most daunting. Another challenge was to define mechanisms and assurances that would protect the cultural and social identities as well as the heritage of national minorities.

At its 3678th meeting, held on 3 July 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (France), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. He then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 28 June 1996 from the representative of Croatia addressed to the Secretary-General,²⁸ stating that Croatia had received the report favourably and providing several clarifications to points that had been raised.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁹

The Security Council, in accordance with paragraph 6 of resolution 1037 (1996), has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 26 June 1996 on the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium.

The Council notes that the implementation of the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, signed on 12 November 1995, is proceeding according to the timetable established by the Agreement. In particular it notes with appreciation that the demilitarization proceeded smoothly and was completed on 20 June 1996. It expresses its satisfaction at the cooperation that both parties have shown in this respect. It calls upon both sides to refrain from any action that might raise tension and to continue to cooperate closely with the Transitional Administration on all aspects of the Basic Agreement to maintain peace and security in the region. It expresses its readiness to consider favourably the extension of the mandate of the United Nations military observers in the Transitional Administration as recommended in the report.

The Council expresses its satisfaction with the work already achieved by the Transitional Administration, in particular through its operational joint implementation committees, for the re-establishment of normal conditions of life for all the inhabitants of the region. The Council welcomes the efforts now in train to begin the return of displaced persons and refugees to their homes in the region. It notes that it is equally important that persons who fled from their homes in Western Slavonia and elsewhere in Croatia, in particular in the Krajina, should be permitted to return to their homes of origin. The Council calls upon both parties to cooperate fully with the Transitional Administration in that respect.

The Council recalls the statement by its President of 22 May 1996. The Council regrets that the Government of the Republic of Croatia has not yet taken steps to adopt a comprehensive amnesty law concerning all persons who, either voluntarily or by coercion, served in the civil administration, military or police forces of the local Serb authorities in the former United Nations Protected Areas, with the exception of those who committed war crimes as defined in international law. The Council urges that this action be taken as soon as possible and calls upon the Croatian Government to cooperate with the Transitional Administration to that end.

The Council expresses its concern at the worsening economic situation in the region, particularly since the closure in April of the Djeletovci oilfields, which constitute the region's most important economic resource, and at the subsequent lack of revenue available to the local administration to meet salaries and other operating costs of the region. The Council urges the Government of the Republic of Croatia to cooperate closely with the Transitional Administration to identify and provide funding for the local administration and public services. It also underlines the importance of economic development in stabilizing the region.

The Council expresses its support for the efforts of the Transitional Administration to establish and train a transitional police force which will have the primary responsibility for the maintenance of law and order, operating under the authority of the Transitional Administrator and monitored by the United Nations civilian police. The Council also supports the efforts of the Transitional Administration and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to facilitate mine clearing for humanitarian purposes. It calls upon States and others concerned urgently to contribute in support of such activities.

The Council commends the Transitional Administrator and all the personnel of the Transitional Administration for the impressive results they have achieved so far and expresses its full support for them.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 15 July 1996 (3681st meeting):
resolution 1066 (1996)

On 27 June 1996, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1038 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in the Prevlaka peninsula before the expiry of the existing mandate.³⁰ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that there had been several positive developments including the withdrawal of Croatian military personnel, the partial removal of mines in the United Nations-controlled zone on the Croatian side of the border, the withdrawal of heavy weapons and the easing of movement restrictions. He expressed hope that the parties, having taken the steps towards normalization of the situation in Prevlaka, would adopt the practical options proposed by the United Nations Mission of Observers in Prevlaka (UNMOP) to reduce tension further and to promote an atmosphere conducive to the restoration of the area. He stated that the Mission had made, and continued to make, an important contribution to stability in the Prevlaka area, promoting a better climate for bilateral negotiations between Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. He expressed his belief that, if UNMOP were to be removed at this stage, one of the parties could seek to fill the vacuum created by its departure and the ensuing military tensions could prejudice the process of political negotiations. Moreover, in discussions with his Chief Military Observer, both Governments had requested the continuation of the UNMOP mandate and, given that no other international or regional organization had expressed a willingness to undertake full-time monitoring of the area, he recommended that the mandate of the Mission be extended for a period of three months, until 15 October 1996, pending the outcome of the negotiations between the parties.

At its 3681st meeting, held on 15 July 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (France), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion, without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.³¹ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1066 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its earlier relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 779 (1992) of 6 October 1992, 981 (1995) of 31 March 1995, 1025 (1995) of 30 November 1995 and 1038 (1996) of 15 January 1996,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 27 June 1996,

Reaffirming once again its commitment to the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Croatia,

Noting the Joint Declaration signed at Geneva on 30 September 1992 by the Presidents of the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia which reaffirmed their agreement concerning the demilitarization of the Prevlaka peninsula, emphasizing the contribution that this

demilitarization has made to the decrease of tension in the region, and stressing the need for the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to agree on a settlement which would peacefully resolve their differences,

Stressing the importance it places on mutual recognition among the successor States to the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, within their internationally recognized borders,

Determining that the situation in Croatia continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security,

1. Authorizes the United Nations military observers to continue monitoring the demilitarization of the Prevlaka peninsula, in accordance with resolutions 779 (1992) and 981 (1995) and paragraphs 19 and 20 of the report of the Secretary-General of 13 December 1995, until 15 January 1997;

2. Urges the parties to abide by their mutual commitments and to continue their negotiations with a view to normalizing fully their bilateral relations, which are critical for the establishment of peace and stability throughout the region;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Council by 5 January 1997, for its early consideration, a report on the situation in the Prevlaka peninsula as well as on progress made by the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia towards a settlement which would peacefully resolve their differences;

4. Encourages the parties to adopt the practical options proposed by the United Nations military observers to reduce tension, as referred to in the report of the Secretary-General of 27 June 1996;

5. Requests the United Nations military observers and the multinational Implementation Force authorized by the Council in resolution 1031 (1995) of 15 December 1995 to continue to cooperate fully with each other;

6. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 30 July 1996 (3686th meeting):
resolution 1069 (1996)

At its 3686th meeting, held on 30 July 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General on UNTAES of 26 June 1996 and its addendum in its agenda.³² Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (France), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

³² S/1996/472 and Add.1. See also decision of 3 July 1996.

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's consultations.³³ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1069 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 1037 (1996) of 15 January 1996 establishing the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium and its resolution 1043 (1996) of 31 January 1996 authorizing the deployment of military observers as part of the Transitional Administration,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 26 June 1996,

1. Decides to authorize, as part of the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium and in accordance with the provisions of resolution 1037 (1996), the deployment of one hundred military observers for an additional period of six months, ending on 15 January 1997;

2. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 15 August 1996 (3688th meeting):
statement by the President

On 5 August 1996, pursuant to paragraph 4 of resolution 1037 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted a report to the Security Council on the Transitional Administration.³⁴ In his report, he observed that UNTAES had continued to make vigorous efforts to achieve the full and peaceful reintegration of the region into Croatia. The most immediate concern was to obtain funding for the local administration of the region until sustained Croatian financing became available, possibly for a period of up to six months. He stated that it was regrettable that the Government of Croatia had not provided such funding, and he stressed that, unless the present negotiations with the Government of Croatia reached a satisfactory conclusion, he would have to consider whether to report to the Council that one of the parties had significantly failed to comply with its obligations under the Basic Agreement. He also underlined that negative effects on Serb confidence and UNTAES operations had been caused by the uncertainty regarding the duration of the UNTAES mission. While

UNTAES was making encouraging progress in regard to the implementation of all aspects of its mandate, it did not appear realistic to expect that the tasks would be completed by the expiration of the current UNTAES mandate. Therefore, he recommended that, considering the many and complex tasks UNTAES had been mandated to perform and in order to provide greater clarity and guidance to the mission, the Council consider the possibility of indicating that it intended to extend the mandate of UNTAES by up to a further 12 months to enable it to complete its tasks.

By a letter dated 2 August 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁵ the Secretary-General communicated his concerns over the difficulties faced by UNTAES in securing funding for the operations of existing local administrative structures in its area of operations.

By a note dated 12 August 1996, the Secretary-General transmitted the text of the Agreement on Interim Co-financing of Public Services on the Territory Administered by UNTAES, concluded on 8 August 1996 by the Government of Croatia and UNTAES.³⁶

At its 3688th meeting, held on 15 August 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letter, the note and the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Germany), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:³⁷

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 5 August 1996 on the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, and the letter dated 2 August 1996 from the Secretary-General concerning the funding of the existing local administrative structures in the area of operations of the Transitional Administration.

The Council welcomes the progress made by the Transitional Administration in implementing the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, signed on 12 November 1995, and in promoting the full and peaceful reintegration of the region of Eastern Slavonia into the Republic of Croatia. It stresses that the restoration and maintenance of the multi-ethnic character of Eastern Slavonia are important to international efforts to maintain peace and stability in the region of the former Yugoslavia as a whole. It reminds both parties of their obligation to cooperate with the Transitional Administration. It underlines the importance of economic rehabilitation of the region, the establishment of a transitional police force and the return of displaced persons and refugees to their homes in the region, as well as the importance of the promotion by the Government of Croatia of the return of displaced persons and refugees to their homes of origin elsewhere in the Republic of Croatia. It further underlines the importance of the holding of elections in accordance with the Basic Agreement, once the necessary conditions have been established.

The Council reminds the Government of Croatia of its responsibility to cooperate with the Transitional Administration and to create conditions conducive to maintaining stability in the region. It calls upon the Government of Croatia to take the necessary action without further delay.

The Council recalls the statements by its President of 22 May and 3 July 1996 and again urges the Government of Croatia to adopt a comprehensive amnesty law concerning all persons who, voluntarily or by coercion, served in the civil administration, military or police forces of the local Serb authorities in the former United Nations Protected Areas, with the exception of those who committed war crimes as defined in international law. The Council notes with concern that the amnesty law and the action subsequently taken by the Government of Croatia, as described by the Secretary-General in his report of 5 August, have been insufficient to create confidence among the local Serb population in Eastern Slavonia. The Council notes the general agreement reached by President Tudjman and President Milosevic in Athens on 7 August 1996 that a general amnesty is an indispensable condition for the safe return of refugees and displaced persons. It expects this agreement to be followed up by corresponding concrete measures.

The Council notes with appreciation the agreement reached by the Government of Croatia and the Transitional Administration on issues relating to the funding of public services on the territory administered by the Transitional Administration. It notes, however, that this funding is not sufficient to cover all the costs of such services and it expects further funding to be made available by the Government of Croatia urgently and without conditions. It stresses the importance of ensuring a functioning civil administration so as to maintain stability in the region and help to ensure the fulfilment of the mission objectives of the Transitional Administration. The Council, having regard to its resolution 1037 (1996), also reminds the Government of Croatia of the need to contribute towards the costs of the operation of the Transitional Administration.

³⁷ S/PRST/1996/35.

The Council recalls that the Basic Agreement provides for a transitional period of twelve months which may be extended at most to another period of the same duration if so requested by one of the parties. It stresses the importance it attaches to the Transitional Administration being able to complete its mandated tasks, including the organization of elections as provided for in the Basic Agreement, promptly and in full. These tasks are, as the Secretary-General notes, the building blocks for the difficult process of reconciliation. To that end, the Council affirms its readiness to consider, at an appropriate time, extending the duration of the mandate of the Transitional Administration, on the basis of the Basic Agreement, its resolution 1037 (1996) and a recommendation from the Secretary-General.

The Council expresses its appreciation to the Transitional Administrator and his staff and reaffirms its full support for the efforts of the Transitional Administrator.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 20 September 1996 (3697th meeting): statement by the President

On 23 August 1996, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1019 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation of human rights in Croatia.³⁸ The Secretary-General stated that a prevailing climate of lawlessness persisting in the former Sectors North, South and West, particularly around Knin, was causing great fear among local residents. It was evident that the Government of Croatia still had not taken adequate measures to provide an effective police presence in the region. Moreover, the situation had been aggravated by several bombing attacks and by harassment of non-governmental human rights organizations. Concerning the investigation and prosecution of past violations of international humanitarian law and human rights against the local Serb population, much progress remained to be made by the Croatian authorities. The International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia indicated that it was receiving satisfactory cooperation from Croatian police authorities, but was concerned that the Croatian authorities had not executed arrest warrants transmitted to them. While the process of the return of Croatian Serbs was moving slowly, tens of thousands of Croats, both displaced persons and refugees, were settling in the region. He noted that the manner in which the Government of Croatia had been approaching this question was having a profound impact on the region's ethnic balance. In addition, the question of property required particular attention from the Croatian authorities who also needed to take other measures to facilitate the return of Croatian Serbs, including strong measures against widespread employment discrimination on the basis of ethnic origin. He also noted that the reluctance of the Government of Croatia to enact a broad amnesty for former soldiers of the so-called "Republic of Serb Krajina", and its failure to re-enact or provide a meaningful replacement for suspended constitutional provisions dealing with minority rights in Croatia, were continuing areas of concern. He concluded by saying that, while positive steps had been taken, the overall approach of the Government of Croatia to the rights of Croatian Serbs in Croatia had so far failed to encourage confidence within the Serb population.

At its 3697th meeting, held on 20 September 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Guinea-Bissau), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 16 September 1996 from the President of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia addressed to the President of the Security Council.³⁹ In the letter, the President of the Tribunal informed the Council of the "refusal" by Croatia, a State Member of the United Nations, and by Bosnia and Herzegovina, to cooperate with the Tribunal and to comply with its orders to arrest Iвица Rajić, as required by article 29 of the Statute of the Tribunal. This was not an isolated incident, but formed part of a general pattern of failure in respect of matters concerning the Tribunal. Moreover, he noted that, by refusing to cooperate in the execution of the arrest warrant against Iвица Rajić and others, Croatia had failed to comply with an enforcement measure under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations. In addition, both Croatia and Bosnia and Herzegovina had not lived up to the commitments undertaken by signing the Dayton Peace Agreement.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴⁰

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 23 August 1996 submitted pursuant to Council resolution 1019 (1995) on Croatia.

The Council notes progress in the humanitarian and human rights situation in some areas. The Council regrets, however, that many of its previous requests have not been complied with by the Government of Croatia. Numerous incidents threatening the population in the formerly Serb-controlled areas are a continuing source of concern and could jeopardize the prospects for peaceful and substantial reintegration of refugees and displaced persons in Croatia.

The Council commends the agreement between the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, signed in Belgrade on 23 August 1996, and expects the commitments contained therein to be implemented.

The Council recognizes steps taken by the Government of Croatia to reintegrate refugees and displaced persons into Croatia but urges the Government to expand its programme to accelerate the return of all such persons without preconditions or delay. The Council urges the Government of Croatia also to expand its humanitarian relief efforts, especially as winter approaches.

The Council, in the statement by its President of 3 July 1996, highlighted the need for the adoption of a comprehensive amnesty law, in cooperation with the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium. Since the report of the Secretary-General of 23 August 1996 which found no substantial progress in this regard since passage of the Croatian Government's amnesty law of 17 May 1996, the Republic of Croatia on 20 September 1996 enacted a new amnesty law. The Council welcomes this development as a step towards addressing the concerns outlined by the statement by its President on 3 July 1996 and emphasizes that such a law must be implemented without delay and in a fair and equitable manner, with full respect for the rights of the individual. The Council will follow such implementation closely. The Council notes that a comprehensive new amnesty law and its equitable application are also vital elements in preparing for elections in Eastern Slavonia and important factors in the successful completion of the mandate of the Transitional Administration.

Despite some positive developments, the Council is deeply concerned that residents of the Krajina and Western Slavonia continue to suffer from inadequate security, including the danger of theft or assault at any time. The Council also notes with concern attacks and threats against those engaged in humanitarian relief activities and human-rights monitoring in the area. In particular, it deplores the reported involvement of Croatian uniformed military and police officials in acts of looting and harassment.

The Council urges the Croatian authorities to act immediately to improve the security situation in those regions. It urges that Croatian officials ensure that members of the military and police refrain from criminal and other unacceptable behaviour and increase their efforts to protect the human rights of all persons present in Croatia, including the Serb population.

The Council welcomes the recommendations made by the Secretary-General in his report for specific action which must be taken to improve the human rights situation in the Republic of Croatia, inter alia, in the framework of the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, as part of the peace process towards a comprehensive political settlement in the region. In this context, the Council calls upon the Government of Croatia to expand investigations of crimes committed against the Serb population in 1995. The Council again calls upon the Government of Croatia to rescind its decision of September 1995 suspending certain constitutional provisions affecting the rights of national minorities, principally Serbs.

The Council reminds the Government of Croatia of its obligation to cooperate with the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 and, in particular, to execute the arrest warrants issued by the International Tribunal regarding individuals under Croatian jurisdiction, including prominent accused persons known or believed to be in areas under its control, and to transfer to the Tribunal all indicted persons. In this context, the Council deplores the failure to date of the Republic of Croatia to execute the arrest warrants issued by the International Tribunal against individuals indicted by the Tribunal, in particular the Bosnian Croats referred to in the letter dated 16 September 1996 from the President of the Tribunal to the President of the Council, and calls for the execution of those arrest warrants without delay.

The Council recalls that no individual should be arrested and detained on the territory of the former Yugoslavia for serious violations of international humanitarian law until and unless the International Tribunal has reviewed the case and agreed that the warrant, order or indictment meets international legal standards.

The Council will remain seized of the matter and requests that the Secretary-General continue to report on the situation, in any case no later than 10 December 1996.

Decision of 15 November 1996 (3712th meeting): resolution 1079 (1996)

On 26 October 1996, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1037 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the major activities of UNTAES since his last report of 1 October

⁴⁰ S/PRST/1996/39.

1996, which identified the current challenges and future tasks of the mission and contained his recommendations.⁴¹ He stated that in the six months since the full deployment of UNTAES troops and civilian staff, demilitarization had been completed, the Transitional Police Force had been established, integration of waterways, railways and roads was in hand and postal and telephone services had been reconnected with Croatian systems. Strenuous efforts had been made to attract international financial assistance for the economic reconstruction and revitalization of the region. He also noted that the process of face-to-face political dialogue had been instrumental in the achievement of a satisfactory amnesty law. He informed the Council that, building on the progress that had been achieved, UNTAES had set a realistic target plan for the fulfilment of the remaining tasks of its mandate, although its achievement was dependent on the full and timely cooperation of the parties. He stated that, while extremists on both sides sought to disrupt the implementation by UNTAES of the Basic Agreement programme, it was of particular concern that the Government of Croatia had not been fully forthcoming in meeting its commitments and obligations. An atmosphere of confrontation and obstruction had developed that appeared to be related more to domestic political concerns than to the work of UNTAES. He emphasized that terminating the uncertainty around the mandate of UNTAES was an urgent requirement for the successful completion of the mission. It was clear that the completion of tasks within the present mandate period was impossible, and moreover, a decision by the Council to extend the mandate would discourage those who held the false belief that political pressure would cause the mission to compromise on the performance of its tasks and full realization of its mandate, and therefore seek to obstruct it. He stated that, while the presence of UNTAES had significantly contributed to the normalization of relations between Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and had played an important role in promoting wider regional stabilization, the climate of uncertainty and agitation that had developed over the past two months threatened to undermine the progress of the mission. The Secretary-General therefore recommended that the Council extend the mandate of UNTAES by six months, to end on 15 July 1997. He added that the Council might also wish to give consideration to the need to make appropriate arrangements for a further six-month presence until the end of a two-year transitional period. This follow-on mission would be designed to monitor the parties' compliance with their commitments as outlined in the Basic Agreement and to promote an atmosphere of confidence among all local residents, while facilitating the establishment of a long-term monitoring and observation presence. He noted that an early decision would be needed in order to avoid a further period of pressure and political turmoil.

At its 3712th meeting, held on 15 November 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Indonesia), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 1 November 1996 from the representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴² in which he informed the Council that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia strongly urged the Security Council to adopt a resolution on the extension of the mandate of UNTAES until 15 January 1998, to assure the full implementation of all provisions of the Basic Agreement and satisfy the fundamental needs of the peace process in general.

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of members of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁴³ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1079 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions concerning the territories of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium of the Republic of Croatia, in particular its resolutions 1023 (1995) of 22 November 1995, 1025 (1995) of 30 November 1995, 1037 (1996) of 15 January 1996, 1043 (1996) of 31 January 1996 and 1069 (1996) of 30 July 1996,

Reaffirming once again its commitment to the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Croatia, and emphasizing in this regard that the territories of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium are integral parts of the Republic of Croatia,

Welcoming the success the United Nations Transitional Administration in Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium has had in facilitating the peaceful return of the territories to the control of the Republic of Croatia,

Recalling that the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, signed on 12 November 1995 by the Government of the Republic of Croatia and the local Serb community, requested the Security Council to establish a Transitional Administration to govern the region during the transitional period,

Recalling also that the Basic Agreement provided that the transitional period of twelve months may be extended at most to another period of the same duration if so requested by one of the parties,

Noting that the local Serb community has requested that the transitional period be extended by twelve months, as indicated by the Secretary-General in his report of 28 August 1996,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 26 October 1996, and noting in particular the recommendations of the Secretary-General that the mandate of the Transitional Administration should be extended by six months, until 15 July 1997, that early extension would avoid a period of pressure and political turmoil, and that the Council should consider at this time the need for a further six-month presence of the United Nations,

Determining that the situation in Croatia continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security,

Determined to ensure the security and freedom of movement of the personnel of the United Nations peacekeeping operations in the Republic of Croatia, and, to these ends, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Expresses its full support for the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, and calls upon the Government of the Republic of Croatia and the local Serb community to cooperate fully with the Transitional Administration and to fulfil all obligations specified in the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium and all relevant Security Council resolutions;

2. Calls upon the Government of the Republic of Croatia and the local Serb community to cooperate with the Transitional Administration in creating the conditions and taking the other steps necessary for holding local elections in the region, in accordance with the Basic Agreement, the organization of which is the responsibility of the Transitional Administration;

3. Reaffirms the importance of full compliance by the parties with their commitments as specified in the Basic Agreement to respect the highest standards of human rights and fundamental freedoms and to promote an atmosphere of confidence among all local residents irrespective of their ethnic origin, and in this context, urges the Government of the Republic of Croatia to ensure respect for the rights of all national ethnic groups;

4. Urges, furthermore, the Republic of Croatia and the local Serb community to avoid actions which could lead to refugee movements, and, in the context of the right of all refugees and displaced persons to return to their homes of origin, reaffirms the right of all persons originating from the Republic of Croatia to return to their homes of origin throughout the Republic of Croatia;

5. Emphasizes the responsibility of both the Republic of Croatia and the local Serb community to improve the reliability and effectiveness of the transitional police force, in cooperation with the Transitional Administration and consistent with its mandate;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council fully informed of developments and to report to the Council by 15 February 1997 and again by 1 July 1997 on the situation in the region;

7. Decides to maintain the United Nations presence in the region until the end of the extended transitional period as provided for in the Basic Agreement, and:

(a) Decides to extend the mandate of the Transitional Administration until 15 July 1997;

(b) Requests that as soon as possible after the successful holding of elections, and in no case later than his report of 1 July 1997, the Secretary-General provide to the Council for its immediate action his recommendations, in the light of the progress of the parties towards fulfilling the Basic Agreement, for the further United Nations presence, possibly a restructured Transitional Administration, consistent with the fulfilment of the Basic Agreement, for the six-month period beginning 16 July 1997;

8. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 20 December 1996 (3727th meeting): statement by the President

On 5 November 1996, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1019 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report on the situation of human rights in Croatia.⁴⁴ In his report, he observed that, although the security situation in the former Sectors had improved slightly since his last report, the ongoing looting and harassment, especially in the area around Knin, gave continuing cause for concern. Prospects for improved confidence amongst the local Serb population were further harmed by the Government's lack of progress in investigating and resolving incidents of human rights violations that occurred in 1995. He noted that it was a legitimate question whether Croatian Serbs in the region would be able to re-establish the conditions of normal life in the near future. However, there had been some positive political developments, including the Agreement on Normalization of Relations between the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, which contained important human rights commitments, the adoption of the new Law on Amnesty on 25 September 1996 and the admission of Croatia to the Council of Europe. He informed the Council that, on the issue of the return of Croatian Serb refugees, there had been little progress since his last report. He stated that two developments boded especially poorly for the prospect of future returns. The first was the failure of the Government of Croatia to effectively safeguard property rights. The second was related to the implementation of the new amnesty law, where the re-arrest of numerous persons, immediately following their release under the law, threatened to deprive the legislation of its value in building confidence and promoting reconciliation in Croatia. Regarding the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, there remained strong grounds for concern that the Government of Croatia was withholding its full cooperation, principally by failing to ensure the apprehension of indicted war-crime suspects believed to be in areas under its control. The Office of the Prosecutor had also advised that it had not been able to find evidence of any serious attempt by the Croatian authorities to investigate grave allegations made about the conduct of Croatian soldiers and civilians during the 1995 military operations in Krajina and Western Slavonia.

At its 3727th meeting, held on 20 December 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Italy), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴⁵

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 5 December 1996 submitted pursuant to Council resolution 1019 (1995) on Croatia.

The Council acknowledges notable progress in the humanitarian situation, in particular measures taken by the Government of Croatia to meet the most urgent humanitarian needs of the Croatian Serb population.

Although the security situation has improved slightly, the Council, however, expresses its concern at continued acts of harassment, looting and physical attacks against Croatian Serbs and, in particular, involvement by Croatian uniformed military and police officials in a number of those incidents. It calls upon the Government of Croatia to intensify its efforts to improve the security situation and to ensure adequate security conditions for the local Serb population, including the urgent re-establishment of a functioning court system in the former sectors North and South.

The Council is deeply concerned that in spite of its previous requests there has been little progress on the issue of the return of the Croatian Serb refugees and urges the Government of Croatia to adopt a comprehensive approach in order to facilitate the return of refugees originating from Croatia to their homes of origin throughout Croatia. It deplores the continued failure by the Government of Croatia to safeguard effectively their property rights, especially the situation where many of those Serbs who have returned to the former sectors have been unable to regain possession of their properties. The Council calls upon the Government of Croatia to apply immediately proper procedures to the question of property rights and to stop all forms of discrimination against the Croatian Serb population in the provision of social benefits and reconstruction assistance.

The Council is deeply concerned at reports that the new amnesty law is not being implemented in a fair and equitable manner. It underlines the fact that equitable application of that law is vital for building confidence and promoting reconciliation in Croatia as well as for the peaceful reintegration of the region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium.

The Council stresses the importance of the commitments undertaken by the Government of Croatia in relation to the Council of Europe, including its signature of the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities and expects that the Government of Croatia will implement those commitments fully and without delay.

The Council reiterates its call upon the Government of Croatia to cooperate fully with the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 and to conduct investigations into and the prosecution of all persons accused of serious violations of international humanitarian law, especially those committed in the course of military operations in 1995.

The Council will remain seized of the matter and requests that the Secretary-General continue to report on the situation, in any case no later than 10 March 1997.

Decision of 14 January 1997 (3731st meeting):
resolution 1093 (1997)

On 31 December 1996, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1066 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in the Prevlaka peninsula as well as on the progress made by Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia towards a settlement.⁴⁶ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that the prospects for a peaceful settlement of the Prevlaka issue appeared to have improved with the Agreement on Normalization of Relations between the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. Given the comparative stability that the United Nations Mission of Observers in Prevlaka had ensured in the area, the parties needed to proceed to negotiate a settlement. Noting that, while Prevlaka remained a stable area, it was also tense and the potential for a military confrontation still existed. He also noted that the continued violations and the lack of real progress on the adoption of the options presented by UNMOP were still a cause for concern. He expressed his belief that the continued presence of UNMOP was indispensable, if the full benefits of the Agreement on Normalization of Relations were to be realized in the Prevlaka area and recommended a further six-month extension of the mandate of UNMOP until 15 July 1997.

At its 3731st meeting, held on 14 January 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Japan), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁴⁷ The President further drew the attention of the Council to two other documents: a letter dated 28 October 1996 from the representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia addressed to the Secretary-General,⁴⁸ and a letter dated 25 November 1996 from the representative of Croatia addressed to the Secretary-General,⁴⁹ which transmitted respective aides-mémoire on the situation.

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1093 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its earlier relevant resolutions, in particular, resolutions 779 (1992) of 6 October 1992, 981 (1995) of 31 March 1995, 1025 (1995) of 30 November 1995, 1038 (1996) of 15 January 1996 and 1066 (1996) of 15 July 1996,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 31 December 1996;

Reaffirming once again its commitment to the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Croatia,

Noting the Joint Declaration signed at Geneva on 30 September 1992 by the Presidents of the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia by which they reaffirmed their agreement concerning the demilitarization of the Prevlaka peninsula, emphasizing the contribution that this demilitarization has made to the decrease of tension in the region, and stressing the need for the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to agree on a settlement which would resolve their differences peacefully,

Noting with concern the violations in the United Nations designated zones in the region, and other activities, including restrictions on the freedom of movement of United Nations military observers, referred to in the report of the Secretary-General, which have dangerously increased tensions,

Welcoming the mutual recognition among all the successor States to the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia within their internationally recognized borders, and stressing the importance of full normalization of relations among those States,

Commending the Agreement on Normalization of Relations between the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, signed in Belgrade on 23 August 1996, committing the parties to resolve peacefully the disputed issue of Prevlaka by negotiations in the spirit of the Charter of the United Nations and good neighbourly relations,

Determining that the situation in Croatia continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security, ⁴⁸ S/1996/884.

1. Authorizes the United Nations military observers to continue monitoring the demilitarization of the Prevlaka peninsula, in accordance with resolutions 779 (1992) and 981 (1995) and paragraphs 19 and 20 of the report of the Secretary-General of 13 December 1995 until 15 July 1997;

2. Urges the parties to abide by their mutual commitments and to implement fully the Agreement on Normalization of Relations between the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and stresses that these are critical for the establishment of peace and security throughout the region;

3. Calls upon the parties to adopt the practical options proposed by the United Nations military observers for the improvement of safety and security in the area, as referred to in the report of the Secretary-General of 31 December 1996; and requests that the Secretary-General report by 15 April 1997 on progress made in implementing those practical options, in particular regarding the freedom of movement of the military observers throughout the area and respect for the demilitarization regime;

4. Calls upon the parties to cease and refrain from all violations and from military or other activities which may increase tension, to cooperate fully with the United Nations military observers and to ensure their safety and freedom of movement, including through the removal of landmines;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Council by 5 July 1997, for its early consideration, a report on the situation in the Prevlaka peninsula as well as on progress made by the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia towards a settlement which would resolve their differences peacefully;

6. Requests the United Nations military observers and the multinational Stabilization Force authorized by the Council in resolution 1088 (1996) of 12 December 1996 to cooperate fully with each other;

7. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 31 January 1997 (3737th meeting):
statement by the President

By a letter dated 21 January 1997 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the Secretary-General stated that, since his previous report, the political focus of UNTAES had been to resolve outstanding policy issues required for the holding of elections. He informed the Council that the Joint Implementation Committee on Elections had been unable to resolve any of the principal policy questions, including representation (the institutions for which elections were to be held), voter eligibility and timing of elections. In an attempt to resolve the political deadlock, the Transitional Administrator had met with local Serb leaders and officials of the Government of Croatia on the political package for elections. The outcome of the consultations with the Government of Croatia were contained in a letter dated 12 January 1997, where the Government of Croatia committed itself before the international community to implement fully the Basic Agreement and extended additional rights and privileges to the residents of the region. It also indicated agreement to international monitoring of the implementation of the commitments outlined in the letter. The local Serb Executive Council and Regional Assembly replied in a letter dated 16 January 1997 seeking additional guarantees including the creation of a single county for the region.

The Secretary-General stated that the political package, taken in conjunction with the Basic Agreement and resolution 1037 (1996) as well as the guarantees contained in the Affidavit of Employment, constituted a comprehensive framework of guarantees for Serbs who chose to stay in Croatia. He stated that the letter by the Government of Croatia merited favourable consideration by the Council, although he reiterated that strict compliance by all sides with the obligations outlined in the letter, and the full support of the international community, were essential, if the reintegration process was to succeed.

At its 3737th meeting, held on 31 January 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letter from the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Japan), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President drew the attention of the Council to the following documents: a letter dated 13 January 1997 from the representative of Croatia addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵⁰ conveying the proposal for elections in the region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium; a letter dated 22 January from the representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵¹ transmitting a letter dated 16 January 1997 from the Assembly and the Executive Council of the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium replying to the proposal of the Government of Croatia for the elections; a letter dated 27 January 1997 from the representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to the President of the Security Council transmitting a letter dated 25 January 1997 from the Federal Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵² which stated that the requests of the Serbs in the region deserved to be carefully considered.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁵³

The Security Council has considered the letter from the Secretary-General dated 21 January 1997 concerning developments with respect to the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, and welcomes his evaluation.

The Council welcomes the letter dated 13 January 1997 from the Government of Croatia on the completion of the peaceful reintegration of the region under the Transitional Administration, which guarantees the local Serb community representation and a voice at various levels of local, regional and national government, provides for a limited deferment of military service and affirms the intention of the Government of Croatia to provide the local Serb population with the protection of their legal and civil rights under Croatian law. The Council calls upon the Government of Croatia to implement fully the commitments contained in that letter and the oral guarantees made by Croatian officials to the Transitional Administration, as specified in the letter from the Secretary-General dated 21 January 1997.

The Council also takes note of the letter dated 16 January 1997 from the local Serb Executive Council and Regional Assembly on this matter.

The Council recalls the statement by its President of 15 August 1996 and again underlines the importance of the holding of elections, the organization of which is the responsibility of the Transitional Administration, in accordance with the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium signed on 12 November 1995. The Council shares the view of the Transitional Administrator that the rights and guarantees outlined in the letter from the Government of Croatia, if fully implemented, constitute a solid basis for the holding of elections simultaneously with nationwide elections in Croatia, and offer substantial progress towards the completion of the process of peaceful reintegration of the region. In this context, the Council emphasizes that the holding and certification of elections, upon a decision by the Transitional Administration, within the envisaged timeframe will only be possible if the Croatian authorities fulfil their obligations with respect to the completion of the issuance of citizenship and identity documents for all eligible voters and relevant technical documents, and provide all information as required by the Transitional Administration for certification of the elections. The Council underlines the need for full cooperation by the local Serbs.

The Council reiterates the importance of confidence building measures which could benefit residents of the region beyond the expiration of the mandate of the Transitional Administration. In this regard, it encourages the Croatian authorities to maintain the present demilitarized status of the region.

The Council reaffirms the importance of effectively implementing the right of all residents in the region to equal treatment with respect to housing, access to reconstruction grants and loans, and to property compensation, as guaranteed by Croatian law. It reiterates the right of all refugees and displaced persons to return to their places of origin. It also reiterates the right of residents of a State to choose freely where they wish to live. The upholding of these principles is of vital importance for the stability of the region. In this connection, it strongly encourages the Government of Croatia to reaffirm its obligation, under the provisions of the Croatian Constitution, Croatian law and the Basic Agreement, to treat all its citizens equally regardless of their ethnicity.

The Council stresses that the restoration of the multiethnic character of Eastern Slavonia is important to international efforts to maintain peace and stability in the region of the former Yugoslavia as a whole. The Council encourages the Croatian Government to take such steps as are needed to promote goodwill, build confidence and provide assurances of a safe, secure and stable environment to all people in the region. These steps should include full implementation of its Amnesty Law, full cooperation with the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia, improved cooperation with respect to local Serbs who wish to return to other areas of Croatia, full compliance with the Basic Agreement and full cooperation with the Transitional Administration and other international organizations. The Council welcomes the commitments by the Government of Croatia with regard to the establishment of a Joint Council of Municipalities, a Council of the Serb Ethnic Community and with respect to educational and cultural autonomy of the Serb population and other minorities in the region. The Council notes the reassurances of the Croatian authorities that applications for a second period of deferment of military service for local Serbs will be considered in a positive manner.

The Council condemns the incident that occurred at Vukovar on 31 January 1997, which resulted in the death of a Transitional Administration peacekeeper and injuries to other Transitional Administration personnel.

⁵³ S/PRST/1997/4.

The Council calls upon both sides to cooperate in good faith on the basis of the Basic Agreement. It also calls upon them to continue to cooperate with the Transitional Administrator and with the Transitional Administration in order to ensure the success of the process of reintegration. It calls upon the international community to support fully this endeavour.

The Council expresses its appreciation to the Transitional Administrator and his staff; and reaffirms its full support for them.

The Council will remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 7 March 1997 (3746th meeting):
statement by the President

On 24 February 1997, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1079 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in the region under the administration of UNTAES.⁵⁴ He informed the Council that the Transitional Administrator considered that, with the full cooperation of the parties, 13 April 1997 was a realistic and achievable date for the holding of free and fair elections in the region. He also stated that the political framework for elections, including the rights and guarantees contained in the letter of 13 January 1997 from the Government of Croatia, offered the residents of the region the prospect of full participation in Croatian political life as equal citizens. He further cautioned that the holding of the elections would also depend on the readiness of the Government of Croatia to meet all preconditions, including the issuance of documents, provision of data and timely completion of the technical arrangements required for certification. He also expressed concern about the recent increase in the number of people leaving the region, which could constitute a threat to international efforts to promote peace both in the region and in the wider area. In addition, he was concerned that no progress had been made with respect to the future of displaced persons and the establishment of equal treatment with respect to housing, access to reconstruction grants and loans as well as to property compensation, as guaranteed by Croatian law. He suggested that if the Government of Croatia issued a formal public confirmation of the guarantees from its letter, it would go a long way towards reassuring its Serb interlocutors and assuaging the fears of those Serbs currently inclined to leave the region.

At its 3746th meeting, held on 7 March 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Poland), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 4 March 1997 from the representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia addressed to the President of the Security Council, which requested the Security Council to adopt a resolution containing a number of elements regarding the implementation of the elections.⁵⁵

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁵⁶

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 24 February 1997 on the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium and recent developments in that region. It recalls the statement by its President of 31 January 1997 and reiterates its call on the parties to cooperate fully with the Transitional Administration and the Transitional Administrator.

The Council shares the observation contained in the report of the Secretary-General that, with the full cooperation of the parties, 13 April 1997 is a realistic and achievable date for the holding of free and fair elections in the region.

The Council underlines that it is in the best interests of the members of the Serb community to collect their citizenship documents, to participate fully in those elections, and to take part in Croatian political life as equal citizens on the basis of the implementation of the rights and guarantees contained in the letter dated 13 January 1997 from the Government of Croatia. The Council deplores disruptive activities by some elements of the Serb community in the region creating an atmosphere of political agitation and uncertainty. It calls upon all residents of the region to follow wise leadership, to stay in the region, and to take up their future as citizens of the Republic of Croatia.

The Council stresses that the holding of the elections will also depend on the readiness of the Government of Croatia to meet all preconditions, including the issuance of documents, provision of data and timely completion of the technical arrangements required for certification. The Council acknowledges the encouraging progress the Government of Croatia is making in this respect. It is, however, concerned that implementation of these procedures has been uneven. The Council urges the Government of Croatia to redouble its efforts to ensure the completion of the necessary technical preparations for the holding of elections.

The Council strongly urges the Croatian Government to issue, as a gesture towards reassuring the Serb community, formal public confirmation of the oral guarantees made to the Transitional Administration as specified by the Secretary-General in his letter dated 21 January 1997 and to reaffirm its obligations as referred to in paragraphs 28 and 29 of the report of the Secretary-General. It also calls upon the Government of Croatia to apply its Amnesty Law fairly and consistently to all persons subject to its jurisdiction. The Council stresses that, to a large measure, the long-term success of peaceful reintegration will be determined by the commitment of the Government of Croatia to reconciliation and to ensuring that those Serbs who are currently resident in the region will enjoy equal rights as Croatian citizens.

The Council shares the serious concern, as stated in the report of the Secretary-General, that no progress has been made concerning the future of displaced persons in the region and the establishment of equal treatment with respect to housing, access to reconstruction grants and loans and property compensation, in accordance with the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium and Croatian law. The Council reaffirms the right of all refugees and displaced persons to return to their homes of origin throughout the Republic of Croatia and to live there in conditions of security. It welcomes the proposal elaborated by the Transitional Administration and the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees concerning the return of displaced persons, and urges the Government of Croatia to pursue discussions on that proposal without delay, to cooperate closely with the Transitional Administration and the Office of the High Commissioner in implementation, and to make a clear and unambiguous public statement and undertake concrete actions confirming the equal rights of all displaced persons regardless of their ethnicity.

The Council welcomes the commitment by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the Republic of Croatia to make progress in their bilateral relations, in particular with respect to the permanent demilitarization of the border region and the abolition of the visa regime, which would constitute a major contribution to local confidence-building and the stabilization of the region.

The Council recalls its resolution 1079 (1996) of 15 November 1996 and expresses its intention to consider recommendations, to be submitted by the Secretary-General as soon as possible after the successful holding of elections, concerning the further United Nations presence consistent with the fulfilment of the Basic Agreement.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to keep it regularly informed of the situation. It will remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 19 March 1997 (3753rd meeting): statement by the President

On 5 March 1997, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1019 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report on the situation of human rights in Croatia.⁵⁷ In his report, he stated that security conditions for Croatian Serbs living in the former Sectors, most of whom were elderly, continued to be unsatisfactory, particularly in the area around Knin. Although there was a significant police presence throughout the region, the authorities had generally been ineffective in restoring a climate of law and order. As for investigations of past violations of humanitarian law and human rights, while some progress had taken place regarding more recent incidents, major crimes which occurred at or near the time of Croatia's military operation in the summer of 1995 remained for the most part unresolved. He noted that difficulties for remaining Serbs had been eased considerably during the past winter by intensive humanitarian programmes. Still there had been little progress with regard to the return of younger relatives of elderly Croatian Serbs remaining in the area, despite the 1996 Agreement on Normalization of Relations between the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. With regard to the Tribunal, the Secretary-General emphasized that there remained strong grounds for concern that the Government was withholding its full cooperation. As international observers had noted, hostility continued to characterize inter-ethnic relations in the former Sectors, and it was clear that, if there was to be genuine improvement in the disturbing situation in the former Sectors, efforts by both international and local organizations to promote confidence and reconciliation would continue to be needed for the foreseeable future.

At its 3753rd meeting, held on 19 March 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Poland), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁵⁸

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General on Croatia of 5 March 1997 submitted pursuant to Council resolutions 1009 (1995) and 1019 (1995). It also recalls the statement by its President of 20 December 1996.

The Council remains deeply concerned that, although the Government of Croatia maintains that it has deployed the necessary number of police officers, Croatian Serbs continue to live in conditions of serious insecurity throughout the areas which had been designated United Nations Protected Areas and were known as sectors West, North and South, particularly in the area of former Sector South around Knin. It calls upon the Government of Croatia to take further steps to restore a climate of law and order in those areas.

The Council welcomes the fact that difficult living conditions for remaining Serbs have been considerably eased during recent months by intensive humanitarian programmes conducted by international organizations. In this context, it calls upon the Government of Croatia to assume fully its responsibilities, in cooperation with all relevant international organizations, to ensure that the social and economic situation of all inhabitants in the former sectors improves.

The Council expresses its concern that there continues to be little progress with regard to the return of Croatian Serb displaced persons and refugees to the areas. It calls upon the Government of Croatia to accelerate its efforts to improve conditions of personal and economic security, to remove bureaucratic obstacles to the rapid issue of documentation to all Serb families and to resolve promptly the property issue, by a return of property or just compensation, in order to facilitate the return of Croatian Serbs to the former sectors.

The Council calls upon the Government of Croatia to remove uncertainty about the implementation of its Amnesty Law, in particular by finalizing without delay the list of war crime suspects on the basis of existing evidence and in strict accordance with international law, and to put an end to arbitrary arrests, particularly of Serbs returning to Croatia.

The Council recalls the obligations of Croatia arising from relevant universal human rights instruments to which it is a party. It welcomes the commitments undertaken by the Government of Croatia in relation to the Council of Europe, including its signature of the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities and expects that the Government of Croatia will implement those commitments fully.

The Council is concerned that the Government of Croatia continues to withhold its full cooperation with the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia. It underlines the obligation of the Government of Croatia, in accordance with resolution 827 (1993), to respond promptly and in full to all requests from the International Tribunal. It also calls upon the Government of Croatia to conduct investigations into and the prosecution of persons accused of serious violations of international humanitarian law, especially those committed in the course of military operations in 1995.

The Council stresses the importance of the effective implementation of the measures outlined in the paragraphs above for promoting confidence and reconciliation in Croatia as well as for the peaceful reintegration of the region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium. In this context, the Council requests the Secretary-General to continue to keep it informed on a regular basis and to report again on the humanitarian and human rights situation in Croatia within his report to be submitted by 1 July 1997 pursuant to paragraph 6 of resolution 1079 (1996).

Decision of 25 April 1997 (3772nd meeting):
statement by the President

On 14 April 1997, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1093 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the progress made in implementing those practical options proposed by the United Nations military observers for the improvement of safety and security in the area of the Prevlaka peninsula, particularly regarding the freedom of movement of the military observers throughout the entire area and respect for the demilitarization regime.⁵⁹ In his report, the Secretary-General noted that the parties had made no progress towards adopting the practical options that were part of the procedures proposed by the United Nations Mission of Observers in Prevlaka in May 1996 to reduce tension and improve safety and security in the area. Long-standing violations of the demilitarization regime also persisted and both parties continued to restrict the freedom of movement of UNMOP. He informed the Council that the parties had indicated that their continuing bilateral negotiations had not yet addressed the Prevlaka issue directly and that there had been no progress towards a settlement of the dispute. The Secretary-General stated that, in that situation, UNMOP would continue to carry out its mandate, within the existing practical constraints. It would also continue its efforts to enhance security and safety in its area of responsibility and to contribute to confidence-building between the parties.

⁵⁹ S/1997/311.

At its 3772nd meeting, held on 25 April 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶⁰

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 14 April 1997 concerning the United Nations Mission of Observers in Prevlaka and expresses its disappointment at the general lack of improvement in the situation in Prevlaka.

The Council is concerned by the assessment of the Secretary-General that, while the situation generally has been stable, several developments have led to an increase in tension in the area. The Council is particularly concerned by the descriptions in the report of continuing violations of the demilitarization regime, including movements of heavy weapons and of special police of the Republic of Croatia, and the entry by a navy missile boat of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia into the demilitarized zone, in disregard of the concerns and requests previously expressed by the Council.

The Council calls upon the parties to refrain from provocative actions of all kinds, to cease violations of the demilitarized zone and to cooperate fully with the United Nations military observers.

The Council also notes the observations in the report of the Secretary-General about the lack of any progress towards adopting the practical options proposed to the parties by the United Nations military observers in May 1996, as referred to in the report of the Secretary-General of 31 December 1996 to improve the safety and security of the area. The Council reiterates its call upon both parties to adopt these practical options with a view to their early implementation, to remove landmines from areas patrolled by the military observers, and to stop their interference with the freedom of movement of the military observers and with the implementation of the mandate of the observers.

The Council calls upon the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to resolve the disputed issue of Prevlaka through bilateral negotiations pursuant to the Agreement on Normalization of Relations, signed by them in Belgrade on 23 August 1996, and in the spirit of the Charter of the United Nations and good neighbourly relations.

The Council emphasizes its confidence in and support for the work of the United Nations military observers. It expresses its appreciation to the military observers and to the Member States who have provided personnel and other forms of support.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 8 May 1997 (3775th meeting):
statement by the President

By a letter dated 29 April 1997 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁶¹ the Secretary-General informed the Council of the results of the elections held on 13 and 14 April 1997 in the region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium under the administration of UNTAES. In his report, the Secretary-General stated that the Transitional Administrator had informed him that no intimidation, violence or electoral improprieties were observed or reported before, during or after the elections, which had been an essential step for further progress in the peaceful reintegration of the region and had opened the way for the two-way return of all displaced persons in Croatia. In that regard, rapid progress had been made with the adoption by the Government of Croatia on 24 April 1997 of the Agreed Procedures on Return.

At its 3775th meeting, held on 8 May 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Republic of Korea), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 2 May 1997 from the representative of the Netherlands addressed to the Secretary-General, drawing attention to the statement on the elections in Croatia issued by the European Union on 30 April 1997.⁶²

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶³

The Security Council welcomes the letter from the Secretary-General dated 29 April 1997 which conveys the conclusions of the Transitional Administrator regarding the successful holding of the elections in the region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium in the Republic of Croatia beginning on 13 April 1997, under the direction of the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium.

The Council shares the assessment of the Transitional Administrator that the holding of the elections has been an essential step for further progress in the peaceful reintegration of the region and marks an important milestone for the legitimate representation of the local population in the Croatian constitutional and legal system. It urges early formation of the newly elected bodies of local government and prompt and full implementation of the undertakings contained in the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium and the letter dated 13 January 1997 from the Government of Croatia including the establishment of the Joint Council of Municipalities and the appointment of local Serbs to the guaranteed positions in the parliamentary and administrative structures of Croatia.

The Council underlines the finding of the Transitional Administrator that no intimidation, violence or electoral improprieties were observed or reported before, during or after the elections. The Council welcomes the goodwill and sense of cooperation demonstrated by the parties to the process.

The Council emphasizes the importance of the two-way return of all displaced persons in Croatia, as well as the right of residents of a State to choose freely where they wish to live. In this context, it welcomes the Agreement of the Joint Working Group on the Operational Procedures of Return. It urges the Government of Croatia strictly to implement this agreement. The Council calls upon both sides to cooperate in good faith on the basis of the Basic Agreement and stresses the need to respect human rights, including rights of persons belonging to minorities, throughout the country, in order to ensure the success of the process of reintegration.

The Council expresses its appreciation to the Transitional Administration and to those elements of the international community, including observers from the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, the Council of Europe and members of the diplomatic community, whose efforts made possible the successful holding of elections. The Council commends the Transitional Administration for resolving technical difficulties by taking decisive actions, which contributed significantly to the successful holding of the elections.

The Council looks forward to the recommendations of the Secretary-General, in the light of the progress of the parties towards fulfilling the Basic Agreement, for the further United Nations presence in Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, possibly a restructured Transitional Administration, consistent with the fulfilment of the Basic Agreement, for the six-month period beginning 16 July 1997, in accordance with Council resolution 1079 (1996).

Decision of 14 July 1997 (3800th meeting):
resolutions 1119 (1997) and 1120 (1997)

On 1 July 1997, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1093 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in the Prevlaka peninsula and on progress made by Croatia and the Federal Republic Yugoslavia towards a settlement that would peacefully resolve their differences.⁶⁴ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that the parties still retained differing interpretations of the Prevlaka dispute. Croatia regarded the dispute as a security issue to be settled by an arrangement that would provide security for each State within existing borders, while the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia felt that the dispute centred upon territorial possession of the Prevlaka peninsula. However, both parties confirmed their positive assessment of the role of UNMOP in lessening tension and maintaining stability in the region. The Secretary-General expressed his belief that the presence of UNMOP continued to be essential to maintain conditions that were conducive to a negotiated settlement of the dispute. He therefore recommended a further six-month extension of the mandate of UNMOP until 15 January 1998.

On 23 June 1997, pursuant to paragraphs 6 and 7 of Security Council resolution 1079 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report giving an overview of the activities of UNTAES and describing the humanitarian and human rights situation in Croatia. It also contained his recommendations concerning the future of the United Nations presence in the region after 15 July 1997, in the light of the progress in implementing the Basic Agreement.⁶⁵ In his report, the Secretary-General noted that, since its full deployment in the region, UNTAES had made significant achievements in demilitarization, reintegration of institutions and creation of conditions that had permitted successful elections to be held in April, although the reintegration of the people had hardly begun. President Franjo Tudjman had reaffirmed Croatia's intention to fulfil its various obligations and guarantees, but no specific programmes or timetables had been given. Of particular concern was the stated intention of Croatia to introduce a regime of unrestricted access to the region without taking adequate steps to prevent harassment and intimidation of local residents. The Secretary-General informed the Council that there had been outbursts of ethnic violence against Serbs, increased harassment and intimidation of Serbs, continued hostile propaganda in the Croatian media and serious delays in the introduction in the region of Croatian institutions, among other problems. He stated that, as Croatian promises had not been met in a timely manner on the ground, the Serbs' confidence about their future was very low. In fact, Serb reliance on UNTAES for protection had increased rather than diminished over the past several months. He stated that recent experience regarding the return of Croats to the region had underlined the need for effective preparations to rebuild a functioning multi-ethnic community. The Secretary-General informed the Council that Croatia's position was that, with the successful holding of elections, UNTAES had completed the executive part of its mandate; authority over the region should therefore be transferred to Croatia, the UNTAES military component should be withdrawn and the remaining United Nations civilian presence restricted to a monitoring and observation mission pending its replacement by a long-term Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe observation mission. President Tudjman had warned of negative consequences for Croat-Serb relations and reconciliation, if the executive mandate of UNTAES was extended. The position of local Serbs and of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, which would be the primary recipient of Serb refugees from the region, if reintegration failed, was that UNTAES needed to remain with its existing mandate for the full extended transition period up to 15 January 1998. However, Croatia maintained that it would not have the opportunity to implement programmes of reconciliation as long as the region was under transitional administration, and that a large UNTAES military component created a psychological barrier to normal life. He stated that, in order to accommodate Croatia's concerns, the Transitional Administrator would devolve to Croatian executive responsibility for the major part of civil administration of the region while maintaining his authority and ability to intervene and overrule decisions, if the situation deteriorated and the achievements of UNTAES were threatened. The pace of devolution would be commensurate with Croatia's demonstrated ability to reassure the Serb population and successfully complete peaceful reintegration. In the second phase, subject to satisfactory Croatian performance, remaining executive functions would be devolved.

The Secretary-General expressed his concern that a precipitate transfer of authority to Croatia and the withdrawal of UNTAES in the near term could lead to a mass exodus of Serbs, which would gravely set back the process of bilateral normalization of relations, imperil wider regional security and create an unwelcome precedent for collective international peace efforts in Bosnia and Herzegovina. He therefore recommended the proposed two-phase exit strategy to be an effective programme for the successful completion of peaceful reintegration and the withdrawal of UNTAES from the region. This was contingent upon the full cooperation of the Government of Croatia, which had yet to demonstrate its determination to fulfil its responsibilities. If the confidence of the local population in the sustainable reintegration of people in the region was not achieved, the Security Council would need to reassess the situation by 15 October 1997.

At its 3800th meeting, held on 14 July 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the reports of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Sweden), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Belgium, Croatia, Germany and Italy, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations⁶⁶ and to another draft resolution submitted by Belgium, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Portugal, the Russian Federation, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States, with the Republic of Korea joining as a sponsor.⁶⁷ The President also drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 7 July 1997 from the representative of Denmark addressed to the Secretary-General,⁶⁸ which transmitted the decision adopted by the Permanent Council of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe concerning the presence of OSCE in Eastern Slavonia in Croatia.

At the same meeting, the first draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1119 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its earlier relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 779 (1992) of 6 October 1992, 981 (1995) of 31 March 1995, 1025 (1995) of 30 November 1995, 1038 (1996) of 15 January 1996, 1066 (1996) of 15 July 1996, and 1093

(1997) of 14 January 1997, as well as the statement by its President of 25 April 1997,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 1 July 1997,

Reaffirming once again its commitment to the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Croatia,

Noting with concern that the parties have failed to make any progress in adopting the practical options proposed by the United Nations military observers in May 1996, as referred to in the report of the Secretary-General of 31 December 1996, to reduce tension and improve safety and security in the area, or in reaching a peaceful settlement of the Prevlaka issue,

Noting the observation contained in the report of the Secretary-General of 1 July 1997 that the presence of the United Nations military observers continues to be essential to maintain conditions that are conducive to a negotiated settlement of the disputed issue of Prevlaka,

Determining that the situation in Croatia continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security,

1. Authorizes the United Nations military observers to continue monitoring the demilitarization of the Prevlaka peninsula, in accordance with resolutions 779 (1992) and 981 (1995) and paragraphs 19 and 20 of the report of the Secretary-General of 13 December 1995, until 15 January 1998;

2. Renews its call upon the parties to abide by their mutual commitments, implement fully the Agreement on Normalization of Relations between the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia of 23 August 1996 adopt the practical options proposed by the United Nations military observers for the improvement of safety and security in the area, cease all violations of the demilitarization regime and military or other activities which may increase tension, and cooperate fully with the United Nations military observers and ensure their safety and freedom of movement, including through the removal of landmines;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Council by 5 January 1998 a report on the situation in the Prevlaka peninsula as well as on progress made by the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia towards a settlement to resolve their differences peacefully;

4. Requests the United Nations military observers and the multinational Stabilization Force authorized by the Council in resolution 1088 (1996) of 12 December 1996 to cooperate with each other;

5. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

At the same meeting, the second draft resolution was also put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1120 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions concerning the territories of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium of the Republic of Croatia, in particular resolutions 1023 (1995) of 22 November 1995, 1025 (1995) of 30 November 1995, 1037 (1996) of 15 January 1996, 1043 (1996) of 31 January 1996, 1069 (1996) of 30 July 1996 and 1079 (1996) of 15 November 1996,

Emphasizing the importance of the obligation of the Government of the Republic of Croatia to allow all refugees and displaced persons to return in safety to their homes throughout the Republic of Croatia, and further emphasizing the importance of the two-way return of all displaced persons in the Republic of Croatia,

Welcoming the Agreement of the Joint Working Group on the Operational Procedures of Return but noting with concern that the lack of conditions necessary for the return of displaced persons to the former United Nations Protected Areas from the region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium prevents the return in any substantial number of those displaced persons seeking to return to Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium from other parts of Croatia,

Expressing its grave concern over the lack of improvement in respect for human rights, including the: rights of persons belonging to minorities, in Croatia and in particular in the former United Nations Protected Areas, and strongly deploring recent incidents of ethnically motivated violence in Hrvatska Kostajnica and similar incidents,

Reiterating its concern about the failure of the Government of the Republic of Croatia to cooperate fully with the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia, and in this context recalling the obligation of the States in the region to surrender to the Tribunal all those indicted, Reiterating also its concern about continued uncertainty regarding implementation of the Amnesty Law, which has been detrimental to the building of confidence and trust among Croatia's ethnic communities,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 23 June 1997, and noting in particular his recommendations for the continued presence of the Transitional Administration after 15 July 1997, with an appropriate restructuring of the mission,

Recalling that the Basic Agreement provides that the transitional period of twelve months may be extended at most to another period of the same duration if so requested by one of the parties, and noting that the local Serb community has requested such an extension, as indicated by the Secretary-General in his report of 28 August 1996,

Determining that the situation in Croatia continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security,

Determined to ensure the security and freedom of movement of the personnel of the United Nations peacekeeping operations in the Republic of Croatia, and to these ends, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Expresses its firm support for the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, and calls upon the Government of the Republic of Croatia and the local Serb community to cooperate fully with the Transitional Administration and other international bodies and to fulfil all obligations and commitments specified in the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium and all relevant Security Council resolutions, as well as in the letter from the Government of the Republic of Croatia dated 13 January 1997;

2. Reaffirms in particular the importance of full compliance by the parties, in particular by the Government of the Republic of Croatia, with their commitments, as specified in the Basic Agreement, to respect the highest standards of human rights and fundamental freedoms and to promote an atmosphere of confidence among local residents, regardless of their ethnic origin, and urges the Government of the Republic of Croatia to ensure respect for the rights of all persons of all national ethnic groups;

3. Reaffirms also the right of all refugees and displaced persons originating from the Republic of Croatia to return to their homes of origin throughout the Republic of Croatia; including the prompt payment of pensions; and to foster the successful implementation of the Agreement of the Joint Working Group on the Operational Procedures of Return, treating all returnees equally, regardless of ethnic origin;

7. Urges the Government of the Republic of Croatia to eliminate ambiguities in implementation of the Amnesty Law and to implement it fairly and objectively in accordance with international standards, in particular by concluding all investigations of crimes covered by the amnesty and undertaking an immediate and comprehensive review with United Nations and local Serb participation of all charges outstanding against individuals for serious violations of international humanitarian law which are not covered by the amnesty, in order to end proceedings against all individuals against whom there is insufficient evidence;

8. Decides to extend the mandate of the Transitional Administration until 15 January 1998, as envisaged in its resolution 1079 (1996) as well as in the Basic Agreement;

10. Also endorses the plan for restructuring the Transitional Administration, as set out in the report of the Secretary-General of 23 June 1997, and, in particular, the proposal for achieving the drawdown of the military component of the Transitional Administration by 15 October 1997;

15. Stresses the importance of demilitarization of the area, and in that context stresses further the importance of achieving bilateral agreements on demilitarization and a liberal border regime in the region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, accompanied by appropriate confidence building measures as suggested in the report of the Secretary-General of 23 June 1997;

16. Calls upon the Government of the Republic of Croatia, inter alia, to initiate a country-wide public programme of national reconciliation, to take all necessary steps for the official establishment and legal registration of the Joint Council of Municipalities, and to fulfil all its obligations as specified in the various agreements signed with the Transitional Administration;

18. Underlines the observation of the Secretary-General that the essential prerequisite for the successful completion of peaceful reintegration of the region is the full cooperation of the Government of the Republic of Croatia, which bears the responsibility for convincing the local population that the reintegration of the people of the region is sustainable and that the process of reconciliation and return is irreversible;

19. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 18 September 1997 (3818th meeting): statement by the President

At its 3818th meeting, held on 18 September 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (United States), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Croatia and Germany, at their request, to participate in the discussion, without the right to vote. The President then made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶⁹

The Security Council expresses its deep concern at the lack of substantial progress by the Government of the Republic of Croatia in fulfilling the conditions and tasks that are key to the transfer of executive authority to the Republic of Croatia in the territories of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, as noted in its resolution 1120 (1997) and the report of the Secretary-General of 23 June 1997.

In this regard, the Council calls upon the Croatian Government to meet its obligations and commitments and to take immediate action in the following areas: to remove all administrative and legal obstacles to the two-way return of all displaced persons as well as to the return of refugees; to ensure security and social and economic opportunity, including property rights, for all returnees; to take effective measures to prevent harassment of returnees; to implement measures to establish effective local government administrations; to ensure the regular payment of benefits to all pension and welfare recipients and open Croatian pension offices in the region; to ensure further economic reintegration; to initiate a countrywide public programme of national reconciliation and curb media attacks on ethnic groups; and to implement fully and fairly the Amnesty Law and cooperate fully with the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the former Yugoslavia. In this context, the Council notes the recent information provided by the Croatian Government on steps intended to address some of these issues and urges the Croatian Government to implement these steps without delay.

The Council emphasizes that the prompt completion of the tasks outlined above, as well as the fulfilment by the Croatian Government of its obligations under the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, the agreements between the Croatian Government and the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, as well as the letter from the Croatian Government dated 13 January 1997, will determine the pace of further devolution of executive authority for the civil administration to the Croatian Government as well as further Council action. The Council urges all parties to cooperate fully with the Transitional Administration and looks forward to the report of the Secretary-General due no later than 6 October 1997, as requested in its resolution 1120 (1997).

Decision of 20 October 1997 (3824th meeting):
statement by the President

On 2 October 1997, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1120 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on all aspects relevant to the peaceful reintegration into Croatia of the region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium.⁷⁰ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that, while Croatia had made significant achievements in the formal and technical aspects of reintegration, such as the reintegration of State institutions, its cooperation in reintegrating the people of the region, as well as implementing agreements important to their long-term rights and welfare, had been less apparent. Of fundamental concern was that no attempt had been made by Croatia to lead and support a national programme of reconciliation and confidence-building. He informed the Council that deficiencies in the cooperation and performance of Croatia had delayed the decision by the Transitional Administrator that conditions had been achieved for the transfer of authority to Croatia, as the first phase of the exit strategy had not been completed. It was the Administrator's view that, while the transfer of authority of the region at that time would jeopardize the achievements made, the Government of Croatia could meet its obligations and commitments, if it applied itself with sufficient diligence in the time remaining. The Secretary-General further informed the Council that in view of the calm and stable military situation in the region, the Transitional Administrator considered that the second phase of the repatriation of the military contingent of UNTAES could start on 15 October and be completed by 15 November. However, because conditions had not yet been achieved to enable the full integration of the Transitional Police Force into the Croatian police force, the existing level of civilian strength would be required at least until 15 January 1998. It was also essential that the number of United Nations military observers remained unchanged. UNTAES would continue close cooperation with OSCE to assist in establishing the intended long-term mission of OSCE in Croatia. He stated that he shared the assessment of the Transitional Administrator that there was sufficient time for Croatia to further improve its performance and to comply fully with its obligations before 15 January

1998, when the Council would need to decide on the future of UNTAES. In conclusion, he underlined that the recent renewed commitment of the Government of Croatia had to be put into practice immediately in order to establish sufficient confidence that the termination of the mandate of UNTAES could be achieved without jeopardizing the results of two years of intensive international investment in the process of peaceful reintegration of the region and its people.

At its 3824th meeting, held on 20 October 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Chile), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Croatia, Germany and Italy, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to letters dated 24 September and 3 October 1997, respectively, from the representative of Croatia addressed to the President of the Security Council.⁷¹

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁷²

The Security Council welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 2 October 1997 on the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium and agrees with its balanced and objective assessment.

The Council notes with approval several positive actions taken by the Government of Croatia which are contained in the report, as well as those which have occurred since the report was issued. These developments include the recent agreements relating to education, progress on the reintegration of the judiciary, the law on convalidation, moves towards recognition of pensioner service, assistance to local governments and municipalities, and provision of documentation on twenty-five war crimes cases to the Transitional Administration. The Council is also encouraged by the increased cooperation with the International Tribunal on the Prosecution of Persons

Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia. The Council expects the Government of Croatia to continue to build upon these positive steps and accelerate its efforts in order fully to complete these initiatives.

The Council welcomes the recent establishment by the Government of Croatia of a programme for national reconciliation. A final assessment of this programme must await its full and prompt implementation.

The Council continues to note with concern that there are still many outstanding areas and issues of contention and non-compliance, which require further, urgent action from the Government of Croatia. The Council reiterates its call upon the Government of Croatia to curb media attacks on ethnic groups. The Council also underlines, in particular, the importance of the removal of all legal and administrative barriers, thus allowing the accelerated voluntary two-way return of displaced persons, including their right to choose to live in the region, as well as the return of refugees. It calls upon the Government of Croatia to give immediate effect to recent decisions of the Constitutional Court regarding the Law on the Temporary Takeover and Administration of Specified Property, and to take further action to promote the safe return of owners to their homes and the resolution of the issue of lost tenancy rights, including ensuring access to reconstruction assistance.

Much progress in these and other outstanding areas must be made on an urgent basis, in order for the Government of Croatia to comply fully with its obligations and create the conditions for a successful completion of the Transitional Administration. For its part, the local Serb population must also take more active measures to participate in the reintegration process.

The Council notes the urgent need for all local government bodies in the region, particularly the City Council of Vukovar, to commence full normal functions immediately.

The Council expresses its concern about the behaviour of some officers of the Transitional Police Force, and urges full cooperation with the Transitional Administration in improving the performance of the Force. The Council approves the intention of the Secretary-General to retain United Nations civilian police and military observers at current levels to the end of the mandate of the Transitional Administration. The Council also notes the need to address concerns relating to the continuation of police monitoring functions.

The Council welcomes the close cooperation between the Transitional Administration and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe in expanding the long-term mission of the latter in Croatia.

The Council shares the assessment of the Secretary-General that there is sufficient time for Croatia to comply fully with its obligations and commitments before 15 January 1998 and urges the Government of Croatia to redouble its efforts in the time remaining. The Council looks forward to the next report of the Secretary-General on all aspects relevant to the peaceful reintegration of the region, due by the beginning of December.

Decision of 19 December 1997 (3843rd meeting): resolution 1145 (1997)

On 4 December 1997, pursuant to the request of the Security Council expressed in the statement of its President of 20 October 1997,⁷³ the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on all aspects relevant to the peaceful reintegration of the region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium and on his recommendations for the future role of the United Nations in the region.⁷⁴ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that, as the period of transitional administration envisaged in the Basic Agreement drew to an end, consensus had developed between the Government of Croatia, local Serb leaders and the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia on two key points: firstly, that UNTAES had successfully achieved the basic objectives for which it was established and had completed those tasks in its power; and second, that although much had been achieved, full implementation of commitments by Croatia remained incomplete. However, since October, the Government of Croatia had made a major effort to meet those commitments and to reassure its citizens. The Secretary-General stated that those efforts, if sustained, gave hope that the termination of UNTAES on 15 January 1998 would not jeopardize the results of two years of intensive international investment and efforts in the region. He noted that in the vital area of local policing and rule of law, the Government of Croatia had acknowledged that the Transitional Police Force had not yet demonstrated the professional qualities or inter-ethnic cohesion necessary to police the multi-ethnic communities of the region effectively and impartially and had therefore requested the continued presence of United Nations civilian police in the Danube region of Croatia following the end of the UNTAES mandate. The presence of United Nations civilian police would also provide essential reassurance during the period of major two-way population movement, which was expected to continue until September 1998. The Secretary-General also emphasized that, in the post-UNTAES period, many other international organizations would support Croatia by comprehensively monitoring implementation of commitments and providing reassurance to the population of the region. In that connection, he welcomed the deployment throughout Croatia of the long-term missions of OSCE, the increasing involvement of the Commission envisaged under paragraph 11 of the Basic Agreement⁷⁵ and the activities of local and international non-governmental organizations. He expressed his view that UNTAES should complete its work as originally envisaged and therefore recommended the termination of UNTAES on 15 January 1998. He further recommended that the Security Council establish a support group of 180 civilian police monitors whose task would be to continue to monitor the performance of the Croatian police in the Danube region, particularly in connection with the return of displaced persons, and noted that the Government of Croatia had indicated its readiness to provide such a support group with the necessary protection, should the need arise.

At its 3843rd meeting, held on 19 December 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Costa Rica), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Belgium, Croatia, Germany and Italy, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Belgium, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Portugal, the Russian Federation, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States.⁷⁶ The President further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 20 November 1997 from the representative of Croatia addressed to the Secretary-General, transmitting a letter of the same date from the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs of Croatia to the Secretary-General, which accepted the activities of the Civilian Police Support Group with the provision that its presence in Croatia could be shortened in duration, in line with the positive development of the situation in the region.⁷⁷

At the same meeting, the representative of Croatia stated that the success of UNTAES could be seen in many areas, particularly in the documents

programme, the Government spending in the region, the reconciliation programme, the public overtures to the residents of the region, and the notable number of returns. He also stated that, in spite of the many positive elements it contained, the draft resolution overlooked two important issues. The first was that it did not give proper focus with respect to the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, as paragraph 11 of the resolution called specifically only on Croatia to cooperate with the Tribunal. Although the region “was also occupied for a period of time by Serbia and Montenegro”, the resolution failed to mention the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. In addition, the draft resolution failed to reflect that the former rebels were reintegrating not only into Croatia but also into the vibrant Serb community in Croatia, as a substantial segment of the Serb community had remained to live in Croatia.⁷⁸

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that it was already clear that the fruitfulness of international efforts in the context of UNTAES could only be talked about if there were long-term, full and unconditional adherence by the Government of Croatia to the process of genuine reintegration of people and the achievement of a multi-ethnic reconciliation for all citizens.⁷⁹

The representative of the United States stated that UNTAES, working with the Government of Croatia, had helped to lay a foundation for healing and rebuilding, but that all the commitments, pledges and promises made on both sides had to be made good.⁸⁰

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1145 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions concerning the territories of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja, and Western Sirmium of the Republic of Croatia (the Region),

Reaffirming its commitment to the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Croatia, and emphasizing in this regard that the territories of the Region are integral parts of the Republic of Croatia,

Emphasizing the continuing obligation of the Government of the Republic of Croatia, under the Basic Agreement and international conventions, to allow all refugees and displaced persons to return in safety to their homes throughout the Republic of Croatia, and further emphasizing the urgency and importance of the two-way return of all displaced persons in the Republic of Croatia,

Recalling the mandate of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe of 26 June 1997 providing for a continued and reinforced presence of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe in the Republic of Croatia, with a focus on the two-way return of all refugees and displaced persons, the protection of their rights, and the protection of persons belonging to national minorities,

Welcoming the letter dated 20 November 1997 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Croatia to the Secretary-General requesting a continued presence of United Nations civilian police monitors after the completion of the mandate of the Transitional Administration,

Welcoming also the report of the Secretary-General of 4 December 1997 and the recommendations contained therein, including the recommendation for the establishment of a support group of civilian police monitors,

8. Reminds the local Serb community of the continued importance of demonstrating a constructive attitude and participating actively in the process of reintegration and national reconciliation;

9. Stresses that the achievement of the long-term goals for the Region established by the Security Council depend upon the commitment of the Government of the Republic of Croatia to the permanent reintegration of its Serb citizens and upon the vigilant and active role of the international community, and in this regard welcomes the key role of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe;

Decision of 13 January 1998 (3847th meeting):
resolution 1147 (1998)

On 30 December 1997, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1145 (1998), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on progress made by Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia towards a settlement to resolve peacefully their differences in the area.⁸¹ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the parties had continued to indicate in their contacts that they retained their divergent interpretations of the Prevlaka dispute, with Croatia seeing it as a security issue and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia regarding it as a territorial issue. Still he affirmed that the stability which had prevailed in the UNMOP area of responsibility since the establishment of the mission on 1 February 1996 had not been disrupted by any serious incidents and there had been welcome steps of compliance with the practical options proposed by UNMOP, which had served to confirm the lessening of tensions. Furthermore, both parties had continued to reiterate their firm commitment to a negotiated resolution. However, he added that substantive negotiations had not started and neither side had held out the prospect of long-term violations in the United Nations-controlled zone. The Secretary-General underlined that UNMOP played an essential role in maintaining conditions conducive to negotiations and therefore recommended a further six-month extension of the UNMOP mandate until 15 July 1998.

At its 3847th meeting, held on 13 January 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (France), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President also drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁸² The President then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 12 December 1997 from the representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia addressed to the Secretary-General,⁸³ transmitting a letter dated 12 December 1997 from the President of the Federal Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, and to a letter dated 22 December 1997 from the representative of Croatia addressed to the Secretary-General,⁸⁴ reiterating their positions on the Prevlaka peninsula.

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1147 (1998), which reads:

⁸³ S/1997/984.

⁸⁴ S/1997/1002.

The Security Council,

Noting again the Joint Declaration signed at Geneva on 30 September 1992 by the Presidents of the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, in particular article 3, which reaffirmed their agreement concerning the demilitarization of the Prevlaka peninsula, and emphasizing the contribution that this demilitarization has made to the decrease of tension in the region,

Noting with concern continued long-standing violations of the demilitarization regime in the United Nations designated zones in the region, but welcoming a decrease in the number of violations,

Welcoming the first substantial progress in implementing the practical options proposed by the United Nations military observers in May 1996, as referred to in the report of the Secretary-General of 31 December 1996,

Noting with concern that there has been no progress towards a settlement of the disputed issue of Prevlaka through mutual negotiations,

Recalling the Agreement on Normalization of Relations between the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, signed in Belgrade on 23 August 1996, committing the parties to settle peacefully the disputed issue of Prevlaka by negotiations in the spirit of the Charter of the United Nations and good neighbourly relations, and stressing the need for the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to agree on a settlement which would peacefully resolve their differences,

Noting that the presence of the United Nations military observers continues to be essential to maintain conditions that are conducive to a negotiated settlement of the disputed issue of Prevlaka,

1. Authorizes the United Nations military observers to continue monitoring the demilitarization of the Prevlaka peninsula, in accordance with resolutions 779 (1992) and 981 (1995) and paragraphs 19 and 20 of the report of the Secretary-General of 13 December 1995, until 15 July 1998;

8. Requests the United Nations military observers and the multinational Stabilization Force authorized by the Council in resolution 1088 (1996) of 12 December 1996 to cooperate fully with each other;

9. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 13 February 1998 (3854th meeting):
statement by the President

On 22 January 1998, pursuant to Security Council resolutions 1120 (1997) and 1145 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in the region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium.⁸⁵ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that progress had continued to be made on a range of issues and that the Government had displayed commendable energy and commitment in the conduct of its comprehensive programme for national reconciliation. Nevertheless, several key issues had remained unresolved, including property-related issues, tenancy rights, funding for the Joint Council of Municipalities, and full implementation of the Amnesty Law. He stressed that the lack of progress on those commitments could have serious implications. Critical to sustaining progress would be the role of the international community and Croatia's bilateral partners. In that regard, he welcomed the key role that would be played by the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, and suggested that the Security Council might wish to consider inviting the Chairman-in-Office of OSCE to keep the United Nations regularly informed of relevant developments in the mission area. He also noted that Croatia's request for further United Nations police assistance demonstrated the political will to complete the process of peaceful reintegration. He affirmed that the United Nations Civilian Police Support Group would work closely with the Government of Croatia to monitor police operations in the Danube region and to improve the professional qualities of the multi-ethnic police force. That commitment, and the support of the international community, would ensure that the region was policed effectively and impartially, thereby facilitating the vital process of two-way returns of displaced persons.

At its 3854th meeting, held on 13 February 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Gabon), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁸⁶

The Security Council welcomes the successful completion of the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, as described in the report of the Secretary-General of 22 January 1998. The experience of this multifunctional operation may be useful for similar situations in the future.

The Council commends the commitment shown by the Government of the Republic of Croatia to the implementation of its comprehensive programme of national reconciliation, and stresses the need for continued progress in this regard. The Council is also encouraged by signs of increasing participation in Croatian political life by the region's ethnic Serb citizens, and underlines the importance of continued efforts by the Government of the Republic of Croatia to ensure full participation by the Serb minority in the political life of the country, including through urgent funding of the Joint Council of Municipalities.

The Council notes that, despite the positive conclusion of the Transitional Administration and the efforts of the Government of the Republic of Croatia, including its request for the establishment of the civilian police support group, much remains to be done. The Government of the Republic of Croatia remains responsible for the rights and safety of members of all ethnic groups within the Republic of Croatia and bound by its obligations and commitments under the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium and other international agreements. In this regard, the Council calls upon the Government of the Republic of Croatia to intensify its efforts to promote full reintegration of the region, in particular to resolve property issues and other problems which are hindering the return of refugees and displaced persons, to protect human rights, including by taking action against harassment, to address in full uncertainties about the implementation of the Amnesty Law and to take measures to improve public confidence in the Croatian police.

In this context, the Council emphasizes the key role of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe throughout the Republic of Croatia, including in the Danubian region. The Council strongly supports the closest possible cooperation between the United Nations and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, in particular between the mission of that organization and the support group and other United Nations offices and agencies in the Republic of Croatia, as envisaged by the Secretary-General, and, to that end, encourages the support group and the mission to keep each other fully informed.

The Council pays tribute to the dedicated men and women of the Transitional Administration and, in particular, expresses its appreciation to the Transitional Administrators and the Force Commanders for their leadership of the mission of the Transitional Administration.

Decision of 6 March 1998 (3859th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3859th meeting, held on 6 March 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Gambia), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 26 February from the representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁸⁷ transmitting an aide-mémoire issued on 25 February 1998 by the Federal Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, which outlined worrisome negative developments that were continuing to take place in the region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium leading to an exodus of Serbs on an ever larger scale and jeopardizing the results of the United Nations mission. The President also drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 5 March 1998 from the representative of Croatia addressed to the President of the Security Council, which transmitted an aide-mémoire giving the views of Croatia on the situation in the Eastern Slavonia region.⁸⁸

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁸⁹

The Security Council expresses its concern at the Croatian Government's lack of compliance with obligations assumed under the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, the letter from the Croatian Government dated 13 January 1997 and the agreement of 23 April 1997 between the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and the Croatian Government concerning the return of refugees and displaced persons. The Council notes that the overall security situation in the Danube region remains relatively stable, but is particularly concerned about the increasing incidence of harassment and intimidation of the local Serb community in the region and the failure of the Croatian Government to apply the process of national reconciliation in an effective way at the local level. This worrying situation, together with recent statements by the Croatian authorities, cast doubt upon the commitment of the Republic of Croatia to include ethnic Serbs and persons from other minorities as full and equal members of Croatian society.

The Council, recalling the statement by its President of 13 February 1998 and having taken note of the letter dated 5 March 1998 from the Permanent Representative of the Republic of Croatia to the United Nations, calls upon the Croatian Government publicly to reaffirm and by its actions to demonstrate its commitment to fulfilling its obligations under the Basic Agreement and other agreements in full, including through progress on national reconciliation at every level. In particular, the Council calls upon the Croatian Government to take prompt and unequivocal steps to ensure the safety, security and rights of all Croatian citizens and to build confidence among the Serb community throughout Croatia, including by providing promised funding for the Joint Council of Municipalities. These steps should include measures to create the conditions to allow local Serbs to remain in the region, to facilitate the return of refugees and displaced persons and to address underlying practical and economic issues which inhibit returns. The Council calls upon the Croatian Government to establish clear procedures for the documentation of refugees from Croatia; to issue an equitable plan for nationwide two-way returns; to implement fully and fairly its legislation on amnesty; to act promptly to pass equitable property and tenancy rights legislation which would encourage returns and stimulate additional international reconstruction assistance; to ensure fair employment benefit practices and equal economic opportunity; and to ensure the non-discriminatory application of the rule of law.

The Council recognizes that, since the end of the mandate of the Transitional Administration, the performance of the Croatian police has been generally satisfactory, and in this context it expresses its appreciation and support for the work of the United Nations civilian police support group. The Council notes, however, that public confidence in the police is low. The Council calls upon the Croatian Government to take measures, including through public information and police preventive action, to improve public confidence in the police as part of a wider programme of measures to prevent ethnically motivated crime and ensure the protection and equal treatment of all Croatian citizens, regardless of ethnicity.

The Council stresses that, following the termination of the Transitional Administration, responsibility for the full reintegration of the Danube region lies clearly with the Croatian Government. The United Nations will continue to work closely with the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe in monitoring the situation and reminding the Croatian Government of its obligations.

Decision of 2 July 1998 (3901st meeting):
statement by the President

On 11 June 1998, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1145 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council an overview of the activities of the United Nations Civilian Police Support Group and an assessment of the situation in the region following the termination of the United Nations Transitional Authority for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium on 15 January 1998.⁹⁰ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that there had been progress on a number of issues that remained outstanding at the end of the UNTAES mandate, but core issues, including the abolishment of discriminatory property laws and the establishment of an effective mechanism that would allow owners to recover their property, remained unresolved. The Government of Croatia also still had to adopt a comprehensive nationwide programme for returns and to develop a balanced reconstruction plan. Provided that the Government took major steps to resolve those problems, that the return of Croat displaced persons to the region proceeded without increased ethnic incidents and that the police performance continued to improve, it would be his intention to downsize the Support Group operation gradually beginning in August 1998, with the goal of reaching a level of 140 civilian police monitors by the end of that month and a level of 120 by the end of September. In the meantime, he had instructed his Representative to establish a timetable for the handover of the functions of the Support Group to the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, in the expectation that the Permanent Council of that organization would confirm its readiness to assume responsibility for police monitoring in the region from 16 October 1998.

At its 3901st meeting, held on 2 July 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Russian Federation), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Croatia, at her request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 29 June 1998 from the representative of Croatia addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting the text of the Programme for the Return and Accommodation of Displaced Persons, Refugees and Exiled Persons, adopted by the State Parliament of Croatia on 26 June 1998.⁹¹

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁹²

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 11 June 1998 pursuant to its resolution 1145 (1997) of 19 December 1997.

The Council notes that the overall security situation in the Danube region is relatively stable. It also notes that the generally satisfactory performance of the Croatian police in the region is largely due to comprehensive monitoring by the United Nations Police Support Group and the special attention paid to the situation by the Ministry of the Interior of the Republic of Croatia. However, the Council is concerned that, despite the large presence of the Croatian police, ethnically related incidents, evictions and housing intimidation cases have not been stopped, and that such incidents have increased in the recent period.

The Council expresses its grave concern that a large number of Serb residents and displaced persons have emigrated from the Republic of Croatia since late 1996, mainly because of continued security incidents, ethnically related intimidation, a dire economic situation, bureaucratic hurdles, discriminatory legislation and a stalled return programme. A continuation of this trend could have a seriously negative effect on the restoration of a multi-ethnic society in the Republic of Croatia. The Council, therefore, welcomes the adoption by the Government of Croatia, on 26 June 1998, of a nationwide programme for the return and accommodation of displaced persons, refugees and exiled persons and calls for its prompt and full implementation at all levels, including the abolition of discriminatory property laws and the establishment of effective mechanisms allowing owners to recover their property. It stresses the importance of the prompt and full implementation of the programme on reconciliation at all levels throughout Croatia and of preventing and responding to incidents of harassment and unlawful evictions.

The Council reiterates the continuing obligations of the Government of Croatia under the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium as well as under international conventions and other agreements. It notes with satisfaction that the Government of Croatia has met the majority of its obligations concerning the provision of public services and employment within the public sector, set out in the Basic Agreement. The Council, however, reiterates that a number of obligations have yet to be fulfilled in such areas as the implementation of the Convalidation Law and the Amnesty Law, the functioning of local municipalities and the permanent funding of the Joint Council of Municipalities. In this regard, the Council stresses the significance of the Article 11 Commission, formed under the provisions of article 11 of the Basic Agreement, as a key instrument in encouraging the Government of Croatia to meet its obligations fully and in underscoring continued international commitment to the successful completion of peaceful reintegration.

The Council calls upon the Government of Croatia to improve police response to ethnically related incidents, evictions and housing intimidation cases and to take other measures to strengthen public confidence in the police, including through public information and police preventive action. In this context, the Council stresses the importance of the implementation of the guidelines issued by the Ministry of the Interior on 9 January 1998 and the institution of a community policing programme by the Ministry.

The Council fully supports the activities of the United Nations Police Support Group and the United Nations Liaison Office in Zagreb. It welcomes the decision of 25 June 1998 of the Permanent Council of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe to deploy civilian police monitors to assume, from 15 October 1998, the responsibilities of the Support Group. It also welcomes the invitation by the representative of the Secretary-General to the head of the mission of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe in Croatia to begin planning for the intended transfer of the police monitoring function in the region to that organization. It supports the establishment of a timetable for the handover of the functions of the Support Group to the organization and agrees with the intention of the Secretary-General to reduce gradually the number of civilian police monitors, under the conditions specified in his report. The Council looks forward to a report by the Secretary-General by mid-September detailing the arrangements for the termination of the mandate of the Support Group by 15 October 1998.

Decision of 15 July 1998 (3907th meeting):

On 26 June 1998, pursuant to paragraph 7 of Security Council resolution 1147 (1998), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on progress made by Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia towards a settlement that would peacefully resolve their differences.⁹³ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the stability in the UNMOP area of responsibility had not been disrupted by any serious incidents. However, there were also no signs that both parties would cease the continuing violations of the demilitarization regime in the two United Nations-designated zones, which constituted an irritant in the relations between UNMOP and local authorities. He emphasized that UNMOP was assisting in resolving disputes that could lead to a rise in tension, including an increasing number of civilian difficulties, and had avoided any steps that would prejudice the outcome of bilateral political negotiations. He further noted that the parties had retained their divergent interpretations of the Prevlaka dispute although, for the first time, a formal proposal for the settlement of the issue had been presented. Meanwhile, since UNMOP played an essential role in maintaining conditions conducive to negotiations, he recommended a further six-month extension of the UNMOP mandate until 15 January 1999.

At its 3907th meeting, held on 15 July 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (the Russian Federation), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Croatia, Germany and Italy, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Portugal, the Russian Federation, Slovenia, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States.⁹⁴ The President further drew the attention of the Council to the following letters from the representative of Croatia: a letter dated 18 June 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting the Croatian draft text for an agreement between Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia on a permanent solution to the security issue of Prevlaka,⁹⁵ and letters addressed to the President of the Security Council dated 29 June 1998 and 8 July 1998, respectively, expressing support for bilateral negotiations with a view to resolving security issues in Prevlaka, but stressing that Croatia could not support negotiations aimed at changing internationally recognized borders.⁹⁶ The President also drew the attention of the Council to letters addressed to the President of the Security Council dated 30 June and 10 July 1998, respectively, from the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia,⁹⁷ transmitting a letter from the President of the Republic concerning the extension of the mandate of the UNMOP and a draft agreement between the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and Croatia on the permanent settlement of the disputed issue of Prevlaka with an explanatory note.

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1183 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its earlier relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 779 (1992) of 6 October 1992, 981 (1995) of 31 March 1995 and 1147 (1998) of 13 January 1998,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 26 June 1998, and noting the positive assessment in the report of the Secretary-General of recent developments, including the initiative by the Republic of Croatia for a final resolution of the disputed issue of Prevlaka,

Noting the proposal by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia on the permanent settlement of the disputed issue of Prevlaka,

Republic of Croatia within its internationally recognized borders,

Noting again the Joint Declaration signed at Geneva on 30 September 1992 by the Presidents of the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, in particular article 3, which reaffirmed their agreement concerning the demilitarization of the Prevlaka peninsula, and emphasizing the contribution that this demilitarization has made to the decrease of tension in the region,

Concerned, however, at the continued long-standing violations of the demilitarization regime in the United Nations designated zones in the region and the failure of the parties to improve their compliance with the demilitarization regime as recommended by the United Nations Mission of Observers in Prevlaka, including important demining activities within the demilitarized area, and by continued restrictions on the freedom of movement of its personnel within their area of responsibility,

Recalling the Agreement on Normalization of Relations between the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, signed in Belgrade on 23 August 1996, committing the parties to settle peacefully the disputed issue of Prevlaka by negotiations in the spirit of the Charter of the United Nations and good-neighbourly relations, and deeply concerned at the lack of significant progress towards such a settlement,

3. Reiterates its call upon the parties to cease all violations of the demilitarization regime in the United Nations designated zones, to cooperate fully with the United Nations military observers and to ensure their safety and full and unrestricted freedom of movement, and calls upon them to complete promptly the demining of the area;

4. Urges the parties to abide by their mutual commitments and to implement fully the Agreement on Normalization of Relations between the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia of 23 August 1996, in particular their commitment to reach a negotiated resolution of the disputed issue of Prevlaka in accordance with article 4 of the Agreement, and calls upon them to engage promptly and constructively in negotiations;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Council by 15 October 1998 a report on the situation in the Prevlaka peninsula and in particular on progress made by the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia towards a settlement which would peacefully resolve their differences, and, in this context, on the possible adaptation of the United Nations Mission of Observers in Prevlaka;

6. Requests the United Nations military observers and the multinational Stabilization Force authorized by the Council in resolution 1088 (1996) of 12 December 1996 and extended by resolution 1174 (1998) of 15 June 1998 to cooperate fully with each other;

7. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 6 November 1998 (3941st meeting):
statement by the President

On 27 October 1998, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1145 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a final report on the United Nations Civilian Police Support Group.⁹⁸ In his report, the Secretary-General informed the Council that the mandate of the Support Group had been fully completed and had come to an end on 15 October 1998. The Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe had taken over police monitoring responsibilities on the following day. The overall security situation in the region remained satisfactory, although there continued to be a worrying trend of ethnically motivated incidents. Police performance had improved notably since the beginning of the mandate of the Support Group and the Government had taken steps to ensure that performance continued to improve.

At its 3941st meeting, held on 6 November 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United States), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁹⁹

The Security Council welcomes the final report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Police Support Group and, in particular, his description of the successful conclusion of the mandate of the Support Group and the smooth transition of responsibilities to the police monitoring programme of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe. The Council recalls the commitment of the Government of Croatia to ensure that police monitors of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe will have the same access to police stations, documents and police operations, including investigations and checkpoints, as that accorded to the Support Group.

While the overall security situation in the Danube region remains satisfactory and police performance has improved notably and the Government of Croatia has taken steps to ensure that this continues, a worrying trend of ethnically motivated incidents persists in the region. The Council remains deeply concerned at the continuing departures of Serb residents, resulting to a considerable extent from these incidents. In this context, the Council is mindful of the importance of economic revitalization and reconstruction in creating an environment for sustained returns. The Council calls upon the Government of Croatia to make every effort to enhance public confidence in the police force and to recommit itself fully to the process of reconciliation between ethnic groups.

The Council also calls upon the Government of Croatia to address the perceived lack of security, which is contributing to continuing departures of Serbs from the region, and to remedy a number of problems that are preventing the full implementation of the “Programme for the Return and Accommodation of Displaced Persons, Refugees and Exiled Persons”. While noting that in his previous report the Secretary-General recognized progress in the implementation of the Programme, the Council calls upon the Government of Croatia promptly and fully to address all unresolved issues, which include restitution of property to Croatian citizens of Serb ethnicity, harmonization of legislation with the provisions of the return programme to enable non-discriminatory implementation, effective functioning of all housing commissions, equal access to reconstruction funding, restoration of rights to socially owned apartments, access to information, removal of impediments to the acquisition of documents needed for returnee status and benefits, and implementation of the Convalidation Law.

The Council expresses particular concern about the Joint Council of Municipalities, which represents all Serb ethnic communities in the region and which is described by the Secretary-General as being on the brink of collapse. The Council reiterates the continuing obligations of the Government of Croatia under the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium as well as under international conventions and other agreements, and, in this context, stresses the importance of full implementation of the “Programme for the Establishment of Trust, Accelerated Return and Normalization of Living Conditions in the War-Affected Regions of the Republic of Croatia”.

The Council expresses its full support for the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, which has now assumed the role of the Support Group, and looks forward to being kept informed, whenever necessary, of relevant developments in the Danube region of Croatia.

The Council expresses its deep appreciation to all the men and women who participated in the United Nations peacekeeping operations in the Danube region of Croatia. Their dedication and perseverance made a significant contribution to regional peace.

Decision of 15 January 1999 (3966th meeting): resolution 1222 (1999)

On 6 January 1999, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1183 (1998), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the United Nations Mission of Observers in Prevlaka.¹⁰⁰ In his report, the Secretary-General noted that the continued stability of the area, under monitoring of the United Nations military observers, had contributed to a constructive atmosphere in which discussions were continuing although it would be premature to conclude that a final agreement between the parties was close at hand. He recommended that, in the light of the pivotal role of UNMOP in ensuring the maintenance of an atmosphere in which serious negotiations could proceed and, given the current status of negotiations between the parties, the mandate of the Mission be extended for six months, until 15 July 1999, without change to its current concept of operations. He also noted that, in the event that the parties were unable to resolve their dispute or make substantial progress during that time, the Security Council might wish to consider alternative mechanisms, such as international mediation or arbitration, in the search for a solution to the dispute.

At its 3966th meeting, held on 15 January 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Brazil), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Croatia, Germany and Italy, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Canada, France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States.¹⁰¹ The President further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 24 December 1998 from the representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting a letter of the same date from the President of the Federal Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia addressed to the President of the Security Council, requesting the extension of the mandate of UNMOP for an additional period of six months, and a memorandum on the negotiating position of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in connection with the region of Prevlaka and the preservation of the security system of the United Nations.¹⁰² The President also drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 7 January 1999 from the representative of Croatia addressed to the President of the Security Council, requesting the Security Council to press the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to engage in constructive negotiations regarding the Prevlaka peninsula.¹⁰³

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1222 (1999) which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its earlier relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 779 (1992) of 6 October 1992, 981 (1995) of 31 March 1995, 1147 (1998) of 13 January 1998 and 1183 (1998) of 15 July 1998,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 6 January 1999 on the United Nations Mission of Observers in Prevlaka,

Recalling the letter dated 24 December 1998 from the Prime Minister of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the letter dated 7 January 1999 from the Permanent Representative of Croatia to the United Nations, concerning the disputed issue of Prevlaka,

Reaffirming once again its commitment to the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Croatia within its internationally recognized borders,

Taking note once again of the Joint Declaration signed at Geneva on 30 September 1992 by the Presidents of the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, in particular articles 1 and 3, the latter reaffirming their agreement concerning the demilitarization of the Prevlaka peninsula,

Noting with concern, however, that long-standing violations of the demilitarization regime by both parties continue, including the standing presence of Yugoslav military personnel and the occasional presence of Croatian military elements in the demilitarized zone, and limitations placed on the free movement of United Nations military observers by both parties,

Welcoming, in this regard, the recent lifting of certain restrictions on access for the Mission by Croatia, as well as the recent steps taken by the Croatian authorities to improve communication and coordination with the Mission to allow it to monitor more effectively the situation in its area of responsibility,

Welcoming also the Croatian willingness to open crossing points between Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Montenegro) in the demilitarized zone, which has led to considerable civilian traffic in both directions and which represents a significant confidence-building measure in the normalization of relations between the two parties, and expressing the hope that further such openings will help to increase such civilian traffic,

Noting with approval the continuing bilateral negotiations between the parties pursuant to the Agreement on Normalization of Relations between the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia of 23 August 1996, but expressing serious concern that such negotiations have not yet resulted in any substantive progress towards a settlement of the disputed issue of Prevlaka,

Reiterating its call upon the parties urgently to put in place a comprehensive demining programme,

Noting that the presence of the United Nations military observers continues to be essential to maintain conditions that are conducive to a negotiated settlement of the disputed issue of Prevlaka,

1. Authorizes the United Nations military observers to continue monitoring the demilitarization of the Prevlaka peninsula, in accordance with resolutions 779 (1992) and 981 (1995) and paragraphs 19 and 20 of the report of the Secretary-General of 13 December 1995, until 15 July 1999;

2. Welcomes the improvement in cooperation between the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the United Nations military observers and the decrease in the number of serious incidents, and reiterates its call upon the parties to cease all violations of the demilitarization regime in the United Nations designated zones, to take steps further to reduce tension and improve safety and security in the area, to cooperate fully with the United Nations military observers and to ensure their safety and full and unrestricted freedom of movement;

3. Requests the Secretary-General, in the light of the improved cooperation and reduction in tensions in Prevlaka as described in his report, to consider possible reductions, without prejudice to the main operational activities of the United Nations Mission of Observers in Prevlaka, focusing on the possibility of reducing the number of military observers to as few as twenty-two, in line with the reconsideration of the concept of operations of the Mission and the existing security regime and the desirability of closing the Mission when appropriate;

4. Also requests the Secretary-General to submit a report by 15 April 1999 on the progress of bilateral negotiations between the parties, as well as on possible ways to facilitate a negotiated settlement, should the parties require such assistance, and to this end requests the parties to report at least bimonthly to the Secretary-General on the status of the negotiations;

5. Urges once again that the parties abide by their mutual commitments and implement fully the Agreement on Normalization of Relations, and stresses in particular the urgent need for them to fulfil rapidly and in good faith their commitment to reach a negotiated resolution of the disputed issue of Prevlaka in accordance with article 4 of the Agreement;

6. Requests the United Nations military observers and the multinational Stabilization Force authorized by the Council in resolution 1088 (1996) of 12 December 1996 and extended by resolution 1174 (1998) of 15 June 1998 to cooperate fully with each other;

7. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 15 July 1999 (4023rd meeting):
resolution 1252 (1999)

On 8 July 1999, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1222 (1999), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the progress of bilateral negotiations between Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to resolve the disputed issue of Prevlaka, as well as on possible ways to facilitate a negotiated settlement, should the parties require such assistance.¹⁰⁴ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that the situation in the UNMOP area of responsibility had remained relatively calm, although tensions were heightened for a time following the commencement of NATO military action against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia on 24 March 1999. Still, violations of both the demilitarized and United Nations-controlled zones persisted during the period under review and United Nations military observers had not been able to patrol fully or freely in the UNMOP area of responsibility on either the Croatian or the Yugoslav side. The Secretary-General expressed his disappointment that there had not been substantive progress in the talks between the two parties. He suggested that, while the two parties were alone responsible for reaching a satisfactory and enduring resolution, alternative mechanisms could also be considered as means of assisting the parties to implement, in practical terms, their stated intent to resolve the Prevlaka dispute peacefully. Furthermore, he added that the Council might wish to reassess the state of the negotiations after three months, on the basis of regular reports by the parties as originally requested in resolution 1222 (1999), and that it would be useful if the parties reported after each round of talks to facilitate the process. Given the importance of ensuring that the situation on the ground remained stable and as free of tension as possible, and in order to maintain conditions of stability within which political negotiations would have the greatest possible chance of success, the Secretary-General recommended that the UNMOP mandate be extended for a further six-month period, until 15 January 2000, without any changes to its current concept of operations.

At its 4023rd meeting, held on 15 July 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Malaysia), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Croatia, Germany and Italy, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Canada, France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom, and the United States, which, in accordance with the understanding reached in the Council's prior consultations, had become a presidential text.¹⁰⁵ The President further drew the attention of the Council to the following documents: letters dated 15 March, 2 May, 25 June and 13 July 1999, respectively, from the representative of Croatia addressed to the President of the Security Council; and letters dated 23 March, 27 April, 10 May, 18 June and 7 July 1999, respectively, from the representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia addressed to the President of the Security Council, detailing the positions of each side on the issue of the Prevlaka peninsula and recent developments.¹⁰⁶

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1252 (1999), which reads:

Expressing its concern about more recent, additional violations of the demilitarized zone, in particular the presence there of troops of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia,

Noting with satisfaction that the opening of crossing points between Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Montenegro) in the demilitarized zones continues to facilitate civilian and commercial traffic in both directions without security incidents and continue to represent a significant confidence-building measure in the normalization of relations between the two parties, and urging the parties to utilize these openings as a basis for further confidence-building measures to achieve the normalization of relations between them,

Reiterating its serious concerns about the lack of substantive progress towards a settlement of the disputed issue of Prevlaka in the continuing bilateral negotiations between the parties pursuant to the Agreement on Normalization of Relations between the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia of 23 August 1996, and calling upon the parties to resume discussions,

Reiterating its call upon the parties urgently to put in place a comprehensive demining programme,

C. The situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina

Decision of 4 April 1996 (3647th meeting): statement by the President

On 29 March 1996, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1035 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a progress report on the establishment of the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina (UNMIBH), which included the International Police Task Force in Bosnia and Herzegovina.¹⁰⁷ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that it was evident that military undertakings

under the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina¹⁰⁸ had been complied with under the powerful presence of the Multinational Military Implementation Force. A relatively stable military environment had been established for the implementation of the extremely complex political and civilian undertakings contained in the Agreement. Over the last month, UNMIBH, and especially the Task Force, had been predominantly concerned with the transfer of the Bosnian Serb-controlled suburbs of Sarajevo to the authority of the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, to achieve the reunification of the city under the terms of the Peace Agreement. He noted that the bitterness, fears and hatred created by the four years of war were the underlying forces that had led to the exodus of the Bosnian Serb population of Sarajevo. However, the Bosnian Serb and the Federation authorities bore a great responsibility for the setback, as they had not shown any determination to reassure and persuade the Serb population to stay on. A number of Bosnian Serb Sarajevans might consider returning to Sarajevo, if they felt that conditions there were secure enough, especially if they could regain access to their homes upon return. He underlined that the Federation authorities would have to adopt a radically different policy towards reconciliation if they wished to encourage the reconstitution of a multicultural Sarajevo. Meanwhile, the challenge remained to strengthen the links between the two entities¹⁰⁹ to whom the Peace Agreement had assigned considerable autonomy and constitutional authority. He noted that the restoration of some degree of confidence at the political level was essential for the parties to work together in Bosnia and Herzegovina. Within the Federation, persistent strains between the two partners were a major cause for concern, and he underlined that, unless the two communities made determined and sustained efforts to avoid conflict, establish cantons as agreed and strengthened Federation structures, divisive trends would increase. The Secretary-General stated that it was in the midst of those tensions that UNMIBH and its principal component, the Task Force, were operating. He stressed that annex (11) to the Peace Agreement envisaged the Task Force as an unarmed monitoring and advisory force. It was on that basis that the Security Council had authorized its deployment and contributing Governments had provided personnel. It was therefore not feasible to assign to the unarmed force the task of enforcing law and order in a country awash with weapons, particularly when it had no legal authority to do so. He stressed that UNIMBH faced uncertainties related to the dilemma that would arise, if IFOR was withdrawn as anticipated by the end of the year, and reiterated that the mandate of the Task Force ought to be coterminous with that of IFOR. It was unrealistic to envisage a civilian police operation continuing its work without the framework of security provided by the presence of a credible international military force. Finally, he stated that, as peace could not be durable unless it was accompanied by justice, those individuals indicted by the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia had to be brought to trial.

By a letter dated 13 March 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹¹⁰ the Secretary-General transmitted the first report of the High Representative for the implementation of the peace agreement on Bosnia and Herzegovina, which covered the period from the signature of the Peace Agreement in Paris on 14 December 1995 to the beginning of March 1996, and the establishment of the Headquarters of the High Representative in Sarajevo as well as of a secretariat in Brussels.

At its 3647th meeting, held on 4 April 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General and the letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Chile), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 22 March 1996 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council, conveying a communication from the Secretary-General of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), transmitting the fourth report on the operations of the Implementation Force;¹¹¹ and a letter dated 26 March 1996 from the representatives of France, Germany, Italy, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States addressed to the Secretary-General,¹¹² transmitting the text of the final document of the Contact Group Ministerial meeting, dated 23 March 1996. He further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 4 April 1996 from the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹¹³ asserting that the Government of Bosnia and Herzegovina had undertaken all measures requested of it, including ensuring the security of the Serb population that lived in the previously Serb-controlled suburbs of Sarajevo.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹¹⁴

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 29 March 1996 submitted pursuant to its resolution 1035 (1995) of 21 December 1995, and the report of the High Representative for the implementation of the peace agreement on Bosnia and Herzegovina, annexed to the letter from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council dated 13 March 1996. The Council welcomes both reports.

The Council notes that, on the whole, the implementation of the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the annexes thereto (collectively the "Peace Agreement") is proceeding according to the timetable established by the Agreement. It also notes, in general, satisfactory compliance with the military aspects of the Peace Agreement, as confirmed in the most recent report to the Council on the operations of the Implementation Force, and stresses that now the main emphasis in implementation efforts by the international community and the Bosnian parties themselves should shift to the civil aspects of the Agreement.

The Council stresses that the responsibility for implementing the Peace Agreement rests primarily with the parties to the Agreement. It demands that they fully implement the Peace Agreement and demonstrate a genuine commitment to confidence and security-building measures, regional arms control, reconciliation and the building of a common future. In that context, it demands that the parties comply fully, unconditionally and without any further delay with their commitments regarding the release of prisoners, implementation of the constitutional framework, withdrawal of foreign forces, ensuring freedom of movement, cooperation with the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991, return of refugees and respect for human rights and international humanitarian law. It calls upon the authorities concerned with the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina to move forward vigorously on measures to strengthen the Federation and, to that end, to implement in full the Sarajevo agreement concluded on 30 March 1996.

The Council is particularly concerned at the failure to date by all parties to comply fully with the provisions of the Peace Agreement concerning the release of prisoners, in spite of the repeated commitments by the parties to do so. The Council stresses that the obligation to release the prisoners is unconditional. Failure to do so constitutes a serious case of non-compliance. In this context, the Council affirms its support for the conclusions of the Contact Group Ministerial Meeting of 23 March 1996 and notes the readiness of the High Representative to propose measures to be taken against any party that fails to comply.

The Council expresses its full support for the High Representative who is in charge of monitoring the implementation of the Peace Agreement and mobilizing and, as appropriate, giving guidance to, and coordinating the activities of, the civilian organizations and agencies involved, in accordance with resolution 1031 (1995). It also expresses its full support for the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina and other international institutions and organizations involved in the implementation of the Peace Agreement. It affirms that the implementation of the Peace Agreement must be strict, just and impartial.

The Council expresses its strong support for the International Police Task Force in Bosnia and Herzegovina of the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina. It notes that an effective United Nations civilian police operation is vital to the implementation of the Peace Agreement and encourages the Task Force to implement its mandate as actively as possible consistent with annex 11 of the Peace Agreement, as referred to in resolution 1035 (1995). The Council, bearing in mind the agreement of the parties in annex 11 of the Peace Agreement not to impede the movement of Task Force personnel or in any way hinder, obstruct or delay them in the performance of their responsibilities, calls upon the parties to allow Task Force personnel immediate and complete access to any site, person, activity, proceeding, record, or other item or event in Bosnia and Herzegovina as the Task Force may request. It notes with appreciation the participation of Member States in the staffing of the Task Force and urges those Member States which have agreed to provide civilian police to dispatch expeditiously fully qualified personnel to enable the Task Force to reach full deployment by mid-April. It encourages the Task Force to accelerate the deployment of police monitors, consistent with maintaining their high quality. The Council also expresses its strong support for the Mine Action Centre of the Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina and encourages States to contribute to the United Nations Voluntary Trust Fund for Assistance in Mine Clearance.

The Council recognizes that economic reconstruction and rehabilitation throughout the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina are key factors for the overall success of the peace implementation process, reconciliation and reintegration. These tasks require the political will of and consistent efforts by the Bosnian parties as well as substantial international assistance. The Council urges that priority be given to projects aimed at facilitating the process of reconciliation and the economic reintegration of the whole country. It notes with appreciation the resources that have already been made available in this respect. It calls upon States and international institutions to honour fully their commitments regarding economic and financial assistance to Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Council recalls the relationship, as described in the London Conference, between the fulfilment by the parties of their commitments in the Peace Agreement and the readiness of the international community to commit financial resources for reconstruction and development. It affirms that it is the parties themselves that have the most important role in re-establishing the economy of their country.

The Council expresses its deep concern over recent developments in the Sarajevo area which caused thousands of Bosnian Serb civilians to leave their homes. The Council calls upon the parties to make greater efforts towards reconciliation and the reconstitution of a multicultural and multi-ethnic Sarajevo, as a city of Bosniacs, Serbs, Croats, and others, and as the capital and seat of the future common institutions of Bosnia and Herzegovina. It further calls upon the parties to put in place additional measures to ensure security, freedom of movement and conditions for the return of people affected in Sarajevo and all other transferred areas. The Council calls upon the parties to reverse the trend of population movements and partition efforts in Bosnia and Herzegovina along ethnic lines.

The Council pays tribute to all those who have given their lives in the cause of peace in the former Yugoslavia and expresses its condolences to their families, including to the family of the Secretary of Commerce of the United States of America.

The Council requests the Secretary-General and the High Representative to continue to keep the Council regularly informed on the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina and on the implementation of the Peace Agreement.

Decision of 8 August 1996 (3687th meeting):
statement by the President

By a letter dated 9 July 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the Secretary-General transmitted the report of the High Representative for the implementation of the peace agreement on Bosnia and Herzegovina.¹¹⁵ In the report, the High Representative identified substantial shortcomings in the implementation of the Peace Agreement and stressed that the resolution of those issues was inextricably linked to the creation of a stable peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina. While some progress had been made, the severity of abuses in places such as Teslic and the Sarajevo suburbs belied the conclusion that, with time, the parties would make the necessary changes to ensure respect for human rights without outside pressure. He cautioned that there was troubling evidence of a trend not only to accept, but also to institutionalize, ethnic separation. He underlined that the parties needed to work actively to create conditions conducive to the return of members of minority groups to their homes and to ensure that vulnerable persons, including those with opposing political views, were able to return and live in safety. He then called upon the parties to implement a range of urgent measures relating to cooperating with human rights institutions and organizations, and addressing human rights abuses.

By a letter dated 11 July 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹¹⁶ the President of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 reported that a Trial Chamber of the Tribunal had delivered a decision under rule 61 of the Tribunal's Rules of Procedure and Evidence in the case of Radovan Karadžić and Ratko Mladić, and had found that there were reasonable grounds for believing that they were individually responsible for planning, instigating or ordering the commission of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes. Consequently, the Trial Chamber had issued international arrest warrants against the two accused. He also notified the Council that the failure to execute the initial arrest warrants against the two accused was wholly due to the refusal of the Republika Srpska and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to cooperate with the Tribunal in accordance with article 29 of its Statute. He was therefore duty-bound to bring to the attention of the Security Council the refusal of the Republika Srpska and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to cooperate with the Tribunal, so that the Council could decide upon the appropriate response.

At its 3687th meeting, held on 8 August 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letters in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the ¹¹⁶ S/1996/556.

President (Germany), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina, at his request, to participate in the discussion, without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to letters dated 2, 3, 18 and 22 July 1996, respectively, from the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹¹⁷ which called upon all parties to honour their obligations and commitments under the Dayton/Paris Agreement with respect to the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia and called for the arrest and extradition to The Hague of indicted war criminals. The President further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 8 July 1996 from the representative of Guinea addressed to President of the Security Council, which reported that the Contact Group of the Organization of the Islamic Conference endorsed the contents of the letter dated 2 July 1996 from Bosnia and Herzegovina and urged the Security Council to impose sanctions on those parties which did not fully comply with the orders of the Tribunal, to seek the arrest and extradition of war criminals by the international force and to declare that elections could not be held before the apprehension of indicted war criminals.¹¹⁸

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹¹⁹

The Security Council has considered the report of the High Representative for the implementation of the peace agreement on Bosnia and Herzegovina annexed to the letter from the Secretary-General to the President of the Council dated 9 July 1996.

The Council expresses its full support for the conclusions reached at the meeting of the Peace Implementation Council in Florence, Italy, on 13 and 14 June 1996. It stresses the importance of the forthcoming elections in Bosnia and Herzegovina, to be carried out in accordance with the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the annexes thereto (collectively the "Peace Agreement"), which will allow for the establishment of the common institutions and which will be an important milestone for normalization in Bosnia and Herzegovina. It calls upon the parties to ensure the prompt functioning of these institutions after the elections. It supports the preparatory work done in this regard.

The Council expects the parties to increase their efforts towards the maintenance and further enhancement of conditions necessary to ensure democratic elections, as provided for in article I of annex 3 of the Peace Agreement, and to abide fully by the results of those elections. In that context, the Council stresses the importance of the agreement reached by the Bosniac and Bosnian Croat leaderships in Mostar and facilitated by the European Union Administration of Mostar that has at last secured Bosnian Croat participation in a unified city administration in Mostar on the basis of the election results of 30 June 1996. The Council expects the Bosniac and Bosnian Croat leaderships in Mostar to implement this agreement fully and without delay, and stresses that failure to do so would seriously undermine crucial efforts to ensure lasting peace and stability in Bosnia and Herzegovina. It expresses its full support for the international organizations that are currently working in Mostar and in particular for the European Union Administration of Mostar, and calls upon both leaderships to cooperate fully with the Administration. It calls upon the Government of the Republic of Croatia, which bears a special responsibility in this context, to continue to use its influence on the Bosnian Croat leadership to ensure full compliance with its obligations. The Council will continue to follow closely the situation in Mostar.

The Council underlines the fact that the continued lack of progress in transferring authority and resources to the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina is a potential danger for the peace implementation process. The Council calls upon the Federation partners to accelerate their efforts for the establishment of a fully functioning Federation, which is an essential prerequisite for peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

The Council notes with particular concern the conclusions of the High Representative, contained in his report on the implementation of the human rights provisions of the Peace Agreement, that the parties are not implementing their commitments in respect of human rights and that this failure is impeding the return of refugees. It condemns all acts of ethnic harassment. It calls upon the parties to the Peace Agreement to take immediately the measures identified in the report to stop the trend of ethnic separation in the country and in its capital, Sarajevo, and to preserve their multi-cultural and multi-ethnic heritage. The Council deeply regrets the undue delay in implementing measures regarding, inter alia, the development or creation of new independent media and the preservation of property rights, and calls upon each party to implement them immediately. The Council is ready to consider further reports by the Office of the High Representative on all aspects of the implementation of the Peace Agreement, including those mentioned above.

The Council stresses that, under the Peace Agreement, persons indicted by the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 who have failed to comply with an order to appear before the Tribunal may not stand as a candidate or hold any appointive, elective or other public office in the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina. Any continued holding of such an office is unacceptable. In this context, the Council notes the fact that, as a first step, Radovan Karadzic, after officially handing over his executive powers in the Republika Srpska on 30 June 1996, agreed on 19 July 1996 to cease definitively all political and official activities, thus facilitating the electoral process in Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Council expects this undertaking to be implemented fully and in good faith and will closely monitor further developments.

The Council stresses that all States and concerned parties have an obligation, in accordance with resolution 827 (1993) of 25 May 1993, other relevant resolutions and the Peace Agreement, to cooperate fully with the International Tribunal and to comply without exception with requests for assistance or orders issued by a Trial Chamber. The Council has considered the letter from the President of the International Tribunal dated 11 July 1996, which referred to the conclusion of a Trial Chamber of the Tribunal regarding the failure to execute the warrants of arrest issued against Radovan Karadzic and Ratko Mladic owing to the refusal of the Republika Srpska and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to cooperate with the Tribunal. It condemns this failure to execute these arrest warrants. The Council notes the recent visit by the delegation from the Republika Srpska to the International Tribunal in The Hague for the purpose of discussing all aspects of cooperation with the Tribunal, and expects that cooperation with the Tribunal to bring to justice all persons indicted will be realized. The Council condemns the failure to date of the Bosnian Croat leadership and the Croatian Government to comply with the orders of the International Tribunal regarding several persons indicted for war crimes. The Council demands the full cooperation of all parties concerned in the immediate execution of all arrest warrants and the transfer to the International Tribunal of all persons indicted, in accordance with article 29 of the statute of the Tribunal. The Council further condemns any attempt to challenge the authority of the International Tribunal. The Council underlines the importance of the obligations undertaken by the parties to the Peace Agreement to cooperate fully with the International Tribunal and stresses that failure to arrest and transfer persons indicted by the Tribunal is a violation of these obligations. The Council stresses that compliance with the requests and orders of the International Tribunal constitutes an essential aspect of implementing the Peace Agreement, as provided by previous resolutions; the Council is ready to consider the application of economic enforcement measures to ensure compliance by all parties with their obligations under the Peace Agreement.

The Council condemns any threat or act of violence directed against international personnel in Bosnia and Herzegovina, in particular those directed against personnel belonging to the United Nations International Police Task Force on the territory of the Republika Srpska. It condemns also the obstacles put in the way of forensic investigations carried out by international organizations on the territory of the Republika Srpska as well as on the territory of the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina. It calls upon all parties to lift those obstacles and to ensure full freedom of movement and safety for all international personnel.

The Council reiterates its full support for the High Representative and for all international organizations currently working in Bosnia and Herzegovina for the implementation of the Peace Agreement. The Council stands ready to consider the need for further action in order to continue and consolidate the efforts made for full implementation of the Peace Agreement. The Council welcomes all initiatives which will lead to a greater degree of stability and cooperation in the whole region.

Decision of 10 October 1996 (3701st meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3701st meeting, held on 10 October 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Honduras), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 8 October 1996 from the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina addressed to the President of the Security Council, which referred to reports that a Presidential statement was being considered by the Security Council with regard to human rights abuses in Srebrenica, Zepa, Banja Luka and Sanski and noted that, since there had not been an appropriate response to the Council's demands in its Presidential statement of 8 August 1996, the Council was now obliged to adopt measures that demanded justice and a durable peace.¹²⁰

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹²¹

The Security Council has considered, in the light of its resolution 1034 (1995) of 21 December 1995, the current situation with regard to the investigation of violations of international humanitarian law in the areas of Srebrenica, Zepa, Banja Luka and Sanski Most as well as in the areas of Glamoc, Ozren and elsewhere throughout the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

The Council recalls the report of the Secretary-General of 27 November 1995.

The Council expresses deep concern about the very little progress achieved so far in these investigations and strongly appeals to all the parties of Bosnia and Herzegovina to make every effort to identify the fate of the missing persons, both for humanitarian and legal purposes.

The Council is concerned that endeavours by the relevant international authorities to identify the fate of the missing by, inter alia, carrying out exhumations have met with limited success largely owing to obstruction by the Republika Srpska. It notes with concern that the fate of only a few hundred missing persons has been established so far.

The Council welcomes the recent visit by the delegation from the Republika Srpska to the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991, in The Hague, and expresses the hope that this visit marks a turning point in relations between the Republika Srpska and the International Tribunal and will facilitate cooperation with regard to investigations conducted by personnel of the Tribunal.

The Council condemns all attempts to obstruct the investigations or to destroy, alter, conceal or damage any related evidence. The Council stresses again the obligations of all the parties to cooperate fully and unconditionally with the relevant international authorities and among themselves with respect to such investigations and reminds the parties of their commitment under the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the annexes thereto (collectively the "Peace Agreement").

The Council reaffirms that the violations of international humanitarian law throughout the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina as described in resolution 1034 (1995) must be fully and properly investigated. The Council reiterates that all States and concerned parties have an obligation, in accordance with resolution 827 (1993) of 25 May 1993, other relevant resolutions and the Peace Agreement, to cooperate fully with the International Tribunal and to comply without exception with requests for assistance or orders issued by a Trial Chamber. The Council expresses again its support for the endeavours of the international agencies and authorities involved in these investigations and invites them to pursue and intensify their efforts. It encourages Member States to continue to provide the necessary financial and other support.

The Council will continue to follow this issue closely. It requests the Secretary-General to keep it regularly informed on progress reached in the investigation of the violations of international humanitarian law referred to in the report mentioned above.

Decision of 12 December 1996 (3723rd meeting): resolution 1088 (1996)

On 9 December 1996, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1035 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the activities of the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina and his recommendations for the future of the United Nations involvement in Bosnia and Herzegovina, based on the recommendations of the London Peace Implementation Conference.¹²² In his report, the Secretary-General observed that, while satisfaction could be drawn from the status of the implementation of the Peace Agreement, much remained to be done, particularly regarding those aspects of the Peace Agreement which would bind together the communities in the country. Noting that much attention at the London Conference had been devoted to the need to ensure that the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia did its work, he called upon all States to detain indicted war criminals and turn them over to the Tribunal, and reiterated that a failure to do so constituted a violation of obligations under international law. On the basis of the requests made by the Peace Implementation Council and his own assessment, he recommended that the Security Council extend the mandate of UNMIBH for another year, until 21 December 1997. He further recommended that the International Police Task Force in Bosnia and Herzegovina have the task of investigating allegations of human rights abuses by police officers or other law enforcement officials of the various authorities of Bosnia and Herzegovina added to its mandate. He noted that if a modest increase in the strength of the Force was needed for that purpose, he would seek approval of the Council at the appropriate time.

By a letter dated 21 November 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹²³ the Secretary-General transmitted a letter dated 20 November from the High Representative for the implementation of the peace agreement on Bosnia and Herzegovina containing the conclusions of the Ministerial Steering Board and of the Presidency of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

By a letter dated 5 December 1996 addressed to the Secretary-General,¹²⁴ the representative of the United Kingdom transmitted the conclusions of the London Peace Implementation Conference on Bosnia and Herzegovina, held from 4 to 5 December 1996.

At its 3723rd meeting, held on 12 December 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General and the letters in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Italy), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Canada, the Czech Republic, Ireland, Malaysia, Norway, Turkey and Ukraine, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by France, Germany, Italy, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States.¹²⁵ The President further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 9 December 1996 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹²⁶ conveying the communication from the High Representative for the implementation of the peace agreement on Bosnia and Herzegovina.

At the same meeting, the President also drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 9 December 1996 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹²⁷ conveying the exchange of letters between the Secretary-General of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the parties to the Dayton Peace Accords concerning the agreement that had been reached for a follow-up force to IFOR, which was to be called the Stabilization Force (SFOR), and be organized and led by NATO.

The representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina emphasized that he was there to represent all of Bosnia and Herzegovina and the Presidency of Bosnia and Herzegovina as a whole and that the Dayton/Paris Peace Agreement was still the foundation of the peace process. While expressing general satisfaction with the draft resolution, he highlighted several issues. First, although the economic recovery and reconstruction had moved forward, the general and explicit promises of assistance had remained too frequently unrealized. At the same time, at least some members of the Presidency of Bosnia and Herzegovina were in favour of assistance being conditioned on fulfillment of the obligations contained in the Peace Agreement. Second, while progress was being made in the establishment of the new institutions of the central Government of Bosnia and Herzegovina as well as the accommodation of the old institutions, less progress had been achieved on the elements of the Peace Agreement that constituted the reintegration of the country and the real basis for real peace. Third, he reiterated support for the call under the terms of the Dayton/Paris Agreement for regional arms control and military stabilization. He expressed the belief that this was a cornerstone for peace and security in the region. Effective inspections were essential and public reporting of compliance or non-compliance was absolutely determinative under the terms of the Peace Agreement. Fourth, he welcomed the continuing role of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) in supervising the forthcoming municipal elections in Bosnia and Herzegovina. Fifth, he mentioned an issue where there did not seem to be consensus between all the authorities in Bosnia and Herzegovina. This was the call for full cooperation and compliance with the International Criminal Tribunal and its orders, which had been made in the draft resolution, the Peace Agreement and numerous other resolutions and statements of the Security Council. He emphasized that the legal and constitutional requirement for compliance with the Tribunal applied to all equally, and that the central Government had already acted in full consistency with the principle by surrendering to the Tribunal all indicted persons who were under the control of his country's authorities, regardless of whether they were Serbs, Croats or Bosnian Muslims.¹²⁸

The representative of Ireland spoke on behalf of the European Union and the associated and aligned countries.¹²⁹ He noted that the draft resolution was a reaffirmation by the international community that it was willing to support the consolidation of peace and democracy in Bosnia and Herzegovina by continuing to provide the necessary stable and secure environment within which the important objectives of the Peace Agreement could be reached. He stressed that it had to be clearly understood that, without the fullest commitment from the authorities of Bosnia and Herzegovina to meeting their obligations under the Peace Agreement, the European Union would have to reconsider the scope of its engagement in the peace process. Noting that the European Union would continue to closely monitor the progress being made and would react, as appropriate, whenever commitments were not being met, he stressed the particular importance of effective action in the following areas: full respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms; marked progress in establishing freedom of movement and communication between the entities; the elimination of obstacles to the early, phased, safe and orderly return of refugees and displaced persons to their homes; full compliance by the authorities in Bosnia and Herzegovina and other States with the orders of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia; full respect for freedom of expression, including a free and independent media; and the successful holding of municipal elections by summer 1997 under the supervision of OSCE.¹³⁰

The representative of China stated that, although his delegation would vote in favour of the draft resolution, he wished to make three points. First, the deployment of the Stabilization Force was an important, major operation following the Implementation Force, and it should accept the political leadership of the Security Council and report on schedule to the Council on the performance of its tasks. Second, China had reservations with regard to the draft resolution's invocation of Chapter VII of the Charter, regarding the authorization of enforcement measures and the use of force. It was his delegation's view that SFOR had to maintain strict neutrality and fairness and could not misuse force and that, in its operations, it should steadfastly promote peace and stability in Bosnia and Herzegovina. Third, he stated that it was the understanding of the Security Council that the paragraphs of the draft resolution that invoked Chapter VII of the Charter did not apply to part III.¹³¹

¹³¹ Ibid., pp. 14-15.

Speaking before the vote, the representative of the United States stated that his country firmly supported the extension of the mandate of the International Police Task Force on Bosnia and Herzegovina and urged the parties to abide by the Task Force-promulgated internationally accepted principle of policing in a democratic state. He reiterated that all States and parties must cooperate fully with the Tribunal. Noting that SFOR would continue to have the authority to detain indictees when it encountered them, he stated that all States and parties should recognize that there would be consequences for non-cooperation. He also called on the parties to honour commitments that would allow freedom of movement to all, including refugees and displaced persons.¹³²

The representative of Egypt stated that the principle of conditionality in the draft resolution, which linked the availability of international financial assistance and the degree to which all the authorities in Bosnia and Herzegovina implemented the Peace Agreement, including cooperation with the Tribunal and the Action Plan approved by the London Conference, must be implemented so as to differentiate between those who cooperated and those who did not.¹³³

The representative of France stated that his delegation would support the draft resolution and mentioned four main points of agreement between the international community and the authorities of Bosnia and Herzegovina on how to approach the next two years. These were: first, the commitment of all the authorities to participate without reservation in the establishment of a democratic Bosnian State, and second, the obligation to cooperate without reservation with the Tribunal. The other two were the reaffirmation and strengthening of the substantial role of the High Representative whose centrality in the effective implementation of the peace agreement had been confirmed by the experience of the past year; and the more active mandate for the Task Force, although the primary responsibility for progress would once again fall on the Bosnian parties.¹³⁴

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that underlying the approach set out in the Action Plan

was the principle that responsibility for promoting reconciliation lay with the authorities in Bosnia and Herzegovina. He stressed that the international community's willingness to help them would inevitably depend on the degree to which those authorities shouldered that responsibility. He also noted that one key area in this respect was compliance with the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia.¹³⁵

The representative of the Russian Federation reiterated that the clear primary responsibility for the successful development of the peace process lay with the Bosnians themselves, and their level of cooperation in the implementation of the Peace Agreement would largely determine the degree of involvement of the international community in the process of reconstruction of Bosnia and Herzegovina. He maintained that the experience of the first year of international efforts in support of the Peace Agreement was convincing testimony to the fact that success was possible only on the basis of an impartial approach. Everything had to be equal: the support for the recovery of various regions in Bosnia and Herzegovina and, if necessary, the punishment, including the refusal of economic assistance or the adoption of other measures, for failure to carry out obligations assumed under the Peace Agreement. The draft resolution clearly laid down the principle of equal treatment of the parties. That also applied to the issue of cooperation with the Tribunal, which, as the draft resolution emphasized, was to carry out its responsibilities for dispensing justice impartially. He stressed that the Tribunal should not be used as a political instrument. In his view, success in the incipient stage of the "Bosnian settlement" and in the work of SFOR was guaranteed by the fact that the key parameters, including measures of influence, were supported by all members of the Presidency of Bosnia and Herzegovina and by the leadership of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, as reflected in the Security Council resolution.¹³⁶

Several other speakers spoke both before and after the vote, welcoming the authorization of SFOR, the subregional arms control agreements and the Peace Implementation Conference and other efforts; calling on all parties to cooperate fully with the Tribunal and to facilitate freedom of movement and the return of refugees and displaced people; and noting the urgency of economic development. A number of speakers also mentioned the importance of a free media while other speakers noted the importance of economic restoration and the problems of mine clearance.¹³⁷

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1088 (1996), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous relevant resolutions concerning the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia, including resolutions 1031 (1995) of 15 December 1995 and 1035 (1995) of 21 December 1995,

Welcoming further the progress in the implementation of the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the annexes thereto (collectively the "Peace Agreement", and expressing its appreciation to the High Representative, the Commander and personnel of the multinational Implementation Force, and the personnel of other international organizations and agencies in Bosnia and Herzegovina for their contributions to the implementation of the Peace Agreement,

Noting with satisfaction the holding of the elections called for in annex 3 of the Peace Agreement, and welcoming the progress in establishing the common institutions in accordance

Decision of 14 February 1997 (3740th meeting): statement by the President

By a letter dated 14 February 1997 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹³⁸ the Secretary-General transmitted a communication dated 14 February 1997 from the High Representative, enclosing the decision adopted in Rome on 14 February 1997 by the Arbitral Tribunal for the dispute over the inter-entity boundary in the Brcko area.

At its 3740th meeting, held on 14 February 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Kenya), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina, at her request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹³⁹

The Security Council notes the announcement of the decision of 14 February 1997 by the arbitral tribunal on the disputed portion of the Inter-Entity Boundary Line in the Brcko area, pursuant to article V of annex 2 to the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

The Council reminds the parties to annex 2 to the General Framework Agreement of their obligation to be bound by the decision of the arbitral tribunal and to implement the decision without delay. The Council underscores the importance of prompt and full cooperation by the parties to the General Framework Agreement and the annexes thereto (collectively the "Peace Agreement") in carrying out their commitments to implement the Peace Agreement in its entirety.

Decision of 11 March 1997 (3749th meeting):
statement by the President

By a letter dated 7 March 1997 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁴⁰ the Secretary-General transmitted the executive summary and key findings of the report prepared by the Task Force pursuant to the decisions on Mostar of 12 February 1997. The report covered an incident on 10 February 1997 when police officers fired into a procession marching towards a cemetery.

By another letter dated 7 March 1997 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁴¹ the Secretary-General transmitted a communication dated 7 March 1997 from the Principal Deputy High Representative for the Implementation of the Peace Agreement on Bosnia and Herzegovina. The letter, referring to the deliberations of the Security Council on the situation in Mostar, attached the following documents: (a) the text of the decisions from the meeting of 12 February 1997, in which the participants¹⁴² condemned in strongest terms the violent acts committed in Mostar and all provocative acts preceding the present crisis; and (b) a copy of the letter from the Principal Deputy High Representative addressed to the Chair of the Presidency of Bosnia and Herzegovina and the Member of the Presidency, Mr. Kresimir Zubak, of 24 February 1997.

At its 3749th meeting, held on 11 March 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letters in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Poland), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina, at her request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to letters dated 17 February and 3 March 1997, respectively, from the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting decisions on Mostar adopted by officials of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and an advance copy of the report of the Task Force in pursuance of the 12 February decisions on Mostar.¹⁴³

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁴⁴

The Security Council has considered the letter dated 7 March 1997, and the annex thereto, from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council concerning the incident on 10 February 1997 involving a violent assault against a group of civilians attempting to visit a graveyard in West Mostar in the presence of the International Police Task Force, in which one person died and others were wounded.

The Council notes that the participants in the meeting of 12 February 1997 referred to in the letter from the Secretary-General agreed, inter alia, to request the International Police Task Force to conduct an investigation into that incident, to accept and endorse the report on the investigation in full, and to draw the necessary conclusions concerning the arrest, the bringing to trial and dismissal from office of those found responsible for instigating or participating in violent acts.

Tomic, Foreign Minister Prlic, Croatian Democratic Union of Bosnia and Herzegovina (HDZ) President Rajic, Democratic Action Party (SDA) Vice-President and Prime Minister Bicakcic, and the Mayor and Deputy Mayor of Mostar. The meeting was chaired by the Principal Deputy High Representative. The Commander of SFOR, the Acting Police Commissioner and the Head of the Office of the High Representative South were also present.

The Council fully supports the conclusions drawn from the International Police Task Force report by the Office of the High Representative and fully supported by the Task Force, the Commander of the Stabilization Force in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the members of the Contact Group.

The Council strongly condemns the involvement by West Mostar police officers in the violent assault on 10 February 1997 as referred to in the International Police Task Force report annexed to the letter dated 7 March 1997 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council.

The Council also condemns the failure of the local police to provide protection to civilians subject to inter-ethnic attacks which occurred throughout Mostar both before and after the incident on 10 February 1997, and stresses the importance it attaches to preventing such incidents in the future.

The Council takes note of the announced suspension of some of the police officers identified in the International Police Task Force report but remains deeply concerned by the failure to date of the responsible authorities to take all the necessary steps to implement the conclusions drawn from that report. It strongly condemns attempts by those authorities to place conditions upon the arrest and prosecution of the police officers identified in the International Police Task Force report as having fired upon the group of civilians.

The Council demands that the responsible authorities, notably in West Mostar, immediately implement the conclusions drawn from the International Police Task Force report and, in particular, suspend all relevant police officers and arrest and prosecute them without further delay. It also calls upon the responsible authorities to investigate all police officers involved in the incident.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to keep it informed of the situation. It will remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 31 March 1997 (3760th meeting):
resolution 1103 (1997)

On 14 March 1997, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1088 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the activities of the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina.¹⁴⁵ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that the Stabilization Force, which had succeeded the Implementation Force, was the principal guarantor of the fragile peace that existed in Bosnia and Herzegovina. He also stated that there were two principal threats to that fragile peace: one was the continued friction between the Federation partners and the other the friction between the entities within the joint institutions. While admirable progress had been achieved in some areas, particularly in the establishment of joint institutions in accordance with the Constitution of Bosnia and Herzegovina, progress in others remained dangerously slow. In the area of cooperation with the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, four of the five signatories to annex 1A of the Peace Agreement had yet to comply with their basic undertakings in the Agreement. He informed the Council that the Brcko Implementation Conference had proposed that the Task Force carry out monitoring, restructuring and retraining police in the Brcko area. In addition, the Security Council had endorsed, in resolution 1088 (1996), additional human rights investigation tasks for the Task Force, and the Task Force Commissioner had determined that these tasks required the force to be strengthened by 120 police personnel. He therefore recommended that the Council approve the proposed increase in the authorized strength of UNMIBH by 186 police and 11 civilian personnel as well as 120 police personnel for human rights investigations. He cautioned that the role proposed for the Task Force in the Brcko area would need to be performed in close cooperation with SFOR.

At its 3760th meeting, held on 31 March 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Poland), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁴⁶ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1103 (1997), which reads:

¹⁴⁶ S/1997/263.

¹⁴⁵ S/1997/224 and Add. 1.

The Security Council,

Taking note of the decision of 14 February 1997 by the arbitral tribunal on the disputed portion of the Inter-Entity Boundary Line in the Brcko area and noting the holding of the Brcko Implementation Conference in Vienna on 7 March 1997,

Reminding all parties to annex 2 of the Peace Agreement of their obligation, in accordance with article V of that annex, to be bound by the decision of the arbitral tribunal and to implement it without delay,

Expressing its appreciation to the personnel of the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina, including those of the International Police Task Force, for their work in assisting in the implementation of the Peace Agreement in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and to all other personnel of the international community engaged in implementing the Peace Agreement,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 14 March 1997,

2. Acknowledges the importance of ensuring that the International Police Task Force is able to carry out all the tasks with which it has been entrusted, in particular those tasks set out in the conclusions of the London Conference and agreed upon by the authorities in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and decides to consider expeditiously the recommendations of the Secretary-General concerning those tasks, contained in his report of 14 March 1997;

Decision of 16 May 1997 (3776th meeting):

By a letter dated 5 May 1997 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁴⁷ the Secretary-General transmitted the executive summary and the conclusions of a report entitled "Mostar: human rights and security situation, 1 January-15 February 1997", prepared by the Task Force. He also informed the Council of the follow-up to the 10 February incident, and noted that, while no further action by the responsible authorities to implement the demands contained in the statement by the President of 11 March 1997 had been taken, the general situation had improved. He also noted that, in resolution 1103 (1997) of 31 March 1997, the Council had acknowledged the importance of ensuring that the Task Force was able to carry out all the tasks with which it had been entrusted, including its investigation into the 10 February 1997 incident. He reiterated his recommendation for an increase in Task Force strength by 120 personnel and expressed the hope that the Security Council would respond positively to it.

On 14 March 1997, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report pursuant to paragraph 28 of resolution 1088 (1996), summarizing the activities of the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina since the previous report and providing an updated view of the activities of the United Nations system in Bosnia and Herzegovina during the same period.¹⁴⁸

Decision of 18 and 19 December 1997
(3842nd meeting and resumption): resolution
1144 (1997)

On 10 December 1997, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1088 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the activities of the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina.¹⁵² In his report, the Secretary-General stated that there had been progress towards implementing the General Framework Agreement in areas of concern to the UNMIBH operation, including the inauguration of joint Bosnian-Croat police forces in the two mixed cantons of the Federation; the initiation of a comprehensive police restructuring programme in the Republika Srpska; and the appointment of a multi-ethnic police leadership in the contested city of Brcko. He cautioned that the progress was in its early stages and fragile and would require the Mission's continued engagement in developing the capacity for policing according to internationally acceptable standards. He also stressed that police restructuring had to be accompanied by reform of the judicial system in general. He informed the Council that he had suggested to the High Representative and the members of the Steering Board of the Peace Implementation Council that UNMIBH work with the Council of Europe, OSCE and other organizations to expand its operations to ensure that international efforts to reform the judicial and penal systems advanced in tandem with efforts aimed at reforming the local police forces. Another area that deserved increased attention was the loss of revenue to the State through economic crimes that benefited mainly forces opposed to the peace process. He stated that, in order to carry out the tasks related to judicial reform and economic crime, UNMIBH would require an increase in human and financial resources. Finally, the Secretary-General recommended an extension of the UNMIBH mandate for a further 12-month period, although he noted that the presence of International Police Task Force monitors was contingent on the existence of adequate security arrangements, which could only be secured by a credible international military force.

At its 3842nd meeting, held on 18 December 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included

the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Costa Rica), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Argentina, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Canada, Croatia, Germany, Hungary, Italy, Luxembourg, Malaysia, Norway, Pakistan, Slovenia, Turkey and Ukraine, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 12 December 1997 from the Secretary-General, addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁵³ transmitting a letter dated 10 December 1997 from the Secretary-General of NATO addressed to the Secretary-General, enclosing the eleventh monthly report on Stabilization Force operations. The President further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 15 December 1997 from the representative of Germany, addressed to the Secretary-General, transmitting the conclusions of the Peace Implementation Conference on Bosnia and Herzegovina held on 9 and 10 December 1997.¹⁵⁴ The Council also had before it a draft resolution submitted by France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Portugal, the Russian Federation, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States.¹⁵⁵

At the same meeting, the representative of China expressed support for the work of the United Nations carried out in accordance with the provisions of the Peace Agreement. In his view, UNMIBH ought to principally carry out tasks mandated by the Peace Agreement. He also observed that issues relating to judicial reform and economic matters involved sensitive and complex questions and high stakes. Therefore, the United Nations should proceed with caution in that respect. Noting that the countries contributing troops to SFOR were reviewing its future mandate, he expressed hope that those countries would report to the Security Council in a timely fashion on their thoughts about the future. He also expressed hope that any actions taken by SFOR would be conducive to continued stability in Bosnia and Herzegovina.¹⁵⁶

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that, while negative trends had been kept in check by the presence of multinational forces, his delegation reaffirmed its resolute rejection of attempts at an arbitrary, unilateral interpretation of the mandate of existing international structures, which was leading to a build-up of elements of military force in the arsenal of peacekeeping efforts in Bosnia and Herzegovina. He noted that sub-units of SFOR had carried out a pre-planned operation to forcibly detain individuals indicted by the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, and had thereby gone beyond the mandate of SFOR that had been approved by the Security Council, which ruled out such acts of force targeted at individuals. He also expressed concern that the High Representative, who was ultimately responsible for respect for the civilian aspects of the Agreement, was informed of the arrest only after the fact. He underlined that the Russian Federation frowned on any unilateral actions that might threaten the lives of the peacekeepers or jeopardize the entire process of a settlement in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and stressed that they did not intend to take responsibility for such actions. Still, the United Nations was making a real contribution to the Bosnian settlement, and his Government supported the further continuation of the activities of the United Nations Mission and the Task Force in the framework of the current mandate.¹⁵⁷

The representative of the United Kingdom welcomed the latest action by SFOR, acting under the authority contained in the relevant Security Council resolutions, to detain two Bosnian Croats indicted for war crimes. He called on other war crimes indictees to surrender themselves, and on all parties to the Peace Agreement to fully comply with their commitment to transfer those indicted for war crimes to The Hague. His country welcomed the readiness to use SFOR directly to support civilian implementation and noted that NATO was examining possible options for a follow-on force to succeed SFOR when its mandate expired in June 1998. He believed that the extension of the mandate of the Task Force for six months, on a renewable basis to bring it in line with the mandate of SFOR, was strategically coherent while offering the best way of meeting operational requirements.¹⁵⁸

The representative of France urged that all indicted persons be handed over to the Tribunal, and reiterated that the primary responsibility for handing over the war criminals being sought fell on the parties. He stressed that, as recently confirmed by the Secretary-General of NATO, all of the allies and the countries participating in SFOR shared the same resolve to ensure that indicted war criminals were brought to justice. The arrest in central Bosnia of two indicted persons had been an example. That was a joint effort under a single chain of command and in accordance with identical rules of engagement. He underlined that the policy followed in that domain was decided by the Council of NATO.¹⁵⁹

The representative of Egypt stated that progress made recently in implementation of the Agreement was closely linked to the efforts made to deal with and settle the question of war crimes. He noted that despite the difficulty of dealing with the problem, the fact that SFOR had apprehended one of the indicted war criminals on 10 July 1997 and two Croatian war criminals the previous day had proved that SFOR was indeed capable of dealing with the question. He stressed that the peace process in Bosnia would not continuously progress without the apprehension of those indictees, and that the reconciliation process would not succeed without them being tried. He stated that the Security Council bore a historic responsibility to mandate SFOR, and any successor force, to pursue the war criminals and bring them to trial. Regarding the Agreement on Subregional Arms Control, he noted that Republika Srpska continued to refuse to make the deep cuts necessary to comply with the Agreement. He maintained that the Security Council bore a special responsibility for the implementation of that part of the Dayton Agreement, not only to prevent the eruption of conflict in the future, but also within the context of exercising its responsibility under the Charter for the regulation of armaments. Finally, he stressed that the reconstruction efforts had to be linked to the responsiveness of the parties to the political efforts being made. This view was shared by all the States members of the Organization of the Islamic Conference Contact Group on Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Contact Group felt it was extremely important that the role of the Security Council in Bosnia and Herzegovina not be confined to the Mission and the Task Force, and that it was imperative that the Security Council set a number of guidelines to address the aforementioned problems in coordination with the Peace

Implementation Council in Bosnia, and assign a larger role to SFOR and its successor, in order to create a unified and multi-ethnic State.¹⁶⁰

The representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina stated that, while the United Nations had not failed in Bosnia and Herzegovina, it had not yet succeeded either. He welcomed the extension of the mandate of the multilateral force led by NATO beyond the deadline of the summer of 1998, although he emphasized that the military aspects of implementation would prove to be rather hollow without a coordinated and revitalized effort on the civilian aspect of implementation. He expressed concern about the lack of respect shown to the Tribunal and the political consequences thereof. He underlined that the Tribunal was enshrined in the Constitution of Bosnia and Herzegovina as the highest authority in the country, and had jurisdiction over all potential witnesses and suspects related to war crimes and genocide that might have been committed in Bosnia and Herzegovina and in the former Yugoslavia as a whole. In that regard, he emphasized his delegation's concern regarding the large number of States that still had not adopted domestic legislation in line with full cooperation with the Tribunal.¹⁶¹

The representative of Croatia emphasized that his Government assigned special significance to the Tribunal and its work and that his country did not condition its cooperation with the Tribunal upon the reciprocal cooperation of any other country or entity. Observing that the limited capabilities of Tribunal meant that it could only carry out its work in a selective manner, he therefore added that discretion in deciding which crimes and perpetrators to pursue carried significant weight. Croatia could not be wholly satisfied with the exercise of the discretion to date as international sources had estimated that Bosnian Croats and Muslims were responsible for about 10 per cent of all the crimes committed in Bosnia and Herzegovina during the conflict, while Bosnian Serbs were responsible for 90 per cent. Yet, Bosnian Croats represented 73 per cent of those in custody. Regarding the recent arrest of two Bosnian Croats, he stressed that, while the arrests were based on international law and were within the scope of the mandate of SFOR, they had brought to an even higher level the already existing disproportionality of Croat detainees. He stressed that it was essential for the peace process that the Tribunal in its future work better reflect the level of involvement and degree of responsibility of the different sides of the conflict.

Several other speakers underlined the role of the United Nations in the establishment of lasting peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina and stressed, in that regard, that the Dayton Peace Agreement needed to be implemented in full. A number of speakers called on the parties in Bosnia to cooperate fully in the peace process and highlighted, in particular, the importance of issues such as the return of refugees and displaced persons, freedom of movement, establishment of the rule of law, respect for and protection of human rights, the conduct of free and fair elections, economic reconstruction and effective functioning of common institutions and cooperation with the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia. Several speakers also highlighted the role of the Task Force as a key factor in the implementation of the civilian aspects of the Peace Agreement. Some also stressed the need for adequate security arrangements to be established after the end of the mandate of SFOR.¹⁶²

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1144 (1997), which reads as follows:

Expressing its appreciation to the personnel of the Mission, and commending the leadership and dedication of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and the Commissioner of the International Police Task Force in their efforts to support the implementation of the Peace Agreement,

Noting that the presence of International Police Task Force monitors is contingent on the existence of adequate security arrangements which, at present, can only be secured by a credible international military force,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina, which includes the International Police Task Force, for an additional period terminating on 21 June 1998, which will be renewed for a further period unless significant changes are made to the security arrangements as currently provided by the multinational Stabilization Force, and decides also that the Task Force shall continue to be entrusted with the tasks set out in annex 11 of the Peace Agreement, including the tasks referred to in the conclusions of the Peace Implementation Conference held in London on 4 and 5 December 1996 and of the Ministerial Meeting of the Steering Board of the Peace Implementation Council held in Sintra on 30 May 1997 and the Peace Implementation Conference held in Bonn on 9 and 10 December 1997, and agreed upon by the authorities in Bosnia and Herzegovina;

2. Expresses its support for the conclusions of the Bonn Conference, and encourages the Secretary-General to pursue implementation of its relevant recommendations, in particular on the restructuring of the International Police Task Force;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council informed regularly about the work of the International Police Task Force and, in particular, its progress in assisting the restructuring of law enforcement agencies; to report every three months on the implementation of the mandate of the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina as a whole; and to include in his first report a description of action taken to implement recommendations of the Bonn Conference on restructuring the Task Force, particularly the creation of specialized Task Force units to train Bosnian police to address more effectively key public security issues;

4. Reaffirms that the successful implementation of the tasks of the International Police Task Force rests on the quality, experience and professional skill of its personnel, and urges Member States, with the support of the Secretary-General, to ensure the provision of such qualified personnel;

5. Urges Member States to provide training, equipment and related assistance for local police forces in coordination with the International Police Task Force, recognizing that resources are critical to the success of the police reform efforts of the Task Force;

6. Calls upon all concerned to ensure the closest possible coordination among the Office of the High Representative, the multinational Stabilization Force, the Mission and the relevant civilian organizations and agencies in order to ensure the successful implementation of the Peace Agreement and the priority objectives of the civilian consolidation plans, as well as the security of the International Police Task Force;

7. Pays tribute to the victims of the helicopter crash of 17 September 1997 in Bosnia and Herzegovina, including members of the Office of the High Representative, the International Police Task Force and a bilateral assistance programme, for their sacrifice in advancing the peace process;

8. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States stated that, while his country was gratified by the improvements in cooperation with the International Criminal Tribunal by some parties, and strongly supported recent actions by SFOR, failure by other parties to cooperate could mean only continued isolation. He expressed strong support for the restructuring of the Task Force to provide maximum support to the most pressing civilian implementation needs. He also stated that it had become clear that continued progress in Bosnia necessitated a follow-on military force, led by NATO, after SFOR ended. He noted that his President had announced that the United States could take part in a security presence in Bosnia when SFOR withdrew. He agreed with the Secretary-General that the continued presence of a NATO-led peacekeeping force was closely linked to the future of the Task Force. It therefore made sense that the mandate of the Task Force be considered only when the details of what would follow SFOR became clearer, and therefore his delegation had supported a six-month extension of the mandate of UNMIBH. As the debate on an SFOR follow-on force moved ahead, he expected that the Task Force would assume as much responsibility for public security as it could, and noted that his delegation had made a number of suggestions to improve its performance under its current mandate. He noted that his country had not pressed for changes in the mandate of the Task Force in the context of the current renewal, but a prolongation of the status quo was not acceptable. He underlined that the United States had not foreclosed the option of changing the mandate in the future, if that would help to improve the effectiveness of the Task Force.¹⁶³

Decision of 19 March 1998 (3862nd meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3862nd meeting, held on 19 March 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Gambia), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina, at her request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 17 March 1998 from the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting the text of the Supplemental Award of the Arbitral Tribunal for the Dispute over the Inter-Entity Boundary in the Brčko Area, dated 15 March 1998.¹⁶⁴

At the same meeting the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council.¹⁶⁵

The Security Council welcomes the announcement of the decision on 15 March 1998 relating to Brcko by the arbitral tribunal pursuant to article V of annex 2 to the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina and to the award of 14 February 1997.

The Council, recalling that the 1997 award helped to promote the start of a peaceful, orderly and phased return process in Brcko and the beginnings of the establishment of a multi-ethnic administration, considers that the decision of 15 March 1998 represents the best interests of the peace process. The Council commends the efforts of the Presiding Arbitrator and of the International Supervisor for Brcko.

The Council calls upon the parties to annex 2 to the General Framework Agreement to implement the decision without delay, as they are obliged to do. The Council underscores the importance of prompt and full cooperation by the parties to the Agreement in carrying out their commitments to implement the Agreement in its entirety, including cooperation with the International Supervisor for Brcko and the Office of the High Representative.

Decision of 21 May 1998 (3883rd meeting):
resolution 1168 (1998)

On 12 March 1998, pursuant to paragraph 3 of Security Council resolution 1144 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the activities of the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina and on the steps taken to implement the recommendations of the meeting of the Peace Implementation Council held at Bonn on 9 and 10 December 1997.¹⁶⁶ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that further progress had been made towards the implementation of the mandate of UNMIBH and the tasks of the International Police Task Force. The Security Council, in its resolution 1144 (1997), had endorsed the conclusions of the Bonn meeting of the Peace Implementation Council, which had requested the Task Force to carry out new intensive training programmes for the local police in a number of specialized fields. He outlined his proposal on how to respond to the request of the Security Council and recommended that the Council approve the very modest increase in resources required. The Implementation Council had asked UNMIBH to take part in a major programme of legal reform under the coordination of the Office of the High Representative. The Secretary-General had also submitted a proposal for a programme of court monitoring by the Mission. He reiterated his conviction that police and judicial reforms had to be carried out in an integrated way and he therefore believed that the Security Council should approve the required increase in resources for the task.

At its 3883rd meeting, held on 21 May 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Kenya), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Germany and Italy, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Portugal, the Russian Federation, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States.¹⁶⁷ The President further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 9 April 1998 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting a letter dated 9 April 1998 from the High Representative for the implementation of the peace agreement on Bosnia and Herzegovina.¹⁶⁸

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1168 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous relevant resolutions concerning the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia, including resolutions 1031 (1995) of 15 December 1995, 1035 (1995) of 21 December 1995, 1088 (1996) of 12 December 1996, 1103 (1997) of 31 March 1997, 1107 (1997) of 16 May 1997 and 1144 (1997) of 19 December 1997,

Recalling the conclusions of the Ministerial Meeting of the Steering Board of the Peace Implementation Council held in Sintra, Portugal, on 30 May 1997 and the Peace Implementation Conference held in Bonn on 9 and 10 December 1997,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 12 March 1998, and taking note of his observations and the planning outlined in paragraphs 37 to 46 of that report,

Reaffirming its full support for the High Representative and his staff and his responsibility in implementing the civilian aspects of the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the Annexes thereto (collectively the "Peace Agreement"),

Commending the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina, including the International Police Task Force, and recalling the recommendations of the Bonn Peace

Implementation Conference relating to the Mission, including the Task Force,

Expressing its appreciation to the personnel of the Mission, including the International Police Task Force, and to the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and the Task Force Commissioner,

Emphasizing the increasing importance of specialized training for local police in Bosnia and Herzegovina, especially in the areas of critical incident management, corruption, organized crime and drug control, as outlined in the report of the Secretary-General,

Acknowledging that success in the area of police reform in Bosnia and Herzegovina is closely linked to complementary judicial reform, and taking note of the report of the High Representative of 9 April 1998, which emphasizes that judicial reform is a priority for further progress,

1. Decides to authorize an increase in the strength of the International Police Task Force by 30 posts, to a total authorized strength of 2,057;

2. Supports the improvements in the overall management of the International Police Task Force undertaken by the Secretary-General, his Special Representatives, and the Task Force Commissioners and personnel in Bosnia and Herzegovina, stresses the importance of continued reforms in this area, and in this regard strongly encourages the Secretary-General to make further improvements to the Task Force, in particular with regard to personnel management issues;

3. Encourages Member States to intensify their efforts to provide, on a voluntary funded basis and in coordination with the International Police Task Force, training, equipment and related assistance for local police forces in Bosnia and Herzegovina;

4. Recognizes that establishing an indigenous public security capability is essential to strengthening the rule of law in Bosnia and Herzegovina, agrees to consider expeditiously a court monitoring programme led by the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina as part of an overall programme of legal reform as outlined by the Office of the High Representative, and requests the Secretary-General to submit recommendations on the possibility of utilizing locally hired personnel as far as is practical and of voluntary funding;

5. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 15 June 1998 (3892nd meeting):
resolution 1174 (1998)

On 10 June 1998, pursuant to paragraph 3 of Security Council resolution 1144 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina.¹⁶⁹ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that UNMIBH was proceeding with its programme to restructure the police services in the Federation and the Republika Srpska, but progress in implementing the programme would depend upon the ability of all members of the international community to secure compliance of the parties with the commitments they made in the General Framework Agreement for Peace. He noted that the past three months had seen an increase in violent incidents aimed at returning refugees and displaced persons, in particular those belonging to minority groups. At the same time, resistance towards integrating minority officers into the police force had continued, especially in the Croat-controlled areas of the Republika Srpska. He stressed that, while UNMIBH would do anything in its power to further advance the restructuring of the local police forces in order to help create confidence for returning minorities, it would be overly optimistic to expect a decisive change before the nationwide elections scheduled for 13 September 1998. He noted that the role of the Task Force was also changing and that the Mission was now prepared to move forward with a programme to monitor and assess the court system. He told the Council that he had been informed by the Secretary-General of NATO that NATO military authorities had developed an operational plan for the continuation of a NATO-led multinational force in Bosnia and Herzegovina and that the plan had been endorsed by the Foreign Ministers of NATO. On the assumption that there would be no significant changes to the security arrangements as currently provided by SFOR, he recommended that the mandate of UNMIBH be extended for an additional period terminating on 21 June 1999.

At its 3892nd meeting, held on 15 June 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Portugal), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, Germany, Italy, Malaysia and Turkey, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by France, Germany, Italy, Japan,

Portugal, the Russian Federation, Slovenia, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States.¹⁷⁰

At the same meeting, the President further drew the attention of the Council to the following documents: a letter dated 5 June 1998 from the representative of Luxembourg addressed to the Secretary-General;¹⁷¹ a letter dated 10 June 1998 from the representative of Germany addressed to the Secretary-General;¹⁷² a letter dated 11 June 1998 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council;¹⁷³ and a letter dated 9 April 1998 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council.¹⁷⁴

The representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina stated that military, civilian and economic resources being committed to serve peace and rebuild Bosnia and Herzegovina, were having a gradual but steady positive impact. However, there was still an ongoing, organized criminal effort to keep the people from going back to their homes and to prevent the process of reconciliation and normalcy from taking hold, an assessment that was shared by the representative of SFOR, the Office of the High Representative and others. Regarding the situation in Kosovo,¹⁷⁵ he stated that those “who light the fuse” would try to sell their constructive engagement in one situation at the expense of another. He suggested that a leadership that preyed on its neighbours, on its own people and on its own stereotypes was to blame for the wars in Slovenia, Croatia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, and Kosovo. He also said that there was compelling evidence that weapons taken during attacks on United Nations forces in Bosnia were now being used in Kosovo against the Kosovo Albanians, which should be proof enough as to where the blame lay.¹⁷⁶

The representative of Croatia, recognizing the importance of the return process in the ongoing stabilization of the region, recalled that Croatia remained the only State in the region that had received a significant number of displaced persons from a group formerly affiliated with the rebel occupying forces. He stated that a consequence of a one-sided approach with regard to refugee returns had already been reflected in a loss of confidence in the Dayton Peace Agreement. In addition, despite recent positive developments in the theatre with the voluntary surrender or arrest by SFOR of some Serb indictees, Bosnia and Herzegovina Croats continued to make up the vast majority of imprisoned indictees, which did not nurture confidence in the international community.¹⁷⁷

The representative of Germany underlined that reform and restructuring of the local police would remain ineffective if not accompanied by similar efforts regarding the judicial system. In that context, the High Representative had pointed out that the International Police Task Force was best equipped to monitor criminal courts in Bosnia. The Security Council would urgently have to find a pragmatic solution which enabled the Task Force to begin the task, setting aside theological or budgetary disputes. He stressed that it was the Council's responsibility to make the international effort in Bosnia a coherent and therefore successful one, and not to be diverted by secondary questions regarding the philosophy of United Nations peacekeeping in general.¹⁷⁸

The representative of Albania stated that the extension of the mandate of the Stabilization Force in Bosnia and Herzegovina was a necessary step in the light of the situation in the Balkan area and the deepening of the crisis in the Kosovo region. That was why Albania was in favour not only of the extension of the mandate of SFOR, but also of energetic action by the international community to prevent a second tragedy like Bosnia from taking place in the Balkans. It was now time for the international community to be more united and determined to stop the "ethnic cleansing" in Kosovo and to find a peaceful and workable solution to calm the situation and to resolve the conflict in Kosovo. That action would strengthen the peace process in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the implementation of the Dayton Agreement, as well as peace and stability in the Balkan region.¹⁷⁹

The representative of the Russian Federation stressed that an extremely important area of international assistance continued to be the work of SFOR and the Mission, including the Task Force. He stated that an important guarantee for the success of SFOR and the Task Force was their strict compliance with the mandates established by the Security Council for those operations. His delegation was convinced that SFOR could not and should not assume any police functions whatsoever.¹⁸⁰

The representative of the United States stated that SFOR and UNMIBH had been critical to the implementation of the long-term process agreed by the parties in the Dayton/Paris accords. He stressed that much work remained and that NATO had adopted a series of benchmarks to measure progress in the overall implementation of the Peace Agreement. Meeting those benchmarks would permit progressive reductions in the size and profile of the Force. He reiterated that the primary responsibility for the implementation of the Peace Agreement rested with the parties themselves and stressed that efforts had to be redoubled to implement the Agreement. Cooperating fully with the Tribunal, the return of refugees and the strengthening of joint institutions were also key elements.¹⁸¹

The representative of China reiterated that China's reservations about the invocation of Chapter VII of the Charter and the authorization of the use of force contained in the draft resolution remained unchanged. He stated that in implementing the mandate set out by the Security Council, SFOR must not misuse force. Moreover, Chapter VII, as invoked in the draft resolution, was not applicable to the parts concerning the Mission and the Task Force.¹⁸²

A number of other speakers took the floor, noting that ultimately the responsibility for the establishment of lasting peace lay with the parties in Bosnia and Herzegovina themselves, and underscoring some of the key issues that needed to be addressed including the return of refugees, the effective functioning of common institutions, fostering free and fair media and greater cooperation with the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia. Several speakers emphasized the importance of the Task Force in monitoring the activities of the local police force and in its restructuring, and welcomed the expansion of the role of the Task Force in key public security matters. Some speakers also highlighted the role of SFOR in providing security not only to the citizens of Bosnia and Herzegovina, but also to the Mission, the Task Force and other international organizations.¹⁸³ A number of speakers also stressed that events in Kosovo were a cause for concern, and that the international community needed to be vigilant about the ramifications.¹⁸⁴

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1174 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous relevant resolutions concerning the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia, including resolutions 1031 (1995) of 15 December 1995, 1035 (1995) of 21 December 1995, 1088 (1996) of 12 December 1996, 1144 (1997) of 19 December 1997 and 1168 (1998) of 21 May 1998,

Emphasizing its appreciation to the High Representative, the Commander and personnel of the multinational Stabilization Force, the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and the personnel of the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina, including the Commissioner and personnel of the International Police Task Force, and the personnel of other international organizations and agencies in Bosnia and Herzegovina for their contributions to the implementation of the Peace Agreement,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter,

Decision of 16 July 1998 (3909th meeting): resolution 1184 (1998)

At its 3909th meeting, held on 16 July 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included two reports of the Secretary-General on UNMIBH dated 12 March and 10 June 1998, respectively, in its agenda.¹⁸⁵ Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Russian Federation), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Germany and Italy, at their request, to participate in the discussion, without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Portugal, the Russian Federation, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States.¹⁸⁶ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1184 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Decision of 18 June 1999 (4014th meeting):
resolution 1247 (1999)

On 11 June 1999, pursuant to paragraph 20 of Security Council resolution 1174 (1998), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the activities of UNMIBH.¹⁸⁷ In his report, the Secretary-General stated that the Mission contributed to the establishment of the rule of law in Bosnia and Herzegovina by reforming and restructuring the police, assessing the functioning of the existing judicial system and monitoring and auditing the performance of the police and other agencies involved in the maintenance of law and order. Despite progress, political developments in Bosnia and Herzegovina and in the wider region continued to challenge the establishment of the rule of law. The difficulties encountered in trying to establish self-sustaining political institutions throughout the country had forced the High Representative to use his authority creatively in support of the implementation of the General Framework Agreement. Continuing close cooperation of the Mission with the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), SFOR and the Office of the High Representative would be necessary to address impediments to a sustainable peace. He stressed that UNMIBH still had a considerable way to go before the peace process in Bosnia and Herzegovina became self-sustainable. He therefore recommended that the Security Council extend the mandate of the Mission for another period of 12 months.

At its 4014th meeting, held on 18 June 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Gambia), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Germany and Italy, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Canada, France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom, and the United States.¹⁸⁸

At the same meeting, the President further drew the attention of the Council to letters dated 7 and 8 March 1999, respectively, from the representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁸⁹ which forwarded a statement concerning the decision of the Arbitral Tribunal and a statement regarding the removal of the President of Republika Srpska from office by the High Representative; a letter dated 11 March 1999 from the representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia addressed to the Secretary-General,¹⁹⁰ transmitting a letter from the Minister for Foreign Affairs which conveyed disagreement with the decisions of the Arbitral Tribunal on Brcko and the decision of the High Representative to dismiss the President of Republika Srpska. The President also drew the attention of the Council to the following documents: a letter dated 9 March 1999 from the representative of Germany addressed to the Secretary-General;¹⁹¹ a letter dated 6 May 1999 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting a letter dated 5 May 1999 from the High Representative for the implementation of the peace agreement on Bosnia and Herzegovina addressed to the Secretary-General;¹⁹² and a letter dated 3 June 1999 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council.¹⁹³

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1247 (1999), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous relevant resolutions concerning the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia, including resolutions 1031 (1995) of 15 December 1995, 1035 (1995) of 21 December 1995, 1088 (1996) of 12 December 1996, 1144 (1997) of 19 December 1997, 1168 (1998) of 21 May 1998, 1174 (1998) of 15 June 1998 and 1184 (1998) of 16 July 1998,

Reaffirming its commitment to the political settlement of the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia, preserving the sovereignty and territorial integrity of all States there within their internationally recognized borders,

Emphasizing its appreciation to the High Representative, the Commander and personnel of the multinational Stabilization Force, the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and the personnel of the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina, including the Commissioner and personnel of the International Police Task Force, and the personnel of other international organizations and agencies in Bosnia and Herzegovina for their contributions to the implementation of the Peace Agreement,

Noting that the States in the region must play a constructive role in the successful development of the peace process in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and noting especially the obligations of the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in this regard as signatories to the Peace Agreement,

Emphasizing that a comprehensive and coordinated return of refugees and displaced persons throughout the region continues to be crucial to lasting peace,

Taking note of the declaration of the ministerial meeting of the Peace Implementation Council in Madrid on 16 December 1998 and the conclusions of its previous meetings,

Noting the reports of the High Representative, including his latest report of 5 May 1999,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 11 June 1999,

Deliberations of 15 November 1999 (4069th meeting)

At its 4069th meeting, held on 15 November 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council was briefed by the three members of the Presidency of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

In their briefings, the three members of the Presidency reaffirmed their commitment to the Dayton Agreement. They highlighted what had been achieved since the Agreement had been signed and what remained to be done. In that regard, they paid special tribute to the United Nations and the international community for the assistance provided. They drew attention to the New York Declaration, adopted by the members of the Presidency in New York on 14 November 1999, and highlighted some essential elements of the Declaration: the State border service; strengthening inter-entity cooperation; the question of returns into urban areas; strengthening of common institutions; the fight against corruption; promoting transparency; and establishing a central database for passports.

The Chair of the Presidency of Bosnia and Herzegovina stated that, while there had been real progress, there were many more tasks ahead, including: the issue of the functioning of joint institutions, implementing serious economic and social reforms, fighting terrorism, organized crime and corruption, as well as the return of refugees and displaced persons. He also stressed that the Presidency had two important laws before it in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the permanent election law and the law on the border service. He expressed the belief that the Tribunal was an essential element on the path to reconciliation. He urged the Council to insist on direct communication in all institutions, as opposed to the former practice of communication through the Council.¹⁹⁵

Mr. Alija Izetbegovic, Member of the Presidency, briefly addressed the list of issues and areas where the Security Council and the international community as a whole could assist: the return of refugees; the arrest and prosecution of war criminals; the rebuilding of Bosnia and Herzegovina and implementation of economic reform; the issue of corruption; the consensus decision-making process; demining; and security in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the region as a whole. He believed that Bosnia and Herzegovina could not feel secure in its future until the region as a whole moved forward economically and towards the necessary respect for democratic, human and minority rights.¹⁹⁶

Mr. Zivko Radisic, Member of the Presidency, expressed his belief that the Dayton Peace Accord had strong support in Republika Srpska from all of its citizens, political parties and State institutions. He noted that the military aspect of the Dayton Peace Accord had been implemented with enormous success, and without any incidents or resistance. Further, he expressed optimism for the goal of demilitarization of Bosnia and Herzegovina and the wider region, which could lead to the creation of conditions for a lasting peace and rapid economic development. He believed that the results achieved in the implementation of the Dayton Peace Accord would be even greater, if the norms and the spirit of Dayton were fully and consistently respected, noting that the arbitration decision on Brcko had infringed on the premise of the territorial integrity of the entities and caused crisis and dissatisfaction among the citizens of the Republika Srpska. Economic aid pledged by the international community had also been uneven, although he noted that the behaviour on the part of certain institutions of the Republika Srpska had also had an impact in that area.¹⁹⁷

All members of the Council welcomed the adoption of the New York Declaration as a clear statement by the Presidency that it was committed to removing the remaining obstacles to the full implementation of the Dayton Accord. They encouraged the Presidency to persevere in their tasks of rebuilding the country. In that connection, they called for more efforts towards reconciliation, institution building, the rule of law, economic reform and fighting corruption. They reaffirmed that the goal of the international community was to see a united, democratic and multi-ethnic Bosnia and Herzegovina. Several speakers also expressed support for the work of the Tribunal.¹⁹⁸

The representative of the United States stated that, despite progress, great problems and concerns remained, and he called on the Office of the High Representative to press for full implementation. He stated that his delegation did not believe that the High Representative had expanded his authority or that the Peace Implementation Council had expanded its authority beyond what was authorized in the Dayton Agreements. Finally he maintained that success in Kosovo and Bosnia and Herzegovina were equally important to the international community, and one could not be separated from the other in the long run. Bosnia and Herzegovina was years ahead of Kosovo on the timelines of history, but success in both would be required for stability in the region. He reiterated that the ultimate obstruction to this remained what it had been for the last nine years: “the leadership in Belgrade”.¹⁹⁹

The representative of France noted that, when speaking of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the example of Kosovo and the problems which the Council was confronting needed to be kept in mind. He also stated that increasingly Bosnia and Herzegovina would have to rely on its own resources to successfully carry out the needed reforms.²⁰⁰

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the New York Declaration did not address the fact that there were three de facto independent armies in Bosnia and Herzegovina, which was clearly not a normal situation and which did not help in the trend towards integration and towards strengthening a unified Bosnian State. He called for action on the development of a unified military doctrine for Bosnia and Herzegovina. He also expressed concern about the continued negative impact on the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina of the final arbitration award on Brcko. He underscored that it was important that the decisions be implemented in a way that would stabilize the situation to the greatest possible extent and that would be in accordance with the Peace Agreement, through identifying solution acceptable to all parties. Regarding the situation in Kosovo, he stated that his personal conclusions were not very encouraging as the safety and security of the population seemed to be increasingly under threat. He stated that more and more often the majority of such incidents reflected an organized policy aimed at expelling all non-Albanians from Kosovo, which was undermining resolution 1244 (1999). In his view, the Kosovo Force (KFOR) and the United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK) had been unable to eliminate provocations and activities intended to undermine resolution 1244 (1999), or guarantee the proper level of safety and security for all. However, he maintained that he could not agree with attempts to link decisions relating to Kosovo or Bosnia and Herzegovina with any questions that had nothing to do with issues under discussion, as that might be interpreted as interference in the internal affairs of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.²⁰¹

The representative of the United Kingdom stressed that the High Representative had to be given support in what he was doing, and be able to take the decisions that were necessary.²⁰²

The representative of China emphasized the necessity of establishing a unified armed force. He also expressed support for the work of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, which hopefully would proceed in a professional, impartial and objective manner.²⁰³

The representative of Slovenia maintained that the crisis in Kosovo had severely tested peace and stability in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and he commended all parties in Bosnia and Herzegovina for their responsible and wise attitude, which contributed to the preservation of stability in the country. The peace, stability and unity of Bosnia and Herzegovina were of critical importance for the resolution of other problems in the region, most notably the problem of Kosovo. Therefore, every effort needed to be made to strengthen Bosnia and Herzegovina and its institutions.²⁰⁴

D. International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia

Decision of 8 May 1996 (3663rd meeting): statement by the President

By a letter dated 24 April 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁰⁵ the President of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 informed the Council of the refusal of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to cooperate with the Tribunal, as required by resolutions of the Council and the Statute of the Tribunal. Specifically, the occasion for the report was the failure of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to execute arrest warrants against three accused, Mile Mrksic, Miroslav Radic and Veselin Sljivancanin, all of whom were on its territory and who were charged with the murder of 260 civilians and other unarmed men following the fall of the city of Vukovar in November 1991.

At its 3663rd meeting, held on 8 May 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letter in its agenda. The President (China) then drew the attention of the Council to the following documents: a letter dated 19 April 1996 from the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina addressed to the President of the Security Council;²⁰⁶ a letter dated 19 April 1996 from the representative of Croatia addressed to the President of the Security Council;²⁰⁷ and a letter dated 8 May 1996 from the representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia addressed to the President of the Security Council.²⁰⁸

At the same meeting the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁰⁹

The Security Council expresses its profound concern at recent instances of failure to cooperate with the International Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, established pursuant to resolution 827 (1993) of 25 May 1993, and in particular the failure of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to cooperate, described in the letter dated 24 April 1996 from the President of the Tribunal to the President of the Security Council.

The Council recalls its decision in resolution 827 (1993) that all States should cooperate fully with the International Tribunal and its organs in accordance with that resolution and the statute of the Tribunal and that consequently all States should take any measures necessary under their domestic law to implement the provisions of the resolution and the statute, including the obligation of States to comply with requests for assistance or orders issued by Trial Chamber under article 29 of the statute. The Council underlines the importance of these obligations, as well as the obligations undertaken by the parties to the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the annexes thereto (collectively the “Peace Agreement”) to cooperate fully with the International Tribunal.

The Council deploras the failure to date of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to execute the arrest warrants issued by the International Tribunal against the three individuals referred to in the letter dated 24 April 1996, and calls for the execution of those arrest warrants without delay.

The Council calls upon all States and others concerned to comply fully with their obligations with respect to cooperation with the International Tribunal, and in particular their obligation to execute arrest warrants transmitted to them by the Tribunal. It recalls its resolution 1022 (1995) of 22 November 1995 which it noted, inter alia, that compliance with the requests and orders of the Tribunal constituted an essential aspect of implementing the Peace Agreement. The Council calls upon all States which have not already done so to make provision in their domestic law enabling them to comply fully with their obligations with respect to cooperation with the Tribunal.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 8 April 1997 (3763rd meeting):
resolution 1104 (1997)

At its 3763rd meeting, held on 8 April 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the item “Establishment of the list of candidates for Judges” in its agenda.

At the same meeting, the President (China) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council’s prior consultations.²¹⁰ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1104 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Decision of 27 August 1997 (3813th meeting):
resolution 1126 (1997)

By a letter dated 30 July 1997 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²¹¹ the Secretary-General informed him that the President of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia had requested an extension of the terms of office of the non-elected judges of the Tribunal in order to allow them to dispose of ongoing cases.

At its 3813th meeting, held on 27 August 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letter in its agenda.

At the same meeting, the President (United Kingdom) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of its prior consultations.²¹² The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1126 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Taking note of the letter dated 30 July 1997 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council, to which was annexed the letter to him dated 18 June 1997 from the President of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the former Yugoslavia,

Endorses the recommendation of the Secretary-General that Judges Karibi-Whyte, Odio Benito and Jan, once replaced as members of the International Tribunal, finish the Celebici case which they have begun before expiry of their terms of office, and takes note of the intention of the Tribunal to finish the case before November 1998.

Decision of 13 May 1998 (3878th meeting):

At its 3878th meeting, held on 13 May 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Kenya) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Costa Rica, France, Japan, Kenya, Portugal, Slovenia, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States²¹³. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 5 May 1998 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting a letter dated 16 April 1998 from the President of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia addressed to the Secretary-General, raising the problem faced as a result of the recent dramatic increase in the number of persons accused of crimes under the Statute of the Tribunal, and recommending the establishment of a third Trial Chamber.²¹⁴

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that it was his delegation's understanding that the reference in the draft resolution to Chapter VII of the Charter was purely a technicality and would not set a precedent for the consideration by the Security Council of any similar situation.²¹⁵

The representative of China expressed his country's reservation about invoking Chapter VII in the draft resolution. He noted that over the previous five years the situation in the territory of the former Yugoslavia had undergone tremendous changes, which made it even less appropriate to invoke Chapter VII.²¹⁶

During the course of the debate, a number of speakers made statements expressing support for the work of the Tribunal, and supporting the establishment of a third Trial Chamber. Several speakers also called on all parties to cooperate fully with the Tribunal.²¹⁷ A number of speakers also highlighted the need for a permanent international criminal court.²¹⁸

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1166 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 827 (1993) of 25 May 1993,

Remaining convinced that the prosecution of persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia contributes to the restoration and maintenance of peace in the former Yugoslavia,

Having considered the letter dated 5 May 1998 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council,

Convinced of the need to increase the number of judges and Trial Chambers, in order to enable the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 ("the International Tribunal") to try without delay the large number of accused awaiting trial,

Noting the significant progress being made in improving the procedures of the International Tribunal, and convinced of the need for its organs to continue their efforts to further such progress,

At its 3919th meeting, held on 27 August 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the item “Establishment of the list of candidates for judges” in its agenda.

At the same meeting, the President (Slovenia) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution, prepared in the course of the Council’s prior consultations.²²⁰ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1191 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 808 (1993) of 22 February 1993, 827 (1993) of 25 May 1993 and 1166 (1998) of 13 May 1998,

Decision of 17 November 1998 (3944th meeting):

By a letter dated 8 September 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²²¹ the President of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia reported to the Council the continuing refusal of the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to cooperate with the Tribunal by failing to arrest and transfer to its custody three persons who had been indicted: Mile Mrksic, Miroslav Radic and Veselin Sljivancanin. He stressed that such conduct was illegal. He noted that the Security Council had acted under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations when it created the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, thus all States were legally required to comply with its orders, including warrants of arrest and surrender. Moreover, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, as a signatory to the Dayton Agreement, was further bound to cooperate with the International Tribunal (General Framework Agreement, article IX; annex I-A, article X; annex 7, article III (2)). He therefore stressed that it was imperative that the conduct of the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia no longer be tolerated.

²²¹ S/1998/839.

²¹⁹ Annex not included in present Supplement.

²²⁰ S/1998/806.

By a letter dated 22 October 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²²² the President of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia noted that recent efforts to find a peaceful solution to events in Kosovo²²³ had resulted in agreements between the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. While the agreements committed the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to accept an international verification system in Kosovo, they contained no provisions regarding the obligation of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to cooperate with the Tribunal. Moreover, it appeared that the statement by the President of Serbia reserved to the domestic judicial system of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia the right to investigate, prosecute and try offences committed in Kosovo that might fall within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. He stressed that that was of particular concern to the Tribunal considering the history of its relationship with the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, which was characterized by near-total non-compliance. Thus, he maintained that it was imperative that the competence of the Tribunal be unambiguously reaffirmed and that the obligation of the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to cooperate with it be made an explicit part of any resolution of the situation in Kosovo.

By a letter dated 6 November 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²²⁴ the President of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia reported to the Security Council the continuing refusal of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to cooperate with the Tribunal. The occasion for the report was the failure of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to issue visas to investigators of the Office of the Prosecutors so that they could conduct investigations in Kosovo. In doing so, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had stated that it did not accept any investigation of the Tribunal in Kosovo and Metohija. He stressed that that position contravened the explicit decisions of the Council in resolutions 1160 (1998), 1199 (1998), and 1203 (1998).

²²³ For purposes of this Supplement, the term “Kosovo” refers to “Kosovo, Federal Republic of Yugoslavia”, without prejudice to issues of status. In other instances, the terminology originally used in official documents has been preserved to the extent possible.

²²⁴ S/1998/1040.

Noting that the Council had issued presidential statements in response to prior reports by the Tribunal of non-compliance by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, which had failed to bring about the required cooperation with the Tribunal, he requested measures from the Council that were sufficiently compelling to bring the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia into the fold of law-abiding nations.

At its 3944th meeting, held on 17 November 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the three letters in its agenda. The President (United States) then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Portugal, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States, with Slovenia joining as a sponsor.²²⁵

Speaking before the vote, the representative of China stated that his country supported the work of the Tribunal in principle. However, he stressed that the Council had established the Tribunal on an ad hoc basis, with a specific target. The Tribunal was not a permanent court of law, nor was it an organ that could intervene at any time in the internal affairs of any country in the Balkan region with regard to matters that fell purely within that country’s domestic jurisdiction. He stressed that the problems in the Kosovo region of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, by their very nature, originated in terrorist and separatist activities, and the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia was investigating and handling those matters through its internal judicial procedures. The handling of those matters fell entirely within the internal jurisdiction of the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. He reiterated that the principle of respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia needed to be strictly observed. In the light of those considerations, he stated that the Chinese delegation was unable to support the invoking of Chapter VII of the Charter as a means of putting pressure on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, as well as some other provisions in the draft resolution. Therefore, his delegation would abstain in the vote.²²⁶

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted by 14 votes to none, with

2. Calls again upon the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, and all other States which have not already done so, to take any measures necessary under their domestic law to implement the provisions of resolution 827 (1993) and the statute of the International Tribunal, and affirms that a State may not invoke provisions of its domestic law as justification for its failure to perform binding obligations under international law;

3. Condemns the failure to date of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to execute the arrest warrants issued by the International Tribunal against the three individuals referred to in the letter dated 8 September 1998, and demands the immediate and unconditional execution of those arrest warrants, including the transfer to the custody of the Tribunal of those individuals;

E. The situation in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia

Decision of 13 February 1996 (3630th meeting): resolution 1046 (1996)

On 30 January 1996, pursuant to resolution 1027 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on developments on the ground and other circumstances affecting the mandate of the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force (UNPREDEP) in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and all aspects of UNPREDEP.²²⁸ In his report, the Secretary-General noted that the deployment of the Force in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia had played a significant role in preventing the conflict in the former Yugoslavia from spreading to that Republic and had contributed to alleviating serious concerns about external security threats. He stated that, as the continuation of the UNPREDEP mission was an important contribution to the maintenance of peace and stability in the region, he recommended that the mandate of UNPREDEP should not only be continued but that it should become an independent mission, reporting directly to United Nations Headquarters in New York, effective on 1 February 1996.²²⁹ He noted that, despite its new status, the operation would have basically the same mandate, strength and composition of troops. In respect of ongoing programmes, a key priority would be engineering operations, and he therefore proposed making provision for a permanent arrangement for engineering assets in an independent UNPREDEP mission, which would require an increase of the authorized strength by approximately 50 personnel. Another major priority would be the communications infrastructure.

By a letter dated 6 February 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²³⁰ the Secretary-General expressed his appreciation for the fact that the members of the Security Council concurred in principle with his recommendation that UNPREDEP become an independent mission with basically the same mandate, strength and composition of forces.²³¹ He stated that he intended to submit concrete proposals on the financial and administrative requirements of the proposed change in the status of UNPREDEP, in conjunction with the financial and administrative arrangements for the liquidation of the United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation in Croatia, the United Nations Protection Force and the United Nations Peace Forces Headquarters, as well as for the new missions in Bosnia and Herzegovina and Croatia, to the relevant United Nations bodies. He requested that the Council approve the proposed increase of the strength of UNPREDEP by 50 military personnel and the appointment of a Force Commander.

At its 3630th meeting, held on 13 February 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report and the letter of the Secretary-General in its agenda.

At the same meeting, the President (United States) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,²³² which was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1046 (1996), which reads:

²³⁰ S/1996/94.

²³¹ Letter dated 1 February 1996 from the President of the Security Council addressed to the Secretary-General (S/1996/76).

²³² S/1996/96.

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous relevant resolutions, in particular resolution 1027 (1995) of 30 November 1995 by which it extended the mandate of the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia until 30 May 1996,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 29 January 1996 and his letter dated 6 February 1996 to the President of the Council and the annex thereto,

1. Decides to authorize, for the duration of the present mandate, an increase in the strength of the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force by fifty military personnel in order to provide for a continued engineering capability in support of its operations;
2. Approves the establishment of the position of Force Commander of the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force;
3. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Council not later than 20 May 1996 further recommendations on the composition, strength and mandate of the Force in the light of developments in the region;
4. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 30 May 1996 (3670th meeting):
resolution 1058 (1996)

On 23 May 1996, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1046 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report giving further recommendations on the composition, strength and mandate of the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force, in the light of developments in the region.²³³ In his report, noting that UNPREDEP was the first preventive force deployed by the United Nations, the Secretary-General stated that the mere presence of a United Nations force had undoubtedly had a reassuring, stabilizing and confidence-building effect. In addition, the Force's military operations had helped to reduce tensions on the country's borders and to ensure that stability was not impaired by unintended military confrontations or by the activities of armed smugglers. He expressed his agreement that UNPREDEP had been, and continued to be, a success for the United Nations, for the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and for the region as a whole. He noted that the view of the Government of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia was that there was a continued need for UNPREDEP in order to maintain stability, preserve the gains already achieved and avoid undermining the still-fragile structure of peace in the Balkans. He added that this view was shared by the leadership of other political parties and of various ethnic groups in the country, and by most of the Governments that had expressed views to the Secretariat, including the Governments of the troop-contributing nations. He expressed his belief that, at the moment, it would be imprudent to withdraw UNPREDEP, although the question of whether its mandate could be implemented with fewer resources remained. However, he noted that, while it had been suggested, he was convinced that the UNPREDEP infantry should not be replaced with military observers. He stated his intention to review questions relating to the concept and strength of UNPREDEP at regular intervals and to inform the Security Council as soon as he judged that developments in the region and/or in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia itself permitted further economies. Meanwhile, he recommended that the mandate of the Force, in its present configuration, should be extended for a further period of six months to 30 November 1996.

At its 3670th meeting, held on 30 May 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (China), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution submitted by France, Germany, Italy, the United Kingdom and the United States, with Poland joining as a sponsor.²³⁴ He further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 11 April 1996 from the representative of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia addressed to the Secretary-General,²³⁵ transmitting the text of a letter dated 8 April 1996 from the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia addressed to the Secretary-General.

The representative of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia stated that it was the opinion of his Government that the situation in the region had not changed to the extent that the mandate of the mission should be restructured or terminated. He noted that the Dayton Agreement had not been implemented; the threats to his country by the potential explosion of the crisis had not been overcome yet, in view of the issue of Kosovo;²³⁶ the northern border had not been mutually demarcated; and his country had been left with a significantly reduced defensive capability as a consequence of the withdrawal of all armaments and military equipment following the departure of the former Yugoslav army and the Security Council resolution imposing an arms embargo. For those reasons and others, the mandate of UNPREDEP should be further extended.²³⁷

The representative of Italy, speaking on behalf of the European Union and the associated countries, Bulgaria, the Czech Republic, Estonia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Malta, Poland and Slovakia,²³⁸ stated that they were in full agreement with the assessments in the Secretary-General's report of 23 May 1996, and noted that it represented an important precedent in the preventive deployment of United Nations forces. Although the report of the Secretary-General reflected an unquestionable improvement in the situation, it was equally clear that the situation still contained troublesome elements of precariousness, and that peace and stability within the borders of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia were still largely dependent on developments in the rest of the former Yugoslavia. Therefore, the circumstances made any withdrawal of UNPREDEP forces at such a delicate stage premature and potentially dangerous and risked sending the wrong signal.²³⁹

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that, while the United Nations could be justly proud of the success of the operation, the current situation in the region of the former Yugoslavia was radically different from the one that prevailed in 1992 or even a year previously. He suggested that it would be strange if UNPREDEP were to be maintained in the form in which it existed at the height of the hostilities in the territory of the former Yugoslavia and that, in that connection, it would be fitting and proper to raise the question of reconfiguring the whole structure of the operation. He noted that the report of the Secretary-General had analysed the possibility of replacing the military contingents of UNPREDEP with military observers, and that, despite certain reservations, the conclusion had been reached that this option was feasible in principle, from both technical and operational viewpoints. He went on to say that considering the fact that in 1992, at the peak of the crisis, the Security Council had established the personnel strength of the operation's military component at approximately 700, and given that the armed struggle in Bosnia and Herzegovina had ended, his delegation's belief was that it would be logical to revert at least to the original personnel strength. He also suggested that several of the functions being performed by the civilian component of UNPREDEP could be entrusted to the United Nations Development Programme and the specialized agencies of the Organization. At the same time, he recognized that the positive changes in the region were not yet irreversible and pointed out that his delegation had not raised the question of winding up or of withdrawing UNPREDEP and had taken particular account of the ongoing concerns of the Macedonian leadership. As a result, he expressed his belief that, while it would have been possible to extend the mandate in its present form for four months, so that the Security Council could come back to the issue and take a decision that would be consonant with the real state of affairs in the region, the other members of the Council had not supported these proposals and so they were not reflected in the draft resolution. As his delegation had not heard any convincing arguments in support of the view that it was the only correct decision in the current situation, he stated that his delegation would therefore be obliged to abstain from voting. He expressed his hope that, when the mandate was taken up again, account would be taken of their concerns, and, on that basis, the Council would determine how the operation should be dealt with in the future.²⁴⁰

The representative of China stated that, taking into account the request of the Government of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and the situation in the region, his country would consent to the extension of the mandate of UNPREDEP. At the same time, the Chinese delegation maintained that the United Nations peacekeeping missions, including preventive deployment missions, needed to follow some established principles and be terminated upon completion of their mandates. He expressed hope that, with a continued improvement of the situation in the region, UNPREDEP would reduce its strength according to its actual needs and finally terminate its mission in "a smooth manner".²⁴¹

Taking the floor before and after the vote, a number of speakers noted that, considering the fact that stability in the region remained fragile, they would support the extension of the mandate of UNPREDEP. Most speakers also noted the importance of continuing to review the composition, strength and mandate of the force in the light of the situation.²⁴²

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention (Russian Federation), as resolution 1058 (1996),²⁴³ which reads:

Noting that the security situation of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia has improved, but recognizing that it is too early to be confident that stability has been established in the region, and expressing the hope that future developments in the region will not undermine confidence and stability in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia or threaten its security,

Welcoming the signing of the agreement between the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia on 8 April 1996, and urging both parties to implement it in full, including the demarcation of their mutual border,

Welcoming also the progress achieved in improving relations between the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and Greece on the basis of the Interim Accord of 13 September 1995,

Welcoming further the close cooperation between the Force and the mission of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe,

Taking note of the letter from the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of the Permanent Mission of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General dated 11 April 1996,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 23 May 1996 and, in particular, his assessment of the composition, strength and mandate of the Force,

1. Takes note with appreciation of the report of the Secretary-General of 23 May 1996;

2. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force for a period terminating on 30 November 1996;

3. Calls upon Member States to consider favourably requests by the Secretary-General for necessary assistance to the Force in the performance of its mandate;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council regularly informed of any developments on the ground and other circumstances affecting the mandate and also requests the Secretary-General to review the composition, strength and mandate of the Force and to report to the Council by 30 September 1996 for its consideration;

5. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 27 November 1996 (3716th meeting): resolution 1082 (1996)

On 19 November 1996, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1058 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report giving his recommendations regarding the composition, strength, mandate and future of UNPREDEP.²⁴⁴ He noted that, while much progress had been achieved in the region since the signing of the Dayton Agreement, it was clear that the international community's political and military involvement in the former Yugoslavia would necessarily continue for some time in order to consolidate peace and security. Moreover, it had become increasingly evident that the primary threat to the country's stability might come from internal political tensions. He stated that, as the Government of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia had requested the extension of the UNPREDEP mandate for six months beyond 30 November 1996, he would recommend that the mandate of the Force be extended for a further six months, to 31 May 1997, with a phased reduction of the military component by 300 all ranks by 1 April 1997. During the mandate period he would consult United Nations agencies and other relevant organizations on the modalities for continuing international support to the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, and would submit recommendations to the Council on the type of international presence that would be appropriate from June 1997.

At its 3716th meeting, held on 27 November 1996 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Indonesia), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Security Council to a letter dated 19 November 1996 from the representative of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, transmitting the text of a letter dated 18 November 1996 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia addressed to the Secretary-General,²⁴⁵ which expressed his opinion that the situation in the region had not changed to an extent that would allow either the reduction or termination of UNPREDEP. The President further drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by France, Germany, Italy, the United Kingdom and the United States.²⁴⁶

²⁴⁶ S/1996/979.

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the original objective of the deployment of a United Nations preventive mission in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, averting the spillover into that country of conflicts from other regions of the former Yugoslavia, had been achieved and that the mandate given by the Security Council had been fulfilled. He expressed his belief that it was therefore right and justified to raise the question of shutting down UNPREDEP, and noted that if the Council acted out of inertia and transformed the operation into something inviolable by maintaining it, the Council ran the risk of wiping out all the earlier positive achievements of the operation and of calling into question the unique experience of preventive peacekeeping. He noted that, while the substantive reduction of the size of UNPREDEP and the draft resolution's oblique reference to the possibility for a full drawing down of the operation were definite steps forward, his delegation felt these were insufficient. Considering the evolving situation in the region and the current trend towards a further positive evolution, his country did not see the point of maintaining UNPREDEP after May 1997. For that reason, he had proposed including a clear statement in the draft resolution that the present extension of the UNPREDEP mandate was its last. He noted that his delegation's position was not reflected in the draft resolution and that, having taken into consideration the positions of the other members of the Security Council, the leadership of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and the troop-contributing countries, his delegation had decided to abstain on the vote. He reiterated that the Russian Federation believed that it was the final extension of the UNPREDEP mandate, although this in no way reflected an underestimation of the real problems in the country or excluded the possibility of a further international presence to support and maintain programmes being implemented with international assistance.²⁴⁷

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention (Russian Federation), as resolution 1082 (1996),²⁴⁸ which reads:

The Security Council,

²⁴⁸ For the vote, see S/PV.3716, p. 3.

Recalling all its previous relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 1046 (1996) of 13 February 1996 and 1058 (1996) of 30 May 1996,

Reaffirming its commitment to the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia,

Noting with appreciation the important role played by the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force in contributing to the maintenance of peace and stability, and paying tribute to its personnel in the performance of their mandate,

Taking into consideration the fact that the security situation of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia continues to improve, but that peace and stability in the broader region have not yet been fully achieved, and expressing the hope that developments in the region will contribute to increased confidence and stability in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, permitting the further drawing down of the Force towards its conclusion,

Welcoming the improvement in the relations between the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and its neighbouring States,

Reiterating its call on the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to implement in full their agreement of 8 April 1996, in particular regarding the demarcation of their mutual border,

Welcoming the continued cooperation between the Force and the mission of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe,

Taking note of the letter dated 18 November 1996 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia to the Secretary-General requesting the extension of the mandate of the Force,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 19 November 1996, and noting his assessment of the composition, strength and mandate of the Force,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force for a period terminating on 31 May 1997 with a reduction of its military component by three hundred all ranks by 30 April 1997 with a view to concluding the mandate as and when circumstances permit;

2. Calls upon Member States to consider favourably requests by the Secretary-General for necessary assistance to the Force in the performance of this mandate;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council regularly informed about any developments and to report to the Council by 15 April 1997 with his recommendations on a subsequent international presence in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia;

4. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 9 April 1997 (3764th meeting):
resolution 1105 (1997)

By a letter dated 4 April 1997 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the Secretary-General stated that peace and stability in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia were intimately linked to the overall situation in the region and that recent developments in Albania and the resulting situation of lawlessness and banditry in certain parts of that country had demonstrated that stability in the Balkan region remained extremely fragile.²⁴⁹ He noted that, while there appeared to be no imminent danger of the problems in Albania spilling over to the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, the current crisis was a source of great anxiety in that country. The Minister for Foreign Affairs of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia had underlined the seriousness of the situation and requested that the reduction of the UNPREDEP military component be suspended. Considering the volatility of the situation in the region, the Secretary-General's Special Representative and the Force Commander of UNPREDEP had temporarily suspended the drawdown of the military component and had conveyed their concern to him about the timing of the downsizing of the Force. However, if it were to meet the 30 April deadline for the mandated reduction in force levels, UNPREDEP would be required to resume the drawdown in the coming days. He advised that, while UNPREDEP had been a successful mission, proceeding with the planned reduction during a period when further regional instability continued to be a possibility could put at risk the credibility of the international community's first serious effort at preventive deployment. In this light, and on the basis of the advice of his Special Representative, he recommended that the Security Council approve the suspension of the reduction of the UNPREDEP military component until the end of the current mandate on 31 May 1997.

At its 3764th meeting, held on 9 April 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Portugal), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Security Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.²⁵⁰ He further drew the attention of members of the Council to a letter dated 1 April 1997 from the representative of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia addressed to the Secretary-General, transmitting a letter dated 1 April 1997 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia addressed to the Secretary-General, requesting that the reduction of the UNPREDEP military component be suspended.²⁵¹

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1105 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 1082 (1996) of 27 November 1996,

Reaffirming its commitment to the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia,

Having considered the letter dated 3 April 1997, and the recommendation contained therein from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council,

1. Decides to suspend the reduction of the military component of the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force referred to in its resolution 1082 (1996) until the end of the current mandate on 31 May 1997;

2. Welcomes the redeployment of the Force already achieved in the light of the situation in Albania, and encourages the Secretary-General to continue further redeployment of the Force taking into consideration the situation in the region, consistent with the mandate of the Force;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Council by 15 May 1997 a report containing recommendations on a subsequent international presence in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia referred to in its resolution 1082 (1996);

4. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 28 May 1997 (3783rd meeting):
resolution 1110 (1997)

On 12 May 1997, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1082 (1996), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the status of the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force.²⁵² He stated that recent developments in Albania had demonstrated that stability in the Balkan region remained fragile. Uncertainty still prevailed and there had been doubts about the possibility of holding free and fair elections in June. He stated that the lack of a perceptible and early change in the situation in Albania could lead to another explosion of internal violence, which might have a negative impact on neighboring countries. In that regard, the large number of weapons circulating in the region posed a risk to the stability in the region that could not be neglected. He expressed his opinion that, in the light of the strong views of the Government of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia for a continued presence of UNPREDEP, and the continuation of the conditions that led to the suspension of the drawdown of the military component and the challenges in the region, it would be imprudent to recommend that UNPREDEP be terminated or to recommend any immediate changes in the mandate or size of the Force. He therefore recommended that the mandate of UNPREDEP be renewed for an additional six months until 30 November 1997 and the present strength of the Force be maintained for a period of four months. At that point, taking into account prevailing conditions, a two-month phased reduction of the military component to the 750 troop level foreseen by the Council in resolution 1082 (1996) could begin.

At its 3783rd meeting, held on 28 May 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Republic of Korea), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Germany, Italy and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Portugal, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States.²⁵³ He further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 1 April 1997 from the representative to the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia addressed to the Secretary-General,²⁵⁴ transmitting the text of a letter of the same date from the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia addressed to the Secretary-General, which proposed extending the mandate of UNPREDEP with its full composition of troops.

The representative of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia noted that, in spite of the success of UNPREDEP and the stability of his country, the present negative developments in the region, particularly in Albania, had made the extension of the mandate of UNPREDEP an obvious necessity. He emphasized that the preventive tasks of the mission in the coming period would not be easier than what had been the case so far. The complex situation in the region and the difficulties in predicting precisely coming developments required the continuous and able coordination of all peace efforts. In that regard, the capacity of the mission and its ability to perform the tasks it was best qualified for needed to be utilized thoughtfully and effectively. He reiterated that the mission should continue to act as an important force for peace in the region.²⁵⁵

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1110 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 1082 (1996) of 27 November 1996 and 1105 (1997) of 9 April 1997,

Recalling also its resolution 1101 (1997) of 28 March 1997, in which the Security Council expressed its deep concern over the situation in Albania,

Reaffirming its commitment to the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia,

Reiterating its appreciation for the important role played by the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force in contributing to the maintenance of peace and stability, and paying tribute to the personnel of the Force in the performance of their mandate,

Welcoming the significant progress made by the Governments of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in developing their mutual relations in many areas, and reiterating its call upon the two Governments to implement in full their agreement of 8 April 1996, in particular regarding the demarcation of their mutual border in the light of the willingness shown by them to resolve the matter,

Taking note of the letter dated 1 April 1997 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia to the Secretary-General, requesting the extension of the mandate of the Force,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 12 May 1997 and the recommendations contained therein,

Noting his observation that recent developments in the region, in particular in Albania, have demonstrated that stability there remains fragile,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force until 30 November 1997 and to start as of 1 October 1997, taking into account the conditions prevailing at that time, a two-month phased reduction of the military component by 300 all ranks;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council regularly informed about any relevant developments, and further requests the Secretary-General to review the composition, deployment, strength and mandate of the Force as outlined in his report, taking into consideration the situation prevailing at that time in the region, in particular in Albania, including in the context of elections in that country, and to submit a report to the Council by 15 August 1997 for its consideration;

3. Welcomes the redeployment of the Force already achieved in the light of the situation in Albania, and encourages the Secretary-General to continue further redeployment of the Force taking into consideration the situation in the region, consistent with the mandate of the Force;

4. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the Russian Federation noted that the initial goal of UNPREDEP, which was to prevent conflicts in other regions of the former Yugoslavia from spreading, had been attained. Considering that the main reason for the extension of UNPREDEP was the complicated situation in Albania, he suggested that the most urgent task was to work out ways to properly restructure UNPREDEP, concentrating it in the area of Albania. He noted that a realistic analysis of the functions and tasks of UNPREDEP at this stage should include the question of a speedy reduction of its military component as soon as circumstances in Albania allowed.²⁵⁶

The representative of the United States expressed the belief that UNPREDEP played an important and highly effective role in promoting stability in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia. The crisis in Albania had heightened the need for the continuation of UNPREDEP, but, in his delegation's view, there were other sources of instability and tension in the region which also reinforced the current importance of UNPREDEP. He expressed full support for a message of sustained, undiminished international commitment to UNPREDEP and the region. He also expressed the belief that the resolution would strengthen the ability of UNPREDEP to carry out its difficult mission and enhance the collective efforts by members of the Council in the region.²⁵⁷

The representative of Japan stated that, while the situation within the country had stabilized to some degree, owing to the deployment of the multinational protection forces and to the efforts of various humanitarian agencies, it was anticipated that the restoration of political, economic and social order would take time, even after the election. Considering this, his delegation shared the views expressed in the reports of the Secretary-General.²⁵⁸

At its 3836th meeting, held on 28 November 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (China), with the consent of the Council, invited the representative of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.²⁵⁹ He noted that, while the informal consultations were still continuing on some remaining technical aspects of the mandate of UNPREDEP, the mandate would expire on 30 November 1997. As a result of the informal consultations, the members of the Council had decided to adopt the draft resolution to allow time for the completion of consultations. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 3 November 1997 from the representative of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia addressed to the Secretary-General,²⁶⁰ which expressed the belief that UNPREDEP should be extended with the current mandate and composition for a period, which could be for the following 12 months.

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1140 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 1110 (1997) of 28 May 1997,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force for an additional period terminating on 4 December 1997;

2. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 4 December 1997 (3839th meeting):
resolution 1142 (1997)

On 20 November 1997 pursuant to Security Council resolution 1110 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNPREDEP covering developments in the mission area since his last report.²⁶¹ The Secretary-General stated that UNPREDEP had successfully contributed to preventing the spillover of conflicts elsewhere in the region into the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, promoting dialogue among the various political forces and ethnic communities, and providing humanitarian assistance. However, he noted that peace and stability in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia continued to depend largely on developments in other regions. He noted that there were concerns over the uncertainty of the outcome of the presidential elections in Serbia and the possible repercussions that it could bring to the area. Increased violence in Kosovo had also raised fears of a spillover effect on ethnic Albanians in the host country. Similarly, the slow progress in implementing the civilian aspects of the Dayton Peace Accords in Bosnia and Herzegovina had underscored the need for a longer-term commitment by the international community in that country. Within the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, the effects of inter-ethnic relations on long-term stability remained a matter of concern. He noted that the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia had requested an extension of the UNPREDEP mandate for a period of 12 months, citing his Government's concern at the continued sources of destabilization in the region. The Secretary-General suggested that the reduction of the military component by 300 all ranks, which had been initiated, could be viewed as the commencement of a phased exit in response to the improved situation in the region. He also suggested that the Council might wish to observe the effectiveness of the initial reduction before contemplating its next step. He stated his intention to revert to the Council in due course with appropriate recommendations for further reductions on the basis of a careful assessment of the situation in all its relevant aspects. He then recommended that the mandate of UNPREDEP be extended for an additional period of six months with the strength and configuration he had outlined. His Special Representative and the Force Commander would monitor the situation closely so as to be in a position to advise him as soon as conditions permitted a further reduction.

At its 3839th meeting, held on 4 December 1997 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Costa Rica), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Germany, Italy and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Costa Rica, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Portugal, the Russian Federation, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States.²⁶² He further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 3 November 1997 from the representative of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia addressed to the Secretary-General,²⁶³ stating his views in connection with the need for extending the stay of UNPREDEP in the Republic of Macedonia after 30 November 1997.

The representative of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia expressed the view that the situation would not improve as much as his delegation wished in the coming nine months. For that reason and with the aim of preventing new conflicts, implementing the Dayton Agreement, developing better good-neighbourly relations among Balkan States and integrating them in the European structures, determined efforts by the international community and the United Nations were needed and had to continue. He stated that those were the main reasons for his Government's view that a 12-month extension would be appropriate. He emphasized that the extension of the UNPREDEP mandate represented an important contribution of the Security Council to the effort to maintain peace and security in the Balkans.²⁶⁴

The representative of Germany noted that the mission had started out as a preventive effort to prevent a spillover from conflicts in the other parts of the former Yugoslavia and its focus had shifted first towards the civil unrest in Albania and then to the situation in the Kosovo region of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, which gave rise to fears of destabilization also in the area of operations of UNPREDEP. He noted that, with preventive missions, of which UNPREDEP was a model, it was always particularly difficult to gauge the degree of success and it was similarly difficult to decide when a preventive mission had satisfactorily completed its task. Noting that there seemed to be general agreement that UNPREDEP had been a success story, he expressed his belief that the Council should take no chances by ending the international military presence in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia before a sufficient degree of stability was achieved throughout the surrounding region.²⁶⁵

Speaking before the vote, several delegations expressed their support for the extension of the mandate of UNPREDEP and looked forward to receiving the Secretary-General's recommendations. A number of speakers maintained that significant risks remained in the region, particularly in Kosovo and Albania, which made the extension of UNPREDEP necessary. Several delegations also mentioned the importance of an appropriate successor mechanism that would ensure that the gains made by UNPREDEP were not jeopardized.²⁶⁶

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1142 (1997), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous relevant resolutions concerning the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia, in particular resolutions 1105 (1997) of 9 April 1997 and 1110 (1997) of 28 May 1997,

Recalling also its resolutions 1101 (1997) of 28 March 1997 and 1114 (1997) of 19 June 1997, in which the Council expressed concern over the situation in Albania,

Reaffirming its commitment to the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia,

Reiterating its appreciation for the important role played by the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force in contributing to the maintenance of peace and stability, and paying tribute to the personnel of the Force in the performance of their mandate,

Reiterating its call upon the Governments of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to implement in fulfilling their agreement of 8 April 1996, in particular regarding the demarcation of their mutual border,

Welcoming the phased reduction and restructuring of the troop strength of the Force, which has taken place pursuant to resolution 1110 (1997),

Taking note of the letter dated 31 October 1997 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia to the Secretary-General, requesting the extension of the mandate of the Force,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 20 November 1997 and the recommendations contained therein,

Taking note of the observation of the Secretary-General that there have been a number of positive developments in the overall situation in the area, in particular the stabilization of the situation in Albania, but that peace and stability in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia continue to depend largely on developments in other parts of the region,

Bearing in mind the intention of Member States and interested organizations to consider actively the instituting of possible alternatives to the Force,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force for a final period until 31 August 1998, with the withdrawal of the military component immediately thereafter;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council by 1 June 1998 on the modalities of the termination of the Force, including practical steps for the complete withdrawal of the military component immediately after 31 August 1998, and to submit recommendations on the type of international presence that would be most appropriate: for the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia after 31 August 1998;

3. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the Russian Federation stated that developments in the situation in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and the region, particularly after the successful handling of the acute political crisis and the stabilization of the situation in Albania, confirmed how relevant and timely it was to restructure UNPREDEP, with the withdrawal of a military component from the operation. The mandate established in 1991, which was already successfully implemented, could not be an effective instrument for neutralizing the current risks to stability within and around the country. Therefore the centre of gravity should now shift to the civilian area, bringing into play non-military international structures. He noted that, while his Government had consistently supported this approach, it had taken into account the position of interested parties, primarily that of the host country and the recommendation of the Secretary-General, and agreed to the final extension of the mandate of UNPREDEP, with the withdrawal of the military component immediately thereafter.²⁶⁷

Decision of 21 July 1998 (3911th meeting):

On 1 June 1998, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1142 (1997), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNPREDEP, addressing the Council's request to report on the modalities of the termination of the mission and submit recommendations on the type of international presence that would be most appropriate afterwards, as well as covering developments in the mission area since his last report.²⁶⁸ The Secretary-General noted that the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia had referred to the changed circumstances in the region which mitigated against any weakening of the international presence in the country. In particular, he had expressed his Government's concern over the negative developments north of the border, especially in Kosovo, the yet unmarked border with the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, and the tensions along the border between Albania and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. Expressing his concern that the peace and stability of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia could be endangered, if the military component of the Force was withdrawn, the Minister had recommended an extension of UNPREDEP for an additional period of six months, with the same mandate structure and troop composition.

The Secretary-General also noted that discussions were under way within the framework of NATO and elsewhere concerning the possible need for an expanded international military presence in the region as a consequence of the situation in Kosovo. Consultations were also continuing with a view to adopting a decision on the establishment of a comprehensive regime to monitor the implementation of the arms embargo on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia imposed by Security Council resolution 1160 (1998). The outcome of either might well have implications for both the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and UNPREDEP. Therefore, he suggested that proceeding with a decision to withdraw UNPREDEP would be premature. He added that he also did not yet possess the requisite information to submit recommendations on the type of international presence that would be most appropriate after the withdrawal of UNPREDEP. He suggested that one possible option that the Security Council could consider was to extend UNPREDEP with its mandate unchanged for a further period of six months, with the Council reviewing its decisions, if the outcome of the aforementioned international discussion affected it. He also suggested that, as any further escalation of the crisis in Kosovo could have negative operational consequences for the Force at its current strength, if the Security Council wished, he would submit specific proposals on a possible strengthening of the force's overall capacity.

On 14 July 1998, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report containing specific proposals on a possible strengthening of the overall capacity of UNPREDEP, taking into consideration the situation in the region and the relevant Security Council resolutions, including 795 (1992) and 1160 (1998).²⁶⁹ He reiterated that it seemed premature to proceed with a decision to withdraw UNPREDEP and that, therefore, the Council might wish to consider the extension of the mandate of UNPREDEP for a further period of six months, until 28 February 1999. He also recommended that, in view of the constraints placed on UNPREDEP, the Council might wish to consider increasing the troop level of UNPREDEP by 350 all ranks and increasing the military observer and the civilian police elements by twelve and twenty-four personnel, respectively.

At its 3911th meeting, held on 21 July 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the two reports in its agenda. The President (Russian Federation), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Austria, Germany, Italy and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of members of the Council to letters dated 15 May and 9 July 1998, respectively, from the representative of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, transmitting letters of the same dates from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia addressed to the Secretary-General.²⁷⁰

The representative of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia stated that his Minister for Foreign Affairs had reiterated that his Government had endorsed the option of an eventual increase in the military component, maintaining the same mandate structure and proportion and taking into account in particular the internal specifics of the country. He had also stated that reinforcing the civilian police could be successful and could contribute to more efficient monitoring. The representative also stressed that his delegation welcomed the recommendations of the Secretary-General in his report dated 14 July 1998.²⁷¹

The representative of Austria, speaking on behalf of the European Union and associated and aligned countries,²⁷² stated that, while UNPREDEP was initially intended to prevent a spillover from conflicts in the former Yugoslavia, the focus had shifted to the conflict in Kosovo which posed a serious threat to regional peace and security. He stated that the European Union fully subscribed to the provisions of Security Council resolution 1169 (1998), which, inter alia, imposed an arms embargo on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. He declared that UNPREDEP would play an important role in the monitoring of and reporting on illicit arms flows and other activities that had been prohibited under Security Council resolution 1160 (1998).²⁷³

Speaking before the vote, the representative of China emphasized that, while his delegation had always been of the view that United Nations peacekeeping operations should have both a proper beginning and a proper conclusion, China had taken into account the request by the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and the concern expressed by other countries of the area and would not object to the further extension of the mandate of UNPREDEP. However, his country wanted to reiterate that in assisting in the maintenance of stability and security in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, the international community should respect the political independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the country concerned, namely the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia. He expressed hope that the adjustment of the mandate of UNPREDEP to enable it to be responsible for monitoring the border areas between the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and Albania would help effectively contain illicit arms flows and terrorist activities in the region. On that basis and in the interest of maintaining peace and stability in the area, China would not object to the adjustment of the mandate and would vote for the draft resolution. However, he noted that such a vote did not constitute any change in China's position of principle with respect to resolutions 1101 (1997), 1114 (1997) and 1160 (1998).²⁷⁴

The representative of the United States stated that, despite its successes, the mission of UNPREDEP was not over. In Kosovo, Belgrade had failed to fulfil the calls of the international community to cease action against the civilian population, return forces to barracks and begin meaningful negotiations on an enhanced status and a substantially greater degree of autonomy for Kosovo, which had led to a deteriorating situation in Kosovo that threatened regional stability. He emphasized that the current crisis in Kosovo reinforced the need for an increase in and extension of the current mandate of UNPREDEP. Noting that the strength of UNPREDEP would be increased by 300 troops, he stated that his delegation had not excluded consideration of a further increase, if the situation in the region required it.²⁷⁵

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that his delegation shared the view expressed by the Secretary-General that the continuing complex situation in Kosovo, Serbia, and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia made it advisable to extend the mandate of the operation. He remarked that it was clear that the direct reason prompting the members of the Security Council to adjust the Council's decision on terminating UNPREDEP after 31 August related to resolution 1160 (1998), which authorized the imposition of an arms embargo and called for the cessation of external support for "the Kosovar terrorists". He expressed his belief that UNPREDEP could and should make a useful, practical contribution to carrying out monitoring functions in line with resolution 1160 (1998), and noted that an appropriate provision had been included in the draft resolution.²⁷⁶

Also speaking before the vote, several speakers expressed their support for the extension and expansion of the mandate of UNPREDEP.²⁷⁷

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1186 (1998), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions concerning the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia, in particular resolution 795 (1992) of 11 December 1992, in which it addressed possible developments which could undermine confidence and stability in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia or threaten its territory, and resolution 1142 (1997) of 4 December 1997,

Recalling also its resolutions 1101 (1997) of 28 March 1997 and 1114 (1997) of 19 June 1997, in which it expressed its concern over the situation in Albania, and its resolution 1160 (1998) of 31 March 1998, in which it decided that all States shall prevent the sale or supply to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, including Kosovo, of arms and related materiel of all types and shall prevent arming and training for terrorist activities there,

Reiterating its appreciation for the important role played by the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force in contributing to the maintenance of peace and stability, and paying tribute to its personnel in the performance of their mandate,

Commending the role of the Force in monitoring the border areas and reporting to the Secretary-General on any developments which could pose a threat to the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and by its presence deterring threats and preventing clashes, including monitoring and reporting on illicit arms flows within its area of responsibility,

Reiterating its call on the Governments of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to implement in full their agreement of 8 April 1996, in particular regarding the demarcation of their mutual border,

Taking note of the letters dated 15 May and 9 July 1998 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia to the Secretary-General, requesting the extension of the mandate of the Force and endorsing the option of an increase in its troop strength,

Having considered the reports of the Secretary-General of 1 June and 14 July 1998 and the recommendations contained therein,

Reaffirming its commitment to the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia,

1. Decides to authorize an increase in the troop strength of the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force up to 1,050 and to extend the current mandate of the Force for a period of six months until 28 February 1999, under which the Force would continue by its presence to deter threats and prevent clashes, to monitor the border areas, and to report to the Secretary-General any developments which could pose a threat to the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, including the tasks of monitoring and reporting on illicit arms flows and other activities that are prohibited under resolution 1160 (1998);

2. Expresses its intention to consider further the recommendations of the Secretary-General in his report of 14 July 1998;

3. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 25 February 1999 (3982nd meeting): rejection of a draft resolution

On 12 February 1999, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1186 (1998), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report covering developments in the mission area of UNPREDEP since his reports of 1 June and 14 July 1998.²⁷⁸ In his report, the Secretary-General informed the Council that the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia had presented arguments for an extension of the mandate of UNPREDEP for an additional six months, with its existing composition and structure. He also drew attention to the fact that the Contact Group on the former Yugoslavia was engaged in seeking a political solution to the Kosovo crisis and discussions were continuing within the framework of NATO concerning the deployment of an international military presence in the region. Considering these developments, he suggested that the Security Council might wish to consider extending the presence of UNPREDEP, with its existing mandate and composition, for a further period of six months until 31 August 1999, on the understanding that it would review its decisions should the aforementioned international discussions result in developments which would affect the role and responsibilities of UNPREDEP.

At its 3982nd meeting, held on 25 February 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Canada) with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Bulgaria, Germany, Italy and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Canada, France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, Slovenia, the United Kingdom and the United States.²⁷⁹ He further drew the attention of members of the Council to a letter dated 2 February 1999 from the representative of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia addressed to the Secretary-General, transmitting a letter dated 29 January 1998 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia also addressed to the Secretary-General.²⁸⁰

The representative of Argentina stated that, since the situation in Kosovo had not yet been resolved, the presence of UNPREDEP, which was a preventive force, constituted an irreplaceable reassurance. Equally important was the mandate that the Council gave to UNPREDEP to monitor illicit flows of arms and other activities prohibited under resolution 1160 (1998). In light of these issues, his delegation supported the extension of the mandate of UNPREDEP for a further six-month period, until 31 August 1999, with its existing composition and mandate.²⁸¹

The representative of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia emphasized that it could be argued that the contributions of the United Nations were more necessary than when the Security Council decided to extend the mandate of the UNPREDEP the previous year. The situation continued to be very difficult, dangerous and unpredictable, and it could be safely considered a serious threat to the peace and security of the Balkans. The possibility of a new bloody war in the Balkans needed to be considered a real one. He reiterated that extension of the mandate of UNPREDEP needed to be seen as providing important support to the peace forces in the region. Prevention of a new war in the Balkans was of utmost urgency and a very serious obligation of the Security Council under the Charter of the United Nations, in particular under Article 24, in which the Council was requested to act on behalf of the Member States. He asserted that Member States fully supported the extension of the mandate of the first successful preventive peacekeeping mission of the United Nations. He noted that the main argument against the use of the veto was that the Security Council acted on behalf of all Member States, not of an individual Member State. In the case of UNPREDEP, he stressed that the extension of its mandate was supported by all Member States except one, and that was because of bilateral considerations, something that his delegation considered to be in full contradiction of the Charter of the United Nations.²⁸²

Speaking before the vote, the representative of the Russian Federation stated that his position was that the tasks of UNPREDEP regarding the monitoring of compliance with the arms embargo and with the injunctions established by resolution 1160 (1998) should become the main component of its activities, and that this should have been more clearly highlighted in the mandate of the operation. Guided by that approach, his delegation had proposed corresponding amendments to the draft resolution on the extension of the mandate of UNPREDEP. He stated that, as these amendments were unfortunately not duly reflected in the final text of the draft resolution, his delegation would not be able to support the draft resolution.²⁸³

At the same meeting, the Council proceeded to vote on the draft resolution. Under the preambular part of the draft resolution, the Council would, inter alia, have underlined the continuing importance of the role of the UNPREDEP in monitoring the border areas and reporting to the Secretary-General on any developments which could pose a threat to the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and, by its presence, deterring threats and preventing clashes, including monitoring and reporting on illicit arms flows within its area of responsibility. The resolution received 13 votes in favour to 1 against (China), with 1 abstention (Russian Federation), and was not adopted owing to the negative vote of a permanent member of the Security Council.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States stated that very real regional threats to the security of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia remained. He emphasized that his delegation's vote to extend the mandate of UNPREDEP was a vote of confidence in a mission that was needed as much as ever. He expressed regret over the decision of one member of the Council to exercise its veto. He expressed his belief that the overall interests of security in the region should have been sufficiently compelling to outweigh other considerations and that the role of UNPREDEP was indispensable. His delegation therefore hoped to begin work with members of the Security Council to find a way to allow the international community to continue to meet this critical need, without disruption.²⁸⁴

The representative of Slovenia expressed regret that the Council was unable to adopt the necessary decision to extend the mandate of UNPREDEP. He stated that the situation around the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia was fraught with instability and potential threat, which called for an array of international responses, among them the preventive deployment of the United Nations peacekeeping force in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia. He stressed that it was essential that Council members dealt with specific situations from the standpoint of ensuring peace and security in the world and from the perspective of the Organization as a whole. That was essential for the realization of the responsibility conferred upon the Council by the United Nations Member States and enshrined in Article 24 of the Charter of the United Nations. He stated that the situation in the immediate vicinity of Kosovo continued to represent a threat to peace and security in the region and gave additional importance and urgency to the role of UNPREDEP. Therefore, Slovenia strongly supported the idea of continued consultations among the Security Council members and with the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia to lead to an arrangement acceptable to all, which could ensure the continued pursuit of the tasks which made UNPREDEP necessary.²⁸⁵

The representative of China, explaining the vote against the draft resolution, stated that his delegation had always maintained that United Nations peacekeeping operations, including preventive deployment missions, should not be open-ended. As the situation in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia had apparently stabilized and the Secretary-General had clearly indicated that the original goal of the Security Council in establishing the preventive mission had been met, there was no need to extend further the mandate of UNPREDEP. He also reiterated that as Africa and other regions were still plagued by conflict and instability and needed greater attention, it would be neither reasonable nor fair to continue to assess Member States for UNPREDEP.²⁸⁶

Several speakers expressed support for the extension of the mandate of UNPREDEP, their regret that the Security Council was unable to do so, and their concern over the possible escalation of the crisis in Kosovo.²⁸⁷

The representative of China took the floor a second time to reply that he had taken note of the statements made by several representatives and expressed the belief that deciding one's own position on the merits of a matter was

Decision of 31 March 1998 (3868th meeting): resolution 1160 (1998)

By a letter dated 11 March 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁸⁹ the representative of the United Kingdom transmitted the text of a statement on Kosovo, Federal Republic of Yugoslavia,²⁹⁰ agreed by the members of the Contact Group²⁹¹ at their meeting in London on 9 March 1998. The Contact Group expressed their dismay that, although they had called upon the authorities in Belgrade and the leadership of the Kosovo Albanians to join in a peaceful dialogue, rather than taking steps to reduce tensions or entering without preconditions in dialogue towards a political solution, the Belgrade authorities had applied repressive measures in Kosovo. They stressed that their condemnation of the actions of the Serbian police should not in any way be mistaken for an endorsement of terrorist actions by the Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) or any other group or individual. In the light of the deplorable violence in Kosovo, they felt compelled to take steps to demonstrate to the authorities in Belgrade that they could not defy international standards without facing severe consequences. The Contact Group welcomed the continuation of consultations in the Security Council, in view of the implications of the situation in Kosovo for regional security. Owing to the gravity of the situation, they endorsed the following measures, to be pursued immediately: consideration by the Council of a comprehensive arms embargo against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, including Kosovo; refusal to supply equipment to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, which might be used for internal repression, or for terrorism; denial of visas for senior Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and Serbian representatives responsible for repressive action by security forces of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in Kosovo; and a moratorium on government-financed export credit support for trade and investment, including government financing for privatizations, in Serbia. The Contact Group further noted that the Russian Federation could not support the last two measures mentioned above for immediate imposition. However, if there was no progress towards the steps called for by the Contact Group, the Russian Federation would then be willing to discuss all the measures. The Contact Group also called upon President Milosevic of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to take rapid and effective steps to stop the violence and engage in a commitment to find a political solution to the issue of Kosovo through dialogue. If President Slobodan Milosevic took those steps, they would immediately reconsider the measures they had adopted. If he failed to take those steps, and repression continued in Kosovo, the Contact Group would move to further international measures, and, specifically, pursue a freeze on the funds held abroad by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and Serbian Governments. The Contact Group stressed that they supported neither independence nor the maintenance of the status quo. As they had set out clearly, the principles for a solution of the Kosovo problem needed to be based upon the territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, and in accordance with the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) standards, the Helsinki Principles, and the Charter of the United Nations. A solution also had to take into account the rights of the Kosovo Albanians and all those who lived in Kosovo. They supported an enhanced status for Kosovo within the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, which a substantially greater degree of autonomy would bring, and recognized that that must include meaningful self-administration.

By a letter dated 27 March 1998, addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁹² the representative of the United States transmitted the text of a statement on Kosovo, Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, agreed by the members of the Contact Group at their meeting in Bonn on 25 March 1998. They stated that their overall assessment was that further progress by Belgrade on certain points requiring action by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and Serbian governments was necessary. Therefore, they had agreed to maintain and implement the measures announced on 9 March, including seeking adoption by 31 March of the arms embargo resolution currently under consideration in the Security Council.

At its 3868th meeting, held on 31 March 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the letters in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Gambia), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Canada, Croatia, Egypt, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Italy, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Pakistan, Poland, Turkey and Ukraine, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. He also extended an invitation to Mr. Vladislav Jovanovic, at his request, to address the Council in the course of its discussion of the item.²⁹³

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Portugal, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States.²⁹⁴ The President further drew the attention of the Council to the following documents: identical letters dated 11 March 1998 from the representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia addressed to the Secretary-General and to the President of the Security Council;²⁹⁵ letters dated 12, 16 and 18 March 1998, respectively, from the representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia addressed to the Secretary-General;²⁹⁶ a letter dated 13 March 1998 from the representative of Bulgaria addressed to the Secretary-General;²⁹⁷ and a letter dated 17 March 1998 from the representative of Poland addressed to the President of the Security Council.²⁹⁸ Members of the Council also received a letter dated 30 March 1998 from the representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁹⁹ protesting the efforts of the Council to adopt a resolution that provided for the imposition of an arms embargo on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, and stating that the situation in Kosovo and Metohija was an internal matter of Serbia.

At the same meeting, the representative of Costa Rica stated that his country had always maintained that safeguarding human rights was not solely and exclusively a matter of the internal jurisdiction of States. In that connection, he expressed the belief that there were certain circumstances in which a violation of such fundamental rights was so serious that it constituted, in and of itself, a threat to international peace and security and therefore fully justified the Security Council invoking the powers granted to it under Chapter VII of the Charter. While condemning terrorism in all its forms, he underlined that combating terrorism did not justify human rights violations or the failure to respect international humanitarian law.³⁰⁰

The representative of Brazil stated that although the Charter enshrined the principle of non-intervention in matters that were essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any State, everyone was aware that the principle did not prejudice the application of enforcement measures under Chapter VII, in accordance with Article 2 (7). He noted that in recent years some observers had gone so far as to suggest that there might have been a tendency to frame emergencies under Chapter VII so as to circumvent the non-intervention principle. This would be a distortion of the waiver provided by Article 2 (7), which would seem to be incompatible with its original purpose. On the other hand, as stated in General Assembly resolution 51/242, annex II, sanctions should be resorted to only with the utmost caution, when other peaceful options provided by the Charter were inadequate. In conclusion, he emphasized his delegation's commitment to the pacific settlement of disputes within a context of respect for sovereignty and territorial integrity. Brazil believed that exercising caution in resorting to coercive measures would actually strengthen the authority of the Security Council in the face of serious and otherwise intractable situations.³⁰¹

The representative of Slovenia stated that there were three essential political lessons to be borne in mind while approaching the issue of Kosovo. First, there was no reason to expect quick fixes. Second, it was essential that the political process be started on the basis of the broad and fundamental principles of the Charter of the United Nations and the Helsinki Final Act of 1975. Third, it was essential to ensure that intellectual and moral accuracy prevailed in the international efforts to help resolve the situation. He noted that in the past, the unilateral dismantling of the autonomy of Kosovo represented one of the major sources of political deterioration and instability in the region. At present, the use of force against the Albanians of Kosovo represented the most important source of instability and a threat to international peace and security. Consequently, efforts had to be directed towards the elimination of that threat. Regarding terrorism, he stated that it was clear that violent acts, such as the taking of hostages, attacks against the safety of civilian air traffic, terrorist bombings and other attacks against civilian targets were properly defined as terrorism. On the other hand, there were forms of struggle that, while undesirable, were not terrorism and ought not to be labelled so. That was particularly relevant to the situation in Kosovo, where the characteristics of an armed conflict had already assumed serious proportions. He expressed agreement with the decisions of the Contact Group and stressed that such action was necessary since the situation in Kosovo had already developed into a threat to international peace and security in the region, which was the reason for action based on Chapter VII of the Charter.³⁰²

The representative of Bahrain stated that the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC), at its meeting of Ministers for Foreign Affairs from 16 to 17 March 1998, had expressed its concern at the grave violations of the human and political rights of the inhabitants of the Kosovo region and called for an immediate halt to such actions and for an immediate withdrawal from civilian areas.³⁰³

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that from the outset his delegation had viewed the events in Kosovo as the internal affair of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. His Government strongly believed that the basic principle for a settlement of the situation in Kosovo was that the autonomous region had to remain within Serbia, on the basis of unswerving compliance with the principle of the territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and of the republics that made it up. Only within that legal framework was an effective settlement of the Kosovo problem possible through peaceful political dialogue without preconditions or unilateral approaches. He underscored that, while condemning the use of excessive force by the Serbian police, the Russian Federation also strongly condemned any terrorist acts on the part of the Kosovo Albanians, including the "so-called" Kosovo Liberation Army and other manifestations of extremism. The representative stressed that, while the events in Kosovo had an adverse regional impact, the situation in Kosovo, despite its complexity, did not constitute a threat to regional, much less international, peace and security. He informed the Council that it had been extremely difficult for the Russian Federation to agree with the introduction of a military embargo, and had done so only on the understanding that the issue was not about punishing anyone, Belgrade in particular, but about specific measures designed to prevent an increase in tension, to erect an obstacle to external terrorism and to foster the political process with a view to a speedy and lasting settlement. He also noted that one of the most important conditions for the viability of the embargo was an effective monitoring regime for its implementation, particularly on the Albanian-Macedonian border, and it was precisely from that perspective that the Council needed to consider the mandate of the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force.³⁰⁴ It was his delegation's position that the establishment by the Security Council of a military embargo, like any application of military sanctions, was possible only with a clear exit strategy. While the approach of his delegation had not received sufficient support in the Security Council, the draft resolution had been able to define strict criteria. If Belgrade complied with these criteria, the Security Council would decide to lift the embargo. He stressed that the main task of the international community was the full promotion of the consolidation of progress made in the situation around Kosovo. That must not be done by increasing sanction measures, which might have the most adverse repercussions for the entire Balkan region and many other States.³⁰⁵

The representative of China stated that Kosovo was an integral part of the territory of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. The question of Kosovo was an internal matter of the Federal Republic. It should be resolved properly through negotiations between the two parties concerned, on the basis of the principle of respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. He noted that the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had taken a series of positive measures in that regard and the situation on the ground was moving towards stability. He stated that his delegation did not think that the situation in Kosovo endangered regional and international peace and security. The representative stressed that if the Council was to get involved in a dispute without a request from the country concerned, it might set a bad precedent and would have wider negative implications. Therefore, the Council needed to be cautious when addressing those issues. He underlined that, although the priority in solving the question of Kosovo in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia was for the parties to start the political talks as soon as possible, the draft resolution would not help move the parties to negotiations. Neither was it appropriate to bring before the Council the differences between OSCE and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, as well as the human rights issues in Kosovo, nor was it proper to link the return of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to the international community to the question of Kosovo. Since the content of the draft resolution did not conform to the principled positions of China, his delegation had no choice but to abstain in the voting.³⁰⁶

Speaking both before and after the vote, a number of speakers stated that neither the repression of human and political rights of the Albanian population in Kosovo nor the separation and independence of Kosovo were acceptable, but that a solution had to be found within the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. All speakers urged the authorities in Belgrade and the leadership of the Albanian community in Kosovo to immediately enter into a substantive dialogue without precondition. They also endorsed the statements made by the Contact Group. Several speakers also called upon all States to strictly observe the embargo.³⁰⁷

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention (China), as resolution 1160 (1998),³⁰⁸ which reads:

The Security Council,

Condemning the use of excessive force by Serbian police forces against civilians and peaceful demonstrators in Kosovo, as well as all acts of terrorism by the Kosovo Liberation Army or any other group or individual and all external support for terrorist activity in Kosovo, including finance, arms and training,

Taking note of the declaration of 18 March 1998 by the President of the Republic of Serbia on the political process in Kosovo and Metohija,

Noting the clear commitment of senior representatives of the Kosovo Albanian community to non-violence,

Noting that there has been some progress in implementing the actions indicated in the Contact Group statement of 9 March 1998, but stressing that further progress is required,

Affirming the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Calls upon the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia immediately to take the further necessary steps to achieve a political solution to the issue of Kosovo through dialogue and to implement the actions indicated in the Contact Group statements of 9 and 25 March 1998;

2. Also calls upon the Kosovo Albanian leadership to condemn all terrorist action, and emphasizes that all elements in the Kosovo Albanian community should pursue their goals by peaceful means only;

3. Underlines the fact that the way to defeat violence and terrorism in Kosovo is for the authorities in Belgrade to offer the Kosovo Albanian community a genuine political process;

4. Calls upon the authorities in Belgrade and the leadership of the Kosovo Albanian community urgently to enter without preconditions into a meaningful dialogue on political status issues, and notes the readiness of the Contact Group to facilitate such a dialogue;

5. Agrees, without prejudging the outcome of that dialogue, with the proposal in the Contact Group statements of 9 and 25 March 1998 that the principles for a solution of the Kosovo problem should be based on the territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and should be in accordance with standards of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, including those set out in the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, signed at Helsinki on 1 August 1975, and the Charter of the United Nations, and that such a solution must also take into account the rights of the Kosovo Albanians and all who live in Kosovo, and expresses its support for an enhanced status for Kosovo, which would include a substantially greater degree of autonomy and meaningful self-administration;

6. Welcomes the signature on 23 March 1998 of an agreement on measures to implement the 1996 Education Agreement, calls upon all parties to ensure that its implementation proceeds smoothly and without delay according to the agreed timetable, and expresses its readiness to consider measures if either party blocks implementation;

7. Expresses its support for the efforts of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe for a peaceful resolution of the crisis in Kosovo, including through the Personal Representative of the Chairman-in-Office for the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, who is also the Special Representative of the European Union, and the return of the long-term missions of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe;

8. Decides that all States shall, for the purposes of fostering peace and stability in Kosovo, prevent the sale or supply to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, including Kosovo, by their nationals or from their territories or using their flag vessels and aircraft, of arms and related materiel of all types, such as weapons and ammunition, military vehicles and equipment and spare parts for the aforementioned, and shall prevent arming and training for terrorist activities there;

9. Decides to establish, in accordance with rule 28 of its provisional rules of procedure, a committee of the Security Council, consisting of all the members of the Council, to undertake the following tasks and to report on its work to the Council with its observations and recommendations:

(a) To seek from all States information regarding the action taken by them concerning the effective implementation of the prohibitions imposed by the present resolution;

(b) To consider any information brought to its attention by any State concerning violations of the prohibitions imposed by the present resolution and to recommend appropriate measures in response thereto;

(c) To make periodic reports to the Security Council on information submitted to it regarding alleged violations of the prohibitions imposed by the present resolution;

(d) To promulgate such guidelines as may be necessary to facilitate the implementation of the prohibitions imposed by the present resolution;

(e) To examine the reports submitted pursuant to paragraph 12 below;

10. Calls upon all States and all international and regional organizations to act strictly in conformity with the present resolution, notwithstanding the existence of any rights granted or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or of any contract entered into or any license or permit granted prior to the entry into force of the prohibitions imposed by the present resolution, and stresses in this context the importance of continuing implementation of the Agreement on Subregional Arms Control signed in Florence, Italy, on 14 June 1996;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to provide all necessary assistance to the Committee established pursuant to paragraph 9 above and to make the necessary arrangements in the Secretariat for this purpose;

12. Requests States to report to the Committee established pursuant to paragraph 9 above within thirty days of adoption of the present resolution on the steps they have taken to give effect to the prohibitions imposed by the present resolution;

13. Invites the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe to keep the Secretary-General informed on the situation in Kosovo and on measures taken by that organization in this regard;

14. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council regularly informed and to report on the situation in Kosovo and the implementation of the present resolution no later than thirty days following the adoption of the present resolution and every thirty days thereafter;

15. Also requests that the Secretary-General, in consultation with appropriate regional organizations, include in his first report recommendations for the establishment of a comprehensive regime to monitor the implementation of the prohibitions imposed by the present resolution, and calls upon all States, in particular neighbouring States, to extend full cooperation in this regard;

16. Decides to review the situation on the basis of the reports of the Secretary-General, which will take into account the assessments of, inter alia, the Contact Group, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe and the European Union, and decides also to reconsider the prohibitions imposed by the present resolution, including action to terminate them, following receipt of the assessment of the Secretary-General that the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, cooperating in a constructive manner with the Contact Group, has:

(a) Begun a substantive dialogue in accordance with paragraph 4 above, with the participation of an outside representative or representatives, unless any failure to do so is not because of the position of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia or Serbian authorities;

(b) Withdrawn the special police units and ceased action by the security forces affecting the civilian population;

(c) Allowed access to Kosovo by humanitarian organizations as well as representatives of the Contact Group and other embassies;

(d) Accepted a mission by the Personal Representative of the Chairman-in-Office of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe for the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia that would include a new and specific mandate for addressing the problems in Kosovo, as well as the return of the long-term missions of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe;

(e) Facilitated a mission to Kosovo by the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights;

17. Urges the Office of the Prosecutor of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991, established pursuant to resolution 827 (1993) of 25 May 1993, to begin gathering information related to the violence in Kosovo that may fall within its jurisdiction, and notes that the authorities of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia have an obligation to cooperate with the Tribunal and that the Contact Group countries will make available to the Tribunal substantiated relevant information in their possession;

18. Affirms that concrete progress to resolve the serious political and human rights issues in Kosovo will improve the international position of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and prospects for normalization of its international relationships and full participation in international institutions;

19. Emphasizes that failure to make constructive progress towards the peaceful resolution of the situation in Kosovo will lead to the consideration of additional measures;

20. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that in adopting the resolution, the Security Council had sent an unmistakable message that, by acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Council considered that the situation in Kosovo constituted a threat to international peace and security in the Balkans. It said to Belgrade that repression in Kosovo would not be tolerated by the international community and to the Kosovar side that terrorism was unacceptable. He stressed that his delegation did not support separatism or independence in Kosovo, but that it expected Belgrade to grant Kosovo an enhanced status, including self-administration. Getting the authorities in Belgrade and the Kosovo Albanian community to start a constructive dialogue without preconditions about the differences between them was the only chance of reaching a peaceful settlement.³⁰⁹

The representative of the United States stated that the international community had to avoid the mistakes of the past, when they had waited too long before taking decisive action. His delegation fully recognized that the security of the region directly affected broader international interests and that deterioration of the situation in Kosovo constituted a threat to international peace and security. He reiterated that to have the arms embargo and other sanctions lifted and to avoid further measures, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had to begin an unconditional dialogue on political status issues with the Kosovo Albanian leadership. He welcomed the commitment of senior representatives of the Kosovo Albanian leadership to non-violence and a negotiated solution to the crisis in Kosovo and stressed that his Government would not countenance terrorist activity or external support for terrorist activity. He also noted that the resolution underlined the important role of the Office of the Prosecutor of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia in gathering evidence about the violence in Kosovo that might fall within its jurisdiction. Finally, urgent action by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to stop the violence and other provocative action by its police and paramilitary security forces was of key importance.³¹⁰

Mr. Jovanovic stated that Kosovo and Metohija was a Serbian province that had always been, and was, an integral part of the Republic of Serbia. He stated that the meeting of the Security Council and the adoption of a resolution were not acceptable to the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, since questions that represented an internal matter for Serbia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia were at stake. His Government considered that the internal question could not be the subject of deliberation in any international forum without the consent of the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, and such consent had not been granted. He noted that the pretext for the action by the Security Council had been found in two anti-terrorist police actions in Kosovo and Metohija, the autonomous province of Serbia. He stressed that there was not, nor had there been, any armed conflict in Kosovo and Metohija. There was therefore no danger of a spillover, no threat to peace and security and no basis for invoking Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations. He stressed that the Contact Group was not authorized to create obligations for the Security Council by its statements, or to establish the calendar of its meetings and decisions or to determine the content of those decisions. He also maintained that Serbia was firmly committed to an unconditional dialogue with the members of the Albanian minority and to the solution of all questions through political means in accordance with European standards. However, he emphasized that the call of some countries for solutions to be sought outside Serbia or within the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia constituted a violation of the territorial integrity of Serbia, a State which had been in existence for more than 13 centuries, much longer than even the first ideas of “Yugoslavness”.³¹¹

The representative of Turkey stated that his Government had formulated a number of proposals towards finding a concrete solution to the Kosovo problem. A solution to the dispute had to be found through comprehensive dialogue between the parties and within the framework of the territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. He suggested that it should be possible for a third party, which would be decided on by the two sides, to assume a function that would facilitate reaching a settlement. He also suggested that the dialogue aimed at reinstating all the rights of all the ethnic minorities in Kosovo ought to begin immediately. Those minorities, including the Turkish community, ought to be represented in the talks concerning the future of Kosovo.³¹²

The representative of Albania stated that his Government favoured a peaceful resolution of the conflict, did not support the use of violence and was firm in demanding a harsh condemnation of Serbia. Albania called for the immediate withdrawal of the Serbian military, paramilitary and police forces and for serious talks, declaring that borders would not change and that the Kosovo problem had to be considered, as were those of other Yugoslav republics, by always applying the European model. He maintained that, given the dimensions of the Kosovo crisis and the danger of it spilling over to the south of the Balkan peninsula, the crisis went far beyond the limits of having some implications for regional security. He expressed the belief that the great responsibility of the Member States of the Security Council to preserve peace and security in the area, in order to avoid a new tragedy, would guide them to take the necessary decisions without delay.³¹³

The representative of Croatia emphasized that all political issues in Kosovo, including its future status, had to be resolved between the Belgrade authorities and Kosovo Albanians through a genuinely democratic political process, which had to take into account both the opinions of the Badinter Commission on the inviolability of the borders of new States established following the dissolution of the former Yugoslavia and the tradition of territorial autonomy in Kosovo. Croatia acknowledged the importance of normalizing relations between the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the rest of the international community. However, he stressed that the participation of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in international institutions was conditional upon its application for membership and the fulfilment of all criteria for acceptance into those institutions, as was the case with every new applicant. Consequently, it was the understanding of his delegation that that was the only context within which paragraph 18 of the resolution could be interpreted. The issue of succession to the former Yugoslavia could not be linked to the Kosovo crisis, because it was a matter which involved all the successor States to the former Yugoslavia and needed to be resolved on the basis of the opinions of the Badinter Commission and international law.³¹⁴

The representative of Greece pointed out that any measures against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia should also take into account the stability of south-eastern Europe and should not unduly harm States in the region, which were particularly hit by the negative consequences of the sanctions regime in the years 1992 through 1996.³¹⁵

The representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina first of all welcomed the role of the Security Council in the process and emphasized the determinative importance of the Council remaining seized of the matter. Second, the authority and active role of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia was unquestioned and necessary. Third, they stressed the territorial integrity and sovereignty of all the States in the region, without any prejudice to the eventual solution. Fourth, they emphasized that the basis for a solution lay with full respect for the democratic, human, national and minority rights of all the citizens of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. Fifth, noting that the role of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina had been frequently addressed before the Council, the representative emphasized that the health of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia also reflected upon the health of Bosnia and Herzegovina. Sixth, he stressed the importance of the arms-control arrangements negotiated under the authority of OSCE, both within the region and in their country. Seventh, his Government would like to underline the consistency of the interpretation provided by the representative of Slovenia with that of the relevant Security Council and General Assembly resolutions, as that related to paragraph 18 of the resolution.³¹⁶

The representative of Egypt stated that his delegation had noted that the Security Council candidly referred to the fact that the resolution had been adopted under the provisions of Chapter VII of the Charter without a prior reference to a determination by the Security Council that there existed a threat to international peace and security as required by the provisions of Article 39 of the Charter. He stated that, of course, it might be said that the Council was the master of its own procedures, and that was correct with regard to procedures. However, in principle, the constitutional requirements in the Charter should in general be scrupulously followed and respected.³¹⁷

Decision of 24 August 1998 (3918th meeting):
statement by the President

On 5 August 1998, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1160 (1998), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on developments in Kosovo, Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.³¹⁸ In his report, the Secretary-General informed the Council that the situation in Kosovo had continued to deteriorate with increased heavy fighting between the security forces of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the “so-called” Kosovo Liberation Army being reported. Most disturbing were reports of increased tensions along the border between the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and Albania. The unrelenting violence had led to a dramatic increase in internally displaced persons in Kosovo and Montenegro since his last report, which was causing further instability. He observed that the continuing infiltration from outside the borders of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia of weapons and fighting men was a source of continuing widespread concern, as were the sharp escalation of violence and the reported use of excessive force by security forces against civilians as part of the operations of the Government against KLA. He stated that centrifugal tendencies appeared to be gaining ground. He maintained that the situation was aggravated by the failure of the authorities of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the Kosovo Albanians to enter into serious negotiations on the future status of Kosovo. He underlined that the continuation or further escalation of the conflict had dangerous implications for the stability of the region. Finally, he expressed his strong hope that the question of Kosovo would be examined not in isolation, but in a manner that fully took into account and embraced the broad, regional context and the principles of the Charter of the United Nations.

At its 3918th meeting, held on 24 August 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Slovenia), with the consent of the Council invited the representatives of Germany and Italy, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 20 July 1998 from the representative of Austria addressed to the Secretary-General,³¹⁹ transmitting the text of a statement on recent fighting in Kosovo issued on 20 July 1999 by the President of the European Union.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:³²⁰

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 5 August 1998 submitted pursuant to its resolution 1160 (1998) of 31 March 1998.

The Council remains gravely concerned about the recent intense fighting in Kosovo which has had a devastating impact on the civilian population and has greatly increased the numbers of refugees and displaced persons.

The Council shares the concern of the Secretary-General that the continuation or further escalation of the conflict in Kosovo has dangerous implications for the stability of the region. In particular, the Council is gravely concerned that given the increasing numbers of displaced persons, coupled with the approaching winter, the situation in Kosovo has the potential to become an even greater humanitarian disaster. The Council affirms the right of all refugees and displaced persons to return to their homes. In particular, the Council emphasizes the importance of unhindered and continuous access of humanitarian organizations to the affected population. The Council is concerned over reports of increasing violations of international humanitarian law.

The Council calls for an immediate ceasefire. The Council emphasizes that the authorities of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the Kosovo Albanians must achieve a political solution to the issue of Kosovo and that all violence and acts of terrorism from whatever quarter are unacceptable, and reiterates the importance of the implementation of its resolution 1160 (1998). The Council reaffirms the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, and urges the authorities of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the Kosovo Albanian leadership to enter immediately into a meaningful dialogue leading to an end to the violence and a negotiated political solution to the issue of Kosovo. It supports in this context the efforts of the Contact Group, including its initiatives to engage the authorities of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the Kosovo Albanian leadership in discussions on the future status of Kosovo.

In this regard, the Council welcomes the announcement by Mr. Ibrahim Rugova, the leader of the Kosovo Albanian community, of the formation of a negotiating team to represent the interests of the Kosovo Albanian community. The formation of the Kosovo Albanian negotiating team should lead to the early commencement of a substantial dialogue with the authorities of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, with the aim of ending the violence and achieving a peaceful settlement, including the safe and permanent return of all internally displaced persons and refugees to their homes.

It remains essential that the authorities of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the Kosovo Albanians accept responsibility for ending the violence in Kosovo, for allowing the people of Kosovo to resume their normal lives and for moving the political process forward.

The Council will continue to follow the situation in Kosovo closely and will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 23 September 1998 (3930th meeting): resolution 1199 (1998)

On 4 September 1998, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1160 (1998), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in Kosovo, Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.³²¹ In his report, the Secretary-General expressed his alarm at the lack of progress towards a political settlement in Kosovo and the further loss of life, displacement of the civilian population and destruction of property resulting from the ongoing conflict. He reiterated that it was essential that negotiations get under way so as to break “the cycle of disproportionate use of force by the Serbian forces and acts of violence by the Kosovo Albanian paramilitary units” by promoting a political resolution of the conflict. Persistent tensions on the border between the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and Albania, including reports of border violations and cross-border shelling, were a further cause of serious concern. That escalation of tensions risked detrimental consequences for the stability in the region. He reiterated his concern that the United Nations operations in the region could be negatively affected by developments in Kosovo. He expressed his belief that there could be no military solution for the crisis and urged both parties to demonstrate restraint and to start the negotiating process as soon as possible. He stated that efforts by the Contact Group, regional organizations and individual States to put an end to the violence and to create appropriate conditions for a political settlement of the conflict had his full support. Finally, he noted that recent clashes in Kosovo had led to further displacement of the civilian population, which had borne the brunt of the fighting since March 1998, and urged parties in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to assure unhindered access to all affected areas and to ensure the security of the relief personnel.

At its 3930th meeting, held on 23 September 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Sweden), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Germany and Italy, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Portugal, Slovenia, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States.³²²

Speaking before the vote, the representative of the Russian Federation stated that the situation in and around Kosovo, Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, remained extremely difficult. As a result of the continued armed confrontations, including some in which heavy weapons were used, there was a steady flow of refugees and displaced persons, which, given the onset of winter, was fraught with grave humanitarian consequences. In violation of Security Council resolution 1160 (1998), material and financial support from abroad continued to be provided to Kosovo extremists, first and foremost from the territory of Albania, which was seriously destabilizing the situation and provoking tensions in Kosovo. Despite the efforts undertaken, up to that time, it had been impossible to establish a direct political dialogue between the Serbian authorities, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the leadership of the Kosovo Albanians. Under those circumstances, an urgent need had arisen to give additional impetus to international efforts to facilitate a political settlement and a normalization of the humanitarian situation in the area. He reiterated that the basic provisions of the draft resolution corresponded with the fundamental stance taken by the Russian Federation, which favoured settlement of the conflict in Kosovo exclusively through peaceful and political means on the basis of granting broad autonomy to Kosovo, with strict respect for the territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. He maintained that his delegation was convinced that there was no reasonable alternative to such an approach. In particular, the use of unilateral measures of force to settle the conflict was fraught with the risk of destabilizing the Balkan region and all of Europe and would have long-term adverse consequences for the international system, which relied on the central role of the United Nations.³²³

The representative of China stated that his country had always been of the view that the question of Kosovo was an internal matter of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. He expressed his belief that the question of Kosovo should and could be solved only by the Yugoslav people themselves in their own way. His delegation appreciated the position of the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia regarding settling the Kosovo issue through unconditional dialogue. He maintained that the situation in the Kosovo region was now stabilizing. There was no large-scale armed conflict, still less any escalation of the conflict. The Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had also taken a series of positive measures to encourage the refugees to return home and provide facilities for humanitarian relief work. He expressed grave concern about the action of blocking for political purposes the return of refugees and prolonging the humanitarian crisis so as to keep the attention of the international community on the region. He reiterated that China did not see the situation in Kosovo as a threat to international peace and security. He also reiterated that many of the countries in the region were multi-ethnic. If the Security Council became involved in a dispute without being requested to do so by the countries of the region, or went even further and unfairly applied pressure on or threatened actions against the Government of the country concerned, it would create a bad precedent and have wider negative implications. He asserted that the draft resolution had not taken into full consideration the situation in Kosovo and the legitimate rights of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia within its sphere of sovereignty. It had invoked Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter all too indiscreetly in order to threaten the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. That would not help bring about the fundamental settlement of the Kosovo issue. It might, on the contrary, reinforce the separatist and terrorist forces in the region and increase the tension there. As a result, the Chinese delegation could not support the draft resolution and would be compelled to abstain.³²⁴

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and was adopted by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention (China), as resolution 1199 (1998),³²⁵ which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 1160 (1998) of 31 March 1998,

Having considered the reports of the Secretary-General pursuant to resolution 1160 (1998), and in particular his report of 4 September 1998,

Taking note with appreciation of the statement by the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of France, Germany, Italy, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America (the Contact Group) of 12 June 1998 at the conclusion of the meeting of the Contact Group with the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of Canada and Japan, and the further statement of the Contact Group made in Bonn on 8 July 1998,

Taking note also with appreciation of the joint statement of 16 June 1998 by the Presidents of the Russian Federation and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia,

Taking note of the communication by the Prosecutor of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 addressed to the Contact Group on 7 July 1998, expressing the view that the situation in Kosovo represents an armed conflict within the terms of the mandate of the Tribunal,

Gravely concerned at the recent intense fighting in Kosovo and in particular the excessive and indiscriminate use of force by Serbian security forces and the Yugoslav Army, which have resulted in numerous civilian casualties and, according to the estimate of the Secretary-General, the displacement of over 230,000 persons from their homes,

Deeply concerned by the flow of refugees into northern Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina and other European countries as a result of the use of force in Kosovo, as well as by the increasing numbers of displaced persons within Kosovo, and other parts of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, up to 50,000 of whom the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees has estimated are without shelter and other basic necessities,

Reaffirming the right of all refugees and displaced persons to return to their homes in safety, and underlining the responsibility of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia for creating the conditions which allow them to do so,

Condemning all acts of violence by any party, as well as terrorism in pursuit of political goals by any group or individual, and all external support for such activities in Kosovo, including the supply of arms and training for terrorist activities in Kosovo, and expressing concern at the reports of continuing violations of the prohibitions imposed by resolution 1160 (1998),

Deeply concerned by the rapid deterioration in the humanitarian situation throughout Kosovo, alarmed at the impending humanitarian catastrophe as described in the report of the Secretary-General, and emphasizing the need to prevent this from happening,

Deeply concerned also by reports of increasing violations of human rights and of international humanitarian law, and emphasizing the need to ensure that the rights of all inhabitants of Kosovo are respected,

Reaffirming the objectives of resolution 1160 (1998), in which the Council expressed support for a peaceful resolution of the Kosovo problem, which would include an enhanced status for Kosovo, a substantially greater degree of autonomy, and meaningful self-administration,

Reaffirming also the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Demands that all parties, groups and individuals immediately cease hostilities and maintain a ceasefire in Kosovo, Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, which would enhance the prospects for a meaningful dialogue between the authorities of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the Kosovo Albanian leadership and reduce the risks of a humanitarian catastrophe;

4. Demands that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, in addition to the measures called for under resolution 1160 (1998), implement immediately the following concrete measures towards achieving a political solution to the situation in Kosovo as contained in the Contact Group statement of 12 June 1998:

(b) Enable effective and continuous international monitoring in Kosovo by the European Community Monitoring Mission and diplomatic missions accredited to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, including access and complete freedom of movement of such monitors to, from and within Kosovo, unimpeded by government authorities, and expeditious issuance of appropriate travel documents to international personnel contributing to the monitoring;

5. Notes, in this connection, the commitments of the President of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, in his joint statement with the President of the Russian Federation of 16 June 1998:

(a) To resolve existing problems by political means on the basis of equality for all citizens and ethnic communities in Kosovo;

(b) Not to carry out any repressive actions against the peaceful population;

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that, despite the efforts of the international community to help find a settlement, the security forces of President Milosevic of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia were continuing to inflict brutality and repression on those they “claim[ed] to see as their fellow citizens”. He stressed that President Milosevic carried a direct responsibility. If he ignored those obligations and continued to pursue military repression, the international community would respond vigorously. By acting under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter and by explicitly characterizing the deterioration of the situation in Kosovo as a threat to peace and security in the region, the Security Council was putting President Milosevic on notice that he would be held accountable for his actions.³²⁶

³²⁶ S/PV.3930, p. 4.

The representative of the United States stated that the best way to stem the crisis was for Belgrade to heed the demands for an immediate cessation of offensive actions and for the pullback of its security forces. They also called for a meaningful dialogue, without preconditions and with international involvement, leading to a solution to the Kosovo question, as set out in the resolution. In particular, the authorities in Belgrade had to be held accountable for creating the conditions to allow all refugees and displaced persons to return to their homes in safety. Belgrade was responsible for the well-being of the people of Kosovo, as well as for the security of all diplomatic personnel and non-governmental humanitarian personnel on the ground. He also underlined the importance of full cooperation with the Tribunal. He expressed their hope that the resolution and the ongoing efforts to reach a settlement would convince Belgrade to comply with the demands of the international community, but stressed that planning at the North Atlantic Treaty Organization for military operations, if those efforts did not succeed, was nearing completion. He underscored that the international community would not stand idly by as the situation in Kosovo deteriorated.³²⁷

Decision of 24 October 1998 (3937th meeting):
resolution 1203 (1998)

On 4 September 1998, pursuant to Security Council resolutions 1160 (1998) and 1199 (1998), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in Kosovo, Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. In his report, the Secretary-General informed the Council that, during the reporting period, fighting in Kosovo had continued unabated.³²⁸ He stated that the international community had witnessed appalling atrocities in Kosovo, reminiscent of the recent past elsewhere in the Balkans. Those had been borne out by reporting by the Kosovo Diplomatic Observer Mission and other reliable sources. It was clear beyond any reasonable doubt that the great majority of such acts had been committed by security forces in Kosovo acting under the authority of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, although Kosovo Albanian paramilitary units had engaged in armed action also, and there was good reason to believe that ³²⁷ Ibid., pp. 4-5.

they too had committed atrocities. He cautioned that, if the present state of affairs continued, thousands could die in the winter and that conditions had to be created that would allow for the return of a significant number of internally displaced persons. He expressed his hope that the negotiations between the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the Kosovo Albanian leadership would be resumed without delay and would produce early agreements, and that they would result in the restoration of confidence that was needed for a return and resettlement of all those who had fled their home in fear. Such agreements might also envisage more far-reaching steps, possibly even institutional reforms, to address long-term needs. He suggested that it would be useful to initiate consultations amongst international actors to prepare to face such a challenge, without necessarily awaiting the agreements. He also suggested that it would be helpful if, in the immediate term, the Kosovo Diplomatic Observer Mission were brought to its full strength and if the presence of human rights observers were enhanced. He noted that for the report he had had to rely largely on information and analysis from sources external to the United Nations and did not have the means necessary to provide an independent assessment of compliance, as required by the Security Council in paragraph 15 of resolution 1199 (1998), other than on the humanitarian situation. Therefore, the Council might wish to make its own judgment in that respect on the basis of the present report. He reiterated that, as the Council had affirmed, the deterioration in the situation in Kosovo, Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, constituted a threat to peace and security in the region.

At its 3937th meeting, held on 24 October 1998 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United Kingdom), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Germany, Italy, Poland and Ukraine, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Bahrain, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Portugal, Slovenia, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States.³²⁹ The President further drew the attention of the Council to the following documents:

letters dated 14, 16 and 23 October 1998, respectively from the representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting the endorsement of the Yugoslav Republic of Serbia of the accord on the problems in Kosovo and Metohija, reached by the President of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the United States Special Envoy, the agreement on the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe Verification Mission in Kosovo, and a statement on the meeting between the Yugoslav President and the Head of the OSCE Mission in Kosovo;³³⁰ letters dated 16 and 19 October 1998 from the representative of Poland addressed to the President of the Security Council and to the Secretary-General, respectively, transmitting a decision of OSCE on Kosovo and the agreement on the OSCE Verification Mission in Kosovo;³³¹ and a letter dated 22 October 1998 from the representative of the United States addressed to the President of the Security Council, enclosing the text of the Kosovo Verification Mission Agreement between NATO and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.³³² He further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 16 October 1998 from the representative of Canada to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council,³³³ expressing the view that the Council should move quickly to adopt a resolution to lock in the agreement that the President of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had signed, and to provide for its enforcement.

The representative of Poland presented the view of the Polish Chairmanship-in-Office of OSCE. The Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe was concerned at the unfolding crisis in Kosovo, its dangerous potential ramifications for peace and stability in the region and in Europe, and the fact that the provisions of Security Council resolutions 1160 (1998) and 1199 (1998) had not been fully complied with. He informed the Council that OSCE had taken the position that the solution should be based on respect for the territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and on the standards defined in the United Nations Charter, as well as on OSCE documents. The Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe insisted that such a solution take into account the right of the Kosovo Albanians to autonomy and significant self-government, which would be reflected in a special status of the province within the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. He noted that, thanks to the efforts of the international community, the process of settling the Kosovo dispute had entered into a new phase. The OSCE Chairman-in-Office had signed an agreement between OSCE and the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia on the establishment of the Mission. That agreement, together with the agreement on the NATO-Kosovo Air Verification regime, constituted an important step towards the development of a political framework aimed at ensuring compliance with the demands set out in resolution 1199 (1998). He also stated that the leader of the Kosovo Albanians, had, in spite of some reservations, welcomed the agreement and expressed the view that the Albanian community in Kosovo would cooperate with the OSCE Verification Mission in Kosovo. The Kosovo Albanian leader saw that act as an important step towards enhancing the international presence in Kosovo, which needed to facilitate negotiations for a political solution to the crisis, the recognition of Albanian community institutions, including local police, and a decision on the future of Kosovo. Finally, the representative of Poland expressed the belief that an effective implementation of the recently concluded agreements had to be secured, if the process of conflict resolution was to gain momentum.³³⁴

The representative of Ukraine stressed that, as the Ministry for Foreign Affairs of Ukraine had noted, while understanding the motivations behind the decision by NATO of 13 October 1998 on the possibility of the use of military force in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, his delegation was still hopeful that the latest steps of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia leadership as to the implementation of Security Council resolution 1199 (1998) would make it possible to avert the use of force, because it could lead to unpredictable consequences.³³⁵

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Costa Rica stated that, while his Government was supporting the draft resolution, he wanted to state some ³³⁴ S/PV.3937, pp. 2-4.

³³⁵ Ibid., pp. 4-5.

misgivings of a legal nature, with regard to certain aspects of the draft resolution. He maintained that a goal such as that one, which was ethically and morally unquestionable, deserved to be achieved by means of international law. He expressed the belief that any Security Council resolution ought to be strictly in keeping with international law and with a sound political concept. The adoption of any measure that implied the use of force or military troops had to meet all the legal, political and strategic requirements of the Charter and be based on practical experience. Any action that implied the use of force, with the very limited exception of the right of legitimate defence, thus required clear authorization by the Council for each specific case. He maintained that those principles were implicit in the primary responsibility of the Council with respect to the maintenance of international peace and security and in the absolute prohibition of the use of force in international relations. The Council could not transfer to others or set aside its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security. His delegation did not believe that the Council should authorize missions with military troops whose limits and powers were not clearly pre-established or whose mandate might be conditional on the subsequent decisions of other organs or groups of States. He insisted that the Security Council alone could determine whether there had been a violation of its resolutions, adopted in the exercise of its mandated powers. Only the Security Council could authorize the use of force to ensure compliance with its resolutions, in exercise of its primary responsibility of the maintenance of international peace and security.³³⁶

The representative of Brazil observed that a difficult negotiating process had prevented the Security Council from moving more rapidly on Kosovo after the agreements reached between the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia on the one hand, and OSCE and NATO on the other. In its attempt to reach a consensus, the Security Council had been caught between two opposing tendencies. Some had argued that the Council's role at that stage should not go beyond a mere endorsement of those agreements; others had argued in favour of exerting as much pressure as possible, if need be, without a clear reference to the prerogatives of the Council under the Charter. Of particular concern was the possibility that the Council

might be transferring to other organizations its essential role in making the determination on whether or not its resolutions were being complied with. He expressed the belief that before it became sufficiently clear that the trend of the past few months had been reversed in Kosovo, the Council could not allow itself to be seen as showing complacency about non-compliance or even incomplete compliance with its resolutions. He commented that his delegation did not wish to raise the question of how regional groups define themselves. However, as a State Member of the United Nations it was his country's right to defend the Charter and according to the Charter, "non-universal organisms" might resort to force only on the basis either of the right to legitimate self-defence, as stipulated in Article 51, or through the procedures of Chapter VIII, in particular Article 53, which imposed on them the obligation of seeking Security Council authorization beforehand and abiding by the Council's decisions. He underscored that the integration of non-universal organizations into the wider collective security concept enshrined in the Charter was a serious matter. He maintained that it would be regrettable if they were to slide into a two-tiered international system, in which the Security Council would continue to bear primary responsibility for the maintenance of peace and security in most of the world, while it would bear only secondary responsibility in regions covered by special defence arrangements. He noted that his delegation was glad that the suggestion to have a preambular paragraph reaffirming the primary responsibility of the Council for the maintenance of international peace and security had been taken on board. In light of that reaffirmation and of other changes which satisfied their basic concerns, his delegation would be voting in favour of the draft resolution before them.³³⁷

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that a new, important stage had been reached, opening up prospects for a political solution of the Kosovo problem. He reiterated that the Russian Federation fully supported the Agreements regarding the dispatch of the verification missions and called upon Belgrade to implement them fully. He noted that there had also clearly been some progress in the fulfilment of the requirements contained in Security Council resolutions 1160 (1998) and 1199 (1998), although much still remained to be done. Regarding the draft resolution, he stressed that enforcement elements had been excluded, and there were no provisions in it that would directly or indirectly sanction the automatic use of force, which would be to the detriment of the prerogatives of the Council under the Charter. Observing that in the course of the work on the draft resolution, much attention had been paid to the question of ensuring the security of the personnel of the verification missions in Kosovo, he expressed their satisfaction that it was clearly stated in paragraph 9 that, in the event of an emergency, measures to ensure the safety of the verification missions, including arrangements for evacuating OSCE personnel, would be undertaken strictly in accordance with the procedure provided for in the agreements signed with the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. He commented that the clarity introduced on that issue provided guarantees against arbitrary and unsanctioned actions. He also maintained that one could not fail to take account of the possible danger to the implementation of the agreements between OSCE and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia as a result of actions by the Kosovo Albanians and expressed alarm at news of their continuing failure to comply with the demands of the Security Council. Noting that illegal weapons continued to reach Kosovo in violation of the arms embargo, he emphasized that that created a real threat of a new outbreak of violence and tension. He reminded members that resolution 1160 (1998) had been adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter, and that the draft resolution also made reference to that chapter, which served as a reminder to those who were violating the arms embargo and in particular the prohibition on supplying outside weapons or assistance to the Kosovo terrorists. He cautioned that the draft resolution did not take into account the recent positive changes with respect to the implementation by Belgrade of the Council's demands. His delegation could not agree with the one-sided assertion in the preambular part of the text that the unresolved situation in Kosovo constituted a continuing threat to peace and security in the region. He also expressed regret that the sponsors of the draft resolution refused to delete the portion of the text relating to freedom of operation of media outlets in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. Questions of freedom of the press lay far beyond the powers of the Security Council, and therefore could not be the object of a Council resolution, especially one adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter. It was other United Nations organs that considered such matters. He informed the Council that under the circumstances, the Russian delegation would abstain in the vote on the draft resolution. Finally, he reiterated that his delegation was convinced that there were no differences of opinion among members of the Security Council on the strategy for action to achieve a peaceful settlement in Kosovo. That strategy, which precluded the granting of carte blanche with respect to the use of force, was reflected in the draft resolution and the Russian Federation would not object to its adoption.³³⁸

The representative of the United Kingdom welcomed the draft resolution and noted that it was right that its commitments were enshrined in a mandatory Chapter VII resolution. The history of unfulfilled commitments from the President of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia over the summer meant that they could not rely on his word, but had to watch his actions closely. In agreeing to the two missions, the Yugoslav President had accepted that the international community had a significant role to play in resolving the problems of Kosovo. He stressed that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had guaranteed the freedom of movement of the OSCE Verification Mission as well as its safety and security. The representative underlined that there should be no doubt that his Government would use to the full their inherent right to protect their nationals if they were in danger, and the right under the draft resolution to ensure their safety and freedom of movement. The United Kingdom called upon the authorities in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the Kosovo Albanian leadership to seize the opportunity to build a new Kosovo, based on free elections and the principle of self-government for its people. Failure to do so would not be understood or accepted by the international community.³³⁹

A number of other speakers took the floor, welcoming the signing of the agreements between OSCE and NATO and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia; calling for the two parties to begin a constructive, unconditional dialogue leading to agreement on all matters and issues that had yet to be resolved and to take measures to prevent a humanitarian catastrophe.³⁴⁰

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and was adopted by 13 votes to none, with 2 abstentions (China and the Russian Federation), as resolution 1203 (1998),³⁴¹ which reads:

and expressing concern at the reports of continuing violations of the prohibitions imposed by resolution 1160 (1998),

17. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

At the same meeting, speaking after the vote, the representative of China stated that his delegation understood the agreements on the question of Kosovo reached between the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the parties concerned and that they evaluated positively the efforts made by the Government in alleviating the humanitarian situation in Kosovo and pursuing lasting peace and reconciliation in the region. However, at the same time as those agreements were being concluded, a regional organization made the decision to take military actions against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and interfere in its internal affairs — a decision that was made unilaterally, without consulting the Security Council or seeking its authorization. That act had violated the purposes, principles and relevant provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, as well as international law and widely acknowledged norms governing relations between States. He reiterated that the question of Kosovo needed to be resolved on the basis of maintaining the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, conforming to the provisions and requirements of the Charter. The implementation of the agreements also had to proceed on that basis and be completed through full consultation and cooperation with the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. The representative stated that, while China did not oppose the adoption of a well-focused technical resolution by the Council to endorse the agreements reached between the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and relevant parties and to encourage peaceful approaches on the question of Kosovo, his Government did not favour the inclusion in the resolution of content beyond the above agreements, and was even more opposed to using Council resolutions to pressure the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia or to interfere in its internal affairs. He noted that the Chinese delegation had put forward its amendments during the Council's consultations, among which the request to delete those elements authorizing use of force or threatening to use force was accommodated. He stressed that China believed that the resolution did not entail any authorization to use force or to threaten to use force against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, nor should it be interpreted as authorizing the use of force. Nonetheless, the resolution still contained several elements beyond the agreements reached between the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the parties concerned, including reference to Chapter VII of the Charter and elements of interference in the internal affairs of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, and the Chinese delegation therefore abstained in voting.³⁴²

The representative of the United States stated that the voices of reason and moderation in Kosovo had been muffled by repressive political, military and police actions and by those who advocated violence and the use of force over negotiation. Recently, Belgrade had taken steps to silence the independent media, further depriving the people of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia of the capacity to make their own judgments about events in Kosovo and to assess accurately the actions of their leaders. In that context, he expressed regret that not all members of the Council were able to support the resolution, and in particular its language about the importance of free media to a peaceful resolution of the Kosovo crisis. He also stressed that the investigations of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia into Kosovo were essential to restoring peace and security and had to continue with the cooperation of everyone. He acknowledged that a credible use of force was key to achieving OSCE and NATO agreements and remained key to ensuring their full implementation. In addition, no party should be under the misapprehension that it could take any action that would hinder or endanger international verifiers or the personnel of humanitarian organizations. He also insisted that the NATO allies, in agreeing on 13 October to the use of force, made it clear that they had the authority, the will and the means to resolve the issue, and that they retained that authority. Finally, he reiterated that the crisis in Kosovo could and should be resolved through peaceful dialogue and negotiation.³⁴³

The representative of France stated that the way was open to a peaceful settlement to the question of Kosovo, but vigilance and commitment on the part of all would be required. He noted that members of the Council were aware of the dangers and threats and did not want any recurrence of the violations of the safety and security of those entrusted with the verification and implementation of the agreements. The Council therefore welcomed the commitment of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to guarantee the security of the verification missions, but it affirmed that, in the event of an emergency, action might be necessary to ensure the safety and freedom of movement of the Mission, as envisaged in the agreements signed in Belgrade.³⁴⁴

Decision of 19 January 1999 (3967th meeting): statement by the President

At its 3967th meeting, held on 19 January 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Brazil), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Germany and Italy, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 16 January 1999 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁴⁵ in which the representative of Albania requested that an urgent meeting of the Security Council be convened with regard to the massacre of ethnic Albanians in the village of Racak, Kosovo. The President further drew the attention of the Council to the following other documents: a letter dated 17 January 1999 from the representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia addressed to the Secretary-

General,³⁴⁶ transmitting a statement by the President of the Republic of Serbia following a statement of the Head of the OSCE Verification Mission; and a letter dated 18 January 1999 from the representative of Albania addressed to the Secretary-General,³⁴⁷ transmitting a letter from the Minister for Foreign Affairs concerning the massacre of ethnic Albanians in Racak, Kosovo, urging the Secretary-General's immediate engagement in the matter.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:³⁴⁸

The Security Council strongly condemns the massacre of Kosovo Albanians in the village of Racak in southern Kosovo, Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, on 15 January 1999, as reported by the Kosovo Verification Mission of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe. It notes with deep concern that the report of the Mission states that the victims were civilians, including women and at least one child. The Council also takes note of the statement by the head of the Mission that the responsibility for the massacre lay with security forces of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, and that uniformed members of both the armed forces of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and Serbian special police had been involved. The Council emphasizes the need for an urgent and full investigation of the facts and urgently calls upon the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to work with the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 and the Mission to ensure that those responsible are brought to justice.

The Council deplores the decision by Belgrade to declare the head of the Mission, William Walker, persona non grata, and reaffirms its full support for Mr. Walker and the efforts of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe to facilitate a peaceful settlement. It calls upon Belgrade to rescind this decision and to cooperate fully with Mr. Walker and the Mission.

The Council deplores the decision by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to refuse access to the Prosecutor of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, and calls upon the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to cooperate fully with the International Tribunal in carrying out an investigation in Kosovo, in line with the call for cooperation with the Tribunal in Council resolutions 1160 (1998) of 31 March 1998, 1199 (1998) of 23 September 1998 and 1203 (1998) of 24 October 1998.

The Council notes that, against the clear advice of the Mission, Serb forces returned to Racak on 17 January 1999 and that fighting broke out.

The Council considers that the events in Racak constitute the latest in a series of threats to the efforts to settle this conflict through negotiation and peaceful means.

The Council condemns the shooting of Mission personnel on 15 January 1999 and all actions endangering Mission and international personnel. It reaffirms its full commitment to the safety and security of the Mission personnel. It reiterates its demands that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the Kosovo Albanians cooperate fully with the Mission.

The Council calls upon the parties to cease immediately all acts of violence and to engage in talks on a lasting settlement.

The Council also strongly warns the Kosovo Liberation Army against actions which are contributing to tensions.

The Council considers all of these events to be violations of its resolutions and of relevant agreements and commitments calling for restraint. It calls upon all parties to respect fully their commitments under the relevant resolutions and affirms once again its full support for international efforts to facilitate a peaceful settlement on the basis of equality for all citizens and ethnic communities in Kosovo. The Council reaffirms its commitment to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.

The Council takes note with concern of the report of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees that five-and-a-half-thousand civilians fled the Racak area following the massacre, showing how rapidly a humanitarian crisis could again develop if steps are not taken by the parties to reduce tensions.

The Council will remain actively seized of the matter.

statement by the President

At its 3974th meeting, held on 29 January 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Brazil), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Germany and Italy, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 26 January 1999 from the representatives of the Russian Federation and the United States addressed to the Secretary-General³⁴⁹ and to a letter dated 29 February 1999 from the representative of the United Kingdom addressed to the President of the Security Council.³⁵⁰

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:³⁵¹

The Security Council expresses its deep concern at the escalating violence in Kosovo, Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. It underlines the risk of a further deterioration in the humanitarian situation if steps are not taken by the parties to reduce tensions. The Council reiterates its concern at attacks on civilians and underlines the need for a full and unhindered investigation of such actions. It calls once again upon the parties to respect fully their obligations under the relevant resolutions and to cease immediately all acts of violence and provocation.

The Council welcomes and supports the decisions of the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of France, Germany, Italy, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America (the Contact Group), following their meeting in London on 29 January 1999, which aim at reaching a political settlement between the parties and establishing a framework and timetable for that purpose. The Council demands that the parties accept their responsibilities and comply fully with these decisions and requirements, as with its relevant resolutions.

The Council reiterates its full support for international efforts, including those of the Contact Group and the Kosovo Verification Mission of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, to reduce tensions in Kosovo and facilitate a political settlement on the basis of substantial autonomy and equality for all citizens and ethnic communities in Kosovo and the recognition of the legitimate rights of the Kosovo Albanians and other communities in Kosovo. It reaffirms its commitment to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.

The Council will follow the negotiations closely and would welcome members of the Contact Group keeping it informed about the progress reached therein.

The Council will remain actively seized of the matter.

Letter dated 24 March 1999 from the Permanent Representative of the Russian Federation to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council

Initial proceedings

Decision of 26 March 1999 (3989th meeting): rejection of a draft resolution

By a letter dated 24 March 1999 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the representative of the Russian Federation requested that an urgent meeting of the Security Council be convened to consider “an extremely dangerous situation” caused by the unilateral military action of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.³⁵²

At its 3988th meeting, held on 24 March 1999 in response to the request contained in the preceding letter, the Council included the letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (China), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Albania, Belarus, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Germany and India, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. He also invited Mr. Vladislav Jovanovic to address the Council in the course of its discussion of the item. The President then recalled Security Council resolutions 1160 (1998), 1199 (1998), 1199 (1998), and 1203 (1998).

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 24 March 1999 from the representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁵³ requesting the Council to convene an urgent meeting, on the basis of Chapter VII of the Charter, so that it might take an immediate action to condemn and to stop the NATO military activities against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. He stressed that by carrying out air strikes against military and civilian facilities, the armed forces of NATO had committed an act of aggression on the territory of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, which represented a blatant and flagrant violation of the basic principles of the Charter of the United Nations and was in direct contravention of Article 53 (1), in which it was stated that “no enforcement action shall be taken under regional arrangements or by regional agencies without the authorization of the Security Council”. He stated that, in reply to the NATO aggression against its territory, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, as a sovereign and independent State and a founding member of the United Nations, had no alternative but to defend its sovereignty and territorial integrity in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter. The President further drew the attention of the Council to a letter of the same date addressed to the President of the Security Council from the representative of Belarus, also calling for an urgent meeting of the Council to consider the situation caused by the military activity of NATO.³⁵⁴

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that his country was profoundly outraged at the use of military force by NATO against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. He stressed that the countries involved in the unilateral use of force against the sovereign Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, carried out in violation of the Charter of the United Nations and without the authorization of the Council, needed to realize the heavy responsibility they bore for subverting the Charter and other norms of international law. He continued that the members of NATO were not entitled to decide the fate of other sovereign and independent States. Those States were not only members of their alliance, but also Members of the United Nations, so that it was their obligation to be guided by the Charter of the United Nations, in particular its Article 103, which clearly established the absolute priority for Members of the Organization of Charter obligations over any other international obligations. The representative maintained that the attempts to justify the NATO strikes with arguments about preventing a humanitarian catastrophe in Kosovo were completely untenable. Those attempts were in no way based on the Charter or other generally recognized rules of international law. He also underscored that the decision of NATO to use military force was particularly unacceptable from any point of view, because the potential of political and diplomatic methods to yield a settlement in Kosovo had not been exhausted. He stated that the Russian Federation demanded the immediate cessation of illegal military action against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, and they reserved the right to raise in the Security Council the question of the adoption of appropriate measures with respect to the situation, which had arisen as a result of the illegal actions of NATO and posed a clear threat to international peace and security.³⁵⁵

The representative of the United States stated that the current situation in Kosovo was of grave concern to everyone. The United States and its allies had begun military action only with the greatest reluctance. He expressed the belief that such action was necessary to respond to Belgrade's brutal persecution of Kosovo Albanians, violations of international law, excessive and indiscriminate use of force, refusal to negotiate to resolve the issue peacefully and recent military build-up in Kosovo, all of which foreshadowed a humanitarian catastrophe. He stressed that the continuing offensive by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia was threatening the stability of the region and constituted a threat to the safety of international observers and humanitarian workers in Kosovo. He reminded the Council that resolutions 1199 (1998) and 1203 (1998) recognized that the situation in Kosovo constituted a threat to peace and security in the region and invoked Chapter VII of the Charter. In resolution 1199 (1998) the Council had demanded that the Serbian forces take immediate steps to improve the humanitarian situation and avert the impending humanitarian catastrophe. Moreover, Belgrade had refused to comply with agreements with NATO and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) to verify its compliance with Security Council demands. The actions of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia also violated its commitments under the Helsinki Final Act, as well as its obligations under the international law of human rights. He summed up by saying that Belgrade's actions in Kosovo could not be dismissed as an internal matter. He reiterated that efforts by the Contact Group had led to talks in Rambouillet and Paris, which had produced a balanced agreement, which the Kosovo Albanians had signed, but Belgrade had rejected. While they were mindful that violations of the ceasefire by the Kosovo Liberation Army had also contributed to the situation, it was Belgrade's policy that had prevented a peaceful solution. He concluded by expressing his country's belief that the action by NATO was justified and

necessary to stop the violence and prevent an even greater humanitarian disaster.³⁵⁶

The representative of Canada stated that the conflict in Kosovo threatened to precipitate a far larger humanitarian disaster and destabilize the entire region. He emphasized that the preference of his delegation had been for a diplomatic solution and the diplomatic track had been given every chance to succeed. The continuing oppression in Kosovo by the Government in Belgrade and its continuing refusal to act in compliance with the requirements of successive Security Council resolutions had left NATO with no choice but to take action.³⁵⁷

The representative of Slovenia, noting that the military action against the civilian population had further escalated, stated that the situation represented a case of massive violations of the relevant Security Council resolutions, in particular resolution 1199 (1998) of 23 September 1998, which called for an immediate end to all military activity against the civilian population, and was a looming threat to international peace and security in the region. He stressed that their main concern were the consequences of the systematic and brutal violations of the Security Council resolutions. He expressed regret that not all permanent members were willing to act in accordance with their special responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security under the Charter of the United Nations. Their apparent absence of support had prevented the Council from using its powers to the full extent and from authorizing the action, which was necessary to put an end to the violations of its resolutions. He stated that it was his country's expectation and belief that the action that was being undertaken would be carried out strictly within the substantive parameters established by the relevant Security Council resolutions, particularly resolution 1199 (1998) of 23 September 1998, which called for an immediate end to all military activity against the civilian population.³⁵⁸

The representative of the Gambia expressed regret that the international community had had to take the actions it had. He maintained that, while regional arrangements had responsibility for the maintenance of peace and security in their areas, the Council had primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, as stated in the Charter of the United Nations. However, he noted that at times the exigencies of a situation demanded and warranted decisive and immediate action. His country had found that the present situation in Kosovo deserved such a treatment. He therefore called on those with whom the responsibility lay to take the necessary actions to prevent a continuation of the action before it was too late.³⁵⁹

³⁵⁶ Ibid., pp. 4-5.

³⁵⁷ Ibid., pp. 5-6.

³⁵⁸ Ibid., pp. 6-7.

The representative of the Netherlands stated that they had participated in and assumed responsibility for the NATO decisions because there had been no other solution. He underlined that a country or alliance that was compelled to take up arms to avert a humanitarian catastrophe would always prefer to be able to base its action on a specific Security Council resolution. However, if due to one or two permanent members' rigid interpretation of the concept of domestic jurisdiction, such a resolution was not attainable, they could not sit back and simply let the humanitarian catastrophe occur. He stressed that in such a situation they would act on the legal basis they had available, and what they had available in that case was more than adequate.³⁶⁰

The representative of Brazil stated that the Government of Brazil had expressed its concern about the developments in the crisis and regretted that the escalation of tensions had resulted in recourse to military action.³⁶¹

The representative of France stated that the actions that had been decided upon were a response to the violation by Belgrade of its international obligations, which stemmed in particular from the Security Council resolutions adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter. He reiterated that the Belgrade authorities needed to be persuaded that the only way to settle the crisis in Kosovo was for them to halt their military offensives in Kosovo and accept the framework defined by the Rambouillet Accords.³⁶²

The representative of Malaysia stated that as a matter of principle, his delegation was not in favour of the use or threat of use of force to resolve any conflict situation. If the use of force was necessary, it should be a recourse of last resort, to be sanctioned by the Council, which had been vested with the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security. He stated that the ongoing conflict would have international repercussions and that the international community could not afford to stand idly by. His delegation had wished that the crisis in Kosovo could have been dealt with directly by the Council and regretted that in the absence of action by the Council it had been necessary for action to be taken outside the Council.³⁶³

The representative of Namibia stated that his delegation wished to underscore that military action against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia might not be the solution, and that the implications of that action might go beyond the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, thereby posing a serious threat to peace and security in the region. Therefore, his delegation appealed for the immediate cessation of the ongoing military action and for exhausting all possible avenues for a peaceful resolution of the conflict.³⁶⁴

The representative of Gabon stated that his delegation would have hoped that the Contact Group would continue to use all its authority to compel the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to sign the Rambouillet agreement. His Government was in principle opposed to the use of force to settle local or international disputes.³⁶⁵

The representative of Argentina stated that they reiterated their position regarding the urgent need for strict compliance with Security Council resolution 1160 (1998), and 1199 (1998) and appealed to the Belgrade Government to return to the path of negotiation.³⁶⁶

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that, in defiance of the international community, the President of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had refused to accept the interim political settlement negotiated at Rambouillet, to observe the limits on security-force levels agreed to on 25 October and to end the excessive and disproportionate use of force in Kosovo. He asserted that renewed acts of repression by the authorities of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia would cause further loss of civilian life and would lead to displacement of the civilian population on a large scale in hostile conditions. He maintained that in those circumstances, and as an exceptional measure on grounds of overwhelming humanitarian necessity, military intervention was legally justifiable. The force now proposed was directed exclusively to averting a humanitarian catastrophe and was the minimum judged necessary for that purpose.³⁶⁷

The representative of China stated that NATO, with the United States in the lead, had launched military strikes against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, seriously exacerbating the situation in the Balkan region. He underlined that the act amounted to a blatant violation of the Charter of the United Nations and of the accepted norms of international law. The Government of China strongly opposed that act. He reiterated that the question of Kosovo, as an internal matter of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, needed to be resolved among the parties concerned in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia themselves. He maintained that it had always been their position that, under the Charter, it was the Security Council that bore primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, and it was only the Council that could determine whether a given situation threatened international peace and security and could take appropriate action. His Government was firmly opposed to any act that violated this principle and that challenged the authority of the Security Council. He stated that the Chinese Government vigorously called for an immediate cessation of the military attacks by NATO against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.³⁶⁸

The representative of the Russian Federation then took a second intervention to make two factual clarifications. First, in response to the statement that the Russian Federation was a co-sponsor of the packages of documents of the Contact Group, he stated that, while the Russian Federation was a member of the Contact Group, and the Contact Group had adopted a document in London that was the basis of the draft political settlement; the military implementation had never been discussed in the Contact Group, but in

NATO. Second, in response to the statement that the actions of NATO had become inevitable because one or two of the permanent members of the Security Council had blocked action, he stated that that was not correct because no proposals on that topic had been introduced in the Council by anyone.³⁶⁹

Mr. Jovanovic stated that the armed forces of NATO had committed a unilateral act of aggression against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, despite the fact that his Government had not threatened any country or the peace and security of the region. It had been attacked because it sought to solve an internal problem and had used its sovereign right to fight terrorism and prevent the secession of a part of its territory. He underscored that the decision to attack an independent country had been taken outside the Security Council, the sole body responsible, under the Charter of the United Nations, for maintaining international peace and security. That blatant aggression was a flagrant violation of the basic principles of the Charter of the United Nations and was in direct contravention of Article 53 (1). His country requested the Council to take immediate action to strongly condemn and stop the aggression against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and to protect its sovereignty and territorial integrity. Until that happened, his country had no alternative but to defend its sovereignty and territorial integrity by all means at its disposal, in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations. He stressed that the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia remained committed to a reasonable political settlement of the problems in Kosovo and Metohija that respected the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Serbia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and guaranteed the equality of the rights of all citizens and national communities living there.³⁷⁰

The representative of Belarus stressed that the use of military force against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia without a proper decision of the only competent international body, which was the Security Council, qualified as an act of aggression, with all ensuing responsibility for its humanitarian, military, and political consequences. His country was disturbed that the unlawful military action against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia meant an intentional disregard for the role and responsibility of the Security Council in maintaining international peace and security. He stated that Belarus called for an immediate stop to the use of force against and in the sovereign Federal Republic of Yugoslavia; for the immediate resumption of the negotiating process on a peaceful settlement; and insisted on restoring the Charter role of the Council in maintaining international peace and security.³⁷¹

The representative of India stated that the attacks against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia were in clear violation of Article 53 of the Charter. He emphasized that no country, group of countries or regional arrangement, no matter how powerful, could arrogate to itself the right to take arbitrary and unilateral military action against others. Noting that Kosovo was recognized as part of the sovereign territory of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, he stressed that under the application of Article 2 (7), the United Nations had no role in the settlement of the domestic political problems of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. He stated that the only exception laid down by Article 2 (7) would be the application of enforcement measures under Chapter VII, and that the attacks had not been authorized by the Council, acting under Chapter VII, and were therefore illegal. He commented that they had heard that the attack on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia would be called off if its Government accepted what had been described as "NATO peacekeeping forces" on its territory. He observed that his country and the entire membership of the Non-Aligned Movement had repeatedly said that the United Nations could not be forced to abdicate its role in peacekeeping and that a peacekeeping operation could be deployed only with the consent of the Government concerned. He stressed that there was a very real danger that the attacks would imperil regional peace and security and spread discord in the Balkans and beyond. He urged NATO to stop immediately the military action against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.³⁷²

The representative of Germany spoke as the Presidency of the European Union and informed the Council of a statement adopted by the European Council at its meeting in Berlin. The statement said that policy of the European Council was directed against the irresponsible policy of the Yugoslav leadership. President Milosevic needed to stop Serb aggression in Kosovo and sign the Rambouillet Accords, which included a NATO-led implementation force to provide stability. The only objective of the international community was to find a political future for Kosovo, on the basis of the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, which did justice to the concerns and aspirations of all the people of Kosovo.³⁷³

³⁷² Ibid., pp. 15-16.

The representative of Albania expressed the total support of his Government for the military action of NATO and considered it an action in support of peace and stability in the region. The international community had not declared war on Serbia, because war had existed there for a long time. However, the international community had achieved the first step towards peace, security in the region and the reestablishment of human values and of the principles that were so well expressed in the Charter of the United Nations. He maintained that no country that tried to bury the basic Charter principles of peace, security and cooperation and that committed genocide and crimes against humanity could expect to receive the protection of the United Nations and the Security Council.³⁷⁴

The representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina stated that, while military force was never a welcome option, it was sometimes the only alternative. He maintained that a country that had most recently engaged in aggression and military intervention against its own neighbours, and that had committed genocidal acts against its own population and others, that had refused to adhere to international law and numerous Security Council resolutions or to cooperate with the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, could not credibly plead for the protection of international law.³⁷⁵

The representative of Slovenia spoke again regarding Security Council resolutions 1199 (1998) and 1203 (1998). He stated that the situation in Kosovo was defined by the Council as a threat to international peace and security in the region. That defined the ³⁷³ Ibid., pp. 16-18.

³⁷⁵ Ibid., pp. 18-19.

situation as something other than a matter that was essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of a State. Therefore, he asserted that Article 2 (7) of the Charter did not apply. He also stated that, while the responsibility of the Security Council for international peace and security was a primary responsibility, it was not an exclusive responsibility. He stated that it very much depended on the Security Council and on its ability to develop policies that would make it worthy of the authority it had under the Charter, whether the primacy of its responsibility would actually be the reality of the United Nations.³⁷⁶

At its 3989th meeting, held on 26 March 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council again included the letter from the representative of the Russian Federation in its agenda.³⁷⁷ Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (China), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Albania, Belarus, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Cuba, Germany, India and Ukraine, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then recalled Security Council resolutions 1160 (1998), 1199 (1998) and 1203 (1998). The President further drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Belarus and the Russian Federation and sponsored by India.³⁷⁸

At the same meeting, the President also drew the attention of the Council to the following documents: a letter dated 24 March 1999 from the representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting the decision of the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to declare a state of war;³⁷⁹ a letter dated 25 March 1999 from the representative of Tajikistan addressed to the Secretary-General, expressing concern over the bomb strikes and calling for a peaceful resolution to the conflict;³⁸⁰ and a letter dated 24 March 1999 from the representative of Belarus addressed to the Secretary-General, calling for the convening of an emergency meeting of the Security Council on the matter.³⁸¹ He also drew attention to letters dated 25 March 1999 from the representative of

Ukraine addressed to the Secretary-General,³⁸² stating that it considered the military action by NATO as aggression against a sovereign State and urging the Council to consider the situation; and a letter dated 25 March 1999 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting a letter dated 23 March 1999 from the Secretary-General of NATO.³⁸³

At the same meeting, speaking before the vote, the representative of Canada, noting that the draft resolution demanded an immediate cessation of the hostilities and urgent resumption of negotiations, pointed out that the entire international community had been negotiating urgently and actively since the beginning of the humanitarian crisis in Kosovo in order to avert the escalation. Moreover, the Security Council had adopted a number of resolutions and presidential statements asking the President of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to put an end to the repression. However, during that process, the President of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had “taken advantage of the international community’s good intentions” to continue and even intensify his tactic of repression in Kosovo, in obvious violation of the relevant resolutions of the Council and of the commitments he had undertaken. The representative maintained that the draft resolution would only grant the President of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia free rein, which was why Canada would vote against the resolution.³⁸⁴

The representative of Slovenia stated that the draft resolution represented an inadequate attempt to address the situation concerning Kosovo. He observed that the draft resolution ignored the fact that several months ago the Security Council had declared the situation to be one constituting a threat to peace and security in the region. The draft resolution also ignored the fact that the Council had already spelled out the requirements for the removal of that threat and the fact that those requirements were flagrantly violated by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. He stated that all those and other obstacles to the implementation of the resolutions under Chapter VII of the Charter were ignored in the draft resolution, which failed to address the relevant circumstances and ignored the situation of necessity, which had led to the current international military action. In addition, he stated that the draft resolution also failed to reflect the practice of the Security Council, which had several times chosen to remain silent at a time of military action by a regional organization, aimed at the removal of a regional threat to peace and security. He stressed that the requirement of consistency in the interpretation and application of the principles and norms of the Charter demanded some indication as to the specific justification for the approach proposed by the draft resolution. He concluded by stating that in the present circumstances, according to the Charter, the Council had the primary, but not the exclusive, responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security.³⁸⁵

The representative of the Netherlands noted that resolution 1203 (1998) clearly stated that the Security Council was acting under Chapter VII of the Charter. He maintained that the NATO action followed directly from resolution 1203 (1998), in conjunction with the flagrant non-compliance on the part of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. Given its complex background, his delegation could not allow it to be described as unilateral use of force. He emphasized that if the Security Council demanded an immediate cessation of the NATO action, it would send the wrong signal to the President of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, leading to a further prolongation of the bloodshed in Kosovo.³⁸⁶

The representative of the United States reiterated that, by rejecting a peace settlement and escalating its assault on the people of Kosovo, in violation of numerous Security Council resolutions, Belgrade had chosen the path of war. He stressed that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia forces were pressing their offensive against civilians, burning, looting, and attacking Kosovo Albanian political leaders. As a result, the large refugee flows out of Kosovo into neighbouring countries could have a serious and destabilizing effect. The stability of Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and the rest of the region was at stake. Those developments justified sustained military action to limit Belgrade's ability to threaten and harm innocent civilians in Kosovo. He underscored that, while the draft resolution alleged that NATO was acting in violation of the Charter, that "turned the truth on its head", as the Charter did not sanction armed assaults upon ethnic groups or imply that the international community should turn a blind eye to a growing humanitarian disaster. Therefore the actions by NATO were completely justified. He concluded by saying that the draft resolution did nothing to advance the cause of peace in the Balkans, which the international community and the Security Council had worked long and hard to achieve.³⁸⁷

The representative of the Russian Federation stated the continuing military action, undertaken under the pretext of preventing a humanitarian catastrophe, had already caused severe humanitarian consequences and done serious damage to the efforts to find a political settlement in Kosovo. He maintained that the aggressive military action unleashed by NATO against a sovereign State without the authorization, and in circumvention, of the Security Council was a real threat to international peace and security and a gross violation of the Charter and other basic norms of international law. He stressed that key provisions of the Charter were being violated, in particular: Article 2 (4), which required all Members of the United Nations to refrain from the threat or use of force in their international relations, including against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State; Article 24, which entrusted the Council with the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security; Article 53, on the inadmissibility of any enforcement action under regional arrangement or by regional agencies without the authorization of the Council, as well as others. He also added that the ban declared by NATO on any civil aviation flights in the airspace of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Macedonia and Croatia was a gross violation of the principle of exclusive sovereignty of a State over the airspace above its territory, which was enshrined in article 1 of the Convention on International Civil Aviation (Chicago Convention). He concluded by saying that members of the Council could not ignore the demands that they were hearing in various parts of the world, made by, among others, the Rio Group, the Council of Defence Ministers of the member countries of the Commonwealth of Independent States and members of the Non-Aligned

Movement, to stop the military aggression and to respect international legality.³⁸⁸

At the same meeting, the Council proceeded to vote on the draft resolution. Under the preambular part of the draft resolution, the Council would have expressed concern that NATO had used military force against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia without the authorization by the Council, and affirmed that that such unilateral use of force constituted a flagrant violation of the United Nations Charter, in particular Articles 2 (4), 24 and 53. The draft resolution also would have recognized that the ban by NATO of civil flights in the airspace of a number of countries in the region constituted a flagrant violation of the principle of complete and exclusive sovereignty of every State over the airspace above its territory in accordance with Article 1 of the Chicago Convention; and determined that the use of force by NATO against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia constituted a threat to international peace and security. The resolution received 3 votes in favour (China, Namibia and the Russian Federation) and 12 against, and was not adopted because it did not obtain the required majority.³⁸⁹

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United Kingdom reiterated that, as recognized in resolutions 1199 (1998) and 1293 (1998), it was the policies of Belgrade with regard to Kosovo that had caused the threat to peace and security in the region, not the actions of NATO. He maintained that, in the circumstances existing at that time, military intervention was justified as an exceptional measure to prevent an overwhelming humanitarian catastrophe. Referring to the suggestion in the draft resolution that NATO had banned civil flights over a number of countries in the Balkan region, he informed the Council that that was incorrect: NATO had advised Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia and the former Yugoslavia Republic of Macedonia that NATO air strikes could make their airspace unsafe for civil flights. In the light of that advice, those countries had decided to close their airspace to such flights. As a result, there had been no breach of either the Charter of the United Nations or of the Chicago Convention.³⁹⁰

The representative of France stated that the actions decided upon responded to the violation by Belgrade of its international obligations under the resolutions, which the Security Council had adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations. He also stated that the draft resolution ran directly counter to his country's judgment, which was why France had voted against it.³⁹¹

The representatives of Argentina and Malaysia stated that they could not accept a draft resolution that failed to mention earlier resolutions of the Security Council on the question of Kosovo that invoked Chapter VII, disregarded the extremely grave humanitarian context and did not take into account the background to the situation.³⁹²

The representative of Bahrain stated that his Government was not able to vote in favour of the draft resolution because it would have encouraged the Belgrade authorities to continue with their current policy of "ethnic cleansing" and led to more massacres and displacements for the Kosovo Albanians.³⁹³

The representative of China stated that the continued military strikes against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia by NATO had already resulted in severe casualties and damage, and the situation in the Balkan region had seriously deteriorated. He stated that the Government of China strongly opposed such an act, which constituted a blatant violation of the principles of the Charter of the United Nations and of international law, as well as a challenge to the authority of the Council. The representative reiterated the call for an immediate cessation of military action so as to facilitate the restoration of peace in the Balkan region. He also reiterated that the question of Kosovo, being an internal matter of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, needed to be resolved by the parties concerned in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia among themselves.³⁹⁴

The representative of Ukraine read a statement issued by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Ukraine on 24 March 1999, which stated that Ukraine considered the use of military force against a sovereign State without the authorization of the Security Council as inadmissible. At the same time, the refusal by Belgrade to sign the agreements elaborated through the mediation of the Contact Group had resulted in the breakdown of the negotiating process. Therefore, the provisions of Security Council resolutions 1160 (1998) and 1199 (1998) had not been fully implemented, and that had led to the use of force.³⁹⁵

Mr. Jovanovic stated that the aggression by NATO countries, led by the United States, could not be justified on any grounds whatsoever. If the aggression went on, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia would continue to protect its sovereignty and territorial integrity on the basis of Article 51 of the United Nations Charter. He maintained that once the aggression was stopped, his Government would be ready to resume negotiations about political solutions of the problem in Kosovo and Metohija on the basis of the 10 principles adopted by the Contact Group on 29 January 1999 and the document signed in Paris by the members of their delegation. He asserted that, by attacking the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, NATO had not solved the “alleged humanitarian catastrophe in Kosovo and Metohija”, but was itself creating “a catastrophe of enormous proportions for all citizens of Yugoslavia” and for peace and stability in the region and beyond. He concluded by saying that the aggressor “displayed contempt” for the United Nations and its Charter and arrogated the prerogatives of the Security Council as the only organ in charge of maintaining international peace and security.³⁹⁶

The representatives of Belarus and Cuba stressed that the decision to use force could be made only by the Council taking into account the views of the States Members of the Organization; and called on the Council to put a halt to and condemn the NATO military action. They also called for the resumption of the work of the Contact Group on the former Yugoslavia.³⁹⁷

The representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina stated that, if the draft resolution had been adopted or had even succeeded in garnering significant support, it would have been a defeat for peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina. He stressed his concern for the implications of the NATO military action being undertaken without the sanction of the Council. However, his delegation would have been even more concerned and dismayed if the Council had been blocked and there had been no response to the humanitarian crisis and to the legal obligation to confront ethnic cleansing and war crime abuses. He also noted that the airspace of Bosnia and Herzegovina was closed on the basis of their own decision.³⁹⁸

The representative of India underlined that it was a matter of great concern that the attacks of NATO on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia continued, with the Security Council reduced to helplessness. He reiterated that his Government had expected the Council to exert its authority to bring about an early return of the peace that was broken by the bombing. He therefore expressed his country’s deep regret that the Council had not adopted the draft resolution and maintained that the effect would be to prevent a return of the peace that the international community so dearly wanted and which permanent members, three of whom had cast vetoes in pursuit of national interests, had a special responsibility to uphold.³⁹⁹

At the same meeting, the representative of Canada referred to the statement of the representative of India that three vetoes had been cast and pointed out that, in fact, there had been no vetoes cast, as a veto was cast only when it overrode nine positive votes, which had not been the case that morning. The representative of France associated himself with the statement made by the representative of Canada.⁴⁰⁰

Organization (NATO) attack at the Embassy of China in Belgrade.⁴⁰¹

At its 4000th meeting, held on 8 May 1999 in response to the above-mentioned letter, the Security Council included the letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Gabon), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Albania, Belarus, Cuba, India, Iraq and Ukraine, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the representative of China read a statement by the Government of China, informing the Council that NATO, led by the United States, had attacked the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, resulting in serious damage to the Embassy premises and at least two dead and more than 20 injured. The representative expressed his country's indignation and strong condemnation of the incident. He underscored that it was a flagrant violation of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected Persons, including Diplomatic Agents. The representative stated that China strongly demanded that NATO carry out an investigation of the serious incident and account for it and stressed that NATO had to assume all responsibility for it. He noted that his Government reserved the right to take further action. Finally, he reiterated the demand that NATO immediately and unconditionally stop its air strikes against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.⁴⁰²

The representative of the United States stated that his delegation did not have confirmation of the facts at that time and that NATO had opened an investigation of the matter. He stressed that if NATO had been responsible for the incident, his country was deeply sorry and reiterated that NATO would never target civilians or an embassy. However, he maintained that NATO was taking action in response to Belgrade's "sustained multi-year, outrageous, unacceptable policies of ethnic cleansing, terrorization and repression of its own citizens in Kosovo". He underscored that NATO would continue to press the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia until it agreed to accept conditions offered by NATO and the Group of Eight principles.⁴⁰³

The representative of the Russian Federation expressed his country's deepest condolences to the Government of China and to the families of the victims of the NATO strike. He underscored that his Government was outraged and demanded an immediate investigation. He maintained that the fate of the Kosovars had become entirely incidental, and the humanitarian banner was being used "as a cover for NATO's attempts to destroy the present world order", which was based on respect for international law and for the Charter of the United Nations. He reiterated that it was essential to shift immediately to a political settlement.⁴⁰⁴

The representative of the Netherlands expressed his regret about the incident. He stated that collateral damage to an embassy building was not essentially different from other collateral damage. As the Embassy was not deliberately targeted, the accident could not be regarded as a violation of diplomatic immunity, let alone as an attack on the integrity of the country concerned. He reiterated his Government's conviction that they had no choice but to launch air strikes after President Slobodan Milosevic had continued to ignore the demands of the Security Council. He acknowledged that there were many more refugees, but maintained that they could not be held responsible for the fact that President Milosevic had seized the opportunity to accelerate and try to complete his "final solution to the Kosovo problem".⁴⁰⁵

The representative of France first expressed his delegation's profound sympathy to the delegation of China. He stated that France, like all members of the European Union, supported the initiative of the Secretary-General of the United Nations dated 9 April 1999, and was working together with Canada, Germany, Italy, Japan, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States (Group of Eight) to develop a political solution. He informed the Council that a meeting of the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the eight countries on 6 May had made it possible to adopt general principles for a political solution to the Kosovo problem.⁴⁰⁶ He expressed the desire of his Government to arrive at the adoption of a Security Council resolution under Chapter VII that would endorse and adopt those principles for a settlement and that would make it possible to restore peace and stability to that region in crisis.⁴⁰⁷

The representative of Slovenia expressed their sincere condolences to the Government and the people of China. He informed the Council that a draft resolution relating to the humanitarian aspects of the situation had been submitted to the Council, and he expressed hope that the Council would take action on the draft resolution soon. He stressed that all efforts for a peaceful resolution of the situation in and around Kosovo, Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had to continue, and that the Council had to be actively involved in the process.⁴⁰⁸

The representative of the United Kingdom expressed his sincere condolences to China. He reiterated that NATO also expressed its regrets, that they awaited the results of the investigation and that NATO did not target civilians or embassies. He also maintained that NATO had taken urgent and forceful action to reverse the humanitarian tragedy and to return the displaced to their homes in safety. He stated that the key to concluding the conflict was the acceptance by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia of the steps spelled out in the Group of Eight statement of 6 May 1999.⁴⁰⁹

Mr. Jovanovic stated that his country had been a victim of NATO aggression, and that NATO attacks had been concentrated on civilian targets, threatening lives, the environment and the basic human rights of the entire population of the country. He stressed that there was no mention of collateral damage or incidental killings of people and destruction of property in the Geneva Conventions or in the statutes of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia. He reiterated that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had been committed to a peaceful solution of the crisis in Kosovo and Metohija, but that they had the right and the duty to protect themselves from aggression — rights and duties that were enshrined in the Charter and international law. He also noted that the Embassy building was in the exclusive residential area of New Belgrade, which had no military targets, and stressed that the attack was in gross violation of the Geneva Convention of 1949 and of international law. He maintained that it was not only the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia that was targeted, but peace and security in the region as well. He stated that the Security Council had perhaps a last chance to exercise its duty and reaffirm the authority invested in it by the Charter of the United Nations.⁴¹⁰

The representative of Albania expressed its condolences to the Government of China. He also expressed his country's belief that NATO, through its action, was trying to preserve the principles of the Charter of the United Nations, including the maintenance of peace and international security.⁴¹¹

The representative of India underscored that any damage to a diplomatic establishment was to be entirely deplored and maintained that the incident, along with the continuing loss of innocent lives and other untoward consequences, only confirmed that the very fundamentals of the approach of NATO were wrong. He reiterated that a solution to the problems relating to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia were to be found only in means other than military ones. He therefore urged an immediate end to all hostilities so as to give peace a chance.

The representative of China spoke again and, referring to the argument that as NATO had not intentionally attacked the Chinese Embassy it could not be charged with violating the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected Persons, including Diplomatic Agents, maintained that, deliberate or not, the action by NATO was a "blatant flouting of international law" and reiterated that NATO had to shoulder full responsibility for its action.⁴¹²

All speakers made statements expressing profound regret for the strike on the Embassy and extending their sympathy to the delegation of China. A number of speakers also called for the crisis to be resolved by diplomatic means.⁴¹³ Other speakers condemned the military actions by NATO and called for an immediate halt to the bombing and the resumption of diplomatic efforts to find a peaceful solution.⁴¹⁴

At its 4001st meeting, held on 14 May 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council again included the letter dated 7 May 1999 from the representative of China addressed to the President of the Security Council in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Gabon), in accordance with the decisions taken at the 4000th meeting, invited the representatives of Albania, Belarus, Cuba, India, Iraq and Ukraine, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 9 May 1999 from the representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia addressed to the President of the Security Council;⁴¹⁵ a letter dated 10 May 1999 from the representative of South Africa addressed to the President of the Security Council;⁴¹⁶ and a letter dated 10 May 1999 from the representative of the Sudan addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴¹⁷ transmitting statements by the respective countries concerning the bombing of the Chinese Embassy by NATO.

At the same meeting, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴¹⁸

The Security Council recalls the press statement by the President on 8 May 1999, and expresses its deep distress and concern over the bombing of the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia on 7 May 1999, which has caused serious casualties and property damage. The Council expresses its deepest sympathy and profound condolences to the Chinese Government and families of the victims.

The Council expresses profound regrets over the bombing and deep sorrow for the loss of lives, injuries and property damage caused by the bombing, and notes that regrets and apologies were expressed for this tragedy by members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. The Council, bearing in mind the Charter of the United Nations, reaffirms that the principle of the inviolability of diplomatic personnel and premises must be respected in all cases in accordance with internationally accepted norms.

The Council stresses the need for a complete and thorough investigation of the bombing by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. In this connection, it takes note of the fact that an investigation has been initiated by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and it awaits the results of the investigation.

The Council will remain seized of this matter.

Security Council resolutions 1160 (1998), 1199 (1998) and 1203 (1998)

Initial proceedings

Decision of 14 May 1999 (4003rd meeting): resolution 1239 (1999)

At its 4003rd meeting, held on 14 May 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the item "Security Council resolutions 1160 (1998), 1199 (1998) and 1203 (1998)" in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Gabon), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Albania, Belarus, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Cuba, Egypt, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Jordan, Kuwait, Morocco, Pakistan, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Turkey, Ukraine, the United Arab Emirates and Yemen, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President also invited the Deputy Permanent Observer of the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC) under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure. The President then drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Argentina, Bahrain, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Brazil, Egypt, Gabon, the Gambia, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Jordan, Kuwait, Malaysia, Morocco, Namibia, Pakistan, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Slovenia, Turkey, the United Arab Emirates and Yemen.⁴¹⁹ The President further drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 6 May 1999 from the representative of Turkey addressed to the President of the Security Council, informing the Council that its co-sponsorship of the draft resolution in no way indicated any change in regard to the long-standing position of Turkey concerning the name of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.⁴²⁰

At the same meeting, speaking before the vote, the representative of Bahrain observed that according to United Nations sources there were more than 840,000 displaced persons within the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and more than 700,000 outside that territory. He stated that, therefore, there was a need to try to redress the humanitarian situation and to help the refugees. He informed the Council that it was in view of the humanitarian situation that the delegations of Bahrain and Malaysia had taken the initiative to submit a draft resolution, which had achieved consensus in the Council and in the caucus and other groups of Member States outside of the Council. His country called upon Council members to adopt the draft resolution by consensus so that the humanitarian assistance that was so necessary to the refugees could be given to them and so that their situation could be improved pending their return to their homes.⁴²¹

The representative of Malaysia stated that, while nothing would have pleased his delegation more than adopting a resolution that addressed the Kosovo issues in a comprehensive manner, the Council could in the meantime play a meaningful role by pronouncing itself on the humanitarian situation, which was an important aspect of the Kosovo crisis. He stressed that formal action by the Council on the humanitarian issue in and around Kosovo would be a clear expression of the serious concern of the Council about the humanitarian tragedy that had unfolded. He stated that the draft resolution represented the first serious attempt on the part of some Council members to bring the Kosovo issue back to the Council in the hope that it could pave the way for the forging of a consensus on the more difficult aspects of the Kosovo problem, thereby reasserting the role of the Council on the issue.⁴²²

The representative of the United States observed that the draft resolution focused attention on the urgent issue at hand in Kosovo and the surrounding region: the plight of hundreds of thousands of refugees and displaced persons and the critical need to assist the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and other humanitarian organizations and workers in their efforts to address the crisis. He also reiterated that the crisis could be resolved if Belgrade met the conditions set out by NATO and the principles of the Group of Eight, agreed to at the Foreign Ministers' meeting on 6 May 1999. He stressed that his country remained firm in its resolve to continue to exert pressure on President Slobodan Milosevic and his Government to stop their planned, systematic campaign of ethnic cleansing and to permit the return of all refugees and displaced persons to their homes in safety and in security. He stated that his Government expected that the Secretary-General's humanitarian mission to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia would focus on the destruction in Kosovo, and stressed that it was essential in their view that the team have unimpeded access throughout its visit.⁴²³

The representative of France stressed the importance of paragraph 5 of the draft resolution, which emphasized that the humanitarian situation would continue to deteriorate in the absence of a political solution to the crisis. He noted that, by specifying that any solution needed to be consistent with the principles adopted by the Foreign Ministers of Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States on 6 May 1999, the Council was clearly indicating what the parameters of a political solution needed to be.⁴²⁴

The representative of China stated that, while his delegation was deeply disturbed by the humanitarian crisis in the Balkans, the fact that NATO had launched military attacks against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia was an equal concern. Following the bombing of the Embassy of China, he stressed that China had every reason to demand that NATO immediately and unconditionally stop the bombing. He stressed that an immediate cessation of the bombing campaign against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia needed to be the prerequisite for any political solution to the Kosovo issue and also the minimum condition for alleviating the humanitarian crisis in the Balkans. For those reasons, the Chinese delegation had put forward constructive amendments to the draft resolution calling for a cessation of all military activities, which were not accepted. He also noted that the draft resolution referred to the principles adopted by the Foreign Ministers of the Group of Eight, and stated that they could not accept that the Council had prejudged those principles in the draft resolution without first deliberating on them. On the basis of those considerations, he stated that the Chinese delegation had no choice but to abstain in the voting on the draft resolution.⁴²⁵

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the tragic course of events in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had shown that it was the military action against that sovereign country, conducted by NATO in circumvention of the Security Council and in violation of the Charter of the United Nations and other generally recognized norms of international law, that had caused the humanitarian catastrophe and created a real emergency situation in the Balkans region. Noting that the civilian infrastructure was being destroyed systematically and deliberately, and very serious damage was being done to the economy, he stressed that the material basis for the return of the refugees and the displaced persons to their homes was being destroyed, though NATO had proclaimed that the resolution of the problem of refugees was one of its main tasks. He stated that, although it was difficult to remain indifferent in the face of the escalating humanitarian catastrophe, it was clear that this was a consequence, not a cause, of the crisis situation. It was precisely with regard to the causes of the humanitarian catastrophe that the Security Council should have spoken out, as the organ bearing primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security. He noted that it had been upon the initiative of his delegation that the draft resolution had taken on board the important conclusion that the humanitarian situation would continue to deteriorate unless a political settlement to the crisis could be ensured. However, the draft resolution had not taken into account a number of their other amendments, of which the main one was an appeal for immediate cessation of the NATO air strikes on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, adamantly supported by the Russian Federation and China. He informed the Council that because of the principled nature of their position, his delegation could not support the text.⁴²⁶

⁴²⁵ Ibid., pp. 7-8.

⁴²⁶ Ibid., pp. 8-9.

Speaking both before and after the vote, several other speakers expressed their support for the draft resolution and their concern about the humanitarian situation in and around Kosovo. A number of speakers called for the cessation of hostilities and for the Security Council to reassert its authority over the situation and to find a political solution.⁴²⁷ Other speakers maintained that the major reason for the worsening humanitarian situation was the NATO military action and called for its immediate end.⁴²⁸

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted by 13 votes to none, with two abstentions (China and the Russian Federation), and adopted as resolution 1239 (1999),⁴²⁹ which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 1160 (1998) of 31 March 1998, 1199 (1998) of 23 September 1998 and 1203 (1998) of 24 October 1998, and the statements by its President of 24 August 1998, 19 January 1999 and 29 January 1999,

Reaffirming the territorial integrity and sovereignty of all States in the region,

1. Commends the efforts that have been taken by Member States, the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and other international humanitarian relief organizations in providing urgently needed relief assistance to the Kosovo refugees in Albania, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and Bosnia and Herzegovina, and urges them and others in a position to do so to contribute resources for humanitarian assistance to the refugees and internally displaced persons;

6. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, Mr. Jovanović reiterated that the aggression of NATO was continuing, expanding and intensifying, and was a gross violation of the Charter of the United Nations and the basic principles of international relations. He noted that, despite many requests by his Government, the Security Council had taken no steps to uphold the Charter of the United Nations, to prevent the arrogation of its authority by others and the violations of international peace and security. He stated that the NATO campaign had targeted civilians, infrastructure and the economy, and inflicted a humanitarian catastrophe on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. Additionally, NATO bombs had caused an ecological disaster in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the region and NATO had violated international conventions and covenants on human rights and freedoms, in particular the Geneva

Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War. He expressed his delegation's regret that the draft resolution made no mention of the tragic consequences of the NATO aggression. Stating that the concern of the Security Council about the humanitarian situation in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia was justified, he reiterated that the attempt to legalize the aggression of NATO by means of the "so-called humanitarian resolution" was unjustified. He stressed that the bypassing of the Security Council, the body charged with the maintenance of international peace and security, prior to the commencement of the aggression, and the subsequent attempts to get the Council on board in order to legalize the aggression, dealt a heavy blow to the reputation of the United Nations and set a dangerous precedent for international relations in general.⁴³⁰

The representative of the Netherlands commented on the statement by Mr. Jovanović and stressed that if Serbia wanted to be part of Europe, it would have to realize why it had been subjected to NATO air strikes, and maintained that their intervention on account of "the atrocities committed by the Serbian security forces and the Yugoslav army in Kosovo" would not have been possible if it had not been preceded by almost eight years of "ethnic cleansing".⁴³¹

The representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran, in his capacity as Chairman of the OIC Contact Group on Bosnia and Herzegovina and Kosovo, expressed his deep concern about the ripple effect of the Kosovo crisis and the belief that the continuation of the current Kosovo crisis could endanger the fragile peace and security in other parts of the Balkans. The OIC Contact Group deeply regretted the failure of the Security Council to deal effectively with the crisis in Kosovo and to put an end to the plight of the Kosovo Albanians. They reiterated that the Security Council had the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security and expressed hope that the Council would accelerate its endeavours in order to carry out its responsibility under the United Nations Charter in an effective manner.⁴³²

The representative of Albania expressed his country's strong support for the resolution and belief in the value of the NATO mission and its actions. He stated that NATO was saving exactly the same values that the United Nations was created to defend, and noted that the Albanian people regretted that the United Nations was not able to deliver the same message due to the obstacles created by some of its Members. Albania welcomed any initiative of the international community that could solve the crisis in Kosovo and the humanitarian catastrophe and that respected the freedom of the people who believed so much in the principles of the United Nations.⁴³³

The representative of Slovenia appealed to all Council members to understand that the unity and resolve of the entire international community were the essential conditions for the success of the efforts for peace and expressed his country's belief that the resolution was a relevant contribution to that end.⁴³⁴

Initial proceedings

Decision of 10 June 1999 (4011th meeting): resolution 1244 (1999)

By a letter dated 6 May 1999 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the representative of Germany transmitted a statement by the Chairman on the conclusion of the meeting of the Group of Eight Ministers for Foreign Affairs held at the Petersberg Centre on 6 May 1999.⁴³⁵ The letter announced that the Ministers had adopted the following general principles on the political solution to the Kosovo crisis: immediate and verifiable end to violence and repression in Kosovo; withdrawal from Kosovo of military, police and paramilitary forces; deployment in Kosovo of effective international civil and security presences, endorsed and adopted by the United Nations, capable of guaranteeing the achievement of the common objectives; establishment of an interim administration for Kosovo to be decided by the Security Council to ensure conditions for a peaceful and normal life for all inhabitants in Kosovo; the safe and free return of all refugees and displaced persons and unimpeded access to Kosovo by humanitarian aid organizations; a political process towards the establishment of an interim political framework agreement providing for a substantial self-government for Kosovo, taking full account of the Rambouillet Accords and the principles of sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the other countries of the region, and the demilitarization of the Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA); and a comprehensive approach to the economic development and stabilization of the crisis region.

By a letter dated 5 June 1999 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁴³⁶ the representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia transmitted a letter dated 4 June 1999 from the Federal Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia addressed to the Secretary-General, informing him of the acceptance by the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the Assembly of the Republic of Serbia of the Peace Plan (principles) presented by the President of the Finnish Republic, representing the European Union and the United Nations, and by the personal envoy of the President of the Russian Federation. He noted that the Yugoslav constitutional authorities had been strongly motivated by the fact that the competence of the Security Council was being established by the acceptance of the Peace Plan, including the setting up of a United Nations mission in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations. The Federal Minister stated his conviction that that had created conditions and a need for regular contacts and cooperation between the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the United Nations. He expected that his delegation's representatives would be able to present their views on the draft resolution, and that an appropriate agreement would be concluded later on between the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the United Nations.

By a letter dated 7 June 1999 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴³⁷ the representative of Germany, on behalf of the Presidency of the European Union, transmitted the agreement on the Peace Plan (principles) to move towards a resolution of the Kosovo crisis.

By a letter dated 10 June 1999 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴³⁸ the Secretary-General transmitted a letter dated 10 June 1999 from the Secretary-General of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO). The Secretary-General of NATO informed the United Nations that NATO military authorities had agreed with the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia on the procedures and modalities for the withdrawal from Kosovo of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia security forces, which had begun to withdraw from Kosovo in accordance with those procedures and modalities. He noted that NATO was monitoring the compliance of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia closely. Against that background, NATO air operations against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had been suspended.

At its 4011th meeting, held on 10 June 1999 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the item entitled "Security Council resolutions 1160 (1998), 1199 (1998), 1203 (1998) and 1239 (1999)" and the above-mentioned letters in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Gambia), with the consent of the Council, invited the representatives of Albania, Belarus, Costa Rica, Croatia, Cuba, Germany, Hungary, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Italy, Japan, Mexico, Norway, Turkey, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and Ukraine, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President also invited Mr. Vladislav Jovanovic to sit at the Council table and to make a statement.

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Canada, France, Gabon, Germany, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, the Russian Federation, Slovenia, Ukraine, the United Kingdom and the United States, with Bahrain joining as a co-sponsor.⁴³⁹ The President also drew the attention of the Council to the following documents: a letter dated 2 June 1999 from the representative of Germany addressed to the Secretary-General;⁴⁴⁰ and letters dated 1, 5 and 7 June 1999, respectively, from the representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia addressed to the President of the Security Council.⁴⁴¹ Members of the Council also received a letter dated 4 June 1999 from the representative of France addressed to the President of the Security Council⁴⁴² and a letter dated 9 June 1999 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council.⁴⁴³

Mr. Jovanovic, on behalf of the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, addressed the following requests to the members of the Council: first, to point out the responsibility of the NATO member States for flagrantly violating the principles of the Charter of the United Nations and for the unauthorized and brutal bombing of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, which resulted in a massive humanitarian catastrophe, the destruction of the civilian infrastructure and the economy of the country, the death of more than 2000 people and the wounding of more than 6,000 civilians; second, to stress the moral, political and material obligation of the NATO member States to fully compensate the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and its citizens within the shortest possible period of time for all the damage caused by the unauthorized bombing; and third, to restore the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia all of its suspended rights in the United Nations, in international and financial institutions and in other international organizations and associations, as well as to lift all existing sanctions and unilateral restrictions and all other discriminatory measures. He stated that, although the peace plan had confirmed a role for the United Nations in the solution of the crisis, his Government had instead faced NATO attempts to deploy its troops in Kosovo and Metohija by way of insisting on some political elements without a decision and a mandate from the Council. He stressed that, in order to achieve a lasting and stable peace in the region and reaffirm the roles of the United Nations and the Security Council as the highest bodies for the maintenance of international peace and security, it was necessary to deploy the United Nations peacekeeping mission in Kosovo and Metohija on the basis of a decision of the Council and of Chapter VI of the Charter and with the prior and full agreement of the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. He also stated that, in that context, the Security Council draft resolution needed to contain the following positions: a firm and unequivocal reaffirmation of full respect for the territorial integrity and sovereignty of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia; and a political solution to the situation in Kosovo and Metohija that would be based on broad autonomy, in accordance with the highest international standards, such as the Paris Charter and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) Copenhagen document, ensuring the full equality of all ethnic communities. The solution for Kosovo and Metohija also needed to fall within the legal frameworks of the Republic of Serbia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, which implied that all State and public services in the province, including the organs of law and order, should function according to the Constitution and laws of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the Republic of Serbia. He also stressed that the draft resolution should not contain provisions on the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, considering that that institution had no jurisdiction over the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and had not been included in the principles of the Ahtisaari-Chernomyrdin peace plan. The resolution also needed to contain a condemnation of NATO aggression against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia as an act in violation of the Charter of the United Nations and a threat to international peace and security; a reference to the reports of the United Nations Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs and Emergency Relief Coordinator and the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, which should point to the civilian casualties and material destruction as consequences of NATO attacks, and a condemnation of the use of inhumane weapons; a condemnation of NATO bombing of foreign diplomatic and consular missions in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia; provisions ensuring unhindered and safe passage of refugees; and respect for the Constitution and laws of the Republic of Serbia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia as necessary preconditions for the solution of all questions and a successful evolution of the international presence. He stated that the mandate of the mission needed to consist of the supervision of the implementation of the comprehensive agreement on Kosovo and Metohija, the withdrawal of Yugoslav military and political forces, the return of refugees and displaced persons and cooperation with international humanitarian organizations in providing assistance to all in need of it. The mission also had to guarantee full security and equality to all citizens in Kosovo and Metohija, regardless of their religious and national affiliations, and prevent all violence, especially the resurgence of terrorism and separatism. The mission had to be responsible to and report to the Secretary-General and the Security Council. He underscored that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia could not accept a mission that would take over the role of government in Kosovo and Metohija or any form of open or hidden protectorate, or a mission that had an open mandate, unlimited in time. He also stressed that they were against the participation in the United Nations mission by the countries that had taken an active part in the aggression. He expressed his delegation's regret that the draft resolution proposed by the Group of Eight was "yet another attempt to marginalize the world Organization aimed at legalizing post festum the brutal aggression", and noted that the solutions being tried provided a broad authority to those who had conducted a war against a sovereign country. He observed that in sub-items (a) and (b) of operative paragraph 9, the draft resolution requested in all practical terms that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia renounce a part of its sovereign territory and grant amnesty to terrorists. Furthermore, in operative paragraph 11, the draft resolution established a protectorate, provided for the creation of a separate political and economic system in the province and opened up the possibility of the secession of Kosovo and Metohija from Serbia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. He concluded by stating that, in adopting the draft resolution, the Council would not only be instrumental in a de facto dismemberment of a sovereign European State, but would also set a negative precedent with far-reaching consequences for overall international relations.⁴⁴⁴

The representative of Namibia expressed regret that it was only after the "senseless killing of innocent civilians, the destruction of property and the massive displacement of people" that a peace plan had been possible. He stressed that his country did not condone ethnic cleansing and other human rights abuses committed in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, and also opposed any attempt to dismember the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. Finally, he reiterated that it was the primary responsibility of the Security Council to maintain international peace and security, and that all States Members of the United Nations had the obligation to uphold the provisions of the Charter in that regard.⁴⁴⁵

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the draft resolution's main significance lay in the fact that it restored the Kosovo settlement to the political track along with the central role of the United Nations. He noted that in addition to clearly reaffirming the commitment of all States to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, the draft resolution authorized the deployment in Kosovo, under United Nations auspices, of international civil and security presences with a clearly formulated, concrete mandate. He underlined that the draft resolution's reference to Chapter VII of the Charter related exclusively to ensuring the safety and security of international personnel and compliance with the provisions of the draft resolution. It did not even hint at the possibility of any use of force beyond the limits of the tasks clearly set out by the Security Council. He also stressed that the demilitarization of the "so-called" Kosovo Liberation Army and other armed Kosovo Albanian groups was of special importance in terms of achieving a lasting and effective political settlement of the Kosovo crisis, which was clearly defined as one of the principal duties of the international security presence. The Kosovo Liberation Army needed scrupulously to comply with all demands made of it by the Council and needed to cease to exist as a military force. He also called for the leadership of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to comply fully with the obligations it had entered into.⁴⁴⁶

The representative of China reiterated that the Government of China had made their principled stance clear. His delegation had firmly opposed NATO military action against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and demanded that NATO immediately stop all its bombing operations. China stood for peaceful settlement of the question of Kosovo, on the basis of respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and guarantees of the legitimate rights and interests of all ethnic groups in the Kosovo region. His country was of the view that any proposed solution needed to take full account of the view of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. He emphasized that, fundamentally speaking, ethnic problems within a State needed to be settled by its own Government and people, through the adoption of sound policies. They could not be used as an excuse for external intervention, much less used by foreign States as an excuse for the use of force. He maintained that respect for sovereignty and non-interference in each other's internal affairs were basic principles of the Charter of the United Nations. Since the end of the cold war, the international situation had undergone major changes, but those principles were by no means outdated, having acquired even greater relevance. He underscored that, in essence, the "human rights over sovereignty" theory served to infringe upon the sovereignty of other States and to promote "hegemonism" under the pretext of human rights, which ran counter to the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations. The representative stated that the draft resolution had failed to reflect fully the principled stand and justified concerns of China. In particular, it made no mention of the disaster caused by NATO bombing in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, and it had failed to impose necessary restrictions on the invoking of Chapter VII of the Charter. However, in view of the fact that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had already accepted the peace plan, that NATO had suspended its bombing and that the draft resolution had reaffirmed the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations, the primary responsibility of the Security Council for the maintenance of international peace and security and the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, he stated that the Chinese delegation would not block the adoption of the draft resolution.⁴⁴⁷

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention (China),⁴⁴⁸ as resolution 1244 (1999), which reads:

Speaking after the vote, the representative of Slovenia stated that, with regard to military and security aspects, his country wanted to emphasize the need for the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to terminate the state of war in the country immediately. In particular, the state of war and related measures could not be used against the Republic of Montenegro, which had demonstrated a reasoned and constructive approach throughout the conflict, including by accepting and taking care of tens of thousands of internally displaced persons. He stressed that the pressures exerted by Belgrade against the Republic of Montenegro under the pretext of military needs had to stop and expressed concern that without such a measure the situation in Montenegro could escalate into a new threat to international peace and security in the region. At the political level, he underlined that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had to understand the importance of the normalization of its relations with its neighbours and with other States. It therefore had to stop its attempts to create the erroneous impression that it was a continuing Member State of the United Nations and apply for membership in the United Nations, as expressly required by Security Council resolution 777 (1992) and General Assembly resolution 47/1 of 22 September 1992. He repeated that justice would be an essential condition for the durability of peace, and stressed the importance of the role of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia. In conclusion, he observed that, while it was true that international organizations had to be careful in all their efforts and that they had to respect international law, including the principle of the sovereignty of States, it was at least equally clear that State sovereignty was not absolute and that it could not be used as a tool of denial of humanity resulting in threats to peace.⁴⁴⁹

The representative of the Netherlands expressed the hope of his Government that the few delegations that had maintained that the NATO air strikes against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia were a violation of the United Nations Charter would one day realize that the Charter was not the only source of international law. He maintained that the Charter was much more specific on respect for sovereignty than on respect for human rights, but they regarded it as a generally accepted rule of international law that no sovereign State had the right to terrorize its own citizens. He stated that the shift from sovereignty to human rights spelled uncertainty, and they all had their difficulties with it, but the Security Council could not afford to ignore it.⁴⁵⁰

The representative of Canada stated that his country considered that humanitarian and human rights concerns had to be given new weight in the Council's definition of security and in its calculus as to when and how the Council had to engage. He expressed the belief that the agreement reached in the Council was an important step towards a broader definition of security by the international community.⁴⁵¹

The representative of the United States stated that the resolution would advance a goal that was shared by all members, that of returning hundreds of thousands of Kosovars to their homes with security and self-government. While his country welcomed agreement by Belgrade to principles for resolving the crisis, he stressed that his delegation could not forget the systematic campaign of repression and ethnic cleansing carried out against the people of Kosovo in violation of recognized principles of international law. In the resolution, the international community had clearly demonstrated that such policies and behaviour would not be tolerated and affirmed that the resolution addressed all of their key objectives as set out by NATO. In particular, his delegation welcomed the reiteration in the resolution of the strong mandate of the authority and the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia over war crimes committed in the former Yugoslavia, including Kosovo, contained in Security Council resolution 1160 (1998). He also stressed that it was important to note that the resolution provided for the civil and military missions to remain in place until the Council affirmatively decided that conditions existed for their completion. The United States would work to ensure that the people of Kosovo were given the meaningful self-government they deserved, as envisioned in the ⁴⁵⁰ Ibid., pp. 12-13.

⁴⁵¹ Ibid., pp. 13-14.

Rambouillet Accords. Finally, he stressed that both sides to the conflict needed to demonstrate a firm commitment to peace.⁴⁵²

The representative of Brazil commented that, independent of the moral considerations invoked for the actions, problematic precedents had been set in the resort to military force without Security Council authorization. He stressed that those had neither contributed to upholding the Council's authority nor improved the humanitarian situation.⁴⁵³

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the Chapter VII resolution and its annexes clearly set out the demands of the international community, which Belgrade had to satisfy. He stressed that the interpretation and conditions that the delegation of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had attempted to propose had been rejected. The resolution also provided for the deployment of an international civil presence, led by the United Nations, for the continuing work of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, and for an effective international security presence to re-establish a safe environment in Kosovo. That force needed to command the confidence of Kosovo Albanian refugees if they were to return home, which was why NATO had made clear that it would be essential to have a unified NATO chain of command under the political direction of the North Atlantic Council in consultation with non-NATO force contributors.⁴⁵⁴

The Secretary-General stated that the United Nations was determined to lead the civilian implementation of the peace effectively and efficiently, but to do so it needed the cooperation of all parties and the means to carry out the mandate. He underscored that the commitment to peace was not enough, but that it was the will to implement it that was what counted. That included tasks for which the United Nations was not responsible, but which were vital if peace and stability were to be restored, for example the need for the full withdrawal of Serb military, paramilitary and police forces and for the demilitarization of the Kosovo Liberation Army. He said that he looked to those responsible for the security aspects of the resolution to act swiftly. He informed the Council that he would soon revert to them with specific proposals on how to make the civilian operation authorized by the resolution truly integrated and effective. Finally, he affirmed that the hard and extremely complex work of building a durable peace lay ahead, and in doing so they needed to deal with the roots of the crisis.⁴⁵⁵

A number of other speakers took the floor after the vote and after the resumption of the meeting. They welcomed the resolution and stressed the importance of immediate efforts to provide a secure environment for the refugees and displaced persons to return to their homes; underlined the importance of the work of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia in Kosovo; and noted that the resolution reaffirmed that it was the primary responsibility of the Security Council to maintain international peace and security.⁴⁵⁶

The representative of Belarus reiterated the condemnation of the military actions by NATO, and stressed that they had been undertaken in violation of the Charter of the United Nations and universally recognized norms of international law.⁴⁵⁷

The representative of Germany spoke on behalf of the European Union and associated and aligned countries,⁴⁵⁸ stating that the necessary and warranted military action by NATO, in combination with diplomatic activity, had brought about the agreement of the authorities of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to withdraw all military, police and paramilitary forces, thereby creating the conditions for the return of hundreds of thousands of Kosovars driven out of Kosovo. He reiterated that full responsibility for the situation lay entirely with President Milosevic and the regime. The European Union firmly believed that all those who planned, authorized and executed the campaign of forced deportation, torture and murder had to be held personally accountable and brought to justice before the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia. It was gratified to see the Security Council assuming the functions foreseen by the United Nations Charter and urged the Security Council to show unity and coherence in its further handling of the crisis. Finally, he informed the Council that, with a view to enhancing peace, stability, prosperity and cooperation among countries in the region, the European Union had established a stability pact for South-Eastern Europe.⁴⁵⁹

The representative of Norway stated that, as Chairman-in-Office of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Norway, welcomed the decision to place the overall responsibility for the civilian presence with the United Nations. Noting that the civilian implementation of the peace agreement would have to be divided between several international organizations, he stressed that clear lines of command and clearly defined areas of responsibility would be necessary. Careful consideration needed to be given to ensuring that the division of responsibility was logical and promoted efficient implementation. He stated that the primary responsibility for rebuilding democratic institutions and civil society needed to lie with OSCE, as the organization had considerable experience and expertise with regard to the tasks.⁴⁶⁰

The representative of Costa Rica expressed concerns about how the operations in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had been conducted and reiterated that with the very limited exception of the right to legitimate defence, any option involving the use of force required the clear authorization of the Security Council in each specific case. He expressed his country's belief that that principle was implicit in the Council's primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, as well as in the absolute prohibition against the use of force in international relations.⁴⁶¹

The representative of Cuba maintained that this had been an invasion by the United States and NATO and that the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia were absolutely unworkable under the conditions that had been imposed, meaning the disintegration by force of a sovereign State.⁴⁶²

The representative of Ukraine stated that they were more certain than before that the threatening development of the situation in and around Kosovo could have been avoided, if the Security Council had been prepared to exercise its powers under Chapter VII of the Charter at a very early stage of the conflict. He also stressed that his country expected the Council to address in a positive and action-oriented way the problem of the economic losses of third countries suffered as a result of military activities in Kosovo.⁴⁶³

The representative of Croatia stated that "the Great Serbian expansion policy" had initiated wars in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, Slovenia, and had resulted in the dissolution of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, a founding member of the United Nations, and its replacement by five equal successor States, none of which automatically continued the international legal personality and status of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the United Nations. Regarding their role in the Kosovo crisis, he stressed that, while supporting the actions of the international community in Kosovo, they had persisted in maintaining the pace of the normalization of relations with the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and its peoples. He maintained that peace bred in, and on, economic prosperity so the international community needed to strengthen its approach towards fostering the overall security, political and economic stability and prosperity of the entire region and thus "widen the road" towards reintegration into Euro-Atlantic structures, for those who sought it.⁴⁶⁴

The representative of Albania expressed his country's high appreciation for the irreplaceable role of NATO, which had stopped "one of the greatest human catastrophes in Europe after the Second World War" and which had brought to a halt "the genocide and the ethnic cleansing carried out against millions of innocent civilians". He maintained that the leaders of the Group of Eight and NATO had been defending the principles of the Charter of the United Nations and preventing the spillover of the conflict into Europe. He underlined that the mission of peace initiated by the Security Council resolution would achieve success when it took into consideration two essential conditions set out by the international community. First, there needed to be substantial economic assistance for reconstructing Kosovo and its economy, infrastructure and self-governing institutions. Second, any long-term solution to the Kosovo problem had to take into consideration and respect the will of the people of Kosovo to decide their own future.⁴⁶⁵

The representative of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia stated that the implementation of the resolution and the peace agreement had priorities: the first priority was the goal of enabling each refugee and every displaced person to go home in safety and with dignity; the other was the recovery and reconstruction of the region. He stressed that the implementation of paragraph 17 of the resolution was of crucial importance for his country and for others in the region, and reiterated that the firm intention to promote democracy, economic prosperity, stability and regional cooperation in their region needed to be implemented in the spirit of the resolution, generously and without hesitation.⁴⁶⁶

The representative of Bulgaria emphasized that the return before the winter of all the ethnic Albanian refugees who wished to go back to their homes in Kosovo was the key to a durable resolution of the present conflict. He stressed that the rehabilitation efforts in Kosovo could be even more challenging than those that had led to the peace. He also noted that of particular importance in avoiding further similar crises in the Balkans was the comprehensive stabilization and development of the States affected by the Kosovo crisis. The international community needed to play a decisive role in helping countries in South-Eastern Europe to rebuild and develop their economies, their civil societies, their democratic infrastructure and their security relations according to their specific needs.⁴⁶⁷

At the same meeting, the representative of the United States took a second intervention to observe that the representative of Cuba had avoided any acknowledgement of the human realities in Kosovo

prior to the commencement of the NATO air campaign on 24 March.⁴⁶⁸

The representative of Cuba made a second statement and reiterated that it was NATO that had flagrantly violated the sovereignty and territorial integrity of a Member State.⁴⁶⁹

The representative of the Netherlands also made a second statement noting that an effort to get the Council to support the “allegation” that NATO had violated the Charter of the United Nations had been defeated by 12 votes to 3. He also referred again to the rule, which was now generally accepted in international law, that no sovereign State had the right to terrorize its own citizens.⁴⁷⁰
